The first mention of the infant's advantage as a ratio decidendi is in an odd dictum of Tankerville, 39 Ass. 1, who says: "If novel disseisin be brought by a guardian for the infant, though the infant in proper person disavows it, still nonsuit or retraxit shall not be adjudged, because the suit is presumed to be for his advantage; but if percase matter arises in the suit, whereby percase a disadvantage should be adjudged to the infant, then percase it would be good to surcease." The very terms, and especially the humorous repetition of "percase," intimate the discretion which the court reserves to itself, even in making an order which it can see to be for the benefit of the infant or against it. But this is a very different thing from judging whether a contract is for his benefit or not, and giving or taking away his rights in the exercise of such a discretion. If instead of saying that contracts prejudicial to infants are absolutely void, the books said merely that the courts would not enforce them, the modern rule would be better expressed. Thus trading contracts were formerly said to be "absolutely void as against public policy." (Bayley, J., in Thornton v. Illingworth, 2 Barn. & C. 824. But see comments on this in Benjamin on Sales, § 26, and Bennett's note, p. 37.) If the act is prejudicial only to an individual, then it is to be considered as voidable only by that individual. (Wilde, J., in Commonwealth v. Weiher, 3 Met. (Mass.) 445; Allis v. Billings, 6 Met. (Mass.) 415, 39 Am. Dec. 744; Parke, B., in Williams v. More, 11 Mees. & W. 256.) The cases holding infant's contracts void are collected and doubted in Parsons on Partnership, p. 18, n. e.

At common law the infant's ratification is needed to make an executory contract binding; and this of course implied that he had come of age. No obligation would be now judicially enforced against him, without such ratification (except in the states where by statute his contracts are presumptively valid, self apprentice by deed indented or indentures, for seven years; and <sup>d</sup> he may by deed or will appoint a guardian to his children, if he has any. Lastly, it is generally true, that an infant can make no other contract that will bind him: yet he may bind himself to pay for his necessary meat, drink, apparel, physic, and such other and need disaffirmance to discharge him, e. g., Iowa). But when the contract has been executed, and he seeks to get back money or property actually parted with, the case is quite different. He is allowed to repudiate his acts even during minority; and now the important question is, on what terms? We must distinguish here whether he is plaintiff or defendant. In the former case, at law, he could demand back all he had parted with by his voidable deed or act; but equity made him return the consideration, if he still had it, though it did not refuse relief if he had spent it.

Many conflicts may be solved by the distinction between rights in rem and in personam properly applied. When an infant repudiates his sale or purchase of chattels, he thereby restores the chattel to its original owner, so that a vendor to him may bring an action of replevin or of trover (not of trespass), not on any contract, express or implied, but on the original right of property and its breach, and he may bring a like action against his vendee. The repudiation likewise destroys all obligation to pay money on the contract. But as to the money paid on such contract before repudiation, the case is different. There is no right in rem remaining or revived to a sum of money. It must be sued for, if at all, on an implied promise to repay it. Such a promise cannot be implied from any act of an infant. Can it from his act after reaching majority? Not without in effect affirming the original contract. Yet some courts have held it can be done if he was in possession of the money after he had reached majority, some without that qualification, and some have gone so far as to make it a defense—a condition of any repudiation. If one who has sold and conveyed land during infancy were required to return the purchase money before revoking the deed and recovering the land, this would merely convert the sale into a mortgage, and would in effect make a valid and binding mortgage by an infant, as was said in Manning v. Johnson, 26 Ala. 446, 62 Am. Dec. 732, with long note, pp. 734–738, citing many dicta, which holds that infant may recover the land at law without returning the consideration, but with these important qualifications: (a) If the infant after he arrives at full age is shown to have been possessed of the consideration, and to have retained it an unreasonable time, or disposed of it, this will affirm his contract; (b) and the revocation of the contract by the infant at full age will allow the other party to sue for and recover at law the consideration paid him. a is in clear conflict with the cases that allow him to revoke until the statute runs; b is equivalent to enforcing the infant's contract to repay money lent; for if the other party wishes to provide an infant of means with spending money, he has necessaries; and likewise for his good teaching and instruction, whereby he may profit himself afterwards.* And thus much, at present, for the privileges and disabilities of infants.

only to buy property of him at a low rate, and he will hold it virtually as mortgaged for the money paid on it. He will only take the risk of the infant's entire insolvency before revocation, in which case he will still get a judgment for the amount paid him, and hold it over his head as in the case of any other insolvent debtor. Technically, too, this action can only be sustained upon an implied contract of the infant to repay money received in infancy, which the law has always refused to allow. The right of the other party to recover chattels given the infant in exchange or payment, after the infant's revocation of the transaction, rests on a different footing. (Badger v. Phinney, 15 Mass. 359, 8 Am. Dec. 105.)

An infant's contract will not be validated by fraudulent representations inducing the vendor to sell (Studwell v. Shapter, 54 N. Y. 249); nor fraud in representing himself of age. (Sims v. Everhardt, 102 U. S. 300, 26 L. Ed. 87.) But this may constitute a cause of action for the tort, though it will not estop him from repudiating the contract (Brown v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 117 Mass. 479); nor will he be estopped from repudiating a note and mortgage given for borrowed money to one who he knew believed him to be of full age (Baker v. Stone, 136 Mass. 405); but when the possession itself of the goods is obtained by fraud in the contract, e. g., by giving a fraudulent check, he will be liable (as an adult would be) in case of trover. (Mathews v. Cowan, 59 Ill. 341.) As a rule the rights and duties of third parties dealing with infants depend on the actual age of the infant, not on their knowledge of it. They cannot meet the plea of infancy by showing that they supposed the party to be of full age; nor does their knowledge of his infancy diminish rights they otherwise would possess. (Cassier v. Fales, 139 Mass. 461, 1 N. E. 922, 20 The Reporter, 208.) Even the infant's misrepresentation and fraud as to his age will not make him liable. (Aliter, by statute in some states, e. g., Iowa.) In Knapp v. Crosby, 1 Mass. 479, where the costs on a writ of error were in the power of the court, and a judgment was set aside on the ground of defendant's infancy, costs were refused him because plaintiff did not know of his infancy. Infant's domicile is that of parents—father, if living (Cf. Wharton on Conflict of Laws, § 41; Wheeler v. Burrow, 18 Ind. 14; Davis v. Davis, 30 Ill. 180), mother, if in charge of it (Jenness v. Jenness, 24 Ind. 355, 87 Am. Dec. 335); and that of father remains after his death till legally changed. (Pennsylvania v. Ravenel, 21 How. 103, 16 L. Ed. 33.) Bastard has mother's domicile. (Eggleston v. Battles, 26 Vt. 548.) Quere, as to effect of legitimating statute as in Missouri with regard to null marriage?—HAMMOND.

variety subsisting, for the advancement of religion, of learning, and of commerce; in order to preserve entire and forever those rights and immunities, which, if they were granted only to those individuals of which the body corporate is composed, would upon their death be utterly lost and extinct. To show the advantages of these incorporations, let us consider the case of a college in either of our universities, founded ad studendum et orandum (for study and prayer), for the encouragement and support of religion and learning. If this was a mere voluntary assembly, the individuals which compose it might indeed read, pray, study, and perform scholastic exercises together, so long as they could agree to do so: but they [468] could neither frame, nor receive any laws or rules of their conduct; none at least, which would have any binding force, for want of a coercive power to create a sufficient obligation. Neither could they be capable of retaining any privileges or immunities: for, if such privileges be attacked, which of all this unconnected assembly has the right, or ability, to defend them? And, the creation of such fictitious bodies only to the state. Then in the nineteenth century Savigny developed and defined this fiction theory. The question might well be asked, How can that which is a mere fiction act so as to acquire rights and incur liabilities? For the fictitious person will hardly serve a useful purpose if it cannot at least acquire property and make contracts. The answer was found in an analogy between the artificial person and the natural person who is under disability, such as one of tender years. Just as the pupillus of Roman law who cannot act has a tutor who acts for him and whose acts are deemed to be his acts, so the artificial person who cannot act must be represented by natural persons whose acts are attributed to it.

"Against this fiction theory and its developments, as against other doctrines which Romanism had forced upon the native law, renescent Germanism replied with the Genossenschaftstheorie. 'Our German Fellowship,' so Maitland sums up the essence of that theory, 'is no fiction, no symbol, no piece of the state's machinery, no collective name for individuals, but a living organism and a real person with a body and members and a will of its own. Itself can will, itself can act; it wills and acts by the men who are its organs, as a man wills and acts by brain, mouth and hand. It is not a fictitious person; it is a Gesamtperson, and its will is a Gesamtwille; it is a group-person and its will is a group-will.'"—GELDART, Legal Personality (1911), 27 Law Quarterly Review, 90, 92.

"Has the common law received the fiction theory of corporations?" This question is answered by Sir Frederick Pollock, 27 Law Quarterly Review, 219, 232: "We may now try to sum up the doctrine as it appears to have been understood at the time, say about 1600, when the common law was settled in when they are dispersed by death or otherwise, how shall they transfer these advantages to another set of students, equally unconnected as themselves? So, also, with regard to holding estates or other property, if land be granted for the purposes of religion or learning to twenty individuals not incorporated, there is no legal way of continuing the property to any other persons for the same purposes, but by endless conveyances from one to the other, as often as the hands are changed. But when they are consolidated and united into a corporation, they and their successors are then considered as one person in law: as one person, they have one will, which is collected from the sense of the majority of the individuals: this one will may establish rules and orders for the regulation of the whole, which are a sort of municipal laws of this little republic; or rules and statutes may be prescribed to it at its creation, which are then in the place of natural laws: the privileges and immunities, the estates and possessions, of the corporation, when once vested in them, will be forever vested, without any new conveyance to new successions; for all the individual members that have existed from the foundation to the present time, or that shall ever hereafter exist, are but one person in law, a person that never dies:

its classical form and became accessible in print. A body of men claiming corporate personality may rely either on express royal authority (much more on the authority of an act of parliament in which the king and the estates of the realm concur), or on ancient and continuous usage. When the existence of a corporation is established in either way, it is a person in law having such capacities and disposing powers as are compatible with an incorporeal subject of rights and duties. These capacities are attributed to it by the general law, and an express grant is not needed to confer them. On the contrary, they can be diminished only by express restriction. The king, or the founder with his assent, can prescribe internal regulations, but the prevalent opinion is that without parliament he cannot substantially derogate from the corporation's right to do, by means of its common seal, all such acts in the law as a natural man may by deed, nor yet confer on it immunity from an ordinary man's responsibility; the law will allow the limits imposed in both directions by the nature of things, and it knows of no others. How far exactly these conditions operate, to what kinds of actions and legal process, for example, a corporation is amenable, has to be worked out as particular cases arise. As to what the nature of corporate personality may be in itself, no positive rule at all is laid down. Most of the points could probably be supported at need by a good show of civilian though hardly of canonist authors. Nevertheless the whole does not look to me very like the work of men imbued with the fiction theory."

in like manner as the River Thames is still the same river, though the parts which compose it are changing every instant.

§ 633. 1. History of corporations: Roman law.—The honor of originally inventing these political constitutions entirely belongs to the Romans. They were introduced, as Plutarch says, by Numa; who finding upon his accession, the city torn to pieces by the two rival factions of Sabines and Romans, thought it a prudent and politic measure to subdivide these two into many smaller ones, by [469] instituting separate societies of every manual trade and profession. They were afterwards much considered by the civil law,<sup>a</sup> in which they were called universitates (corporations), as forming one whole out of many individuals; or collegia (corporations), from being gathered together: they were adopted also by the canon law, for the maintenance of ecclesiastical discipline; and from them our spiritual corporations are derived. But our laws have considerably refined and improved upon the invention, according to the usual genius of the English nation: particularly with regard to sole corporations, consisting of one person only, of which the Roman lawyers had no notion; their maxim being that “tres faciunt collegium (three make a corporation).”<sup>b</sup> Though they held, that if a corporation, originally consisting of three persons, be reduced to one, “si universitas ad unum redit,” it may still subsist as a corporation, “et stet nomen universitatis.”<sup>c</sup>

§ 634. 2. Classes of corporations.—Before we proceed to treat of the several incidents of corporations, as regarded by the laws of England, let us first take a view of the several sorts of them;<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Public and municipal corporations.—It will be seen that Blackstone nowhere mentions what is now the most important division of corporations—that into public and private. It was quite unknown when he wrote. Indeed, the chief kind of public corporations, the municipal, were hardly distinguishable in their legal aspect from private corporations. They lacked all the features which now make so broad a difference in the rules of law applicable to them, that the latest writers find it impossible to treat of the two together. The great work of Judge Dillon on Municipal Corporations, and the still newer ones of Morawetz and Taylor on Private Corporations, describe systems far more and then we shall be better enabled to apprehend their respective qualities.

§ 635. a. Corporations aggregate—b. Corporations sole.—The first division of corporations is into aggregate and sole. Corporations aggregate consist of many persons united together into one society, and are kept up by a perpetual succession of members, so as to continue forever: of which kind are the mayor and commonalty of a city, the head and fellows of a college, the dean and chapter of a cathedral church. Corporations sole consist of one person only and his successors, in some particular station, who are incorporated by law, in order to give them some legal capacities and advantages, particularly that of perpetuity, which in their natural persons they could not have had. In this sense the king is a sole corporation:<sup>4</sup> so is a bishop: so are some deans, and pre-unlike and disparate, to use Mr. Austin's favorite word, than were the ecclesiastical and lay corporations, or the aggregate and sole of Blackstone. On the other hand, these divisions have almost disappeared from American law within the last century. Ecclesiastical corporations were known only to a few of our older states at any time; and even in these they have lost all distinctive features. Even our churches, which preserve a corporate organization, are not recognized by the law as such, and could not well be under the constitutional provisions forbidding religious establishments. They are formed in the same manner and under the same rules with lay corporations for literary, educational, and charitable purposes: and under the statutes of many states form with these a class by themselves, separate from the corporations formed for pecuniary profit. As for sole corporations, they have disappeared almost entirely from our law: not so much by any change in the law itself, as by the obsolescence of the ecclesiastical dignitaries who furnish most of Blackstone's instances. Single persons, holding some office or trust, can take property, or obligations to them and their respective successors, by properly worded instruments; many public officers, treasurers, sheriffs, etc., are specially authorized by statutes to do the same: the law applicable to these cases is almost precisely that which a century ago would have been deemed peculiar to sole corporations; and yet the word is hardly ever applied to them. In the reports and digests and treatises it is found under the rubric of office, officer, or some more specific term, and rarely found under that of corporations.

Municipal corporations, as now known, may be said to be a development of common-law principles on this side of the Atlantic. Until half a century ago, even the cities, boroughs, and other like bodies of England were organized on bendaries, distinct from their several chapters: and so is every parson and vicar. And the necessity, or at least use, of this institution will be very apparent, if we consider the case of [470] a parson of a church. At the original endowment of parish churches, the freehold of the church, the churchyard, the parsonage house, the glebe, and the tithes of the parish, were vested in the then parson by the bounty of the donor, as a temporal recompense to him for his spiritual care of the inhabitants, and with intent that the same emoluments should ever afterwards continue as a recompense for the same care. But how was this to be effected? The freehold was vested in the parson; and, if we suppose it vested in his natural capacity, on his death it might descend to his heir, and the same model with those for private purposes. Membership or "freedom" was transmitted like private property, or given by co-optation, and rarely required even a residence within the corporate bounds. Much oftener it went with the title to land in these. The rights and duties of the corporation itself were measured by no general rule. Even the most necessary powers of administration were shared with parishes, manor courts, and artificial districts of various kinds. The famous History of Boroughs, prepared for a political purpose, and one of the first weapons of the long agitation which led to the reform bill of 1832, is full of curious details as to the composition of each parliamentary borough in England. The state of things it describes lasted down to 1835, when the Municipal Corporations' Reform Act, 5 & 6 Wm. IV, c. 76, worked a great reform, and remodeled the most important places with a few exceptions on a general plan, not unlike that which had grown up in the United States. Its distinctive features may be stated briefly thus: The municipal corporation is a subordinate branch of the government of the land, not an embodiment of individuals for their own ends, although the ancient principle of corporate unity—that the entire body is one person in law—is the means employed in both. But membership in this joint personality is gained in different ways. The municipal corporation has no control over the enjoyment of its own privileges. Residence within the corporate bounds is the chief prerequisite, and all others are fixed by the legislature, or by general law. The corporation itself has no voice in the matter.

"When a man moves into a town he becomes a citizen thereof (if possessed of the requisite qualifications as to age, etc., and if he remains the requisite length of time) whatever may be the desire of himself or the town." (Morton, J., Oakes v. Hill, 10 Pick. 333, 346. Cf. Overseers of Poor v. Sears, 22 Pick. 122, 130; Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 356, 23 Am. Rep. 332; People v. Canaday, 73 N. C. 198, 21 Am. Rep. 465.) Nor has it any choice as to the objects of its existence or the methods of obtaining them. These are fixed for it, either by special charter or by general legislation, and they are invariably of a public nature. It must, of course, exercise a wide discretion as to the

would be liable to his debts and encumbrances: or, at best, the heir might be compellable, at some trouble and expense, to convey these rights to the succeeding incumbent. The law, therefore, has wisely ordained that the parson, quatenus (as) parson, shall never die, any more than the king; by making him and his successors a corporation. By which means all the original rights of the parsonage are preserved entire to the successor: for the present incumbent, and his predecessor who lived seven centuries ago, are in law one and the same person; and what was given to the one was given to the other also.<sup>3</sup> means to be employed in each case, but even in selecting these it cannot work for the private interest of members. The fact that it is composed of all who come within it, and that it loses all interest in those who depart from it, furnishes a sufficient test of what are private as distinct from public interests. (Dillon on Municipal Corporations, §§ 9, 52 et seq., 195; Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, c. 8; United States v. B. & O. R. Co., 17 Wall. 332, 21 L. Ed. 601; Philadelphia v. Fox, 64 Pa. St. 169; People v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 532; People v. Albertson, 55 N. Y. 50; State v. Leffingwell, 54 Mo. 458.) Again, it results from the foregoing that the public or municipal corporation, unlike the private, has no vested rights except in the property which it holds in trust for municipal purposes in the interest of its constantly fluctuating membership. The sovereign (represented as to the municipal corporation by the legislature) may modify its charter at pleasure, increase or diminish its powers, or wipe it out altogether.

The distinction between the two forms of corporation may be curiously illustrated in this respect by the ancient difference of customary and prescriptive rights. Whatever could be claimed by custom at common law is of such nature that a fluctuating body like the inhabitants of a particular territory may claim it. Whatever can be claimed only by prescription is property, which they as a body cannot claim, but must leave to those who can deduce each a several title to it. (Compare 2 Comm. 263.) Yet a municipal corporation can claim the same by prescription now.—HAMMOND.

3 Corporations sole.—"The suggestion in Maine's text regarding the Roman ancestor in his representative character as a kind of corporation sole may be helpful to English students, but we can hardly trust it to throw light on the actual formation of Roman legal ideas. For our English category of corporations sole is not only, as Maine calls it, a fiction, but modern, anomalous, and of no practical use. When a parson or other solely corporate office-holder dies, there is no one to act for the corporation until a successor is appointed, and, when appointed, that successor can do nothing which he could not do without being called a corporation sole. In the case of the parson even the continuity of the freehold is not saved, and it is said to be in abeyance in the interval. As for the king, or 'the crown,' being a corporation sole, the language of our books appears to be nothing but a clumsy and, after all, ineffective de-

§ 636. c. Ecclesiastical corporations.—Another division of corporations, either sole or aggregate, is into ecclesiastical and lay. Ecclesiastical corporations are where the members that compose it are entirely spiritual persons; such as bishops; certain deans, and prebendaries; all archdeacons, parsons, and vicars; which are sole corporations: deans and chapters at present, and formerly prior and convent, abbot and monks, and the like, bodies aggregate. These are erected for the furtherance of religion, and perpetuating the rights of the church.

§ 637. d. Lay corporations—(1) Civil corporations; (2) Eleemosynary corporations.—Lay corporations are of two sorts, civil and eleemosynary. The civil are such as are erected for a variety of temporal purposes. The king, for instance, is made a corpora-

vice to avoid openly personifying the state. The problems of federal politics in Canada and Australia threaten to make the fiction complex. Is 'the crown' a trustee for Dominion and Province, for commonwealth and state, with possibly conflicting interests? Or is there one indivisible crown being or having several persons for different purposes? (F. W. Maitland, L. Q. R. xvi. 335, xvii. 131; W. Harrison Moore, L. Q. R. xx, 351; Markby, 'Elements of Law,' § 145). The whole thing seems to have arisen from the technical difficulty of making grants to a parson and his successors after the practice of making them to God and the patron saint had been discontinued, as tending to bring the saints into the unseemly position of litigants before secular courts. All this we may now think makes for historical curiosity rather than philosophical edification."—POLLOCK, Maine's Ancient Law, with notes by Sir Frederick Pollock, 226.

"A sole corporation is generally said to be a corporation composed of a single member. The definition is inaccurate and misleading. The capital stock of any corporation might by transfer become invested in one person, but this would not constitute it a corporation sole, it would still retain its original character." Thompson on Corporations, § 15.

The existence of the corporation sole in English law as a juristic person has been doubted by Professor Maitland. The Corporation Sole, 16 Law Quarterly Review, 335. The Crown as Corporation, 17 Law Quarterly Review, 131. "Then following in the steps of Sir William Markby, I ventured to say that this corporation sole has shown itself to be no 'juristic person' but is either a natural man or a juristic abortion."

Corporations sole have practically passed out of the law of the United States. They have been recognized, however, in several states. Weston v. Hunt, 2 Mass. 500; Archbishop of San Francisco v. Shipman, 79 Cal. 288, 21 Pac. 830; McCloskey v. Doherty, 97 Ky. 300, 30 S. W. 649; Governor v. Allen, 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 176.

tion to prevent in general the possibility of an interregnum or vacancy of the throne, and to preserve the possessions of the crown entire; for, immediately upon the demise of one king, his successor is, as we have formerly seen, in full possession of the regal rights and dignity. Other lay corporations are erected for the good government of [471] a town or particular district, as a mayor and commonalty, bailiff and burgesses, or the like: some for the advancement and regulation of manufactures and commerce; as the trading companies of London, and other towns: and some for the better carrying on of divers special purposes; as churchwardens, for conservation of the goods of the parish; the college of physicians and company of surgeons in London, for the improvement of the medical science; the royal society for the advancement of natural knowledge; and the society of antiquaries for promoting the study of antiquities. And among these I am inclined to think the general corporate bodies of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge must be ranked:<sup>4</sup> for it is clear they are not spiritual or ecclesiastical corporations, being composed of more laymen than clergy: neither are they eleemosynary foundations, though stipends are annexed to particular magistrates and professors, any more than other corporations where the acting officers have standing salaries; for these are rewards pro opera et labore (for work and labor), not charitable donations only, since every stipend is preceded by service and duty: they seem, therefore, to be merely civil corporations. The eleemosynary sort are such as are constituted for the perpetual distribution of the free alms, or bounty, of the founder of them to such persons as he has directed. Of this kind are all hospitals for the maintenance of the poor, sick, and impotent; and all colleges, both in our universities and out of them: which colleges, are founded for two purposes; 1. For the promotion of piety and learning by proper regulations and ordinances. 2. For imparting assistance to the members of those bodies, in order to enable them to prosecute their devotion and studies with greater ease and assiduity. And all these eleemosynary corporations are, strictly speaking, lay and not ecclesiastical, even though composed of ecclesiastical persons,<sup>f</sup> and although they in some things partake of the nature, privileges, and restrictions of ecclesiastical bodies.

[472] Having thus marshaled the several species of corporations, let us next proceed to consider, 1. How corporations, in general, may be created. 2. What are their powers, capacities, and incapacities. 3. How corporations are visited. And 4. How they may be dissolved.

§ 638. 3. Creation of corporations—a. Civil law.—Corporations, by the civil law, seem to have been created by the mere act, and voluntary association of their members; provided such convention was not contrary to law, for then it was illicitum collegium (an unlawful corporation).<sup>g</sup> It does not appear that the prince's consent was necessary to be actually given to the foundation of them; but merely that the original founders of these voluntary and friendly societies (for they were little more than such) should not establish any meetings in opposition to the laws of the state.<sup>h</sup>

§ No doubt the authorization of the supreme power of the state was needed to constitute corporations as legal persons under the Roman law, and the assent of the sovereign was necessary for their dissolution; and Professor Williston is right in his observation that "Blackstone is in error in saying that by the civil law the voluntary association of the members was sufficient unless con-

§ 639. b. English law—(1) Corporations by common law; (2) Corporations by prescription.—But, with us in England, the king's consent is absolutely necessary to the erection of any corporation, either impliedly or expressly given.<sup>a</sup> The king's implied consent is to be found in corporations which exist by force of the common law, to which our former kings are supposed to have given their concurrence; <sup>5a</sup> common law being nothing else but custom, arising from the universal agreement of the whole community. Of this sort are the king himself, all bishops, parsons, vicars, churchwardens, and some others; who by common law have ever been held (as far as our books can show us) to have been corporations, virtute officii: and this incorporation is so inseparably annexed to their offices, that we cannot frame a complete legal idea of any of these persons, but we must also have an idea trary to law—an error probably caused by the fact that penalties were imposed on certain forbidden associations in the nature of clubs for acting without the authorization of the state, and only on these.” “The History of the Law of Business Corporations before 1800,” by Samuel Williston, in 3 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History, pp. 195, 197. The reader will find much of interest in this essay.

<sup>a</sup> Cities and towns were first erected into corporate communities on the Continent, and endowed with many valuable privileges, about the eleventh century (Roberts Cha. V. i. 30.): to which the consent of the feudal sovereign was absolutely necessary, as many of his prerogatives and revenues were thereby considerably diminished.

<sup>5a</sup> “We find Blackstone laying it down that the sovereign's consent is absolutely necessary to the erection of any corporation. Such consent, he explains, is implied with respect to corporations at the common law. In the United States the courts have taken a position similar to that of Blackstone. (Corporations at the common law have been but rarely mentioned in American corporate law. The validity, however, of a corporation aggregate at the common law was recognized by the United States supreme court, speaking by Mr. Justice Story, in Terrett v. Taylor, 9 Cranch, 43, 46 (churchwardens), and in Pawlet v. Clark, 9 Cranch, 292, 328 (same). The validity of a corporation sole at the common law was recognized in the cases just cited (parson), and in Governor v. Allen, 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 176 (governor of a state). As to a corporation sole by virtue of a statute, see Weston v. Hunt, 2 Mass. 500 (parson); Brunswick v. Dunning, 7 Mass. 445 (parson); Jansen v. Ostrander, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 670, 679 (a town officer was a corporation ‘by implication from the act creating the office’).” Edward H. Warren, “Collateral Attack on Incorporation,” 21 Harv. Law Rev. 303, 311.

of a corporation, capable to transmit [473] his rights to his successors, at the same time. Another method of implication, whereby the king's consent is presumed, is as to all corporations by prescription, such as the city of London, and many others,<sup>1</sup> which have existed as corporations, time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary; and therefore are looked upon in law to be well created. For though the members thereof can show no legal charter of incorporation, yet in cases of such high antiquity the law presumes there once was one; and that by the variety of accidents, which a length of time may produce, the charter is lost or destroyed.

§ 640. (3) Consent of king, how given—(a) By parliament.—The methods, by which the king's consent is expressly given, are either by act of parliament or charter. By act of parliament, of which the royal assent is a necessary ingredient, corporations may undoubtedly be created;<sup>1</sup> but it is observable, that most of those statutes, which are usually cited as having created corporations, do either confirm such as have been before created by the king; as in the case of the college of physicians, erected by charter 10 Hen. VIII (1518),<sup>2</sup> which charter was afterwards confirmed in parliament;<sup>1</sup> or, they permit the king to erect a corporation in futuro with such and such powers; as is the case of the bank of England,<sup>3</sup> and the society of the British fishery.<sup>4</sup> So that the immediate creative act is usually performed by the king alone, in virtue of his royal prerogative.<sup>5</sup>

§ 641. (b) By charter.—All the other methods, therefore, whereby corporations exist, by common law, by prescription, and by act of parliament, are for the most part reducible to this of the king's letters patent, or charter of incorporation. The king's creation may be performed by the words "creamus, erigimus, fundamus, incorporamus (we create, we erect, we found, we incorporate)," or the like. Nay, it is held, that if the king grants to a set of men to have gildam mercatoriam, a [474] mercantile meeting or assembly,<sup>p</sup> this is alone sufficient to incorporate and establish them forever.<sup>q</sup>

§ 642. (4) Power of parliament to create corporations.—The parliament, we observe, by its absolute and transcendent authority, may perform this, or any other act whatsoever: and actually did perform it to a great extent, by statute 39 Eliz., c. 5 (Workhouses, 1597), which incorporated all hospitals and houses of correction founded by charitable persons, without further trouble: and the same has been done in other cases of charitable foundations. But otherwise it has not formerly been usual thus to intrench upon the prerogative of the crown, and the king may prevent it when he pleases. And, in the particular instance before mentioned, it was done, as Sir Edward Coke observes,<sup>r</sup> to avoid the charges of incorporation and licenses of mortmain in small benefactions; which in his days were grown so great, that they discouraged many men from undertaking these pious and charitable works.

§ 643. (5) Creation of corporations by patent.—The king (it is said) may grant to a subject the power of erecting corporations,<sup>s</sup> though the contrary was formerly held: 'that is, he may permit the subject to name the persons and powers of the corporation at his pleasure; but it is really the king that erects, and the subject is but the instrument: for though none but the king can make a corporation, yet qui facit per alium, facit per se (he who does a thing by the agency of another, does it himself).<sup>u</sup> In this manner the chancellor of the University of Oxford has power by charter to erect corporations; and has actually often exerted it, in the erection of several matriculated companies, now subsisting, of tradesmen subservient to the students.

§ 644. (6) Corporate name.—When a corporation is erected, a name must be given to it; and by that name alone it must sue, and be sued, and do all [475] legal acts; though a very minute variation therein is not material.<sup>v</sup> Such name is the very being of its constitution; and, though it is the will of the king that erects the corporation, yet the name is the knot of its combination, without which it could not perform its corporate functions.<sup>w</sup> The name of incorporation, says Sir Edward Coke, is as a proper name, or name of baptism; and therefore when a private founder gives his college or hospital a name, he does it only as a godfather; and by the same name the king baptizes the incorporation.<sup>x 7</sup>

<sup>7</sup> Authority to create corporations.—The crown has at all times exercised the prerogative of creating corporations by charter or letters patent, and may still do so upon the advice of a responsible minister. Thus, in 1889, the British South Africa Company was “constituted, erected, and incorporated . . . by our prerogative royal and of our especial grace.” But trading corporations are now usually incorporated either by special acts of parliament, as most of our railway companies have been, or under the powers contained in general acts of parliament, of which the most important is the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. That act, which repeals and re-enacts in the form of a Consolidating Act, the Companies Act, 1862, and many other acts on the same subject, empowers any seven or more persons to form themselves into an incorporated company for any lawful purpose, by subscribing to a memorandum of association and otherwise complying with the requirements of the act. A vast number of trading companies have been formed under that act, or the earlier Companies Acts, whose place it has taken.—STEPHEN, 3 Comm. (16th ed.), 6.

In the United States, where written constitutions define the powers of the several branches of government, the power of chartering corporations belongs to the legislature only. The power of granting corporate franchises is not given to Congress in express terms by the constitution, but it belongs to Congress as an incident to the powers expressly granted. McCullough v. Maryland, 4

§ 645. 4. Powers of a corporation—a. To have perpetual succession; b. To sue and be sued; c. To purchase and hold lands; d. To have a common seal; e. To make by-laws.—After a corporation is so formed and named, it acquires many powers, rights, capacities, and incapacities, which we are next to consider. Some of these are necessarily and inseparably incident to every corporation; which incidents, as soon as a corporation is duly erected, are tacitly annexed of course.<sup>7</sup> As, 1. To have perpetual succession. This is the very end of its incorporation: for there cannot be a succession forever without an incorporation;<sup>8</sup> and therefore all aggregate corporations have a power necessarily implied of electing

Wheat. 316. Whether Congress can charter a corporation in any particular case, therefore, depends wholly upon the constitutionality of the object to be attained, and the fact that the formation of a corporation is really adapted to effect this object. Morawetz on Private Corporations, § 9.

In many of the states the legislature is prohibited by constitutional provision from granting corporate franchises except within certain prescribed rules. Thus, it is provided, in many instances, that no charter of incorporation shall be granted by special act, and that corporations shall be formed only in accordance with general laws. Morawetz on Private Corporations, § 10.

The rule that corporations may exist by prescription has been frequently asserted in the United States with regard to municipal corporations. "But the acquiescence of the public cannot upon the same principle be held to legalize a private corporation; for the public are ordinarily not concerned in the existence of a private corporation, and acquiescence can have no weight where there is no cause for objecting.

"Long-continued uses of corporate franchises may undoubtedly be presumptive evidence that a charter was granted, in the United States as well as in England, but in the United States all franchises must be derived from an act of the legislature, and it is generally possible to ascertain with certainty whether or not a corporation was chartered, by reference to the statute books or to the records of the articles of incorporation." Morawetz on Private Corporations, § 37.

De facto corporations.—The corporation at the common law and the corporation by prescription were recognized by the courts as legal units though unchartered. The courts have been called upon to recognize the acts of de facto corporations as corporate acts, although such corporations have not been sanctioned by the state because they have failed to conform to statutory provisions regarding the formation and regulation of corporations. Professor Warren has discussed this subject thoroughly in two articles in the Harvard Law Review. "There is therefore nothing in the nature of things which prevents a court from members in the room of such as go off.* 2. To sue or be sued, implead or be impleaded, grant or receive, by its corporate name, and do all other acts as natural persons may. 3. To purchase lands, and hold them, for the benefit of themselves and their successors: which two are consequential to the former. 4. To have a common seal. For a corporation, being an invisible body, cannot manifest its intentions by any personal act or oral discourse: it therefore acts and speaks only by its common seal.<sup>8</sup> For, though recognizing as a legal unit a body of persons unauthorized by the sovereign to act as a unit, but in fact acting as a unit.

“Are there sufficient reasons of policy to prevent the courts from recognizing such body as a unit?”

“It has been accepted as clear and long settled law, that, without the consent of the state, corporate action is unauthorized.

“It follows that if the state complains in a ‘quo warranto’ or similar proceeding, of unauthorized corporate action, the courts will grant the state appropriate relief. This is clear law.

“But suppose that the state does not complain. Ought the courts to allow the question of legal incorporation to be raised collaterally?” 21 Harv. Law Rev. 305; 20 Harv. Law Rev. 456.

The courts have recognized the acts of de facto corporations as corporate acts and have denied collateral attack. They have based their decisions on the broad ground of estoppel. Four requisites to the existence of such corporations have been recognized; (1) the existence of a charter, or some law under which a corporation with the powers assumed might lawfully be created; and (2) a bona fide attempt to organize a corporation under such a charter or statute; (3) a colorable compliance with such a charter or statute; (4) an actual user of the corporate powers or some of them which might have been rightfully used by such an organization. Methodist etc. Church v. Pickett, 19 N. Y. 482; Newcomb-Endicott Co. v. Fee, 167 Mich. 574, 133 N. W. 540. The courts have, however, denied collateral attack in cases where all the technical requisites were not present and have allowed recovery by or against the de facto corporation on the ground of fairness between the parties. Professor Warren concludes his review of the subject by saying, “Viewing the subject as a whole, it is seen that whether or not collateral attack is to be permitted depends not so much on logical deductions as on the exercise of a sound judgment.”

Questions of collateral attack upon incorporation usually have arisen in the United States, but not in England, where the statute provides that the certificate of incorporation is conclusive evidence that the provisions of the Companies Acts have been complied with.

<sup>8</sup> “This reason, besides bearing on its face indications of having been invented after the fact, goes altogether too far. A corporation has no hand the particular members may express their private consents to any act, by words, or signing their names, yet this does not bind the corporation; it is the fixing of the seal, and that only, which unites the several assents of the individuals, who compose the community, and makes one joint assent of the whole.<sup>b 9</sup> 5. with which to affix its seal, and if it may perform that act by an agent, there is no reason in the nature of things why it should not do anything else by the same instrumentality. (1 Blackst. Comm., Sharswood's ed., 475, n. 7.)" Williston, Business Corporations Before 1800, 3 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History, 195, 209.

<sup>9</sup> Use of seal by corporations.—This rule has, however, been considerably modified, both by the relaxations introduced by the decisions of the courts and by the legislature. On the one hand, the courts have long admitted the exception in favor of all corporations aggregate that they may without the use of the common seal do all acts of a trivial and frequently occurring kind and those which by their nature do not admit of delay, for, to require such acts to be done under seal, would defeat the objects for which the corporation is created. (Per Denman, C. J., in Church v. Imperial Gas Light & Coke Co. (1838), 6 Ad. & E. 846, 861.) And, in the case of corporations established for trading purposes, the rule is, that they may without the use of a seal do all things of ordinary occurrence in that trade; the seal of the company only being required for matters of an unusual and extraordinary kind. (South of Ireland Colliery Co. v. Waddle (1869), L. R. 4 C. P. 617.) In the case of companies incorporated under the Companies Acts, or by special act of parliament incorporating the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, the legislature has enacted that the company may make without the common seal all contracts which an individual may make orally or in writing without the use of a seal. The seal of the company is only required for contracts of a kind which if made by an individual would have to be under seal. (Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, § 76; Companies Clauses Act, 1845, § 97.)—STEPHEN, 3 Comm. (16th ed.), 7.

"In former times it was held that a corporation could not express its will or enter into a contract except through an instrument under seal, executed by a duly constituted agent. This doctrine certainly had no principle based upon reason to support it; on the contrary, it seems to have been a result of the ignorance of the art of writing during the dark ages. It was never rigorously applied in all cases, which shows that it did not result from the nature of a corporation; and in modern times the ancient rule has been wholly discarded. It is now a rule well settled throughout the United States that a corporation may make a contract without the use of a seal in all cases in which this may be done by an individual; and it is equally well settled that an agent of a corporation may be appointed without the use of a seal, whatever may be the purposes of the agency." Morawetz on Corporations, § 338; Thompson on Corporations, § 1920.

or private statutes for the better government [476] of the corporation; which are binding upon themselves, unless contrary to the laws of the land, and then they are void. This is also included by law in the very act of incorporation:° for, as natural reason is given to the natural body for the governing it, so by-laws or statutes are a sort of political reason to govern the body politic. And this right of making by-laws for their own government, not contrary to the law of the land, was allowed by the law of the twelve tables at Rome.<sup>d</sup> But no trading company is, with us, allowed to make by-laws, which may affect the king's prerogative, or the common profit of the people, under penalty of 40*l.* unless they be approved by the chancellor, treasurer, and chief justices, or the judges of assize in their circuits: and, even though they be so approved, still if contrary to law they are void.* These five powers are inseparably incident to every corporation, at least to every corporation aggregate: for two of them, though they may be practiced, yet are very unnecessary to a corporation sole; viz., to have a corporate seal to testify his sole assent, and to make statutes for the regulation of his own conduct.

§ 646. 5. Privileges and disabilities.—There are also certain privileges and disabilities that attend an aggregate corporation,<sup>10</sup>

10 Characteristics of corporations.—The five distinctive characteristics or attributes of a modern private corporation are these: (1) to sue and be sued in the corporate name, (2) to take and hold the title to real property in its corporate name, (3) to conduct its business and affairs through a board of managers or directors, (4) to continue in existence during the period for which it is chartered irrespective of the death of its members or the transfer by them of their shares, (5) to be liable for all of the corporate debts and obligations to the exclusion of any liability upon its members for such debts or obligations. Liverpool Ins. Co. v. Massachusetts, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 566, 19 L. Ed. 1029; Thomas v. Dakin, 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 9; Andrews Bros. Co. v. Youngstown Coke Co., 86 Fed. 585, 30 C. C. A. 293, 58 U. S. App. 444. The last two attributes, succession and liability, are considered the most important, and are usually relied upon to determine whether an association of individuals and are not applicable to such as are sole; the reason of them ceasing, and of course the law. It must always appear by attorney; for it cannot appear in person, being, as Sir Edward Coke says,<sup>f</sup> invisible, and existing only in intendment and consideration of law. It can neither maintain, nor be made defendant to, an action of battery or such like personal injuries: for a corporation can neither beat, nor be beaten, in its body politic.<sup>g</sup> <sup>11</sup> A corporation cannot commit treason, or felony, or other crime, in its corporate is to be considered as a corporation, an entity distinct and separate from its members, or merely as an association of individuals which is the case of an ordinary partnership.

"Under the common law, the members of a corporation are not individually liable to any extent for its debts, unless there is an express provision in the company's charter creating a liability." Morawetz on Corporations, § 779. In England at the present time the liability of a shareholder is regulated by the form of the memorandum of association, and the provisions of the Companies Act, 1908. A statement that the liability of members is limited means "limited by shares," and no member can be called upon to pay more after his shares are fully paid up. In the United States the state constitutions and state statutes have regulated and enhanced the liability of stockholders. Thompson on Corporations, § 4759 et seq. The statutes may generally be classified under three heads, accordingly as they impose single, double or triple liability. Thompson on Corporations, §§ 4791-4794. In each of these three cases the liability is limited in amount and is in the first case the par value of the shares of the stockholder, and in the other two cases is the par value doubled and trebled respectively. There is a fourth class of constitutional and statutory regulations which impose a liability on shareholders which is not limited but is proportional. Thompson on Corporations, § 4797. There the stockholder is liable for such proportion of the corporate debts as the amount of stock owned by him bears to the whole amount of the subscribed capital stock.

11 Tort liability of corporations.—Under the theory that a corporation could do only those things which it was authorized by the state to do, the conclusion naturally followed that a corporation could not commit a tort, and therefore could not be liable in a tort action. The modern rule is entirely opposed to that point of view and corporations have been held liable for the torts of their agents committed in the course of their employment to the same degree as individuals. Chestnut Hill Turnpike Co. v. Rutter, 4 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 6, 8 Am. Dec. 675. A malicious state of mind has also been imputed to the corporation so as to render it liable for "vexatiously and maliciously" driving omnibuses. Green v. London Omnibus Co., 7 Com. B., N. S., 290. It cannot be executor or administrator, or perform any personal duties; for it cannot take an oath for the due execution of the office. It cannot be seised of lands to the use of another;<sup>j</sup> for such kind of confidence is foreign to the end of its institution. Neither can it be committed to prison;<sup>k</sup> for its existence being ideal, no man can apprehend or arrest it. And therefore, also, it cannot be outlawed; for outlawry always supposes a precedent right of arresting, which tion may entertain malice and therefore be liable in an action for malicious prosecution. Vance v. Erie Ry. Co., 32 N. J. L. 334, 90 Am. Dec. 665.

Criminal liability of corporations.—The modern law has gradually developed the rule that a corporation should be held liable for criminal acts. This development has been somewhat retarded by the difficulty of calculating the proper punishment for certain crimes. There is apparently no reason why the courts should not impute a guilty mind to the corporation in the case where it has directed a crime, in the same way that they impute a malicious mind in case of a tort.

In a case before the supreme court of the United States, it was contended that the provisions of the Elkins Act were unconstitutional because Congress has no authority to impute to a corporation the commission of criminal offenses, or to subject a corporation to a criminal prosecution by reason of the things charged. The Elkins Act, regulating interstate commerce (Feb. 19, 1903, 32 U. S. Stat. 847), provides: (1) That anything done or omitted to be done by a corporation common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce, and the acts amendatory thereof, which, if done or omitted to be done by a director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such corporation, would constitute a misdemeanor under said acts, or under this act, shall also be held to be a misdemeanor committed by such corporation, and upon conviction thereof it shall be subject to like penalties as are prescribed in said acts, or by this act, with reference to such persons, except as such penalties are herein changed.

In upholding the provisions of the act, the court said:

"Some of the earlier writers on common law held the law to be that a corporation could not commit a crime. It is said to have been held by Lord Chief has been defeated by the parties absconding, and that also a corporation cannot do: for which reasons the proceedings to compel a corporation to appear to any suit by attorney are always by distress on their lands and goods.<sup>1</sup> Neither can a corporation be excommunicated; for it has no soul, as is gravely observed by Sir Edward Coke:<sup>m</sup> and therefore also it is not liable to be summoned into the ecclesiastical courts upon any account; for those courts act only pro salute animæ (for the welfare of the soul), and their

Justice Holt (Anonymous, 12 Mod. 559) that 'a corporation is not indictable, although the particular members of it are.' In Blackstone's Commentaries, chapter 18, section 12, we find it stated: 'A corporation cannot commit treason, or felony, or other crime in its corporate capacity, though its members may in their distinct individual capacities.' The modern authority, universally, so far as we know, is the other way. In considering the subject, Bishop's New Criminal Law, section 417, devotes a chapter to the capacity of corporations to commit crime, and states the law to be: 'Since a corporation acts by its officers and agents, their purposes, motives, and intent are just as much those of the corporation as are the things done. If, for example, the invisible, intangible essence of air which we term a corporation, can level mountains, fill up valleys, lay down iron tracks, and run railroad cars on them, it can intend to do it, and can act therein as well viciously as virtuously.' New York C. R. v. United States, 212 U. S. 481, 492, 53 L. Ed. 613, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 304. See, also, United States v. Van Schaick, 134 Fed. 592, where a corporation was held liable as principal for manslaughter for violation of a statute regulating the supply of life-preservers on boats.

"In many crimes, however, the only intention required is an intention to do the prohibited act—that is to say, the crime is complete when the prohibited act has been intentionally done; and the more recent and better considered cases hold that a corporation may be charged with an offense which only involves this kind of intention, and may be properly convicted when, in its corporate capacity, and by direction of those controlling its corporate action, it does the prohibited act." United States v. John Kelso Co., 86 Fed. 304 (violating eight-hour law); State v. Baltimore Ry. Co., 120 Ind. 298, 22 N. E. 307 (obstructing highway); Southern Express Co. v. State, 1 Ga. App. 700, 58 S. E. 67 (sale of liquor to minors contrary to statute).

The English cases are clear that a corporation may be indicted for misdemeanors which do not depend on the mental condition of the person committing them (such as obstructing a highway); whether the misdemeanor consist of an act of omission or commission. 3 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 9, and cases cited.

sentences can only be enforced by spiritual censures: a consideration, which, carried to its full extent, would alone demonstrate the impropriety of these courts interfering in any temporal rights whatsoever.

There are also other incidents and powers, which belong to some sort of corporations, and not to others. An aggregate corporation may take goods and chattels for the benefit of themselves and their successors, but a sole corporation cannot:<sup>a</sup> for such movable property is liable to be lost or embezzled, and would raise a multitude of disputes between the successor and executor; which the law is careful to avoid.<sup>12</sup> In ecclesiastical and eleemosynary foundations, the king or the founder may give them rules, laws, statutes, and ordinances, which they are bound to observe: but corporations merely [478] lay, constituted for civil purposes, are subject to no particular statutes; but to the common law, and to their own by-laws, not contrary to the laws of the realm.<sup>o</sup> Aggregate corporations also, that have by their constitution a head, as a dean, warden, master, or the like, cannot do any acts during the vacancy of the headship, except only appointing another: neither are they then capable of receiving a grant; for such corporation is incomplete without a head.<sup>p</sup> But there may be a corporation aggregate constituted without a head:<sup>q</sup> as the collegiate church of Southwell in Nottinghamshire, which consists only of prebendaries; and the governors of the Charter-house, London, who have no president or superior, but are all of equal authority.

§ 647. 6. Corporations act by majority.—In aggregate corporations also, the act of the major part is esteemed the act of the whole.<sup>r</sup> By the civil law this major part must have consisted of two-thirds of the whole; else no act could be performed:<sup>s</sup> which, perhaps, may be one reason why they required three at least to make a corporation. But, with us, any majority is sufficient to determine the act of the whole body. And whereas, notwithstanding the law stood thus, some founders of corporations had made statutes in derogation of the common law, making very frequently the unanimous assent of the society to be necessary to any corporate act (which King Henry VIII found to be a great obstruction to his projected scheme of obtaining a surrender of the lands of ecclesiastical corporations); it was therefore enacted by statute 33 Hen. VIII, c. 27 (Corporation, 1541), that all private statutes shall be utterly void, whereby any grant or election, made by the head, with the concurrence of the major part of the body, is liable to be obstructed by any one or more, being the minority: but this statute extends not to any negative or necessary voice, given by the founder to the head of any such society.

§ 648. 7. Power to purchase lands—a. Statutes of mortmain. We before observed that it was incident to every corporation, to have a capacity to purchase lands for themselves and [479] successors: and this is regularly true at the common law.† But they are excepted out of the statute of wills: "so that no devise of lands to a corporation by will is good: except for charitable uses, by statute 43 Eliz., c. 4 (Charitable Gifts, 1601):" which exception is again greatly narrowed by the statute 9 Geo. II, c. 36 (Charitable Uses, 1736). And also, by a great variety of statutes,‡ their privilege even of purchasing from any living grantor is much abridged; so that now a corporation, either ecclesiastical or lay, must have a license from the king to purchase,‡ before they can exert that capacity which is vested in them by the common law:<sup>18</sup> nor is even

These statutes are generally called the statutes of mortmain; all purchases made by corporate bodies being said to be purchases in mortmain, in mortua manu (in a dead-hand): for the reason of which appellation Sir Edward Coke* offers many conjectures; but there is one which seems more probable than any that he has given us: viz., that these purchases being usually made by ecclesiastical bodies, the members of which (being professed) were reckoned dead persons in law, land therefore, holden by them, might with great propriety be said to be held in mortua manu.

I shall defer the more particular exposition of these statutes of mortmain till the next book of these Commentaries,<sup>14</sup> when we shall consider the nature and tenures of estates; and also the exposition of those disabling statutes of Queen Elizabeth, which restrain spiritual and eleemosynary corporations from aliening such lands as they are at present in legal possession of: only mentioning them in this place, for the sake of regularity, as statutable incapacities incident and relative to corporations.

§ 649. 8. Duties of corporations.—The general duties of all bodies politic, considered in their corporate capacity, may, like those of natural persons, be [480] reduced to this single one; that of acting up to the end or design, whatever it be, for which they were created by their founder.<sup>15</sup>

may be required in carrying on the business for which the company was formed." "The implied right of corporations to acquire and hold property for authorized purposes has in many cases been restrained within definite limits, either by general statutes or by the acts under which the companies are formed." Morawetz on Corporations, §§ 327, 328. The same author points out that the English statutes of mortmain were never adopted in the United States, although some states have declared themselves in favor of a mortmain policy, and provisions similar to the mortmain acts are to be in their statutes and charters of incorporation. *Leazure v. <sup>15</sup> Implied powers of corporations.—Corporations organized under general laws derive their powers from those laws and the articles of association or

§ 650. 9. Visitation of corporations—a. Ecclesiastical corporations.—I proceed, therefore, next to inquire, how these corporations may be visited. For corporations being composed of individuals, subject to human frailties, are liable as well as private persons, to deviate from the end of their institution. And for that reason the law has provided proper persons to visit, inquire into, and correct all irregularities that arise in such corporations, either sole or aggregate, and whether ecclesiastical, civil, or eleemosynary.<sup>16</sup> With regard to all ecclesiastical corporations, the ordinary is their visitor, so constituted by the canon law, and from franchises by which they are created and empowered to act. In England the objects of such companies are to be found in the Memorandum of Association as regulated by the Companies (Consolidated) Act, 1908, Ashbury Ry. Carriage Co. v. Riche (1875), L. R. 7 H. L. 672; Companies Act, 1913. In the United States the powers or objects of a corporation are to be determined from its Articles of Association and the constitution and statutes of the jurisdiction in which it is organized.

The chief problem that has arisen in this connection is in the proper determination of the implied powers of a corporation. "We take the general doctrine to be in this country that the powers of corporations organized under legislative statutes are such and such only as those statutes confer. Conceding the rule applicable to all statutes, that what is fairly implied is as much granted as what is expressed, it remains that the charter of a corporation is the measure of its powers, and that the enumeration of these powers implies the exclusion of all others." Thomas v. West Jersey Ry. Co., 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. Ed. 950. The charter of a corporation is construed like other grants from the state strictly against the grantee, so that powers not clearly granted are impliedly withheld. Whitaker v. Delaware & Hudson Canal Co., 87 Pa. St. 34; Downing v. Mt. Washington Road Co., 40 N. H. 230; Proprietors of Stonebridge Canal v. Wheeley, 2 Barn. & Ad. 792. See, also, Jacksonville Ry. & Nav. Co. v. Hooper, 160 U. S. 514, 40 L. Ed. 515, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379.

<sup>16</sup> Right of visitation.—The duties of a visitor are, generally, to control all irregularities in the institution over which he presides, and to decide and give redress in all controversies arising among the members, as to the interpretation of their laws and statutes. (Dr. Lee's Case (1858), E. B. & E. 863.) The visitor's construction of statutes is binding on superior courts. (A. G. v. Clare Hall (1747), 3 Atk. 662, as reported in 2 Term Rep. 312.) In the exercise of these duties, he is to be guided by the intentions of the founder; so far as they can be collected from the statutes or from the design of the institution. But otherwise, and as regards the course of proceeding, he is restrained by no particular forms (Re Dean of York (1841), 2 Q. B. 1); and while he keeps within his jurisdiction, his determinations as visitor are final, and examinable in no other court whatsoever. (R. v. Bishop of Ely (1788), 2 Term thence derived to us. The pope formerly, and now the king, as supreme ordinary, is the visitor of the archbishop or metropolitan; the metropolitan has the charge and coercion of all his suffragan bishops; and the bishops in their several dioceses are in ecclesiastical matters the visitors of all deans and chapters, of all persons and vicars, and of all other spiritual corporations.<sup>17</sup> With respect to all lay corporations, the founder, his heirs, or assigns, are the visitors, whether the foundation be civil or eleemosynary; for in a lay incorporation the ordinary neither can nor ought to visit.*

§ 651. b. Civil corporations—(1) Lay corporations.—I know it is generally said, that civil corporations are subject to no visitation, but merely to the common law of the land; and this shall be presently explained. But first, as I have laid it down as a rule that the founder, his heirs, or assigns, are the visitors of all lay corporations, let us inquire what is meant by the founder. The founder of all corporations in the strictest and original sense is the king alone, for he only can incorporate a society; and in civil incorporations, such as mayor and commonalty, etc., where there are no possessions or endowments given to the body, there is no other founder but the king: but in eleemosynary foundations, such as colleges and hospitals, where there is an endowment of lands, the law distinguishes, and makes two species of [481] foundation; the one fundatio incipiens, or the incorporation, in which sense the king is the general founder of all colleges and hospitals; the other

Rep. 290; R. v. Bishop of Worcester (1815), 4 M. & S. 415).—STEPHEN, 3 Comm. (16th ed.), 13.

In the United States the right of visitation is vested in the state. In general, the legislature is the visitor of the corporations created by it. The legislature is aided by the courts and certain public officers or private visitors. The power of the state may be exercised by injunction, mandamus, forfeiture, and indictment. The attorney general may proceed by quo warranto. The right of visitation exercised by the legislatures or the states is not absolute but is limited by the provisions of the state and federal constitutions. The exercise of this power must not impair the obligation of contract nor take property without due process of law. Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 518; Thompson on Corporations, § 475 et seq.

fundatio perficiens, or the dotation of it, in which sense the first gift of the revenues is the foundation, and he who gives them is in law the founder: and it is in this last sense that we generally call a man the founder of a college or hospital.<sup>b</sup> But here the king has his prerogative: for, if the king and a private man join in endowing an eleemosynary foundation, the king alone shall be the founder of it. And, in general, the king being the sole founder of all civil corporations, and the endower the perficient founder of all eleemosynary ones, the right of visitation of the former results, according to the rule laid down, to the king; and of the latter to the patron or endower.

* The king being thus constituted by law visitor of all civil corporations, the law has also appointed the place, wherein he shall exercise this jurisdiction: which is the court of king's bench; where and where only, all misbehaviors of this kind of corporations are inquired into and redressed, and all their controversies decided. And this is what I understand to be the meaning of our lawyers, when they say that these civil corporations are liable to no visitation; that is, that the law having by immemorial usage appointed them to be visited and inspected by the king their founder, in his majesty's court of king's bench, according to the rules of the common law, they ought not to be visited elsewhere, or by any other authority.<sup>c</sup> And this is so strictly true, that though the king by his letters patent had subjected the college of physicians to the visitation of four very respectable persons, the lord chancellor, the two chief justices, and the chief baron; though the college had accepted this charter with all possible marks of acquiescence, and had acted under it for near a century; yet in 1753, the authority of this provision coming in dispute, on an appeal preferred to these supposed [482] visitors, they directed the legality of their own appointment to be argued: and as this college was merely a civil and not an eleemosynary foundation, they at length determined, upon several days solemn debate, that they had no jurisdiction as

<sup>c</sup> This notion is perhaps too refined. The court of king's bench, from its general superintendent authority where other jurisdictions are deficient, has power to regulate all corporations where no special visitor is appointed. But, as its judgments are liable to be reversed by writs of error, it may be thought to want one of the essential marks of visitatorial power.

§ 652. (2) Eleemosynary corporations.—As to eleemosynary corporations, by the dotation the founder and his heirs are of common right the legal visitors, to see that such property is rightly employed, as might otherwise have descended to the visitor himself: but, if the founder has appointed and assigned any other person to be visitor, then his assignee so appointed is invested with all the founder's power, in exclusion of his heir. Eleemosynary corporations are chiefly hospitals, or colleges in the universities. These were all of them considered, by the popish clergy, as of mere ecclesiastical jurisdiction: however, the law of the land judged otherwise; and, with regard to hospitals, it has long been held,<sup>4</sup> that if the hospital be spiritual, the bishop shall visit; but if lay, the patron. This right of lay patrons was indeed abridged by statute 2 Hen. V, c. 1 (Hospitals, 1414), which ordained that the ordinary should visit all hospitals founded by subjects; though the king's right was reserved, to visit by his commissioners such as were of royal foundation. But the subject's right was in part restored by statute 14 Eliz., c. 5 (Poor Relief, 1572), which directs the bishop to visit such hospitals only, where no visitor is appointed by the founders thereof: and all the hospitals founded by virtue of the statute 39 Eliz., c. 5 (Workhouses, 1597), are to be visited by such persons as shall be nominated by the respective founders. But still, if the founder appoints nobody, the bishop of the diocese must visit.*

§ 653. (3) Colleges.—Colleges in the universities (whatever the common law may now, or might formerly, judge) were certainly considered by the popish clergy, under whose direction they were, as ecclesiastical, or at least as clerical corporations; and therefore the right of visitation was claimed by the ordinary of the [483] diocese. This is evident, because in many of our most ancient colleges, where the founder had a mind to subject them to a visitor of his own nomination, he obtained for that purpose a papal bull to exempt them from the jurisdiction of the ordinary; several of which are still preserved in the archives of the respective societies. And in some of our colleges, where no special visitor is appointed, the bishop of that diocese, in which Oxford was formerly comprised, has immemorially exercised visitatorial authority which can be ascribed to nothing else, but his supposed title as ordinary to visit this, among other ecclesiastical foundations. And it is not impossible that the number of colleges in Cambridge, which are visited by the Bishop of Ely, may in part be derived from the same original.

But, whatever might be formerly the opinion of the clergy, it is now held as established common law that colleges are lay corporations, though sometimes totally composed of ecclesiastical persons; and that the right of visitation does not arise from any principles of the canon law, but of necessity was created by the common law.† And yet the power and jurisdiction of visitors in colleges was left so much in the dark at common law, that the whole doctrine was very unsettled till the famous case of Philips and Bury.‡ In this the main question was, whether the sentence of the Bishop of Exeter, who (as visitor) had deprived Doctor Bury, the rector of Exeter College, could be examined and redressed by the court of king's bench. And the three puisne judges were of opinion, that it might be reviewed, for that the visitor's jurisdiction could not exclude the common law; and accordingly judgment was given in that court. But the Lord Chief Justice Holt was of a contrary opinion; and held, that by the common law the office of visitor is to judge according to the statutes of the college, and to expel and deprive upon just occasions, and to hear all appeals of course; and that from him, and him only, the party grieved ought to have redress; the founder having reposed in him so entire a confidence, that he [484] will administer justice impartially, that his determinations are final, and examinable in no other court whatsoever. And, upon this, a writ of error being brought into the house of lords, they concurred in Sir John Holt's opinion, and reversed the judgment of the court of king's bench. To which leading case all subsequent determinations have been conformable. But, where the visitor is under a temporary disability, there the court of king's bench will interpose, to prevent a defect of justice.<sup>b</sup> Also it is said,<sup>1</sup> that if a founder of an eleemosynary foundation appoints a visitor, and limits his jurisdiction by rules and statutes, if the visitor in his sentence exceeds those rules, an action lies against him; but it is otherwise, where he mistakes in a thing within his power.

§ 654. 10. Dissolution of corporations.—We come now, in the last place, to consider how corporations may be dissolved. Any particular member may be disfranchised, or lose his place in the corporation, by acting contrary to the laws of the society, or the laws of the land: or he may resign it by his own voluntary act.<sup>c</sup> But the body politic may also itself be dissolved in several ways; which dissolution is the civil death of the corporation: and in this case their lands and tenements shall revert to the person, or his heirs, who granted them to the corporation: for the law doth annex a condition to every such grant, that if the corporation be dissolved, the grantor shall have the lands again, because the cause of the grant faileth.<sup>178</sup> The grant is, indeed, only during the life of the corporation; which may endure forever: but, when that life is determined by the dissolution of the body politic, the grantor takes it back by reversion, as in the case of every other grant for life. The debts of a corporation, either to or from it, are totally extinguished by its dissolution; so that the members thereof cannot recover, or be charged with them, in their natural capacities: "19 agreeable to that maxim of the civil law," "si quid universitati debetur, singulis non debetur; nec, quod debet universitas, singuli debent (whatever be due to a corporation, is not due to each member singly; nor is each singly answerable for the debts due from the corporation)."

<sup>18</sup> This rule that upon the dissolution of a corporation at common law its real property reverted to the grantor or his heirs has been doubted. Gray, Rule Against Perpetuities (2d ed.), §§ 44–48. As a common-law doctrine it was applied to ecclesiastical and municipal corporations, where there were usually no shareholders and no creditors. There the land went to the grantors or donors and the personalty to the king.

In the case of private corporations the shareholders are usually the grantors. In equity they are looked upon as the persons beneficially interested and therefore on dissolution, and after the payment of creditors, the assets of the corporation will be divided among them. Where the statutes do not expressly provide for the distribution of the property on dissolution, equity will administer the assets in favor of the beneficiaries. Morawetz on Corporations, §§ 1031, 1032. See Late Corporation of Latter Day Saints v. United States, 136 U. S. 1, 34 L. Ed. 481, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 792; Greenwood v. Union Freight R. R. Co., 105 U. S. 13, 26 L. Ed. 961.

§ 655. a. Methods of dissolution—(1) By act of parliament; (2) By death of all members; (3) By surrender of franchise; (4) By forfeiture of charter.—<sup>[485]</sup> A corporation may be dissolved, 1. By act of parliament, which is boundless in its operations. 2. By the natural death of all its members, in cases of an aggregate corporation. 3. By surrender of its franchises into the hands of the king, which is a kind of suicide. 4. By forfeiture of its charter, through negligence or abuse of its franchises; in which case the law judges that the body politic has broken the condition

<sup>19</sup> This remark has been repeated by later authors, and has led to some confusion. It was undoubtedly an error. The only authority cited to support it is Edmunds v. Brown, 1 Lev. 237. The Company of Woodmongers had been dissolved. It had given a bond to the plaintiff, which was signed by the defendants for the company. This action was debt on the bond against the individuals who signed it. The plaintiff failed, and rightly, for the bond was not executed by the defendants as individuals but for the company. The difficulty, however, was simply in the remedy which the plaintiff chose. This is evident from the case of Naylor v. Brown, Finch, 83—a suit in equity by the creditors of the Woodmongers' Company, begun immediately after the failure of the action at law just referred to. On the dissolution of the company, the members had divided up its property. It was decreed that the property should be returned, "it being in equity still a part of the estate of the late company," and that the debts due the plaintiffs should be discharged from the fund so formed. This important case, which seems to have been generally overlooked, clearly shows that the property of a dissolved corporation was liable in equity for the corporate debts, although they were unenforceable at law.—WILLISTON, Business Corporations Before 1800, in 3 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History, 195, 233.

upon which it was incorporated, and thereupon the incorporation is void. And the regular course is to bring an information in nature of a writ of quo warranto (by what warrant or authority), to inquire by what warrant the members now exercise their corporate power, having forfeited it by such and such proceedings. The exertion of this act of law, for the purposes of the state, in the reigns of King Charles and King James the Second, particularly by seizing the charter of the city of London, gave great and just offense; though perhaps, in strictness of law, the proceedings in most of them were sufficiently regular, but the judgment against that of London was reversed by act of parliament<sup>o</sup> after the revolution; and by the same statute it is enacted that the franchises of the city of London shall never more be forfeited for any cause whatsoever. And, because by the common law corporations were dissolved, in case the mayor or head officer was not duly elected on the day appointed in the charter or established by prescription, it is now provided,<sup>p</sup> that for the future no corporation shall be dissolved upon that account; and ample directions are given for appointing a new officer, in case there be no election, or a void one, made upon the charter or prescriptive day.<sup>20</sup>

<sup>20</sup> Special machinery is now provided in Great Britain for dissolving, or "winding up," as it is called, companies that are registered under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. On the important subject of "Limited Companies" in Great Britain under the above-mentioned act, the reader is referred to 3 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), pp. 249 ff.

In the United States the statutes of the various states provide methods of dissolution. These statutes are not uniform; some allow the stockholders to dissolve the corporation, others make it necessary that the directors or stockholders shall apply to a court which shall by its decree dissolve the corporation. The general methods of dissolution are still practically the same as those enumerated by Blackstone, except that the legislature cannot dissolve a corporation in violation of a right given by the state or federal constitution. Statutes concerning dissolution are usually passed for the purpose of expediting the procedure and protecting the persons interested in the affairs of the corporation.

OF THE RIGHTS OF THINGS.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF PROPERTY, IN GENERAL.

§ 1. Right of property.—The former book of these Commentaries having treated at large of the jura personarum, or such rights and duties<sup>1</sup> as are annexed to the persons of men, the

<sup>1</sup> Of the form in which rights and duties appear in the law.—Beginners sometimes do not see the extent to which rights and duties figure in the law, because they look only for the broad abstractions which are described under those names in the books. But most of the rights and duties known to the practical law appear either in the form of institutions and relations, each of which denotes complexes of many such rights and duties, or of the ultimate facts out of which rights spring, or by which a right is modified.

The systematic treatment of law is distinguished from that of other sciences by the fact that it does not consist merely in the proper arrangement of the single truths that compose it. In law, these truths change their nature as well as form in the process. The separate rules of law drop their form of rules, of injunctions and prohibitions, and become members of a legal institution. They become the ultimate facts that compose a transaction, or the elements out of which are formed such conceptions as person, thing, rights, obligations, etc. (Ihering, Spirit of Roman Law, 1, 37.)

It is needless to show that this is true of the various names of crimes, of torts and other wrongs, or of the terms of procedure, which belong to the category of remedies—both having definite relations to the conception of a right. But it is equally true of the words designating the different forms of property, e. g., tenement, estate, fee simple, freehold, remainder, reversion, coparcenary, joint tenancy, appurtenance, fixture, chattel, chose in action, bill of exchange, each of which denotes either a form of the right of property or the object of such a right.

So, also, of the words expressing legal relations, citizen, alien, magistrate, husband, wife, parent, child, ancestor, heir, master, servant, every one of which implies a considerable number of rights and duties toward the related or other persons. These differ in this respect from such terms as creditor, debtor, vendor, vendee, grantor, grantee, principal, agent, etc., because the latter designate the parties to a single transaction, while the former characters inhere in the persons to which they belong through a great variety of different transactions, all of which will be modified by the objects of our inquiry in this second book will be the jura rerum, or those rights which a man may acquire in and to such external things as are unconnected with his person. These are what the rights and duties peculiar to the persons so designated. In other words, the former terms denote a true status, the others only normal persons, engaged in a single transaction to which their relation is limited, and with which it ends; e. g., of the vendor and vendee no peculiar rules of law can be stated, except those which belong to the sale in question; principal and agent are properly such only with reference to a single contract of agency, no matter how wide its scope. On the other hand, master and servant implies a continuous control, affecting all acts done while it lasts, and in that capacity; and like parent and child may modify rights and duties of any kind, by general rules of law forming the status. In other words, each of the last-mentioned terms "denotes a lot of distinctive rights and duties, marked by a collective name and bound by that name into a complex aggregate." (Bentham, quoted by Austin, p. 723.)

To understand the force or contents of a legal term, the student must distinguish what logicians term its extension, or what it denotes or applies to, and its comprehension (sometimes called intension, but the word is a bad one because only a letter distinguishes it from a word of same sound, but very different meaning, intention), or what it connotes or implies.

The extension of a term denotes the objects to which it may be applied; its comprehension, the qualities which it implies in every one of those objects; e. g., a hereditament is applicable to all kinds of land or rights to land in fee, whether in possession or in expectancy, in severalty or in common, legal or equitable, absolute or conditional, and whether corporeal or incorporeal. This is the extension of the term "hereditament"; its comprehension implies that every such thing, however it may differ in other respects from the rest, will have the common qualities of passing to the legal heir on the death of the holder, of being exempt from the process of administration, of vesting in the heir by the mere process of law without act of the parties, etc. It will also imply all the qualities of a freehold, of which fee is merely a species if in possession.

Strictly speaking, hereditament and fee are distinguished as a thing, and right to a thing. But this may be overlooked here as belonging rather to the metaphysics of law than to its logic.

Again, crime in its extension denotes treason, felony, misdemeanor, and the subdivisions of each: in its comprehension it implies a wrongful act, a guilty intention or malice, imputability, and in some states an act forbidden by positive law. Misfeasance in its extension denotes acts of fraud, negligent breaches of duty (not of obligation), conversion, nuisance, and a great variety of other causes of action, while it comprehends in every case an indirect wrong, and damage proximately produced by it. Malfeasance in its extension denotes writers on natural law style the rights of dominion, or property concerning the nature and original of which I shall first premise a few observations, before I proceed to distribute and consider its several objects.

trespasses of all kinds, slander per se, and all other direct wrongs; while it comprehends in every such action a direct infringement of an absolute right from which the law implies damnum. Although actual and even special damnum may be also proved in such actions, it is not an essential part of the cause of action, and therefore is not comprehended in the term.

By a familiar law of logic, as the extension of a term is increased its comprehension is diminished, and vice versa; i. e., the greater number of separate facts or species there may be included in a term, or the greater number of cases it will apply to, the fewer qualities will be comprehended in the term as common to and possessed by all of them, or the fewer qualities will be implied by it; e. g., the term "estate" is one of wide extension, and applies to every kind of interest held in land, whether freehold, leasehold, or copyhold. (It may be doubtful whether the copyholder had a status in the original sense of the term, but it would be an over-refinement to exclude him now.) But its comprehension is proportionately limited; it implies few qualities as always connoted by it, for the relation between the holder and the land may be of many different kinds.

A freehold estate is of less extension, excluding all the estates less than freehold (leasehold, copyhold, etc.); but it implies duration for life and much else. A fee is of still less extension, but comprehends other qualities, such as inheritability; and so we may go on with fee simple, fee simple in possession, fee simple in possession upon condition, fee simple in possession upon condition subsequent, etc. For other examples take (a) private wrong (3 Bl. Comm. 1), tort, trespass, false imprisonment; (b) private wrong, tort, case, malicious arrest; (c) private wrong, tort, conversion; (d) remedy, action, equitable action, suit for specific performance; (e) remedy, action, action of tort, replevin.

When we analyze a term like real property or crime into various things to which it applies, we proceed from the general to the particular. When we analyze the facts of a client's case until from the concrete fact we have reached the primary right which lies at the basis of the cause of action, we are proceeding from the particular to the general. Yet the term "analysis" is properly used in both cases. The former is analysis in extension; the latter, in comprehension. (Jevons, Lessons in Logic, p. 208.)

ion which one man claims and exercises over the external things of the world, in total exclusion of the right of any other individual in the universe. And yet there are very few that will give themselves the trouble to consider the original and foundation of this right.<sup>2</sup> Pleased as we are with the possession, we seem afraid to

The student who wishes to master the whole law easily and rapidly can find no better exercise than to take any large collection of legal terms, like the titles of the United States Digest or the index of Blackstone or Kent, and arrange them systematically under the following categories:

1. Denoting legal institutions, e. g., courts.
2. Denoting relations, guardianship.
3. Denoting parties to a single transaction of any kind, e. g., partner.
4. Denoting status, infant.
5. Denoting transactions, contract, gift.
6. Denoting things, easement, fixture, hereditament.
7. Denoting remedies, action, trover, habeas corpus.

And the scheme may be enlarged and subdivided to almost any extent, until it embraces every term of fixed legal meaning which is capable of being treated as an ultimate fact.—HAMMOND.

<sup>2</sup> Origin of property in land.—Most recent writers on law take the right of property for granted without any attempt to investigate its origin. The theory of writers on natural law assumes that the conception of property existed in its present form from the earliest stage of human thought. Consequently it does not discriminate between the two very different questions, the ethical ground or basis of private property, and the mode in which the institution of property has actually been developed. In regard to the former question, it is enough here to say that the right to property is in the last analysis identical with the right to existence, since individual existence can only be maintained by constant appropriations from external nature, and by the occupancy of a place on the earth's surface. If, as Grotius and Puffendorf maintain, individual property must be derived to each person from the cession of his fellows of their original common rights, then the right of each to exist must depend upon joint consent. (For these theories the student may consult Grotius, de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. 2, cap. 2, §§ 1, 2; Puffendorf, de Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. 4, cap. 4, with the notes of Barbeyrac; 2 Locke's Works, p. 181, etc.; Treatise on Government, book 1, c. 4; Rutherford's Institutes of Natural Law, c. 3; 3 Wilson's Works, pp. 179-198; Montesquieu, Esprit des Lois, liv. 26, cap. 15; Maine's Ancient Law, c. 8; Schouler on Personal Property, pp. 1-24; J. S. Mill's Principles of Political Economy, i. 240.)

Recent students of ancient Aryan law have tried to show that the notion of property in land was originally a religious one. In the earliest times, they say, it was not the law which guaranteed the right of property, but religion.

look back to the means by which it was acquired, as if fearful of some defect in our title; or at best we rest satisfied with the decision of the laws in our favor, without examining the reason or authority upon which those laws have been built. We think it enough that our title is derived by the grant of the former proprietor, by descent from our ancestors, or by the last will and testament of the dying owner; not caring to reflect that (accurately and strictly speaking) there is no foundation in nature or in natural law why a set of words upon parchment should convey the dominion of land; why the son should have a right to exclude his fellow-creatures from a determinate spot of ground, because his father

The proof depends chiefly upon the sacred character that undoubtedly in early Greek, Roman, Hindoo, as well as Hebrew law, attached to boundary marks, termini, etc. (See Laws of Manu, viii. 245; Varro, De Lingua Latina, v. 74; Pollux, ix. 9; Hesychius verba ἕσος; Plato, de Legg. viii. 842; Ovid Fast. ii. 677.) But when all law had a religious character, and the commonest rules of human intercourse were placed under the sanction of religious penalties, these facts prove very little as to the origin of any particular rule or notion. As well show that marriage was first introduced as a religious duty, because we find it almost always accompanied by religious rites. Indeed, the argument for marriage might be made much stronger, since we find it one of the chief points of early religion to perpetuate the race in order to keep up the worship of ancestors and the family rites. (La Cité Antique, par F. de Coulanges, translated by T. C. Barker under the title "Aryan Civilization," etc., London, 1871. See on this point, c. 6, 7.)

The growth of the conception of individual ownership in land among our own ancestors is not difficult to trace, and the principal stages of it can be distinctly marked, although much remains to be investigated in regard to details. It is safe to say that among the Germanic tribes described by Cæsar and Tacitus there was no abstract right of property in land such as we now possess. The territory controlled by the whole tribe or community was common property, so far as property could be predicated of it in any sense. Its enjoyment was parceled out among the families or members of the tribe from time to time, with a constant tendency to more definite and permanent, several possession. This possession was recognized as a legal right under the title of gewere—the seisin of later times. This may be defined as the right to repel by force every attack on the objects in possession, guaranteed by the approval of the community, and if needful, by their joint force. It would, of course, be exercised by the family under the direction of their head, or pater familias, and thus gave rise to the conception of family ownership. It embraced the land in possession of each family with the persons and chattels found thereon. But as possession can never be altogether physical, there would be a natural extension of the gewere to that which had once been in possession and never had done so before him: or why the occupier of a particular field or of a jewel, when lying on his death-bed and no longer able to maintain possession, should be entitled to tell the rest of the world which of them should enjoy it after him. These inquiries, it must be owned, would be useless and even troublesome in common life. It is well if the mass of mankind will obey the laws when made, without scrutinizing too nicely into the reasons of making them. But, when law is to be considered not only as matter of practice, but also as a rational science, it cannot be improper or useless to examine more deeply the rudiments and grounds of these positive constitutions of society.

In the beginning of the world, we are informed by holy writ, the all-bountiful Creator gave to man "dominion over all the formally abandoned, or abandoned only with the intent of resuming. Hence the conception of an ideal possession. We find this extension going on throughout the Anglo-Saxon period of our law. But it may be doubted whether the abstract idea of property as distinct from and opposed to possession was ever formed in our law down to the time when the whole doctrine of the title to land was modified by feudal and Roman notions.

It has been a fruitful theme of controversy how these changes were to be accounted for or expressed in the form of a principle; what new element has been added to possession, actual or ideal, to form our present notion of property (right over things external whether possessed or not) unknown to the early Germanic law. The principal theories by which these phenomena have been accounted for may be stated thus: (1) That rights in rem were unknown to the early Germanic law and only personal rights recognized; (2) that a peculiar kind of property right, known as the gewere or seisin, was then the only form of right to external things recognized, the distinction of possession and property being as yet unknown, and both confounded under the one term; (3) that possession was the only right to things recognized, and that the notion of property was yet unformed. (4) There remains possibly still a fourth hypothesis: that the only rights known to early English law, or to Germanic law generally, were rights to outward objects, possessory only, and that it was the later recognition of rights in personam, borrowed from the Roman law, directly or indirectly, that formed the new element of proprietary rights. Less obvious than either of the others, this seems to explain the historical facts more completely than any of them.

Blackstone has discussed none of these questions. They lay outside of his task, for they were no part of the existing law when he wrote. The distinction of rights in rem and in personam he has studiously ignored, no doubt because he thought it not acknowledged by English law, which was indeed the common opinion of English lawyers in the eighteenth century, and until Mr. Austin, earth; and over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth [a] upon the earth."* This is the only true and solid foundation of man's dominion over external things, whatever airy metaphysical notions may have been started by fanciful writers upon this subject. The earth, therefore, and all things therein, are the general property of all mankind, exclusive of other beings, from the immediate gift of the Creator. And, while the earth continued bare of inhabitants, it is reasonable to suppose, that all was in common among them, and that everyone took from the public stock to his own use such things as his immediate necessities required.

§ 3. a. Ownership in common.—These general notions of property were then sufficient to answer all the purposes of human life; and might perhaps still have answered them had it been possible for mankind to have remained in a state of primeval simplicity; as may be collected from the manners of many American nations when first discovered by the Europeans; and from the ancient method of living among the first Europeans themselves, if we may fresh from the German schools, introduced it again. (Lectures on Jurisprudence, I. 46-59, et seq.; App. Table II.) Gewere is a term unknown to the Anglo-Saxon law though familiar to the kindred systems on the Continent; and in the French and English form of seisin it had become appropriated to real property only, and its connection with property in general thus disguised. How completely the connection with chattels had been forgotten is shown by Mr. Maitland's rediscovery of its use in that sense in his articles on the Mystery of Seisin, 2 L. Q. R. 481, October, 1886, and Seisin of Chattels, July, 1885. But it is worth noticing that in Blackstone's analysis of a "complete title" (Book II, c. 13, pp. *195-*199) he has severed the right of property entirely from the right of possession, in a manner which the English law of his own time could never have suggested (as above mentioned), while in his two elements of "possession" and "right of possession" he has exactly accounted for all the phenomena that are found in the Anglo-Saxon law as distinct from that after the Conquest. He has not indeed expressed the distinction between the two rights in an exhaustive way, for he has taken no notice of the effect of contract between the parties in modifying either. But there is at least some reason to think that he saw correctly the nature of the change made at, or about, the Conquest, even if he could not explain the reasons for it or the causes that produced it historically.—HAMMOND.

they esteemed a very flagrant injustice, and would sacrifice their lives to preserve them. Hence a property was soon established in every man's house and home-stall; which seem to have been originally mere [5] temporary huts or movable cabins, suited to the design of Providence for more speedily peopling the earth, and suited to the wandering life of their owners, before any extensive property in the soil or ground was established. And there can be no doubt but that movables of every kind became sooner appropriated than the permanent substantial soil: partly because they were more susceptible of a long occupancy, which might be continued for months together without any sensible interruption, and at length by usage ripen into an established right; but principally because few of them could be fit for use, till improved and ameliorated by the bodily labor of the occupant: which bodily labor, bestowed upon any subject which before lay in common to all men, is universally allowed to give the fairest and most reasonable title to an exclusive property therein.

attempt it because Blackstone, who is always a faithful index of the average opinions of his day, has summed them up in his second book and first chapter." (Maine here quotes above passages from Blackstone, and continues:)

"Some ambiguities of expression in this passage lead to the suspicion that Blackstone did not quite understand the meaning of the proposition which he found in his authorities, that property in the earth's surface was first acquired, under the law of nature, by the occupant; but the limitation which designedly or through misapprehension he has imposed on the theory brings it into a form which it has not infrequently assumed. Many writers more famous than Blackstone for precision of language have laid down that, in the beginning of things, occupancy first gave a right against the world to an exclusive but temporary enjoyment, and that afterwards this right, while it remained exclusive, became perpetual. Their object in so stating their theory was to reconcile the doctrine that in the state of nature res nullius became property through occupancy, with the inference which they drew from the Scriptural history that the patriarchs did not at first permanently appropriate the soil which had been grazed over by their flocks and herds.

"The only criticism which could be directly applied to the theory of Blackstone would consist in inquiring whether the circumstances which make up his picture of a primitive society are more or less probable than other incidents which could be imagined with equal readiness. Pursuing this method of examination, we might fairly ask whether the man who had occupied (Blackstone evidently uses this word with its ordinary English meaning) a particular spot of ground for rest or shade would be permitted to retain it without disturbance. The chances surely are that his right to possession would be exactly arisen, and the good order of the world been continually broken and disturbed, while a variety of persons were striving who should get the first occupation of the same thing, or disputing which of them had actually gained it. As human life also grew more and more refined, abundance of conveniences were devised to render it more easy, commodious, and agreeable; as, habitations for shelter and safety, and raiment for warmth and decency. But no man would be at the trouble to provide either, so long as he had only an usufructuary property in them, which was to cease the instant that he quitted possession; if, as soon as he walked out of his tent, or pulled off his garment, the next stranger who came by would have a right to inhabit the one, and to wear the other. In the case of habitations in particular, it was natural to observe, that even the brute creation, to whom everything else was in common, maintained a kind of permanent property in their dwellings, especially for the protection of their young; that the birds of the air had nests, and the beasts of the field had caverns, the invasion of which made to perform for speculative jurisprudence, in furnishing a supposed explanation of the origin of private property. It was once universally believed that the proceeding implied in occupancy was identical with the process by which the earth and its fruits, which were at first in common, became the allowed property of individuals. The course of thought which led to this assumption is not difficult to understand, if we seize the shade of difference which separates the ancient from the modern conception of natural law. The Roman lawyers had laid down that occupancy was one of the natural modes of acquiring property, and they undoubtedly believed that, were mankind living under the institutions of nature, occupancy would be one of their practices. How far they persuaded themselves that such a condition of the race had ever existed, is a point, as I have already stated, which their language leaves in much uncertainty; but they certainly do seem to have made the conjecture, which has at all times possessed much plausibility, that the institution of property was not so old as the existence of mankind. Modern jurisprudence, accepting all their dogmas without reservation, went far beyond them in the eager curiosity with which it dwelt on the supposed state of nature. Since then it had received the position that the earth and its fruits were once res nullius, and since its peculiar view of nature led it to assume without hesitation that the human race had actually practiced the occupancy of res nullius long before the organization of civil societies, the inference immediately suggested itself that occupancy was the process by which the 'no man's goods' of the primitive world became the private property of individuals in the world of history. It would be wearisome to enumerate the jurists who have subscribed to this theory in one shape or another, and it is the less necessary to

§ 6. (2) Ownership of land.—All this while the soil and pasture of the earth remained still in common as before, and open to every occupant: except, perhaps, in the neighborhood of towns, where the necessity of a sole and exclusive property in lands (for the sake of agriculture) was earlier felt, and therefore more readily complied with. Otherwise when the multitude of men and cattle had consumed every convenience on one spot of ground, it was deemed a natural right to seize upon and occupy such other lands as would more easily supply their necessities. This practice is still retained among the wild and uncultivated nations that have never been formed into civil states, like the Tartars and others in the east; where the climate itself, and the boundless extent of their territory, conspire to retain them still in the same savage state of vagrant liberty, which was universal in the earliest ages; and which Tacitus informs us continued among the Germans till the decline of the Roman empire.* We have also a striking ex-

control or 'detention,' possession in law, and ownership, and he talks as if our refined legal conceptions had come to primeval man ready made, and in exactly the form and language of eighteenth century publicists. But perhaps it was needless cruelty to suggest that Blackstone either did not understand the technical meaning of occupation or intended to impose on his readers by playing with a verbal ambiguity. The word 'occupare' is, after all, not purely technical in Latin; it certainly has no technical meaning in the passage of Cicero which Blackstone quotes (Comm. ii, 4; Cic. 'de Fin.' iii, 20, § 67). Cicero was neither an original philosopher nor a great jurist; but no one would charge him with supposing that the right of a spectator in a theater to the place he has taken ('eum locum quem quisque occupavit') had anything to do with the permanent acquisition of dominium. It would be more plausible to credit him with an inkling of the historical truth pointed out by Maine in these pages, that the notion of absolute legal ownership, and still more the presumption that everything ought to have an owner, or that, as our own books say, 'the law must needs reduce the properties of all goods to some man,' are rather modern than primitive. Blackstone's neglect to observe that the detached individual man whom he postulates is a kind of person altogether unknown to archaic institutions is the common and fatal fault, as Maine has in effect said, of all individualist theories of society: of Hobbes', which Locke's was intended to refute, no less than of Blackstone's, which is a slight modification of Locke's."—MAINE, Ancient Law (Pollock's ed.), 314.

ample of the same kind in the history of Abraham and his nephew Lot.<sup>a</sup> When their joint substance became so great that pasture and other conveniences grew scarce, the natural consequence was that a strife arose between their servants; so that it was no longer practicable to dwell together. This contention Abraham thus endeavored to compose: "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between thee and me. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me. If thou wilt take the left hand then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left." This plainly implies an acknowledged right, in either, to occupy whatever ground he pleased, that was not preoccupied by other tribes. "And Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, even as the garden of the Lord. Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan, and journeyed east; and Abraham dwelt in the land of Canaan."

[7] Upon the same principle was founded the right of migration, or sending colonies to find out new habitation, when the mother country was overcharged with inhabitants; which was practiced as well by the Phœnicians and Greeks, as the Germans, Scythians, and other northern people. And, so long as it was confined to the stocking and cultivation of desert uninhabited countries, it kept strictly within the limits of the law of nature. But how far the seizing on countries already peopled, and driving out or massacring the innocent and defenseless natives, merely because they differed from their invaders in language, in religion, in customs, in government, or in color; how far such a conduct was consonant to nature, to reason, or to Christianity, deserved well to be considered by those, who have rendered their names immortal by thus civilizing mankind.

As the world by degrees grew more populous, it daily became more difficult to find out new spots to inhabit, without encroaching upon former occupants; and, by constantly occupying the same individual spot, the fruits of the earth were consumed, and its spontaneous produce destroyed, without any provision for a future supply or succession. It therefore became necessary to pursue some regular method of providing a constant subsistence; and this necessity produced, or at least promoted and encouraged, the art of agriculture. And the art of agriculture, by a regular connection and consequence, introduced and established the idea of a more permanent property in the soil than had hitherto been received and adopted. It was clear that the earth would not produce her fruits in sufficient quantities, without the assistance of tillage: but who would be at the pains of tilling it, if another might watch an opportunity to seize upon and enjoy the product of his industry, art, and labor? Had not, therefore, a separate property in lands, as well as movables, been vested in some individuals, the world must have continued a forest, and men have been mere animals of prey; which, according to some philosophers, is the genuine state of [§] nature. Whereas now (so graciously has Providence interwoven our duty and our happiness together) the result of this very necessity has been the ennobling of the human species, by giving it opportunities of improving its rational faculties, as well as of exerting its natural. Necessity begat property; and, in order to insure that property, recourse was had to civil society, which brought along with it a long train of inseparable concomitants; states, government, laws, punishments, and the public exercise of religious duties. Thus connected together, it was found that a part only of society was sufficient to provide, by their manual labor, for the necessary subsistence of all; and leisure was given to others to cultivate the human mind, to invent useful arts, and to lay the foundations of science.

§ 7. 2. Occupancy, original title to property.—The only question remaining is, how this property became actually vested: or what it is that gave a man an exclusive right to retain in a permanent manner that specific land, which before belonged generally to everybody, but particularly to nobody. And, as we before observed that occupancy gave the right to the temporary use of the soil, so it is agreed upon all hands that occupancy gave also the original right to the permanent property in the substance of the earth itself; which excludes everyone else but the owner from the use of it. There is indeed some difference among the writers on natural law, concerning the reason why occupancy should convey this right, and invest one with this absolute property: Grotius and Puffendorf insisting, that this right of occupancy is founded on a tacit and implied assent of all mankind, that the first occupant should become the owner; and Barbeyrac, Titius, Mr. Locke, and others, holding that there is no such implied assent, neither is it necessary that there should be; for that the very act of occupancy, alone, being a degree of bodily labor, is from a principle of natural justice, without any consent or compact, sufficient of itself to gain a title. A dispute that savors too much of nice and scholastic refinement! However, both sides agree in this, that occupancy is the thing by which the title was in fact originally gained; every man seizing to his own continued [9] use such spots of ground as he found most agreeable to his own convenience, provided he found them unoccupied by anyone else.

§ 8. a. Dereliction.—Property, both in lands and movables, being thus originally acquired by the first taker, which taking amounts to a declaration that he intends to appropriate the thing to his own use, it remains in him, by the principles of universal law, till such time as he does some other act which shows an intention to abandon it; for then it becomes, naturally speaking, publici juris (of public right) once more, and is liable to be again appropriated by the next occupant. So if one is possessed of a jewel, and casts it into the sea or a public highway, this is such an express dereliction, that a property will be vested in the first fortunate finder that will seize it to his own use. But if he hides it privately in the earth or other secret place, and it is discovered, the finder acquires no property therein; for the owner hath not by this act declared any intention to abandon it, but rather the contrary; and if he loses or drops it by accident, it cannot be collected from thence that he designed to quit the possession; and therefore in such a case the property still remains in the loser, who may claim it again of the finder. And this, we may remember, is the doctrine of the law of England, with relation to treasure-trove.<sup>1</sup>

§ 9. 3. Transfer of ownership.—But this method, of one man's abandoning his property, and another seizing the vacant possession, however well founded in theory, could not long subsist in fact. It was calculated merely for the rudiments of civil society, and necessarily ceased among the complicated interests and artificial refinements of polite and established governments. In these it was found, that what became inconvenient or useless to one man, was highly convenient and useful to another; who was ready to give in exchange for it some equivalent, that was equally desirable to the former proprietor. Thus mutual convenience introduced commercial traffic, and the reciprocal transfer of property by sale, grant, or conveyance: which <sup>[10]</sup> may be considered either as a continuance of the original possession which the first occupant had; or as an abandoning of the thing by the present owner, and an immediate successive occupancy of the same by the new proprietor. The voluntary dereliction of the owner, and delivering the possession to another individual, amount to a transfer of the property; the proprietor declaring his intention no longer to occupy the thing himself, but that his own right of occupancy shall be vested in the new acquirer. Or, taken in the other light, if I agree to part with an acre of my land to Titius, the deed of conveyance is an evidence of my intending to abandon the property; and Titius being the only or first man acquainted with such my intention, immediately steps in and seizes the vacant possession: thus the consent expressed by the conveyance gives Titius a good right against me; and possession, or occupancy, confirms that right against all the world besides.

§ 10. a. Succession to property on death.—The most universal and effectual way of abandoning property is by the death of the occupant: when both the actual possession and intention of keeping possession ceasing, the property which is founded upon such possession and intention ought also to cease of course. For, naturally speaking, the instant a man ceases to be, he ceases to have any dominion: else, if he had a right to dispose of his acquisitions one moment beyond his life, he would also have a right to direct their disposal for a million of ages after him; which would be highly absurd and inconvenient. All property must therefore cease upon death, considering men as absolute individuals, and unconnected with civil society: for then, by the principles before established, the next immediate occupant would acquire a right in all that the deceased possessed. But as, under civilized governments which are calculated for the peace of mankind, such a constitution would be productive of endless disturbances, the universal law of almost every nation (which is a kind of secondary law of nature) has either given the dying person a power of continuing his property by disposing of his possessions by will; or, in case he neglects to dispose of it, or is not permitted to make any disposition [11] at all, the municipal law of the country then steps in, and declares who shall be the successor, representative, or heir of the deceased; that is, who alone shall have a right to enter upon this vacant possession, in order to avoid that confusion, which its becoming again common would occasion.* And further, in case no testament be permitted by the law, or none be made, and no heir can be found so qualified as the law requires, still, to prevent the robust title of occupancy from again taking place, the doctrine of escheats is adopted in almost every country whereby the sovereign of the state, and those who claim under his authority, are the ultimate heirs, and succeed to those inheritances, to which no other title can be formed.<sup>4</sup>

§ 11. (1) Intestate succession.—The right of inheritance, or descent to the children and relations of the deceased, seems to have been allowed much earlier than the right of devising by testament.

* It is principally to prevent any vacancy of possession, that the civil law considers father and son as one person; so that upon the death of either, the inheritance does not so properly descend, as continue in the hands of the survivor. Ff. 28. 2. 11.

<sup>4</sup> Escheat.—The doctrine of escheats is not to be confounded with that doctrine of public law by which the state or the sovereign is the ultimus hæres of all vacant property. It took the place of that doctrine in the law of England, so far as land is concerned, but it rests in different principles and operates in a different way. Indeed, it differs from it as the doctrine of feudal tenure differs from that of eminent domain, which has since taken its place. "The state steps into the place of the feudal lord, by virtue of its sovereignty, as the original and ultimate proprietor of all the lands within its jurisdiction." (4 Kent's Comm. 424; Hinkle's Lessee v. Shadden, 2 Swan (32 Tenn.), 46, 48.) All property belongs to the nation. Those things not divided among individuals are public property. (Arnold v. Munday, 6 N. J. L. 1, 10 Am. Dec. 356. See note on Escheat, post, page *241.)—HAMMOND.

We are apt to conceive at first view that it has nature on its side; yet we often mistake for nature what we find established by long and inveterate custom. It is certainly a wise and effectual, but clearly a political, establishment; since the permanent right of property, vested in the ancestor himself, was no natural, but merely a civil, right. It is true, that the transmission of one's possessions to posterity has an evident tendency to make a man a good citizen and a useful member of society: it sets the passions on the side of duty, and prompts a man to deserve well of the public, when he is sure that the reward of his services will not die with himself, but be transmitted to those with whom he is connected by the dearest and most tender affections. Yet, reasonable as this foundation of the right of inheritance may seem, it is probable that its immediate original arose not from speculations altogether so delicate and refined, and if not from fortuitous circumstances, at least, from a plainer and more simple principle. A man's children or nearest relations are usually about him on his <sup>[12]</sup> death-bed, and are the earliest witnesses of his decease. They became, therefore, generally the next immediate occupants, till at length in process of time this frequent usage ripened into general law. And therefore, also, in the earliest ages, on failure of children, a man's servants born under his roof were allowed to be his heirs; being immediately on the spot when he died. For we find the old patriarch Abraham expressly declaring that "since God had given him no seed, his steward Eliezer, one born in his house, was his heir."<sup>1</sup>

§ 12. (2) Testamentary succession.—While property continued only for life, testaments were useless and unknown; and, when it became inheritable, the inheritance was long indefeasible, and the children or heirs at law were incapable of exclusion by will. Till at length it was found that so strict a rule of inheritance made heirs disobedient and headstrong, defrauded creditors of their just debts, and prevented many provident fathers from dividing or charging their estates as the exigency of their families required. This introduced pretty generally the right of disposing of one's property, or a part of it, by testament; that is, by written or oral instructions properly witnessed and authenticated, according to the pleasure of the deceased: which we therefore emphatically style his will. This was established in some countries much later than in others. With us in England, till modern times, a man could only dispose of one-third of his movables from his wife and children; and, in general, no will was permitted of lands till the reign of Henry the Eighth; and then only for a certain portion: for it was not till after the restoration that the power of devising real property became so universal as at present.

Wills, therefore, and testaments, rights of inheritance and successions, are all of them creatures of the civil or municipal laws, and accordingly are in all respects regulated by them; every distinct country having different ceremonies and requisites to make a testament completely valid: neither does anything vary more than the right of inheritance under different <sup>[13]</sup> national establishments. In England, particularly, this diversity is carried to such a length, as if it had been meant to point out the power of the laws in regulating the succession to property, and how futile every claim must be that has not its foundation in the positive rules of the state. In personal estates the father may succeed to his children; in landed property he never can be their immediate heir, by any the remotest possibility: in general, only the eldest son, in some places only the youngest, in others all the sons together, have a right to succeed to the inheritance: in real estates males are preferred to females, and the eldest male will usually exclude the rest; in the division of personal estates, the females of equal degree are admitted together with the males, and no right of primogeniture is allowed.

This one consideration may help to remove the scruples of many well-meaning persons, who set up a mistaken conscience in opposition to the rules of law. If a man disinherits his son, by a will duly executed, and leaves his estate to a stranger, there are many who consider this proceeding as contrary to natural justice: while others so scrupulously adhere to the supposed intention of the dead, that if a will of lands be attested by only two witnesses instead of three, which the law requires, they are apt to imagine that the heir is bound in conscience to relinquish his title to the devisee. But both of them certainly proceed upon very erroneous principles, as if, on the one hand, the son had by nature a right to succeed to his father's lands; or as if, on the other hand, the owner was by nature entitled to direct the succession of his property after his own decease. Whereas the law of nature suggests, that on the death of the possessor the estate should again become common, and be open to the next occupant, unless otherwise ordered for the sake of civil peace by the positive law of society. The positive law of society, which is with us the municipal law of England, directs it to vest in such person as the last proprietor shall by will, attended with certain requisites, appoint; and, in defect of such appointment, to go to some particular person, who from the result <sup>[14]</sup> of certain local constitutions, appears to be the heir at law. Hence it follows, that, where the appointment is regularly made, there cannot be a shadow of right in anyone but the person appointed: and, where the necessary requisites are omitted, the right of the heir is equally strong and built upon as solid foundation, as the right of the devisee would have been, supposing such requisites were observed.

§ 13. 4. Things in common.—But, after all, there are some few things, which notwithstanding the general introduction and continuance of property, must still unavoidably remain in common; being such wherein nothing but an usufructuary property is capable of being had: and therefore they still belong to the first occupant, during the time he holds possession of them, and no longer. Such (among others) are the elements of light, air, and water; which a man may occupy by means of his windows, his gardens, his mills, and other conveniences: such, also, are the generality of those animals which are said to be feræ naturæ (wild by nature), or of a wild and untamable disposition: which any man may seize upon and keep for his own use or pleasure. All these things, so long as they remain in possession, every man has a right to enjoy without disturbance; but if once they escape from his custody, or he voluntarily abandons the use of them, they return to the common stock, and any man else has an equal right to seize and enjoy them afterwards.

§ 14. 5. Ownerless things.—Again, there are other things, in which a permanent property may subsist, not only as to the temporary use, but also the solid substance; and which yet would be frequently found without a proprietor, had not the wisdom of the law provided a remedy to obviate this inconvenience. Such are forests and other waste grounds, which were omitted to be appropriated in the general distribution of lands: such also are wrecks, estrays, and that species of wild animals, which the arbitrary constitutions of positive law have distinguished from the rest by the well-known appellation of game. With regard to these and some others, as disturbances and quarrels <sup>[15]</sup> would frequently arise among individuals, contending about the acquisition of this species of property by first occupancy, the law has therefore wisely cut up the root of dissension, by vesting the things themselves in the sovereign of the state; or else in his representatives appointed and authorized by him, being usually the lords of manors. And thus the legislature of England has universally promoted the grand ends of civil society, the peace and security of individuals, by steadily pursuing that wise and orderly maxim, of assigning to everything capable of ownership a legal and determinate owner.

OF REAL PROPERTY; AND, FIRST, OF CORPOREAL HEREDITAMENTS.

§ 15. Classification of things.—The objects of dominion or property are things, as contradistinguished from persons; and things are by the law of England distributed into two kinds: things real, and things personal. Things real are such as are permanent, fixed, and immovable, which cannot be carried out of their place; as lands and tenements: things personal are goods, money, and all other movables; which may attend the owner's person wherever he thinks proper to go.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Real and personal property distinguished.—Is the distinction between real and personal property a natural and essential one, or is it merely the creature of positive law? Mr. Austin (Lectures on Jurisprudence, I. 59, 60) and some other recent writers take the latter view, and even call it "needless and accidental." But it is evident that property in land differs from any other kind of property. It is the control of a certain portion of the earth's surface (or of the nation's territory) without reference to the physical substance occupying the space. We may remove the buildings, the soil itself, the strata under the soil, and they cease to be real property and become personal. But the space itself remains, and is still our close. We cannot remove or change it. We cannot destroy it as we can all other property. However complete our ownership may be by the law, nature has fixed limits to it that belong to no other kind of property. Moreover real property must necessarily be held subject to the rights of the state. Every nation must for its own existence as such have a territory and be lord paramount of that territory. Each individual proprietor must hold all his rights subject to the rights of the state: for it is in the power of the state to maintain its own territorial existence that his title depends. (United States v. Repentigny, 5 Wall. 211, 18 L. Ed. 627.)

In England (where out of twenty million inhabitants only thirty to thirty-five thousand own a foot of the soil, and the number is constantly diminishing, while that of the landless increases) the practical enforcement of the state's rights is fast becoming a question of intense interest, though it addresses itself more directly to legislators and economists than to practicing lawyers. Many thinking men are disposed to advocate the theory that the state is, as a matter of necessity, the only proprietor of the soil, and that individual rights are and must always be subordinate. An able statement of this view is in an article on "The Tenure of Land." (West. Rev. July, 1864. See, also, J. S. Mill's Principles of Political Economy. Yet Mr. Mill quotes, apparently with approbation, Austin's attack "on the darkening distinction between real and personal property—a distinction which has no foundation in the philosophy of law, but solely in its history, and which Austin emphatically characterizes as a cause of complexness, disorder, and darkness, which nothing but the extirpation of the distinction can thoroughly cure." [Ed. Rev. Oct. 1863, p. 226, note.] This illustrates the disregard of all connection between law and life common alike to legal and lay writers.)

In treating of things real, let us consider, first, their several sorts or kinds; secondly, the tenures by which they may be holden; thirdly, the estates which may be had in them; and, fourthly, the title to them, and the manner of acquiring and losing it.

"Landed property is felt even by those most tenacious of its rights to be a different thing from other property, and where the bulk of the community have been disinherited of their share of it, and it has become the exclusive attribute of a small minority, men have generally tried to reconcile it to their sense of justice by endeavoring to attach duties to it, and erecting it into a sort of magistracy, either moral or legal. But if the state is at liberty to treat the possessors of land as public functionaries, it is only going one step further to say that it is at liberty to discard them. The claim of the land owners to the land is altogether subordinate to the general policy of the state. The principle of property gives them no right to the land, but only a right to compensation for whatever portion of their interest in the land it may be the policy of the state to deprive them of." (Prin. of Pol. Econ., i, p. 285.) "To me it seems almost an axiom that property in land should be interpreted strictly, and that the balance in all cases of doubt should incline against the proprietor. The reverse is the case with the property in movables, and in all things the product of labor; over these the owner's power, both of use and exclusion, should be absolute, except where positive evil to society would result from it; but in the case of land no exclusive right should be permitted in any individual which cannot be shown to be productive of positive good. To be allowed any exclusive right at all over any portion of the common inheritance, while there are others who have no portion is already a privilege. No quantity of movable goods which a person can acquire by his labor prevents others from acquiring the like by the same means; but from the very nature of the case, whoever owns land keeps it from somebody else." (Prin. of Pol. Econ., i, p. 287.)

The general tendency of our law at present, especially in the western states, is to do away with all distinction, and regard individual ownership of real estate as precisely of the same character with personal. "We, in general, own our land in simple absoluteness, and need not talk of allodium, or free and common socage." (Per Woodward, J., in Pierson v. Armstrong, 1 Iowa, 282, 294, 63 Am. Dec. 440.)

Yet there is unquestionably a distinction in the nature of things between the two. The community as a whole has a right of control over the territory as a whole very different from any it possesses over the personal fortunes of its citizens. It must have this for its safety; it cannot help having it, so far as other nations are concerned. Each individual proprietor of land must hold all his rights subject to the rights of the state. No matter what may be the changing forms under which these paramount rights may appear, we find them always existing and founded in the very nature of the case. The common ownership of the early Saxons and other Germanic tribes, the feudal tenures of the middle ages, the eminent domain of modern law, are only so many varying expressions of a single principle. Real property law is now often treated as if it related only to individual estates, but this is an arbitrary division of the subject. We cannot fully discuss the rules of law relating to a piece of land to-day without taking account of those which regulate the action of government in taxing it, forfeiting it, confiscating it to its own use, etc. We cannot even define accurately the rights of the individual owner without studying the same rules, which give and limit to the body politic rights as substantial and valuable as those held by a feudal lord—rights in some respects more arbitrary than any feudal lord ever claimed.

The power of the sovereign over the land of the country, and the dependence of all private titles upon that, are stated in the most forcible terms in Forsyth's Cases on C. L., p. 14, quoting Lord Mansfield in Campbell v. Hall, Cowp. 209; 20 St. Tr. 323. And see Smith v. Brown, 2 Salk. 666. The same expressions will be found in many American cases on the right of eminent domain. It is only when private property in land is the subject of discussion that this element seems forgotten.

Some of our recent jurists treat the distinction of land and chattels, or realty and personalty (in the English sense), as an unlucky attempt to express the scientific difference between res mobiles, immobiles, which they regard as the original or natural classification: (Amos, Systematic View, p. 131, et seq.; 2 Austin, Lecture xlvi, pp. 804, 805; Holland on Jurisprudence, pp. 135, 136.) But the distinction between mobilia, immobilia, was certainly not a primitive one in the Roman law. It is due to the classic jurists (Gaius, ii. 42; Ulpian, xix. 8; Dig. ii. 8, 15; Code, i. 2, 14, pr.), and even they use res soli oftener, I think, than res immobiles. Besides, they introduce a third term, se moventia, not having any counterpart in our classification. There is no evidence of any early use of motion as a criterion of legal qualities in the Roman more than in the English law. We find traces of it in the forms of writs (F. N. B. 88 B); but no rules of law based upon it.

The distinction of movable and immovable seems to be of small importance in itself. Much personal property is as immovable as land, either in a literal sense or in the sense by which we denote a want of complete power over the property. Thus houses on leased land, growing crops, heavy fixed machinery, etc., are actually immovable. Shares in the public funds, or in railroads and other local works, are immovable in so far that the owner cannot at pleasure remove them from under the control of whatever government rules the territory; in this partaking to a most important degree of the peculiarity of real estate. We must then look elsewhere for the basis of a distinction, if one is to be made.

There is nothing in the physical nature of land differing widely from other property. Houses would of course become chattels at once, severed from the soil; but so would the soil itself if displaced. There is no part of a man's land that he may not, under some circumstances, sever and sell as personal property. The surface soil may be carted off to build a railroad, or enrich other land, and quarries and mines might exhaust all the contents of a close as deep as men could go under the physical conditions, leaving nothing but a hole. Still the hole would remain, and remain the owner's; it would have all the legal qualities of real estate; over that section of the earth's surface he would have the same control as ever.

On the other hand, this very permanency is a limit of the owner's right. He cannot by any means whatever destroy or transmute his property in land. He may destroy houses, and remove, as we have just seen, the physical contents of his close; but he would be obliged to leave the close itself, the section of space, just as he found it. "Everything properly embraced within the description of personal property is both movable and perishable. Land is immovable and imperishable. Personal property is at the absolute disposal of the owner. He can use, transport, or destroy. Real property can only be used. It is not the subject of transportation or destruction. The surface of the earth may be changed and occupied for different purposes; it may be forced to yield up portions of its wealth, in mineral and agricultural products, to the hand of man; but the foundation, the thing itself, will remain forever. An individual may hold the right of possession for a period, but in the progress of time he must pass along and leave that right behind him for the enjoyment of others. Hence the rule naturally follows that no person can by any possible arrangement become invested with the absolute ownership of land. . . . It has therefore become an accepted rule of public law that the absolute and ultimate right of property shall be regarded as vested in the sovereign or corporate power of the state where the land lies, . . . because it is the only one which is certain to survive the generations of men as they pass away." (Bingham on Real Estate, pp. 2, 3.)

From this train of thought, then, we reach a conclusion as to what constitutes the peculiar nature of real estate. Not its immobility merely, but the permanency and unchangeability, of which the immobility is only an outward sign. But in what does the permanency inhere? Not in the earth or rocks of the soil, nor in the houses thereon; all these may be changed and taken away, may be converted into personal chattels and other chattels fixed in their places, and thus converted into real estate. What is permanent is simply the space—the definite part of the earth's surface. That which makes real estate differ from all other kinds of property is that it consists in the owner's control over a certain defined part of the earth on which we dwell. In this respect no other property has anything in common with what lawyers mean by land.

§ 18. b. Tenements.—Tenement is a word of still greater extent, and though in its vulgar acceptation [17] is only applied to houses and other buildings, yet in its original, proper, and legal sense it signifies everything that may be holden, provided it be of a permanent nature;<sup>2</sup> whether it be of a substantial and sensible,

But municipal law treats it as a part not of the earth's surface in general, but of the national domain—the territory occupied by the state. All its important legal qualities are derived from this relation. The state for its very existence must have a territory—must exercise sovereign power over that territory—must therefore be brought into peculiar relations with all individuals exercising other powers over portions of the same. Here is the cardinal distinction. All other kinds of property may or may not bring its owner into contact with the state. Real property must do so, because both the state and the private owner must control it. It is not necessary for our purpose to enumerate all the points of contact between the two owners. The chief of them are these: (1) As to all foreign nations the state is the owner in chief. It may cede any portion of its domain to a conqueror, and the rights of the private owner will be at the mercy of the latter, except so far as the rights of conquest are controlled by modern laws of war. In other cases any foreign power that wishes to make any use of private land must have permission from the state. The individual owner has no right to transfer his title to a foreign power without the sanction of his own government. Until recently it has been the general rule that he could not even transfer it to the individual subject of a foreign power. (2) The state may take any part of its own territory out of the hands of an individual owner when it pleases, subject only to such restrictions as the state itself imposes by constitution or otherwise. (3) If the land is left without an individual owner, the state must for its own safety and welfare take charge of it. (4) The state must control the owner's use of it so as to prevent its being a nuisance to others.

Beside these necessary points of control, history shows that the ownership of the soil gives the possessor a relation to the state different from and superior to every other kind of property.—HAMMOND.

<sup>2</sup> "In People ex rel. v. Kelsey, 14 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 376, it is said: 'The word "tenement" signifies everything which may be holden, if it be of a permanent nature, and a wharf or pier is so permanent that it becomes a part of the soil and freehold itself.' In People v. Westervelt, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 676, it was said: 'No doubt the notion that tenements comprehended chattels real was taken, in Vredenbergh v. Morris, 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 223, from the very general words of Blackstone (2 Bl. Comm. 16, 17), who says that 'it includes or of an unsubstantial ideal kind. Thus liberum tenementum, frank-tenement, or freehold, is applicable not only to lands and other solid objects, but also to offices, rents, commons, and the like:<sup>a</sup> and, as lands and houses are tenements, so is an advowson a tenement; and a franchise, an office, a right of common, a peerage, or other property of the like unsubstantial kind, are, all of them, legally speaking, tenements.<sup>b</sup>

§ 19. c. Hereditaments: corporeal and incorporeal.—But an hereditament, says Sir Edward Coke,<sup>c</sup> is by much the largest and most comprehensive expression: for it includes not only lands and tenements, but whatsoever may be inherited, be it corporeal, or incorporeal, real, personal, or mixed. Thus an heirloom, or implement of furniture which by custom descends to the heir together with an house, is neither land, nor tenement, but a mere movable; yet, being inheritable, is comprised under the general word “hereditament”: and so a condition, the benefit of which may descend to a man from his ancestor, is also an hereditament.<sup>d</sup>

Hereditaments, then, to use the largest expression, are of two kinds: corporeal and incorporeal. Corporeal consist of such as affect the senses; such as may be seen and handled by the body:

everything that may be holden, provided it be of a permanent nature.’ But none of his illustrations given at the same page go so far; and the generality of his phrases is still more plainly restricted by Co. Litt. 6a, to which he refers. Coke’s words are: ‘Tenementum, tenement, is a large word, to pass not only lands and other inheritances which are holden, but also offices, rents, profits a prendre out of lands, and the like, wherein a man hath any frank-tenement, and whereof he is seised ut de libero et tenemento.’ The illustrations of the same writer (Co. Litt. 19 and 20a) show also that the term in its technical sense is confined to freeholds. Perkins, § 114, is to the same effect. Preston on Estates, 8, 9, is very full in his examples, all of which are confined to freeholds; indeed, terms of years are expressly excluded. Wood’s Inst. 114, also contains a very full enumeration to the same effect. Blackstone himself excludes terms for years by so many words at another place (Bl. Comm. 386; Co. Litt. 118b, s. p.)” Orchard v. Wright etc. Store Co., 225 Mo. 414, 20 Ann. Cas. 1072, 125 S. W. 486, 495.

incorporeal are not the object of sensation, can neither be seen nor handled, are creatures of the mind, and exist only in contemplation.<sup>3</sup>

§ 20. (1) Corporeal hereditaments—(a) Land.—Corporeal hereditaments consist wholly of substantial and permanent objects; all which may be comprehended under the general denomination of land only. For land, says Sir Edward Coke,<sup>o</sup> comprehendeth in its legal signification any ground, soil, or earth whatsoever; as arable meadows, pastures, woods, moors, waters, marshes, furzes, and heath. [18] It legally includeth also all castles, houses, and other buildings: for they consist, saith he, of two things; land, which is the foundation, and structure thereupon: so that, if I convey the land or ground, the structure or building passeth therewith. It is observable that water is here mentioned as a species of land, which may seem a kind of solecism; but such is the language of the law: and therefore I cannot bring an action to recover possession of a pool or other piece of water, by the name of water only; either by calculating its capacity, as, for so many cubical yards; or, by superficial measure, for twenty acres of water; or by general description, as for a pond, a watercourse, or a rivulet: but I must bring my action for the land that lies at the bottom, and must call it twenty acres of land covered with water.† For water is a movable, wandering thing, and must of necessity continue common by the law of nature;<sup>4</sup> so that I can only have a temporary, transient, usufructuary property therein: wherefore, if a body of water runs out of my pond into another man's, I have no right to reclaim it. But the land which that water covers is permanent, fixed, and immovable: and therefore in this I may have a certain, substantial property; of which the law will take notice, and not of the other.

<sup>3</sup> Corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments.—This distinction, though of great antiquity and authority, is obviously founded on a misconception. For it is manifest that a freehold estate in possession, which is the plainest example of a corporeal hereditament, is of the same nature (though not of the same extent or value) as a right of way over the same piece of land, which is clearly an incorporeal hereditament. It is, equally with the right of way, a “creature of the mind,” or rather, of the law, and can neither be seen nor handled. It is the land itself which “affects the senses”: but this is precisely the same thing in both cases. The true distinction is, that a corporeal hereditament is an interest in land which confers possession (or, as it was formerly called, “seisin”) of the land upon the person in whom it is vested; while the incorporeal hereditament, however valuable it may be, does not entitle its owner to possession of the land. This distinction was of vast importance in feudal times, and, even now, is not without practical consequences. However, the student can hardly be expected to understand it until he has become further acquainted with the subject of this book.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 101.

§ 21. (i) Superjacent and subjacent space.—Land hath also, in its legal signification, an indefinite extent, upwards as well as downwards. Cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad cælum (he who owns the ground possesses also to the sky), is the maxim of the law, upwards; therefore no man may erect any building, or the like, to overhang another's land: and, downwards, whatever is in a direct

<sup>4</sup> Ice as realty.—In holding that when the water of a stream running in its natural channel is congealed the ice attached to the soil constitutes a part of the land and belongs to the owner of the bed of the stream, the Indiana court says: "The entire ground upon which any property in water as water, flowing in a stream, is denied, in distinction from the admitted property in its impetus, is in that, as Blackstone states, 'it is a movable, wandering thing, and must of necessity continue common by the law of nature.' 2 Bl. Comm. 18. In Sury v. Pigot, Poph. 166, it is quaintly said, that an ejectione firma will not lie for water 'because it is not firma, sed currit.' But when this 'movable, wandering thing' has congealed and become attached to the soil, does it not, like any other accession thereto, become part of the realty? Wherein does it differ from alluvion, or accretion, which is but the imperceptible deposit or addition of earth, sand, gravel, and other matter made by rivers, floods or other causes, upon land? Angell, Watercourses, § 53. It is the adhering of property to something else, by which the owner of one thing becomes possessed of a right to another. Webster's Dictionary, where is cited the sentence from Richard Cobden, 'The golden alluvions are there (in California and Australia) spread over a far wider space; they are found not only on the banks of rivers and in their beds, but are scattered over the surface of vast plains.' This addition is alluvion, whether arising from natural or artificial causes. 2 Hilliard, Real Prop., 195, note a; Bouv. Law Dic. It has been held, 'the seaweed thus thrown up by the sea, may be considered as one of those marine increases arising by slow degrees; and according to the rule of the common law, it belongs to the owner of the soil.' *Emans v. line between the surface of any land and the center of the earth, belongs to the owner of the surface; as is every day's experience in the mining countries. So that the word "land" includes not only the face of the earth, but everything under it, or over it.<sup>5</sup> And therefore if a man grants all his lands, he grants thereby all his mines of metal and other fossils, his woods, his waters, and his houses, as well as his fields and meadows. Not but the particular names of the things are [19] equally sufficient to pass them, except in the

<sup>5</sup> Rights in superjacent space.—It is the theory of the law that the land owner owns above and below the surface. (This theory is expressed by the maxim, Cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad cælum et ad inferos—he who owns the ground possesses also to the sky and to the center of the earth.) But it is an undetermined question whether the principle means that the ownership of the land carries with it the possession of the column of air above, or merely that the land owner is entitled to complain of the occupation of the space above him which materially interferes with his enjoyment of his land. Lord Ellenborough, in 1815, raised the question whether passing over a man's land in a balloon would be a trespass. He then expressed the opinion that it was not in itself a trespass "to interfere with the column of air superincumbent on the close," although he held that a man was a trespasser who fired a gun on his own land so that the shot fell on his neighbor's land. (Pickering v. Rudd, 4 Camp. 219, 1 Stark. 56.) Lord Blackburn later expressed the opinion that the balloonist would be a technical trespasser. (Kenyon v. Hart, 6 Best & S. 249, 122 Eng. Reprint, 1188.) Erecting a building so that the eaves overhang another's land has been held to be a trespass. (Smith v. Smith, 110 Mass. 302.) And ejectionment has been allowed against a company that had strung a telephone wire over the plaintiff's land. (Butler v. Frontier Telephone Co., 186 N. Y. 486, 116 Am. St. Rep. 563, 9 Ann. Cas. 858, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 920, 79 N. E. 716.) In a case in which it was held that the owner of a stallion was liable for damage done by the horse kicking and biting the plaintiff's mare through a wire fence which separated the plaintiff's and defendant's closes, Lord Coleridge said: "It seems to me sufficiently clear that some portion of the horse's body must have been over the boundary. That may be a very small trespass, but it is a trespass in law." (Ellis v. Loftus Iron Co., L. R. 10 C. P. 10.) It may be doubted whether this case was not decided rather on the theory of the common-law duty of the owner of cattle to keep them in than on the theory of trespass. It has, however, also been held that in a quarrel between two neighbors, where one of them reached her arm across the fence, she was guilty of a trespass. "The mere fact that plaintiff did not step across the boundary line does not make her any less a trespasser if she reached her arm across the line, as she admits she did." (Hannabalsen v. Sessions, 116 Iowa, 457, 93 Am. St. Rep. 250, 90 N. W. 93.) In Butler v. Frontier Telephone Co., 186 N. Y. 486, 116 Am. St. Rep. 563, 9 Ann. Cas. 858, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 920, 79 N. ## OF INCORPOREAL HEREDITAMENTS.

§ 22. Character of an incorporeal hereditament.—An incorporeal hereditament is a right issuing out of a thing corporate (whether real or personal) or concerning, or annexed to, or exercisable within, the same.<sup>a</sup> It is not the thing corporate itself, which

<sup>1</sup> Incorporeal hereditaments.—In defining this term Blackstone has not repeated his definition of hereditament, apparently taking it for granted that no one would apply the name of the sub-class to anything which may not be inherited, that being an essential property of the class. (Text, p. 18.) But experience shows that the definition taken by itself has sometimes been applied to objects that are incorporeal, but in no sense hereditaments, e. g., to mining licenses (Beatty v. Gregory, 17 Iowa, 109, 85 Am. Dec. 546), public easements, etc. Mr. Broom, therefore, has corrected this by adding “transmissible to heirs, according to the law regulating the inheritance of land.” (Broom and Hadley, ii, 20.) But he has also changed Blackstone’s “issuing out of a thing corporate, whether real or personal,” and said that “except in a few cases an incorporeal hereditament issues out of or is annexed to a corporeal hereditament.” (Broom and Hadley, ii, 20.) There was no such limitation to the common-law conception; but in fact the few kinds of incorporeal hereditaments still in use in American law do thus issue out of land, I believe, without exception; and even in England, according to Serjeant Stephen, “the term of incorporeal hereditament is in effect exclusively applied to the class of things real; and may in such case be defined as a right annexed to, or issuing out of, or exercisable within an hereditament corporeal of that class.” (New Com., vol. 1, 666.)

A hereditament at common law was not necessarily land or even real property. Anything (in possession) that would descend to a man’s heirs, instead of passing to his executor or administrator, was a hereditament; and if not land it was an incorporeal hereditament. Thus annuities to a man and his heirs, tithes, advowsons, offices, corodies, franchises, dignities, were incorporeal hereditaments. Most of these have dropped out of the class with us in America, because they no longer pass to heirs in the strict sense of the word, if they have not become obsolete entirely. Tithes, advowsons, corodies, are unknown with us. Offices and franchises have lost entirely their hereditary character. Rents are almost the only such hereditaments enumerated by Blackstone that may still be regarded as such when held as distinct objects of ownership (in gross), and these are rare. The only remaining examples are usually appendant to some estate in land (ways, commons), and as such may consist in lands, houses, jewels, or the like; but something collateral thereto, as a rent issuing out of those lands or houses, or an office relating to those jewels. In short, as the logicians speak, corporeal hereditaments are the substance, which may be always seen, always handled: incorporeal hereditaments are but a sort of accidents, which inhere in and are supported by that substance; and may belong or not belong to it, without any visible alteration therein. Their existence is merely in idea and abstracted contemplation; though their effects and profits may be frequently objects of our bodily senses. And indeed, if we would fix a clear notion are easements. For this reason easements and incorporeal hereditaments are often confounded together, and what is true of one term is spoken of as belonging to the other. But an easement is not necessarily a hereditament, and most incorporeal hereditaments are not easements.

A still worse blunder is that of ranking estates and easements together as divisions of a single genus. One may have an estate of any quantity in an easement, as well as in a piece of land or corporeal hereditament; but it is on the assumption that the easement is also an incorporeal hereditament. One can have no estate in an easement in gross, or in a chattel.

Easement and its correlative servitude belong to the class of words that denote the object of a right, and not the right itself; and in that respect are in the same category with hereditament. But servitude connotes the object with regard to the land over which the right is to be exercised, not the object of the right itself. It is not an appurtenance of the servient estate, any more than the sum due (the duitie in the precise old phrase of the Y. B.) is a part of the debtor's property. It is what in mathematics would be called a minus, a negative quantity. Hence for the purposes of classification it had better be dismissed from thought, as only another name for the same thing or object of right, regarded from the standpoint of duty instead of right.

Remainders and reversions have often in recent books been included among incorporeal hereditaments, because they formerly "lay in grant" and not in livery. But Stephen has well said that "the more convenient and juster arrangement is that adopted by Blackstone. The larger use of the term confounds the estate which may be had in the property with the property itself." (New Com., vol. 1, 666, n. d.) The remainder or reversion is as truly a form of estate as a freehold in possession, and may have either a corporeal or incorporeal hereditament for its object. But a title to enter for condition broken is properly called an incorporeal hereditament. The party entitled has no estate in the land whatever, and there is no confusion. (Marquis of Winchester's Case, 3 Coke, 2; 2 Wooddesson, 38.) If we call reversions and remainders incorporeal hereditaments we must revise many well-settled rules of law, e. g., that a rent cannot be granted out of an incorporeal hereditament; for it is agreed that rent may be reserved on the grant of a reversion, even of an incorporeal hereditament, we must be careful not to confound together the profits produced, and the thing, or hereditament, which produces them. An annuity, for instance, is an incorporeal hereditament: for though the money, which is the fruit or product of this annuity, is doubtless of a corporeal nature, yet the annuity itself, which produces that money, is a thing invisible, has only a mental existence, and cannot be delivered over from hand to hand. So tithes, if we consider the <sup>[21]</sup> produce of them, as the tenth sheaf or tenth lamb, seem to be completely corporeal; yet they are indeed incorporeal hereditaments: for they, being merely a contingent right, collateral to or issuing out of lands, can never be the object of sense: they are neither capable of being shown to the eye, nor of being delivered into bodily possession.

§ 23. Kinds of incorporeal hereditaments.—Incorporeal hereditaments are principally of ten sorts; advowsons, tithes, commons, ways, offices, dignities, franchises, corodies or pensions, annuities, and rents.

if a dry reversion that had before no rent attached to it. (Whitlock's Case, 8 Coke, 69.)

American writers have gone still further and added uses and trusts to the list of incorporeal hereditaments, although Professor Wooddesson had said distinctly: "With us a trust or beneficial estate in lands is never ranked among incorporeal hereditaments" (2 Lectures, 38, Lect. xxi), and Lord Coke's well-known description of a use (1 Inst. 272 b) as neither jus in re nor jus ad rem, but collateral to the land, might have been a sufficient warning. One writer (Mr. A. Bingham) has even divided the whole subject of real estate into the two heads of Estates and Easements, as if one could have any easement except by an estate in it.—HAMMOND.

(from whence, as was formerly mentioned,<sup>b</sup> arose the division of parishes), the lord, who thus built a church, and endowed it with glebe or land, had of common right a power annexed of nominating such minister as he pleased (provided he were canonically qualified) to officiate in that church, of which he was the founder, endower, maintainer, or, in one word, the patron.<sup>c</sup>

This instance of an advowson will completely illustrate the nature of an incorporeal hereditament. It is not itself the bodily possession of the church and its appendages; but it is a right to give some other man a title to such bodily possession. The advowson is the object of neither the sight nor the touch; and yet it perpetually exists in the mind's eye, and in contemplation of law. It cannot be delivered from man to man by any visible bodily transfer, nor can corporal possession be [<sup>22</sup>] had of it. If the patron takes corporal possession of the church, the churchyard, the glebe or the like, he intrudes on another man's property; for to these the parson has an exclusive right. The patronage can therefore be only conveyed by operation of law, by verbal grant, either oral or written, which is a kind of invisible, mental transfer: and being so vested, it lies dormant and unnoticed, till occasion calls it forth: when it produces a visible, corporeal fruit, by entitling some clerk, whom the patron shall please to nominate, to enter and receive bodily possession of the lands and tenements of the church.

§ 25. a. Advowsons appendant or in gross.—Advowsons are either advowsons appendant, or advowsons in gross. Lords of manors being originally the only founders, and of course the only patrons, of churches,<sup>d</sup> the right of patronage or presentation, so long as it continues annexed to the possession of the manor, as some have done from the foundation of the church to this day, is called an advowson appendant,* and it will pass, or be conveyed, together with the manor, as incident and appendant thereto, by a grant of the manor only, without adding any other words.<sup>f</sup> But where the property of the advowson has been once separated from the property of the manor, by legal conveyance, it is called an advowson in gross, or at large, and never can be appendant any more; but is for the future annexed to the person of its owner, and not to his manor or lands.<sup>g 4</sup>

§ 26. b. Advowsons presentative, collative, or donative.—Advowsons are also either presentative, collative, or donative.<sup>h</sup> An advowson presentative is where the patron hath a right of presentation to the bishop or ordinary, and moreover to demand of him to institute his clerk, if he finds him canonically qualified: and this is the most usual advowson. An advowson collative is where the bishop and patron are one and the same person: in which case the bishop cannot present to himself; but he does, by the one act of collation, or [23] conferring the benefice, the whole that is done in common cases, by both presentation and institution. An advowson donative is when the king, or any subject by his license, doth found a church or chapel, and ordains that it shall be merely in the gift or disposal of the patron; subject to his visitation only, and not to that of the ordinary; and vested absolutely in the clerk by the patron's deed of donation, without presentation, institution, or induction.<sup>1</sup> This is said to have been anciently the only way of conferring ecclesiastically benefices in England; the method of institution by the bishop not being established more early than the time of Archbishop Becket in the reign of Henry II.<sup>2</sup> And therefore, though Pope Alexander III,<sup>1</sup> in a letter to Becket, severely

<sup>4</sup> This is the view of Blackstone; but it seems to be at variance with that of other authorities (Ive's Case (1597), 5 Rep., at 11 b; Hartopp's and Cock's Case (1627), Hutt. 88, 123 Eng. Reprint, 1120). Perhaps there is a confusion between "appendant" and "appurtenant."—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 810 n.

inveighs against the prava consuetudo (erroneous practice), as he calls it, of investiture conferred by the patron only, this, however, shows what was then the common usage. Others contend that the claim of the bishops to institution is as old as the first planting of Christianity in this island; and in proof of it they allege a letter from the English nobility to the pope in the reign of Henry the Third, recorded by Matthew Paris,<sup>m</sup> which speaks of presentation to the bishop as a thing immemorial. The truth seems to be, that, where the benefice was to be conferred on a mere layman, he was first presented to the bishop, in order to receive ordination, who was at liberty to examine and refuse him: but where the clerk was already in orders, the living was usually vested in him by the sole donation of the patron; till about the middle of the twelfth century, when the pope and his bishops endeavored to introduce a kind of feudal dominion over ecclesiastical benefices, and, in consequence of that, began to claim and exercise the right of institution universally, as a species of spiritual investiture.

However this may be, if, as the law now stands, the true patron once waives this privilege of donation, and presents to the bishop and his clerk is admitted and instituted, the [24] advowson is now become forever presentative, and shall never be donative any more.<sup>n</sup> For these exceptions to general rules, and common right, are ever looked upon by the law in an unfavorable view, and construed as strictly as possible. If, therefore, the patron, in whom such peculiar right resides, does once give up that right, the law, which loves uniformity, will interpret it to be done with an intention of giving it up forever; and will therefore reduce it to the standard of other ecclesiastical livings.

§ 27. 2. Tithes.—A second species of incorporeal hereditaments is that of tithes;<sup>5</sup> which are defined to be the tenth part of the increase, yearly arising and renewing from the profits of lands, the stock upon lands, and the personal industry of the inhabitants: the first species being usually called predial, as of corn, grass, hops,

and wood;° the second mixed, as of wool, milk, pigs, etc.,<sup>p</sup> consisting of natural products, but nurtured and preserved in part by the care of man; and of these the tenth must be paid in gross; the third personal, as of manual occupations, trades, fisheries, and the like; and of these only the tenth part of the clear gains and profits is due.<sup>q</sup><sup>6</sup>

It is not to be expected from the nature of these general Commentaries, that I should particularly specify, what things are tithable, and what not, the time when, or the manner and proportion in which, tithes are usually due. For this I must refer to such authors as have treated the matter in detail: and shall only observe that, in general, tithes are to be paid for everything that yields an annual increase, as corn, hay, fruit, cattle, poultry, and the like; but not for anything that is of the substance of the earth, or is not of annual increase, as stone, lime, chalk, and the like; nor for creatures that are of a wild nature, or feræ naturæ, as deer, hawks, etc., whose increase, so as to profit the owner, is not annual, but casual.<sup>r</sup> It will rather be our business to consider, 1. The original of the right of tithes. 2. In whom [<sup>25</sup>] that right at present subsists. 3. Who may be discharged, either totally or in part, from paying them.

§ 28. a. Origin of tithes.—As to their original, I will not put the title of the clergy to tithes upon any divine right; though such a right certainly commenced, and I believe as certainly ceased, with the Jewish theocracy. Yet an honorable and competent maintenance for the ministers of the gospel is, undoubtedly, jure divino (by divine right); whatever the particular mode of that maintenance may be. For, besides the positive precepts of the New Testament, natural reason will tell us, that an order of men, who are separated from the world, and excluded from other lucrative professions, for the sake of the rest of mankind, have a right to be furnished with the necessaries, conveniences, and moderate enjoyments of life, at their expense, for whose benefit they forego the usual means of providing them. Accordingly all municipal laws have provided a liberal and decent maintenance for their national priests or clergy: ours in particular have established this of tithes, probably in imitation of the Jewish law: and perhaps, considering the degenerate state of the world in general, it may be more beneficial to the English clergy to found their title on the law of the land than upon any divine right whatsoever, unacknowledged and unsupported by temporal sanctions.

We cannot precisely ascertain the time when tithes were first introduced into this country. Possibly they were contemporary with the planting of Christianity among the Saxons, by Augustin the Monk, about the end of the sixth century. But the first mention of them, which I have met with in any written English law, is in a constitutional decree, made in a synod held A. D. 786,<sup>a</sup> wherein the payment of tithes in general is strongly enjoined. This canon, or decree, which at first bound not the laity, was effectually confirmed by two kingdoms of the heptarchy, in their parliamentary conventions of estates, respectively consisting of the kings of Mercia [<sup>26</sup>] and Northumberland, the bishops, dukes, senators, and people. Which was a few years later than the time that Charlemagne established the payment of them in France,<sup>t</sup> and made that famous division of them into four parts; one to maintain the edifice of the church, the second to support the poor, the third the bishop, and the fourth the parochial clergy.<sup>u</sup>

The next authentic mention of them is in the fœdus Edwardi et Guthruni; or the laws agreed upon between King Guthrun the Dane, and Alfred and his son Edward the Elder, successive kings of England, about the year 900. This was a kind of treaty between those monarchs, which may be found at large in the Anglo-Saxon laws:<sup>v</sup> wherein it was necessary, as Guthrun was a pagan, to provide for the subsistence of the Christian clergy under his dominion; and, accordingly, we find <sup>x</sup> the payment of tithes not only enjoined, but a penalty added upon nonobservance: which law is seconded by the laws of Athelstan,<sup>r</sup> about the year 930. And this is as much as can certainly be traced out, with regard to their legal original.

§ 29. b. Tithes, to whom due.—We are next to consider the persons to whom they are due. And upon their first introduction (as hath formerly been observed<sup>s</sup>) though every man was obliged to pay tithes in general, yet he might give them to what priests he pleased;<sup>a</sup> which were called arbitrary consecrations of tithes: or he might pay them into the hands of the bishop, who distributed among his diocesan clergy the revenues of the church, which were then in common.<sup>b</sup> But, when dioceses were divided into parishes, the tithes of each parish were allotted to its own particular minister; first by common consent, or the appointments of lords of manors, and afterwards by the written law of the land.<sup>c</sup>

[27] However, arbitrary consecrations of tithes took place again afterwards, and became in general use till the time of King John.<sup>d</sup> Which was probably owing to the intrigues of the regular clergy, or monks of the Benedictine and other rules, under Archbishop Dunstan and his successors; who endeavored to wean the people from paying their dues to the secular or parochial clergy (a much more valuable set of men than themselves), and were then in hopes to have drawn, by sanctimonious pretenses to extraordinary purity of life, all ecclesiastical profits to the coffers of their own societies. And this will naturally enough account for the number and riches of the monasteries and religious houses, which were founded in those days, and which were frequently endowed with tithes. For a layman, who was obliged to pay his tithes somewhere, might think it good policy to erect an abbey, and there pay them to his own monks; or grant them to some abbey already erected; since, for this dotation, which really cost the patron little or nothing, he might, according to the superstition of the times, have masses forever sung for his soul. But, in process of years, the income of the poor laborious parish priests being scandalously reduced by these arbitrary consecrations of tithes, it was remedied by Pope Innocent the Third* about the year 1200 in a decretal epistle, sent to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and dated from the palace of Lateran: which has occasioned Sir Henry Hobart and others to mistake it for a decree of the council of Lateran held A. D. 1179, which only prohibited what was called the infeudation of tithes, or their being granted to mere laymen,<sup>f</sup> whereas this letter of Pope Innocent to the archbishop enjoined the payment of tithes to the parsons of the respective parishes where every man inhabited, agreeable to what was afterwards directed by the same pope in other countries.<sup>g</sup> This epistle, says Sir Edward Coke,<sup>h</sup> bound not the lay subjects of this realm; but, being reasonable and just (and, he might have [28] added, being correspondent to the ancient law) it was allowed of, and so became lex terræ (the law of the land). This put an effectual stop to all the arbitrary consecrations of tithes; except some footsteps which still continue in those portions of tithes, which the parson of one parish hath, though rarely, a right to claim in another: for it is now universally held,<sup>i</sup> that tithes are due, of common right, to the parson of the parish, unless there be a special exemption. This parson of the parish, we have formerly seen,<sup>k</sup> may be either the actual incumbent, or else the appropriator of the benefice: appropriations being a method of endowing monasteries, which seems to have been devised by the regular clergy, by way of substitution to arbitrary consecrations of tithes.<sup>l</sup>

§ 30. c. Exemption from tithes.—We observed that tithes are due to the parson of common right, unless by special exemption: let us therefore see, thirdly, who may be exempted from the payment of tithes, and how lands, and their occupiers, may be exempted or discharged from the payment of tithes, either in part or totally, first, by a real composition; or, secondly, by custom or prescription.

§ 31. (1) By a real composition.—First, a real composition is when an agreement is made between the owner of the lands, and the parson or vicar, with the consent of the ordinary and the patron, that such lands shall for the future be discharged from payment of tithes, by reason of some land or other real recompense given to the parson, in lieu and satisfaction thereof.<sup>m</sup> This was permitted by law, because it was supposed that the clergy would be no losers by such composition; since the consent of the ordinary, whose duty it is to take care of the church in general, and of the patron, whose interest it is to protect that particular church, were both made necessary to render the composition effectual: and hence have arisen all such compositions as exist at this day by force of the common law. But, experience showing that even this caution was ineffectual, and [29] the possessions of the church being, by this and other means, every day diminished, the disabling statute 13 Eliz., c. 10 (Dilapidations, 1571), was made: which prevents, among other spiritual persons, all parsons and vicars from making any conveyances of the estates of their churches, other than for three lives or twenty-one years. So that now, by virtue of this statute, no real composition made since the 13 Eliz. (1571) is good for any longer term than three lives or twenty-one years, though made by consent of the patron and ordinary: which has indeed effectually demolished this kind of traffic; such compositions being now rarely heard of, unless by authority of parliament.

§ 32. (2) By discharge by custom or prescription.—Secondly, a discharge by custom or prescription, is where time out of mind such persons or such lands have been, either partially or totally, discharged from the payment of tithes. And this immemorial usage is binding upon all parties; as it is in its nature an evidence of universal consent and acquiescence, and with reason supposes a real composition to have been formerly made. This custom or prescription is either de modo decimandi (of a particular manner of tithing), or de non decimando (of an exemption from tithes).

is by custom a particular manner of tithing allowed, different from the general law of taking tithes in kind, which are the actual tenth part of the annual increase. This is sometimes a pecuniary compensation, as twopence an acre for the tithe of land: sometimes it is a compensation in work and labor, as that the parson shall have only the twelfth cock of hay, and not the tenth, in consideration of the owner's making it for him: sometimes, in lieu of a large quantity of crude or imperfect tithe, the parson shall have a less quantity, when arrived to greater maturity, as a couple of fowls in lieu of tithe eggs; and the like. Any means, in short, whereby the general law of tithing is altered, and a new method of taking them is introduced, is called a modus decimandi, or special manner of tithing.

[30] To make a good and sufficient modus, the following rules must be observed. 1. It must be certain and invariable,<sup>n</sup> for payment of different sums will prove it to be no modus, that is, no original real composition; because that must have been one and the same, from its first original to the present time. 2. The thing given, in lieu of tithes, must be beneficial to the parson, and not for the emolument of third persons only:<sup>o</sup> thus a modus, to repair the church in lieu of tithes, is not good, because that is an advantage to the parish only; but to repair the chancel is a good modus, for that is an advantage to the parson. 3. It must be something different from the thing compounded for:<sup>p</sup> one load of hay, in lieu of all tithe hay, is no good modus: for no parson would bona fide (in good faith) make a composition to receive less than his due in the same species of tithe; and therefore the law will not suppose it possible for such composition to have existed. 4. One cannot be discharged from payment of one species of tithe, by paying a modus for another.<sup>q</sup> Thus a modus of 1d. for every milch cow will discharge the tithe of milch kine, but not of barren cattle: for tithe is, of common right, due for both; and therefore a modus for one shall never be a discharge for the other. 5. The recompense must be in its nature as durable as the tithes discharged by it; that is, an inheritance certain:<sup>r</sup> and therefore modus that every inhabi- tant of a house shall pay 4*d.* a year, in lieu of the owner's tithes, is no good modus; for possibly the house may not be inhabited, and then the recompense will be lost. 6. The modus must not be too large, which in law is called a rank modus: as if the real value of the tithes be 60*l. per annum*, and a modus is suggested of 40*l.* this modus will not be good; though one of 40*s.* might have been valid.* For, in these cases of prescriptive or customary modus's, the law supposes an original real composition to have been regularly made; which being lost by length of time, the immemorial usage is admitted as evidence to show that it once did exist, and that from thence <sup>[31]</sup> such usage was derived. Now, time of memory hath been long ago ascertained by the law to commence from the reign of Richard the First;† and any custom may be destroyed by evidence of its nonexistence in any part of the long period from his days to the present; wherefore, as this real composition is supposed to have been an equitable contract, or the full value of the tithes, at the time of making it, if the modus set up is so rank and large, as that it beyond dispute exceeds the value of the tithes in the time of Richard the First, this modus is felo de se and destroys itself. For, as it would be destroyed by any direct evidence to prove its nonexistence at any time since that era, so also it is destroyed by carrying in itself this internal evidence of a much later original.

§ 34. (b) De non decimando.—A prescription de non decimando is a claim to be entirely discharged of tithes, and to pay no compensation in lieu of them. Thus the king by his preroga-

* Ninth edition inserts here, "Indeed, properly speaking, the doctrine of rankness in a modus is a mere rule of evidence, drawn from the improbability of the fact, and not a rule of law." [Pyke v. Dowling, Hil. 19 Geo. III. C. B.]

▪ 11 Mod. 60.

† This rule was adopted, when by the statute of Westm. 1. (3 Edw. I, c. 39—Limitation, 1275), the reign of Richard I. was made the time of limitation in a writ of right. But, since by the statute 32 Hen. VIII. c. 2 (Prescription, 1540), this period (in a writ of right) hath been very rationally reduced to sixty years, it seems unaccountable, that the date of legal prescription or memory, should still continue to be reckoned from an era so very antiquated. See 2 Roll. Abr. 269. pl. 16.

tive is discharged from all tithes.<sup>u</sup> So a vicar shall pay no tithes to the rector, nor the rector to the vicar, for ecclesia decimas non solvit ecclesiæ (the church does not pay tithes to the church).<sup>v</sup> But these personal privileges (not arising from or being annexed to the land) are personally confined to both the king and the clergy; for their tenant or lessee shall pay tithes, though in their own occupation their lands are not generally tithable.<sup>w</sup> And, generally speaking, it is an established rule, that, in lay hands, modus de non decimando non valet (an exemption from tithing is of no force).<sup>x</sup> But spiritual persons or corporations, as monasteries, abbots, bishops, and the like, were always capable of having their lands totally discharged of tithes, by various ways,<sup>y</sup> as, 1. By real composition: 2. By the pope's bull of exemption: 3. By unity of possession; as when the rectory of a parish, and lands in the same parish, both belonged to a religious [32] house, those lands were discharged of tithes by this unity of possession: 4. By prescription; having never been liable to tithes, by being always in spiritual hands: 5. By virtue of their order; as the knights templars, cistercians, and others, whose lands were privileged by the pope with a discharge of tithes.<sup>z</sup> Though upon the dissolution of abbeys by Henry VIII most of these exemptions from tithes would have fallen with them, and the lands become tithable again; had they not been supported and upheld by the statute 31 Hen. VIII, c. 13 (Religious Houses, 1539), which enacts, that all persons who should come to the possession of the lands of any abbey then dissolved, should hold them free and discharged of tithes, in as large and ample a manner as the abbeys themselves formerly held them. And from this original have sprung all the lands, which, being in lay hands, do at present claim to be tithe-free: for, if a man can show his lands to have been such abbey lands, and also immemorially discharged of tithes by any of the means before mentioned, this is now a good prescription de non decimando. But he must show both these requisites: for abbey lands, without a special ground of discharge, are not discharged of course; neither will any prescription de non decimando avail in total discharge of tithes, unless it relates to such abbey lands.

§ 35. 3. Commons.—Common, or right of common, appears from its very definition to be an incorporeal hereditament: being a profit which a man hath in the land of another; as to feed his beasts, to catch fish, to dig turf, to cut wood, or the like.<sup>a 7</sup> And hence common is chiefly of four sorts; common of pasture, of piscary, of turbary, and of estovers.<sup>8</sup>

§ 36. a. Common of pasture.—Common of pasture is a right of feeding one's beasts on another's land; for in those waste grounds, which are usually called commons, the property of the soil is generally in the lord of the manor; as in common fields it is in the particular tenants. This kind of common is either appendant, appurtenant, because of vicinage, or in gross.<sup>b</sup>

§ 37. (1). Common appendant.—<sup>[33]</sup> Common āppendant is a right, belonging to the owners or occupiers of arable land, to put commonable beasts upon the lord's waste, and upon the lands of other persons within the same manor. Commonable beasts are either beasts of the plow, or such as manure the ground. This is a matter of most universal right: and it was originally permitted,<sup>c</sup> not only for the encouragement of agriculture, but for the necessity of the thing. For, when lords of manors granted out parcels of land to tenants, for services either done or to be done, these tenants could not plow or manure the land without beasts; these beasts could not be sustained without pasture; and pasture could not be had but in the lord's wastes, and on the uninclosed fallow grounds of themselves and the other tenants. The law therefore annexed

this right of common, as inseparably incident, to the grant of the lands; and this was the original of common appendant: which obtains in Sweden, and the other northern kingdoms, much in the same manner as in England.<sup>4</sup>

§ 38. (2) Common appurtenant.—Common appurtenant ariseth from no connection of tenure, nor from any absolute necessity:<sup>9</sup> but may be annexed to lands in other lordships,<sup>9</sup> or extend to other beasts, besides such as are generally commonable; as hogs, goats, or the like, which neither plow nor manure the ground. This not arising from any natural propriety or necessity, like common appendant, it is therefore not of general right; but can only be claimed by immemorial usage and prescription,<sup>f</sup> which the law

<sup>9</sup> Use of the word "appurtenant."—The principle of appurtenancy is not confined to rights of common, but is applicable to incorporeal hereditaments in general. Incorporeal hereditaments appurtenant consist of such as are not naturally and originally appendant to corporeal hereditaments, but have been annexed to them, either by some express deed of grant, or by prescription from long enjoyment. Rights of common and rights of way or passage over the property of another person are the principal kinds of incorporeal hereditaments usually found appurtenant to lands. When thus annexed, they will pass by a conveyance of the lands to which they have been annexed, without mention of the appurtenances; although these words, "with the appurtenances," have been usually inserted in conveyances, for the purpose of distinctly showing an intention to comprise such incorporeal hereditaments of this nature as may belong to the lands. But if such rights of common or of way, though usually enjoyed with the lands, should not have been strictly appurtenant to them, a conveyance of the lands merely, with their appurtenances, without mentioning the rights of common or way, would not have been sufficient to comprise them. It was, therefore, usual in conveyances to insert at the end of the "parcels," or description of the property, a number of "general words" in which were comprised, not only all rights of way and common, etc., which might belong to the premises, but also such as might be therewith used or enjoyed. But now, by the Conveyancing Act of 1881, a conveyance of land made after the year 1881 shall be deemed to include and shall by virtue of the act operate to convey, with the land, all commons, ways, and other liberties, privileges, easements, rights, and advantages whatsoever reputed to appertain to, or at the time of conveyance enjoyed with, the land or any part thereof. In consequence of this enactment, general words are now rarely employed.—WILLIAMS, Real Prop. (21st ed.), 426.

§ 39. (3) Common because of vicinage.—Common because of vicinage, or neighborhood, is where the inhabitants of two townships, which lie contiguous to each other, have usually intercommoned with one another; the beasts of the one straying mutually into the other's fields, without any molestation from either.<sup>10</sup> This is indeed only a permissive right, intended to excuse what in strictness is a trespass in both, and to prevent a multiplicity of suits: and therefore either township may inclose and bar out the other, though they have intercommoned time out of mind. Neither hath any person of one town a right to put his beasts originally [34] into the other's common: but if they escape, and stray thither of themselves, the law winks at the trespass.*

§ 40. (4) Common in gross.—Common in gross, or at large, is such as is neither appendant nor appurtenant to land, but is annexed to a man's person; being granted to him and his heirs by deed: or it may be claimed by prescriptive right, as by a parson of a church, or the like corporation sole. This is a separate inheritance, entirely distinct from any landed property, and may be vested in one who has not a foot of ground in the manor.

§ 41. (5) Restrictions on commons of pasture.—All these species, of pasturable common, may be and usually are limited as to number and time; but there are also commons without stint,

<sup>10</sup> Common of vicinage.—Professor Wooddesson has said truly that common per cause de vicinage is not properly a right of common or incorporeal hereditament, but only an excuse for trespass; or in modern terms, it is not an easement, but a mere license. He also points out that it extends to other cases than the example given by Blackstone, as where cattle are lawfully placed in one field or pasture and stray into an adjoining common being open and uninclosed. (Lectures, ii. 50.) So where two neighbors let their lands lie open without a partition fence, but put cattle each into his own land, their relative rights and duties are those of common of vicinage. Much petty litigation might have been saved in some states if this common-law principle had been remembered by lawyers and judges.—HAMMOND.

and which last all the year.<sup>11</sup> By the statute of Merton, however, and other subsequent statutes,<sup>h</sup> the lord of a manor may inclose so much of the waste as he pleases, for tillage or wood ground, provided he leaves common sufficient for such as are entitled thereto. This inclosure, when justifiable, is called in law "approving"; an ancient expression signifying the same as "improving."<sup>12</sup> The lord hath the sole interest in the soil; but the interest of the lord and commoner, in the common, are looked upon in law as mutual. They may both bring actions for damage done, <sup>11</sup> Commons without stint.—Where an incorporeal hereditament is capable of being held in gross, it may be created either by an original grant to that effect, or by separation of an originally appendant or appurtenant right from the dominant tenement to which it was formerly annexed. (Musgrave v. Gave (1741), Wiles, 319, 125 Eng. Reprint, 1193; Bunn v. Channen (1813), 5 Taunt. 244, 128 Eng. Reprint, 683.) At one time there seems to have been very considerable doubt whether such a separation was permissible; at any rate, without the consent of the owner of the servient tenement. (Drury v. Kent (1603), Cro. Jac. 15, 79 Eng. Reprint, 13; Daniel v. Hanslip (1672), 2 Lev. 67, 83 Eng. Reprint, 452.) But this doubt seems to have been confined to cases in which the right claimed was of an indefinite character, e. g., so-called "common without stint"—a feature extremely rare in incorporeal hereditaments, and quite inconsistent with their character. (Ormerod v. Todmorden Mill Co. (1883), 11 Q. B. D., at p. 172, per Bowen, L. J.)—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 266.

<sup>12</sup> Meaning of the word "approve."—"Approve" in this sense is not the common word—Lat. approbare—neither does it stand for appropriare, as has been conjectured with some plausibility. It represents an old French verb, aproer or approuer, to profit or enrich, from preu or prou, itself an obscure word, which in modern French survives in "ni prou ni peu" (cf. preuz, prouesse). In Latin of the late thirteenth century (Statute of Westminster and Fleta) it appears in reflective construction as se approuare. "Se approuare de" . . . is therefore "to make one's profit of" . . . exactly what in the statute of Merton, where the word itself does not occur, is expressed by the phrase "commodum suum facere." The corresponding substantive is "approment" or "appromement" in the English of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. In the seventeenth century the spelling approve, appprovement, and with it the mistaken derivation from approbare, came in. <sup>13</sup> English inclosure and commons acts.—The inclosure of common fields and waste lands, and the consequent extinction of common rights therein, were deemed to be objects of so much importance to agricultural improvement, that they were not left in modern times to depend on these ancient statutes; but were introduced very generally, throughout entire manors and parishes in almost every part of the kingdom, by force of local acts of parliament, passed from time to time for the purpose. To avoid the expense and delay attendant on this practice, was passed the Inclosure (Consolidation) Act of 1801; the aim of which was to consolidate a number of the regulations usually inserted in local Inclosure Acts, and to make them applicable, subject only to any special provisions, to every case of local inclosure. So popular did this policy of inclosure become, in the early years of the nineteenth century, when the rapid increase of population enabled huge fortunes to be realized by inclosing wastes for building purposes, that at last it was determined to do away altogether with the necessity of obtaining special powers from the legislature in each case, and to provide a scheme which should be easily applicable to all inclosure projects. This object was achieved by the passing of the Inclosure Act, 1845. * * *

So long as the policy which produced the Inclosure Act of 1845, and its numerous amendments, continued to receive popular approval, the process of inclosure went on rapidly under its provisions. Year after year, sometimes twice in a single session, parliament passed a short act authorizing the carrying out of inclosure schemes recommended by the Inclosure Commissioners; until the disappearance of open spaces, especially in the neighborhood of large towns, began to inspire thoughtful people with a doubt whether the vaunted policy of the Inclosure Acts was really for the benefit of the nation. It was generally believed that, apart from questions of public health, the rights of the poorer commoners had been somewhat neglected in the awards of the commissioners. Popular feeling began to manifest itself. The formation, in the year 1865, of the Commons Preservation Society, marks the turn of the tide. Statutes, passed with the object of hindering the rapid extension of that process which parliament had hitherto been so anxious to promote, began to make their appearance. One of the earliest was the Metropolitan Commons Act of 1866, which expressly forbade the commissioners to entertain any proposal for the inclosure of a common within the Metropolitan Police District, and provided an elaborate machinery for the conversion of such commons into public parks and gardens. And this policy became general ten years later,

§ 43. c. Common of turbary.—As common of turbary is a liberty of digging turf upon another's ground.<sup>1</sup> There is also a common of digging for coals, minerals, stones, and the like. All these bear a resemblance to common of pasture in many respects; though in one point they go much further: common of pasture being only a right of feeding on the herbage and vesture of the soil, which renews annually; but common of turbary, and the rest, are a right of carrying away the very soil itself.<sup>14</sup>

when the Commons Act, 1876, enacted that any common lands, in lieu of being inclosed, might be appropriated as open land, and regulated for the public use; and expressly provided, that any encroachment on, or inclosure of, a village green or recreation ground, having a known and defined boundary, should be a public nuisance, and summarily punishable before the magistrates. A civil jurisdiction is also thereby given to the county court of the district in the matter of any such nuisance; and that court may accordingly, as the justice of the case requires, grant injunctions or make orders of removal or abatement. The change of policy evidenced by the legislation of 1866 and 1876 has, in recent years, been carried still further by the Law of Commons Amendment Act, 1893, and the Commons Act, 1899; by the latter of which any district council is authorized to prepare a scheme for the regulation and management of any common within its district, and nonparliamentary grants or inclosures of commons, even for the most beneficent objects, are forbidden. So that the elaborate provisions of the Inclosure Act, 1845, though nominally unrepealed, have become almost a dead letter.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 270.

<sup>14</sup> Commons of piscary and turbary.—Common of piscary is a liberty of fishing in another man's water, as common of turbary is a liberty of digging turf upon another man's ground for the purposes of a message to which the right is appurtenant or appurtenant. These may be claimed either by grant or by prescription; and a right of piscary may be either appurtenant or in gross. Common of turbary cannot be claimed as appurtenant to land, but only to a house; and it authorizes not the taking of turf except for the purpose of using the same as fuel, in the particular house to which the right is annexed. It has been recently decided, that the destruction of the house to which the right is appendant, with a view of rebuilding, does not destroy the right of turbary; which will attach to the new house, provided that the burden on the servient tenement is not thereby increased.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 267.

or farm, from off another's estate. The Saxon word, bote, is used by us as synonymous to the French estovers: and therefore house-bote is a sufficient allowance of wood, to repair, or to burn in, the house; which latter is sometimes called fire-bote: plow-bote and cart-bote are wood to be employed in making and repairing all instruments of husbandry: and hay-bote or hedge-bote is wood for repairing of hays, hedges, or fences. These botes or estovers must be reasonable ones; and such any tenant or lessee may take off the land let or demised to him, without waiting for any leave, assignment, or appointment of the lessor, unless he be restrained by special covenant to the contrary.<sup>m 15</sup>

These several species of commons do all originally result from the same necessity as common of pasture; viz., for the maintenance and carrying on of husbandry: common of piscary being given for the sustenance of the tenant's family: common of turbary and fire-bote for his fuel; and house-bote, plow-bote, cart-bote, and hedge-bote, for repairing his house, his instruments of tillage, and the necessary fences of his grounds.

§ 45. 4. Ways.—A fourth species of incorporeal hereditaments is that of ways; or the right of going over another man's ground. I speak not here of the king's highways, which lead from town to town; nor yet of common ways, leading from a village into the fields; but of private ways, in which a particular man may have an interest and a right, though another be owner of the soil. This may be grounded on a special permission; as when the owner of the land grants to another a liberty of passing over his grounds, to go to church, to market, or the like: in which case the gift or grant is particular; and confined to the grantee alone; it dies with the person; and, if the grantee leaves the country, he cannot assign over his right to any other; nor can he justify taking another [36] person in his company.<sup>n 16</sup> A way may be also by prescription; as if all the owners and occupiers of such a farm have immemorially used to cross another's ground: for this immemorial usage supposes an original grant, whereby a right of way thus appurtenant to land may clearly be created. A right of way may also arise by act and operation of law: for, if a man grants me a piece of ground in the middle of his field, he at the same time tacitly and impliedly gives me a way to come at it; and I may cross his land for that purpose without trespass.<sup>o 17</sup> For when the law doth give anything to one, it giveth impliedly whatsoever is necessary for enjoying the same.<sup>p</sup> By the law of the twelve tables at Rome, <sup>16</sup> No easements "in gross."—It is now the doctrine of the law that there can be no such thing as a true right of way, or any other easement, held "in gross," that is to say, independently of the claimant's interest in some tenement, for the benefit of which the easement is claimed.

<sup>15</sup> Like common of pasture, it may be claimed either by express grant or prescription; but it is doubtful whether it can exist in gross. This common of estovers is to be carefully distinguished from the house-bote, etc., of a tenant for life (p. *122, post), which arises by operation of law as part of his life estate, and which is exercised, not in alieno solo, as every true incorporeal hereditament is, but in suo solo, i. e., in the land itself of the tenant for life.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 268.

<sup>17</sup> Ways of necessity.—"These are termed ways of necessity. It is always of strict necessity; and this necessity must not be created by the party claiming the right of way. It never exists where a man can get to his property through his own land. That a road through his neighbor's would be a better road, more convenient, or less expensive, is not to the purpose. That the passage through his own land is too steep or too narrow does not alter the case. It is only where there is no way through his own land that the right of way over the land of another can exist. A right of way from necessity only extends to a single way. That a person claiming a way of necessity has already one way is a good plea, and bars the plaintiff. (McDonald v. Lindall, 3 Rawle (Pa.), 492.) It is founded on an implied grant, according to the legal maxim, quando lex aliquid alicui concedit, concedere videtur et id. sine quo res ipsa esse non potest. (Nichols v. Luce, 24 Pick. (Mass.) 102, 35 Am. Dec. 302.) But whereabouts shall be the way? The owner of the land over which it exists has a right to locate it in the first instance, with this limitation, that it must be a convenient way. If he fails or refuses to locate, or makes an inconvenient or unreasonable location, the right devolves upon the grantee of the way. (Russell v. Jackson, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 574.) The right of way of necessity ceases with the necessity which gave rise to it; so that if a public road is opened, or the grantee purchases other land, which gives him a way over his own land, the first right of way ceases. (Collins v. Prentice, 15 Conn. 39, 38 Am. Dec. 61; Pierce v. Selleck, 18 Conn. 321; New York Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Milnor, 1 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 353.)" Sharswood. The grantee is to assign the way where he can best spare it. (Bolton v. School Board of London, 40 L. T., N. S., 582.)—HAMMOND.

where a man had the right of way over another's land, and the road was out of repair, he who had the right of way might go over any part of the land he pleased;<sup>18</sup> which was the established rule in public as well as private ways. And the law of England, in both cases, seems to correspond with the Roman.<sup>9</sup>

§ 46. 5. Offices.—Offices, which are a right to exercise a public or private employment, and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging, are also incorporeal hereditaments: whether public, as those of magistrates; or private, as of bailiffs, receivers, and the like. For a man may have an estate in them, either to him and his heirs, or for life, or for a term of years, or during pleasure only: save only that offices of public trust cannot be granted for a term of years, especially if they concern the administration of justice, for then they might perhaps vest in executors or administrators.<sup>7</sup> Neither can any judicial office be granted in reversion; because though the grantee may be able to perform it at the time of the grant, yet before the office falls he may become unable and insufficient: but ministerial offices may be so granted;<sup>8</sup> for those may be executed by deputy. Also, by statute 5 and 6 Edw. VI, c. 16 (Sale of Offices, 1552), no public office shall be sold, under pain of disability to dispose of or hold it. For the law presumes that [37] he who buys an office will by bribery, extortion, or other unlawful means, make his purchase good, to the manifest detriment of the public.<sup>19</sup>

of the place or by removal under the written law, it was said in support of a decision sustaining the deprivation, that the thing involved was not property or a vested right of property and so it could be taken away. In support of a determination that the due process of law feature of the constitution applies to the deprivation of office it came to be frequently said that the thing is property because it is of pecuniary value. In support of the contrary theory and that the power to remove an officer for cause is not judicial, it was said that an office, or the right to an office, is not property—though not venturing to say that it is not a thing of value to its possessor. Where an effort was made in the initial stages of the confusion to support the latter view by something in the nature of logic, it was said that the thing is not property because not subject to absolute vestment and to be bought and sold and pass by inheritance. And again, that it is a mere agency, terminable by choice of the agent, or by legislative will, and has no element of gain except contingent upon service previously rendered. The teachings of the old masters of the law, Coke and Blackstone, that the right to an office and to take the emoluments thereof is property has been carelessly, it seems, brushed aside by the mere statement that conditions under which they wrote were different than those existing under our system; that the distinction renders that which was formerly properly denominated property not so now the feature generally referred to being that an office then was a hereditament, while it has no such element now. That demonstrated the very extreme of argument based on false logic, sometimes indulged in as an easy method of constructing a basis for an ultimate conclusion to be pronounced. It often happens, where the superstructure is suspended upon mere assertion at first and then there is effort to create a support, in reason that the reason is more the product of desire than of principle. That is well illustrated when we refer to the text of Blackstone and see that the right to an office and to take its emoluments—not the office contemplated as a place—was denominated property and not, necessarily, with reference to any of its features which some judicial writers have said rendered it then of the crown, they must arise from the king's grant; or, in some cases, may be held by prescription, which, as has been frequently said, presupposes a grant. The kinds of them are various, and almost infinite: I will here briefly touch upon some of the principal; premising only, that they may be vested in either natural persons or bodies politic; in one man, or in many; but the same identical fran-

a property nature, but not now. Blackstone divided property into tangible, and such intangible things, or incorporeal things 'as can neither be seen or handled,' creatures of the mind, and existing only in contemplation. All were classed under the broad term 'property' and not, necessarily, because they were subjects of traffic. 2 Cooley's Blackstone, 37. In the details as to the intangible class of property we find an almost boundless field. It extends to substantially everything of any value, pecuniary or otherwise, to the individual—including the 'right to exercise an office and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging.' It was said that was classable as within the intangible sphere because one might have an estate, that is, a right therein, among other things 'for a term of years or during pleasure only,' 'though no public office, in general, is a subject of sale.' 2 Bl. Comm. 37. Thus the word 'estate' was used in the broad sense of a rightful possession at pleasure, for life, or for years upon conditions subsequent or without condition, and property was regarded as including everything with it in the broad sense of the term, whether tangible, or intangible and only existing in contemplation of the senses—if valuable to the person in any sense. Who can doubt but that this conception was in the minds of the framers of the constitution while they were not in the peril of seeking information from an unreconcilable undigested mass of judicial sayings—just had the teachings of the old philosophers of the law for their guidance.

"Thus the efforts to give support to the idea that the right to an office is not property seems futile. They originated in such an early case as Conner v. City of New York, 1 Seld. (5 N. Y.) 285, to sustain the right of the legislature to deal with an office regardless of the will of the officer. It was followed in Donahue v. County of Will, 100 Ill. 94, to sustain the position that the right to an office is not under the protection of due process of law. That case is cited by most text-writers, while conceding by the reasoning that a distinction must be made between an officer and the right to an office, and that many courts hold that the latter is essentially property. Throop on Public Officers, § 18. In Wammack v. Holloway, 2 Ala. 31, the court said that the right to an office is 'as much a species of property as any other thing capable of being held or owned,' citing Blackstone and Bacon. It is no less property now than in the olden times because it is not a 'hereditament.'"—MARSHALL, J., in Ekern v. McGovern, 154 Wis. 157, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 796, 142 N. W. 595.

chise that has before been granted to one cannot be bestowed on another, for that would prejudice the former grant."<sup>20</sup>

§ 49. a. Various franchises.—To be a county palatine is a franchise, vested in a number of persons. It is likewise a franchise for a number of persons to be incorporated, and subsist as a body politic; with a power to maintain perpetual succession and do other corporate acts: and each individual member of such corporation is also said to have a franchise or freedom. Other franchises are, to hold a court-leet: to have a manor or lordship; or, at least, to have a lordship paramount: to have waifs, wrecks, estrays, treasure-trove, royal fish, forfeitures, and deodands: to have a court of one's own, or liberty of holding pleas; and trying causes: to have the cognizance of pleas; which is a still greater liberty, being an exclusive right, so that no other court shall try causes arising

<sup>20</sup> Meaning of franchise.—"What is a franchise? Under the English law Blackstone defines it as 'a royal privilege, or branch of the king's prerogative, subsisting in the hands of a subject.' 2 Bl. Comm. 37. Generalized, and divested of the special form which it assumes under a monarchical government based on feudal traditions, a franchise is a right, privilege or power or public concern, which ought not to be exercised by private individuals at their mere will and pleasure, but should be reserved for public control and administration, either by the government directly, or by public agents, acting under such conditions and regulations as the government may impose in the public interest, and for the public security. Such rights and powers must exist under every form of society. They are always educed by the laws and customs of the community. Under our system, their existence and disposal are under the control of the legislative department of the government, and they cannot be assumed or exercised without legislative authority. No private person can establish a public highway, or a public ferry, or railroad, or charge tolls for the use of the same, without authority from the legislature, direct or derived. These are franchises. No private person can take another's property, even for a public use, without such authority; which is the same as to say, that the right of eminent domain can only be exercised by virtue of a legislative grant. This is a franchise. No persons can make themselves a body corporate and politic without legislative authority. Corporate capacity is a franchise. The list might be continued indefinitely." State of California v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., 127 U. S. 1, 40, 32 L. Ed. 150, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073.

"A 'franchise' has been often defined, so that the meaning of the term is well settled. Blackstone's definition is: 'A royal privilege or branch of the within that jurisdiction: to have a bailiwick, or liberty exempt from the sheriff of the county; [28] wherein the grantee only, and his officers, are to execute all process: to have a fair or market; with the right of taking toll, either there or at any other public places, as at bridges, wharfs, or the like; which tolls must have a reasonable cause of commencement (as in consideration of repairs, or the like), else the franchise is illegal and void:<sup>x</sup> or, lastly, to have a forest, chase, park, warren, or fishery, endowed with privileges of royalty; which species of franchise may require a more minute discussion.

§ 50. b. Franchise of forest.—As to a forest: this, in the hands of a subject, is properly the same thing with a chase; being subject to the common law, and not to the forest laws.<sup>y</sup> But a chase differs from a park, in that it is not inclosed, and also in that a man may have a chase in another man's ground as well as in his own; being indeed the liberty of keeping beasts of chase or royal game therein, protected even from the owner of the land with a king's prerogative subsisting in the hands of a subject.' 2 Bl. Comm. 37. In this country it is a special privilege granted by the state, which does not belong to citizens of the country generally by common right. This is the distinguishing feature of a franchise. A right which belongs to the government when conferred upon the citizen is a franchise. No one can exercise the right of eminent domain, or establish a highway or railway and charge tolls for the same, without a grant from the legislature. Such rights as inhere in the sovereign power can only be exercised by the individual or corporation by virtue of a grant from such sovereign power, and when the state grants such a right it is a franchise." Lasher v. People, 183 Ill. 226, 75 Am. St. Rep. 103, 47 L. R. A. 802, 55 N. E. 663, 665.

"It will be observed that none of these, except corporations having the right to take tolls at bridges, wharfs, etc., have any application, under our laws. If, then, his enumeration is to be taken, the number of cases is small in which a franchise may be involved. If the Constitutional Convention and the General Assembly used the term according with its strict legal import, and we must presume they did, then in this country it can only embrace corporations, ferries, bridges, wharfs and the like, where tolls are authorized to be taken, and we may add the elective franchise, as it is granted by the constitution to a portion of the people to elect their officers. If others exist they do not occur to us at this time." People v. Holtz, 92 Ill. 426, 429.

power of hunting them thereon. A park is an inclosed chase, extending only over a man's own grounds. The word park indeed properly signifies an inclosure; but yet it is not every field or common, which a gentleman pleases to surround with a wall or paling, and to stock with a herd of deer, that is thereby constituted a legal park: for the king's grant, or at least immemorial prescription, is necessary to make it so.<sup>a</sup> Though now the difference between a real park, and such inclosed grounds, is in many respects not very material: only that it is unlawful at common law for any person to kill any beasts of park or chase,<sup>a</sup> except such as possess these franchises of forest, chase, or park.

§ 51. c. Franchise of freewarren.—Freewarren is a similar franchise, erected for preservation or custody (which the word signifies) of beasts and fowls of warren;<sup>b</sup> which, being feræ naturæ (of a wild nature), everyone had a natural right to kill as he could: but upon [39] the introduction of the forest laws, at the Norman Conquest, as will be shown hereafter, these animals being looked upon as royal game and the sole property of our savage monarchs, this franchise of freewarren was invented to protect them; by giving the grantee a sole and exclusive power of killing such game so far as his warren extended, on condition of his preventing other persons. A man, therefore, that has the franchise of warren, is in reality no more than a royal gamekeeper: but no man, not even a lord of a manor, could by common law justify sporting on another's soil, or even on his own, unless he had the liberty of freewarren.<sup>c</sup> This franchise is almost fallen into disregard, since the new statutes for preserving the game; the name being now chiefly preserved in grounds that are set apart for breeding hares and rabbits. There are many instances of keen sportsmen in ancient times, who have sold their estates, and reserved the freewarren, or right of killing game, to themselves; by which means it comes to pass that a man and his heirs have sometimes freewarren over another's ground.<sup>d</sup>

§ 52. d. Franchise of free fishery.—A free fishery, or exclusive right of fishing in a public river, is also a royal franchise; and is considered as such in all countries where the feudal polity has prevailed:•<sup>21</sup> though the making such grants, and by that

<sup>21</sup> Free fishery.—Free fishery in the common-law sense as a royal franchise is of course unknown in this country; and common of piscary is probably equally so. But the right of free fishing, not only in the sea and its arms, bays, etc., but also in navigable waters of all kinds, is a well-established common right of all men who can reach the waters without committing a trespass, or who are willing to risk the consequences of a trespass upon banks which are the property of other men.

In some few cases, as at Newport, Rhode Island, there still exists a right of way along the shore for the purpose of fishing in the sea. But this is exceptional, and can be traced to peculiar customs. Strictly speaking, no man can claim to take fish as a right, unless the law gives him access to the place necessary for the purpose. When it does so, the presumption is that he may take fish there, unless the owner of the land can show some kind of privilegium that excludes him; and of this there probably are extremely few examples in the country. But the legislature may regulate the exercise of this as of all common rights of citizens; and does so the more freely because not hindered by private and prescriptive rights, either in navigable waters of the state, or in those non-navigable streams where the soil itself is private property. (Commonwealth v. Chapin, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 199; 16 Am. Dec. 386; Waters v. Lilley, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 145, 16 Am. Dec. 333; Ingram v. Threadgill, 14 N. C. 59; Howes v. Grush, 131 Mass. 207; Doughty v. Conover, 42 N. J. L. 193; Weller v. Snover, 42 N. J. L. 341; Woolever v. Stewart, 36 Ohio St. 146, 38 Am. Rep. 569.)

Still there are important differences between the right in navigable and non-navigable waters. Prescriptive rights may be obtained in the latter as well as rights by grant; while in the former, though prescription is not impossible, it could only be obtained by showing adverse enjoyment, not only against the owner, but against all the world beside. (Chalker v. Dickinson, 1 Conn. 382, 6 Am. Dec. 250; Collins v. Benbury, 25 N. C. 277, 38 Am. Dec. 722, 27 N. C. 118, 42 Am. Dec. 155; Delaware & M. R. Co. v. Stump, 8 Gill & J. means appropriating what seems to be unnatural to restrain, the use of running water, was prohibited for the future by King John's great charter; and the rivers that were fenced in his time were directed to be laid open, as well as the forests to be disafforested.<sup>f</sup> This opening was extended, by the second<sup>g</sup> and third<sup>h</sup> charters of Henry III, to those also that were fenced under Richard I; so that a franchise of free fishery ought now to be at least as old as the reign of Henry II. This differs from a several fishery; because he that has a several fishery must also be the owner of the soil,<sup>i</sup> which in a free fishery is not requisite. It differs also from a Serg. & R. (Pa.) 71. It should be needless to say that this does not apply to shell-fish, such as oysters, etc., that are ascriptici glebæ and therefore depend on an entirely different rule. State v. Sutton, 2 R. I. 434; McCarty v. Holman, 22 Hun (N. Y.), 53; Robins v. Ackerly, 24 Hun (N. Y.), 499.)

The decisions upon this difference are hopelessly conflicting in different states, owing to the acceptance or rejection of the supposed common-law doctrine that only waters where the tide ebbs and flows are navigable in the eye of the law. (Houck on Rivers; The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. 443, 13 L. Ed. 1058; The Hine v. Trevor, 4 Wall. 555, 18 L. Ed. 451; New England etc. Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 11 Wall. 1, 20 L. Ed. 90.) This rests on the authority of Sir Matthew Hale's treatise, De Jure Maris, as commonly quoted; although it was shown twenty years ago that even had this been the English rule, it was not a rule of law to be followed here, but only an inference of fact, true in England but inapplicable here. It is not easy, however, to overthrow a doctrine once established on the authority of a great name, by drawing logical distinctions; and it is interesting to find that, even in England, the fact is now recognized that Lord Hale's opinion has been wrongly stated, and that he held navigability in law to depend on navigability in fact. I owe the information on which this statement is made to an opinion of counsel as to public rights in navigable rivers, printed by the corporation of Nottingham, England, in a recent case in which they were interested. From this opinion of Mr. P. Edward Dove, their counsel, I quote the following:—

It has been decided in several recent cases (Murphy v. Ryan, 2 I. R. C. L. 143; Pearce v. Scotcher, 9 Q. B. D. 162) that there can be no public right of fishing in nontidal waters. The point has not yet come before any English court of appeal, and I have no hesitation in saying that it is not consistent with our earlier law. Indeed, doubts have been expressed about it by several common of piscary before mentioned, in that the free fishery is an exclusive [40] right, the common of piscary is not so: and therefore, in a free fishery, a man has a property in the fish before they are caught; in a common of piscary not till afterwards.* Some, indeed, have considered a free fishery not as a royal franchise, but merely as a private grant of a liberty to fish in the several fishery of the grantor.<sup>1</sup> But the considering such right as originally a flower of the prerogative, till restrained by magna carta, and derived by royal grant (previous to the reign of Richard I) to such as now claim it by prescription, may remove some difficulties in respect to this matter, with which our books are embarrassed.*

* Ninth edition adds, "For it must be acknowledged, that the rights and distinctions of the three species of fishery are very much confounded in our law books; and that there are not wanting respectable authorities which maintain, that a several fishery may exist distinct from the property of the soil, and that a free fishery implies no exclusive right, but is synonymous with common of piscary." judges. For example, in Bristow v. Cormican, 10 I. R. C. L., at page 433, Whiteside, C. J., says: "Inquisitive lawyers have raised the question, Did Lord Hale propound dogmatically that navigable in law meant tidal, not that it really was so? . . . It may fairly be said that this question should now be thoroughly investigated in principle, and decided according to analogy and reason by the ultimate court of appeal." And at page 411, Dowse, B., says that he is by no means satisfied that the question has been thoroughly investigated.

After an examination of all the material for forming an opinion on the early law of rivers, I have come to the following conclusions: (1) Every river that is in fact navigable for ships or boats is a "public river" and a highway.

Hale (De Jure Maris, c. 11), in treating of the right of prerogative in rivers, says: "Another part of the king's jurisdiction in reformation of nuisances is to reform and punish nuisances in all rivers, whether fresh or salt, that are a common passage not only for ships and greater vessels, but also for smaller, as barges or boats; to reform the obstructions or annoyances that are therein to such common passage; for as the common highways on the land are for the common land passage, so these kind of rivers, whether fresh or salt, that bear boats or barges are highways by water; and as the highways by land are called altæ viæ regiæ, so these public rivers for public passage are called fluvii regales and haut streames le Roy; not in reference to the propriety of the river, but to the public use. . . . There be some streams or rivers that are private, not only in propriety or ownership but also in use, as

§ 53. 8. Corodies.—Corodies are a right of sustenance, or to receive certain allotments of victual and provision for one's maintenance.<sup>m</sup> In lieu of which (especially when due from ecclesiastical persons), a pension or sum of money is sometimes substituted.<sup>n</sup> And these may be reckoned another species of incorporeal hereditaments; though not chargeable on, or issuing from, any corporeal inheritance, but only charged on the person of the owner in respect of such his inheritance. To these may be added, § 54. 9. Annuities.—Annuities, which are much of the same nature; only that these arise from temporal, as the former from spiritual persons. An annuity is a thing very distinct from a rent-charge, with which it is frequently confounded: a rent-charge little streams and rivers, that are not a common passage for the king's people. Again, there be other rivers, as well fresh as salt, that are of common or public use for carriage of boats and lighters. And these, whether they are fresh or salt, whether they flow and reflow or not, are prima facie publici juris, common highways for man or goods, or both, from one inland town to another. Thus the rivers of Wey or Severn, of Thames, and divers others, as well above the bridges and ports as below, as well above the flowings of the sea as below, as well where they are become to be of private propriety, as in what parts they are of the king's propriety, are public rivers juris publici. And therefore all nuisances and impediments of passages of boats and vessels, though in the private soil of any person, may be punished by indictments and removed, and this was the reason of the statute of Magna Carta, cap. 23."

He goes on to say that even a river made navigable is juris publici if it was made navigable "at a common charge or by publick authority." That Hale is right in not limiting public rights in rivers to the tidal portions, admits of easy proof. In the first place he is confirmed by c. 23 of Magna Carta, which he himself quotes; and that this refers to nontidal rivers is clear, not only from the very wide words of the statute, but more particularly from the last four words. In the next place Hale is confirmed by the very important evidence of the Hundred Rolls. One of the articles of inquiry was, "de omnibus purpresturis quibuscumque factis super Regem vel regalem dignitatem, per quos factæ fuerunt, qualiter, et a quo tempore"; and the following extracts under this head show clearly that any obstruction in rivers was treated by the common law as a common nuisance and a purpresture. The importance of this is evident when we remember what a purpresture was. And, as Coke adds in another place (2 Inst., p. 38, ed. 1642), "every publique river or streame is alta via regia, the king's highway." It is clear from this that the rivers in the following extracts from the Hundred Rolls are public rivers, and therefore, as Coke being a burden imposed upon and issuing out of lands, whereas an annuity is a yearly sum chargeable only upon the person of the grantor.<sup>o</sup> Therefore, if a man by deed grant to another the sum of 20*l.* per annum, without expressing out of what lands it shall issue, no land at all shall be charged with it; but it is a mere personal annuity: which is of so little account in the law, that if granted to an eleemosynary corporation, it is not within the statutes of mortmain:<sup>p</sup> and yet a man may have a real estate in it, though his security is merely personal.<sup>22</sup>

puts it, “the king’s highways.” It is hardly necessary to point out that these rivers include many which are not tidal in any part.

Cases reported in the Year-Books also bear out the view that navigable rivers are highways, even above the flow of the tide; as, for example: And note, that it was found by the inquest that the water of Lea is the king’s highway, where the question was a nuisance in the Lea between Ware and Waltham. It was, moreover, held that if the river changed its course, the highway changed with it to the new channel. And note, that Thorpe says that if there be a water that is a highway, which water by increase of the water or by force of the same changes its course on to other soil, still is there as before a highway where this water is, as there was before in the old channel; so that the lord of the soil cannot disturb this newly made course. (Adjudged in the Notting-ham Eyre.)

In some parts of the country rivers are not only highways, but they are the only highways (just as the Irrawaddy is the only highway in Burmah at the present day); e. g., in 1372 we are told that the Avon between Bath and Bristol was the only highway by which victuals could be brought, there being no land passage, par obstacle de marreys. (2 Rot. Parl. 312.)—HAMMOND.

<sup>22</sup> Annuities and corodies.—The position of corodies and annuities among the hereditaments is not so difficult to explain as their exclusion from the tenements, and consequently from the Stat. de Donis. They correspond with the feuda cavenæ et cameræ, and, therefore, were capable of tenure, at least under the feudal law of the Continent.

Both were, no doubt, included under the civiles annonas, which were expressly lands and tenements corporeal. It must be a profit; yet there is no occasion for it to be, as it usually is, a sum of money: for spurs, capons, horses, corn, and other matters may be rendered, and frequently are rendered by way of rent.<sup>r</sup> It may also consist in services or manual operations; as, to plow so many acres of ground, to attend the king or the lord to the wars, and the like; which services in the eye of the law are profits. This profit must also be certain; or that which may be reduced to a certainty by either party. It must also issue yearly; though there is no occasion for it to issue every successive year; but it may be reserved every second, third, or fourth year:<sup>s</sup> yet, as it is to be produced out of the profits of lands and tenements, as a recompense for being permitted to hold or enjoy them, it ought to be reserved yearly, because those profits do annually arise and are annually renewed. It must issue out of the thing granted, and not be part of the land or thing itself; wherein it differs from an exception in the grant, which is always of part of the thing granted.<sup>t</sup> It must, lastly, issue out of lands and tenements corporeal; that is, from some inheritance whereunto the owner or grantee of the rent may have recourse to distrain. Therefore, a rent cannot be reserved out of an advowson, a common, an office, a franchise, or the like.<sup>u</sup> But a grant of such annuity or sum may operate as a personal contract, and oblige the grantor to pay the money reserved, or subject him to an action of debt:<sup>v</sup> though it doth not affect the inheritance, and is no legal rent in contemplation of law.

termed res immobiles by Justinian, Nov. vii. pr. In the time of Henry II, or soon after, they seem to have been confounded with rents, at least they are called so in the gloss to Vacarius, p. 188. It may fairly be inferred that they were at first regarded as of the same nature with rents proper, and that the distinction between them grew up in English law as the conception of real rights became more closely identified with land. In the civil law reditus and pensiones and panes civiles (rents, corodies, and annuities) had all been reckoned among res immobiles. (C. 31, § 2, de jure dotium, v. 12, and the gloss to it in Wenck's Vacarius, referring to Du Cange v. Panis curiates, where an example is given from the accounts of Henry II.)—HAMMOND.

§ 56. a. Kinds of rents.—There are at common law<sup>x</sup> three manner of rents, rent-service, rent-charge, and rent-seck.

§ 57. (1) Rent-service.—Rent-service is so called [42] because it hath some corporal service incident to it, as at the least fealty, or the feudal oath of fidelity.<sup>y</sup> For, if a tenant holds his land by fealty, and ten shillings rent; or by the service of plowing the lord's land, and five shillings rent; these pecuniary rents, being connected with personal services, are therefore called rent-service. And for these, in case they be behind, or arrear, at the day appointed, the lord may distrain of common right, without reserving any special power of distress; provided he hath in himself the reversion or future estate of the lands and tenements, after the lease or particular estate of the lessee or grantee is expired.<sup>z</sup>

§ 58. (2) Rent-charge.—A rent-charge, is where the owner of the rent hath no future interest, or reversion expectant in the land;<sup>23</sup> as where a man by deed maketh over to others his whole

<sup>23</sup> Rent-charge.—Judge Sharswood has pointed out in a note here that in states which do not recognize the statute of quia emptores as a part of their common law, there may be rent service without a reversion. "The description of a rent-charge is correct as applied to England, where the statute of quia emptores forbade subinfeudation; for there is, therefore, no connection of tenure between the grantor and grantee. In Pennsylvania, however, this statute was never in force; and although the connection of tenure is merely nominal—although the whole possibility of reverter upon failure of heirs is now vested in the commonwealth—yet that mere transfer has not altered the character of the estate or the legal incidents thereto annexed. In Pennsylvania, therefore, a rent service is not only where there is a reversion in the owner of the rent, as where a man grants an estate for life or years, reserving a rent, but also where he parts with the whole fee simple, reserving a rent. Distress is incident thereto of common right. A rent-charge is confined to the cases where the owner of land grants a rent thereout to a stranger, and by a special clause grants him also a right to distrain for the rent if it should be in arrear; without such a clause it would be a rent-seck. (Ingersoll v. Sergeant, 1 Whart. (Pa.) 337; Franciscus v. Reigart, 4 Watts (Pa.), 98; Kenege v. Elliot, 9 Watts (Pa.), 258, 262.)"

But in the general disappearance of distress for rent as a common-law right, and the substitution of statutory landlord's liens, it is doubtful whether the estate in fee simple, with a certain rent payable thereout, and adds to the deed a covenant or clause of distress, that if the rent be arrear, or behind, it shall be lawful to distrain for the same. In this case the land is liable to the distress, not of common right, but by virtue of the clause in the deed, and therefore it is called a rent-charge, because in this manner the land is charged with a distress for the payment of it.<sup>a</sup>

§ 59. (3) Rent-seck.—Rent-seck, reditus siccus, or barren rent, is in effect nothing more than a rent reserved by deed, but without any clause of distress.

§ 60. (4) Other varieties of rents—(a) Quit-rents; (b) Rack-rent; (c) Fee-farm rents.—There are also other species of rents, which are reducible to these three. Rents of assize are the certain established rents of the freeholders and ancient copyholders of a manor,<sup>b</sup> which cannot be departed from or varied. Those of the freeholders are frequently called chief rents, reditus capitales; and distinction of the three kinds of rent will be hereafter of any practical consequence.

The student must bear in mind that all rents due on leases for years, or for use and occupation, etc., are not incorporeal hereditaments, and that this distinction has no meaning with reference to them. Only rents payable by the freehold tenant to others are such. When the owner of the land collects rent from the occupant for its use and enjoyment, as in the vast majority of cases known to modern practice, it would be absurd to treat such a rent as an incorporeal hereditament. The owner of the land, which is the corporeal hereditament, can no more have an incorporeal one issuing out of the same land, than he can have an easement over his own land.—HAMMOND.

By virtue of the Landlord and Tenant Act of 1730, the owner of a rent-charge may distrain on the land for arrears, even though he has no express power by the deed of charge. In the case of rent-charges created since 1881, the Conveyancing Act of 1881 allows the owner of a rent-charge, if the rent is in arrear for forty days, to exercise the further right of entering the land and holding the same, or any part thereof, or of demising it or a portion thereof to a trustee for a term of years, upon trust to raise the arrears; until, by one method or the other, the arrears have been discharged. See Stephen, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 287.

Rents-seck have, by virtue of the provisions of recent statutes giving redress in case rents-charge are in arrears, practically ceased to exist.

both sorts are indifferently denominated quit-rents, quieti reditus; because thereby the tenant goes quit and free of all other services. When these payments were reserved in silver or white money, they were anciently called white-rents, or blanch-farms, reditus albi;<sup>o</sup> in contradistinction to rents reserved in work, grain, or baser money, which were called [<sup>43</sup>] reditus nigri or blackmail.<sup>d</sup> Rack-rent is only a rent of the full value of the tenement or near it.<sup>24</sup> A fee-farm rent is a rent-charge issuing out of an estate in fee; of at least one-fourth of the value of the lands, at the time of its reservation: <sup>o</sup> for a grant of lands, reserving so considerable a rent, is indeed only letting lands to farm in fee simple instead of the usual methods for life or years.<sup>o</sup>

§ 61. b. General rules as to rents.—These are the general divisions of rent; but the difference between them (in respect to the remedy for recovering them) is now totally abolished; and all persons may have the like remedy by distress for rents-seck, rents of assize, and chief-rents, as in case of rents reserved upon lease.<sup>f</sup>

Rent is regularly due and payable upon the land from whence it issues, if no particular place is mentioned in the reservation: <sup>o</sup> but, in case of the king, the payment must be either to his officers at the exchequer or to his receiver in the country.<sup>h</sup> And, strictly, the rent is demandable and payable before the time of sunset of the day whereon it is reserved; <sup>i</sup> though perhaps not absolutely due till midnight.<sup>k</sup>

<sup>24</sup> Rack-rent.—Rack-rent, I need hardly explain, is the highest annual rent that can be obtained by the competition of those who desire to become tenants. It is not a strictly legal term, though sometimes used in acts of parliament; in legal documents it is represented by “the best rent that can be obtained without a fine.”—POLLOCK, Land Laws, 155 n.

With regard to the original of rents, something will be said in the next chapter: and, as to distresses and other remedies for their recovery, the doctrine relating thereto, and the several proceedings thereon, these belong properly to the third part of our Commentaries, which will treat of civil injuries, and the means whereby they are redressed.<sup>25</sup>

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.
OF THE FEUDAL SYSTEM.

§ 62. History of the feudal system.—It is impossible to understand, with any degree of accuracy, either the civil constitution of this kingdom, or the laws which regulate its landed property, without some general acquaintance with the nature and doctrine of feuds, or the feudal law: <sup>1</sup> a system so universally received through-

<sup>1</sup> The feudal system.—The one great law book of the last century may serve to illustrate two points, though I have some hesitation about mentioning the first of them. Blackstone's work was the first-fruits of a professorship of law; in the presence of that book every professor of law will always feel very small, but there it stands the imperishable monument of what may be done by obliging a lawyer to teach law. But in the second place let us take one of Blackstone's greatest exploits, his statement of our land law and of its history. Everyone nowadays can pick holes in "the feudal system" and some great writers can hardly mention it without loss of temper. But the theory of a feudal system it was that enabled Blackstone to paint his great picture, a picture incomplete and with many faults in it, but the first picture ever painted. Whence did he get the theory which made this possible? From Coke? Coke had no such theory, and because he had none was utterly unable to give any connected account of the law that he knew so well. No, the feudal system was a very early essay in comparative jurisprudence, and the man who had the chief part in introducing the feudal system into England was Henry Spelman. It was the idea of a law common to all the countries of Western Europe that enabled Blackstone to achieve the task of stating English law in a rational fashion. And so it will be found during the length of our national life; an isolated system cannot explain itself, still less explain its history. When great work has been done some fertilizing germ has been wafted from abroad; now it may be the influence of Azo and now of the Lombard feudists, now of Savigny and now of Brunner. Let me not be misunderstood:—there is not much "comparative jurisprudence" for those who do not know thoroughly well the things to be compared, not much "comparative jurisprudence" for Englishmen who will not slave at their law reports; but still there is nothing that sets a man thinking and writing to such good effect about a system of law and its history as an acquaintance however slight with other systems and their history. One of the causes why so little has been done for our mediæval law is I feel sure our very complete and traditionally consecrated ignorance of French and German law. English lawyers have for the last six centuries exaggerated the uniqueness of our legal history by overrating and antedating the triumphs of Roman law upon the continent. I know just enough to say this with confidence, that there are great masses of mediæval law very comparable with our own; a little knowledge of them would out Europe, upwards of twelve centuries ago, that Sir Henry Spelman<sup>a</sup> does not scruple to call it the law of nations in our western world. This chapter will be therefore dedicated to this inquiry. And though, in the course of our observations in this and many other parts of the present book, we may have occasion to search pretty highly into the antiquities of our English jurisprudence, yet surely no industrious student will imagine his time misemployed, when he is led to consider that the obsolete doctrines of our laws are frequently the foundation, upon which what remains is erected; and that it is impracticable to comprehend many rules of the modern law, in a scholarlike scientific manner, with-send us to our Year-Books with new vigor and new intelligence.—MAITLAND, 1 Collected Papers, 488.

See, also, Maitland, Const. Hist. Eng., 142, where Professor Maitland attributes to Spelman, Wright, and Blackstone their respective shares as regards the introduction of feudal ideas into English law, saying: "The new learning was propagated among English lawyers by Sir Martin Wright; it was popularized and made orthodox by Blackstone in his easy, attractive manner." And as to the meaning of feudalism, Maitland says: "What do we mean by feudalism? Some such answer as the following is the best that I can give—A state of society in which the main social bond is the relation between lord and man, a relation implying on the lord's part protection and defense; on the man's part protection, service, and reverence, the service including service in arms. This personal relation is inseparably involved in a proprietary relation, the tenure of land—the man holds land of the lord, the man's service is a burden on the land, the lord has important rights in the land, and (we may say) the full ownership of the land is split up between man and lord. The lord has jurisdiction over his men, holds court for them, to which they owe suit. Jurisdiction is regarded as property, as a private right which the lord has over his land. The national organization is a system of these relationships: at the head there stands the king as lord of all, below him are his immediate vassals, or tenants in chief, who again are lords of tenants, who again may be lords of tenants, and so on, down to the lowest possessor of land. Lastly, as every other court consists of the lord's tenants, so the king's court consists of his tenants in chief, and so far as there is any constitutional control over the king it is exercised by the body of these tenants."

See further a learned article, entitled, "The Effect of Tenure on Real Property Law," by James Edward Hogg, in 25 Law Quart. Rev. 178.

"On the continent of Europe the feudal system of landholding seems to have come to maturity in the course of the tenth century. It is thought partly out having recourse to the ancient. Nor will these researches be altogether void of rational entertainment as well as use: as in viewing the majestic ruins of Rome or Athens, of Balbec or Palmyra, it administers both pleasure and instruction to compare them with the drafts of the same edifices, in their pristine proportion and splendor.

§ 63. 1. Origin of feuds.—<sup>[45]</sup> The constitution of feuds<sup>b</sup> had its original from the military policy of the northern or Celtic nations, the Goths, the Huns, the Franks, the Vandals, and the Lombards, who all migrating from the same officina gentium (the storehouse of nations), as Crag very justly entitles it,<sup>c</sup> poured them-to have originated in the grants of land made by the Frank kings of the three preceding centuries to their kinsmen and followers upon the grantees' undertaking to continue faithful. The estates so granted are known as benefices. Other elements of feudalism are found in the practice of commendation—that is, of men submitting themselves to some powerful neighbor as their lord and thereby gaining protection in return for faithful service—and in the grants made by kings to powerful subjects of liberty of jurisdiction over the inhabitants of particular districts with immunity from the royal jurisdiction. The main features of the feudal system of tenures were (1) the principle that all land is held, either mediately or immediately, of the king; (2) the union of the relation of lord and man with that of landlord and tenant, whereby the personal service due from the vassal to his superior became the condition of his holding land granted to him by his lord; and (3) the jurisdiction of the lord over his tenants. The personal relation of lord and man was known to English law before the Norman Conquest. And it appears that English institutions were in other respects tending towards feudalism at the time of the Conquest. But the introduction into English law of the feudal principle that all land is held of the crown, and of the tenure of land by military service, seems to have been the immediate result of the Conquest and of William's dealings with the land. Although William introduced feudal tenure into England, it should be noted that his policy was opposed to the introduction of feudal government. At the assembly held at Salisbury in 1086 he caused all his subjects, whosoever men they were, to swear fealty to him as their supreme lord. Hence arose an important difference between the English law of feudal tenure and that prevailing on the Continent. The continental tenant owed fealty to his immediate lord only, and might well be summoned to go with his lord to war against the lord's superior, on pain of forfeiture, if he failed to comply. The English tenant did homage to his lord, saving his allegiance selves in vast quantities into all the regions of Europe, at the declension of the Roman empire. It was brought by them from their own countries, and continued in their respective colonies as the most likely means to secure their new acquisitions: and to that end, large districts or parcels of land were allotted by the conquering general to the superior officers of the army, and by them dealt out again in smaller parcels or allotments to the inferior officers and most deserving soldiers.<sup>4</sup> These allotments were called feoda, feuds, fiefs, or fees; which last appellation in the northern languages * signifies a conditional stipend or reward.<sup>2</sup> Rewards

<sup>2</sup> Pontoppidan in his history of Norway (page 290) observes, that in the northern languages odh signifies proprietas (property) and all totum (the whole). Hence he derives the odhal right in those countries; and hence too perhaps is derived the udal right in Finland, etc. (See MacDoual. Inst. part. 2.) Now the transposition of these northern syllables, alldh, will give us the true etymology of the alodium, or absolute property of the feudists as, by a similar combination of the latter syllable with the word fee (which signifies, we have seen, a conditional reward or stipend) feodh or feodum will denote stipendiary property.

<sup>2</sup> Meaning of feudum.—In Digby, Real Property (5th ed.), 31 n, it is said: "The word feudum is not found earlier than the close of the ninth century. Stubbs, Const. Hist., i, p. 251, note 1. Its etymology has given rise to much controversy. Blackstone (ii, p. 45) thinks that it comes from two words in 'the northern languages, fee, signifying conditional stipend or reward, and odh, proprietas.' Sir F. Palgrave believes it to be simply a colloquial abbreviation of emphyteusis (Rise of English Commonwealth, ii, p. ccvii). Diez, however (Etymologisches Wörterbuch der Romanischen Sprachen), sub voce FIO, shows that feudum is a Latin recoinage of a word sprung from an old Teutonic root—Lombardian fu, Old High German feh (vieh), Gothic faihu, signifying cattle, or, generally, property; cattle being probably amongst the earliest subjects of property (see sub voce FEOH in Bosworth, Anglo-Saxon Dictionary, and compare pecus, pecunia). Hence feudum, the d being added for euphony (compare feuum in Domesday). Hence fief, fee, feoffment, etc.; and see Littré, Dictionnaire de la Langue Francaise, sub voce or stipends they evidently were; and the condition annexed to them was, that the possessor should do service faithfully, both at home and in the wars, to him by whom they were given; for which purpose he took the juramentum fidelitatis, or oath of fealty:<sup>c</sup> and in case of the breach of this condition and oath, by not performing the stipulated service, or by deserting the lord in battle, the lands were again to revert to him who granted them.<sup>d</sup>

§ 64. 2. The feudal relation.—Allotments, thus acquired, naturally engaged such as accepted them to defend them: and as they all sprang from [46] the same right of conquest, no part could subsist independent of the whole; wherefore all givers as well as receivers were mutually bound to defend each other's possessions. But, as that could not effectually be done in a tumultuous irregular way, government, and to that purpose subordination, was necessary. Every receiver of lands, or feudatory, was therefore bound, when called upon by his benefactor, or immediate lord of his feud or fee, to do all in his power to defend him. Such benefactor or lord was likewise subordinate to and under the command of his immediate benefactor or superior; and so upwards to the prince or general himself. And the several lords were also reciprocally bound, in

FIEF. Sir H. Maine (Early History of Institutions, p. 157, etc.) describes the creation amongst the ancient Irish of a relation analogous to that of lord and vassal by the gift of stock by the chief, and its voluntary or forced acceptance by the tribesman."

In Halsbury, Laws of England (24:189 n), it is said: "The hypothesis is that the land was granted by a chieftain to his follower; in Latin as a beneficium, in the Teutonic languages as a fief, or fee—Latinized into feudum, feodum—or their equivalents. The English terms were feodum and fee (Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, vol. I, p. 214, n. 2). The grant assumed and perpetuated the relation of lord and vassal; and the interest of the donee came to be hereditary. The leading idea in 'feud,' as used in the expression 'feudal system,' is that of vassalage; in the form 'fee' the hereditary nature of the vassal's interest is most prominent (see Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, vol. I, pp. 44 et seq.); and as to the theory that the title to all land is derived ultimately from the king, see 2 Bl. Comm. 51. The term 'feu' is in every-day use in Scotland. Feu is there the prevailing tenure of land, and is now of the nature of a perpetual lease."

their respective gradations, to protect the possessions they had given. Thus the feudal connection was established, a proper military subjection was naturally introduced, and an army of feudatories were always ready enlisted, and mutually prepared to muster, not only in defense of each man's own several property, but also in defense of the whole, and of every part of this their newly acquired country: ' the prudence of which constitution was soon sufficiently visible in the strength and spirit, with which they maintained their conquests.

§ 65. 3. The feudal system on the Continent.—The universality and early use of this feudal plan, among all those nations, which in complaisance to the Romans we still call barbarous, may appear from what is recorded * of the Cimbri and Teutons, nations of the same northern original as those whom we have been describing, at their first irruption into Italy about a century before the Christian era. They demanded of the Romans, "ut martius populus aliquid sibi terræ daret, quasi stipendium: cæterum, ut vellet, manibus atque armis suis uteretur." The sense of which may be thus rendered; they desired stipendiary lands (that is, feuds) to be allowed them, to be held by military and other personal services, whenever their lords should call upon them. This was evidently the same constitution, that displayed itself more fully about seven hundred years afterwards: when the Sali, Burgundians, and Franks broke in upon Gaul, the Visigoths on [47] Spain, and the Lombards upon Italy; and introduced with themselves this northern plan of polity, serving at once to distribute and to protect the territories they had newly gained. And from hence, too, it is probable that the Emperor Alexander Severus<sup>1</sup> took the hint of Addidit sane his et animalia et servos, ut possent colere quod acceperant; ne per inopiam hominum vel per senectutem desererentur rura vicina barbariæ, quod turpissimum ille ducebat.* (The lands which were taken from the enemy on the borders he gave to his generals and soldiers; on condition that their heirs should be soldiers, and never belong to private stations: saying that they would fight more resolutely, if they at the same time defended their own dividing lands conquered from the enemy among his generals and victorious soldiery, on condition of receiving military service from them and their heirs forever.

§ 66. a. Feudal tenure supplants allodial ownership.—Scarce had these northern conquerors established themselves in their new dominions, when the wisdom of their constitutions, as well as their personal valor, alarmed all the princes of Europe; that is, of those countries which had formerly been Roman provinces, but had revolted, or were deserted by their old masters, in the general wreck of the empire. Wherefore most, if not all, of them thought it necessary to enter into the same or a similar plan of policy. For whereas, before, the possessions of their subjects were perfectly allodial (that is, wholly independent, and held of no superior at all), now they parceled out their royal territories, or persuaded their subjects to surrender up and retake their own landed property, under the like feudal obligations of military fealty.<sup>m</sup> And thus, in the compass of a very few years, the feudal constitution, or the doctrine of tenure, extended itself over all the western world. Which alteration of landed property, in so very material a point, necessarily drew after it an alteration of laws and customs: so that the feudal laws soon drove out the Roman, which had hitherto universally obtained, but now became for many centuries lost and forgotten; and Italy itself (as some of the civilians, with more spleen than judgment, have expressed it) belluinas, atque ferinas, immanesque Longobardorum leges accepit (received the wild, fierce and barbarous laws of the Lombards).<sup>n</sup>

lands. He also gave animals and slaves with them, that they might cultivate what they had acquired; lest, through want of men, or by reason of old age, the neighboring lands should be utterly neglected, a thing which he considered most disgraceful.” (Æl. Lamprid. in Vita Alex. Severi.)

stitution, till the reign of William the Norman.<sup>o</sup> Not but that it is reasonable to believe, from abundant traces in our history and laws, that even in the times of the Saxons, who were a swarm from what Sir William Temple calls the same northern hive, something similar to this was in use: yet not so extensively, nor attended with all the rigor that was afterwards imported by the Normans. For the Saxons were firmly settled in this island, at least as early as the year 600: and it was not till two centuries after that feuds arrived to their full vigor and maturity, even on the Continent of Europe.<sup>p</sup>

§ 68. a. The Norman Conquest.—This introduction, however, of the feudal tenures into England, by King William,<sup>q</sup> does not seem to have been effected immediately after the Conquest, nor by the mere arbitrary will and power of the Conqueror; but to have been gradually established by the Norman barons, and others, in such forfeited lands as they received from the gift of the Conqueror, and afterwards universally consented to by the great council of the nation long after his title was established. Indeed, from the prodigious slaughter of the English nobility at the battle of Hastings, and the fruitless insurrections of those who survived, such numerous forfeitures had accrued, that he was able to reward his Norman followers with very large and extensive possessions, which gave a handle to the monkish historians, and such as have implicitly followed them, to represent him as having by right of the sword seized on all the lands of England, and dealt them out again to his own favorites. A supposition, grounded upon a mistaken sense of the word conquest; which in its feudal acceptation, signifies no more than acquisition: and this has led many hasty writers into a strange historical mistake, and one which upon the slightest examination will be found to be most untrue. However, [49] certain it is, that the Normans now began to gain very large possessions in England; and their regard for the feudal law, under which they had long lived, together with the king's recommendation of this policy to the English, as the best way to put themselves on a military footing, and thereby to prevent any future attempts from the Continent, were probably the reasons that prevailed to effect its establishment here by law. And, though the time of this great revolution in our landed property cannot be ascertained with exactness, yet there are some circumstances that may lead us to a probable conjecture concerning it. For we learn from the Saxon chronicle,<sup>a</sup> that in the nineteenth year of King William's reign an invasion was apprehended from Denmark; and the military constitution of the Saxons being then laid aside, and no other introduced in its stead, the kingdom was wholly defenseless: which occasioned the king to bring over a large army of Normans and Bretons, who were quartered upon every landholder, and greatly oppressed the people. This apparent weakness, together with the grievances occasioned by a foreign force, might co-operate with the king's remonstrances, and the better incline the nobility to listen to his proposals for putting them in a posture of defense.

<sup>q</sup> Origin of the feudal system.—“If we go back to the eleventh century, we find a body of law in England which William the Conqueror is said to have promulgated, but with which, in truth, he had very little to do, for it was an effect of causes which, among other phenomena, produced William himself. The feudal system sprang from the economic necessities of mediæval Europe.” Brooks Adams, in Centralization and the Law, p. 25.

§ 69. b. Domesday Book.—For, as soon as the danger was over, the king held a great council to inquire into the state of the nation;<sup>r</sup> the immediate consequence of which was the compiling of the great survey called Domesday Book, which was finished in the next year: and in the latter end of that very year the king was attended by all his nobility at Sarum; where all the principal landholders submitted their lands to the yoke of military tenure, became the king's vassals, and did homage and fealty to his person.*

This may possibly have been the era of formally introducing the feudal tenures by law; and perhaps the very law, thus made at the council of Sarum, is that which is still extant,<sup>t</sup> [50] and couched in these remarkable words: "statuimus, ut omnes liberi homines fœdere et sacramento affirmant, quod intra et extra universum regnum Angliæ Wilhelmo regi domino suo fideles esse volunt; terras et honores illius omni fidelitate ubique servare cum eo, et contra inimicos et alienigenas defendere (We decree that all freemen bind themselves by homage and fealty, that within and without the whole kingdom of England, they will be faithful to King William, their lord, and everywhere preserve his lands and honors with all fidelity, and defend him against all foreign and domestic enemies)." The terms of this law (as Sir Martin Wright has observed<sup>u</sup>) are plainly feudal: for, first, it requires the oath of fealty, which made in the sense of the feudists every man that took it a tenant or vassal: and, secondly, the tenants obliged themselves to defend their lord's territories and titles against all enemies foreign and domestic. But what clearly evinces the legal establishment of this system, is another law of the same collection,<sup>w</sup> which exacts the performance of the military feudal services, as ordained by the general council. "Omnes comites, et barones, et milites, et servientes, et universi liberi homines totius regni nostri prædicti, habeant et teneant se semper bene in armis et in equis, ut decet et oportet: et sint semper prompti et bene parati, ad servitium suum integrum nobis explendum et peragendum, cum opus fuerit; secundum quod nobis debent de fœdis et tenementis suis de jure facere, et sicut illis statuimus per commune concilium totius regni nostri prædicti (That all earls, barons, soldiers, servants, and freemen of our whole kingdom aforesaid, keep and hold themselves always well furnished with arms and horses, as is suitable and proper: and be always ready and well prepared for fulfilling and performing their entire service to us when need shall be; according to what they are by law bound to do for us by reason of their fees and tenements, and as we have ordained by the common council of our whole kingdom aforesaid).”

The new polity, therefore, seems not to have been imposed by the conqueror, but nationally and freely adopted by the general assembly of the whole realm, in the same manner as other nations of Europe had before adopted it, upon the same principle of self-security. And, in particular, they had the recent example of the French nation before their eyes; which had gradually surrendered up all its allodial or free lands into the king's hands, who restored them to the owners as a beneficium or feud, to be held to them and such of their heirs as they previously nominated to the king: and thus by degrees all the allodial estates in France were converted into feuds, and the freemen became the vassals of the crown.<sup>z</sup> The only difference between this change of tenures in France and that in England was, that the former was effected gradually, <sup>[51]</sup> by the consent of private persons; the latter was done at once, all over England, by the common consent of the nation.<sup>7</sup>

§ 70. a. Feudal tenures in England.—In consequence of this change, it became a fundamental maxim and necessary principle (though in reality a mere fiction) of our English tenures, “that the king is the universal lord and original proprietor of all the lands in his kingdom;”<sup>z</sup> and that no man doth or can possess any part of it, but what has mediately or immediately been derived as a gift from him, to be held upon feudal services.” For, this being the real case in pure, original, proper feuds, other nations who adopted this system were obliged to act upon the same supposition, as a substruction and foundation of their new polity, though the fact was indeed far otherwise. And indeed by thus consenting to the introduction of feudal tenures, our English ancestors probably meant no more than to put the kingdom in a state of defense by establishing a military system; and to oblige themselves (in respect of their lands) to maintain the king's title and territories, with equal vigor and fealty, as if they had received their lands from his bounty upon these express conditions, as pure, proper beneficiary feudatories. But whatever their meaning was, the Norman interpreters, skilled in all the niceties of the feudal constitutions, and well understanding the import and extent of the feudal terms, gave a very different construction to this proceeding: and thereupon took a handle to introduce not only the rigorous doctrines which prevailed in the duchy of Normandy, but also such fruits and dependencies, such hardships and services, as were never known to other nations; <sup>a</sup> as if the English had, in fact as well as theory, owed everything they had to the bounty of their sovereign lord.

§ 71. d. Modifications in the feudal system.—Our ancestors, therefore, who were by no means beneficiaries, but had barely consented to this fiction of tenure from <sup>[52]</sup> the crown, as the basis of a military discipline, with reason looked upon these deductions as grievous impositions, and arbitrary conclusions from principles that, as to them, had no foundation in truth.<sup>b</sup> However, this king, and his son, William Rufus, kept up with a high hand all the rigors of the feudal doctrines: but their successor, Henry I, found it expedient, when he set up his pretensions to the crown, to promise a restitution of the laws of King Edward the Confessor, or ancient Saxon system; and accordingly, in the first year of his reign, granted a charter,<sup>c</sup> whereby he gave up the greater grievances, but still reserved the fiction of feudal tenure, for the same military purposes which engaged his father to introduce it. But this charter was gradually broken through, and the former grievances were revived and aggravated, by himself and succeeding princes; till in the reign of King John they became so intolerable, that they occasioned his barons, or principal feudatories, to rise up in arms against him: which at length produced the famous great charter (Magna Carta) at Runnymede, which, with some alterations, was confirmed by his son, Henry III. And, though its immunities (especially as altered on its last edition by his son<sup>d</sup>) are very greatly short of those granted by Henry I, it was justly esteemed at the time a vast acquisition to English liberty. Indeed, by the further alteration of tenures that has since happened, many of these immunities may now appear, to a common observer, of much less consequence than they really were when granted; but this, properly considered, will show, not that the acquisitions under John were small, but that those under Charles were greater. And from hence also arises another inference; that the liberties of Englishmen are not (as some arbitrary writers would represent them) mere infringements of the king's prerogative, extorted from our princes by taking advantage of their weakness; but a restoration of that ancient constitution, of which our ancestors had been defrauded by the art and finesse of the Norman lawyers, rather than deprived by the force of the Norman arms.

§ 72. Theory of the feudal system.—[53] Having given this short history of their rise and progress, we will next consider the nature, doctrine, and principal laws of feuds; wherein we shall evidently trace the groundwork of many parts of our public polity, and also the original of such of our own tenures, as were either abolished in the last century, or still remain in force.

§ 73. 1. Lord and vassal.—The grand and fundamental maxim of all feudal tenure is this; that all the lands were originally granted out by the sovereign, and are therefore holden, either mediately or immediately, of the crown. The grantor was called the proprietor, or lord; being he who retained the dominion or ultimate property of the feud or fee: and the grantee, who had only the use and possession, according to the terms of the grant, was styled the feudatory or vassal, which was only another name for the tenant or holder of the lands; though, on account of the prejudices we have justly conceived against the doctrines that were afterwards grafted on this system, we now use the word vassal opprobriously, as synonymous to slave or bondman. The manner of the grant was by words of gratuitous and pure donation, dedi et concessi (I have given and granted); which are still the operative words in our modern infeudations or deeds of feoffment. This was perfected by the ceremony of corporal investiture, or open and notorious delivery of possession in the presence of the other vassals, which perpetuated among them the era of the new acquisition, at a time when the art of writing was very little known: and therefore the evidence of property was reposed in the memory of the neighborhood; who in case of a disputed title, were afterwards called upon to decide the difference, not only according to external proofs, adduced by the parties litigant, but also by the internal testimony of their own private knowledge.

§ 74. 2. Oath of fealty; homage.—Besides an oath of fealty, or profession of faith to the lord, which was the parent of our oath of allegiance, the vassal or tenant upon investiture did usually homage to his lord;<sup>4</sup> openly and humbly kneeling, being ungirt,

<sup>4</sup> Fealty and homage—Livery of seisin.—It would be well if our modern books told us more of the real meaning of fealty and homage, and the distinction between them, even if it were necessary to omit the description so often repeated from Blackstone of the form in which homage was rendered. This to be sure is interesting, and lends picturesque color to what would otherwise be a dry statement of obsolete law. But it throws no light on the connection between these acts and the rights which they symbolized.

They mark distinct stages in the advance of the feudal system; fealty is the representative of the original tie between lord and man as a personal relation; homage is the recognition of the tenure of land by the dependent, the pledge of service to the landlord. It retains its distinctive character more completely in England than on the Continent, probably because it takes the place and fulfills the office of the investiture, otherwise unknown to the free tenures of the island.

The two terms distinguished in English law as a matter of form, and entirely confounded by the later writers of the Continent, preserve the memory of the two great stages of the feudal law. Fealty is the relation of inferior to superior, of mann to hlaford, in the Anglo-Saxon books, the purely personal relation which beginning with the comitatus, and continued in the form of commendation, belonged to socage tenure as well as to knight service, and even survived to take the form of allegiance to the king or commonwealth in our own day. Homage, on the other hand, only made its appearance when the relation became one of land as well as of persons. It was the recognition of service due to the lord, not merely as superior, but as the giver of a benefice or fee. It was rendered for each several holding, while fealty was personal. All other differences were merely consequences of this. We cannot doubt that the development of homage was coincident with the change from personal to territorial law, from sovereignty of the tribe to sovereignty of the territory, and especially with the introduction of feudalism into England. It also marked an important difference between the system there and elsewhere.

The importance given to the livery of seisin, the actual transfer of the tenement, the freehold by the feoffor, in English law, in contrast to its neglect uncovered, [54] and holding up his hands both together between those of the lord, who sat before him; and there professing that "he did become his man, from that day forth, of life and limb and earthly honor": and then he received a kiss from his lord.* Which ceremony was denominated homagium, or manhood, by the feudists, from the stated form of words, devenio vester homo (I become your man).<sup>† 5</sup>

† It was an observation of Dr. Arbuthnot, that tradition was nowhere preserved so pure and incorrupt as among children, whose games and plays are delivered down invariably from one generation to another. (Warburton's notes on Pope. vi. 134. 8o.) Perhaps it may be thought puerile to observe (in confirmation of this remark) that in one of our ancient pastimes (the King I am or basilinda of Julius Pollux, Onomastic. l. 9. c. 7.) the ceremonies and language of feudal homage are preserved with great exactness.

on the Continent, has attracted general attention. Of course it has been attributed to Roman influence, like everything else not easily explicable; and it is surprising that Gundermann even has copied this explanation, although elsewhere he has expressly stated the true reason, or rather the fact which forms the complementary effect, that the English law places no weight on investiture, because it coalesced with homage. (Englisches Privatrecht, § 10, p. 202.)

Livery by the feoffor became important for the very reason that livery by the lord, i. e., investiture, did not. Merging in homage, an act subsequent to the traditio, and presupposing the latter, investiture could not well be the constitutive fact that gave the new estate, and livery of sêisin must occupy its place. The contrast in this respect of common freeholds to copyholds, wherein an investiture by the lord or his steward always remained the form, and to the form which Edward II tried to establish for tenants in capite, shows us plainly why investiture was deemed incompatible with the rights of freemen.

Fealty, fidelitas, had become a duty of the subject generally without reference to the comitatus, at least as early as the ninth century. In the Capitulum instructing the Missi how they were to proceed in their investigations, A. D. 828 (Walter, C. J. G. ii. 374), it is expressly provided that they are to begin by selecting the better and more veracious men of each county, and if any of them be found not to have promised fealty already to the emperor, he is to do so. They are then to be instructed in their duties, and that they are to report delinquencies, as they desire to keep whole their faith and promise, knowing that if one be found to have spoken aught but truth he is to be reckoned untrue to his fealty—infidelis.—HAMMOND.

<sup>5</sup> While homage was peculiarly an incident of military tenure, it was also occasionally rendered by socage tenants.—POLLOCK & MAITLAND, 1 Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 305.

§ 75. 3. Feudal service.—When the tenant had thus professed himself to be the man of his superior or lord, the next consideration was concerning the service, which, as such, he was bound to render, in recompense for the land he held. This, in pure, proper and original feuds, was only twofold: to follow, or do suit to, the lord in his courts in time of peace; and in his armies or warlike retinue, when necessity called him to the field. The lord was, in early times, the legislator and judge over all his feudatories: and therefore the vassals of the inferior lords were bound by their fealty to attend their domestic courts-baron,<sup>a</sup> (which were instituted in every manor or barony, for doing speedy and effectual justice to all the tenants) in order as well to answer such complaints as might be alleged against themselves, as to form a jury or homage for the trial of their fellow-tenants: and upon this account, in all the feudal institutions both here and on the Continent, they are distinguished by the appellation of the peers of the court;  pares curtis, or  pares curia. In like manner the barons themselves, or lords of inferior districts, were denominated peers of the king's court, and were bound to attend him upon summons, to hear causes of greater consequence in the king's presence and under the direction of his grand justiciary; till in many countries the power of that officer was broken and distributed into other courts of judicature, the peers of the king's court still reserving to themselves (in <sup>[55]</sup> almost every feudal government) the right of appeal from those subordinate courts in the last resort. The military branch of service consisted in attending the lord to the wars, if called upon, with such a retinue, and for such a number of days, as were stipulated at the first donation, in proportion to the quantity of the land.

§ 76. 4. Duration of feuds.—At the first introduction of feuds, as they were gratuitous, so also they were precarious and held at the will of the lord,<sup>b</sup> who was then the sole judge whether his vassal performed his services faithfully. Then they became certain for one or more years. Among the ancient Germans they continued only from year to year: an annual distribution of lands being made by their leaders in their general councils or assemblies.<sup>1</sup> This was professedly done, lest their thoughts should be diverted from war to agriculture; lest the strong should encroach upon the possessions of the weak; and lest luxury and avarice should be encouraged by the erection of permanent houses, and too curious an attention to convenience and the elegant superfluities of life. But, when the general migration was pretty well over, and a peaceable possession of the new-acquired settlements had introduced new customs and manners; when the fertility of the soil had encouraged the study of husbandry, and an affection for the spots they had cultivated began naturally to arise in the tillers; a more permanent degree of property was introduced, and feuds began now to be granted for the life of the feudatory.<sup>2</sup> But still feuds were not yet hereditary;<sup>3</sup> though frequently granted, by the favor of the lord, to the children of the former possessor; till in process of time it became unusual, and was therefore thought hard, to reject the heir, if he were capable to perform the services:<sup>1</sup> and therefore infants, women and professed monks, who were incapable of [§6] bearing arms, were also incapable of succeeding to a genuine feud. But the heir, when admitted to the feud which his ancestor possessed, used generally to pay a fine or acknowledgment to the lord, in horses, arms, money, and the like, for such renewal of the feud: which was called a relief, because it re-established the inheritance, or in the words of the feudal writers, "incertam et caducam hereditatem relevabat (it raised up the uncertain and fallen inheritance)." This relief was afterwards, when feuds became absolutely hereditary, continued on the death of the tenant, though the original foundation of it had ceased.

<sup>3</sup> Origin of "estates" in land.—The grant of a fee conferred an interest which was capable of being inherited, and in time the word "fee" came to denote heritability. Digby, Hist. Real Prop. (5th ed.), 95; 1 Poll. & Maitl., Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 235. When the grant was set forth in a deed, the heritability was expressed by making the grant to the donee and his "heirs." It then became established that the word "heirs" must be used. "Fee has now two senses: (1) it means land holden of a lord, as opposed to land owned allodially—fief; (2) an estate of inheritance, as opposed to an estate for life—feodum as opposed to liberum tenementum, also used in a secondary sense for an estate for life. Feodum or fee usually bears the second of the above senses." The interest of the grantee, considered in respect to its duration, was known as an estate in the land. "Henceforth, therefore, the law speaks of estates, and not of property or ownership in land." Digby, Hist. Real Prop. (5th ed.), 60. "Thus are established the first elements of that wonderful calculus of estates which, even in our own day, is perhaps the most distinctive feature of English private law." 2 Poll. & Maitl., Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 11.

§ 77. a. Feuds become hereditary.—For in process of time feuds came by degrees to be universally extended, beyond the life of the first vassal, to his sons, or perhaps to such one of them, as the lord should name; and in this case the form of the donation was strictly observed: for if a feud was given to a man and his sons, all his sons succeeded him in equal portions; and as they died off, their shares reverted to the lord, and did not descend to their children, or even to their surviving brothers, as not being specified in the donation.<sup>m</sup> But when such a feud was given to a man and his heirs, in general terms, then a more extended rule of succession took place; and when a feudatory died, his male descendants in infinitum (forever) were admitted to the succession. When any such descendant, who thus had succeeded, died, his male descendants were also admitted in the first place; and, in defect of them, such of his male collateral kindred as were of the blood or lineage of the first feudatory, but no others. For this was an unalterable maxim in feudal succession, that "none was capable of inheriting a feud, but such as was of the blood of, that is, lineally descended from, the first feudatory."<sup>n</sup> And the descent, being thus confined to males, originally extended to all the males alike; all the sons, without any distinction of primogeniture, succeeding to equal portions of the father's feud. But this being found upon many accounts inconvenient (particularly, by dividing the services, and thereby weakening the strength of the feudal union), and honorary feuds (or titles of nobility) being now introduced, which were not of <sup>(57)</sup> a divisible nature, but could only be inherited by the eldest son;° in imitation of these military feuds (or those we are now describing) began also in most countries to descend according to the same rule of primogeniture, to the eldest son, in exclusion of all the rest.º

§ 78. 5. Feuds inalienable.—Other qualities of feuds were, that the feudatory could not alien or dispose of his feud; neither could he exchange, nor yet mortgage, nor even devise it by will, without the consent of the lord.ª⁷ For, the reason of conferring the feud being the personal abilities of the feudatory to serve in war, it was not fit he should be at liberty to transfer this gift, either from himself, or from his posterity who were presumed to inherit his valor, to others who might prove less able. And, as the feudal obligation was looked upon as reciprocal, the feudatory being entitled to the lord's protection, in return for his own fealty and service; therefore the lord could no more transfer his seignory or protection without consent of his vassal, than the vassal could his feud without consent of his lord;ª it being equally unreasonable, that the lord should extend his protection to a person to whom he had exceptions, and that the vassal should owe subjection to a superior not of his own choosing.

§ 79. 6. Subinfeudation.—These were the principal, and very simple, qualities of the genuine or original feuds: which were all of a military nature, and in the hands of military persons: though the feudatories, being under frequent incapacities of cultivating and manuring their own lands, soon found it necessary to commit part of them to inferior tenants; obliging them to such returns in service, corn, cattle, or money, as might enable the chief feudatories to attend their military duties without distraction: which returns, or reditus, were the original of rents. And by these means the feudal polity was greatly extended; these inferior feudatories (who held what are called in the Scots law “rere-fiefs”) being under similar obligations of fealty, to do suit of court, to answer the stipulated <sup>[58]</sup> renders or rent-service, and to promote the welfare of their immediate superiors or lords.*

§ 80. 7. Proper and improper feuds.—But this at the same time demolished the ancient simplicity of feuds; and an inroad being once made upon their constitution, it subjected them, in a course of time, to great varieties and innovations. Feuds began to be bought and sold, and deviations were made from the old fundamental rules of tenure and succession; which were held no longer sacred, when the feuds themselves no longer continued to be purely military. Hence these tenures began now to be divided into feoda propria et impropria, proper and improper feuds; under the former of which divisions were comprehended such, and such only, of which we have before spoken; and under that of improper or derivative feuds were comprised all such as do not fall within the other description: such, for instance, as were originally bartered and sold to the feudatory for a price; such as were held upon base or less honorable services, or upon a rent, in lieu of military service; such as were in themselves alienable, without mutual license; and such as might descend indifferently either to males or females. But, where a difference was not expressed in the creation, such new-created feuds did in all other respects follow the nature of an original, genuine, and proper feud.†

§ 81. 8. Corruption of the feudal system.—But as soon as the feudal system came to be considered in the light of a civil establishment, rather than as a military plan, the ingenuity of the same ages, which perplexed all theology with the subtlety of scholastic disquisitions, and bewildered philosophy in the mazes of metaphysical jargon, began also to exert its influence on this copious and fruitful subject: in pursuance of which, the most refined and oppressive consequences were drawn from what originally was a plan of simplicity and liberty, equally beneficial to both lord and tenant, and prudently calculated for their mutual protection and defense. From this one foundation, in different countries of Europe, very different superstructures have been raised: what effect it has produced on the landed property of England will appear in the following chapters.

OF THE ANCIENT ENGLISH TENURES.

§ 82. English tenures, feudal.—In this chapter we shall take a short view of the ancient tenures of our English estates, or the manner in which lands, tenements and hereditaments might have been holden; as the same stood in force, till the middle of the last century. In which we shall easily perceive that all the particularities, all the seeming and real hardships, that attended those tenures, were to be accounted for upon feudal principles and no other; being fruits of, and deduced from, the feudal policy.

§ 83. 1. Nature of feudal tenure.—Almost all the real property of this kingdom is by the policy of our laws supposed to be granted by, dependent upon and holden of some superior lord, by and in consideration of certain services to be rendered to the lord by the tenant or possessor of this property. The thing holden is therefore styled a tenement, the possessors thereof tenants, and the manner of their possession a tenure.<sup>1</sup> Thus all the land in the kingdom is supposed to be holden, mediately or immediately, of the king; who is styled the lord paramount, or above all. Such

<sup>1</sup> Tenure.—Tenure in its first technical sense meant feudal tenure; the vassal “held” of his lord: he did not own the land. “Allodial tenure” was never heard of, until in modern times the term was introduced, to denote the “alod” or “odal right” of the pre-feudal time. At first there is but one kind, freehold. The unfreeman did not “hold” the land: he and his land were held together. Gradually as the church gave practical effect to its doctrine of the brotherhood of man, and as feudalism proved that subordination and freedom could exist together, the relation of the unfreeman to his land was conceived of as “servile” or “base” tenure, out of which grew the later copyhold tenure. This shows its nature as a true variety of holding, capable of assuming all the forms of estate without changing its character as a tenure.

Leasehold tenure, on the other hand, is not a tenure at all in the feudal sense, because the lessee has no “hold” or tenure of the land: no seisin, as the law of England expressed it. But he was necessarily a freeman, and therefore could not be reckoned among the serfs. The easiest escape from the difficulty was to say that he held by a different kind of tenure, and was a freeman, but had not a freehold. Therefore there is no variety of estates in leasehold, answering to those of freehold, or even of copyhold. It is a single form of estate, less than freehold, but always held by a freeman. That tenants as held under the king immediately, when they granted out portions of their lands to inferior persons, became also lords with respect to those inferior persons, as they were still tenants with respect to the king; and thus partaking of a middle nature, were called mesne, or middle, lords. So that if the king granted a manor to A, and he granted a portion of the land to B, now B was said to hold [60] of A, and A of the king; or in other words, B held his lands immediately of A, but mediately of the king. The king, therefore, was styled lord paramount; A was both tenant and lord, or was a mesne lord; and B was called tenant paravail, or the lowest tenant; being he who was supposed to make avail, or profit, of the land.<sup>a</sup> In this manner are all the lands of the kingdom holden, which are in the hands of subjects: for according to Sir Edward Coke,<sup>b</sup> in the law of England we have not properly allodium;<sup>2</sup> which, we have seen,<sup>c</sup> is the name by which the feudists it is not a tenure in the feudal sense is shown by its survival to the present day, when it is in constant use, although feudal tenures have long been obsolete.

Copyhold depending on immemorial custom cannot now be created, nor can freehold be changed into it. But it may be turned into freehold by a mere conveyance of the freehold to the copyholder by the lord, or by a release to him of the seignorial rights; and such transmutation is called enfranchisement. Or, on the other hand, the copyholder may convey to the lord, and this will be an extinguishment of the copyhold. (1 Stephen's New Com. 229, n. f.)

How closely connected all these terms are—tenure, estate, title—and how easily they pass into one another, is shown by the fact that the statute which did most to destroy feudalism had no reference to tenure at all, but was intended to affect estates, and operated most directly upon titles. This was stat. Quia Emptores, 18 Edw. I, which regulated the sale of hereditaments, changed the transfers from feudal to allodial in their nature, broke up sub-infeudation, and prevented the formation of new fees and therefore of manors. Every sale since that time has been the transfer of an old fee, not the creation of a new one. This began the process that ended with the stat. 12 Car. II, c. 24, or rather with the reforms of the commonwealth, preserved by that statute, in the abolition of all strictly feudal tenures.—HAMMOND.

<sup>2</sup> Meaning of allodium.—Land owned by a subject, and not held of a lord, is called allodial land (Co. Litt. 1 b; 2 Bl. Comm. 47); and a system of allodial ownership appears to have preceded the feudal system in England, the land then owned being termed, according to the mode of acquisition, bookland or folkland (Co. Litt. 65 a, Hargrave's note; Pollock and Maitland, His-

abroad distinguish such estates of the subject, as are not holden of any superior. So that at the first glance we may observe, that our lands are either plainly feuds, or partake very strongly of the feudal nature.

§ 84. a. Tenants in capite.—All tenures being thus derived, or supposed to be derived, from the king, those that held immediately under him, in right of his crown and dignity, were called his tenants in capite, or in chief; which was the most honorable species of tenure, but at the same time subjected the tenants to greater and more burdensome services, than inferior tenures did.<sup>d</sup> This distinction ran through all the different sorts of tenure; of which I now proceed to give an account.

§ 85. 2. Kinds of feudal services—a. Free and base services; certain and uncertain services.—There seem to have subsisted among our ancestors four principal species of lay tenures, to which all others may be reduced: the grand criteria of which were the natures of the several services or renders, that were due to the lords from their tenants. The services, in respect of their quality, were either free or base services; in respect of their quantity and the time of exacting them, were either certain or uncertain. Free services were such as were not unbecoming the character of a soldier, or a freeman to perform; as to serve [<sup>61</sup>] under his lord in the wars, to pay a sum of money, and the like. Base services were such as were fit only for peasants, or persons of a servile rank; tory of English law, vol. I, pp. 37 et seq.; Digby, History of the Law of Real Property, 5th ed., pp. 11 et seq.). Such ownership is assumed to have been—at any rate as to bookland, or land received by grant—absolute ownership, and the term ‘allodium’ is used to denote land owned absolutely. The term survived the institution of the feudal system, and was applied to land held of a lord, so that a man was sometimes said to hold in allodio; but the allodium and the beneficium were then becoming transformed into the feodum (Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, p. 49; Digby, History of the Law of Real Property, 5th ed., p. 26).—HALSBURY, 24 Laws of England, 138 a.

as to plow the lord's land, to make his hedges, to carry out his dung, or other mean employments. The certain services, whether free or base, were such as were stinted in quantity, and could not be exceeded on any pretense; as, to pay a stated annual rent, or to plow such a field for three days. The uncertain depended upon unknown contingencies: as, to do military service in person, or pay an assessment in lieu of it, when called upon; or to wind a horn whenever the Scots invaded the realm; which are free services: or to do whatever the lord should command; which is a base or villein service.

§ 86. 3. Species of feudal tenures—a. Frank-tenements: (1) Knight service; (2) Free socage; b. Villeinage: (1) Pure villeinage; (2) Villein socage.—From the various combinations of these services have arisen the four kinds of lay tenure which subsisted in England, till the middle of the last century; and three of which subsist to this day. Of these Bracton (who wrote under Henry the Third) seems to give the clearest and most compendious account, of any author ancient or modern;* of which the following is the outline or abstract.† “Tenements are of two kinds, frank-tenement, and villeinage. And, of frank-tenements, some are held freely in consideration of homage and knight service; others in free socage with the service of fealty only.” And again,‡ “of villeinages some are pure, and others privileged. He that holds in pure villeinage shall do whatsoever is commanded him, and always be bound to an uncertain service. The other kind of villeinage is called villein socage; and these villein socmen do villein services, but such as are certain and determined.” Of which the sense seems to be as follows: first, where the service was free, but uncertain, as military service with homage, that tenure was called the tenure in [62] chivalry, per servitium militare, or by knight service. Secondly, where the service was not only free, but also certain, as by fealty only, by rent and fealty, etc., that tenure was called liberum socagium, or free socage. These were the only free holdings or tenements; the others were vileinous or servile: as, thirdly, where the service was base in its nature, and uncertain as to time and quantity, the tenure was purum villenagium, absolute or pure villeinage. Lastly, where the service was base in its nature, but reduced to a certainty, this was still villeinage, but distinguished from the other by the name of privileged villeinage, villenagium privilegiatum; or it might be still called socage (from the certainty of its services) but degraded by their baseness into the inferior title of villanum socagium, villein socage.

§ 87. 3. a. (1) Knight service.—The first, most universal, and esteemed and most honorable species of tenure, was that by knight service, called in Latin servitium militare, and in law-French chivalry, or service de chivaler, answering to the fief d'haubert of the Normans,<sup>a</sup> which name is expressly given it by the Mirror.<sup>1</sup> This differed in very few points, as we shall presently see, from a pure and proper feud, being entirely military, and the genuine effect of the feudal establishment in England. To make a tenure by knight service, a determinate quantity of land was necessary, which was called a knight's fee, feodum militare; the value of which, not only in the reign of Edward II,<sup>b</sup> but also of Henry II,<sup>1</sup> and therefore probably at its original in the reign of the conqueror, was stated at 20*l. per annum*; and a certain number of these knight's fees were requisite to make up a barony. And he who held this proportion of land (or a whole fee) by knight service, was bound to attend his lord to the wars for forty days in every year, if called upon: <sup>m</sup> which attendance was his reditus or return, his rent or service, for the land he claimed to hold. If he held only half a knight's fee, he was only bound to attend twenty days, and so in proportion.<sup>23</sup> And there is reason to [63] apprehend, that this service was the whole that our ancestors meant to subject themselves to; the other fruits and consequences of this tenure being fraudulently superinduced, as the regular (though unforeseen) appendages of the feudal system.

§ 88. (a) Incidents of knight service.—This tenure of knight service had all the marks of a strict and regular feud: it was granted by words of pure donation, dedi et concessi (I have given and granted):<sup>o</sup> was transferred by investiture or delivering corporal possession of the land, usually called livery of seisin; and was perfected by homage and fealty. It also drew after it these seven fruits and consequences, as inseparably incident to the tenure in chivalry; viz., aids, relief, primer seisin, wardship, marriage, fines for alienation, and escheat: all which I shall endeavor to explain, and show to be of feudal original.

§ 89. (i) Aids.—Aids were originally mere benevolences granted by the tenant to his lord, in times of difficulty and distress;<sup>p</sup> but in process of time they grew to be considered as a matter of right, and not of discretion. These aids were principally three: first, to ransom the lord's person, if taken prisoner; a necessary

3 Greater and lesser tenants in chief.—In 1 Poll. & Mait., Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 259, we read: "In Henry II's day the allotment of military service upon the lands of the tenants in chief may be regarded as complete. It is already settled that this tenant in chief owes the king the service of one knight, while another owes the service of twenty knights. Historians have often observed that the tenants in chief of the Norman king, even his military tenants in chief, form a very miscellaneous body, and this is important in our constitutional history; a separation between the greater and the lesser tenants must be effected in course of time, and the king has thus a power of defining what will hereafter be the 'estate' of the baronage. In Henry II's day the king had many tenants, each of whom held of him but one knight's fee, or but two or three knights' fees. On the other hand, there were nobles each of consequence of the feudal attachment and fidelity: insomuch that the neglect of doing it, whenever it was in the vassal's power, was by the strict rigor of the feudal law, an absolute forfeiture of his estate.<sup>a</sup> Secondly, to make the lord's eldest son a knight; a matter that was formerly attended with great ceremony, pomp, and expense. This aid could not be demanded till the heir was fifteen years old, or capable of bearing arms: the intention of it being to breed up the eldest son and heir apparent of the seignior, to deeds of arms and chivalry, for the better defense of the nation. Thirdly, to marry the lord's eldest daughter, by giving her a suitable portion: for daughter's portions were in those days extremely slender; few lords being able to save much out of <sup>[64]</sup> their income for this purpose; nor could they acquire money by other means, being wholly conversant in matters of arms: nor by the nature of their tenure, could they charge their lands with this, or any other encumbrances. From bearing their proportion to these aids no rank or profession was exempted: and therefore even the monasteries, till the time of their dissolution, contributed to the knighting of their founder's male heir (of whom their lands were holden) and the marriage of his female descendants.<sup>b</sup> And one cannot but observe, in this particular, the great resemblance which the lord and vassal of the feudal law bore to the patron and client of the Roman republic; between whom also there subsisted a mutual fealty, or engagement of defense and protection. With regard to the matter of aids, there were three which were usually raised by the client; viz., to marry the patron's daughter; to pay his debts; and to redeem his person from captivity.<sup>c</sup> whom had many knights' fees; a few had fifty and upwards. Now, to describe the wide lands held of the king by one of his mightier tenants, the terms honor and barony were used." It is suggested that the distinction between peers and commoners may have arisen from the distinction between the tenants who had few knights' fees and those who had many. See Halsbury, 24 Laws of Eng., 140 n.

But besides these ancient feudal aids, the tyranny of lords by degrees exacted more and more; as, aids to pay the lord's debts (probably in imitation of the Romans), and aids to enable him to pay aids or reliefs to his superior lord; from which last, indeed, the king's tenants in capite (in chief, i. e., of the king) were, from the nature of their tenure, excused, as they held immediately of the king who had no superior. To prevent this abuse, King John's magna carta<sup>u</sup> ordained, that no aids be taken by the king without consent of parliament, nor in any wise by inferior lords, save only the three ancient ones above mentioned. But this provision was omitted in Henry III's charter, and the same oppressions were continued till the 25 Edw. I (1297), when the statute called confirmatio chartarum (a confirmation of the charters) was enacted; which in this respect revived King John's charter, by ordaining that none but the ancient aids should be taken. But though the species of aids was thus restrained, yet the quantity<sup>[65]</sup> of each aid remained arbitrary and uncertain. King John's charter indeed ordered that all aids taken by inferior lords should be reasonable;<sup>v</sup> and that the aids taken by the king of his tenants in capite should be settled by parliament.<sup>x</sup> But they were never completely ascertained and adjusted till the statute Westm. I, 3 Edw. I, c. 36 (Knighthood, 1275), which fixed the aids of inferior lords at twenty shillings, or the supposed twentieth part of every knight's fee, for making the eldest son a knight, or marrying the eldest daughter; and the same was done with regard to the king's tenants in capite (in chief) by statute 25 Edw. III, c. 11 (King's Son and Daughter, 1351). The other aid, for ransom of the lord's person, being not in its nature capable of any certainty, was therefore never ascertained.

§ 90. (ii) Reliefs.—Relief, relevium, was before mentioned as incident to every feudal tenure, by way of fine or composition with the lord for taking up the estate, which was lapsed or fallen in by the death of the last tenant. But, though reliefs had their original while feuds were only life estates, yet they continued after feuds became hereditary; and were therefore looked upon, very justly, as one of the greatest grievances of tenure: especially when, at the first they were merely arbitrary and at the will of the lord; so that, if he pleased to demand an exorbitant relief, it was in effect to disinherit the heir.<sup>7</sup> The English ill-brooked this consequence of their new adopted policy; and therefore William the Conqueror by his laws<sup>8</sup> ascertained the relief, by directing (in imitation of the Danish heriots) that a certain quantity of arms, and habiliments of war should be paid by the earls, barons, and vavasors respectively; and, if the latter had no arms, they should pay 100s.<sup>4</sup> William Rufus broke through this composition, and again demanded arbitrary uncertain reliefs, as due by the feudal laws:

<sup>4</sup> Heriot and relief.—The relation of the heriot to the relief has been one of the chief battle-fields on which the fight of different theories of the early law has been waged. The date of the origin of the heriot has been material only as bearing upon this; and most of those who have studied the subject do not doubt their identity, or at least that it was upon the plan of the heriots that the Norman Conqueror fashioned his plan of relief, as Blackstone (Cf. 2 Comm. *423) says. The main distinction recognized between them is that the heriot is the act of the leaving, relief of the incoming tenant or heir. (Kemble, Saxons in England, i, 178.) This is exactly the difference we should expect to find, if heriot were the rule before the notion of hereditary estates was thought of, and relief took its place when the succession of the heir came to be considered a right. Indeed, it would become ipso facto the new form if the rights of the deceased were regarded as instantly passing to the heir, from whom anything left by the ancestor must be demanded.

Kemble supposes that the heriot began in the comitatus—therefore among freemen—and was extended to the unfree tenants by imitation. I know no authority for this. It is certain that in the tenth century the lord took the unfree man's chattels at his death without exception. (See Rect. Sing. Pers. in Thorpe's Ancient Laws, vol. 1, pp. 431-445.) If the "best beast," or "best chattel" was all that he got in the eleventh under Canute, we might rather infer that this was an amelioration of the former custom than a new hardship inflicted on the helpless class. The notion of a hereditary estate in land was not yet formed; but when it was introduced after the Conquest, it would be natural to impose some condition analogous to that of the tenants who remained in possession of their land, because ascripti glebæ, which might well thereby in effect obliging every heir to new-purchase or redeem his land:<sup>a</sup> but his brother Henry I, by the charter before mentioned, restored his father's law [<sup>66</sup>] and ordained that the relief to be paid should be according to the law so established, and not an arbitrary redemption.<sup>b</sup> But afterwards, when by an ordinance in 27 Hen. II (1181), called the assize of arms, it was provided that every man's armor should descend to his heir, for defense of the realm: and it thereby became impracticable to pay these acknowledgments in arms, according to the laws of the conqueror, the composition was universally accepted of 100s. for every knight's fee; as we find it ever after established.<sup>c</sup> But it must be remembered, that this relief was only then payable, if the heir at the death of his ancestor had attained his full age of one and twenty years.

§ 91. (iii) Primer seisin.—Primer seisin was a feudal burden, only incident to the king's tenants in capite, and not to those who held of inferior or mesne lords. It was a right which the king had, when any of his tenants in capite died seised of a knight's fee, to receive of the heir (provided he were of full age) one whole year's profits of the lands, if they were in immediate possession; and half a year's profits, if the lands were in reversion expectant on an estate for life.<sup>d</sup> This seems to be little more than an additional relief: but grounded upon this feudal reason; that, by the ancient law of feuds, immediately upon a death of a vassal the superior was entitled to enter and take seisin or possession of the land, by way of protection against intruders, till the heir appeared to claim it and receive investiture: and for the time the lord so held it, he was entitled to take the profits; and unless the heir claimed within a year and day, it was by the strict law a forfeiture.* This practice, however, seems not to have long obtained in England, if ever, with regard to tenure under inferior lords; but, as to the king's tenures in capite, this prima seisin (primer seisin) was expressly declared, under Henry III and Edward II, to belong to the king by prerogative, in contradistinction to other lords.† And the king was entitled to enter and receive the †<sup>67</sup> whole profits of the land, till livery was sued; which suit being commonly within a year and day next after the death of the tenant, therefore the king used to take at an average the first-fruits, that is to say, one year's profits of the land.‡ And this afterwards gave a handle to the popes, who claimed to be feudal lords of the church, to claim in like manner from every clergyman in England the first year's profits of his benefice, by way of primitiæ, or first-fruits.

§ 92. (iv) Wardship.—These payments were only due if the heir was of full age; but if he was under the age of twenty-one, being a male, or fourteen, being a female,<sup>b</sup> the lord was entitled to the wardship of the heir, and was called the guardian in chivalry. This wardship consisted in having the custody of the body and lands of such heir, without any account of the profits, till the age of twenty-one in males, and sixteen in females. For the law supposed the heir male unable to perform knight service till twenty-one; but as for the female, she was supposed capable at fourteen to marry, and then her husband might perform the service. The lord, therefore, had no wardship, if at the death of the ancestor the heir male was of the full age of twenty-one, or the heir female of fourteen: yet, if she was then under fourteen, and the lord once had her in ward, he might keep her so till sixteen, by virtue of the statute of Westm. I, 3 Edw. I, c. 22 (Ward, 1275), the two additional years being given by the legislature for no other reason but merely to benefit the lord.<sup>1</sup>

§ 93. (aa) Wardship of the lands.—This wardship, so far as it related to land, though it was not nor could be part of the law of feuds, so long as they were arbitrary, temporary, or for life only; yet, when they became hereditary, and did consequently often descend upon infants, who by reason of their age could neither perform nor stipulate for the services of the feud, does not seem upon feudal principles to have been unreasonable. For the wardship of the land, or custody of the feud, was retained by the lord, that he might out of the profits thereof provide a fit person <sup>(es)</sup> to supply the infant's services, till he should be of age to perform them himself. And, if we consider the feud in its original import, as a stipend, fee, or reward for actual service, it could not be thought hard that the lord should withhold the stipend, so long as the service was suspended. Though undoubtedly to our English ancestors, where such a stipendiary donation was a mere supposition or figment, it carried abundance of hardship; and accordingly it was relieved by the charter of Henry I before mentioned, which took this custody from the lord, and ordained that the custody, both of the land and the children should belong to the widow or next of kin. But this noble immunity did not continue many years.

§ 94. (bb) Wardship of the body.—The wardship of the body was a consequence of the wardship of the land; for he who enjoyed the infant's estate was the properest person to educate and maintain him in his infancy: and also, in a political view, the lord was most concerned to give his tenant a suitable education, in order to qualify him the better to perform those services which in his maturity he was bound to render.

§ 95. (cc) Delivery from wardship.—When the male heir arrived to the age of twenty-one, or the heir female to that of sixteen, they might sue out their livery or ouster le main;* that is, the delivery of their lands out of their guardian's hands. For this they were obliged to pay a fine, namely, half a year's profits of the land; though this seems expressly contrary to magna carta.<sup>1</sup> However, in consideration of their lands having been so long in ward, they were excused all reliefs, and the king's tenants also all primer seisins.<sup>m</sup> In order to ascertain the profits that arose to the crown by these fruits of tenure, and to grant the heir his livery, the itinerant justices, or justices in eyre, had it formerly in charge to make inquisition concerning them by a jury of the county,<sup>n</sup> commonly called an inquisitio post mortem (inquisition after death); which was instituted to inquire (at the death of any man of fortune) the value of his estate, the tenure by which it was [69] holden, and who and of what age his heir was; thereby to ascertain the relief and value of the primer seisin, or the wardship and livery accruing to the king thereupon. A manner of proceeding that came in process of time to be greatly abused, and at length an intolerable grievance; it being one of the principal accusations against Empson and Dudley, the wicked engines of Henry VII, that by color of false inquisitions they compelled many persons to sue out livery from the crown, who by no means were tenants thereunto.<sup>o</sup> And, afterwards, a court of wards and liveries was erected,<sup>p</sup> for conducting the same inquiries in a more solemn and legal manner.

§ 96. (dd) Knighthood.—When the heir thus came of full age, provided he held a knight's fee,<sup>5</sup> he was to receive the order of knighthood, and was compellable to take it upon him, or else pay a fine to the king. For in those heroic times, no person was

Although the subject is of no present interest it illustrates the reasons which induced the editor to reject the additions thus made from the text, and follow that of the eighth edition, the last which was certainly Blackstone's own work. There is reason to believe that some of these changes Dr. Burn, the editor of the ninth edition, made without any authority from Blackstone's papers, and entirely on his own. By reference to book I, page 404, the reader will see that the same change was made there in the same way, after Blackstone qualified for deeds of arms and chivalry who had not received this order, which was conferred with much preparation and solemnity. We may plainly discover the footsteps of a similar custom in what Tacitus relates of the Germans, who in order to qualify their young men to bear arms, presented them in a full assembly with a shield and lance; which ceremony, as was formerly hinted,<sup>a</sup> is supposed to have been the original of the feudal knighthood.<sup>r</sup> This prerogative, of compelling the vassals to be knighted, or to pay a fine, was expressly recognized in parliament, by the statute de militibus, 1 Edw. II (Knighthood, 1307); was exerted as an expedient for raising money by many of our best princes, particularly by Edward VI and Queen Elizabeth; but yet was the occasion of heavy murmurs when exerted by Charles I: among whose many misfortunes it was, that neither himself nor his people seemed able to distinguish between the arbitrary stretch, and the legal exertion, of prerogative. However, among the other concessions made by [70] that unhappy prince, before the fatal recourse to arms, he agreed to divest himself of this undoubted flower of the crown, and it was had left the passage unaltered through the eight editions printed in his lifetime.

The chief ground for thinking that this limitation to the king's tenants was a discovery made by Dr. Burn, and not by the author of the Commentaries, is the fact that there is no evidence for its truth in the original authorities. See Coke on the Stat. de Militibus, 2 Inst. 593, and the commissions of Edw. VI, and Q. Elizabeth in 15 Rymer's Fœdera, 124, 493; with the stat. 16, Car. I, c. 20, and 2 Rushw. Coll. 70; cited by Mr. Christian, who first pointed out the inaccuracy of this addition to the text in his note to this passage, saying, "I do not find that this prerogative was confined to the king's tenants," though apparently without suspecting the authorship.

It is a little hard that Blackstone should thus be made responsible for the errors of his posthumous editor, and at the same time accused of learning from the same posthumous editor all that he knew on such subjects.—HAMMOND.

accordingly abolished by statute 16 Car. I. c. 20 (Order of Knighthood, 1640).

§ 97. (v) Marriage.—But, before they came of age, there was still another piece of authority, which the guardian was at liberty to exercise over his infant wards; I mean the right of marriage (maritagium, as contradistinguished from matrimonium), which in its feudal sense signifies the power which the lord or guardian in chivalry had of disposing of his infant ward in matrimony. For, while the infant was in ward, the guardian had the power of tendering him or her a suitable match, without disparagement, or inequality: which if the infants refused, they forfeited the value of the marriage, valorem maritagi, to their guardian; that is, so much as a jury would assess, or anyone would bona fide give to the guardian for such an alliance: and, if the infants married themselves without the guardian's consent, they forfeited double the value, duplicem valorem maritagi (double the value of the marriage).<sup>a</sup> This seems to have been one of the greatest hardships of our ancient tenures. There are indeed substantial reasons why the lord should have the restraint and control of the ward's marriage, especially of his female ward; because of their tender years, and the danger of such female ward's intermarrying with the lord's enemy.<sup>w</sup> But no tolerable pretense could be assigned why the lord should have the sale, or value of the marriage. Nor, indeed, is this claim of strictly feudal original; the most probable account of it seeming to be this: that by the custom of Normandy the lord's consent was necessary to the marriage of his female wards;<sup>x</sup> which was introduced into England, together with the rest of the Norman doctrine of feuds: and it is likely that the lords usually took money for such their consent, since in the often-cited charter of Henry the First, he engages for the future to take nothing for his consent; which also he promises in general to give provided such female ward were not <sup>[71]</sup> married to his enemy. But this, among other beneficial parts of that charter, being disregarded, and guardians still continuing to dispose of their wards in a very arbitrary unequal manner, it was provided by King John's great charter, that heirs should be married without disparagement, the next of kin having previous notice of the contract;<sup>7</sup> or, as it was expressed in the first draft of that charter, ita maritentur ne disparagentur, et per consilium propinquorum de consanguinitate sua.<sup>8</sup> But these provisions in behalf of the relations were omitted in the charter of Henry III; wherein<sup>9</sup> the clause stands merely thus, "hæredes maritentur absque disparagatione (heirs should be married without disparagement)": meaning certainly, by hæredes, heirs female, as there are no traces before this to be found of the lord's claiming the marriage<sup>b</sup> of heirs male; and as Glanvill<sup>c</sup> expressly confines it to heirs female. But the king and his great lords thenceforward took a handle from the ambiguity of this expression to claim them both, sive sit masculus sive fœmina (whether they be male or female), as Bracton more than once expresses it;<sup>d</sup> and also, as nothing but disparagement was restrained by magna carta, they thought themselves at liberty to make all other advantages that they could.<sup>e</sup> And afterwards this right, of selling the ward in marriage or else receiving the price or value of it, was expressly declared by the statute of Merton;<sup>f</sup> which is the first direct mention of it that I have met with, in our own or any other law.

§ 98. (vi) Fines.—Another attendant or consequence of tenure by knight service was that of finés due to the lord for every alienation, whenever the tenant had occasion to make over his land to another. This depended on the nature of the feudal connection; it not being reasonable nor allowed, as we have before seen, that a feudatory should transfer his lord's gift to another, and substitute a new tenant to do the service in his own stead, without the consent of the lord: and, as the [72] feudal obligation was considered as reciprocal, the lord also could not alienate his seignory without the consent of his tenant, which consent of his was called an attornment. This restraint upon the lords soon wore away; that upon the tenants continued longer. For, when everything came in process of time to be bought and sold, the lords would not grant a license to their tenant, to alien, without a fine being paid; apprehending that, if it was reasonable for the heir to pay a fine or relief on the renovation of his paternal estate, it was much more reasonable that a stranger should make the same acknowledgment on his admission to a newly purchased feud. With us in England, these fines seem only to have been exacted from the king's tenants in capite, who were never able to alien without a license: but, as to common persons, they were at liberty, by magna carta,<sup>g</sup> and the statute of quia emptores<sup>h</sup> (if not earlier), to alien the whole of their estate, to be holden of the same lord, as they themselves held it of before. But the king's tenants in capite, not being included under the general words of these statutes, could not alien without a license: for if they did, it was in ancient strictness an absolute forfeiture of the land;<sup>i</sup> though some have imagined otherwise. But this severity was mitigated by the statute 1 Edw. III, c. 12 (Sale of Land, 1326), which ordained, that in such case the lands should not be forfeited, but a reasonable fine be paid to the king. Upon which statute it was settled, that one-third of the yearly value should be paid for a license of alienation; but, if the tenant presumed to alien without a license, a full year's value should be paid.<sup>k</sup><sup>6</sup>

<sup>6</sup> In the middle of the thirteenth century the tenant enjoyed a large power of disposing of his tenement by act inter vivos, though this was subject to some restraints in favor of his lord. About the history of these restraints different opinions have been held. The old English tradition, represented by Coke, regarded it as a process by which limits were gradually set to ancient liberty. On the other hand, the cosmopolitan "learning of feuds," which Blackstone made popular, assumed the inalienability of the fief as a starting point:—gradually the powers of the tenant grew at the expense of the lord. Of late years a renewed attention to the English authorities has occasioned a reaction in favor of Coke's doctrine. The evidence deserves a patient examination, the result of which may be that we shall see some truth in both of

§ 99. (vii) Escheat.—The last consequence of tenure in chivalry was escheat; which is the determination of the tenure, or dissolution of the mutual bond between the lord and tenant, from the extinction of the blood of the latter by either natural or civil means: if he died without heirs of his blood, or if his blood was corrupted and stained by commission of treason or felony; whereby every inheritable quality was entirely blotted out [73] and abolished. In such cases the land escheated, or fell back, to the lord of the fee;<sup>1</sup> that is, the tenure was determined by breach of the original condition, expressed or implied in the feudal donation. In the one case, there were no heirs subsisting of the blood of the first feudatory or purchaser, to which heirs alone the grant of the feud extended: in the other, the tenant, by perpetrating an atrocious crime, showed that he was no longer to be trusted as a vassal, having forgotten his duty as a subject; and therefore forfeited his feud, which he held under the implied condition that he should not be a traitor or a felon. The consequence of which in both cases was, that the gift, being determined, resulted back to the lord who gave it.<sup>m</sup>

§ 100. (b) Other species of knight service; grand serjeanty. These were the principal qualities, fruits, and consequences of the tenure by knight service: a tenure, by which the greatest part of the lands in this kingdom were holden, and that principally of the king in capite, till the middle of the last century; and which was created, as Sir Edward Coke expressly testifies,<sup>n</sup> for a military purpose; viz., for defense of the realm by the king's own principal subjects, which was judged to be much better than to trust to hirelings or foreigners. The description here given is that of knight service proper; which was to attend the king in his wars. There were also some other species of knight service; so called, though improperly, because the service or render was of a free and honorable nature, and equally uncertain as to the time of rendering as the rival opinions, and come to the conclusion that the controversy has been chiefly occasioned by an attempt, common to all parties, to make the law of the Norman reigns more definite than really it was.—POLLOCK & MAITLAND, 1 Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 329.

that of knight service proper, and because they were attended with similar fruits and consequences. Such was the tenure by grand serjeanty, per magnum servitium, whereby the tenant was bound, instead of serving the king generally in his wars, to do some special honorary service to the king in person; as to carry his banner, his sword, or the like; or to be his butler, champion, or other officer, at his coronation.* It was in most other respects like knight service;† only he was not bound to pay aid,‡ or escuage;§ [74] and, when tenant by knight service paid five pounds for a relief on every knight's fee, tenant by grand serjeanty paid one year's value of his land, were it much or little.* Tenure by cornage, which was, to wind a horn when the Scots or other enemies entered the land, in order to warn the king's subjects, was (like other services of the same nature) a species of grand serjeanty.†

§ 101. (c) Escuage or scutage.—These services, both of chivalry and grand serjeanty, were all personal, and uncertain as to their quantity or duration. But, the personal attendance in knight service growing troublesome and inconvenient in many respects, the tenants found means of compounding for it; by first sending others in their stead, and in process of time making a pecuniary satisfaction to the lords in lieu of it. This pecuniary satisfaction at last came to be levied by assessments, at so much for every knight's fee; and therefore this kind of tenure was called scutagium (scutage) in Latin, or servitium scuti (service money); scutum being then a well-known denomination for money: and in like manner it was called, in our Norman French, escuage; being indeed a pecuniary instead of a military, service. The first time this appears to have been taken was in the 5 Hen. II (1158), on account of his expedition to Toulouse; but it soon came to be so universal, that personal attendance fell quite into disuse. Hence we find in our ancient histories, that, from this period, when our kings went to war, they levied scutages on their tenants, that is, on all the landholders of the kingdom, to defray their expenses, and to hire troops: and these assessments, in the time of Henry II, seem to have been made arbitrarily and at the king's pleasure.<sup>7</sup> Which prerogative being greatly abused by his successors, it became matter of national clamor; and King John was obliged to consent, by his magna carta, that no scutage should be imposed without consent of parliament.<sup>8</sup> But this clause was omitted in his son Henry III's charter; where we only find,<sup>9</sup> that scutages [75] or escuage should be taken as they were used to be taken in the time of Henry II: that is, in a reasonable and moderate manner. Yet afterwards by statute 25 Edw. I, c. 5 & 6 (Taxation, 1297),<sup>8</sup> and many subsequent statutes<sup>x</sup> it was enacted, that the king should take no aids or tasks but by the common assent of the realm. Hence it is held in our old books, that escuage, or scutage could not be levied but by consent of parliament;<sup>y</sup> such scutages being indeed the groundwork of all succeeding subsidies, and the land tax of later times.

<sup>7</sup> There was only one half century during which scutages were frequently imposed, namely, between 1190 and 1240. "The early history of scutage is now in the crucible." There are two recent tracts on the subject: (1) J. F. Baldwin, Scutage and Knight Service, Chicago, 1897; and (2) J. H. Round, The Red Book of the Exchequer (privately printed), 1898. Mr. Baldwin shows, among other things, that as compared with other sources of revenue, the importance of the scutages may easily be overrated. It is said that in the whole course of English history scutage was levied only some forty times. See 1 Poll. & Maitl. Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 253, 267. "Knights' fees were cut up into fractional parts in a manner which would have been impossible had the service been really military. To what extent the service of the tenants in capite of the king was changed to a money payment seems doubtful. Perhaps the commutation was a matter of special arrangement, and in the absence of arrangement the tenant had to furnish military service or pay a fine for his default. Blackstone declines to recognize tenure by escuage as tenure by knight service, and sees in it, as was indeed the fact, the destruction of the advantages of the feudal constitution, leaving only its hardships."—HALSBURY, 24 Laws of England, 141 n.

<sup>8</sup> Mr. Jenks advises us that, as a matter of fact, scutage is not mentioned by name in the 25 Edw. I. See 1 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 122 n.

Since, therefore, escuage differed from knight service in nothing, but as a compensation differs from actual service, knight service is frequently confounded with it. And thus Littleton<sup>a</sup> must be understood, when he tells us, that tenant by homage, fealty, and escuage, was tenant by knight service: that is, that this tenure (being subservient to the military policy of the nation) was respected<sup>a</sup> as a tenure in chivalry.<sup>b</sup> But as the actual service was uncertain, and depended upon emergencies, so it was necessary that this pecuniary compensation should be equally uncertain, and depend on the assessments of the legislature suited to those emergencies. For had the escuage been a settled invariable sum, payable at certain times, it had been neither more nor less than a mere pecuniary rent: and the tenure instead of knight service would have been of another kind, called socage,<sup>c</sup> of which we shall speak in the next chapter.

§ 102. (d) Corruption of knight service.—For the present I have only to observe, that by the degenerating of knight service, or personal military duty, into escuage, or pecuniary assessments, all the advantages (either promised or real) of the feudal constitution were destroyed, and nothing but the hardships remained. Instead of forming a national militia composed of barons, knights, and gentlemen, bound by their interest, their honor, and their oaths, to defend their king and country, the whole of this system of [76] tenures now tended to nothing else, but a wretched means of raising money to pay an army of occasional mercenaries. In the meantime the families of all our nobility and gentry groaned under the intolerable burdens, which (in consequence of the fiction adopted after the Conquest) were introduced and laid upon them by the subtlety and finesse of the Norman lawyers. For, besides the scutages to which they were liable in defect of personal attendance, which, however, were assessed by themselves in parliament, they might be called upon by the king or lord paramount for aids, whenever his eldest son was to be knighted or his eldest daughter married; not to forget the ransom of his own person. The heir, on the death of his ancestor, if of full age, was plundered of the first emoluments arising from his inheritance, by way of relief and primer seisin; and, if under age, of the whole of his estate during infancy. And then, as Sir Thomas Smith<sup>d</sup> very feelingly complains, “when he came to his own, after he was out of wardship, his woods decayed, houses fallen down, stock wasted and gone, lands let forth and plowed to be barren,” to make amends he was yet to pay half a year’s profits as a fine for suing out his livery; and also the price or value of his marriage, if he refused such wife as his lord and guardian had bartered for, and imposed upon him; or twice that value, if he married another woman. Add to this the untimely and expensive honor of knighthood, to make his poverty more completely splendid. And when by these deductions his fortune was so shattered and ruined, that perhaps he was obliged to sell his patrimony, he had not even that poor privilege allowed him, without paying an exorbitant fine for a license of alienation.<sup>e</sup>

§ 103. (e) Abolition of military tenures.—A slavery so complicated, and so extensive as this, called aloud for a remedy in a nation that boasted of its freedom. Palliatives were from time to time applied by successive acts of parliament, which assuaged some temporary grievances. Till at length the humanity of King James I consented<sup>e</sup> for a proper equivalent to abolish them all; though the plan then [77] proceeded not to effect; in like manner as he had formed a scheme, and began to put it in execution, for removing the feudal grievance of heritable jurisdictions in Scotland,<sup>f</sup> which has since been pursued and effected by the statute 20 Geo. II, c. 43 (Heritable Jurisdictions, 1746).<sup>g</sup> King James’ plan for exchanging our military tenures seems to have been nearly the same as that which has been since pursued; only with this difference, that, by way of compensation for the loss which the crown and other lords would sustain, an annual fee-farm rent should be settled and inseparably annexed to the crown, and assured to the inferior lords, payable out of every knight's fee within their respective seignories. An expedient, seemingly much better than the hereditary excise, which was afterwards made the principal equivalent for these concessions. For at length the military tenures, with all their heavy appendages, were destroyed at one blow by the statute 12 Car. II, c. 24 (Military Tenures, 1660), which enacts, "that the court of wards and liveries, and all wardships, liveries, primer seisins, and ouster le mains, values and forfeitures of marriages, by reason of any tenure of the king or others, be totally taken away. And that all fines for alienations, tenures by homage, knights service, and escuage, and also aids for marrying the daughter or knighting the son, and all tenures of the king in capite, be likewise taken away. And that all sorts of tenures, held of the king or others, be turned into free and common socage; save only tenures in frankalmoigne, copyholds, and the honorary services (without the slavish part) of grand serjeanty." A statute, which was a greater acquisition to the civil property of this kingdom than even magna carta itself: since that only pruned the luxuriances that had grown out of the military tenures, and thereby preserved them in vigor; but the statute of King Charles extirpated the whole, and demolished both root and branches.

OF THE MODERN ENGLISH TENURES.

§ 104. Tenures surviving act of 12 Charles II (1660).—Although, by the means that were mentioned in the preceding chapter, the oppressive or military part of the feudal constitution was happily done away, yet we are not to imagine that the constitution itself was utterly laid aside, and a new one introduced in its room: since by the statute 12 Car. II (1660) the tenures of socage and frankalmoigne, the honorary services of grand serjeanty, and the tenure by copy of court roll were reserved; nay, all tenures in general, except frankalmoigne, grand serjeanty, and copyhold, were reduced to one general species of tenure, then well known and subsisting, called free and common socage. And this, being sprung from the same feudal original as the rest, demonstrates the necessity of fully contemplating that ancient system; since it is that alone to which we can recur to explain any seeming or real difficulties, that may arise in our present mode of tenure.

The military tenure, or that by knight service, consisted of what were reputed the most free and honorable services, but which in their nature were unavoidably uncertain in respect to the time of their performance. The second species of tenure, or free socage, consisted also of free and honorable services; but such as were liquidated and reduced to an absolute certainty. And this tenure not only subsists to this day, but has in a manner absorbed and swallowed up (since the [79] statute of Charles the Second) almost every other species of tenure. And to this we are next to proceed.

§ 105. Meaning and character of socage.—Socage, in its most general and extensive signification, seems to denote a tenure by any certain and determinate service. And in this sense it is by our ancient writers constantly put in opposition to chivalry, or knight service, where the render was precarious and uncertain. Thus Bracton;* if a man holds by a rent in money, without any escuage or serjeanty, "id tenementum dici potest socagium (that tenure may be called socage)”: but if you add thereto any royal service, or escuage to any, the smallest, amount, “illud dici poterit feodum militare (that shall be called military tenure).” So, too, the author of Fleta;<sup>b</sup> “ex donationibus, servitia militaria vel magnæ serjantia non continentibus, oritur nobis quoddam nomen generale, quod est socagium (the general name of socage arises from grants to which military service, or grand serjeanty, is not incident.)” Littleton also<sup>c</sup> defines it to be, where the tenant holds his tenement of the lord by any certain service, in lieu of all other services; so that they be not services of chivalry, or knight service. And therefore afterwards<sup>d</sup> he tells us, that whatsoever is not tenure in chivalry is tenure in socage: in like manner as it is defined by Finch,<sup>e</sup> a tenure to be done out of war. The service must therefore be certain, in order to denominate it socage; as to hold by fealty and 20s. rent; or, by homage, fealty, and 20s. rent; or, by homage and fealty without rent; or, by fealty and certain corporal service, as plowing the lord’s land for three days; or by fealty only without any other service: for all these are tenures in socage.<sup>f</sup>

§ 106. Free and common socage.—But socage, as was hinted in the last chapter, is of two sorts: free socage, where the services are not only certain, but honorable: and villein socage, where the services, though certain, are of a baser nature. Such as hold by the former tenure are called in Glanvill,<sup>g</sup> and other subsequent authors, by the name of liberi sokemanni, or tenants in free socage. Of this tenure we are first to speak; and this, both in the nature [80] of its service, and the fruits and consequences, appertaining thereto, was always by much the most free and independent species of any. And therefore I cannot but assent to Mr. Somner’s etymology of the word:<sup>h</sup> who derives it from the Saxon appellation, soc, which signifies liberty or privilege, and, being joined to a usual termination, is called socage, in Latin socagium; signifying thereby a free or privileged tenure.<sup>1</sup> This etymology seems to be much more just than that of our common lawyers in general, who derive it from soca, an old Latin word denoting (as they tell us) a plow: for that in ancient time this socage tenure consisted in nothing else but services of husbandry, which the tenant was bound to do to his lord, as to plow, sow, or reap for him; but that in process of time, this service was changed into an annual rent by consent of all parties, and that, in memory of its original, it still retains the name of socage or plow service.<sup>k</sup> But this by no means agrees with what Littleton himself tells us,<sup>l</sup> that to hold by fealty only, without paying any rent, is tenure in socage; for here is plainly no commutation for plow service. Besides, even services, confessedly of a military nature and original (as escuage itself, which while it remained uncertain, was equivalent to knight service), the instant they were reduced to a certainty changed both their name and nature, and were called socage.<sup>m</sup> It was the certainty, therefore, that denominated it a socage tenure; and nothing sure could be a greater liberty or privilege than to have the service ascertained, and not left to the arbitrary calls of the lord, as in the tenures of chivalry. Wherefore also Britton, who describes socage tenure under the name of fraunke ferme,<sup>n</sup> tells us, that they are "lands and tenements, whereof the nature of the fee is changed by feoffment out of chivalry for certain yearly services, and in respect whereof neither homage, ward, marriage, nor relief can be demanded." Which leads us also to another observation, that if socage tenures were of such base and servile (<sup>81</sup>) original, it is hard to account for the very great immunities which the tenants of them always enjoyed; so highly superior to those of the tenants by chivalry, that it was thought, in the reigns of both Edward I and Charles II, a point of the utmost importance and value to the tenants, to reduce the tenure by knight service to fraunke ferme or tenure by socage. We may therefore, I think, fairly conclude in favor of Somner's etymology, and the liberal extraction of the tenure in free socage, against the authority even of Littleton himself.<sup>1</sup>

Taking this, then, to be the meaning of the word, it seems probable that the socage tenures were the relics of Saxon liberty; retained by such persons as had neither forfeited them to the king, nor been obliged to exchange their tenure for the more honorable, as it was called, but at the same time more burdensome, tenure of knight service. This is peculiarly remarkable in the tenure which prevails in Kent, called gavelkind, which is generally acknowledged to be a species of socage tenure;° the preservation whereof inviolate from the innovations of the Norman Conqueror is a fact universally known. And those who thus preserved their liberties were said to hold in free and common socage.

§ 107. 1. Kinds of free and common socage.—As, therefore, the grand criterion and distinguishing mark of these species of

<sup>1</sup> Meaning of socage.—The derivation of the word [socage] has given rise to much controversy. The generally accepted derivation is from "soc," an old word meaning a plowshare, the socage tenant being bound to agricultural service. But this was far from being universally the case; probably in early times it was the exception rather than the rule. There can be little question that the word is connected with soca, socn, "jurisdiction," from the Anglo-Saxon secan, "to seek." The free landholders had probably by the time of the Conquest been brought nearly universally into the condition of persons owing suit or attendance at the court of some great man. Thus the sochemanni are probably the free suitors or attendants (secta, sequor) of the lord's court, who came in process of time to be regarded as tenants holding in socage, by the tenure of such suit or service. These tenants were usually brought under the obligation of rendering some fixed rent or service, and hence the later conception of the essential characteristics of socage tenure. See Stubbs, Const. Hist., i, p. 273. See further as to the position of these socmen, Vinogradoff, Villeinage in England, pp. 196–203.—Digby, Hist. Real Prop. (5th ed.), 45 n.

At the Conquest, many manors—especially manors of ancient demesne—had tenants known as socmen (socmanni), who were distinct from villeins, and were sometimes divided as free and bond socmen. But, while the free socmen may have given their name to tenure in socage, this arose also under other circumstances—by feoffments where fixed rents or services were reserved; by ancient tenure at fixed rents or services where no charter existed; and generally every free holding that was not in chivalry, or serjeanty, or frankalmoigne, tenure are the having its renders or services ascertained, it will include under it all other methods of holding free lands by certain and invariable rents and duties: and, in particular, petit serjeanty, tenure in burgage, and gavelkind.

§ 108. a. Petit serjeanty.—We may remember, that by the statute 12 Car. II (1660), grand serjeanty is not itself totally abolished, but only the slavish appendages belonging to it; for the honorary services (such as carrying the king's sword or banner, officiating as his butler, carver, etc., at the coronation) are still reserved. Now petit serjeanty bears a great resemblance to grand serjeanty; for as the one is a personal service, so the other is a rent or render, both tending to some purpose relative to the king's person. [§2] Petit serjeanty, as defined by Littleton,<sup>p</sup> consists in holding lands of the king by the service of rendering to him annually some small implement of war, as a bow, a sword, a lance, an arrow, or the like. This, he says,<sup>q</sup> is but socage in effect; for it is no personal service, but a certain rent: and, we may add, it is clearly no predial service, or service of the plow, but in all respects liberum et commune socagium (free and common socage); only being held of the king, it is by way of eminence dignified with the title of parvum servitium regis, or petit serjeanty. And magna carta respects it in this light, when it enacts,<sup>r</sup> that no wardship of the lands or body shall be claimed by the king in virtue of a tenure by petit serjeanty.

§ 109. b. Burgage tenure.—Tenure in burgage is described by Glanvill,<sup>s</sup> and is expressly said by Littleton<sup>t</sup> to be but tenure in socage: and it is where the king or other person is lord of an ancient was classed as socage. Since socage was not liable to uncertain escuage, wardship and marriage, there was doubtless a tendency for it to increase at the expense of military tenure by the gradual conversion into socage of holdings as to which the evidence of military tenure had been lost. See Littleton's Tenures, § 118; Vinogradoff, Villeinage in England, pp. 178–210; Pollock & Maitland, History of English Law, vol. 1, pp. 271–277, 343, vol. borough, in which the tenements are held by a rent certain.<sup>1</sup> It is indeed only a kind of town socage; as common socage, by which other lands are holden, is usually of a rural nature. A borough, as we have formerly seen, is usually distinguished from other towns by the right of sending members to parliament; and, where the right of election is by burgage tenure, that alone is a proof of the antiquity of the borough. Tenure in burgage, therefore, or burgage tenure, is where houses, or lands which were formerly the site of houses, in an ancient borough, are held of some lord in common socage, by a certain established rent. And these seem to have withstood the shock of the Norman encroachments principally on account of their insignificance, which made it not worth while to compel them to an alteration of tenure; as an hundred of them put together would scarce have amounted to a knight's fee. Besides, the owners of them, being chiefly artificers and persons engaged in trade, could not with any tolerable propriety be put on such a military establishment, as the tenure in chivalry was. And here also we have again an instance, where a tenure is confessedly in socage, and yet could not possibly ever have been held by plow service; since the [83] tenants must have been citizens or burghers, the situation frequently a walled town, the tenement a single house; so that none of the owners was probably master of a plow, or was able to use one, if he had it.

§ 110. (1) Borough-English.—The free socage, therefore, in which these tenements are held, seems to be plainly a remnant of Saxon liberty; which may also account for the great variety of customs, affecting many of these tenements so held in ancient burgage: the principal and most remarkable of which is that called borough-English, so named in contradistinction, as it were, to the Norman customs, and which is taken notice of by Glanvill,<sup>v</sup> and by Littleton;<sup>x</sup> viz., that the youngest son, and not the eldest, succeeds to the burgage tenement on the death of his father.<sup>2</sup> For which Littleton<sup>v</sup> gives this reason; because the younger son, by reason of his tender age, is not so capable as the rest of his brethren to help himself. Other authors<sup>a</sup> have indeed given a much stranger reason for this custom, as if the lord of the fee had anciently a right to break the seventh commandment with his tenant's wife on her wedding-night; and that therefore the tenement descended not to the eldest, but the youngest, son; who was more certainly the offspring of the tenant. But I cannot learn that ever this custom prevailed in England, though it certainly did in Scotland (under the name of mercheta or marcheta), till abolished by Malcolm III.<sup>a</sup> And perhaps a more rational account than either may be stretched (though at a sufficient distance) from the practice of the Tartars; among whom, according to Father Duhalde, this custom of descent to the youngest son also prevails. That nation is composed totally of shepherds and herdsmen; and the elder sons, as soon as they are capable of leading a pastoral life, migrate from their father with a certain allotment of cattle, and go to seek a new habitation. The youngest son, therefore, who continues latest with the father, is naturally the heir of his house, the rest being already provided for. And thus we find that, among many other northern nations, it was the custom for all the sons but one to migrate from the father, which one became <sup>[84]</sup> his heir.<sup>b</sup> So that possibly this custom, wherever it prevails, may be the remnant of that pastoral state of our British and German ancestors, which Cæsar and Tacitus describe. Other special customs there are in different burgage tenure; as that, in some, the wife shall be en-

Nottingham, in the days of the Conquest, a new French borough grew up beside the old English borough, and the customs of the Burgus Franciscus as to dower, inheritance and the like had to be distinguished from those of the Burgus Anglicus. Among the customs of the English borough was that of descent to the youngest son, and to this the lawyers gave the name of "borough-English." —POLL. & MAITL., 1 Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 647.

dowed of all her husband's tenements,<sup>o</sup> and not of the third part only, as at the common law: and that, in others, a man might dispose of his tenements by will,<sup>a</sup> which, in general, was not permitted after the Conquest till the reign of Henry the Eighth; though in the Saxon times it was allowable.<sup>e</sup> A pregnant proof that these liberties of socage tenure were fragments of Saxon liberty.

§ 111. c. Gavelkind.—The nature of the tenure in gavelkind affords us a still stronger argument.<sup>3</sup> It is universally known what struggles the Kentishmen made to preserve their ancient liberties, and with how much success those struggles were attended. And as it is principally here that we meet with the custom of gavelkind (though it was and is to be found in some other parts of the kingdom<sup>f</sup>), we may fairly conclude that this was a part of those liberties; agreeably to Mr. Selden's opinion, that gavelkind before the Norman Conquest was the general custom of the realm.<sup>g</sup> The distinguishing properties of this tenure are various: some of the principal are these; 1. The tenant is of age sufficient to alien his

<sup>3</sup> Coke's etymological derivation of gavelkind was: "gave all kinde; for the custome giveth to all the sonnes alike." Co. Litt. 140 a. The word is said to be derived from gafol (rent), and so gafolund or gavelkind lands meant originally rent-paying lands. Before the Conquest the equal partibility of land among sons was the general custom of the realm, and at first continued, after the Conquest, as to socage lands. Primogeniture was introduced to suit the supposed necessities of military tenure. 24 Halsbury, Laws of Eng. 151; Digby, Hist. Real Prop. (5th ed.), 47; 2 Poll. & Maitl., Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 271. It is presumed that all land in Kent is subject to the custom of gavelkind unless the contrary is proved. *Re Chenoweth, Ward v. estate by feoffment at the age of fifteen.<sup>b 4</sup> 2. The estate does not escheat in case of an attainder and execution for felony; their maxim being, "the father to the bow, the son to the plow."<sup>15</sup> 3. In most places he had a power of devising land by will, before the statute for that purpose was made.<sup>k</sup> 4. The lands descend, not to the eldest, youngest, or any one son only, but to all the sons together;<sup>l</sup> which was indeed anciently the most <sup>[85]</sup> usual course of descent all over England,<sup>m</sup> though in particular places particular customs prevailed. These, among other properties, distinguished this tenure in a most remarkable manner: and yet it is said to be only a species of a socage tenure, modified by the custom of the country; the lands being holden by suit of court and fealty, which is a service in its nature certain.<sup>n</sup> Wherefore, by a charter of King John,<sup>o</sup> Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, was authorized to exchange the gavelkind tenures holden of the see of Canterbury into tenures by knight's service; and by statute 31 Hen. VIII, c. 3 (1539), for disgaveling the lands of divers lords and gentlemen in the county of Kent, they are directed to be descendible for the future like other lands which were never holden by service of socage. Now, the immunities which the tenants in gavelkind enjoyed were such, as we cannot conceive should be conferred upon mere plowmen and peasants: from all which I think it sufficiently clear, that tenures in free socage are in general of a nobler original than is assigned by Littleton, and after him by the bulk of our common lawyers.

§ 112. 2. Free socage of feudal character.—Having thus distributed and distinguished the several species of tenure in free socage, I proceed next to show that this also partakes very strongly of the feudal nature. Which may probably arise from its ancient Saxon original; since (as was before observed<sup>p</sup>) feuds were not unknown among the Saxons, though they did not form a part of their military policy, nor were drawn out into such arbitrary consequences as among the Normans. It seems, therefore, reasonable to imagine, that socage tenure existed in much the same state before the Conquest as after: that in Kent it was preserved with a high hand, as our histories inform us it was; and that the rest of the socage tenures dispersed through England escaped the general fate of other property, partly out of favor and affection to their particular owners, and partly from their own insignificance: since I do not apprehend the number of socage tenures soon after the Conquest to have been very considerable, nor their value by any means large: till by successive [80] charters of enfranchisement granted to the tenants, which are particularly mentioned by Britton,<sup>5</sup> their number and value began to swell so far as to make a distinct, and justly envied, part of our English system of tenures.

§ 113. a. Tokens of feudal character of free socage.—However this may be, the tokens of their feudal original will evidently appear from a short comparison of the incidents and consequences of socage tenure with those of tenure in chivalry; remarking their agreement or difference as we go along.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>6</sup> Socage tenure not of feudal origin.—I have avoided all discussion of merely historical statements for reasons already stated; but this question is of such fundamental importance that the student should not be left to accept Blackstone's conclusions without knowing the grounds on which modern thought differs from them.

Socage tenure, like all other forms of tenure, is of feudal origin (see note 1, ante, p. *59); but yet Blackstone's statement is misleading if it teaches that the relation between the farmers or tillers of the soil and their lords was formed on feudal models, and the example of other feudal states. In all the continental states the line between the feudal law and that of the commonalty, lehnrecht and landrecht, was so drawn as to exclude the tillers of the soil altogether, and confine the chivalry, the gentry, and their system, to those who were above all labor except that of military life. So far as feudalism is a system common to all European states, and distinct from primitive Germanic (or Roman) law, it is certain that these roturiers, ceorlas were excluded from it.

In England alone, by a remarkable exception, though not a solitary one, their lands came to be treated as fees, feuda, and subject to the same rules of law with those of the highest nobles. Instead of a lehnrecht for one class

§ 114. (1) Held of a superior lord.—In the first place, then, both were held of superior lords; of the king as lord paramount, and sometimes of a subject or mesne lord between the king and the tenant.

§ 115. (2) Services.—Both were subject to the feudal return, render, rent, or service of some sort or other, which arose from a supposition of an original grant from the lord to the ten-and landrecht for the other, such as we find in the Sachsenspiegel and other continental books, there was one law on real property for both classes. It is this more than aught else that has given to English law that permeating feudal character, which has been so often noticed by continental writers of late years, while comparing it with their own systems, and at the same time it is this which has saved England from the immense gulf between the nobility and commons, that intensified all the evils of feudalism, and finally brought on the French revolution of 1789. The restriction of the peerage or "nobility" as a rank to eldest sons; the union of knights of the shire and burgesses in the house of commons; even the persistent life and strength of the jury system can hardly be shown to have had more influence than this community of legal rights between the knight or baron and the yeoman or socman. In truth, no comparison or weighing of relative effects is of any value; all these phenomena are parts of a single movement, effects of a single cause.

But it would be misleading to think with Blackstone that this unity of military and socage tenures was a natural consequence of the feudal system. On the contrary, it was a marked exception to the rule, and our history shows it. The new light thrown by recent research on the obscure period of the early Norman and Angevin reigns confirms the inferences from Glanvill and Bracton. In the earlier writer the line of demarcation between the knight and socman is plain. Primogeniture is the privilege of the former. Gavelkind is not mentioned because it is the rule as to socmen all over England where no local customs prevented.

In the latter, less than a century after, the socman and knight are not yet subject to the same rules of descent and of estate, as in Littleton, but they are so nearly alike that the gavelkind tenure of Kent remains a marked exception to the common law. We see that in the interval of—say two generations—the feudalism introduced by the Red King, and his brother and nephew, has been greatly modified, and compelled to admit the socman to share its privileges; that the line has been drawn not between the gentleman and the roturier, shutting out the farmer, but between the freeman and the villein including the socmen in the privileged class; and that the franklin or socman has been admitted to feudal privileges, from which on the Continent he was jealously excluded. The rule that all feuds which were paid for, or based on mercenary considerations, were improper was characteristic of continental systems, but never was fully accepted in England.—HAMMOND.

ant. In the military tenure, or more proper feud, this was from its nature uncertain; in socage, which was a feud of the improper kind, it was certain, fixed, and determinate (though perhaps nothing more than bare fealty), and so continues to this day.

§ 116. (3) Fealty.—Both were, from their constitution, universally subject (over and above all other renders) to the oath of fealty, or mutual bond of obligation between the lord and tenant.<sup>r</sup> Which oath of fealty usually draws after it suit to the lord's court. And this oath every lord, of whom tenements are holden at this day, may and ought to call upon his tenants to take in his court-baron; if it be only for the reason given by Littleton,<sup>s</sup> that if it be neglected, it will by long continuance of time grow out of memory (as doubtless it frequently has) whether the land be holden of the lord or not; and so he may lose his seignior, and the profit which may accrue to him by escheats and other contingencies.<sup>t</sup>

§ 117. (4) Aids.—The tenure in socage was subject, of common right, to aids for knighting the son and marrying the eldest daughter:<sup>u</sup> [87] which were fixed by the statute Westm. 1, c. 36, at 20s. for every 20*l.* per annum so held; as in knight service. These aids, as in tenure by chivalry, were originally mere benevolences, though afterwards claimed as matter of right; but were all abolished by the statute 12 Car. II (1660).

§ 118. (5) Reliefs.—Relief is due upon socage tenure, as well as upon tenure in chivalry: but the manner of taking it is very different. The relief on a knight's fee was 5*l.* or one-quarter of the supposed value of the land; but a socage relief is one year's rent or render, payable by the tenant to the lord, be the same either great or small: * and therefore Bracton † will not allow this to be properly a relief, but quædam præstatio loco relevii in recognitionem domini (a certain payment of money instead of a relief as an acknowledgment of the lord). So, too, the statute 28 Edw. I, c. 1 (Confirmation of Great Charter, 1300), declares, that a free sokeman shall give no relief, but shall double his rent after the death of his ancestor, according to that which he hath used to pay his lord, and shall not be grieved above measure. Reliefs in knight service were only payable, if the heir at the death of his ancestor was of full age: but in socage they were due, even though the heir was under age, because the lord has no wardship over him. † The statute of Charles II reserves the reliefs incident to socage tenures; and therefore, wherever lands in fee simple are holden by a rent, relief is still due of common right upon the death of a tenant. ‡

§ 119. (6) Primer seisin.—Primer seisin was incident to the king's socage tenants in capite, as well as those by knight service. † But tenancy in capite as well as primer seisins, are also, among the other feudal burdens, entirely abolished by the statute.

§ 120. (7) Wardship.—Wardship is also incident to tenure in socage; but of a nature very different from that incident to knight service. For if the inheritance descend to an infant under fourteen, the wardship of him does not, nor never did, belong to the lord of the fee; because, in this tenure no military or [§§] other personal service being required, there was no occasion for the lord to take the profits, in order to provide a proper substitute for his infant tenant: but his nearest relation (to whom the inheritance cannot descend) shall be his guardian in socage, and have the custody of his land and body till he arrives at the age of fourteen. The guardian must be such a one, to whom the inheritance by no possibility can descend; as was fully explained, together with the reasons for it, in the former book of these Commentaries. † At fourteen this wardship in socage ceases; and the heir may oust the guardian, and call him to account for the rents and profits: ° for at this age the law supposes him capable of choosing a guardian for himself. It was in this particular, of wardship, as also in that of marriage, and in the certainty of the render or service, that the socage tenures had so much the advantage of the military ones. But as the wardship ceased at fourteen, there was this disadvantage attending it: that young heirs, being left at so tender an age to choose their own guardians till twenty-one, they might make an improvident choice. Therefore, when almost all the lands in the kingdom were turned into socage tenures, the same statute 12 Car. II, c. 24 (Military Tenures, 1660), enacted, that it should be in the power of any father by will to appoint a guardian, till his child should attain the age of twenty-one. And, if no such appointment be made, the court of chancery will frequently interpose, and name a guardian, to prevent an infant heir from improvidently exposing himself to ruin.

§ 121. (8) Marriage.—Marriage, or the valor maritaggi (value of the marriage), was not in socage tenure any perquisite or advantage to the guardian, but rather the reverse. For, if the guardian married his ward under the age of fourteen, he was bound to account to the ward for the value of the marriage, even though he took nothing for it, unless he married him to advantage.<sup>d</sup> For, the law, in favor of infants, is always jealous of guardians, and therefore in this case it made them account, not only for what they did, but also for what they might, receive on the infant's behalf; [89] lest by some collusion the guardian should have received the value, and not brought it to account; but, the statute having destroyed all values of marriages, this doctrine of course hath ceased with them. At fourteen years of age the ward might have disposed of himself in marriage, without any consent of his guardian, till the late act for preventing clandestine marriages. These doctrines of wardship and marriage in socage tenure were so diametrically opposite to those in knight service, and so entirely agree with those parts of King Edward's laws, that were restored by Henry the First's charter, as might alone convince us that socage was of a higher original than the Norman Conquest.<sup>8</sup>

§ 122. (9) Fines.—Fines for alienation were, I apprehend, due for lands holden of the king in capite by socage tenure, as well as in case of tenure by knight service: for the statutes that relate to this point, and Sir Edward Coke's comment on them,<sup>9</sup> speak generally of all tenants in capite, without making any distinction: though now all fines for alienation are demolished by the statute of Charles the Second.

§ 123. (10) Escheat.—Escheats are equally incident to tenure in socage, as they were to tenure by knight service; except only in gavelkind lands, which are (as is before mentioned) subject to no escheats for felony, though they are to escheats for want of heirs.<sup>10</sup>

Thus much for the two grand species of tenure, under which almost all the free lands of the kingdom were holden till the restoration in 1660, when the former was abolished and sunk into the latter: so that lands of both sorts are now holden by the one universal tenure of free and common socage.<sup>10</sup>

§ 124. Villeinage tenure.—The other grand division of tenure, mentioned by Bracton as cited in the preceding chapter, is that of villeinage, as contradistinguished from liberum tenementum, or frank tenure. And (this we may remember) he subdivides into two classes, pure and privileged, villeinage: from whence have arisen two other species of our modern tenures.<sup>11</sup>

• 1 Inst. 43. 2 Inst. 65, 66, 67.

<sup>9</sup> Disappearance of escheats.—The occurrence of escheat is now said to be rare; owing, partly, to the complete power of testamentary disposition which is enjoyed by all adult owners of fee simple estates, and partly to the abolition, by the Forfeiture Act of 1870, of the artificial form of escheat on conviction for felony. See 1 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 128.

<sup>11</sup> On villeinage, tenure in villeinage, and copyhold, see the authoritative book of Paul Vinogradoff, Villeinage in England; also, Williams, Real Property, Part III; Poll. & Maitl. Hist. Eng. Law.

§ 125. 1. Pure villeinage: copyhold.—<sup>[*0]</sup> From the tenure of pure villeinage have sprung our present copyhold tenures, or tenure by copy of court roll at the will of the lord: in order to obtain a clear idea of which it will be previously necessary to take a short view of the original and nature of manors.

§ 126. a. Manors.—Manors are in substance as ancient as the Saxon constitution, though perhaps differing a little, in some immaterial circumstances, from those that exist at this day: <sup>c</sup> just as we observed of feuds, that they were partly known to our ancestors, even before the Norman Conquest.<sup>12</sup> A manor, manerium, a man-endo (from remaining), because the usual residence of the owner, seems to have been a district of ground, held by lords or great personages; who kept in their own hands so much land as was necessary for the use of their families, which were called terræ dominicales, or demesne lands; being occupied by the lord, or dominus manerii (the lord of the manor), and his servants. The other, or tene-mental, lands they distributed among their tenants: which from the different modes of tenure were called and distinguished by two different names. First, book-land, or charter-land, which was held by deed under certain rents and free services, and in effect differed nothing from free socage lands:<sup>b</sup> and from hence have arisen most of the freehold tenants who hold of particular manors, and owe

<sup>12</sup> Origin and definition of manors.—Halsbury's Laws of England (VIII, 3) gives the following as the origin and definition of manors:

"Before the statute of 'Quia Emptores' (18 Edw. I, c. 1, 1290), when the king gave land to one of his subjects and his heirs to hold of the king and his heirs, and the subject, after selecting a portion thereof for his own particular occupation, parceled out the whole or the greater part of the residue to his subordinates to be held of him in return for certain services to be paid or rendered to him by such subordinates, the subject had what was subsequently called a manor. By the statute of 'Quia Emptores' the creation of new manors was rendered impossible, except by express statutory enactment or by the crown under a custom existing before the passing of that statute.

"The nearest approach to an authoritative definition of a manor, without being an exact definition, is, that it is the seisin of a defined district, with the power of subinfeudation therein, and the existence of freeholders holding of the manor, and the right to a court-baron, in which the feudatories are judges."

suit and service to the same. The other species was called folkland, which was held by no assurance in writing, but distributed among the common folk or people at the pleasure of the lord, and resumed at his discretion; being indeed land held in villeinage, which we shall presently describe more at large. The residue of the manor, being uncultivated, was termed the lord's waste, and served for public roads, and for common of pasture to the lord and his tenants. Manors were formerly called baronies, as they still are lordships: and each lord or baron was empowered to hold a domestic court, called the court-baron, for redressing misdemeanors and nuisances within the manor, and for settling disputes of property among the tenants. This court is an inseparable ingredient of every manor; and if the number [<sup>91</sup>] of suitors should so fail as not to leave sufficient to make a jury or homage, that is, two tenants at the least, the manor itself is lost.<sup>13</sup>

§ 127. b. Subinfeudation.—In the early times of our legal constitution, the king's greater barons, who had a large extent of territory held under the crown, granted out frequently smaller manors to inferior persons to be held of themselves; which do, therefore, now continue to be held under a superior lord, who is called in such cases the lord paramount over all these manors: and his seigniorship is frequently termed an honor, not a manor, especially if it hath belonged to an ancient feudal baron, or hath been at any time in the hands of the crown. In imitation whereof, these inferior lords began to carve out and grant to others still more minute estates, to be held as of themselves, and were so proceeding downwards in infinitum (without limit); till the superior lords observed, that by this method of subinfeudation they lost all their feudal profits, of wardships, marriages, and escheats, which fell into the hands of these mesne or middle lords, who were the immediate superiors of the terre-tenant, or him who occupied the land: and also that the mesne lords themselves were so impoverished thereby, that they were disabled from performing their services to their own superiors. This occasioned, first, that provision in the thirty-second chapter of magna carta, 9 Hen. III (1225), (which is not to be found in the first charter granted by that prince, nor in the great charter of King John<sup>14</sup>) that no man should either give or sell his land, without reserving sufficient to answer the demands of his lord; and, afterwards the statute of Westm. 3, or quia emptores, 18 Edw. I, c. 1 (1290), which directs, that, upon all sales or feoffments of land, the feoffee shall hold the same, not of his immediate feoffor, but of the chief lord of the fee, of whom such feoffor himself held it. But these provisions, not extending to the king's own tenants in capite, the like law concerning them is declared by the statutes of prerogativa regis, 17 Edw. II, c. 6 (1324), and of 34 Edw. III, c. 15 (Land, 1360), by which last all subinfeudations, previous to the reign of King<sup>[92]</sup> Edward I were confirmed: but all subsequent to that period were left open to the king's prerogative. And from hence it is clear, that all manors existing at this day, must have existed as early as King Edward the First: for it is essential to a manor that there be tenants who hold of the lord; and, by the operation of these statutes, no tenant in capite since the accession of that prince, and no tenant of a common lord since the statute of quia emptores, could create any new tenants to hold of himself.

§ 128. c. Folkland.—Now with regard to the folkland, or estates held in villeinage, this was a species of tenure neither

<sup>14</sup> Magna Carta (1217), c. 39, provided: "No freeman from henceforth shall give or sell any more of his land, but so that of the residue of the lands the lord of the fee may have the service due to him which belongeth to the fee." This was repeated in the charter of 9 Hen. III, c. 32 (1225), and amended by the statute Quia Emptores (1290). See Digby, Hist. Real Prop. (2d ed.), 133; Challis, Law Real Prop. (3d ed.), 19. Blackstone (289, post) is apparently right in considering that the words of the statute aim at subinfeudation, and not at alienation. Halsbury, 24 Laws of Eng. 143 n. strictly feudal, Norman, or Saxon; but mixed and compounded of them all:<sup>k</sup> and which also, on account of the heriots that usually attend it, may seem to have somewhat Danish in its composition. Under the Saxon government there were, as Sir William Temple speaks,<sup>l</sup> a sort of people in a condition of downright servitude, used and employed in the most servile works, and belonging, both they, their children, and effects, to the lord of the soil, like the rest of the cattle or stock upon it. These seem to have been those who held what was called the folkland, from which they were removable at the lord's pleasure. On the arrival of the Normans here, it seems not improbable that they, who were strangers to any other than a feudal state, might give some sparks of enfranchisement to such wretched persons as fell to their share, by admitting them, as well as others, to the oath of fealty; which conferred a right of protection, and raised the tenant to a kind of estate superior to downright slavery, but inferior to every other condition.<sup>m 15</sup> This they called villeinage, and the tenants villeins, either from the word vilis (vile), or else, as Sir Edward Coke tell us,<sup>n</sup> a villa (from a village); because they lived chiefly in villages, and were employed in rustic works of the most sordid kind: like the Spartan helotes, to whom alone the culture of the lands was consigned; their rugged masters, like our northern ancestors, esteeming war the only honorable employment of mankind.

§ 129. d. Villeins.—<sup>[93]</sup> These villeins, belonging principally to lords of manors, were either villeins regardant, that is, annexed to the manor or land: or else they were in gross, or at large, that is, annexed to the person of the lord, and transferable by deed from one owner to another.<sup>o</sup> They could not leave their lord without his permission; but, if they ran away, or were purloined from him, might be claimed and recovered by action like beasts or other chattels. They held, indeed, small portions of land by way of sustaining themselves and families; but it was at the mere will of the lord, who might dispossess them whenever he pleased; and it was upon villein services, that is, to carry out dung, to hedge and ditch the lords' demesnes, and any other the meanest offices:<sup>p</sup> and their services were not only base, but uncertain both as to their time and quantity.<sup>q</sup> A villein, in short, was in much the same state with us, as Lord Molesworth<sup>r</sup> describes to be that of the boors in Denmark, and Stiernhook<sup>s</sup> attributes also to the traals or slaves in Sweden; which confirms the probability of their being in some degree monuments of the Danish tyranny. A villein could acquire no property either in lands or goods: but, if he purchased either, the lord might enter upon them, oust the villein, and seize them to his own use, unless he contrived to dispose of them again before the lord had seized them; for the lord had then lost his opportunity.<sup>t</sup>

<sup>15</sup> This, though still the legal theory of the origin of the relationship of copyholder, cannot now be accepted as more than a legal fiction. Modern historians are practically unanimous in the view that copyholds represent a form of land ownership far older than feudal tenure; and that the claims of the lord were imposed upon a class previously established on the soil. The important legal fact, from which the legal theory is probably derived is, that until the end of the fifteenth century, the estate of the copyholder was not protected in the king's courts, but only in the manorial courts, and was, therefore, much at the mercy of the lord.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 132 n.

In many places, also, a fine was payable to the lord, if the villein presumed to marry his daughter to anyone without leave from the lord:<sup>u</sup> and, by the common law, the lord might also bring an action against the husband for damages in thus purloining his property.<sup>w</sup> For the children of villeins were also in the same state of bondage with their parents; (<sup>94</sup>) whence they were called in Latin, nativi, which gave rise to the female appellation of a villein, who was called a neife.<sup>x</sup> In case of a marriage between a freeman and a neife, or a villein and a freewoman, the issue followed the condition of the father, being free if he was free, and villein if he was villein; contrary to the maxim of the civil law, that partus sequitur ventrem (the offspring follows the condition of its mother). But no bastard could be born a villein, because by another maxim of our law he is nullius filius (the son of nobody); and as he can gain nothing by inheritance, it were hard that he should lose his natural freedom by it.<sup>7</sup> The law, however, protected the persons of villeins, as the king's subjects, against atrocious injuries of the lord: for he might not kill or maim his villein;<sup>8</sup> though he might beat him with impunity, since the villein had no action or remedy at law against his lord, but in case of the murder of his ancestor, or the maim of his own person. Neifes indeed had also an appeal of rape, in case the lord violated them by force.<sup>a</sup>

§ 130. (1) Enfranchisement of villeins.—Villeins might be enfranchised by manumission, which is either express or implied: express, as where a man granted to the villein a deed of manumission:<sup>b</sup> implied, as where a man bound himself in a bond to his villein for a sum of money, granted him an annuity by deed, or gave him an estate in fee, for life or years;<sup>c</sup> for this was dealing with his villein on the footing of a freeman, it was in some of the instances giving him an action against his lord, and in others, vesting an ownership in him entirely inconsistent with his former state of bondage. So, also, if the lord brought an action against his villein, this enfranchised him;<sup>d</sup> for, as the lord might have a short remedy against his villein, by seizing his goods (which was more than equivalent to any damages he could recover) the law, which is always ready to catch at anything in favor of liberty, presumed that by bringing this action he meant to set his villein on the same footing with himself, and therefore held it an implied [<sup>95</sup>] manumission. But, in case the lord indicted him for felony, it was otherwise; for the lord could not inflict a capital punishment on his villein, without calling in the assistance of the law.

ground on their lords; and in particular strengthened the tenure of their estates to that degree, that they came to have in them an interest in many places full as good, in others better than their lords. For the good nature and benevolence of many lords of manors having, time out of mind, permitted their villeins and their children to enjoy their possessions without interruption, in a regular course of descent, the common law, of which custom is the life, now gave them title to prescribe against their lords; and, on performance of the same services, to hold their lands in spite of any determination of the lord's will. For, though in general they are still said to hold their estates at the will of the lord, yet it is such a will as is agreeable to the custom of the manor; which customs are preserved and evidenced by the rolls of the several courts-baron in which they are entered, or kept on foot by the constant immemorial usage of the several manors in which the lands lie. And, as such tenants had nothing to show for their estates, but these customs and admissions in pursuance of them, entered on those rolls, or the copies of such entries witnessed by the steward, they now began to be called tenants by copy of court roll, and their tenure itself a copyhold.<sup>o</sup>

§ 132. (3) Disappearance of villeins.—Thus copyhold tenures, as Sir Edward Coke observes,<sup>f</sup> although very meanly descended, yet come of an ancient house; for, from what has been premised, it appears that copyholders are in truth no other but villeins, who, by a long series of immemorial encroachments on the lord, have at last established a customary right to those estates, which before were held absolutely at the lord's will.<sup>16</sup> Which affords [96] a very

<sup>16</sup> History of copyholds.—It is not very difficult to form a reasonable conception of the early history of copyholds. Positive proof we can hardly expect, as our authorities are very scanty for the first century after Domesday, and we have hardly any detailed records in the shape of court rolls and accounts for another century after that. Unfortunately the whole subject has in modern times been confused by the ambiguous use of words. The meaning of the old villanus, which was at first no less honorable a name than our yeoman, became degraded after the Conquest, and both in Latin and in the French form villein it was used to stand for nativus, with which it properly had nothing to do. The old customary tenure by labor-rents was still called villeinage, and thus substantial reason for the great variety of customs that prevail in different manors, with regard both to the descent of the estates and the privileges belonging to the tenants. And these encroachments grew to be so universal, that when tenure in villeinage was virtually abolished (though copyholds were reserved), by the statute of Charles II, there was hardly a pure villein left in the nation. For Sir Thomas Smith<sup>2</sup> testifies that in all his time (and he was secretary to Edward VI) he never knew any villein in gross throughout the realm; and the few villeins regardant that were then remaining were such only as had belonged to bishops, monasteries, or other ecclesiastical corporations, in the preceding times the customary tenants and the bondmen became completely mixed up in the apprehension of modern text-writers. Mediæval lawyers, no doubt, strove to be accurate with this awkward nomenclature. When they meant nativus, they spoke in express terms of a 'villein by blood.' They were careful to distinguish the old or privileged villeinage, which was really a free though more or less onerous tenure, from the villeinage of base and uncertain tenure, and again to distinguish the service due in respect of the land from the personal condition of the holder. But in later times these things were overlooked, and the result was the popular account of copyholds: namely, that (in Blackstone's language) 'copyholders are in truth no other than villeins, who by a long series of immemorial encroachments on the lord have at last established a customary right to those estates which before were held absolutely at the lord's will': villeins being understood as villeins by blood or nativi. It would be nearer the truth to say that by a long series of encroachments and fictions the lords, and lawyers acting in the interest of the lords, got people to believe that the lord's will was the origin of those ancient customary rights which before were absolute. When we have once shaken off the false theory of Blackstone (I say of Blackstone, for I cannot find that anybody stated it so positively before him), the nature of existing copyhold customs is really enough by itself to carry conviction of their great antiquity. Of this kind is the custom of "borough-English," or, as it is more expressively called in some parts, "cradle-holding," by which the course of descent is neither to the eldest son as at common law, nor to all equally as in the old tenure of gavelkind which still subsists in Kent, but to the youngest son exclusively. Such a rule of descent is very difficult to account for. But the difficulty we now have in understanding it is some proof that it comes down from a forgotten condition of society; and the fact that it was so deeply rooted as to survive the Norman Conquest seems to show that it was ancient then. Similar customs are found in various parts of Europe, and in some cases have been kept up in modern times in spite of the modern law taking no account of them. Probably the explanation is that there of popery. For he tells us that "the holy fathers, monks and friars had in their confessions, and especially in their extreme and deadly sickness, convinced the laity how dangerous a practice it was for one Christian man to hold another in bondage; so that temporal men by little and little, by reason of that terror in their consciences, were glad to manumit all their villeins. But the said holy fathers, with the abbots and priors, did not in like sort by theirs; for they also had a scruple in conscience to impoverish and despoil the church so much as to manumit such as were bond to their churches, or to the manors which the church had gotten; and so kept their villeins still." By these several means the generality of villeins in the kingdom have long ago sprouted up into copyholders; their persons being enfranchised by manumission or long acquiescence; but their estates, in strictness, remaining subject to the same servile conditions and forfeitures as before; though, in general, the villein services are usually commuted for a small pecuniary quit-rent.<sup>b</sup>

§ 133. e. Incidents of copyhold.—[97] As a further consequence of what has been premised, we may collect these two main was a time when each son of a family as he came of age was entitled to an allotment out of common land. Thus the sons in turn parted off from the family and were provided for, and the homestead was left for the youngest. Such a state of things is actually recorded in the old Welsh laws. It might be inferred that the custom as found in England is of Welsh origin, and is in fact a primitive usage which has survived not only the Norman but the English Conquest. In that case, however, we should expect to find it prevalent not in the south and center, but in the west and southwest of England. Whatever account may be given of particular customs, we need have no fear in saying that the modern copyholders are the historical successors of the Old English free landholders who had inheritable titles according to local custom, evidenced not by writing but by the witness of the neighbors, and paid dues and services originally to the state or community, and afterwards to a lord.—POLLOCK, Land Laws, 46.

principles which are held<sup>1</sup> to be the supporters of the copyhold tenure, and without which it cannot exist; 1. That the lands be parcel of, and situate within that manor, under which it is held. 2. That they have been demised, or demisable, by copy of court roll immemorially. For immemorial custom is the life of all tenures by copy; so that no new copyhold can, strictly speaking, be granted at this day.<sup>17</sup>

In some manors, where the custom hath been to permit the heir to succeed the ancestor in his tenure, the estates are styled copyholds of inheritance; in others, where the lords have been more vigilant to maintain their rights, they remain copyholds for life only; for the custom of the manor has in both cases so far superseded the will of the lord, that, provided the services be performed or stipulated for by fealty, he cannot, in the first instance, refuse to admit the heir of his tenant upon his death; nor in the second, can he remove his present tenant so long as he lives, though he holds nominally by the precarious tenure of his lord's will.

The fruits and appendages of a copyhold tenure, that it hath in common with free tenures, are fealty, services (as well in rents as otherwise), reliefs, and escheats. The two latter belong only to copyholds of inheritance; the former to those for life also. But besides these, copyholds have also heriots, wardship, and fines. Heriots, which I think are agreed to be a Danish custom, and of which we shall say more hereafter, are a render of the best beast or other good (as the custom may be) to the lord on the death of the tenant. This is plainly a relic of villein tenure; there being originally less hardship in it, when all the goods and chattels belonged to the lord, and he might have seized them even in the villein's lifetime. These are incident to both species of copyhold; but wardship and fines to those of inheritance only. Wardship, [98] in copyhold estates, partakes both of that in chivalry and that in socage. Like that in chivalry, the lord is the legal guardian; who usually assigns some relation of the infant tenant to act in his stead: and he, like guardian in socage, is accountable to his ward for the profits. Of fines, some are in the nature of primer seisins, due on the death of each tenant, others are mere fines for alienation of the lands; in some manors only one of these sorts can be demanded, in some both, and in others neither. They are sometimes arbitrary and at the will of the lord, sometimes fixed by custom; but, even when arbitrary, the courts of law, in favor of the liberty of copyholders have tied them down to be reasonable in their extent; otherwise they might amount to a disherison of the estate. No fine, therefore, is allowed to be taken upon descents and alienations (unless in particular circumstances) of more than two years improved value of the estate.<sup>* 18</sup> From this instance we may judge of the favorable disposition that the law of England (which is a law of liberty) hath always shown to this species of tenants; by removing, as far as possible, every real badge of slavery from them, however some nominal ones may continue. It suffered custom very early to get the better of the express terms upon which they held their lands; by declaring that the will of the lord was to be interpreted by the custom of the manor; and where no custom has been suffered to grow up to the prejudice of the lord, as in this case of arbitrary fines, the law itself interposes in an equitable method, and will not suffer the lord to extend his power so far as to disinherit the tenant.

<sup>17</sup> Copyhold Act of 1894.—Under the Copyhold Act of 1894, section 81, when a custom of the manor allows the grant of new copyholds, such grant cannot now be made without the consent of the Board of Agriculture; and when so made, the land ceases to be of copyhold tenure, and is vested in the grantee as in free and common socage.

Thus much for the ancient tenure of pure villeinage, and the modern one of copyhold at the will of the lord, which is lineally descended from it.

§ 134. 2. Privileged villeinage, or villeinage socage.—There is yet a fourth species of tenure, described by Bracton under the name sometimes of privileged villeinage, and sometimes of villein socage. This he tells us,<sup>1</sup> is such as has been held of the kings of England from the Conquest (99) downwards; that the tenants

<sup>18</sup> In Fraser v. Mason, [1883] 10 Q. B. D. 398, it was held that a lord, who is entitled by the custom of the manor to a reasonable fine upon admission to a copyhold tenement may demand and recover such fine by the description of three years' improved annual value of the tenement.

herein "villana faciunt servitia, sed certa et determinata (they perform villein services, but certain and fixed); that they cannot alien or transfer their tenements by grant or feoffment, any more than pure villeins can; but must surrender them to the lord or his steward, to be again granted out and held in villeinage. And from these circumstances we may collect, that what he here describes is no other than an exalted species of copyhold, subsisting at this day, viz., the tenure in ancient demesne; to which, as partaking of the baseness of villeinage in the nature of its services, and the freedom of socage in their certainty, he has therefore given a name compounded out of both, and calls it villanum socagium.

§ 135. a. Ancient demesne.—Ancient demesne consists of those lands or manors, which, though now perhaps granted out to private subjects, were actually in the hands of the crown in the time of Edward the Confessor, or William the Conqueror; and so appear to have been by the great survey in the exchequer called Domesday-book.<sup>m</sup> The tenants of these lands, under the crown, were not all of the same order or degree. Some of them, as Britton testifies,<sup>n</sup> continued for a long time pure and absolute villeins, dependent on the will of the lord: and those who have succeeded them in their tenures now differ from common copyholders in only a few points.<sup>o</sup> Others were in great measure enfranchised by the royal favor: being only bound in respect of their lands to perform some of the better sort of villein services, but those determinate and certain; as, to plow the king's land for so many days, to supply his court with such a quantity of provisions, and the like; all of which are now changed into pecuniary rents: and in consideration hereof they had many immunities and privileges granted to them;<sup>p</sup> as, to try the right of their property in a peculiar court of their own, called a court of ancient demesne, by a peculiar process denominated a writ of right close:<sup>q</sup> not to pay toll or taxes;<sup>19</sup> not to contribute to the expenses of knights of the shire; not to be put on juries, and the like.<sup>r20</sup>

§ 136. b. Services of the tenants.—<sup>[100]</sup> These tenants, therefore, though their tenure be absolutely copyhold, yet have an interest equivalent to a freehold: for, though their services were of a base and villein original,<sup>s</sup> yet the tenants were esteemed in all other respects to be highly privileged villeins; and especially for that their services were fixed and determinate, and that they could not be compelled (like pure villeins) to relinquish these tenements at the lord's will, or to hold them against their own: "et ideo, says Bracton, dicuntur liberi (and therefore they are called free)."<sup>t</sup> Britton also, from such their freedom, calls them absolutely sokemans, and their tenure sokemanries; which he describes<sup>u</sup> to be "lands and tenements, which are not held by knight service, nor by grand serjeanty, nor by petit, but by simple services, being as it were lands enfranchised by the king or his predecessors from their ancient demesne." And the same name is also given them in Fleta.<sup>v</sup> Hence Fitzherbert observes,<sup>w</sup> that no lands are ancient demesne, but lands holden in socage: that is, not in free and common socage, but in this amphibious, subordinate class, of villein

<sup>20</sup> Ancient demesne.—Manors of ancient demesne, that is, manors which belonged to the crown in the time of Edward the Confessor or William I, may include freehold, customary freehold, and copyhold tenants. The freehold tenants are known as tenants in ancient demesne, and formerly they were entitled to certain immunities, and they could only sue and be sued in respect of their tenements by action in the lord's court—the court of ancient demesne—commenced by writ of right close. But the immunities are obsolete, and this local procedure has been abolished. Consequently tenure in ancient demesne has ceased to be of practical importance, though in ancient demesne manors, as elsewhere, it may still be necessary to distinguish between freeholds and customary freeholds or privileged copyholds, and to ascertain the customs affecting either kind of holding.—HALSBURY, 24 Laws of England, 150.

<sup>21</sup> In Merttens v. Hill, [1901] 1 Ch. 842, it was held that in the case of tenants in ancient demesne, the freehold is in the tenant, not in the lord. The tenants in question represented socmen mentioned in the Domesday Book, who were called free tenants in very early documents.

socage. And it is possible, that as this species of socage tenure is plainly founded upon predial services, or services of the plow, it may have given cause to imagine that all socage tenures arose from the same original for want of distinguishing, with Bracton, between free socage or socage of frank-tenure, and villein socage or socage of ancient demesne.

§ 137. c. Character of the tenure.—Lands holden by this tenure are therefore a species of copyhold, and as such preserved and exempted from the operation of the statute of Charles II. Yet they differ from common copyholds, principally in the privileges before mentioned, as also they differ from freeholders by one especial mark and tincture of villeinage, noted by Bracton and remaining to this day; viz., that they cannot be conveyed from man to man by the general common-law conveyances of feoffment, and the rest; but must pass by surrender to the lord or his steward, in the manner of common copyholds: [101] yet with this difference,<sup>2</sup> that, in the surrender of these lands in ancient demesne, it is not used to say “to hold at the will of the lord” in their copies, but only “to hold according to the custom of the manor.”<sup>22</sup>

Thus have we taken a compendious view of the principal and fundamental points of the doctrine of tenures, both ancient and modern, in which we cannot but remark the mutual connection and dependence that all of them have upon each other. And upon the whole it appears that, whatever changes and alterations these tenures have in process of time undergone, from the Saxon era to the 12 Car. II (1660), all lay tenures are now in effect reduced to two species; free tenure in common socage, and base tenure by copy of court roll.

I mentioned lay tenures only; because there is still behind one other species of tenure, reserved by the statute of Charles II, which is of a spiritual nature, and called the tenure in frankalmoigne.

<sup>22</sup> This “privileged copyhold” or “villein socage” seems to have been regarded by Coke as “copyhold of frank tenure,” that is to say, of freehold tenure. This was contested by Blackstone (Law Tracts, 220), and in accordance with his argument the view has since prevailed that, while there is a freehold interest in the tenant, he has no freehold tenure.—HALSBURY, 24 Laws of England, 149 n.

§ 138. Tenure in frankalmoigne.—Tenure in frankalmoigne, in libera eleemosyna, or free alms, is that, whereby a religious corporation, aggregate or sole, holdeth lands of the donor to them and their successors forever.<sup>7</sup> The service which they were bound to render for these lands was not certainly defined: but only in general to pray for the souls of the donor and his heirs, dead or alive; and therefore they did no fealty (which is incident to all other services but this<sup>8</sup>) because this divine service was of a higher and more exalted nature.<sup>a</sup> This is the tenure, by which almost all the ancient monasteries and religious houses held their lands; and by which the parochial clergy, and very many ecclesiastical and eleemosynary foundations, hold them at this day;<sup>b</sup> the nature of the service being upon the Reformation altered, and made conformable to the purer doctrines [102] of the church of England. It was an old Saxon tenure; and continued under the Norman revolution, through the great respect that was shown to religion and religious men in ancient times. Which is also the reason that tenants in frankalmoigne were discharged of all other services, except the trinoda necessitas (threefold necessity), of repairing the highways, building castles, and repelling invasions:<sup>c</sup> just as the Druids, among the ancient Britons, had omnium rerum immunitatem (exemption from all offices).<sup>d</sup> And, even at present, this is a tenure of a nature very distinct from all others; being not in the least feudal, but merely spiritual. For if the service be neglected, the law gives no remedy by distress or otherwise to the lord of whom the lands are holden; but merely a complaint to the ordinary or visitor to correct it.<sup>e</sup> Wherein it materially differs from what was called tenure by divine service: in which the tenants were obliged to do some special divine services in certain; as to sing so many masses, to distribute such a sum in alms, and the like; which, being expressly defined and prescribed, could with no kind of propriety be called free alms; especially as for this, if unperformed, the lord might distrain, without any complaint to the visitor.<sup>f</sup> All such donations are indeed now out of use: for, since the statute of quia

OF FREEHOLD ESTATES OF INHERITANCE.

§ 139. Estates.—The next objects of our disquisitions are the nature and properties of estates. An estate in lands, tenements and hereditaments, signifies such interest as the tenant hath therein; so that if a man grants all his estate in Dale to A and his heirs, everything that he can possibly grant shall pass thereby.<sup>a</sup> It is called in Latin, status; it signifying the condition, or circumstance, in which the owner stands, with regard to his property.<sup>1</sup> And, to ascertain this with proper precision and accuracy, estates may be considered in a threefold view: first, with regard to the quantity of interest which the tenant has in the tenement: secondly, with regard to the time at which that quantity of interest is to be enjoyed: and, thirdly, with regard to the number and connections of the tenants.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Conception of "estate."—The conception of an "estate" in lands is a peculiar characteristic of English law. It is regarded, as has been seen, as an interest falling short of complete ownership, but capable of differences in extent or duration. Thus where an interest is given to A for life, and after his death to B for life, and after his death to C in fee, all these interests are regarded as estates, varying in duration or extent, and in the time of their coming into possession or enjoyment. The interest or right passes at once to the successive grantees. The grantor is regarded, not as parting with the whole ownership to A, with a proviso that after A's death it is to go to B, and after B's death to C, but as carving out of his estate two smaller interests or estates, and then as having still the fee simple or inheritance to give away, the grant of which exhausts all the interest in the lands which he has to bestow, which yet does not amount to the complete ownership of the land. Thus the fee simple is regarded as the largest estate—the nearest approach to absolute ownership—which the law recognizes; an estate-tail, an estate for life, an estate for years are regarded as smaller or shorter interests, which cannot exist without the fee simple at the same time residing in some person other than him who has the smaller or "particular" estate.—DIGBY, Hist. Real Prop. (5th ed.), 309.

<sup>2</sup> Meaning and kinds of estates.—It must therefore be carefully distinguished from the modern use of the term by which "estate" is made to signify the property itself, the object of ownership. It is in this colloquial sense that we speak of real estate and personal. Lands, tenements, and hereditaments are real estate. Personal estate is also a general term consisting of two species,

First, with regard to the quantity of interest which the tenant has in the tenement, this is measured by its duration and extent. Thus, either his right of possession is to subsist for an uncertain period, during his own life, or the life of another man; to determine at his own decease, or to remain to his descendants after him: or it is circumscribed within a certain number of years, months, or days: or, lastly, it is infinite and unlimited, being vested in him and his representatives forever. And this occasions the primary division of [104] estates, into such as are freehold, and such as are less than freehold.

chattels real and chattels personal. The species "chattel real" is so called, not because it is a real estate, but because it has a real extraction. The word "estate" thus comprehends both freehold and chattel, as well real as personal. (Countess of Bridgewater v. Duke of Bolton, 6 Mod. 107, 87 Eng. Reprint, 866.) Strictly taken, "estate importeth the interest which a man has in lands." (Comyn.) It is his right to the land in a concrete form. In the older books it is sometimes defined as "time in the land, or land for a time." (Walsingham's Case, Plow. 555; 1 Cruise, tit. 1, § 11; Wharton on Conveyancing, pp. 8, 11.) But that is only because the time for which property is to be enjoyed furnishes a convenient measure or mark of the quantity or extent of right which the party enjoys in it. For as a man who owns the fee simple may do as he pleases with the land, not only for his own life, but also during that practically unlimited period, during which by legal presumption the lives of heirs may extend, to the remotest generation, he must necessarily have the power to do many acts which are forbidden to him who holds for life only, and is therefore bound, at no distant day, to hand over the property to the next owner in as good condition as he received it. This is very plainly seen in the English books, where the rights which the holder of any estate may exercise over the property are distinctly enumerated, and are seen to increase or diminish in exact proportion to the length of time during which the estate may possibly last: e. g., Wharton on Conveyancing. Here in the United States we have practically reduced the number of estates to three or four, but the powers of different holders are as truly measured by the same rule as ever.

An estate in land, therefore, may be described as the sum or legal measure of the rights which each owner of property, whether his ownership be complete or partial, may exercise over the close in question. Now, it is evident that these rights will depend on several independent circumstances, and consequently, estates may be classified in several different ways, beside the three enumerated by Blackstone.

The most important of these are as follows:—

First. The quantity of estates is another name for their duration, or the time during which they may possibly last, not only in itself, but as measuring § 140. 1. Estates of freehold.—An estate of freehold, liberum tenementum, or frank-tenement, is defined by Britton<sup>b</sup> to be “the possession of the soil by a freeman.” And St. Germyn<sup>c</sup> tells us, that “the possession of the land is called in the law of England the frank-tenement or freehold.” Such estate, therefore, and no other, as requires actual possession of the land, is, legally speaking, freehold: which actual possession can, by the course of the

the present amount of power which may be exercised over it. The division of estates in quantity is given by Blackstone in this chapter.

For our purposes the only classes deserving special attention are (a) fee simple; (b) estate for life, of one's self or of another; these two being both included under the term “freehold”; (c) estate for years; (d) estate at will, or from year to year, or by the month, week, etc.

Secondly. The quality of an estate is a term used by some writers to designate two different elements of the right, which Blackstone and others treat separately, viz., the time of enjoyment, and number of tenants.

The time of enjoyment is to be carefully distinguished from the time of duration or quantity. It denotes the time at which the enjoyment is to commence, and the only natural division is, of course, between estates already in possession, and estates still in expectancy. But as these last differ in some respects as to the manner of their creation, we have here three; (a) estates in possession (the normal form); (b) estates in remainder; (c) estates in reversion (b and c being in expectancy).

Thirdly. A man may have an estate either in the whole of a close, or in any undivided fraction of it. This of itself we now regard as naturally a distinction rather in the object of the right, than in the nature of the right. But the common law had a peculiar view of joint tenancy, and generally of this subject, derived from its doctrine of seisin, etc. All the co-owners of a close were regarded as constituting, so to speak, a single owner of a peculiar kind, and as the circumstances of the co-ownership varied, there were several kinds of it, with important distinctions in their mutual rights. You will find these enumerated in chapter 12, as known to the common law.

The only ones of importance to us are (a) severalty, the usual and normal form; (b) joint tenancy, including that in entirety; (c) tenancy in common, with which coparcenary is now identified; (d) tenancy in partnership. This last is entirely unknown to the common law, where it was in common, but is rapidly becoming a well-recognized distinct estate, especially in equity.

Fourthly. Any estate may be made to commence or to terminate, or to be enlarged upon the happening of a contingent event, and we have a division of estates into (a) absolute (the normal form); (b) conditional.

Fifthly. The distinction of law and equity has led to a classification peculiar to our law, between the estates which are recognized alike by all courts and common law, be only given by the ceremony called livery of seisin, which is the same as the feudal investiture.<sup>3</sup> And from these principles we may extract this description of a freehold; that it is such an estate in lands as is conveyed by livery of seisin; or, in tenements of an incorporeal nature, by what is equivalent thereto. And accordingly it is laid down by Littleton,<sup>4</sup> that where a freehold shall pass, it behooveth to have livery of seisin. As, therefore, estates of inheritance and estates for life could not by common law be conveyed without livery of seisin, these are properly estates of freehold; and, as no other estates were conveyed with the same solemnity, therefore no others are properly freehold estates.

in all kinds of action, and those which lack the formalities of a legal estate, and are recognized only in equity. Thus the purchaser of property who has not yet got his deed, but has gone into possession, or acquired in any way specific rights, is regarded in equity as being already possessed of just such an estate as he will have at law when the transaction is complete. This distinction is of much less importance with us than in England, because nearly all our courts take notice of equitable as well as legal titles, and because under our codes an equitable title may usually be set up even in an action at law. Still it has many important applications, and estates are therefore divided into (a) legal; (b) equitable.

There is also a distinction in the books between executed and executory estates, but it belongs more to title than it does to estate, and so far as it has any importance here, it is equivalent to the distinction between legal and equitable estates. (See 1 Washburn, c. 1, pl. 41.)

The five classes above given are independent of each other. No one of them is a subdivision of any other. Every estate must belong to each of the five classes, so that they are not mutually exclusive, but the divisions under each class are mutually exclusive; i. e., any estate found in one division under a given class will not be found in any other division of the same class.

As these classes are independent of each other, the position in one will not determine the position in another. This is so legally, though practically there are reasons why certain combinations do not exist.—HAMMOND.

<sup>3</sup> Livery of seisin and grant.—In the United States, the delivery of a deed of conveyance is regarded now as equivalent to livery of seisin, and vests the estate conveyed in the grantee without other solemnity. It also estops the grantor, and all claiming under him, or by subsequent grant from him, to deny the former grantee's title, which of itself would be sufficient to make actual delivery of possession needless. (Parsons, C. J., in Proprietor of Kennebeck Purchase v. Springer, 4 Mass. 416, 3 Am. Dec. 227; Gilliam v. Bird, 30 N. C. 280, 49 Am. Dec. 379; 3 Washburn on Real Property, 160 or *494; Schwall-

§ 141. a. Estates of inheritance.—Estates of freehold, then, are divisible into estates of inheritance, and estates not of inheritance. The former are again divided into inheritances absolute or fee simple; and inheritances limited, one species of which we usually call fee-tail.

§ 142. (1) Fee-simple estates.—Tenant in fee simple (or, as he is frequently styled, tenant in fee) is he that hath lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to hold to him and his heirs forever; generally, absolutely, and simply; without mentioning what heirs, but referring that to his own pleasure, or to the disposition of the law.<sup>4</sup> The true meaning of the word “fee” (feodum) is the same with that of feud or fief, and in its original sense it is [105] taken in contradistinction to allodium,<sup>2</sup> which latter the writers on this back v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 69 Wis. 292, 2 Am. St. Rep. 740, 34 N. W. 128.)

In England, since 1845, by statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, section 2, the common form of conveyance is a grant which conveys the seisin without the help of livery; depending for its effect on the provision of that statute, which enacted that after October 1, 1845, all corporeal tenements and hereditaments should, as regards the conveyance of the immediate freehold thereof, be deemed to lie in grant as well as livery. The reference to the freehold is not a limitation of the effect, since reversions and remainders always passed by grant. But the word “grant” is not necessary for either corporeal or incorporeal; “convey” or other words of same meaning do as well. (Conveyancing Act of 1881, § 49.)

If we say that by general custom in the United States the same is true here, semble, that it will state the law more accurately than any amount of learned speculation on the operation of our deeds, either by the common law of England or by the statute of uses.—HAMMOND.

4 Tenant in fee simple.—Fee simple is an estate of perpetuity, and confers unlimited power of alienation, and no person is capable of having a greater estate or interest in the land. Every restraint upon alienation is inconsistent with the nature of a fee simple; and if a partial restraint be annexed to a fee, as a condition not to alien for a limited time, or not to a particular person, it ceases to be a fee simple and becomes a fee subject to a condition. (4 Kent, 5; 1 Washburn, c. 3, pl. 45–47.) A condition absolutely prohibiting alienation of an estate in fee simple is held to be repugnant to the grant, and therefore void. (Large’s Case, 2 Leon. 82, 74 Eng. Reprint, 376; Ide v. Ide, 5 Mass. 500; Blackstone Bank v. Davis, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 42, 32 Am. Dec. 241; Hall v. Tufts, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 455; Attwater v. Attwater, 18 Beav. 330, 52

subject define to be every man's own land, which he possesseth merely in his own right, without owing any rent or service to any superior. This is property in its highest degree; and the owner thereof hath absolutum et directum dominium (the absolute and direct ownership), and therefore is said to be seised thereof absolutely in dominico suo, in his own demesne. But feodum or fee, is that which is held of some superior, on condition of rendering him service; in which superior the ultimate property of the land resides. And therefore Sir Henry Spelman<sup>g</sup> defines a feud or fee to be the right which the vassal or tenant hath in lands, to use the same, and take the profits thereof to him and his heirs, rendering to the lord his due services; the mere allodial propriety of the soil always remaining in the lord. This allodial property no subject in England has;<sup>h</sup> it being a received, and now undeniable, principle

Although the owner in fee simple has an absolute power of controlling his property, and can do what he pleases with it, generally speaking, there is one very important limitation upon this power.

He cannot change the state's law of descent, e. g., he cannot make it descend to sons only. All he can do is to give it, or rather to give particular estates in it, to specified individuals during a limited period. He can give it to whom he pleases for life, or for years, with a remainder over to the grantee's oldest son, or to any other individual, whether existing or not, if properly specified and limited.

In this case, of course, no person can change the disposition made of it, until the last remainderman entitled to take comes into being and into possession of the estate.

Formerly many attempts were made by ingenious limitations to keep the property in this condition for many generations. (4 Kent, 271-281; Deane, 224, 225, and post as to remainders.) It is evident that this would change the law of the state so far as this particular property was concerned, by substituting for a fee simple an endless succession of life estates. To prevent the evils growing out of such settlements, statutes in regard to perpetuities have been passed. The main object of all of them is to secure the falling back of the property into the hands of an owner in fee simple within a reasonable time, which varies in the different states.—HAMMOND.

Blackstone's explanation of an estate in fee simple is that a tenant in fee simple holds to him and his heirs forever, generally, absolutely and simply, in the law, that all the lands in England are holden mediately or immediately of the king. The king, therefore, only hath absolutum et directum dominium:<sup>1</sup> but all subjects' lands are in the nature of feodum or fee; whether derived to them by descent from their ancestors, or purchased for a valuable consideration: for they cannot come to any man by either of those ways, unless accompanied with those feudal clogs, which were laid upon the first feudatory when it was originally granted. A subject, therefore, hath only the usufruct, and not the absolute property of the soil; or, as Sir Edward Coke expresses it,<sup>2</sup> he hath dominium utile, but not dominium directum. And hence it is that, in the most solemn acts of law, we express the strongest and highest estate that any subject can have, by these words; "he is seised thereof in his demesne, as of fee." It is a man's demesne, dominicum, or property, since it belongs to him and his heirs forever: yet this dominicum, property, or demesne, is strictly not absolute or allodial, but qualified or feudal: it is his demesne, as of fee; that is, it is not purely and simply his own, since it is held of a superior lord, in whom the ultimate property resides.

[106] This is the primary sense and acceptation of the word "fee." But (as Sir Martin Wright very justly observes<sup>1</sup>) the doctrine, "that all lands are holden," having been for so many without mentioning what heirs, but referring that to his own pleasure, or the disposition of the law (2 Bl. Comm. 104. See, however, 3 Bl. Comm. 224, where the correct account is given). But the idea of nominating an heir to succeed to the inheritance has no place in the English law, however it might have obtained in the Roman jurisprudence. The heir is always appointed by the law, the maxim being Solus Deus hæredem facere potest, non homo (1 Reeve's Hist. Eng. Law, 105; Co. Litt. 191 a, n. (1), vi, 3); and all other persons, whom a tenant in fee simple may please to appoint as his successors, are not his heirs but his assigns. Thus, a purchaser from him in his lifetime, and a devisee under his will, are alike assigns in law, claiming in opposition to and in exclusion of the heir who would otherwise have become entitled (Hogan v. Jackson, 1 Cowp. 305 [98 Eng Reprint, 1096]; Co. Litt. 191 a, n. (1), vi, 10).—WILLIAMS, Real Prop. (21st ed.), 75.

ages a fixed and undeniable axiom, our English lawyers do very rarely (of late years especially) use the word “fee” in this its primary original sense, in contradistinction to allodium or absolute property, with which they have no concern; but generally use it to express the continuance or quantity of estate. A fee, therefore, in general, signifies an estate of inheritance; being the highest and most extensive interest that a man can have in a feud: and, when the term is used simply, without any other adjunct, or has the adjunct of simple annexed to it (as a fee, or a fee simple) it is used in contradistinction to a fee conditional at the common law, or a fee-tail by the statute; importing an absolute inheritance, clear of any condition, limitation, or restrictions to particular heirs, but descendible to the heirs general, whether male or female, lineal or collateral. And in no other sense than this is the king said to be seised in fee, he being the feudatory of no man.<sup>m</sup>

Taking, therefore, fee for the future, unless where otherwise explained, in this its secondary sense, as a state of inheritance, it is applicable to, and may be had in, any kind of hereditaments either corporeal or incorporeal.<sup>n</sup> But there is this distinction between the two species of hereditaments; that, of a corporeal inheritance a man shall be said to be seised in his demesne, as of fee; of an incorporeal one he shall only be said to be seised as of fee, and not in his demesne.<sup>o</sup> For, as incorporeal hereditaments are in

5 Demesne and dominion.—The distinction here made is more accurate than that upon page 105, where the king’s dominium is opposed to the subject’s dominium or demesne. Closely as the two words are connected in origin and etymology, they have quite different meanings in English law. To say that the owner of property “hath absolutum et directum dominium, and therefore is said to be seised thereof absolutely in dominico suo in his own demesne,” is to confound these different meanings. Blackstone and Houard both make this mistake; but a glance at Bracton or Fleta should have saved them from it. These always use dominium in the Roman sense, which is appropriate to the king’s ownership: but dominium in one characteristic of the tenant rather than the lord—pro repugnantia inter dominicum et dominium quæ sese non their nature collateral to, and issue out of, lands and houses,<sup>p</sup> their owner hath no property, dominicum, or demesne, in the thing itself, but hath only something derived out of it; resembling the servitudes, or services, of the civil law.<sup>q</sup> The dominicum or property is frequently [107] in one man, while the appendage or service is in another. Thus Gaius may be seised as of fee, of a way going over the land, of which Titius is seised in his demesne as of fee.

The distinction of dominium and dominicum is brought out very clearly here, and also the connection of dominium and homagium. The lord has dominium over the land of which others are tenants, and takes homage from them. Such lands may fall to him by escheat, but never as heir, for the latter would suppose him to be in the same estate with his tenant—a legal absurdity. But dominicum is the land which he occupies by himself—or through base tenants who have no distinct estate—cum homagium expellat dominicum et retineat servitium (Bracton, fol. 24 a); i. e., the reception of homage is a recognition of the fact that the lord has not the freehold or demesne, but only a seignory, to which service is incident. Even if he had previously held the land in dominico, this would be true. The homage accepted is equivalent to an investiture, and places it in the hands of the tenant.

The absence of investiture and the creation of tenancy by a mutual act of lord and tenant is one of the most significant points of difference between the feudal law of England and that of the Continent. In some of the forms, the tenant in the very act of performing homage, informs the lord of his claim, and implies that he has received seisin already by the preceding tenant, his feoffor. This would be impossible under continental feudalism, or with an English copyhold tenant. The dominicum or demesne of our early law is a term peculiar, I believe, to English law. It denotes primarily that land which the thane or lord held in his own hands and cultivated for the support of his own household, usually by the labor of unfree tenants. It was gradually extended to embrace all land of which the freehold was in him; but never to land held by free tenants of which he only had the services. The freehold or demesne of these lands was in the free tenants themselves. Hence the limitation of the word to corporeal hereditaments, as here stated by Blackstone. Incorporeal, like easements, rents, seignories, are mere jura in re, and the denial to these of seisin in demesne is correctly explained here by Blackstone. See, also, the instructive definition in Termes de la Ley, verb. Demaines.—HAMMOND.

§ 143. (a) Different interests in the same land.—The fee simple or inheritance of lands and tenements is generally vested and resides in some person or other; though divers inferior estates may be carved out of it. As if one grants a lease for twenty-one years, or for one or two lives, the fee simple remains vested in him and his heirs; and after the determination of those years or lives, the land reverts to the grantor or his heirs, who shall hold it again in fee simple. Yet sometimes the fee may be in abeyance, that is (as the word signifies) in expectation, remembrance, and contemplation in law; there being no person in esse (being), in whom it can vest and abide: though the law considers it as always potentially existing, and ready to vest whenever a proper owner appears. Thus, in a grant to John for life, and afterwards to the heirs of Richard, the inheritance is plainly neither granted to John nor Richard, nor can it vest in the heirs of Richard till his death, nam nemo est hæres viventis (for no one is heir of a living person): it remains, therefore, in waiting, or abeyance, during the life of Richard.<sup>r</sup> This is likewise always the case of a parson of a church, who hath only an estate therein for the term of his life; and the inheritance remains in abeyance.<sup>s</sup> And not only the fee, but the freehold also, may be in abeyance; as, when a parson dies, the freehold of his glebe is in abeyance, until a successor be named, and then it vests in the successor.<sup>t</sup>

strued strictly, lest anyone be presumed to have given more than is expressed in the donation)." And therefore, as the personal abilities of the donee were originally supposed to be the only inducements to the gift, the donee's estate in the land extended only to his own person, and subsisted no longer than his life; unless the donor by an express provision in the grant, gave it a longer continuance, and extended it also to his heirs. But this rule is now softened by many exceptions.'

§ 145. (c) When word "heirs" not necessary.—For, 1. It does not extend to devises by will; in which as they were introduced at the time when the feudal rigor was apace wearing out, a more liberal construction is allowed: and therefore by a devise to a man forever, or to one and his assigns forever, or to one in fee simple, the devisee hath an estate of inheritance; for the intention of the devisor is sufficiently plain from the words of perpetuity annexed, though he hath omitted the legal words of inheritance. But if the devise be to a man and his assigns, without annexing words of perpetuity, there the devisee shall take only an estate for life; for it does not appear that the devisor intended any more. 2. Neither does this rule extend to fines or recoveries, considered as a species of conveyance; for thereby an estate in fee passes by act and operation of law without the word "heirs": as it does also for particular reasons, by certain other methods of conveyance, which have relation to a former grant or estate, wherein the word "heirs" was expressed.<sup>2</sup> 3. In creations of nobility by writ, the peer so created hath an inheritance in his title, without expressing the word "heirs"; for they are implied in the creation, unless it be otherwise specially provided: but in creations by patent, which are stricti juris (of strict right), the word "heirs" must be inserted, otherwise there is no inheritance. 4. In grants of lands to sole corporations and their successors, the word "successors" supplies the place of "heirs"; for as heirs take from the ancestor, so doth the successor from the predecessor. Nay, in [109] a grant to a bishop, or other sole spiritual corporation, in frankalmoigne; the word "frankalmoigne" supplies the place of "successors" (as the word "successors" supplies the place of "heirs") ex vi termini (by force of the term); and in all these cases a fee simple vests in such sole corporation. But in a grant of lands to a corporation aggregate, the word "successors" is not necessary, though usually inserted: for, albeit such simple grant be strictly only an estate for life, yet, as that corporation never dies, such estate for life is perpetual, or equivalent to a fee simple, and therefore the law allows it to be one.<sup>a</sup> Lastly, in the case of the king, a fee simple will vest in him, without the word "heirs" or "successors" in the grant; partly from prerogative royal and partly from a reason similar to the last, because the king in judgment of law, never dies.<sup>b</sup> But the general rule is, that the word "heirs" is necessary to create an estate of inheritance.<sup>6</sup>

§ 146. (2) Limited fees.—We are next to consider limited fees, or such estates of inheritance as are clogged and confined with conditions, or qualifications, of any sort. And these we may divide into two sorts: 1. Qualified, or base fees: and 2. Fees conditional, so called at the common law; and afterwards fees-tail, in consequence of the statute de donis (of gifts).

§ 147. (a) Base or qualified fees.—A base, or qualified, fee is such a one as has a qualification subjoined thereto, and which must be determined whenever the qualification annexed to it is at an end.<sup>7</sup> As, in the case of a grant to A and his heirs, tenants of the manor of Dale; in this instance, whenever the heirs of A cease

<sup>6</sup> It is no longer necessary in a conveyance of a fee simple by deed to use the exact words "and his heirs." It may be expressed "in fee simple." Conveyancing Act, 1881. And in wills, by the Wills Act, 1837, it is a presumption of law that every devise of real estate passes the whole interest of the testator.

<sup>7</sup> Base fees.—The commonest case of a base fee is that which arises where a tenant in tail in remainder executes and enrolls a disentailing deed in conformity with the provisions of the Fines and Recoveries Act, 3 & 4 Will. IV, c. 74, but without getting the consent of the tenant for life in possession, the "protector" of the settlement. The deed operates to bar the rights of the issue of the tenant in tail, but not those of the remaindermen, and the grantee under the deed thus gets a fee simple determinable upon the failure of heritable issue of the former tenant in tail. This base fee may be enlarged by the former tenant in tail into a fee simple by the same method by which an estate-tail is to be tenants of that manor, the grant is entirely defeated. So, when Henry VI granted to John Talbot, lord of the manor of Kingston-Lisle in Berks, that he and his heirs, lords of the said manor, should be peers of the realm, by the title of Barons of Lisle; here John Talbot had a base or qualified fee in that dignity;<sup>c</sup> and the instant he or his heirs quitted the seigniorship of this manor, the dignity was at an end. This [110] estate is a fee, because by possibility it may endure forever in a man and his heirs; yet as that duration depends upon the concurrence of collateral circumstances, which qualify and debase the purity of the donation, it is therefore a qualified or base fee.

barred, the consent of the “protector” (if any) being requisite.—2 Ency. Laws of England, 129.

The curious kind of estate created by the conveyance in fee simple of a tenant in tail not in possession, without the concurrence of the owners of estates preceding his own, is called a base fee. Though uncommon, it is not unknown in practice; and it has been used by George Eliot in Felix Holt, with great effect and with perfect correctness, as part of the machinery of the plot; inasmuch that conveyancers reading the novel have been known to lament seriously, as if the thing had happened to one of their own clients, that the parties did not take better advice.—POLLOCK, Land Laws, 110 n.

“It is true, the estate here may not endure forever; it may be terminated by the failure to use and employ the rights and easements granted in the manner prescribed in the grant; but if they shall be so used and employed the grant is forever. And this seems to meet Blackstone’s definition of a qualified or base fee.” Wiggins Ferry Co. v. Ohio & M. Ry. Co., 94 Ill. 83, 93.

“The estate created by the conveyance in this case is not properly an estate on condition either precedent or subsequent. It is not an estate on a condition precedent, upon the performance of which the estate would become absolute and indefeasible. Nor is it an estate on condition subsequent, by the nonperformance of which the estate already vested may be defeated. But it is a base or qualified fee. This estate is a fee, because by possibility it may endure forever; yet as that duration depends upon the concurrence of collateral circumstances, which qualify and debase the purity of the donation, it is therefore a qualified or base fee. 2 Bl. Comm. 109.” Kilpatrick v. Graves, 51 Miss. 432, 443.

hæredibus quibusdam a successione exclusis (a strict and limited donation; as to certain heirs, others being excluded from the succession)”: as to the heirs of a man’s body, by which only his lineal descendants were admitted in exclusion of collateral heirs; or, to the heirs male of his body, in exclusion both of collaterals and lineal females also. It was called a conditional fee, by reason of the condition expressed or implied in the donation of it, that if the donee died without such particular heirs, the land should revert to the donor. For this was a condition annexed by law to all grants whatsoever, that on failure of the heirs specified in the grant, the grant should be at an end, and the land return to its ancient proprietor.* Such conditional fees were strictly agreeable to the nature of feuds, when they first ceased to be mere estates for life, and were not yet arrived to be absolute estates in fee simple. And we find strong traces of these limited, conditional fees, which could not be alienated from the lineage of the first purchaser in our earliest Saxon laws.†‡

§ 149. (i) The old law of conditional fees.—Now, with regard to the condition annexed to these fees by the common law, our ancestors held that such a gift (to a man and the heirs of his body) was a gift upon condition that it should revert to the donor, if the donee had no heirs of his body; but if he had, it should then remain to the donee. They therefore called it a fee simple, on condition

† Si quis terram hæreditariam habeat, eam non vendat a cognatis hæredibus suis, si illi viro prohibitum sit, qui eam ab initio acquisivit, ut ita facere nequeat. (He who possesses an hereditary estate may not, by sale, deprive his heirs by consanguinity of it, if he be prohibited from so doing by him who first acquired the land.) LL. Ælfred. c. 37.

‡ Fees conditional.—There is no doubt much resemblance between fee-tail and the “boeland” of the Saxon period, when limited to the kin of the first taker, as in the law of Alfred here cited: c. 41 of the A. S. texts, cited as c. 37 of the Latin version in note f of the author.

But the resemblance must not be mistaken for identity. The “fee” of the later common law is entirely a different institution from any of the earlier forms of hereditary land, alod, erbeigen, yrfe, hæreditas, proprium, or however it might be called, on the Continent or in England. Only error and fallacies result from confusing them or supposing any genetic relation between them.—HAMMOND.

that he had issue. Now, we must observe that when any condition is performed, it is thenceforth entirely gone; and the thing to which it was before annexed, becomes absolute <sup>[111]</sup> and wholly unconditional. So that, as soon as the grantee had any issue born, his estate was supposed to become absolute by the performance of the condition; at least, for these three purposes: 1. To enable the tenant to alien the land, and thereby to bar not only his own issue, but also the donor of his interest in the reversion.<sup>g</sup> 2. To subject him to forfeit it for treason: which he could not do, till issue born, longer than for his own life; lest thereby the inheritance of the issue, and reversion of the donor, might have been defeated.<sup>h</sup> 3. To empower him to charge the land with rents, commons, and certain other encumbrances, so as to bind his issue.<sup>i</sup> And this was thought the more reasonable because, by the birth of issue, the possibility of the donor's reversion was rendered more distant and precarious; and his interest seems to have been the only one which the law, as it then stood, was solicitous to protect; without much regard to the right of succession intended to be vested in the issue. However, if the tenant did not in fact alien the land, the course of descent was not altered by this performance of the condition; for if the issue had afterwards died, and then the tenant, or original grantee, had died, without making any alienation; the land, by the terms of the donation, could descend to none but the heirs of his body, and, therefore, in default of them, must have reverted to the donor. For which reason, in order to subject the lands to the ordinary course of descent, the donees of these conditional fee simples took care to alien as soon as they had performed the condition by having issue; and afterwards repurchased the lands, which gave them a fee-simple absolute, that would descend to the heirs general, according to the course of the common law. And thus stood the old law with regard to conditional fees; which things, says Sir Edward Coke,<sup>k</sup> though they seem ancient, are yet necessary to be known; as well for the declaring how the common law stood in such cases, as for the sake of annuities, and such like inheritances, as are not within the statutes of entail, and therefore remain as at the common law.

§ 150. (ii) The statute de donis.—<sup>[112]</sup> The inconveniences, which attended these limited and fettered inheritances, were probably what induced the judges to give way to this subtle finesse of construction (for such it undoubtedly was), in order to shorten the duration of these conditional estates. But, on the other hand, the nobility, who were willing to perpetuate their possessions in their own families, to put a stop to this practice, procured the statute of Westminster the Second<sup>1</sup> (commonly called the statute de donis conditionalibus—of conditional gifts) to be made; which paid a greater regard to the private will and intentions of the donor, than to the propriety of such intentions, or any public considerations whatsoever. This statute revived in some sort the ancient feudal restraints which were originally laid on alienations, by enacting, that from thenceforth the will of the donor be observed; and that the tenements so given (to a man and the heirs of his body) should at all events go to the issue, if there were any; or, if none, should revert to the donor.

§ 151. (iii) Fee-tail and reversion.—Upon the construction of this act of parliament, the judges determined that the donee had no longer a conditional fee simple, which became absolute and at his own disposal, the instant any issue was born; but they divided the estate into two parts, leaving in the donee a new kind of particular estate, which they denominated a fee-tail;<sup>m</sup> and vesting in the donor the ultimate fee simple of the land, expectant on the failure of issue; which expectant estate is what we now call a reversion.<sup>n</sup> And hence it is that Littleton tells us,<sup>o</sup> that tenant in fee-tail is by virtue of the statute of Westminster the Second.

§ 152. (iv) What may be entailed.—Having thus shown the original of estates-tail, I now proceed to consider, what things may, or may not, be entailed <sup>[113]</sup> under the statute de donis. Tene- ments is the only word used in the statute: and this Sir Edward Coke<sup>p</sup> expounds to comprehend all corporeal hereditaments whatsoever; and also all incorporeal hereditaments which savor of the realty, that is, which issue out of corporeal ones, or which concern, or are annexed to, or may be exercised within the same; as, rents, estovers, commons, and the like. Also offices and dignities, which concern lands, or have relation to fixed and certain places, may be entailed.<sup>q</sup> But mere personal chattels, which savor not at all of the realty, cannot be entailed. Neither can an office, which merely relates to such personal chattels; nor an annuity, which charges only the person, and not the lands, of the grantor. But in these last, if granted to a man and the heirs of his body, the grantee hath still a fee conditional at common law, as before the statute: and by his alienation may bar the heir or reversioner.<sup>r</sup> An estate to a man and his heirs for another's life cannot be entailed;<sup>s</sup> for this is strictly no estate of inheritance (as will appear hereafter), and therefore not within the statute de donis. Neither can a copyhold estate be entailed by virtue of the statute; for that would tend to encroach upon and restrain the will of the lord: but, by the special custom of the manor, a copyhold may be limited to the heirs of the body;<sup>t</sup> for here the custom ascertains and interprets the lord's will.

<sup>m</sup> The expression, fee-tail, or feodum talliatum, was borrowed from the feudists (See Crag. l. 1. t. 10. § 24, 25); among whom it signified any mutilated or truncated inheritance, from which the heirs general were cut off; being derived from the barbarous verb taliare, to cut: from which the French tailler and the Italian tagliare are formed. (Spelm. Gloss. 531.)

§ 153. (v) Species of estates-tail.—Next, as to the several species of estates-tail, and how they are respectively created. Estates-tail are either general, or special.

§ 154. (aa) Tail-general.—Tail-general is where lands and tenements are given to one, and the heirs of his body begotten; which is called tail-general, because, how often soever such donee in tail be married, his issue in general by all and every such marriage is, in successive order, capable of inheriting the estate-tail, per formam doni (by the form of the gift).<sup>u</sup>

§ 155. (bb) Tail-special.—Tenant in tail-special is where the gift is restrained to certain heirs of the donee's body, and does not go to all of them in general. And this may happen [114] several ways.<sup>w</sup> I shall instance in only one; as where lands and tenements are given to a man and the heirs of his body, on Mary his now wife to be begotten: here no issue can inherit, but such special issue as is engendered between them two; not such as the husband may have by another wife: and therefore it is called special tail. And here we may observe, that the words of inheritance (to him and his heirs) give him an estate in fee; but they being heirs to be by him begotten, this makes it a fee-tail; and the person being also limited, on whom such heirs shall be begotten (viz., Mary his present wife), this makes it a fee-tail special.

§ 156. (cc) Tail male and tail female.—Estates, in general and special tail, are further diversified by the distinction of sexes in such entails; for both of them may either be in tail male or tail female. As if lands be given to a man, and his heirs male of his body begotten, this is an estate in tail male general; but if to a man and the heirs female of his body on his present wife begotten, this is an estate in tail female special. And, in case of an entail male, the heirs female shall never inherit, nor any derived from them;
nor e converso (on the other hand), the heirs male, in case of a gift in tail female.<sup>x</sup> Thus, if the donee in tail male hath a daughter, who dies leaving a son, such grandson in this case cannot inherit the estate-tail; for he cannot deduce his descent wholly by heirs male.<sup>y</sup> And as the heir male must convey his descent wholly by males, so must the heir female wholly by females. And therefore if a man hath two estates-tail, the one in tail male, the other in tail female; and he hath issue a daughter, which daughter hath issue a son; this grandson can succeed to neither of the estates:
for he cannot convey his descent wholly either in the male or female

<sup>9</sup> It should be particularly noticed by the student that it is not possible to limit an estate in fee simple to the heirs of a particular sex. Thus, a conveyance by deed to A "and his heirs male" would give A an ordinary fee simple, descendible to all his heirs in due order. And though, doubtless, such an expression in a will would not be entirely ineffective, effect would only be given to it by assuming that the testator meant to devise, not a fee simple restricted to male heirs, but an estate in tail male.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 153.

§ 157. (vi) Words necessary to make an entail.—As the word “heirs” is necessary to create a fee, so in further imitation of the strictness of the feudal donation, the word body, or some other words of procreation, are necessary to make it a fee-tail, and ascertain to what heirs in particular [115] the fee is limited. If, therefore, either the words of inheritance or words of procreation be omitted, albeit the others are inserted in the grant, this will not make an estate-tail. As, if the grant be to a man and his issue of his body, to a man and his seed, to a man and his children, or offspring; all these are only estates for life, there wanting the words of inheritance, his heirs.<sup>a</sup> So, on the other hand, a gift to a man, and his heirs male, or female, is an estate in fee simple, and not in fee-tail; for there are no words to ascertain the body out of which they shall issue.<sup>b</sup> Indeed, in last wills and testaments, wherein greater indulgence is allowed, an estate-tail may be created by a devise to a man and his seed, or to a man and his heirs male; or by other irregular modes of expression.<sup>c 10</sup>

§ 158. (vii) Frank-marriage.—There is still another species of entailed estates, now indeed grown out of use, yet still capable of subsisting in law; which are estates in libero maritagio, or frank-marriage. These are defined<sup>d</sup> to be, where tenements are given by one man to another, together with a wife, who is the daughter or cousin of the donor, to hold in frank-marriage. Now, by such gift, though nothing but the word “frank-marriage” is expressed, the donees shall have the tenements to them, and the heirs of their two bodies begotten; that is, they are tenants in special tail. For this one word, frank-marriage, does ex vi termini (by force of the term) not only create an inheritance, like the word frankalmoigne, but likewise limits that inheritance; supplying not only words of descent, but of procreation also. Such donees in frank-marriage are liable to no service but fealty; for a rent reserved thereon is void, until the fourth degree of consanguinity be past between the issues of the donor and donee.<sup>e 1†</sup>

§ 159. (viii) Incidents of tenancy in tail.—The incidents to a tenancy in tail, under the statute Westm. 2, are chiefly these.<sup>f</sup>

1. That a tenant in tail may commit waste on the estate-tail, by selling timber, pulling <sup>[116]</sup> down houses, or the like, without being impeached, or called to account, for the same.
2. That the wife of the tenant in tail shall have her dower, or thirds, of the estate-tail.
3. That the husband of a female tenant in tail may be tenant by the curtesy of the estate-tail.
4. That an estate may be barred, or destroyed by a fine, by a common recovery, or by lineal warranty descending with assets to the heir. All which will hereafter be explained at large.

§ 160. (ix) Evils of estates-tail.—Thus much for the nature of estates-tail: the establishment of which family law (as it is properly styled by Pigott<sup>g</sup>) occasioned infinite difficulties and disputes.<sup>h</sup> Children grew disobedient when they knew they could not be set aside: farmers were ousted of their leases made by tenants in tail; for, if such leases had been valid, then under color of long leases the issue might have been virtually disinherited: creditors were defrauded of their debts; for, if tenant in tail could have charged his estate with their payment, he might also have defeated his issue, by mortgaging it for as much as it was worth: innumerable latent entails were produced to deprive purchasers of the lands they had fairly bought; of suits in consequence of which our ancient books are full: and treasons were encouraged; as estates-tail were not liable to forfeiture, longer than for the tenant's life. So that they were justly branded, as the source of new contentions, and mischiefs unknown to the common law; and almost universally considered as the common grievance of the realm.<sup>i</sup> But as the nobility were always fond of this statute (De Donis), because it preserved their family estates from forfeiture, there was little hope of procuring a repeal by the legislature; and therefore, by the connivance of an active and politic prince, a method was devised to evade it.

§ 161. (x) Common recoveries.—About two hundred years intervened between the making of the statute de donis (1285), and the application of common recoveries to this intent, in the twelfth year of Edward IV (1472): which were then openly declared by the judges to be a sufficient [117] bar of an estate-tail.<sup>k</sup> For though the courts had, so long before as the reign of Edward III (1326–1377), very frequently hinted their opinion that a bar might be effected upon these principles,<sup>l</sup> yet it never was carried into execution; till Edward IV observing<sup>m</sup> (in the disputes between the houses of York and Lancaster) how little effect attainders for treason had<sup>n</sup> on families, whose estates were protected by the sanctuary of entails, gave his countenance to this proceeding, and suffered Taltarum's case to be brought before the court:<sup>a</sup> wherein, in consequence of the principles then laid down, it was in effect determined, that a common recovery suffered by tenant in tail should be an effectual destruction thereof.<sup>12</sup> What common recoveries are, both in their nature and consequences, and why they are allowed to be a bar to the estate-tail, must be reserved to a subsequent inquiry. At present I shall only say, that they are fictitious proceedings, introduced by a kind of pia fraus (pious fraud), to elude the statute de donis, which was found so intolerably mischievous, and which yet one branch of the legislature would not then consent to repeal: and, that these recoveries, however clandestinely begun, are now become by long use and acqui-

§ 162. (xi) Statute of treason (1534).—This expedient having greatly abridged estates-tail with regard to their duration, others were soon invented to strip them of other privileges. The next that was attacked was their freedom from forfeitures for treason. For, notwithstanding the large advances made by recoveries, in the compass of about threescore years, towards unfettering these inheritances, and thereby subjecting the lands to forfeiture, the rapacious prince then reigning, finding them frequently [118] resettled in a similar manner to suit the convenience of families, had address enough to procure a statute,<sup>p</sup> whereby all estates of inheritance (under which general words estates-tail were covertly included) are declared to be forfeited to the king upon any conviction of high treason.

§ 163. (xii) Statutes of leases (1540) and fines (1540).—The next attack which they suffered in order of time was by the statute 32 Hen. VIII, c. 28 (Leaseholds, 1540), whereby certain leases made by tenants in tail, which do not tend to the prejudice of the issue, were allowed to be good in law, and to bind the issue in tail. But they received a more violent blow, in the same session of parliament, by the construction put upon the statute of fines,<sup>q</sup> by the statute 32 Hen. VIII, c. 36 (Fines, 1540), which declares a fine duly levied by tenant in tail to be a complete bar to him and his heirs, and all other persons, claiming under such entail. This was evidently agreeable to the intention of Henry VII, whose policy it was (before common recoveries had obtained their full strength and authority) to lay the road as open as possible to the alienation of landed property, in order to weaken the overgrown power of his nobles. But as they, from the opposite reasons, were not easily brought to consent to such a provision, it was therefore couched, in his act, under covert and obscure expressions. And the judges, though willing to construe that statute as favorably as possible for the defeating of entailed estates, yet hesitated at giving fines so extensive a power by mere implication, when the statute de donis had expressly declared, that they should not be a bar to estates-tail. But the statute of Henry VIII, when the doctrine of alienation was better received, and the will of the prince more implicitly obeyed than before, avowed and established that intention.

§ 164. (xiii) Exceptions in favor of the crown.—Yet, in order to preserve the property of the crown from any danger of infringement, all estates-tail created by the crown, and of which the crown has the reversion, are excepted out of this statute. And the same was done with regard to common recoveries, by the statute 34 and 35 Hen. VIII, c. 20 (Fines and Recoveries, 1542), which enacts that no feigned recovery had against tenants in tail where the estate was created by the [119] crown,<sup>r</sup> and the remainder or reversion continues still in the crown, shall be of any force and effect. Which is allowing, indirectly and collaterally, their full force and effect with respect to ordinary estates-tail, where the royal prerogative is not concerned.

Lastly, by a statute of the succeeding year,<sup>s</sup> all estates-tail are rendered liable to be charged for payment of debts due to the king by record or special contract; as since, by the bankrupt laws,<sup>t</sup> they are also subjected to be sold for the debts contracted by a bankrupt. And, by the construction put on the statute 43 Eliz., c. 4

§ 165. (xiv) Resulting condition of estates-tail.— Estates-tail, being thus by degrees unfettered, are now reduced again to almost the same state, even before issue born, as conditional fees were in at common law, after the condition was performed, by the birth of issue. For, first, the tenant in tail is now enabled to alien his lands and tenements by fine, by recovery, or by certain other means; and thereby to defeat the interest as well of his own issue, though unborn, as also of the reversioner, except in the case of the crown: secondly, he is now liable to forfeit them for high treason: and, lastly, he may charge them with reasonable leases, and also with such of his debts as are due to the crown on specialties, or have been contracted with his fellow-subjects in a course of extensive commerce.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>14</sup> Distinction between conditional estates and estates upon condition.— The chief differences between an estate-tail and an estate in fee simple are in fact only these, that the tenant in tail cannot dispose of any interest by will, and that, in order to bind his issue and the remainderman, he must use the forms provided by the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, hereafter to be explained.

In conclusion, the student must be warned against confusing the conditional estates treated of in this chapter with the estates upon condition dealt with in a later chapter of this work. The difference between the two classes of interests may appear to him arbitrary and technical. But at one time it was of great importance; and even now it is not without practical results. A conditional estate is regarded as being, in its origin, of a more limited character than an absolute or unqualified interest. Consequently, it comes to an end of itself on the happening of the condition. An estate upon condition, on the other hand, is regarded as being absolute in its creation, but liable to be suddenly terminated by an external event which occasions a forfeiture. And, inasmuch as no one need enforce a forfeiture, and only certain persons can enforce it, the consequence of a breach of condition is not always, as we shall see, the termination of the estate. (For recent examples of the importance of the distinction between a conditional estate (or limitation) and an estate upon condition, see Re Wagstaff, [1908] 1 Ch. 162; and Re Leach, [1912] 2 Ch. 422, where a conditional fee simple, determinable on the bankruptcy of the donee, was apparently held to be good.)—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 157.

OF FREEHOLDS, NOT OF INHERITANCE.

§ 166. Two kinds of estates for life.—We are next to discourse of such estates of freehold as are not of inheritance, but for life only. And of these estates for life, some are conventional, or expressly created by the acts of the parties; others merely legal, or created by construction and operation of law.<sup>a</sup> We will consider them both in their order.

§ 167. 1. Conventional estates for life.—Estates for life, expressly created by deed or grant (which alone are properly conventional), are where a lease is made of lands or tenements to a man, to hold for the term of his own life, or for that of any other person, or for more lives than one: in any of which cases he is styled tenant for life; only, when he holds the estate by the life of another, he is usually called tenant pur auter vie (for the life of another).<sup>b</sup> These estates for life are, like inheritances, of a feudal nature; and were, for some time, the highest estate that any man could have in a feud, which (as we have before seen<sup>c</sup>) was not in its original hereditary. They are given or conferred by the same feudal rights and solemnities, the same investiture or livery of seisin, as fees themselves are; and they are held by fealty, if demanded, and such conventional rents and services as the lord or lessor, and his tenant or lessee, have agreed on.

life of the grantee;<sup>o</sup> in case the grantor hath authority to make such a grant: for an estate for a man's own life is more beneficial and of a higher nature than for any other life; and the rule of law is, that all grants are to be taken most strongly against the grantor,<sup>i</sup> unless in the case of the king.

§ 169. b. Conditional life estates.—Such estates for life will, generally speaking, endure as long as the life for which they are granted: but there are some estates for life, which may determine upon future contingencies, before the life, for which they are created, expires. As, if an estate be granted to a woman during her widowhood, or to a man until he be promoted to a benefice; in these, and similar cases, whenever the contingency happens, when the widow marries, or when the grantee obtains a benefice, the respective estates are absolutely determined and gone.<sup>q</sup> Yet, while they subsist, they are reckoned estates for life; because, the time for which they will endure being uncertain, they may by possibility last for life, if the contingencies upon which they are to determine do not sooner happen. And, moreover, in case an estate be granted to a man for his life, generally, it may also determine by his civil death: as if he enters into a monastery, whereby he is dead in law:<sup>h</sup> for which reason in conveyances the grant is usually made “for the term of a man's natural life”; which can only determine by his natural death.<sup>l</sup>

§ 170. c. Incidents of estates for life.—[122] The incidents to an estate for life are principally the following; which are applicable not only to that species of tenants for life, which are expressly created by deed; but also to those, which are created by act and operation of law.

§ 171. (1) Estovers or botes.—Every tenant for life, unless restrained by covenant or agreement, may of common right take upon the land demised to him reasonable estovers<sup>k</sup> or botes.<sup>11</sup> For he hath a right to the full enjoyment and use of the land, and all its profits, during his estate therein. But he is not permitted to cut down timber or do other waste upon the premises:<sup>m</sup> for the destruction of such things, as are not the temporary profits of the tenement, is not necessary for the tenant's complete enjoyment of his estate; but tends to the permanent and lasting loss of the person entitled to the inheritance.<sup>2</sup>

§ 172. (2) Emblements.—Tenant for life, or his representatives, shall not be prejudiced by any sudden determination of his estate, because such a determination is contingent and uncertain.<sup>n</sup> Therefore, if a tenant for his own life sows the lands, and dies before harvest, his executors shall have the emblements, or profits of the crop: for the estate was determined by the act of God; and it is a maxim in the law, that actus Dei nemini facit injuriam (the act of God injures no man). The representatives, therefore, of the tenant for life shall have the emblements, to compensate for the labor and expense of tilling, manuring, and sowing the lands; and also for the encouragement of husbandry, which being a public benefit, tending to the increase and plenty of provisions, ought to have the utmost security and privilege that the law can give it. Wherefore by the feudal law, if a tenant for life died between the beginning of September and the end of February, the lord, who was entitled to the reversion, was also entitled to the profits of the whole year: but, if he died between the beginning of March and the end [123] of August, the heirs of the tenant received the whole.<sup>o</sup> From hence our law of emblements seems to have been derived, but with very considerable improvements. So it is also, if a man be tenant for the life of another, and cestui que vie, or he on whose life the land is held, dies after the corn sown, the tenant pur auter vie (for the life of another) shall have the emblements. The same is also the rule, if a life estate be determined by the act of law. Therefore, if a lease be made to husband and wife during coverture (which gives them a determinable estate for life), and the husband sows the land, and afterwards they are divorced a vinculo matrimonii (from the bond of matrimony), the husband shall have the emblements in this case; for the sentence of divorce is the act of law.<sup>p</sup> But if an estate for life be determined by the tenants own act (as, by forfeiture for waste committed; or, if a tenant during widowhood thinks proper to marry), in these, and similar cases, the tenants, having thus determined the estate by their own acts, shall not be entitled to take the emblements.<sup>q</sup> The doctrine of emblements extends not only to corn sown, but to roots planted, or other annual artificial profit, but it is otherwise of fruit-trees, grass, and the like; which are not planted annually at the expense and labor of the tenant, but are either a permanent, or natural, profit of the earth.<sup>r</sup> For even when a man plants a tree, he cannot be presumed to plant it in contemplation of any present profit; but merely with a prospect of its being useful to future successions of tenants. The advantages also of emblements are particularly extended to the parochial clergy by the statute

<sup>2</sup> Liability for waste.—But every tenant for life is, in the absence of authority, answerable for waste, that is, for any spoil or destruction which he does to the premises during his tenancy, to the injury of the person entitled to the inheritance in reversion or in remainder. There are two kinds of waste, voluntary and permissive; the former by the tenant's voluntary act, as where he pulls down a wall, or cuts down timber, the latter by his default, as by suffering a wall to fall down for want of repairs. The ordinary tenant for life is not responsible for permissive waste. But the person on whom the enjoyment of a leasehold interest is settled for his life must, probably, as between himself and the persons entitled to the capital, submit to bear the cost of performing the covenants of the lease; though, unless the lease is legally vested in him, he can be under no personal liability to the lessor. Estates for life are sometimes limited, however, with a clause expressing that the tenant shall hold the land without impeachment of waste; the effect of which formerly was, that he was not liable to an action for waste of either kind, whether voluntary or permissive. But, even in such a case, a court of equity would, formerly, have interfered to restrain the felling of ornamental timber or other like unwarrantable and gratuitous injury to the inheritance; although such acts might not be legal waste at all. And now, by the Judicature Act, 1873, it is expressly provided that an estate for life, without impeachment of waste, shall not confer on the tenant for life any legal right to commit waste of the description known as "equitable waste"; unless an intention to confer such right shall expressly appear by the instrument creating the estate. Such a tenant, and, a fortiori, an ordinary tenant for life, is, therefore, presumably liable to an action for damages if he commits equitable waste.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 161.

28 Hen. VIII, c. 11 (First-fruits, 1536). For all persons, who are presented to any ecclesiastical benefice, or to any civil office, are considered as tenants for their own lives, unless the contrary be expressed in the form of donation.

§ 173. (3) Rights of subtenants.—A third incident to estates for life relates to the under-tenants or lessees. For they have the same, nay greater indulgences than their lessors, the original tenants for life. The same; for the law of estovers and emblements, with [124] regard to the tenant for life, is also law with regard to his under-tenant, who represents him and stands in his place: and greater; for in those cases where tenant for life shall not have the emblements, because the estate determines by his own act, the exception shall not reach his lessee who is a third person. As in the case of a woman who holds durante viduitate (during widowhood); her taking husband is her own act, and therefore deprives her of the emblements: but if she leases her estate to an under-tenant, who sows the land, and she then marries, this her act shall not deprive the tenant of his emblements, who is a stranger and could not prevent her.<sup>1</sup> The lessees of tenants for life had also at the common law another most unreasonable advantage; for, at the death of their lessors the tenants for life, these under-tenants might if they pleased quit the premises, and pay no rent to anybody for the occupation of the land since the last quarter day, or other day assigned for payment of rent.<sup>2</sup> To remedy which it is now enacted,<sup>3</sup> that the executors or administrators of tenant for life, on whose death any lease determined, shall recover of the lessee a ratable proportion of rent, from the last day of payment to the death of such lessor.<sup>3</sup>

§ 174. 2. Legal estates for life—a. Estate in tail after possibility of issue extinct.—The next estate for life is of the legal

kind, as contradistinguished from conventional; viz., that of tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct. This happens, where one is tenant in special tail, and a person, from whose body the issue was to spring, dies without issue; or, having left issue, that issue becomes extinct: in either of these cases the surviving tenant in special tail becomes tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct. As, where one has an estate to him and his heirs on the body of his present wife to be begotten, and the wife dies without issue: "in this case the man has an estate-tail, which cannot possibly descend to anyone; and therefore the law makes use of this long periphrasis, as absolutely necessary to give an adequate idea of his estate. For if it had called him barely tenant in fee-tail special, that [125] would not have distinguished him from others; and besides he has no longer an estate of inheritance, or fee,<sup>x</sup> for he can have no heirs, capable of taking per formam doni (by the form of the gift). Had it called him tenant in tail without issue, this had only related to the present fact, and would not have excluded the possibility of future issue. Had he been styled tenant in tail without possibility of issue, this would exclude time past as well as present, and he might under this description never have had any possibility of issue. No definition, therefore, could so exactly mark him out, as this of tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct, which (with a precision peculiar to our own law) not only takes in the possibility of issue in tail which he once had, but also states that this possibility is now extinguished and gone.

This estate must be created by the act of God, that is, by the death of that person out of whose body the issue was to spring; for no limitation, conveyance, or other human act can make it. For, if land be given to a man and his wife, and the heirs of their two bodies begotten, and they are divorced, a vinculo matrimonii, they shall neither of them have this estate, but be barely tenants for life, notwithstanding the inheritance once vested in them.<sup>y 4</sup>

<sup>4</sup> "In Coke's time there could have been no legal issue of such a marriage; for an alleged marriage could only be dissolved on the ground of nullity. Probably now, if there were issue begotten before the divorce, the divorce would have no effect on the estate-tail." Edward Jenks, Esq., in Stephen, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 166 n.

A possibility of issue is always supposed to exist, in law, unless extinguished by the death of the parties; even though the donees be each of them an hundred years old.*

This estate is of an amphibious nature, partaking partly of an estate-tail, and partly of an estate for life. The tenant is, in truth, only tenant for life, but with many of the privileges of a tenant in tail, as, not to be punishable for waste, etc.:<sup>a</sup> or, he is tenant in tail, with many of the restrictions of a tenant for life; as, to forfeit his estate if he aliens it in fee simple:<sup>b</sup> whereas such alienation by tenant in tail, though voidable by the issue, is no forfeiture of the estate to the reversioner: who is not concerned in interest, [126] till all possibility of issue be extinct. But, in general, the law looks upon this estate as equivalent to an estate for life only; and, as such, will permit this tenant to exchange his estate with a tenant for life; which exchange can only be made, as we shall see hereafter, of estates that are equal in their nature.<sup>5</sup>

§ 175. b. Tenancy by the curtesy.—Tenant by the curtesy of England is where a man marries a woman seised of lands and tenements in fee simple or fee-tail; that is, of an estate of inheritance; and has by her issue, born alive, which was capable of inheriting her estate. In this case, he shall on the death of his wife, hold the lands for his life, as tenant by the curtesy of England.<sup>c</sup>

This estate, according to Littleton, has its denomination, because it is used within the realm of England only; and it is said in the Mirror<sup>d</sup> to have been introduced by King Henry the First; but it appears also to have been the established law of Scotland, wherein it was called curialitas:<sup>e</sup> so that probably our word "curtesy" was understood to signify rather an attendance upon the lord's court or curtis (that is, being his vassal or tenant), than to denote any peculiar favor belonging to this island. And therefore it is laid down<sup>f</sup> that by having issue, the husband shall be entitled to do homage to the lord, for the wife's lands, alone: whereas, before issue had, they must both have done it together.<sup>g</sup> It is likewise used in Ireland, by virtue of an ordinance of King Henry III.<sup>h</sup> It also appears<sup>i</sup> to have obtained in Normandy; and was likewise used among the ancient Almaines or Germans.<sup>k</sup> And yet it is not generally apprehended to have been a consequence of feudal tenure,<sup>k</sup> though I think some substantial feudal reasons may be given for its introduction. For, if a woman seised of lands have issue by her husband, and dies, the husband is the natural guardian of the child, and as such is in reason entitled to the profits of the lands in order to maintain it; and, [127] therefore, the heir apparent of a tenant by the curtesy could not be in ward to the lord of the fee, during the life of such tenant.<sup>1</sup> As soon, therefore, as any child was born, the father began to have a permanent interest in the lands; he became one of the pares curtis (peers of the court), and was called tenant by the curtesy initiate; and this estate being once vested in him by the birth of the child, was not liable to be determined by the subsequent death or coming of age of the infant.

<sup>g</sup> Origin of curtesy.—An ingenious modern theory would teach us that curtesy or curialitas "was understood to signify rather an attendance upon the lord's court or curtis (that is, being his vassal or tenant), than to denote any peculiar favor belonging to this island. And therefore it is laid down that by having issue, the husband shall be entitled to do homage to the lord, for the wife's lands, alone; whereas, before issue had, they must both have done it together." This explanation seems more ingenious than satisfactory. The rule about homage that is here laid down flatly contradicts Glanvill's text, and it is with Glanvill, as the oldest representative of English feudal theory, that we have here to reckon. He says that a woman never does homage; he says that when an heiress is married—not when she has issue—her husband is bound to do homage; he says that no homage is done for the wife's marriage portion (maritagium), and yet of this marriage portion the husband on the birth of issue becomes tenant by the law of England. Again, we have never seen in any record any suggestion that before issue had been born of the marriage the husband was not entitled and bound to do suit to the lord's court; nor can we easily suppose that the lord went without a suitor where there was a childless marriage. Lastly, we have never seen the word curialitas or courtésie used to signify a right or a duty of going to court, unless it is so used in the phrase that is before us. It is a common enough word, and means "civility," "good breeding," "a favor," "a concession."—Poll. & Maitl., 2 Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 414. The same authors (Ibid. 415–417) draw a contrast between the English law of curtesy and similar doctrines of Norman law.

§ 176. (1) Requisites to make a tenancy by the curtesy.—

There are four requisites necessary to make a tenancy by the curtesy; marriage, seisin of the wife, issue, and death of the wife.<sup>m</sup>

1. The marriage must be canonical and legal. 2. The seisin of the wife must be an actual seisin, or possession of the lands; not a bare right to possess, which is a seisin in law, but an actual possession, which is a seisin in deed. And therefore a man shall not be tenant by the curtesy of a remainder or reversion. But of some incorporeal hereditaments a man may be tenant by the curtesy, though there have been no actual seisin of the wife: as in case of an advowson, where the church has not become void in the lifetime of the wife; which a man may hold by the curtesy, because it is impossible to have had actual seisin of it, and impotentia excusat legem (want of power excuses the law).<sup>n</sup> If the wife be an idiot, the husband shall not be tenant by the curtesy of her lands;<sup>7</sup> for the king by prerogative is entitled to them, the instant she herself has any title: and since she could never be rightfully seised of the lands, and the husband's title depends entirely upon her seisin, the husband can have no title as tenant by the curtesy.<sup>o</sup> 3. The issue must be born alive. Some have had a notion that it must be heard to cry; but that is a mistake. Crying, indeed, is the strongest evidence of its being born alive; but it is not the only evidence.<sup>p</sup> The issue also must be born during the life of the mother; for, if the mother dies in labor, and the Cæsarean operation is performed, the husband in this case shall not be tenant by the [128] curtesy: because, at the instant of the mother's death, he was clearly not entitled, as having had no issue born, but the land descended to the child, while he was yet in his mother's womb; and the estate being once so vested, shall not afterwards be taken from him.<sup>q</sup> In gavelkind lands, a husband may be tenant by the curtesy without having any issue.<sup>r</sup> But in general there must be issue born; and such issue must also be capable of inheriting the mother's estate.<sup>s</sup> Therefore, if a woman be a tenant in tail male, and hath only a daughter born, the husband is not thereby entitled to be tenant by the curtesy; because such issue female can never inherit the estate in tail-male.<sup>t</sup> And this seems to be the true reason why the husband cannot be tenant by the curtesy of any lands of which the wife was not actually seised: because, in order to entitle himself to such estate, he must have begotten issue that may be heir to the wife; but no one by the standing rule of law can be heir to the ancestor of any land whereof the ancestor was not actually seised; and therefore as the husband hath never begotten any issue that can be heir to those lands, he shall not be tenant of them by the curtesy.<sup>u</sup> And hence we may observe with how much nicety and consideration the old rules of law were

<sup>8</sup> Seisin requisite to dower or curtesy.—The difference between this requirement and that for a wife's dower, when "seisin in law of the husband

will be as effectual as a seisin in deed" (p. *132), has often been spoken of as one of the arbitrary and technical rules of the ancient law. It is, on the contrary, a proof of its equitable character. It was in the husband's power, not in the wife's, to reduce the seisin in law to an actual seisin. It was his duty to do this for his wife's sake and interest. If he neglected it, he was justly made to take the consequence by losing curtesy. But to cut off his wife's dower, if the husband omitted to take actual seisin where he had seisin in law, would not only punish her for his neglect, but would give him a chance to rob her of her dower for the benefit of his own heirs. This is the meaning of Blackstone's remark, page *132, on the "power" of each spouse.—HAMMOND.

framed; and how closely they are connected and interwoven together, supporting, illustrating, and demonstrating one another. The time when the issue was born is immaterial, provided it were during the coverture: for, whether it were born before or after the wife's seisin of the lands, whether it be living or dead at the time of the seisin, or at the time of the wife's decease, the husband shall be tenant by the curtesy.<sup>9</sup> The husband by the birth of

"To adopt the language of Hosmer, C. J., in Heath v. White, 5 Conn. 228, 236, 'the system of tenure by the curtesy is, at least, pretty artificial, and is what it is because ita lex scripta est.' Its origin is not very well known, nor is there any principle to which, by common consent, it is referable. But the counsel for the defendant contend that the reason for requiring actual seisin in the wife is to be found in the fact that the common law confined inheritance to the stock of actual seisin. If it clearly appeared that this was the sole reason, the defendant would be entitled to the benefit of the rule 'that when the reason of any particular law ceases, so does the law itself.' The citation from 2 Bl. Comm. 128, and from 1 Greenl. Cruise, tit. 'Curtesy,' § 23, to the effect that the rule as to seisin in curtesy probably arose from the rule as to inheritance, at first impressed us as furnishing strong support for this position. But, on turning to Williams' able treatise on Real Property (4th ed., App. E, *491-*502), we found an exhaustive discussion of this question, in which he clearly shows, by many citations from Coke, Littleton, and Blackstone, as well as by other reasons, that this supposition is not true; and his conclusion is 'that the reason why an actual seisin was required to entitle the husband to curtesy was that his wife may not suffer by his neglect to take possession of her lands, and, in order to induce him to do so, the law allowed him curtesy of all lands of which an actual seisin had been obtained, but refused him his curtesy out of such lands as he had taken no pains to obtain possession of.' In 2 Bl. Comm. 131, under the head of 'Dower,' it is said: 'A seisin in law of the husband will be as effectual as a seisin in deed, in order to render the wife dowable; for it is not in the wife's power to bring the husband's title

the child becomes (as was before observed) tenant by the curtesy initiate,<sup>x</sup> and may do many acts to charge the lands: but his estate is not consummate till the death of the wife; which is the fourth and last requisite to make a complete tenant by the curtesy.<sup>y 10</sup>

to an actual seisin, as it is in the husband's power to do with regard to the wife's lands, which is one reason why he shall not be tenant by the curtesy but of such lands whereof the wife, or he himself, in her right, was actually seised in deed.' Lord Coke also has a statement to the same effect. Bishop, in his treatise on the 'Law of Married Women,' argues that curtesy does not depend solely on the right of issue to inherit, but upon the nature of the wife's estate, as well—that it was one that might have been made to yield sustenance to the married parties during coverture. After an able review of all the leading authorities, he says (section 499): "The result of this reasoning seems to be that, while the possibility of the issue inheriting is essential to curtesy, actual possession of the hereditaments by the wife is also essential—curtesy not arising except where the two concur. In this respect the analogy of curtesy to dower is complete. If we suppose that dower was given to assist the widow in her own maintenance, and curtesy to assist the husband in maintaining the children, the analogy ought to be complete; and the law is not unreasonable in declining to give, after death, the use of what was not in use during life.' These considerations would seem to be ample to show that the abolition of the common-law maxim, requiring seisin for the stock of inheritance, does not logically determine the right of the husband to curtesy in a remainder which could not by possibility have vested in possession during coverture. And, finally, the fact that nearly or quite all the states in this country, and England also, have abolished the maxim referred to, and now distribute the estates of intestates among the heirs without any reference or regard to the actual seisin of the ancestors, and yet, at the same time, hold firmly to the doctrine that either actual or legal seisin is an indispensable requisite to title by the curtesy, affords the strongest presumption against the correctness of the defendant's position." Todd v. Oviatt, 58 Conn. 174, 7 L. R. A. 693, 20 Atl. 440, 441.

and tenements whereof he was seised during the coverture, to hold to herself for the term of her natural life.*<sup>11</sup>

Dower is called in Latin by the foreign jurists doarium, but by Bracton and our English writers dos; which among the Romans signified the marriage portion, which the wife brought to her husband; but with us is applied to signify this kind of estate, to which the civil law, in its original state, had nothing that bore a resemblance: nor, indeed, is there anything in general more different than the regulation of landed property according to the English and Roman laws. Dower out of lands seems also to have been unknown in the early part of our Saxon constitution; for, in the laws of King Edmond,<sup>a</sup> the wife is directed to be supported wholly

<sup>11</sup> Dower in the United States.—In most, if not all, the United States dower and curtesy no longer depend on the common law, but are regulated by statute. (1 Washburn, c. 6, § 1, pl. 5.)

Where, as in most western states, the statute makes no reference to the common-law rules, but gives the widow or surviving husband a certain share of the decedent's real estate, precisely as other shares are given to his children or other heirs, it becomes a nice question whether the common-law principles relative to the estate of dower and curtesy have any application to such shares, or whether they are to be regarded as merely distributive shares of the real property, governed by the same principles with other inheritance; e. g., is dower to be favored in such cases?

The supreme court of Indiana has carried the tendency of recent law to its logical extent by holding that the wife takes like any other heir.

"Tenancies in dower, having been abolished by statute, no longer exist in this state. The rights of a surviving wife in the real estate of her husband are those created by statute alone." (Gaylord v. Dodge, 31 Ind. 41.)

"The widow takes her interest as such under our statute, in the lands of her deceased husband, not as dowress, but as an heir takes, by descent from her husband." (Fletcher v. Holmes, 32 Ind. 497; Mock v. Watson, 41 Iowa, 241.)

But, on the whole, the late cases seem to regard this as essentially the same estate with common-law dower, except so far as modified by express statutory provisions.

The inchoate right of dower is so vested in the wife as against the husband, immediately on the marriage (or acquisition of the property afterwards), that no conveyance or other act of the husband can deprive her of it. In some states, however, a judicial sale, whether founded on a general judgment against the husband, or on a mortgage or trust deed made by him, will cut off her right of dower. And a sale by advertisement or statutory foreclosure will be out of the personal estate. Afterwards, as may be seen in gavelkind tenure, the widow became entitled to a conditional estate in one-half of the lands; with a proviso that she remained chaste and unmarried;<sup>b</sup> as is usual also in copyhold dowers, or free-bench. Yet some<sup>c</sup> have ascribed the introduction of dower to the Normans, as a branch of their local tenures; though we cannot expect any feudal reason for its invention, since it was not a part of the pure, primitive, simple law of feuds, but was first of all introduced into that system (wherein it was called triens tertia (the third part),<sup>d</sup> and dotatium—dower) by the Emperor Frederick the Second;<sup>e</sup> equivalent in this respect to a judicial sale. And if the mortgage is foreclosed in the husband's lifetime, it will make no difference whether the wife joined in it or not. (Sturdevant v. Norris, 30 Iowa, 65.) But if the mortgage is not completely foreclosed and the property sold in the husband's life, then the wife's dower will attach to the entire property, or to the surplus over the mortgage, as the mortgage is executed by husband alone, or by husband and wife.

Where the wife unites with the husband in the mortgage of his real estate, and the property is sold under foreclosure, she is entitled to dower in the surplus only (Smith v. Jackson, 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 28; Titus v. Neilson, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 452; Tabele v. Tabele, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 45; Jennison v. Hapgood, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 345; Hartshorne v. Hartshorne, 2 N. J. Eq. 349; Harrow v. Johnson, 3 Met. (Ky.) 578; Bank of Commerce v. Owens, 31 Md. 320, 1 Am. Rep. 60.) And where the holder of the equity of redemption redeems, the widow can have dower only by contributing her portion of the mortgage debt. (Swaine v. Perine, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 482, 9 Am. Dec. 318.) Though she unites in the mortgage only as surety for her husband's debt, the inchoate right of dower is not her separate property in such a sense as to entitle her to have the mortgage redeemed by her husband's estate for her benefit, so as to leave her dower clear. (Hawley v. Bradford, 9 Paige (N. Y.), 200, 37 Am. Dec. 390; Hinchman v. Stiles, 9 N. J. Eq. 454; Bank of Commerce v. Owens, supra.)

A wife cannot relinquish her contingent right of dower directly to her husband, nor a husband his corresponding right to the wife. Either may relinquish by joining with the other in a conveyance to a third party; and probably by a separate release to the purchaser, made after the sale (though such separate releases were formerly held invalid in some cases). But the wife cannot disannex or dissociate her contingent dower from the real estate to which it who was contemporary with our King Henry III. It is possible, therefore, that it might be with us the relic of a Danish custom: since, according to the historians of that country, dower was introduced into Denmark by Swein, the father of our Canute the Great, out of gratitude to the Danish ladies, who sold all their [130] jewels to ransom him when taken prisoner by the Vandals.<sup>f</sup> However this be, the reason, which our law gives for adopting it, is a very plain and sensible one; for the sustenance of the wife, and the nurture and education of the younger children.<sup>g</sup> attaches, and bargain and sell and convey it as a separate and independent interest to a third person, or to her husband. (2 Scribner on Dower, 290; Carson v. Murray, 3 Paige (N. Y.), 483; White v. Wager, 25 N. Y. 328; Winans v. Peebles, 32 N. Y. 423; Simms v. Hervey, 19 Iowa, 273.)

The law does not recognize the right of husband and wife during coverture to make valid and binding contracts to convey or release the dower right of one to the other. By this we do not mean to say that if such contracts are fairly made and acted on, equity will not in some instances treat them as valid, or estop the husband and wife from contesting them; especially when connected with an agreement to separate. (Per Dillon, C. J., in McKee v. Reynolds, 26 Iowa, 578, explaining Blake v. Blake, 7 Iowa, 46.)

Where married women have obtained by statute enlarged powers of dealing with their own property, a distinction has been made between such powers in respect to property held in her own right, and in respect to her interest in her husband's property (e. g., in matters of dower, homestead, etc.), it being held that with respect to the last the statutes have no effect, but she remains under common-law disabilities.

In Ring v. Burt (1869), 17 Mich. 465, 97 Am. Dec. 200, this distinction was very clearly expressed, and it was held that a wife could not convey, encumber, or in any way affect by contract her interest in the homestead except by joining in a deed with her husband. Her agreement in respect to such property is simply void.

But the right to dower is not vested until the husband's death, as against the power of the legislature to abridge or take it away. "In measuring her rights we look to the law in force at the time of the husband's death, for it is this event which ripens or makes consummate the prior right, which so long as it is vested upon the marriage and seisin, was inchoate only. If there was no law in force at that time giving her the right, then it is extinguished. She cannot take under a law repealed prior to that time. And taking under the law then existing, she must take it with its restrictions and limitations." (Per Wright, C. J., in Lucas v. Sawyer, 17 Iowa, 517; Noel v. Ewing, 9 Ind. 37-39, where cases are collected.) The doctrine of Lucas v. Sawyer is followed in § 178. (1) Who may be endowed.—In treating of this estate, let us first consider who may be endowed; secondly, of what she may be endowed; thirdly, the manner how she shall be endowed; and fourthly, how dower may be barred or prevented.

Who may be endowed. She must be the actual wife of the party at the time of his decease. If she be divorced a vinculo matrimonii (from the bond of matrimony), she shall not be endowed; for ubi nullum matrimonium, ibi nulla dos (where there is no marriage, there is no dower due).<sup>b</sup> But a divorce mensa et thoro (from bed and board) only doth not destroy the dower;<sup>1</sup> no, not even

Randall v. Kreiger, Fed. Cas. No. 11,554, 2 Dill. 444, a case on the constitutional power to validate a sale of husband and wife, by attorney. (See, also, Frantz v. Harrow, 13 Ind. 507; Galbreath v. Gray, 20 Ind. 290.)

The chief difficulties arise in cases where the husband has conveyed away the property during coverture, but the wife has not released her right to dower. Here it is held that the wife can claim only the dower allowed by law at the time of death, although a larger dower right may have been allowed by law at the time of conveyance.

But the rule does not work both ways, as the purchaser in such cases has vested rights from the time of conveyance. The wife cannot claim a larger dower than was then allowed by law, although the legislature may have enlarged the dower right between the conveyance and the husband's death.

Such a statute cannot have a retrospective operation so as to lessen the estate actually purchased by the vendee. (Davis v. O'Ferrall, 4 G. Greene (Iowa), 168.) And so when land was sold on judicial sale, at a time when such a sale did not cut off the wife's dower, but subsequently and before the husband's death the law was changed, taking away dower in such cases, it was held that the wife could claim no dower. (Sturdevant v. Norris, 30 Iowa, 65.)

Another question is, in such cases, whether the wife is to have one-third of the value at the time of sale or one-third also of any increased value that may have accrued at the time of the husband's death.

In some states, as New York and Virginia, the widow is confined strictly to the value at the time of alienation. But in most states it is held that she can have the benefit of any general rise in the value of property, even if derived from surrounding improvements, but not of any improvements made by the alienee himself on that property. (See Tyler on Coverture, p. 538; 1 Washburn on Real Property, c. 7, § 5, pl. 22.)

At common law, dower attached only to legal estates. Many questions which arose respecting the precise interest in which dower could be claimed are done away with by statutes giving the wife dower in equitable as well as legal estates.—HAMMOND.

for adultery itself by the common law.* Yet now by the statute Westm. 2,<sup>1</sup> if a woman elopes from her husband, and lives with an adulterer, she shall lose her dower, unless her husband be voluntarily reconciled to her. It was formerly held, that the wife of an idiot might be endowed, though the husband of an idiot could not be tenant by the curtesy:<sup>m</sup> but as it seems to be at present agreed, upon principles of sound sense and reason, that an idiot cannot marry, being incapable of consenting to any contract, this doctrine cannot now take place. By the ancient law the wife of a person attainted of treason or felony could not be endowed; to the intent, says Staunforde,<sup>n</sup> that if the love of a man's own life cannot restrain him from such atrocious acts, the love of his wife and children may: though Britton<sup>o</sup> gives it another turn: viz., that it is presumed the wife was privy to her husband's crime. However, the statute 1 Edw. VI. c. 12 (Criminal Law, 1547), abated the rigor of the common law in this particular, and allowed [<sup>131</sup>] the wife her dower. But a subsequent statute<sup>p</sup> revived this severity against the widows of traitors, who are now barred of their dower (except in the case of certain modern treasons relating to the coin<sup>q</sup>), but not the widows of felons.<sup>12</sup> An alien, also, cannot be endowed, unless she be queen consort; for no alien is capable of holding lands.<sup>r</sup> The wife must be above nine years old at her husband's death, otherwise she shall not be endowed:<sup>s</sup> though in

§ 179. (2) Of what endowed.—We are next to inquire, of what a wife may be endowed. And she is now by law entitled to be endowed of all lands and tenements, of which her husband was seised in fee simple or fee-tail at any time during the coverture; and of which any issue, which she might have had, might by possibility have been heir.<sup>u</sup> Therefore, if a man, seised in fee simple, hath a son by his first wife, and after marries a second wife, she shall be endowed of his lands; for her issue might by possibility have been heir, on the death of the son by the former wife. But, if there be a donee in special tail, who holds lands to him and the heirs of his body begotten on Jane, his wife; though Jane may be endowed of these lands, yet if Jane dies, and he marries a second wife, that second wife shall never be endowed of the lands entailed; for no issue, that she could have, could by any possibility inherit them.<sup>v</sup> A seisin in law of the husband will be as effectual as a seisin in deed, in order to render the wife dowable; for it is not in the wife's power to bring the husband's title to an actual seisin, as it is in the husband's power to do with regard to the wife's lands: which is one reason why he shall not be tenant by the curtesy, but of such lands whereof the wife, or he himself in her right, was actually seised in deed.<sup>w</sup> The seisin of the husband, for a transitory instant (<sup>132</sup>) only, when the same act which gives him the estate conveys it also out of him again (as where by a fine land is granted to a man, and he immediately renders it back by the same fine), such a seisin will not entitle the wife to dower;<sup>x</sup> for the land was merely in transitu (passing through his hands), and never rested in the husband. But, if the land abides in him for a single moment, it seems that the wife shall be endowed thereof.<sup>y</sup> And, in short, a widow may be endowed of all her hus-

<sup>y</sup> This doctrine was extended very far by a jury in Wales, where the father and son were both hanged in one cart, but the son was supposed to have sur-

band's lands, tenements, and hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, under the restrictions before mentioned; unless there be some special reason to the contrary. Thus, a woman shall not be endowed of a castle, built for defense of the realm:<sup>a</sup> nor of a common without stint; for, as the heir would then have one portion of this common, and the widow another, and both without stint, the common would be doubly stocked.<sup>a</sup> Copyhold estates are also not liable to dower, being only estates at the lord's will; unless by the special custom of the manor, in which case it is usually called the widow's free-bench.<sup>b</sup> But, where dower is allowable, it matters not, though the husband alien the lands during the coverture; for he aliens them liable to dower.<sup>c</sup> <sup>13</sup>

viewed the father, by appearing to struggle longest; whereby he became seised of an estate by survivorship, in consequence of which seisin his widow had a verdict for her dower. (Cro. Eliz. 503.)

<sup>14</sup> Dower de la plus belle.—Dower de la plus belle was where the widow on suing the guardian in chivalry for dower was required by him to endow herself of the fairest portion of any lands she might hold as guardian in socage, and tween them, doth endow his wife with the whole, or such quantity as he shall please, of his lands; at the same time specifying and ascertaining the same: on which the wife, after her husband's death, may enter without further ceremony. 4. Dower ex assensu patris (by assent of the father);<sup>e</sup> which is only a species of dower ad ostium ecclesiæ, made when the husband's father is alive, and the son by his consent, expressly given, endows his wife with parcel of his father's lands. In either of these cases, they must (to prevent frauds) be made<sup>h</sup> in facie ecclesiæ et ad ostium ecclesiæ; non enim valent facta in lecto mortali nec in camera, aut alibi ubi clandestina fuere conjugia (in the face of the church, and at the church door; for those made on a death-bed, in a chamber or elsewhere, where the nuptials have been private, are not valid).<sup>15</sup>

§ 181. (4) History of dower.—It is curious to observe the several revolutions which the doctrine of dower has undergone, since its introduction into England. It seems first to have been of the nature of the dower in gavelkind, before mentioned; viz., a moiety of the husband's lands, but forfeitable by incontinency or a second marriage. By the famous charter of Henry I this condition, of widowhood and chastity, was only required in case the husband left any issue:<sup>1</sup> and afterwards we hear no more of it. Under Henry the Second, according to Glanvill,<sup>k</sup> the dower ad ostium ecclesiæ (at the church door) was the most usual species

thus release from dower the lands of her husband held in chivalry. This was abolished along with the military tenures, of which it was a consequence.—1 Bouvier's Law Dict. (Rawle's 3d Rev.), 932.

of dower; and here as well as in Normandy,<sup>1</sup> it was binding upon the wife, if by her consented to at the time of marriage. Neither, in those days of feudal rigor, was the husband allowed to endow her ad ostium ecclesiæ with more than the third part of the lands whereof he was seised, though he might endow her with less; lest by such liberal endowments the lord should be defrauded of his wardships and other feudal profits.<sup>m</sup> But if no specific dotation was made [<sup>134</sup>] at the church porch, then she was endowed by the common law of the third part (which was called her dos rationabilis—reasonable dower) of such lands and tenements, as the husband was seised of at the time of the espousals, and no other; unless he specially engaged before the priest to endow her of his future acquisitions:<sup>n</sup> and, if the husband had no lands, an endowment in goods, chattels, or money, at the time of espousals, was a bar of any dower<sup>o</sup> in lands which he afterwards acquired.<sup>p</sup> In

<sup>p</sup> When special endowments were made ad ostium ecclesiæ, the husband, after affiance made, and troth plighted, used to declare with what specific lands he meant to endow his wife, quod dotat cum de tali manerio cum pertinentiis, etc. (that I will endow her of such a manor with its appurtenances). Bract. Ibid. and therefore in the old York ritual (Seld. Ux. Hebr. 1. 2. c. 27) there is, at this part of the matrimonial service, the following rubric: "sacerdos interroget dotem mulieris; et, si terra et in dotem detur, tunc dicatur psalmus iste, etc. (the priest shall ask what is the woman's dower; and if land be given to her for her dower, then let that psalm be read)." When the wife was endowed generally (ubi quis uxorem suam dotaverit in generali, de omnibus terris et tenementis (when anyone shall have endowed his wife generally, with all his lands and tenements); Bract. Ibid.) the husband seems to have said, "with all my lands and tenements I thee endow"; and then they all became liable to her dower. When he endowed her with personalty only, he used to say, "with all my worldly goods (or, as the Salisbury ritual has it, with all my worldly chattel), I thee endow"; which entitled the wife to her thirds, or pars rationabilis (reasonable portion) of his personal estate, which is provided for by magna carta, cap. 26, and will be further treated of in the concluding chapter of this book; though the retaining this last expression in our modern liturgy, if of any meaning at all, can now refer only to the right of maintenance, which she acquires during coverture, out of her husband's personalty.

King John's magna carta, and the first charter of Henry III,<sup>a</sup> no mention is made of any alteration of the common law, in respect of the lands subject to dower: but in those of 1217, and 1224, it is particularly provided, that a widow shall be entitled for her dower to the third part of all such lands as the husband had held in his lifetime:† yet, in case of a specific endowment of less ad ostium ecclesiæ, the widow had still no power to waive it after her husband's death. And this continued to be law, during the reigns of Henry III and Edward I.‡ In Henry IV's time it was denied to be law, that a woman can be endowed of her husband's goods and chattels:‡ and, under Edward IV, Littleton lays it down [135] expressly, that a woman may be endowed ad ostium ecclesiæ with more than a third part;‡ and shall have her election, after her husband's death, to accept such dower, or refuse it, and betake herself to her dower at common law.¶ Which state of uncertainty was probably the reason, that these specific dowers, ad ostium ecclesiæ (at the church door) and ex assensu patris (by assent of the father) have since fallen into total disuse.

§ 182. (5) Assignment of dower.—I proceed therefore, to consider the method of endowment, or assigning dower, by the common law, which is now the only usual species. By the old law, grounded on the feudal exactions, a woman could not be endowed without a fine paid to the lord; neither could she marry again without his license; lest she should contract herself, and so convey part of the feud to the lord's enemy.‡ This license the lords took care to be well paid for; and, as it seems, would sometimes force the dowager to a second marriage, in order to gain the fine. But, to remedy these oppressions, it was provided, first by the charter of Henry I,<sup>7</sup> and afterwards by magna carta,<sup>8</sup> that the widow shall pay nothing for her marriage, nor shall be distrained to marry afresh, if she chooses to live without a husband; but shall not, however, marry against the consent of the lord: and further, that nothing shall be taken for assignment of the widow's dower, but that she shall remain in her husband's capital mansion-house for forty days after his death, during which time her dower shall be assigned. These forty days are called the widow's quarantine; a term made use of in law to signify the number of forty days, whether applied to this occasion or any other.<sup>9</sup> The particular lands to be held in dower, must be assigned<sup>b</sup> by the heir of the husband or his guardian; not only for the sake of notoriety, but also to entitle the lord of the fee to demand his services of the heir, in respect of the lands so holden. For the heir by this entry becomes tenant [136] thereof to the lord, and the widow is immediate tenant to the heir, by a kind of subinfeudation, or under-tenancy, completed by this investiture or assignment; which tenure may still be created, notwithstanding the statute of quia emptores (18 Edw. I, st. 1, 1290), because the heir parts not with the fee simple, but only with an estate for life. If the heir or his guardian do not assign her dower within the term of quarantine, or do assign it unfairly, she has her remedy at law, and the sheriff is appointed to assign it.<sup>c</sup> Or if the heir (being under age) or his guardian assign, more than she ought to have, it may be afterwards remedied by writ of admeasurement of dower.<sup>d</sup> If the thing of which she is endowed be divisible, her dower must be set out by metes and bounds; but, if it be indivisible, she must be endowed specially; as, of the third presentation to a church, the third toll-dish of a mill, the third part of the profits of an office, the third sheaf of tithe, and the like.*

Upon preconcerted marriages, and in estates of considerable consequence, tenancy in dower happens very seldom: for, the claim of the wife to her dower at the common law diffusing itself so extensively, it became a great clog to alienations, and was otherwise inconvenient to families. Wherefore, since the alteration of the ancient law respecting dower ad ostium ecclesiæ, which hath occasioned the entire disuse of that species of dower, jointures have been introduced in their stead, as a bar to the claim at common law. Which leads me to inquire, lastly, § 183. (6) Barring dower.—How dower may be barred or prevented. A widow may be barred of her dower not only by elopement, divorce, being an alien, the treason of her husband, and other disabilities before mentioned, but also by detaining the title deeds, or evidences of the estate from the heir; until she restores them:† and, by the statute of Gloucester,‡ if a dowager aliens the land assigned her for dower, she forfeits it ipso [137] facto, and the heir may recover it by action. A woman also may be barred of her dower, by levying a fine or suffering a recovery of the lands, during her coverture.<sup>h</sup> But the most usual method of barring dowers is by jointures, as regulated by the statute 27 Hen. VIII, c. 10 (Statute of Uses, 1535).

§ 184. (a) Jointures.—A jointure, which, strictly speaking, signifies a joint estate, limited to both husband and wife, but in common acceptation extends also to a sole estate, limited to the wife only, is thus defined by Sir Edward Coke;† “a competent livelihood of freehold for the wife, of lands and tenements; to take effect, in profit or possession, presently after the death of the husband; for the life of the wife at least.” This description is framed from the purview of the statute 27 Hen. VIII, c. 10 (1535), before mentioned; commonly called the statute of uses, of which we shall speak fully hereafter. At present I have only to observe, that before the making of that statute, the greatest part of the land of England was conveyed to uses; the property or possession of the soil being vested in one man, and the use, or profits thereof, in another; whose directions, with regard to the disposition thereof, the former was in conscience obliged to follow, and might be compelled by a court of equity to observe. Now, though a husband had the use of lands in absolute fee simple, yet the wife was not entitled to any dower therein; he not being seised thereof: wherefore it became usual, on marriage, to settle by express deed some special estate to the use of the husband and his wife, for their lives, in joint tenancy or jointure; which settlement would be a provision for the wife in case she survived her husband. At length the statute of uses ordained, that such as had the use of lands, should, to all intents and purposes, be reputed and taken to be absolutely seised and possessed of the soil itself. In consequence of which legal seisin, all wives would have become dowable of such lands as were held to the use of their husbands, and also entitled at the same time to any special lands that might be settled in jointure: had not the same statute provided, that <sup>[138]</sup> upon making such an estate in jointure to the wife before marriage, she shall be forever precluded from her dower.<sup>2</sup>

§ 185. (i) Requisites of a jointure.—But then these four requisites must be punctually observed: 1. The jointure must take effect immediately on the death of the husband. 2. It must be for her own life at least, and not pur auter vie (for the life of another), or for any term of years, or other smaller estate. 3. It must be made to herself, and no other in trust for her. 4. It must be made, and so in the deed particularly expressed to be, in satisfaction of her whole dower, and not of any particular part of it. If the jointure be made to her after marriage, she has her election after her husband's death, as in dower ad ostium ecclesiæ, and may either accept it, or refuse it and betake herself to her dower at common law; for she was not capable of consenting to it during coverture. And if, by any fraud or accident, a jointure made before marriage proves to be on a bad title, and the jointress is evicted, or turned out of possession, she shall then (by the provisions of the same statute) have her dower pro tanto (to that amount) at the common law.<sup>16</sup>

§ 186. (b) Relative advantages of dower and jointure.—There are some advantages attending tenants in dower that do not <sup>1</sup> These settlements, previous to marriage, seem to have been in use among the ancient Germans, and their kindred nation the Gauls. Of the former Tacitus gives us this account. "Dotem non uxor marito, sed uxori maritus affert: intersunt parentes et propinqui, et munera probant (the wife does not bring the portion to the husband, but the husband to the wife; the parents and relations are present and approve of the gifts)." (De Mor. Germ. c. 18.) and Cæsar (de Bello Gallico, l. 6. c. 18) has given us the terms of a marriage settlement among the Gauls, as nicely calculated as any modern jointure, "Viri, quantas pecunias ab uxoribus dotis nomine acceperunt, tantas ex suis bonis, æstimatione facta, cum dotibus communicant. Hujus omnis pecunie conjunctim ratio habetur, fructusque servantur. Uter eorum vita superavit, ad eum pars utriusque cum fructibus superiorum temporum pervenit (Whatever portion a wife has brought to her husband, an estimate being made, he adds as much from his own goods. An account is taken of all this money jointly, and the produce laid by. The share of both, with all the profits that have accrued, falls to the survivor)." The dauphin's commentator on Cæsar supposes that this Gaulish custom was the ground of the new regulations made by Justinian (Nov. 97.) with regard to the provision for widows among the Romans: but surely there is as much reason to suppose, that it gave the hint for our statutable jointures.

<sup>16</sup> Modern law of jointures.—The use of jointures is not so common now in England as formerly, nor are they frequently met with in the United States. The word "jointure," it is said, signifies an estate or property settled on a woman in consideration of marriage, to be enjoyed by her after her husband's death, and such is its use in the statutes of Nebraska. Fellers v. Fellers, 54 Neb. 694, 74 N. W. 1077. A jointure that bars dower is a provision made for the wife whereby an estate may pass to her presently after the death of her husband. Chaffee v. Chaffee, 70 Vt. 231, 40 Atl. 247. A statute of Ohio provided that, if any estate be conveyed to a woman as jointure, in lieu of her dower, to take effect immediately after the death of her husband, and to continue during her life, such conveyance should bar her dower. The section was the adoption of a similar provision in 27 Hen. VIII, which enacted that, where lands were settled to the use of the wife, every woman having such jointure should not have title to any dower in the residue. This act of parliament was enacted to prevent a woman from having both dower and jointure, since before its passage a jointure was not a bar. It was held by the court that an estate to be conveyed as jointure in Ohio must possess the requisites enumerated by Blackstone and the estate must be such a one as to certainty extend to jointresses; and so, vice versa, jointresses are in some respects more privileged than tenants in dower. Tenant in dower by the old common law is subject to no tolls or taxes; and hers is almost the only estate on which, when derived from the king's debtor, the king cannot distrain for his debt; if contracted during the coverture.<sup>m</sup> But, on the other [139] hand, a widow may enter at once, without any formal process, on her jointure land; as she also might have done on dower ad ostium ecclesiæ, which a jointure in many points resembles; and the resemblance was still greater, while that species of dower continued in its primitive state; whereas no small trouble, and a very tedious method of proceeding, is necessary to compel a legal assignment of dower.<sup>n</sup> And, what is more, though dower be forfeited by the treason of the husband, yet lands settled in jointure remain unimpeached to the widow.<sup>o</sup> Wherefore, Sir Edward Coke very justly gives it the preference, as being more sure and safe to the widow, than even dower ad ostium ecclesiæ, the most eligible species of any.<sup>17</sup>

and kind that the wife on the death of her husband may take possession of, and hold in severalty, and not in common with others. Grogan v. Garrison, 27 Ohio St. 50. The bar arises not by operation of law, but from the express or implied intention of the husband. Morgan v. Sparks, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 1196, 108 S. W. 233.

OF ESTATES LESS THAN FREEHOLD.

§ 187. Kinds of estates less than freehold.—Of estates, that are less than freehold, there are three sorts: 1. Estates for years: 2. Estates at will: 3. Estates by sufferance.<sup>1</sup>

1 Leasehold interests as chattels real.—These leasehold interests are commonly called “chattels real.” The following account of the development of the doctrine under which such interests came to be called chattels or chattels real is given by Pollock & Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), vol. II, p. 115.

“Some compensation was made to the termor, and at the same time the gulf that divided him from the freeholder was widened, by the evolution of another doctrine. In the first half of the thirteenth century lawyers were already beginning to say that his interest in the land is a quasi chattel; soon they were saying boldly that it is a chattel. The main import of this doctrine is that he has something to bequeath by his will. There was a writ in common use which prohibited the ecclesiastical courts from meddling with lay fee (laicum feodum), but the termor’s interest was no ‘lay fee,’ and, if he bequeathed it by his will, the spiritual tribunal would not be prevented from enforcing the bequest. On the other hand, the time had not yet come when the term would be treated as a chattel by the law of intestate succession. It was common to make the lease for years to the lessee “and his heirs,” and, at all events if this were done, the term would pass to the heir if it were not bequeathed by the lessee’s will. However, he was able to bequeath it. We can see the analogy between the term and the chattel at work in another quarter; if the termor commits a felony, his interest does not escheat to his lord; it is forfeited to the king quasi catallum. Indeed, the analogy was beginning to work in many quarters. This is not a purely English peculiarity. In Normandy, also, the term of years is accounted a movable; it is firma mobilis, as contrasted with fee farm (feodi firma).

“At first sight, it is strange that the termor should be able to do what the tenant in fee cannot do, namely, to give his right by testament. We cannot explain this by painting him as a despised creature for whom the feudal land law can find no proper place, for he is thus being put into one category with those who are exercising the most distinctively feudal of all rights in land. To a modern Englishman the phrase ‘chattel real’ suggests at once the ‘leasehold interest,’ and probably it suggests nothing else. But in the middle ages the phrase covers a whole group of rights, and the most prominent member of that group is, not the leasehold interest, but the seignorial right of marriage and wardship. When a wardship falls to the lord, this seems to be treated as a windfall; it is an eminently vendible right, and he who has it can bequeath it by his will. At all events in the hands of a purchaser, the wardship soon becomes a bequeathable chattel: already in John’s reign this is so. The analogy

§ 188. 1. Estates for years.—An estate for years is a contract for the possession of lands or tenements, for some determinate period: and it takes place where a man letteth them to another for the term of a certain number of years, agreed upon between the lessor and the lessee,<sup>a</sup> and the lessee enters thereon.<sup>b</sup> If the lease be but for half a year, or a quarter, or any less time, this lessee is respected as a tenant for years and is styled so in some legal proceedings; a year being the shortest term which the law in this case

<sup>a</sup> We may here remark, once for all, that the terminations of “—or” and “—ee” obtain, in law, the one an active, the other a passive signification; the former usually denoted the doer of any act, the latter him to whom it is done. The feoffor is he that maketh a feoffment; the feoffee is he to whom it is made: the donor is one that giveth lands in tail; the donee is he who receiveth it: he that granteth a lease is denominated the lessor; and he to whom it is granted the lessee. (Litt. § 57.)

between his right and that of the termor is very close. The purchaser of the wardship, though he is in occupation of the land, has no seisin of free tenement; he can bring no assize. On the other hand, he obtains possessory protection by the writ Quare eiecit de custodia, which is a parallel writ to the termor's Quare eiecit infra terminum. What, then, we must ask, have these two cases in common? Is there any economic reason for this assimilation of a term of years to a wardship, and for the treatment of both of them as bequeathable chattels? We believe that there is, namely, the investment of capital, and by the way we will remark that the word ‘catallum,’ if often it must be translated by our chattel, must at others be rendered by our capital. Already in the year 1200 sums of money that we must call enormous were being invested in the purchase of wardships and marriages. There was a speculative traffic in these things at a time when few other articles were being bought and sold on a large scale. Now, it is very natural that a man who invests a round sum should wish for a power of bequest. The invested sum is an utterly different thing from the landed estate which he would desire to keep in his family. And then, as to the term of years, we believe that in the twelfth century and yet later, this stands often, if not generally, in the same economic category. It is a beneficial lease bought for a sum of ready money; it is an investment of capital, and therefore for testamentary purposes it is quasi catallum. If this explanation be thought untrue—and perhaps it runs counter to some traditional theories—we must once more ask attention to the close similarity that there is between our law's treatment of the termor and its treatment of one who has purchased a wardship. Such a purchaser was no despised ‘husbandman,’ no ‘mere bailiff’; in John's day an archbishop who had been chief justiciar invested four thousand marks in a wardship.”

takes notice of.* And this may, not improperly, lead us into a short explanation of the division and calculation of time by the English law.

§ 189. Computation of time.—The space of a year is a determinate and well-known period, consisting commonly of 365 days: for, though in [141] bissextile or leap-years it consists properly of 366, yet by the statute 21 Hen. III (1236) the increasing day in the leap-year, together with the preceding day, shall be accounted for one day only. That of a month is more ambiguous: there being, in common use, two ways of calculating months; either as lunar, consisting of twenty-eight days, the supposed revolution of the moon, thirteen of which make a year: or, as calendar months of unequal lengths, according to the Julian division in our common almanacs, commencing at the calends of each month, whereof in a year there are only twelve. A month in law is a lunar month, or twenty-eight days, unless otherwise expressed; not only because it is always one uniform period, but because it falls naturally into a quarterly division by weeks. Therefore, a lease for “twelve months” is only for forty-eight weeks; but if it be for “a twelvemonth” in the singular number, it is good for the whole year.<sup>4</sup> For herein the law recedes from its usual calculation, because the ambiguity between the two methods of computation ceases; it being generally understood that by the space of time called thus, in the singular number, a twelvemonth, is meant the whole year consisting of one solar revolution. In the space of a day all the twenty-four hours are usually reckoned, the law generally rejecting all fractions of a day, in order to avoid disputes.* Therefore, if I am bound to pay money on any certain day, I discharge the obligation if I pay it before 12 o’clock at night; after which the following day commences.<sup>2</sup> But to return to estates for years.

<sup>2</sup> Year.—The Julian calendar was used in England and the colonies of that country prior to 1752. By statute 24 Geo. III, c. 23 (Calendar (New Style) 1750), the Gregorian calendar was adopted. According to the Julian calendar the year began on March 25th. The term “year” when used in any statute means a calendar year, unless a contrary intention be shown. It means,

§ 190. a. Estates for years originally precarious.—These estates were originally granted to mere farmers or husbandmen, who every year rendered some equivalent in money, provisions, or other rent to the lessors or landlords; but, in order to encourage them to manure and cultivate the ground, they had a permanent interest granted them, not determinable at the will of the lord. And yet their possession was esteemed of so little consequence, that they were rather considered as the bailiffs or servants of the lord, who were to [142] receive and account for the profits at a settled price, than as having any property of their own. And therefore they were not allowed to have a freehold estate: but their interest (such as it was) vested after their deaths in their executors, who were to make up the accounts of their testator with the lord, and his other creditors, and were entitled to the stock upon the farm. The lessee's estate might also, by the ancient law, be at any time defeated, by a common recovery suffered by the tenant of the freehold;† which annihilated all leases for years then subsisting, unless after-likewise, twelve calendar months. Muse v. London Assur. Corp., 108 N. C. 240, 13 S. E. 94. It means 365 calendar days. Erwin v. Benton, 120 Ky. 536, 9 Ann. Cas. 264, 87 S. W. 291. It may, according to context, mean fiscal year, political year, solar year, leap-year, school year, etc. Reusch v. Lincoln, 78 Neb. 828, 112 N. W. 377; Williams v. Bagnelle, 138 Cal. 699, 72 Pac. 408.

Month.—At common law the word “month,” when used without qualification, meant a lunar month. This rule was abolished by statute in England, 1850, and a month declared to mean a calendar month. In the United States the common-law rule was followed in some of the earlier cases. Loring v. Halling, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 119. But the holdings now seem to be uniform that the word, in whatever connection it is used, signifies a calendar month, unless a contrary intent is shown, and in many states this rule has been fixed by statute.

Day.—In a computation of time within which legal obligations must be performed, a day is the entire twenty-four hours, beginning at 12 o'clock noon, and extending to 12 o'clock the next night. Fractions of a day in statutes or legal proceedings, or in contracts, are not generally considered. However, when the rights of parties depend on the precedence of time in the same day, or upon the given hour or fraction of a day, it may be alleged or proved as any other fact. Towell v. Hollweg, 81 Ind. 154; Cal. Pol. Code, § 3259; City of Eureka v. Diaz, 89 Cal. 467, 26 Pac. 961.

§ 191. b. Duration of estates for years.—While estates for years were thus precarious, it is no wonder that they were usually very short, like our modern leases upon rack-rent; and indeed we are told<sup>a</sup> that by the ancient law no leases for more than forty years were allowable, because any longer possession (especially when given without any livery declaring the nature and duration of the estate) might tend to defeat the inheritance. Yet this law, if ever it existed, was soon antiquated; for we may observe, in Madox's collection of ancient instruments, some leases for years of a pretty early date, which considerably exceed that period;<sup>b</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Seisin of termor.—Such a recovery by one "whose title was supposed superior to his by whom those leases were granted" (as Blackstone adds), would of course annul the leases of the party recovered against, and thus render nugatory his right to recover possession by a writ of entry which supposed such a lease. The recovery, therefore, would be resorted to whenever an undesirable lease was to be got rid of. It was probably due to this that the tenant's right to his term and possession under it continued to be "little better than tenancies at the will of the landlord" (p. 143) down to the reign of Edward IV, or later, in spite of the clear statement of the law in their favor, and provision of a writ to help them, in the time of Bracton. (Lib. 4, c. 36, fol. 220.) See further on this point Book III of these Commentaries, page *200.

It is remarkable how persistent in the minds of English lawyers this conviction of the primitive feebleness of terms for years has been. Mr. Challis, the latest writer who has given original thought to the entire doctrine of real property—his very able little work was published in 1885—has stated it even more sweepingly than Blackstone did a century ago.

"But terms of years were by the common law liable to destruction at the will of the reversioner having the freehold. If the latter suffered judgment to go against him by default in a collusive action of recovery, a lease previously granted by him for years had no validity as against the recoverer, who claimed and obtained judgment upon a supposed title paramount to the title of the reversioner; and this destruction of his estate could not be hindered by the termor, because having no freehold, he had no locus standi to intervene in an action of recovery. This hardship was partly remedied by the stat-

and long terms, for three hundred years or a thousand, were certainly in use in the time of Edward III,<sup>1</sup> and probably of Edward I.<sup>2</sup> But certainly, when by the statute 21 Hen. VIII, c. 15 (Tenants for Years, 1529), the termor (that is, he who is entitled to the term of years) was protected against these fictitious recoveries, and his interest rendered secure and permanent, long terms began to be more frequent than before; and were afterwards extensively introduced, being found extremely convenient for family settlements and mortgages: continuing subject, however, to the same rules of succession, [143] and with the same inferiority ute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I, and completely remedied by the 21 Hen. VIII, c. 15, which enabled termors to falsify recoveries obtained on feigned titles. 2 Inst. 321, 322; Co. Litt. 46 a." (H. W. Challis, The Law of Real Property, London, 1895, c. 8, p. 46.)

Mr. Challis would hardly think it fair to say that the lessee of land to-day held an estate "liable to destruction at the will of his lessor," merely because the latter might by a collusive use of fraud and forgery enable a claimant to destroy both of their interests by recovering "judgment upon a supposed title paramount." Yet the legal rule by which that might be done now is precisely the same by which the termor was ousted under a feigned recovery. That the trick was often performed, and safer in the thirteenth century is probable. But so far was the termor from being "liable to destruction at the will of the reversioner" that he had a writ of entry ad terminum qui nondum præterit against his reversioner or lessor, and anyone else who interfered with his possession (quoscunque dejectores), to recover both the unexpired term and damages: and that, too, with all the advantages of a freeholder in a real action, grand cape, petty cape, and all! (Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 1, c. 36, fol. 220.) As to the doubts that were long afterwards raised about the right to recover the term, something must be said in another note. It is sufficient here to show the state of the case at least twenty years before the statute of Gloucester.

But Mr. Challis goes still further when he says: "The foregoing considerations warrant the conclusion that terms of years originally pushed themselves into the rank of legal estates only by virtue of the statute 21 Hen. VIII, c. 15. This conclusion as to the primitive legal status of terms of years is confirmed by the fact that the word "seisin" is used by the old writers synonymously with possession: showing that they recognized no possession unaccompanied by an estate of freehold," (Ib. p. 47.)

The fact of this "synonymous" use of the two terms by Bracton (not by later writers during a long period) is certain; but so also is his use of seising to freeholds, as when they were little better than tenancies at the will of the landlord.

§ 192. c. Definition of estate for years.—Every estate which must expire at a period certain and prefixed, by whatever words created, is an estate for years. And therefore this estate is frequently called a term, terminus, because its duration or continuance is bounded, limited, and determined: for every such estate must have a certain beginning, and certain end.<sup>1</sup> But id certum est, quod certum reddi potest (that is certain which can be made certain): therefore, if a man make a lease to another, for so many years as J. S. shall name, it is a good lease for years;<sup>m</sup> for though it is at present uncertain, yet when J. S. hath named the years, it is then reduced to a certainty. If no day of commencement is named in the creation of this estate, it begins from the making, or delivery of the lease.<sup>n</sup> A lease for so many years as J. S. shall live, is void from the beginning;<sup>o</sup> for it is neither certain, nor can ever be reduced to a certainty, during the continuance of the lease.<sup>4</sup> And the same doctrine holds, if a parson make a lease of his glebe for so many years as he shall continue parson of Dale; for this is still more uncertain. But a lease for twenty or more years, if J. S. shall so long live, or if he should so long continue parson, for the termor's possession. The natural inference is the reverse of that drawn above.

In conclusion, the mistakes of Blackstone and others, including Mr. Challis, as to the status or "legal rights" of the termor in this early period, could hardly be better contradicted than they are in a single sentence from the chapter of Bracton cited above. Non magis poterit aliquis firmarium ejicere de firma sua, quam tenentem aliquem de libero tenemento suo. Et unde si ille ejecerit qui tradidit, seysinam restituet cum damnis; quia talis restitutio non multum differt a disseysina. "No one can eject a farmer from his farm [term] any more than a tenant from his freehold. And even if his lessor have ejected him, he shall restore his seisin with damages; for such a remedy does not differ much from that of disseisin." (Fol. 220 b).—HAMMOND.

is good;<sup>p</sup> for there is a certain period fixed, beyond which it cannot last; though it may determine sooner, on the death of J. S. or his ceasing to be parson there.

§ 193. d. Beginning of the term.—We have before remarked, and endeavored to assign the reason of, the inferiority in which the law places an estate for years, when compared with an estate for life, or an inheritance: observing, that an estate for life, even if it be pur auter vie (for the life of another), is a freehold; but that an estate for a thousand years is only a chattel, and reckoned part of the personal estate.<sup>q</sup> Hence it follows, that a lease for years may be made to commence in futuro (at a future time), though a lease for life cannot. As, if I grant lands to Titius to hold from Michaelmas next for [144] twenty years, this is good; but to hold from Michaelmas next for the term of his natural life, is void. For no estate of freehold can commence in futuro; because it cannot be created at common law without livery of seisin, or corporal possession of the land: and corporal possession cannot be given of an estate now, which is not to commence now, but hereafter.<sup>r</sup> And, because no livery of seisin is necessary to a lease for years, such lessee is not said to be seised, or to have true legal seisin of the lands. Nor, indeed, does the bare lease vest any estate in the lessee; but only gives him a right of entry on the tenement, which right is called his interest in the term, or interesse termini: but when he has actually so entered, and thereby accepted the grant, the estate is then and not before vested in him, and he is possessed, not properly of the land, but of the term of years;<sup>s</sup> the possession or seisin of the land remaining still in him who hath the freehold. Thus the word “term” does not merely signify the time specified in the lease, but the estate also and interest that passes by that lease; and therefore the term may expire, during the continuance of the time; as by surrender, forfeiture, and the like. For which reason, if I grant a lease to A for the term of three years, and after the expiration of the said term to B for six years, and A surrenders or forfeits his lease at the end of one year, B's interest shall immediately take effect: but if the remainder had been to B from and after the expiration of the said three years, or from and after the expiration of the said time, in this case B's interest will not commence till the time is fully elapsed, whatever may become of A's term.<sup>t</sup>

<sup>5</sup> This doctrine, as is said by the editor of Stephen's Comm. (I, 180), may well seem somewhat puzzling. It is suggested that what Coke probably meant to insist upon was, that the lessee was not “seised” of the land, but only possessed of it for a term of years.

§ 194. e. Incidents of an estate for years.—Tenant for term of years hath incident to, and inseparable from his estate, unless by special agreement, the same estovers, which we formerly observed<sup>u</sup> that tenant for life was entitled to; that is to say, house-bote, fire-bote, plow-bote, and hay-bote;<sup>w</sup> terms which have been already explained.<sup>x</sup>

§ 195. (1) Emblements.—[145] With regard to emblements, or profits of land sowed by tenant for years, there is this difference between him, and tenant for life: that where the term of tenant for years depends upon a certainty, as if he holds from midsummer for ten years, and in the last year he sows a crop of corn, and it is not ripe and cut before midsummer, the end of his term, the landlord shall have it; for the tenant knew the expiration of his term, and therefore it was his own folly to sow what he never could reap the profits of.<sup>y</sup><sup>6</sup> But where the lease for years depends upon an uncertainty; as, upon the death of the lessor, being himself only tenant for life, or being a husband seised in right of his wife; or if the term of years be determinable upon a life or lives; in all these cases, the estate for years not being certainly to expire at a time foreknown, but merely by the act of God, the tenant, or his executors, shall have the emblements in the same manner that a tenant for life or his executors shall be entitled thereto.<sup>z</sup> Not so, if it determine by the act of the party himself;

as if tenant for years does anything that amounts to a forfeiture: in which case the emblements shall go to the lessor, and not to the lessee, who hath determined his estate by his own default.*

§ 196. 2. Estates at will.—The second species of estates not freehold are estates at will. An estate at will is where lands and tenements are let by one man to another, to have and to hold at the will of the lessor; and the tenant by force of this lease obtains possession.<sup>b</sup> Such tenant hath no certain indefeasible estate, nothing that can be assigned by him to any other; because the lessor may determine his will, and put him out whenever he pleases. But every estate at will is at the will of both parties, landlord and tenant; so that either of them may determine his will, and quit his connections with the other at his own pleasure.<sup>c</sup> Yet this must be understood with some restriction. [146] For, if the tenant at will sows his land, and the landlord before the corn is ripe, or before it is reaped, puts him out, yet the tenant shall have the emblements, and free ingress, egress, and regress, to cut and carry away the profits.<sup>d</sup> And this for the same reason, upon which all the cases of emblements turn; viz., the point of uncertainty: since the tenant could not possibly know when his landlord would determine his will, and therefore could make no provision against it; and having sown the land, which is for the good of the public, upon a reasonable presumption, the law will not suffer him to be a loser by it. But it is otherwise, and upon reason equally good, where the tenant himself determines the will; for in this case the landlord shall have the profits of the land.<sup>e 7</sup>

§ 197. a. Termination of estate at will.—What act does, or does not, amount to a determination of the will on either side, has formerly been matter of great debate in our courts. But it is now, I think, settled, that (besides the express determination of the lessor's will, by declaring that the lessee shall hold no longer; which must either be made upon the land,<sup>f</sup> or notice must be given to the lessee<sup>e</sup>) the exertion of any act of ownership by the lessor, as entering upon the premises and cutting timber,<sup>b</sup> taking a distress for rent and impounding it thereon,<sup>1</sup> or making a feoffment, or lease for years of the land to commence immediately;<sup>k</sup> any act of desertion by the lessee, as assigning his estate to another, or committing waste, which is an act inconsistent with such a tenure;<sup>l</sup> or, which is instar omnium (equivalent to all), the death or outlawry, of either lessor or lessee;<sup>m</sup> puts an end to or determines the estate at will.

§ 198. b. Rights after termination of estate at will.—The law is, however, careful that no sudden determination of the will by one party shall tend to the manifest and unforeseen prejudice of the other. This appears in the case of [147] emblements before mentioned; and, by a parity of reason, the lessee after the determination of the lessor's will, shall have reasonable ingress and egress to fetch away his goods and utensils.<sup>n</sup> And, if rent be payable quarterly or half-yearly, and the lessee determines the will, the rent shall be paid to the end of the current quarter or half-year.<sup>o</sup> And, upon the same principle, courts of law have of late years leaned as much as possible against construing demises, where no certain term is mentioned, to be tenancies at will; but have rather held them to be tenancies from year to year so long as both parties please, especially where an annual rent is reserved: in which case they will not suffer either party to determine the tenancy even at the end of the year, without reasonable notice to the other.<sup>p</sup>

§ 199. c. Copyholds.—There is one species of estates at will that deserves a more particular regard than any other; and that is, an estate held by copy of court roll; or, as we usually call it, a copyhold estate. This, as was before observed,<sup>a</sup> was in its original and foundation nothing better than a mere estate at will. But, the kindness and indulgence of successive lords of manors having permitted these estates to be enjoyed by the tenants and their heirs, according to particular customs established in their respective districts; therefore, though they still are held at the will of the lord, and so are in general expressed in the court rolls to be, yet that will is qualified, restrained, and limited, to be exerted according to the custom of the manor. This custom, being suffered to grow up by the lord, is looked upon as the evidence and interpreter of his will: his will is no longer arbitrary and precarious; but fixed and ascertained by the custom to be the same, and no other, that has time out of mind been exercised and declared by his ancestors. A copyhold tenant is therefore now full as properly a tenant by the custom as a tenant at will; the custom [148] having arisen from a series of uniform wills. And therefore it is rightly observed by Calthorpe,<sup>r</sup> that “copyholders and customary tenants differ not so much in nature as in name: for although some be called copyholders, some customary, some tenants by the verge, some base tenants, some bond tenants, and some by one name and some by another, yet do they all agree in substance and kind of tenure: all the said lands are holden in one general kind, that is, by custom and continuance of time; and the diversity of their names doth not alter the nature of their tenure.”

§ 200. (1) Forms of copyhold.—Almost every copyhold tenant being therefore thus tenant at the will of the lord according to the custom of the manor; which customs differ as much as the humor and temper of the respective ancient lords (from whence we may account for their great variety), such tenant, I say, may have, so far as the custom warrants, any other of the estates or quantities of interest, which we have hitherto considered, or may hereafter consider, to hold united with this customary estate at will. A copyholder may, in many manors, be tenant in fee simple, in fee-tail, for life, by the curtesy, in dower, for years, at sufferance, or on condition; subject, however, to be deprived of these estates upon the concurrence of those circumstances which the will of the lord, promulged by immemorial custom, has declared to be a forfeiture or absolute determination of those interests; as in some manors the want of issue male, in others the cutting down timber, the nonpayment of a fine, and the like. Yet none of these interests amount to freehold; for the freehold of the whole manor abides always in the lord only,* who hath granted out the use and occupation, but not the corporal seisin or true possession of certain parts and parcels thereof, to these his customary tenants at will.

§ 201. (2) Evolution of copyhold.—The reason of originally granting out this complicated kind of interest, so that the same man shall, with regard to the same land, be at one and the same time tenant in fee simple [149] and also tenant at the lord's will, seems to have arisen from the nature of villeinage tenure; in which a grant of any estate of freehold, or even for years absolutely, was an immediate enfranchisement of the villein.† The lords, therefore, though they were willing to enlarge the interest of their villeins, by granting them estates which might endure for their lives, or sometimes be descendible to their issue, yet did not care to manumit them entirely; and for that reason it seems to have been contrived, that a power of resumption at the will of the lord should be annexed to these grants, whereby the tenants were still kept in a state of villeinage, and no freehold at all was conveyed to them in their respective lands: and of course, as the freehold of all lands must necessarily rest and abide somewhere, the law supposed it to continue and remain in the lord. Afterwards, when these villeins became modern copyholders, and had acquired by custom a sure and indefeasible estate in their lands, on performing their usual services, but yet continued to be styled in their admissions tenants at the will of the lord,—the law still supposed it an absurdity to allow, that such as were thus nominally tenants at will could have any freehold interest: and therefore continued and still continues to determine, that the freehold of lands so holden abides in the lord of the manor, and not in the tenant; for though he really holds to him and his heirs forever, yet he is also said to hold at another's will. But with regard to certain other copyholders, of free or privileged tenure, which are derived from the ancient tenants in villein socage,<sup>u</sup> and are not said to hold at the will of the lord, but only according to the custom of the manor, there is no such absurdity in allowing them to be capable of enjoying a freehold interest: and therefore the law doth not suppose the freehold of such lands to rest in the lord of whom they are holden, but in the tenants themselves;<sup>v</sup> who are sometimes called customary freeholders, being allowed to have a freehold interest though not a freehold tenure.

[150] However, in common cases, copyhold estates are still ranked (for the reasons above mentioned) among tenancies at will; though custom, which is the life of the common law, has established a permanent property in the copyholders, who were formerly nothing better than bondmen, equal to that of the lord himself, in the tenements holden of the manor; nay, sometimes even superior; for we may now look upon a copyholder of inheritance, with a fine certain, to be little inferior to an absolute freeholder in point of interest, and in other respects, particularly in the clearness and security of his title, to be frequently in a better situation.

§ 202. 3. Estates at sufferance.—An estate at sufferance, is where one comes into possession of land by lawful title, but keeps it afterwards without any title at all. As if a man takes a lease for a year, and, after the year is expired, continues to hold the premises without any fresh leave from the owner of the estate.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>9</sup> "This definition of Blackstone has been adopted by this court, and it has been held that after the termination of the term of a tenant, if he holds over, he becomes a tenant at sufferance, unless something is done to change that status to some other, as, for instance, to turn it into a tenancy at will or for another period or term." Stanley v. Stembridge, 140 Ga. 750, 79 S. E. 842, 844.

Or, if a man maketh a lease at will, and dies, the estate at will is thereby determined: but if the tenant continueth possession, he is tenant at sufferance.<sup>v</sup> But, no man can be tenant at sufferance against the king, to whom no laches, or neglect, in not entering and ousting the tenant, is ever imputed by law: but his tenant, so holding over, is considered as an absolute intruder.<sup>x</sup> But, in the case of a subject, this estate may be destroyed whenever the true owner shall make an actual entry on the lands and oust the tenant; for, before entry, he cannot maintain an action of trespass against the tenant by sufferance, as he might against a stranger:<sup>y</sup> and the reason is, because the tenant being once in by a lawful title, the law (which presumes no wrong in any man) will suppose him to continue upon a title equally lawful, unless the owner of the land by some public and avowed act, such as entry is, will declare his continuance to be tortious, or, in common language, wrongful.

[151] Thus stands the law, with regard to tenants by sufferance; and landlords are obliged in these cases to make formal entries upon their lands,<sup>z</sup> and recover possession by the legal process of ejectment: and at the utmost, by the common law, the tenant was bound to account for the profits of the land so by him detained. But now, by statute 4 Geo. II, c. 28 (Landlord and Tenant, 1730), in case any tenant for life or years, or other person claiming under or by collusion with such tenant, shall willfully hold over after the determination of the term, and demand made and notice in writing given, by him to whom the remainder or reversion of the premises shall belong, for delivering the possession thereof; such person, so holding over or keeping the other out of possession, shall pay for the time he detains the lands, at the rate of double their yearly value. And, by statute 11 Geo. II, c. 19 (Distress for Rent, 1737), in case any tenant, having power to determine his lease, shall give notice of his intention to quit the premises, and shall not deliver up the possession at the time contained in such notice, he shall thenceforth pay double the former rent, for such time as he continues in possession. These statutes have almost put an end to the practice of tenancy by sufferance, unless with the tacit consent of the owner of the tenement.

CHAPTER THE TENTH.

OF ESTATES UPON CONDITION.

§ 203. Definition and classification of estates upon condition.

Besides the several divisions of estates, in point of interest, which we have considered in the three preceding chapters, there is also another species still remaining, which is called an estate upon condition; being such whose existence depends upon the happening or not happening of some uncertain event, whereby the estate may be either originally created, or enlarged, or finally defeated.<sup>a</sup> And these conditional estates I have chosen to reserve till last, because they are indeed more properly qualifications of other estates than a distinct species of themselves; seeing that any quantity of interest, a fee, a freehold, or a term of years, may depend upon these provisional restrictions. Estates, then, upon condition, thus understood, are of two sorts: 1. Estates upon condition implied: 2. Estates upon condition expressed: under which last may be included, 3. Estates held in vadio, gage, or pledge: 4. Estates by statute merchant or statute staple: 5. Estates held by elegit.

§ 204. 1. Estates upon condition, implied.—Estates upon condition implied in law are where a grant of an estate has a condition annexed to it inseparably from its essence and constitution, although no condition be expressed in words. As if a grant be made to a man of an office, generally, without adding other words; the law tacitly annexes hereto a secret condition that the grantee shall duly execute his office,<sup>b</sup> on breach of which condition [153] it is lawful for the grantor, or his heirs, to oust him, and grant it to another person.<sup>c</sup>

§ 205. a. Grounds of forfeiture.—For an office, either public or private, may be forfeited by misuser or nonuser, both of which are breaches of this implied condition. 1. By misuser, or abuse; as if a judge takes a bribe, or a park-keeper kills deer without authority. 2. By nonuser, or neglect; which in public offices, that concern the administration of justice, or the commonwealth, is of itself a direct and immediate cause of forfeiture: but nonuser of a private office is no cause of forfeiture, unless some special damage is proved to be occasioned thereby.<sup>d</sup> For in the one case delay must necessarily be occasioned in the affairs of the public, which require a constant attention; but, private offices not requiring so regular and unremitting a service, the temporary neglect of them is not necessarily productive of mischief; upon which account some special loss must be proved, in order to vacate these. Franchises, also, being regal privileges in the hands of a subject, are held to be granted on the same condition of making a proper use of them; and therefore they may be lost and forfeited, like offices, either by abuse or by neglect.*

Upon the same principle proceed all the forfeitures which are given by law of life estates and others; for any acts done by the tenant himself, that are incompatible with the estate which he holds. As if tenants for life or years enfeoff a stranger in fee simple: this is, by the common law, a forfeiture of their several estates; being a breach of the condition which the law annexes thereto, viz., that they shall not attempt to create a greater estate than they themselves are entitled to.<sup>f</sup> So if any tenants for years, for life, or in fee, commit a felony; the king or other lord of the fee is entitled to have their tenements, because their estate is determined by the breach of the condition, "that they shall not commit felony," which the law tacitly annexes to every feudal donation.

§ 206. 2. Estates upon condition, expressed.—[154] An estate on condition expressed in the grant itself is where an estate is granted, either in fee simple or otherwise, with an express qualification annexed, whereby the estate granted shall either commence, be enlarged, or be defeated, upon performance or breach of such qualification or condition.* These conditions are therefore either precedent or subsequent.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> It is pointed out (Stephen, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 192 n), that Blackstone's statement is not quite sound, for it was only where the attempt to create the greater estate was by feoffment, or other conveyance actually passing seisin, that the rule of forfeiture applied. Other conveyances were "innocent," i. e., they transferred only what lawfully belonged to the grantor, and so were not "tortious" as regards the remaindermen. The forfeitures mentioned have been abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, and the Real Property Act, 1845. Forfeiture for breach of implied condition is now very rare, except, perhaps, in the case of freeholds.

§ 207. a. Conditions precedent.—Precedent are such as must happen or be performed before the estate can vest or be enlarged: subsequent are such, by the failure or nonperformance of which an estate already vested may be defeated. Thus, if an estate for life be limited to A upon his marriage with B, the marriage is a precedent condition, and till that happens no estate<sup>b</sup> is vested in A. Or, if a man grant to his lessee for years, that upon payment of a hundred marks within the term he shall have the fee, this also is a condition precedent, and the fee simple passeth not till the hundred marks be paid.<sup>1</sup>

§ 208. b. Conditions subsequent.—But if a man grant an estate in fee simple, reserving to himself and his heirs a certain rent; and that, if such rent be not paid at the times limited, it shall be lawful for him and his heirs to re-enter, and avoid the estate: in this case the grantee and his heirs have an estate upon condition subsequent, which is defeasible if the condition be not strictly performed.* To this class may also be referred all base fees, and fee simples conditional at the common law.<sup>1</sup> Thus an estate to a man and his heirs, tenants of the manor of Dale, is an estate on condition that he and his heirs continue tenants of that manor. And so, if a personal annuity be granted at this day to a man and the heirs of his body; as this is no tenement within the statute of Westminster the Second, it remains, as at common law, a fee simple on condition that the grantee has heirs of his body. Upon the same principle depend all the determinable estates of freehold, which we mentioned in the eighth chapter: as durante viduitate (during widowhood), etc.: these are estates upon condition that the grantees do not marry, and the like. And, on the breach of any of these <sup>[155]</sup> subsequent conditions, by the failure of these contingencies; by the grantee's not continuing tenant of the manor of Dale, by not having heirs of his body, or by not continuing sole; the estates which were respectively vested in each grantee are wholly determined and void.

§ 209. (1) Distinction between conditions and limitations.—A distinction is, however, made between a condition in deed and a limitation, which Littleton<sup>m</sup> denominates also a condition in law. For when an estate is so expressly confined and limited by the words of its creation that it cannot endure for any longer time than till the contingency happens upon which the estate is to fail, this is denominates a limitation: as when land is granted to a man, so long as he is parson of Dale, or while he continues unmarried, or until out of the rents and profits he shall have made 500*l.* and the like.<sup>n</sup> In such case the estate determines as soon as the contingency happens (when he ceases to be parson, marries a wife, or has received the 500*l.*), and the next subsequent estate, which depends upon such determination, becomes immediately vested, without any act to be done by him who is next in expectancy.<sup>3</sup> But when an estate is, strictly speaking, upon condition in deed (as if granted expressly upon condition to be void upon the payment of 40*l.* by the grantor, or so that the grantee continues unmarried, or provided he goes to York, etc.<sup>o</sup>), the law permits it to endure beyond the time when such contingency happens, unless the grantor or his heirs or assigns take advantage of the breach of the condition, and make either an entry or a claim in order to avoid the estate.<sup>p 4</sup> But, though strict words of condition be used in the

<sup>4</sup> It is said that, so different are the two kinds of conveyance, objects which would be illegal if aimed at by way of condition subsequent may be substantially achieved by the use of conditional limitations. Thus it is claimed that, while a conveyance of a legal fee simple with a condition for a forfeiture creation of the estate, yet if on breach of the condition the estate be limited over to a third person, and does not immediately revert to the grantor or his representatives (as if an estate be granted by A to B, on condition that within two years B intermarry with C, and on failure thereof then to D and his heirs), this the law construes to be a limitation and not a <sup>[156]</sup> condition:<sup>a</sup> because, if it were a condition, then, upon the breach thereof, only A or his representatives could avoid the estate by entry, and so D's remainder might be defeated by their neglecting to enter; but, when it is a limitation, the estate of B determines, and that of D commences, the instant that the failure happens. So, also, if a man by his will devises land to his heir at law, on condition that he pays a sum of money, and for nonpayment devises it over, this shall be considered as a limitation, otherwise no advantage could be taken of the nonpayment, for none but the heir himself could have entered for a breach of condition.<sup>r 5</sup>

In all these instances, of limitations or conditions subsequent, it is to be observed, that so long as the condition, either express or on the bankruptcy of the grantee, would be clearly bad as to the condition (Re Dugdale, [1883] 38 Ch. D. 176), yet a conveyance of a fee simple until bankruptcy of the grantee would be operative to deprive his creditors of the land in the event of his bankruptcy. Re Leach, [1912] 2 Ch. 422. In Re Leach, however, the limitation was (a) equitable, and (b) by devise. See Stephen, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 194.

<sup>5</sup> "The will of B. F. contains the following clauses: 'I give my son A. J. F. my home farm, with all its appurtenances. I give my son P. F. my lower farm, that was Waitman's, with all its appurtenances; but my wife, N., to have the full control of both said farms during her widowhood, and no longer.' . . .

"At common law the devise would have been of a defeasible estate for life, there being no words of inheritance in the clause. 2 Bl. Comm. 156. Under our statute (Code, c. 71, § 8) the language imports a defeasible fee simple 'unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will, conveyance, or grant.' The English statute (1 Vict., c. 26, § 28) is very much like ours. Under that statute it has been held that, if the same land be given in one part of the will to A and in another to B, the presence of words of limitation in the latter gift, and their absence in the former, are material to correct the apparent contradiction, and to show that the testator meant a gift to A for life, with remainder to B in fee. Jarm. Wills, 1135; Gravenor v. Watkins, 6 L. R. C. P. 500." Furbee v. Furbee, 49 W. Va. 191, 38 S. E. 511.

implied, either in deed or in law, remains unbroken, the grantee may have an estate of freehold, provided the estate upon which such condition is annexed be in itself of a freehold nature; as if the original grant express either an estate of inheritance, or for life, or no estate at all, which is constructively an estate for life. For the breach of these conditions being contingent and uncertain, this uncertainty preserves the freehold;<sup>a</sup> because the estate is capable to last forever, or at least for the life of the tenant, supposing the condition to remain unbroken. But where the estate is at the utmost a chattel interest, which must determine at a certain time, and may determine sooner (as a grant for ninety-nine years, provided A, B, and C, or the survivor of them, shall so long live), this still continues a mere chattel, and is not, by its uncertainty, ranked among estates of freehold.

§ 210. c. Impossible and illegal conditions.—These express conditions, if they be impossible at the time of their creation, or afterwards become impossible by the act of God or the act of the feoffor himself, or if they be contrary to law, or repugnant to the nature of the estate, are void. In any of which cases, if they be conditions subsequent, that [157] is, to be performed after the estate is vested, the estate shall become absolute in the tenant. As, if a feoffment be made to a man in fee simple, on condition that unless he goes to Rome in twenty-four hours; or unless he marries with Jane S. by such a day (within which time the woman dies, or the feoffor marries her himself); or unless he kills another; or in case he aliens in fee; then in any of such cases the estate shall be vacated and determine: here the condition is void, and the estate made absolute in the feoffee. For he hath by the grant the estate vested in him, which shall not be defeated afterwards by a condition either impossible, illegal, or repugnant.<sup>b</sup> But if the condition be precedent, or to be performed before the estate vests, as a grant to a man that, if he kills another or goes to Rome in a day, he shall have an estate in fee; here, the void condition being precedent, the estate which depends thereon is also void, and the grantee shall take nothing by the grant: for he hath no estate until the condition be performed.<sup>c</sup>

There are some estates defeasible upon condition subsequent, that require a more peculiar notice. Such are,

§ 211. 3. Estates in gage or pledge.—Estates held in vadio, in gage, or pledge; which are of two kinds, vivum vadium, or living pledge; and mortuum vadium, dead pledge; or mortgage.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>6</sup> Mortgage.—“A concise definition of mortgage which should embrace both its equitable and its legal character is virtually impossible. Considered in its modern character, as stripped of its legal notions and embodying purely equitable principles throughout a large portion of the United States, the definition given by the California Civil Code seems to be complete and accurate: ‘A mortgage is a contract by which specific property is hypothecated for the performance of an act, without the necessity of a change of possession.’ Cal. Civ. Code, § 2920. (The term ‘hypothecated’ is here used in its strict technical sense, and with appropriateness of application.) Several forms of definition, regarding the mortgage as a common-law conveyance, are added in the foot-note. These attempted definitions are all erroneous, upon any theory of the instrument; they do not go beyond the literal import of the language in which a mortgage is usually expressed; and they utterly ignore all the equitable elements, which are as much and as truly constituent parts of the mortgage as the legal elements. Any true definition based upon the original common-law and equitable system must embody and express all the double nature of the mortgage—that it is both a lien in equity and a conveyance at law.”—POMEROY, Equity Jur., § 1191.

Bouvier's Law Dict. (Rawle's 3d Rev.) attempts to meet Prof. Pomeroy's “virtually impossible” demands by the following definition of mortgage: “A conveyance of real estate or assignment of personal property, without parting with the possession in either case, by way of hypothecation as security for the performance of some act, usually the payment of money, and treated at law as a conveyance or assignment, but in equity as a lien.”

An instrument, although in form an absolute deed, having been intended merely as security for payment of a debt is a mortgage. Todd v. Todd, 164 Cal. 255, 128 Pac. 413; White v. Walsh, 62 Misc. Rep. 423, 114 N. Y. Supp. 1015. The contemporaneous agreement for a resale and purchase does not of itself make the deed a mortgage. The conveyance must be judged according to the real intent of the parties. If there is a debt subsisting between the parties, and it is the intention to continue the debt, it is a mortgage; but if the conveyance extinguishes the debt, and the parties intend that result, a contract for a resale at the same price does not destroy the character of the deed as an absolute conveyance. Hays v. Emerson, 75 Ark. 551, 87 S. W. 1027. One sure test and essential requisite of a mortgage is the existence of a debt from the grantor to the grantee in the deed. If there is no debt, the instrument cannot be a mortgage, whatever else it may be. Jones v. Hubbard, 193 Mo. 147, 90 S. W. 1137; Smith v. Hope, 47 Fla. 295, 35 South. 865; Perkins

§ 212. a. Vivum vadium.—Vivum vadium, or living pledge, is when a man borrows a sum (suppose 200*l.*) of another; and grants him an estate, as, of 20*l.* per annum, to hold till the rents and profits shall repay the sum so borrowed. This is an estate conditioned to be void, as soon as such sum is raised. And in this case the land or pledge is said to be living: it subsists, and survives the debt; and, immediately on the discharge of that, results back to the borrower.▼

v. Trinity Realty Co., 69 N. J. Eq. 723, 61 Atl. 167; Botan Grocery Co. v. Turner, 46 Tex. Civ. App. 534, 102 S. W. 932.

Another form of conveyance for the purpose of securing payment of money is the deed of trust or trust deed. There are really two forms of this. There is the deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage and the deed of trust, which for the trust purposes is unconditional and indefeasible. The latter is an absolute parting with the title, and the grantor has no power of redemption. Whether a conveyance is one or the other depends on the terms of the deed. The deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage has, in many states, tended to supersede the ordinary mortgage. The distinction between them is the fact that, in the deed of trust, another person than the creditor is selected as grantee and such person holds in trust for the creditor to secure the payment of the debt, and beyond that in trust for the grantor. The chief practical difference between a deed of trust with power of sale and a plain mortgage is that the deed of trust may be foreclosed according to its terms by the trustee without the authority of court, whereas a simple mortgage can be foreclosed only under a decree of court. Axman v. Smith, 156 Mo. 286, 57 S. W. 105. Both the deed of trust and the mortgage are securities for a debt. Both create specific liens on the property; and in both the equitable title or right of redemption remains in the debtor, and is an estate or interest in the property that the debtor may sell, or that may be seized and sold under judicial process by his other creditors, subject to the lien created by the mortgage or deed of trust. Ladd v. Johnson, 32 Or. 195, 49 Pac. 756; Bartlett v. Teah, 1 Fed. 768, 1 McCrary, 176; Brecht v. Law Union & Crown Ins. Co., 153 Fed. 452. Under Cal. Civ. Code, §§ 865, 866, providing that the grantee of realty subject to a trust acquires a legal estate except as against the trustee, a trust deed is substantially a mortgage with power of sale, and the trustor is the holder of the legal title, entitled to exercise the ordinary incidents of ownership subject to the execution of the trust. Hollywood Lumber Co. v. Love, 155 Cal. 270, 100 Pac. 698.

All accessions to the real property subsequent to the mortgage are bound by it. Arques v. Wasson, 51 Cal. 620, 21 Am. Rep. 718. After some conflict of decision, it is now settled that a mortgage of after-acquired property is valid

§ 213. b. Mortgage.—But mortuum vadum, a dead pledge, or mortgage (which is much more common than the other), is where a man borrows of another a specific sum (e. g., 200*l.*) [158] and grants him an estate in fee, on condition that if he, the mortgagor, shall repay the mortgagee the said sum of 200*l.* on a certain day mentioned in the deed, that then the mortgagor may re-enter on the estate so granted in pledge; or, as is now the most usual way, that the mortgagee shall reconvey the estate to the mortgagor: in and equity will give effect to it, whether the title subsequently acquired by the mortgagor is legal or equitable. Bear Lake & River W. W. etc. Co. v. Garland, 164 U. S. 1, 41 L. Ed. 327, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 7.

The equity of redemption is available by any person interested in the mortgaged estate, provided he is in privity with the mortgagor. This includes heirs, devisees, executors, administrators, and assignees of the mortgagor; subsequent encumbrances; tenants for years; judgment creditors; dowress and tenant by the curtesy, as well as others. Merriam v. Barton, 14 Vt. 501; Hoover v. Johnson, 47 Minn. 434, 50 N. W. 475; Jackson v. Becktold etc. Mfg. Co., 86 Ark. 591, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 454, 112 S. W. 161.

Clogging the equity.—In 1681, in the leading case of Harris v. Harris, 1 Vern. 33, Lord Nottingham laid down the principle: "Once a mortgage, always a mortgage." This doctrine is perhaps to-day more frequently expressed in the phrase, "clogging the equity." Noakes v. Rice, [1902] App. Cas. 24; Bradley v. Carritt, [1903] App. Cas. 253. The purpose of Lord Nottingham's doctrine was to render invalid agreements in a mortgage for forfeiture of a right to redeem. But it had also rendered invalid all dealings with the property, or encumbrances thereon, by the mortgagee, as against the mortgagor coming to redeem. It bore on both parties, preventing each of them from making any binding disposition of the property as a whole. Almost a deadlock was thus brought about. Attempts were made to reserve in the mortgage deeds express powers of disposition and control in the mortgagee. But such provisions were always exposed to the danger of being made ineffective by the court of chancery as attempts to "clog the equity."

Relief was accordingly sought of the legislature. In 1860 parliament passed the Law of Property Amendment Act (Lord Cranworth's Act), which conferred upon every mortgagee, after default in payment of principal or interest, the power to sell the mortgaged land and pay himself out of the proceeds, and to insure any insurable property, and to appoint a receiver of the rents and profits. The act did not, however, give any power to lease; and any of the powers given might be excluded by the express terms of the mortgage.

The next step was taken by the Conveyancing Act of 1881, which included all the privileges of the earlier statute, but conferred on either mortgagee or mortgagor, when in possession, power to make binding leases, and in many other ways relieved mortgages of the strict rules that impeded them, and this case the land, which is so put in pledge, is by law, in case of nonpayment at the time limited, forever dead and gone from the mortgagor; and the mortgagee's estate in the lands is then no longer conditional, but absolute. But, so long as it continues conditional, that is, between the time of lending the money and the time allotted for payment, the mortgagee is called tenant in mortgage.* But, as it was formerly a doubt,† whether, by taking such estate in fee, it did not become liable to the wife's dower, and other encumbrances, of the mortgagee (though that doubt has been long ago overruled by our courts of equity‡), it therefore became worked toward a fuller freedom of alienation. See Jenks, Short Hist. Eng. Law, 219, 220, 253, 254.

The American courts, equally with the English, hold to the doctrine that, "once a mortgage, always a mortgage," and refuse to give effect to any provision or stipulation that tends to "clog the equity of redemption." It is an established doctrine that an equity of redemption is inseparably connected with a mortgage; that is to say, so long as the instrument is one of security, the borrower has, in a court of equity, a right to redeem the property upon payment of the loan. This right cannot be waived or abandoned by any stipulation of the parties made at the time, even if embodied in the mortgage. This is a doctrine from which a court of equity never deviates. Peugh v. Davis, 96 U. S. 332, 24 L. Ed. 775; Pomeroy, Eq. Jur., § 1193; Parmer v. Parmer, 74 Ala. 285; Bayley v. Bailey, 5 Gray (Mass.), 505; Hazeltine v. Granger, 44 Mich. 503, 7 N. W. 74; Bradbury v. Davenport, 114 Cal. 593, 55 Am. St. Rep. 92, 46 Pac. 1062.

Tacking.—It is a settled doctrine of equity that where the defendant acquired the legal estate at the time and as part of his original purchase, the fact of his purchase having been bona fide for value and without notice is a perfect defense in equity to any suit brought by the holder of a prior equitable estate, lien, encumbrance, or other interest, seeking either to establish and enforce his equitable estate, lien, or interest, or to obtain any other relief with respect thereto which can be given by a court of equity. This protection is not confined to a defendant who obtained the legal title contemporaneously with his original purchase. It includes those cases where, of several successive purchasers holding equitable estates, one of them later in time has obtained an outstanding legal estate. By far the most frequent instance in England is that of three or more successive mortgagees by conveyance, A, B, and C, where the first only would obtain the legal estate and the others an equitable one. If C, at the time of loaning his money and taking his mortgage, had no notice of B's prior encumbrance—that is, was a bona fide purchaser of the equitable usual to grant only a long term of years, by way of mortgage;* with condition to be void on repayment of the mortgage money: which course has been since continued, principally because on the death of the mortgagee such term becomes vested in his personal representatives, who alone are entitled in equity to receive the money lent, of whatever nature the mortgage may happen to be.

§ 214. (1) Mortgagee's right of possession.—As soon as the estate is created, the mortgagee may immediately enter on the lands; but is liable to be dispossessed, upon performance of the condition by payment of the mortgage money at the day limited. And therefore the usual way is to agree that the mortgagor shall hold the land till the day assigned for payment; when, in case of failure, whereby the estate becomes absolute, the mortgagee may enter upon it and take possession, without any possibility at law of being afterwards evicted by the mortgagor, to whom the land is now forever dead.

estate—on afterwards learning of B's claim, he may buy in or procure a transfer of A's mortgage to himself, and may thus put himself in a position of perfect defense against the enforcement of B's lien; he thus acquires, in fact, not only a defense to any suit brought by B, but the absolute precedence over B in the satisfaction of the liens out of the mortgaged premises. This particular application of the doctrine to successive mortgages is known in English equity as the rule concerning "tacking"—a rule which has been universally rejected by the courts of the various states. Pomeroy, Eq. Jur., § 768. The equity tribunals of England established the rule in the cases of Hedworth v. Primate (1662), Hardres, 318, and Marsh v. Lee (1670), 2 Ventr. 337, 86 Eng. Reprint, 473. The rule of tacking was abolished by the Vendor and Purchaser Act of 1874, but revived by the Land Transfer Act of 1875. Jenks, Short Hist. Eng. Law, 219. Tacking is naturally inconsistent with the system of recording mortgages which prevails in the American states. The doctrine has been severely criticised. Langdell, Eq. Pl. 191; Ames, Lect. Leg. Hist. 269. For other connections in which the term "tacking" is used in this country, see 3 Bouvier, Law Dict. (Rawle's 3d Rev.), 3216.

law, yet they will consider the real value of the tenements compared with the sum borrowed. And, if the estate be of greater value than the sum lent thereon, they will allow the mortgagor at any reasonable time to recall or redeem his estate; paying to the mortgagee his principal, interest, and expenses: for otherwise, in strictness of law, an estate worth 1,000*l.* might be forfeited for nonpayment of 100*l.* or a less sum. This reasonable advantage, allowed to mortgagors, is called the equity of redemption: and this enables a mortgagor to call on the mortgagee, who has possession of his estate, to deliver it back and account for the rents and profits received, on payment of his whole debt and interest; thereby turning the mortuum into a kind of vivum vadium. But, on the other hand, the mortgagee may either compel the sale of the estate, in order to get the whole of his money immediately; or else call upon the mortgagor to redeem his estate presently, or, in default thereof, to be forever foreclosed from redeeming the same; that is, to lose his equity of redemption without possibility of recall. And also, in some cases of fraudulent mortgages,<sup>a</sup> the fraudulent mortgagor forfeits all equity of redemption whatsoever. It is not, however, usual for mortgagees to take possession of the mortgaged estate, unless where the security is precarious, or small; or where the mortgagor neglects even the payment of interest: when the mortgagee is frequently obliged to bring an ejection, and take the land into his own hands, in the nature of a pledge, or the pignus of the Roman law; whereas, while it remains in the hands of the mortgagor, it more resembles their hypotheca, which was where the possession of the thing pledged remained with the debtor.<sup>b</sup> But, by statute 7 Geo. II, c. 20 (Mortgage, 1733), after payment or tender by the mortgagor of principal, interest, and costs, the mortgagee can maintain no ejection; but may be compelled to reassign his securities. In Glanvill's time, when the universal method of conveyance was by livery of seisin [160] or corporal tradition of the lands, no gage or pledge of lands was good unless possession was also delivered to the creditor; “si non sequatur ipsius vadii traditio, curia domini regis hujusmodi privatas conventiones tueri non solet (if delivery of the pledge itself do not follow, the king’s court is not accustomed to take cognizance of private agreements of this kind)”: for which the reason given is, to prevent subsequent and fraudulent pledges of the same land: “cum in tali casu possit eadem res pluribus aliis creditoribus tum prius tum posterius invadiari (since in such a case the same thing might be pledged to many creditors as well before as afterwards).”<sup>c</sup> And the frauds which have arisen, since the exchange of these public and notorious conveyances for more private and secret bargains, have well evinced the wisdom of our ancient law.

§ 216. 4. Estates by statute merchant and statute staple.—A fourth species of estates, defeasible on condition subsequent, are those held by statute merchant, and statute staple; which are very nearly related to the vivum vadium before mentioned, or estate held till the profits thereof shall discharge a debt liquidated or ascertained. For both the statute merchant and statute staple are securities for money; the one entered into pursuant to the statute 13 Edw. I de mercatoribus (1285), and thence called a statute merchant; the other pursuant to the statute 27 Edw. III, c. 9 (1353), before the mayor of the staple, that is to say, the grand mart for the principal commodities or manufactures of the kingdom, formerly held by act of parliament in certain trading towns,<sup>d</sup> and thence this security is called a statute staple. They are both, I say, securities for debts, originally permitted only among traders, for the benefit of commerce; whereby the lands of the debtor are conveyed to the creditor, till out of the rents and profits of them his debt may be satisfied: and, during such time as the creditor so holds the lands, he is tenant by statute merchant or statute staple. There is also a similar security, the recognizance in the nature of a statute staple, which extends the benefit of this mercantile transaction to all the king's subjects in general, by virtue of the statute 23 Hen. VIII, c. 6 (Recognizances for Debt, 1531).<sup>* 7</sup>

§ 217. 5. Estate by elegit.—Another similar conditional estate, created by operation of law, for security and satisfaction of debts, is called an <sup>[161]</sup> estate by elegit.<sup>8</sup> What an elegit is, and why so called, will be explained in the third part of these Commentaries. At present I need only mention, that it is the name of a writ, founded on the statute<sup>o</sup> of Westm. 2, by which, after a plaintiff has obtained judgment for his debt of law, the sheriff gives him possession of one-half of the defendant's lands and tenements, to be held, occupied, and enjoyed, until his debt and damages are fully paid: and, during the time he so holds them, he is called tenant by elegit. It is easy to observe that this is also a mere conditional estate, defeasible as soon as the debt is levied. But it is remarkable, that the feudal restraints of alienating lands, and charging them with the debts of the owner, were softened much

* Ninth edition adds, "Amended by 8 Geo. I. c. 25 (1721), which direct such recognizance to be enrolled and certified into chancery. But these, by the statute of frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3 (1677), are only binding upon the lands in the hands of bona fide purchasers from the day of their enrollment, which is ordered to be marked on the record."

o 13 Edw. I, c. 18 (Damages, 1285).

<sup>8</sup> Writ of elegit.—The statute of Westminster 2 provided that the creditor might have a writ commanding the sheriff to "deliver to him [all the chattels of the debtor saving only his oxen and beasts of his plow, and] the one-half of his land, until the debt be levied upon a reasonable price or extent." This power of the creditor to seize and sell half the debtor's land is now extended to the whole. 1 & 2 Vict., c. 110 (Judgments, 1838). The writ by which this is effected has ever since the statute of Westminster 2 been called the writ of elegit. The remedy by elegit against the goods of the debtor, after having been long disused, was revived in 1880 in consequence of the discovery that it afforded a more ample protection to the creditor in the case of the bankruptcy of the debtor. By the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 the writ of elegit is no longer to affect goods; and the words of the statute of Westminster 2 in brackets as quoted above are repealed. See Digby, Hist. Real Prop. (5th ed.), 281; 3 Bl. Comm. 418. The writ is still, to some extent, in use in the United States. 4 Kent, Comm. 431, 436.

earlier and much more effectually for the benefit of trade and commerce, than for any other consideration. Before the statute of quia emptores,<sup>f</sup> it is generally thought that the proprietor of lands was enabled to alienate no more than a moiety of them: the statute, therefore, of Westm. 2 permits only so much of them to be affected by the process of law as a man was capable of alienating by his own deed. But by the statute de mercatoribus (passed in the same year<sup>g</sup>) the whole of a man's lands was liable to be pledged in a statute merchant, for a debt contracted in trade; though only half of them was liable to be taken in execution for any other debt of the owner.

§ 218. a. Chattels real.—I shall conclude what I had to remark of these estates, by statute merchant, statute staple, and elegit, with the observation of Sir Edward Coke,<sup>h</sup> “These tenants have uncertain interests in lands and tenements, and yet they have but chattels and no freeholds” (which makes them an exception to the general rule); “because though they may hold an estate of inheritance, or for life, ut liberum tenementum (as a freehold), until their debt be paid; yet it shall go to their executors: for ut is similitudinary; and though, to recover their estates, they shall have the same remedy (by assize) as a tenant of the freehold shall have,* yet it is but the similitude [162] of a freehold, and nullum simile est idem (things similar are not the same).” This indeed only proves them to be chattel interests, because they go to the executors, which is inconsistent with the nature of a freehold: but it does not assign the reason why these estates, in contradistinction to other uncertain interests, shall vest in the executors of the tenant and not the heir; which is probably owing to this: that, being a security and remedy provided for personal debts due to the deceased, to which debts the executor is entitled, the law has, therefore, thus directed their succession; as judging it reasonable, from a principle of natural equity, that the security and remedy should be vested in them, to whom the debts if recovered would belong. And, upon the same principle, if lands be devised to a man's executor, until out of their profits the debts due from the testator be discharged, this interest in the lands shall be a chattel interest, and on the death of such executor shall go to his executors: because they, being liable to pay the original testator's debts, so far as his assets will extend, are in reason entitled to possess that fund, out of which he has directed them to be paid.

OF ESTATES IN POSSESSION, REMAINDER, AND REVERSION.

§ 219. Estates in respect to the time of enjoyment.—Hitherto we have considered estates solely with regard to their duration, or the quantity of interest which the owners have therein. We are now to consider them in another view; with regard to the time of their enjoyment, when the actual permanency of the profits (that is, the taking, perception, or receipt, of the rents and other advantages arising therefrom) begins. Estates, therefore, with respect to this consideration, may either be in possession, or in expectancy: and of expectancies there are two sorts; one created by act of the parties, called a remainder; the other by act of law, and called a reversion.

§ 220. 1. Estates in possession.—Of estates in possession (which are sometimes called estates executed, whereby a present interest passes to and resides in the tenant, not depending on any subsequent circumstance or contingency, as in the case of estates executory), there is little or nothing peculiar to be observed.<sup>1</sup> All the estates we have hitherto spoken of are of this kind; for, in laying down general rules, we usually apply them to such estates as are then actually in the tenant's possession. But the doctrine of estates in expectancy contains some of the nicest and most ab-

<sup>1</sup> But it is material to remark, that a man may have an estate in possession in land, and may yet not be in actual possession of the land. For it has long been the settled rule of law, that a freehold interest which is merely subject to a term of years, is an interest in possession; and the owner of such freehold interest, if actually in receipt of the profits of the term, is properly described as being seised in his demesne as of fee (or freehold). (See Challis, Real Property (2d ed.), p. 89.) The origin of this rule was, undoubtedly, the doctrine of the common law, that the occupation of the lessee for years was not seisin, but a minor kind of possession, the existence of which was not inconsistent with the seisin of the lessor. And although, by changes in the law, this distinction has become of less importance, yet the old rule survives for some purposes, e. g., to enable a widow to claim dower out of her husband's reversion on a term of years, which she cannot do out of a true reversion. (Co. Litt. 29 b, 32 a.)—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 210.

struse learning in the English law. These will therefore require a minute discussion, and demand some degree of attention.

§ 221. 2. Estates in remainder.—<sup>[164]</sup> An estate, then, in remainder may be defined to be an estate limited to take effect and be enjoyed after another estate is determined. As if a man seised in fee simple granteth lands to A for twenty years, and, after the determination of the said term, then to B and his heirs forever: here A is tenant for years, remainder to B in fee. In the first place, an estate for years is created or carved out of the fee, and given to A; and the residue or remainder of it is given to B. But both these interests are in fact only one estate; the present term of years and the remainder afterwards, when added together, being equal only to one estate in fee.<sup>a</sup> They are indeed different parts, but they constitute only one whole: they are carved out of one and the same inheritance: they are both created, and may both subsist, together; the one in possession, the other in expectancy. So if land be granted to A for twenty years, and after the determination of the said term to B for life; and after the determination of B's estate for life, it be limited to C and his heirs forever: this makes A tenant for years, with remainder to B for life, remainder over to C in fee. Now, here the estate of inheritance undergoes a division into three portions: there is first A's estate for years carved out of it; and after that B's estate for life; and then the whole that remains is limited to C and his heirs. And here also the first estate, and both the remainders, for life and in fee, are one estate only; being nothing but parts or portions of one entire inheritance: and if there were a hundred remainders, it would still be the same thing; upon a principle grounded in mathematical truth, that all the parts are equal, and no more than equal, to the whole.

§ 222. No remainder on a fee simple.—And hence, also, it is easy to collect, that no remainder can be limited after the grant of an estate in fee simple:<sup>b</sup> because a fee simple is the highest and largest estate, that a subject is capable of enjoying; and he that is tenant in fee hath in him the whole of the estate: a remainder, therefore, which is only a portion, or residuary part, of the estate, cannot be reserved after the whole is disposed of. A particular estate, with all <sup>[165]</sup> the remainders expectant thereon, is only one fee simple; as 40*l.* is a part of 100*l.* and 60*l.* is the remainder of it: wherefore, after a fee simple once vested, there can no more be a remainder limited thereon, than after the whole 100*l.* is appropriated there can be any residue subsisting.

§ 223. a. Rules on the creation of remainders.—Thus much being premised, we shall be the better enabled to comprehend the rules that are laid down by law to be observed in the creation of remainders, and the reasons upon which those rules are founded.

§ 224. (1) The particular estate.—And, first, there must necessarily be some particular estate, precedent to the estate in remainder.<sup>c</sup> As, an estate for years to A, remainder to B for life; or, an estate for life to A, remainder to B in tail. This precedent estate is called the particular estate, as being only a small part, or particular, of the inheritance; the residue or remainder of which is granted over to another. The necessity of creating this preceding particular estate, in order to make a good remainder, arises from this plain reason; that remainder is a relative expression, and implies that some part of the thing is previously disposed of: for, where the whole is conveyed at once, there cannot possibly exist a remainder; but the interest granted, whatever it be, will be an estate in possession.

§ 225. Estates in futuro.—An estate created to commence at a distant period of time without any intervening estate, is therefore properly no remainder: it is the whole of the gift, and not a residuary part. And such future estates can only be made of chattel interests, which were considered in the light of mere contracts by the ancient law,<sup>d</sup> to be executed either now or hereafter, as the contracting parties should agree: but an estate of freehold must be created to commence immediately. For it is an ancient rule of the common law that no estate of freehold can be created to commence in futuro; but it ought to take effect presently either in possession or remainder;* because at common [166] law no freehold in lands could pass without livery of seisin: which must operate either immediately, or not at all. It would therefore be contradictory, if an estate, which is not to commence till hereafter, could be granted by a conveyance which imports an immediate possession. Therefore, though a lease to A for seven years, to commence from next Michaelmas, is good; yet a conveyance to B of lands, to hold to him and his heirs forever from the end of three years next ensuing, is void. So that when it is intended to grant an estate of freehold, whereof the enjoyment shall be deferred till a future time, it is necessary to create a previous particular estate, which may subsist till that period of time is completed; and for the grantor to deliver immediate possession of the land to the tenant of this particular estate, which is construed to be giving possession to him in remainder, since his estate and that of the particular tenant are one and the same estate in law. As, where one leases to A for three years, with remainder to B in fee, and makes livery of seisin to A; here by the livery the freehold is immediately created, and vested in B, during the continuance of A's term of years. The whole estate passes at once from the grantor to the grantees, and the remainderman is seised of his remainder at the same time that the termor is possessed of his term.<sup>2</sup> The enjoyment of it must indeed be deferred till here-

• 5 Rep. 94.

<sup>2</sup> Seisin of remainderman.—In strict logic, there can be neither remainder nor reversion after a term of years. As Blackstone here shows, “the freehold is immediately created [or in case of a reversion is reserved] and vested in [the remainderman] B during the continuance of A's term of years.” Hence B's estate is an estate of freehold in possession, whether it comes to him from another by livery of seisin made to the termor in his behalf, or being in him is not parted with, when he creates the term himself. Hence, also, there can be no contingent remainder after such a term, any more than there possibly can be such a thing as a contingent reversion. If this rule had always been recognized, the entire doctrine of remainders would be greatly simplified: it would have to deal only with freehold estates, the rules of which are comparatively simple. But it is altogether too late to correct the usage, which dates at least from the thirteenth century, as Britton shows, and from a time when seisin was predicated as freely of terms and other chattel interests, and even of personal chattels; as it has since been of freeholds. This is beginning after; but it is to all intents and purposes an estate commencing in presenti (immediately), though to be occupied and enjoyed in futuro (at a future time).

§ 226. Estates at will.—As no remainder can be created, without such a precedent particular estate, therefore the particular estate is said to support the remainder. But a lease at will is not held to be such a particular estate, as will support a remainder over.† For an estate at will is of a nature so slender and precarious, that it is not looked upon as a portion of the inheritance; and a portion must first be taken out of it, in order to constitute a remainder. Besides, if it be a freehold remainder, livery of seisin must be given at the time of its creation; and the entry of the grantor, to do this, determines the estate at will [167] in the very instant in which it is made:‡ or if it be a chattel interest, though perhaps it might operate as a future contract, if the tenant for years be a party to the deed of creation, yet it is void by way of remainder: for it is a separate independent contract, distinct from the precedent estate at will; and every remainder must be part of one and the same estate, out of which the preceding particular estate is taken.§ And hence it is generally true, that if the particular estate is void in its creation, or by any means is to be well understood: indeed, the chief difficulty now seems to be, to convince historical students that there is no mystery in this original use of the word “seisin” for mere possession. But it will assist the beginner, materially, to remember that all the rules for remainders after chattel interests in land really belong to estates that are already freehold, and in seisin, although the mere possession is in the termor: or, in other words, that so far as the doctrine of remainders is concerned, the term of years may be regarded as a nullity, or as a mere contract with the real owner of the land, not an estate in it.—HAMMOND.

defeated afterwards, the remainder supported thereby shall be defeated also:<sup>l</sup> as where the particular estate is an estate for the life of a person not in esse (in existence);<sup>k</sup> or an estate for life upon condition, on breach of which condition the grantor enters and avoids the estate;<sup>l</sup> in either of these cases the remainder over is void.

§ 227. (2) Remainder and particular estate commence at same time.—A second rule to be observed is this; that the remainder must commence or pass out of the grantor at the time of the creation of the particular estate.<sup>m</sup> As, where there is an estate to A for life, with remainder to B in fee: here B's remainder in fee passes from the grantor at the same time that seisin is delivered to A of his life estate in possession. And it is this which induces the necessity at common law of livery of seisin being made on the particular estate, whenever a freehold remainder is created. For, if it be limited even on an estate for years, it is necessary that the lessee for years should have livery of seisin, in order to convey the freehold from and out of the grantor; otherwise the remainder is void.<sup>n</sup> Not that the livery is necessary to strengthen the estate for years; but, as livery of the land is requisite to convey the freehold, and yet cannot be given to him in remainder without infringing the possession of the lessee for years, therefore the law allows such livery made to the tenant of the particular estate, to relate and inure to him in remainder, as both are but one estate in law.<sup>o</sup>

instantly in the survivor: wherefore both these are good remainders. But, if an estate be limited to A for life, remainder to the eldest son of B in tail, and A dies before B hath any son; here the remainder will be void, for it did not vest in anyone during the continuance, nor at the determination, of the particular estate: and, even supposing that B should afterwards have a son, he shall not take by this remainder; for as it did not vest at or before the end of the particular estate, it never can vest at all, but is gone forever.<sup>3</sup> And this depends upon the principle before laid down, that the precedent particular estate, and the remainder are one estate in law; they must therefore subsist and be in esse at one and the same instant of time, either during the continuance of the first estate or at the very instant when that determines, so that no other estate can possibly come between them. For there can be no intervening estate between the particular estate, and the remainder supported thereby: the thing supported must fall to the ground, if once its support be severed from it.

§ 229. b. Division of remainders.—It is upon these rules, but principally the last, that the doctrine of contingent remainders depends. For remainders are either vested or contingent.

§ 230. (1) Vested remainders.—Vested remainders (or remainders executed, whereby a present interest passes to the party, though to be enjoyed in futuro) are where the estate is invariably fixed, to remain to a determinate person, after the [169] particular estate is spent.<sup>4</sup> As if A be tenant for twenty years, remainder

<sup>4</sup> Vested and contingent remainders.—This definition requires that the person who will certainly take at the end of the particular estate (provided he lives until then), be now determined. But the definition given by Kent, and repeatedly approved by the United States supreme court and other American courts, is that “it is the present capacity of taking effect in possession, if the possession were to become vacant, that distinguishes a vested from a contingent remainder.” (4 Comm. 203.) The difference between these two definitions is marked, though it has often been overlooked in the discussion of an intricate subject. Under the latter, every remainder is vested if the remainderman is capable of taking at this moment, should the estate fall in. Blackstone requires in addition that he should also be certain to take whenever it does fall to B in fee; here B's is a vested remainder, which nothing can defeat, or set aside.

§ 231. (2) Contingent remainders.—Contingent or executory remainders (whereby no present interest passes) are where the estate in remainder is limited to take effect, either to a dubious and uncertain person, or upon a dubious and uncertain event; so that the particular estate may chance to be determined, and the remainder never take effect.*

§ 232. (a) Limited to uncertain person.—First, they may be limited to a dubious and uncertain person. As if A be tenant for life, with remainder to B's eldest son (then unborn) in tail; this is a contingent remainder, for it is uncertain whether B will have a son or no: but the instant that a son is born, the remainder is no longer contingent, but vested. Though, if A had died before the contingency happened, that is, before B's son was born, the remainder would have absolutely gone; for the particular estate was determined before the remainder could vest. Nay, by the strict rule of law, if A were tenant for life, remainder to his own eldest son in tail, and A died without issue born, but leaving his wife enceinte or big with child, and after his death a posthumous son was born, this son could not take the land, by virtue of this remainder; for the particular estate determined before there was any person in esse, in whom the remainder could vest.† But, to remedy this hardship, it is enacted by statute 10 & 11 W. III, c. 16

in; provided, of course, he lives long enough. Any other contingency than his death, which may prevent him from taking at that time, is fatal to the vested character of the remainder: while, according to the other rule, "if there is a present right to a future possession, though that right may be defeated by some future event, contingent or certain, there is nevertheless a vested estate." (Lourie, J., in Manderson v. Lukens, 23 Pa. St. 31, 62 Am. Dec. 312; Carver v. Jackson, 4 Pet. 1, 90, 7 L. Ed. 761, 792.)

In New York and some other states the latter rule is now adopted by statute, and of course is binding. For the doubts created by overlooking the change thus made, compare Olney v. Hull, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 311; Thomson v. Ludington, 104 Mass. 193; Moore v. Littel, 41 N. Y. 66; Doe v. Considine, 6 Wall. 458, 18 L. Ed. 869.—HAMMOND.

(Posthumous Children, 1698), that posthumous children shall be capable of taking in remainder, in the same manner as if they had been born in their father's lifetime: that is, the remainder is allowed to vest in them, while yet in their mother's womb.<sup>u</sup>

§ 233. (i) Common possibility.—This species of contingent remainders, to a person not in being, must, however, be limited to someone, that may by common possibility, or potentia propinqua (a near possibility), be in esse at or before the particular estate determines.<sup>v</sup> As if an estate be [170] made to A for life, remainder to the heirs of B: now, if A dies before B, the remainder is at an end; for during B's life he has no heir, nemo est hæres viventis (no one is heir of a living person): but if B dies first, the remainder then immediately vests in his heir, who will be entitled to the land on the death of A. This is a good contingent remainder, for the possibility of B's dying before A is potentia propinqua (a near possibility), and therefore allowed in law.<sup>x</sup> But a remainder to the right heirs of B (if there be no such person as B in esse) is void.<sup>y</sup> For here there must two contingencies happen; first, that such a person as B shall be born; and secondly, that he shall also die during the continuance of the particular estate; which make it potentia remotissima, a most improbable possibility. A remainder to a man's eldest son, who hath none (we have seen), is good; for by common possibility he may have one; but if it be limited in particular to his son John, or Richard, it is bad, if he have no son of that name: for it is too remote a possibility that he should not only have a son, but a son of a particular name.<sup>z</sup> A limitation of a remainder to a bastard before it is born, is not good:<sup>a</sup> for though the law allows the possibility of having bastards, it presumes it to be a very remote and improbable contingency. Thus may a remainder be contingent, on account of the uncertainty of the person who is to take it.

§ 234. (b) Limited on uncertain event.—A remainder may also be contingent, where the person to whom it is limited is fixed and certain, but the event upon which it is to take effect is vague and uncertain. As, where land is given to A for life, and in case B survives him, then with remainder to B in fee; here B is a certain person, but the remainder to him is a contingent remainder, depending upon a dubious event, the uncertainty of his surviving A. During the joint lives of A and B it is contingent; and if B dies first, it never can vest in his heirs, but is forever gone; but if A dies first, the remainder to B becomes vested.

§ 235. (c) Freeholds limited only on freeholds.—<sup>[171]</sup> Contingent remainders of either kind, if they amount to a freehold, cannot be limited on an estate for years, or any other particular estate, less than a freehold. Thus if land be granted to A for ten years, with remainder in fee to the right heirs of B, this remainder is void:<sup>b</sup> but if granted to A for life, with a like remainder, it is good. For, unless the freehold passes out of the grantor at the time when the remainder is created, such freehold remainder is void: it cannot pass out of him, without vesting somewhere; and in the case of a contingent remainder it must vest in the particular tenant, else it can vest nowhere: unless, therefore, the estate of such particular tenant be of a freehold nature, the freehold cannot vest in him, and consequently the remainder is void.

§ 236. (d) Contingent remainders, how defeated.—Contingent remainders may be defeated, by destroying or determining the particular estate upon which they depend, before the contingency happens whereby they become vested.<sup>c 5</sup> Therefore, when there is tenant for life, with divers remainders in contingency, he may, not only by his death, but by alienation, surrender, or other methods, destroy and determine his own life estate, before any of those remainders vest; the consequence of which is that he utterly defeats them all. As, if there be tenant for life, with remainder to his eldest son unborn in tail, and the tenant for life, before any son is born, surrenders his life estate, he by that means defeats the remainder in tail to his son: for his son not being in esse, when the particular estate determined, the remainder could not then vest; and, as it could not vest then, by the rules before laid down, it never can vest at all.

<sup>5</sup> Contingent remainders, how defeated.—But a mere disseisin of the particular tenant will not destroy them, so long as he retains a right of entry. (Fearne on Remainders, p. 286.) Of course the tenant's alienation that merely transfers his estate to another will not destroy the remainders. Aliter, if he destroys the estate, as by feoffment. But it is questionable whether this rule applies in states where the tenant's alienation is by statute good only to the extent that he may legally transfer, and does not work a forfeiture.—HAMMOND.

§ 237. (i) How preserved from defeat.—In these cases, therefore, it is necessary to have trustees appointed to preserve the contingent remainders; in whom there is vested an estate in remainder for the life of the tenant for life, to commence when his determines. If, therefore, his estate for life determines otherwise than by his death, their estate,* for the residue of his natural life, will then take effect, and become a [172] particular estate in possession, sufficient to support the remainders depending in contingency. This method is said to have been invented by Sir Orlando Bridgman, Sir Geoffrey Palmer, and other eminent council, who betook themselves to conveyancing during the time of the civil wars; in order thereby to secure in family settlements a provision for the future children of an intended marriage, who before were usually left at the mercy of the particular tenant for life:<sup>d</sup> and when after the Restoration, those gentlemen came to fill the first offices of the law, they supported this invention within reasonable and proper bounds, and introduced it into general use.

§ 238. c. Executory devises.—Thus the student will observe how much nicety is required in creating and securing a remainder; and I trust he will in some measure see the general reasons, upon which this nicety is founded.<sup>e</sup> It were endless to attempt to enter

<sup>e</sup> Executory estates.—Mr. Fearne objects to this definition as too broad, because it covers also contingent remainders given by will, and would substitute for it: "Such a limitation of a future estate or interest in lands or chattels (though in the case of chattels personal it is more properly an executory bequest), as the law admits in the case of a will, though contrary to the rules upon the particular subtleties and refinements, into which this doctrine, by the variety of cases which have occurred in the course of many centuries, has been spun out and subdivided: neither are they consonant to the design of these elementary disquisitions. I must not, however, omit, that in devises by last will and testament (which, being often drawn up when the party is inops consilii (without counsel), are always more favored in construction than formal deeds, which are presumed to be made with great caution, forethought, and advice), in these devises, I say, remainders may be created in some measure contrary to the rules before laid down: though our lawyers will not allow such dispositions to be strictly remainders; but call them by another name, that of executory devises, or devises hereafter to be executed.

§ 239. (1) Differences between remainders and executory devises.—An executory devise of lands is such a disposition of them by will, that thereby no estate vests at the death of the devisor, but only on some future contingency.<sup>7</sup> It differs from a of limitation in conveyances at common law." (Civil Remainders, p. 368; Coleman's Epitome, p. 75.)

But the American student must remember that in many states by statute such interests may be created by deed as well as will, and should properly be termed "executory estates" rather than executory devises. In other respects Blackstone's description applies to them.—HAMMOND.

"Facts: Property is limited to Edward Shelley for life, remainder to the heirs male of his body. Edward Shelley has two sons, Henry and Richard. Henry, the elder, dies in his father's lifetime, leaving a daughter, and a wife enceinte, him surviving. Edward Shelley, the father, dies while Henry's widow is still enceinte; and Richard enters as heir male. Shortly after, Henry's widow gives birth to a posthumous son.

"Question: Is the posthumous son entitled to the property?"

"Held: The answer to this question depends upon whether, under a limitation of a freehold to the ancestor, with remainder to the heirs, the heirs take remainder in three very material points: 1. That it needs not any [173] particular estate to support it. 2. That by it a fee simple or other less estate may be limited after a fee simple. 3. That by this means a remainder may be limited of a chattel interest after a particular estate for life created in the same.

§ 240. (a) Particular estate not necessary in executory devise.—The first case happens when a man devises a future estate to arise upon a contingency; and, till that contingency happens, does not dispose of the fee simple, but leaves it to descend to his heir at law. As if one devises land to a feme sole and her heirs, upon her day of marriage: here is in effect a contingent remainder without any particular estate to support it; a freehold commencing by descent or purchase. If by purchase, the posthumous son cannot claim the property, since he was in utero at the time of the ancestor's [E. S.'s] death. But if, under such limitation, the heirs take by descent, the posthumous son will be entitled: for it is a technical rule of law that for the purpose of taking by descent, a child en ventre sa mere must be regarded as standing in the position of a child in esse; and so regarded, Henry's son would be entitled as heir male before his father's younger brother Richard.

"The court, following a long-established principle (subsequently known as the Rule in Shelley's Case), held that under the form of limitation in question, the heirs take by descent and not purchase, and that the posthumous son was accordingly entitled.

"Proposition: Where, in the same instrument, a freehold is limited to the ancestor and a remainder to his heirs, the heirs are words of limitation of the estate and not of purchase. 1 Co. 104a."—SPITZ, Cond. and Fut. Int. 39.

Origin of the rule.—According to Blackstone (Harg. Law Tracts, 501), the Rule in Shelley's Case is merely a reiteration of an ancient principle, first mentioned in Abel's Case, 18 Edw. II, 577 (1324). Coke (1 Co. 105b) informs us that Shelley's Case itself, owing to the nicety of the questions and the extent of the interests involved, aroused widespread discussion, and that all the judges were assembled in conference by Queen Elizabeth for its determination. Spitz, Cond. and Fut. Int. 39; 2 Reeves, Real Prop. § 892; Digby, Hist. Real Prop. (5th ed.), 269. 1 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), p. 226, says: "With regard to the origin and reason of the Rule in Shelley's Case, opinion is somewhat divided. But the reasonable view appears to be, that it was introduced in the interests of the crown and the feudal magnates, who, if it had been possible to split up every fee into two successive estates, the one in possession, held by a tenant for life, and the other in remainder, claimed by the expectant heir as a purchaser, would have been deprived of those numerous and profitable prerequisites of forfeiture, escheat, wardship, marriage, and in futuro (at a future period). This limitation, though it would be void in a deed, yet is good in a will, by way of executory devise.* For, since by a devise a freehold may pass without corporal tradition or livery of seisin (as it must do, if it passes at all), therefore it may commence in futuro; because the principal reason why it cannot commence in futuro in other cases is the necessity of actual seisin, which always operates in presenti (immediately). And, since it may thus commence in futuro, there is no need of a particular estate to support it; the only use of which is to make the remainder, by its unity with the particular estate, a present interest. And hence, also, it follows, that such an executory devise, not being a present interest, cannot be barred by a recovery, suffered before it commences.†

the like, which, for the most part, only accrued upon the descent of an estate in fee. However this may be, it is very material for the student to observe—(1) that the rule is now so firmly fixed in our law, that not even an expressed intention on the part of the settler will prevent it applying; (2) that it holds where both the limitations are equitable, as well as where they are both legal. In other words, the rule is not a rule of construction, but a rule of law; and it applies to equitable as well as to legal interests.” (The rule was discussed, with great learning and ingenuity by the late Lord MacNaghten, in the case of Van Grutten v. Foxwell, [1897] App. Cas. 658.)

Rule in Shelley's Case in United States.—The rule in Shelley's Case has been abolished in a number of states (among others, California, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, New York, Virginia, and Wisconsin), and where this is the case, the ancestor will take a life estate with a contingent remainder to his heirs. 1 Stimson, Am. Stat. Law, § 1406; Trumbull v. Trumbull, 149 Mass. 200, 4 L. R. A. 117, 21 N. E. 366; Wilson v. Alston, 122 Ala. 630, 25 South. 225; Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 37 Pac. 1049. In this connection, see the well-known lament of Chancellor Kent on the abolition of the rule in New York, 4 Kent, Comm., 233, note. On the desirability of the abrogation of the rule, see 1 Tiffany, Real Prop., § 133, note. In many states the rule remains in full force. Zabriskie v. Wood, 23 N. J. Eq. 541; Waller v. Pollitt, 104 Md. 172, 64 Atl. 1040; Johnson v. Buck, 220 Ill. 226, 77 N. E. 163; Hubbird v. Goin, 137 Fed. 822, 70 C. C. A. 320; Lee v. Lee, 45 Ind. App. 645, 91 N. E. 507; *Sagers v. A valuable discussion of the rule and its use in Illinois may be found in Kales, Fut. Interests, § 127 ff.

§ 241. (b) Fee, or less estate, limited on executory devise.—By executory devise a fee, or other less estate, may be limited after a fee. And this happens where a devisor devises his whole estate in fee, but limits a remainder thereon to commence on a future contingency. As if a man devises land to A and his heirs; but, if he dies before the age of twenty-one, then to B and his heirs: this remainder, though void in a deed, is good by way of executory devise.<sup>e</sup>

§ 242. (i) Rule against perpetuities.—But, in both these species of executory devises, the contingencies ought to be such as may happen within a reasonable time; as within one or more life or lives in being, or within a moderate [<sup>174</sup>] term of years; for courts of justice will not indulge even wills, so as to create a perpetuity, which the law abhors:<sup>h</sup> because by perpetuities (or the settlement of an interest, which shall go in the succession prescribed, without any power of alienation<sup>1</sup>) estates are made incapable of answering those ends, of social commerce, and providing for the sudden contingencies of private life, for which property was at first established. The utmost length that has been hitherto allowed for the contingency of an executory devise of either kind to happen in, is that of a life or lives in being, and one and twenty years afterwards. As when lands are devised to such unborn son of a feme covert, as shall first attain the age of twenty-one, and his heirs; the utmost length of time that can happen before the estate can vest, is the life of the mother and the subsequent infancy of her son: and this hath been decreed to be a good executory devise.<sup>k s</sup>

<sup>s</sup> Rule against perpetuities.—The rule against perpetuities has been stated by a learned writer upon the rule, in the following language: “No interest is good unless it must vest, if at all, not later than twenty-one years after some life in being at the creation of the interest.” (Gray, Perpetuities, 2d ed., sec. 201.) It is apparent from this definition that a more accurate designation of the rule would be the rule against remoteness. An illustration of a limitation void under the rule is where a testator makes an executory devise to such children of A as may attain the age of twenty-five years. (Leake,

§ 243. (c) Remainder limited on a chattel interest.—By executory devise a term of years may be given to one man for his life, and afterwards limited over in remainder to another, which could not be done by deed: for by law the first grant of it, to a man for life, was a total disposition of the whole term; a life estate being esteemed of a higher and larger nature than any term of years.<sup>1</sup> And, at first, the courts were tender, even in the case of a will, of restraining the devisee for life from aliening the term; but only held, that in case he died without exerting that act of ownership, the remainder over should then take place:<sup>m</sup> for the Property in Land, 2d ed., 322.) A may possibly have a child born after the testator's death, and though there are other children of A living at testator's death, not until the subsequently born child either reaches twenty-five or dies before that time can the interest vest. Until that time it is impossible to say who will be the children entitled. The limitation is therefore void, for there is the possibility that the interest will not vest within lives in being at the time of the creation of the limitation plus the period of twenty-one years, and the rule requires that it must vest within that time. And the person claiming that the limitation is valid cannot argue that it is a physical impossibility that A should have other children by reason of extreme age or other incapacity. (Jee v. Audley, 1 Cox Ch. 324, 29 Eng. Reprint, 1186.) Nor does it matter that the actual fact is that A has children all of whom are over twenty-five years of age at the time of testator's death, and that in fact there is no child subsequently born. (Williams, Real Property, 21st ed., 407.) In the application of the rule against perpetuities, the law will not permit anything short of the absolute logical certainty of the vesting within the prescribed period to render valid a future limitation. The only relaxation of the extreme rigor of the rule is in the case where there is an unborn child actually begotten but not born at the beginning or the end of the period. In such a case, the gross term of twenty-one years may be increased by the actual period of gestation. (Leake, Property in Land, 2d ed., §17.)

The rule against perpetuities is an instance of judicial legislation, operating in comparatively recent times. As Blackstone says, it is based upon the impolicy of permitting estates to be limited so as "to be made incapable of answering those ends of social commerce, . . . for which property was at first established," or to use the phrase of a modern economist, it is a development of the principle of the "fluidity of property." (Ely, Property and Contract in Relation to the Distribution of Wealth, vol. I, c. xviii.) Just as the mediæval judges invented the doctrine of common recoveries in support of this principle, so the judges of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries invented the rule against perpetuities for the same reason. In 1620, in the restraint of the power of alienation, especially in very long terms, was introducing a species of perpetuity. But, soon afterwards, it was held,<sup>a</sup> that the devisee for life hath no power of alienating the term, so as to bar the remainderman: yet in order to prevent the danger of perpetuities, it was settled,<sup>o</sup> that though such remainders may be limited to as many persons successfully as the devisor thinks proper, yet they must all be [175] in esse during the life of the first devisee; for then all the candles are lighted and are consuming together, and the ultimate remainder is in reality only to that remainderman who happens to survive the rest: or, that such remainder may be limited to take effect upon such contin-

case of Pells v. Brown (Cro. Jac. 590, 79 Eng. Reprint, 504), it was established that a future limitation by way of executory devise was indestructible. If such limitations were to be permitted indefinitely, the probable result would be the withdrawal of property from the ordinary channels of commerce. To obviate this evil, Lord Chancellor Nottingham, in the Duke of Norfolk's case, in 1681, enunciated the rule in its original form,—that the future interest by way of executory devise is valid if it must necessarily vest within the period of lives in being at the time of its creation. (3 Chan. Cas. 1; Pollexfen, 223.) When Blackstone wrote, the precise limits of the period within which the future estate must vest were not absolutely settled, and with his usual accuracy, he states that “the utmost length that has been hitherto allowed . . . is that of a life or lives in being and one and twenty years afterwards.” Since his book was written, the rule in its modern form has been definitely settled in Cadell v. Palmer, decided by the house of lords in 1832 (1 Cl. & F. 372, 411, 6 Eng. Reprint, 956). It can now be stated that the period of lives in being plus the gross term of twenty-one years (that is, without reference to the actual minority of children), is the utmost time that will be allowed for the vesting of future estates,—allowing the period of gestation also, where necessary. The rule in this form prevails as part of the common law of America. (Becker v. Chester, 115 Wis. 90, 91 N. W. 87.)

Blackstone treats of the rule with reference only to executory devises, and it is true that in his time courts had not applied the rule to other future interests, and that it was invented to prevent the inconveniences that would flow from the decision in Pells v. Brown. But the rule has been extended since Blackstone wrote so as to cover almost every kind of future interest, whether legal or equitable, whether in realty or personalty. Contingent remainders, rights of entry for breach of common-law conditions, equitable interests under contracts of sale of real property, all have been held subject to the rule by the English courts. (Leake, Property in Land, 2d ed., 317.) The American courts, however, have not applied the rule to rights of entry

gency only as must happen (if at all) during the life of the first devisee.<sup>p</sup>

Thus much for such estates in expectancy, as are created by the express words of the parties themselves; the most intricate title in the law. There is yet another species, which is created by the act and operation of the law itself, and this is called a reversion.

§ 244. 3. Estates in reversion.—An estate in reversion is the residue of an estate left in the grantor, to commence in possession after the determination of some particular estate granted out by him.<sup>q</sup> Sir Edward Coke<sup>r</sup> describes a reversion to be the returning of land to the grantor or his heirs after the grant is over. As, if there be a gift in tail, the reversion of the fee is, without for breach of condition. (Gray, Perpetuities, 2d ed., § 304.) It should be carefully noted that the rule has no application to vested interests; it applies only where an interest is to become vested upon some contingency. It should also be observed that though the rule had its origin in the principle of freedom of alienation, it is now applied to future interests though they may be alienable. (Gray, Restraints on Alienation, 2d ed., § 8.)

“The rule against perpetuities is not a rule of construction, but a peremptory command of law. It is not, like a rule of construction, a test, more or less artificial, to determine intention. Its object is to defeat intention. Therefore, every provision in a will or settlement is to be construed as if the rule did not exist and then to the provision so construed the rule is to be remorselessly applied.” (Gray, Perpetuities, § 629.)

Closely connected with the rule against perpetuities, is the statutory rule embodied in the so-called Thellusson Act forbidding the accumulation of income for a greater period than twenty-one years or the minority of children. (39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 98, 1800.) The purpose of the act is to prevent the evils which would result from permitting accumulations during the possibly long period allowed by the rule against perpetuities. Accumulations directed to be made in violation of the statute are void only as to the excess. (Leake, Property in Land, 2d ed., 337.) Statutes similar to the Thellusson Act have been passed in many American states.

In New York, in 1828, a system apparently designed to take the place of the rule against perpetuities was adopted in the Revised Statutes. The central principle of this system is that every future interest is void which may by any possibility suspend the absolute power of alienation for more than two lives in being at the time of the creation of the estate. The absolute power of alienation is suspended when there are no persons in being by whom any special reservation, vested in the donor by act of law: and so also the reversion, after an estate for life, years, or at will, continues in the lessor. For the fee simple of all lands must abide somewhere; and if he, who was before possessed of the whole, carves out of it any smaller estate, and grants it away, whatever is not so granted remains in him. A reversion is never, therefore, created by deed or writing, but arises from construction of law; a remainder can never be limited, unless by either deed or devise. But both are equally transferable, when actually vested, being both estates in presenti, though taking effect in futuro.

§ 245. a. Incidents of reversions.—The doctrine of reversions is plainly derived from the feudal constitution. For, when a feud was granted to a man for life, or to him and his issue male, rendering either rent, or other services; then, on his death or the failure of issue male, the feud was determined and resulted back to the <sup>[170]</sup> lord or proprietor, to be again disposed of at his pleasure. And hence the usual incidents to reversions are said to be fealty and rent. When no rent is reserved on the particular estate, fealty, however, results of course, as an incident quite inseparable, and may be demanded as a badge of tenure, or acknowledgment of superiority; being frequently the only evidence that the lands are holden at all. Where rent is reserved, it is also incident, though not inseparably so, to the reversion.* The rent may be granted away, reserving the reversion; and the reversion may be granted away, reserving the rent; by special words: but by a general grant of the reversion, the rent will pass with it, as incident thereunto; though by the grant of the rent generally, the an absolute fee in possession can be conveyed. In California, the future interest is void if it may by any possibility suspend the absolute power of alienation beyond the lives of persons in being, instead of two lives in being, as in New York. (Civ. Code, §§ 715, 716.) Under these statutes it has been held that a trust to hold property for a definite period is void, irrespective of the shortness of the period. (Estate of Walkery (1895), 108 Cal. 627, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97, 41 Pac. 772.) Of the New York system, Mr. Gray says its effect "is that in no civilized country is the making of a will so delicate an operation, and so likely to fail of success, as in New York." (Gray, Perpetuities, 2d ed., § 750.)—O. K. McMURRAY.

reversion will not pass. The incident passes by the grant of the principal, but not e converso (conversely): for the maxim of law is, "Accessorium non ducit, sed sequitur, suum principale (The accessory does not precede but follows its principal)."<sup>1</sup>

§ 246. b. Distinctions between remainders and reversions.— These incidental rights of the reversioner, and the respective modes of descent, in which remainders very frequently differ from reversions, have occasioned the law to be careful in distinguishing the one from the other, however inaccurately the parties themselves may describe them. For if one, seised of a paternal estate in fee, makes a lease for life, with remainder to himself and his heirs, this is properly a mere reversion,<sup>2</sup> to which rent and fealty shall be incident; and which shall only descend to the heirs of his father's blood, and not to his heirs general, as a remainder limited to him by a third person would have done:<sup>3</sup> for it is the old estate, which was originally in him, and never yet was out of him. And so, likewise, if a man grants a lease for life to A, reserving rent, with reversion to B and his heirs, B hath a remainder descendible to his heirs general, and not a reversion to which the rent is incident; but the grantor shall be entitled to the rent, during the continuance of A's estate.<sup>4</sup>

§ 247. 4. Statute of Fraudulent Concealment of Deaths, 1707. [177] In order to assist such persons as have any estate in remainder, reversion, or expectancy, after the death of others, against fraudulent concealments of their deaths, it is enacted by the statute 6 Ann., c. 18 (1707), that all persons on whose lives any lands or tenements are holden, shall (upon application to the court of chancery and order made thereupon) once in every year, if required, be produced to the court, or its commissioners; or upon neglect or refusal, they shall be taken to be actually dead, and the person entitled to such expectant estate may enter upon and hold the lands and tenements, till the party shall appear to be living.

§ 248. 5. Doctrine of merger.—Before we conclude the doctrine of remainders and reversions, it may be proper to observe, that whenever a greater estate and a less coincide and meet in one and the same person, without any intermediate estate,<sup>7</sup> the less is immediately annihilated; or, in the law phrase, is said to be merged, that is, sunk or drowned, in the greater. Thus, if there be tenant for years, and the reversion in fee simple descends to or is purchased by him, the term of years is merged in the inheritance, and shall never exist any more. But they must come to one and the same person in one and the same right; else, if the freehold be in his own right, and he has a term in right of another (en auter droit) there is no merger. Therefore, if tenant for years dies, and makes him who hath the reversion in fee his executor, whereby the term of years vests also in him, the term shall not merge; for he hath the fee in his own right and the term of years in the right of the testator, and subject to his debts and legacies. So, also, if he who hath the reversion in fee marries the tenant for years, there is no merger; for he hath the inheritance in his own right, the lease in the right of his wife.<sup>8</sup> An estate-tail is an exception to this rule: for a man may have in his own right both an estate-tail and a reversion in fee; and the estate-tail, though a less estate, shall not merge in the fee.<sup>9</sup> For estates-tail are protected and preserved from merger by the [178] operation and construction, though not by the express words, of the statute de donis: which operation and construction have probably arisen upon this consideration; that, in the common cases of merger of estates for life or years by uniting with the inheritance, the particular tenant hath the sole interest in them, and hath full power at any time to defeat, destroy, or surrender them to him that hath the reversion; therefore, when such an estate unites with the reversion in fee, the law considers it in the light of a virtual surrender of the inferior estate.<sup>b</sup> But, in an estate-tail, the case is otherwise: the tenant for a long time had no power at all over it, so as to bar or to destroy it; and now can only do it by certain special modes, by a fine, a recovery, and the like:<sup>c</sup> it would therefore have been strangely improvident, to have permitted the tenant in tail by purchasing the reversion in fee, to merge his particular estate, and defeat the inheritance of his issue: and hence it has become a maxim, that a tenancy in tail, which cannot be surrendered, cannot also be merged in the fee.<sup>10</sup>

<sup>10</sup> The doctrine of merger has been greatly modified in England by the Judicature Act of 1873, which provides that there shall be no merger, by operation of law only, of any estate the beneficial interest in which would not be denied to be merged in equity. And as it was the rule in equity to deny a merger in all cases where any beneficial right or interest would be unjustly affected thereby, or where it was the obvious intention of the settler that no merger should take place, recent decisions have tended to restrict the operation of the principle. 1 Stephen, Comm. (16th ed.), 228. Snow v. Boycott, [1892] 3 Ch. 110; Capital and Counties Bank v. Rhodes, [1903] 1 Ch. 652; Lea v. Thursby, [1904] 2 Ch. 57.

OF ESTATES IN SEVERALTY, JOINT TENANCY, COPARCENARY, AND COMMON.

§ 249. Estates in respect to the number of their tenants.—We come now to treat of estates, with respect to the number and connections of their owners, the tenants who occupy and hold them. And, considered in this view, estates of any quantity or length of duration, and whether they be in actual possession or expectancy, may be held in four different ways;<sup>1</sup> in severalty, in joint tenancy, in coparcenary, and in common.

§ 250. 1. Estates in severalty.—He that holds lands or tenements in severalty, or is sole tenant thereof, is he that holds them in his own right only, without any other person being joined or connected with him in point of interest, during his estate therein. This is the most common and usual way of holding an estate; and therefore we may make the same observations here, that we did upon estates in possession, as contradistinguished from those in expectancy, in the preceding chapter: that there is little or nothing peculiar to be remarked concerning it, since all estates are supposed to be of this sort, unless where they are expressly declared to be otherwise; and that in laying down general rules and doctrines, we usually apply them to such estates as are held in severalty. I shall therefore proceed to consider the other three species of estates, in which there are always a plurality of tenants.

§ 251. 2. Estates in joint tenancy.—<sup>[180]</sup> An estate in joint tenancy is where lands or tenements are granted to two or more persons, to hold in fee simple, fee-tail, for life, for years, or at will.

1 Correction of a criticism on Blackstone.—This does not mean, as certain critics have assumed for the sake of correcting Blackstone, that every estate can be held in all four such ways: nor does Blackstone say so. He certainly knew, for he has said as much elsewhere, that an estate less than fee cannot be held in coparcenary. The examples of his mistake commonly given, e. g., that joint tenancy cannot be taken by descent, or coparcenary by purchase, etc., are limitations of title, not of estate. He has nowhere said that all four ways of holding an estate are consistent with any kind of a title.—HAMMOND.

In consequence of such grants an estate is called an estate in joint tenancy,<sup>a</sup> and sometimes an estate in jointure, which word as well as the other signifies an union or conjunction of interest; though in common speech the term "jointure" is now usually confined to that joint estate, which by virtue of the statute 27 Hen. VIII, c. 10 (Statute of Uses, 1535), is frequently vested in the husband and wife before marriage, as a full satisfaction and bar of the woman's dower.<sup>b</sup>

In unfolding this title, and the two remaining ones in the present chapter, we will first inquire, how these estates may be created; next, their properties and respective incidents; and lastly, how they may be severed or destroyed.

§ 252. a. Creation of joint estate.—The creation of an estate in joint tenancy depends on the wording of the deed or devise, by which the tenants claim title; for this estate can only arise by purchase or grant, that is, by the act of the parties, and never by the mere act of law. Now, if an estate be given to a plurality of persons, without adding any restrictive, exclusive, or explanatory words, as if an estate be granted to A and B and their heirs, this makes them immediately joint tenants in fee of the lands. For the law interprets the grant so as to make all parts of it take effect, which can only be done by creating an equal estate in them both. As, therefore, the grantor has thus united their names, the law gives them a thorough union in all other respects. For,

§ 253. b. Properties of joint estate.—The properties of a joint estate are derived from its unity, which is fourfold; the unity of interest, the unity of title, the unity of time, and the unity of possession: or, in other words, joint tenants have one and the same interest, accruing by one and the same conveyance, commencing at one and the same time, and held by one and the same undivided possession.<sup>2</sup>

§ 254. (1) Unity of interest.—<sup>[181]</sup> First, they must have one and the same interest. One joint tenant cannot be entitled to one period of duration or quantity of interest in lands, and the other to a different; one cannot be tenant for life, and the other for years: one cannot be tenant in fee, and the other in tail.<sup>o</sup> But, if land be limited to A and B for their lives, this makes them joint tenants of the freehold; if to A and B and their heirs, it makes them joint tenants of the inheritance.<sup>d</sup> If land be granted to A and B for their lives, and to the heirs of A; here A and B are joint tenants of the freehold during their respective lives, and A has the remainder of the fee in severalty: or, if land be given to A and B, and the heirs of the body of A; here both have a joint estate for life, and A hath a several remainder in tail.<sup>o</sup>

§ 255. (2) Unity of title.—Secondly, joint tenants must also have an unity of title: their estate must be created by one and the same act, whether legal or illegal; as by one and the same grant, or by one and the same disseisin.<sup>f</sup> Joint tenancy cannot arise by descent or act of law; but merely by purchase, or acquisition by the act of the party: and, unless that act be one and the same, the two tenants would have different titles; and if they had different titles, one might prove good, and the other bad, which would absolutely destroy the jointure.

§ 256. (3) Unity of time.—Thirdly, there must also be an unity of time: their estates must be vested at one and the same period, as well as by one and the same title. As in case of a present estate made to A and B; or a remainder in fee to A and B after a particular estate; in either case A and B are joint tenants of this by reason of its captivating appearance of symmetry and exactness, than by reason of its practical utility. It means only, that each joint tenant stands, in all respects, in exactly the same position as each of the others; and that anything which creates a distinction either severs the joint tenancy or prevents it from arising. Blackstone seems not to have adverted to the fact that the "unity of time" is not, under the learning of uses and devises, an indispensable requisite.—CHALLIS, Real Prop. (3d ed.), 367.

present estate, or this vested remainder. But if, after a lease for life, the remainder be limited to the heirs of A and B; and during the continuance of the particular estate A dies, which vests the remainder of one moiety in his heir; and then B dies, whereby the other moiety becomes vested in the heir of B: now A's heir and B's heir are not joint tenants of this remainder, but tenants in common; for one moiety vested at one time, and the other moiety vested at another.<sup>2</sup> [182] Yet, where a feoffment was made to the use of a man, and such wife as he should afterwards marry, for term of their lives, and he afterwards married; in this case it seems to have been held that the husband and wife had a joint estate, though vested at different times:<sup>3</sup> because the use of the wife's estate was in abeyance and dormant till the intermarriage; and, being then awakened, had relation back, and took effect from the original time of creation.

§ 257. (4) Unity of possession.—Lastly, in joint tenancy, there must be an unity of possession. Joint tenants are said to be seised per my et per tout, by the half or moiety, and by all;<sup>3</sup> that is, they each of them have the entire possession, as well of every parcel as of the whole.<sup>1</sup> They have not, one of them a seisin of one-half or moiety, and the other of the other moiety; neither can one be exclusively seised of one acre, and his companion of an-

<sup>3</sup> Seisin per my et per tout.—This translation rests on the authority of Littleton and Lord Coke, but has been criticised by modern writers who no doubt are more familiar with the niceties of law-French than these authors or Blackstone. Mie or my unquestionably had both meanings, i. e., of a moiety, and of nothing. Littleton translated it better than Blackstone, per chescun parcel, which is not confined to the case of two tenants only, as "half" is.

Whether Bracton was translating this maxim in the passage quoted by our author in note k is doubtful. At all events, he is speaking there (fol. 430 a) of coheirs, not of joint tenants or tenants by entirety. (See note of Serjeant Manning to Murray v. Hall, 7 Com. B. 455; 2 Minor's Institutes, 404.)—HAMMOND.

other; but each has an undivided moiety of the whole, and not the whole of an undivided moiety.* * *<sup>4</sup>

§ 258. (5) Other incidents of joint estates.—Upon these principles, of a thorough and intimate union of interest and possession, depend many other consequences and incidents to the joint tenant's estate. If two joint tenants let a verbal lease of their land, reserving rent to be paid to one of them, it shall inure to both, in

* Ninth edition adds: "And therefore, if an estate in fee be given to a man and his wife, they are neither properly joint tenants, nor tenants in common: for husband and wife being considered as one person in law, they cannot take the estate by moieties, but both are seised of the entirety, per tout et non per my (by all, and not by the half); the consequence of which is, that neither the husband nor the wife can dispose of any part without the assent of the other, but the whole must remain to the survivor. [To which is added as a note: Litt. § 665. Co. Litt. 187. Bro. Abr. t. Cui in Vita. 8. 2 Vern. 120. 2 Lev. 39.]"

* Quilibet totum tenet et nihil tenet; scilicet, totum in communi, et nihil separatim per se. (Each holds the entirety and yet holds nothing; that is, the entirety in common, and nothing separately by itself.) Bract. 1. 5. tr. 5. c. 26.

<sup>4</sup> Coke tells us that "there can be no moieties between" husband and wife. Co. Litt. 187b; Thomas' Coke, 855; 2 Yeates, 462. Littleton says that the reason is that they are one person in law. Id. Blackstone tells us that for that reason "they cannot take the estate by moieties; but both are seised of the entirety." 2 Bl. Comm. 182; 2 Cruise Dig. 492. If they are "one person in law"—if "there be no moieties between them"—if "they cannot take by moieties," but both "must be seised of the entirety"—the intention to create a tenancy in common is immaterial, for the rule is that the very same words which create such an estate between other parties create an entirety in husband and wife. The case of Green v. King was determined, not on any supposed intention of the parties to the conveyance, but on the sole ground of the absolute incapacity of the husband and wife, who are regarded as one person in law, to take, during coverture, separate estates. 2 Bl. Rep. 1211. The case of Rogers v. Benson was decided upon the same ground. 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 431, 437. Jackson v. Stevens was determined on the same principle of incapacity to take by moieties. 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 110, 115. Sutliff v. Forgey is an authority to the same point. 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 89, 95. Barber v. Harris was also determined on the ground of the incapacity of husband and wife to take either as joint tenants or tenants in common. 15 Wend. 617. In Taul v. Campbell authorities were cited by the court in affirmance of the same doctrine. 7 Yerg. (Tenn.) 319, 27 Am. Dec. 508. In Den v. Hardenbergh the same ground was taken. 10 N. J. L. 42, 18 Am. respect of the joint reversion.<sup>1</sup> If their lessee surrenders his lease to one of them, it shall also inure to both, because of the privity, or relation of their estate.<sup>m</sup> On the same reason, livery of seisin, made to one joint tenant, shall inure to both of them;<sup>n</sup> and the entry, or re-entry, of one joint tenant is as effectual in law as if it were the act of both.<sup>o</sup> In all actions also relating to their joint estate, one joint tenant cannot sue or be sued without joining the other.<sup>p</sup> But if two or more joint tenants be seised of an advowson, and they present different clerks, the bishop may refuse to admit either: because neither joint tenant hath a several right of patronage, but each is seised of [183] the whole: and, if they do not both agree within six months, the right of presentation shall lapse. But the ordinary may, if he pleases, admit a clerk presented by either, for the good of the church, that divine service may be regularly performed; which is no more than he otherwise would be entitled to do, in case their disagreement continued, so as to incur a lapse: and, if the clerk of one joint tenant be so admitted, this shall keep up the title in both of them; in respect of the privity and union of their estate.<sup>q</sup> Upon the same ground it is held, that one joint tenant cannot have an action against another for trespass, in respect of his land; <sup>r</sup> for each has an equal right to enter on any part of it. But one joint tenant is not capable by himself to do any act, which may tend to defeat or injure the estate of the other; as to let leases, or to grant copyholds: <sup>s</sup> and, if any waste be done, which tends to the destruction of the inheritance, one joint tenant may have an action of waste against the other, by

This doctrine prevails, it is believed, in every state of the Union, where the common law furnishes the rule of decision. Chancellor Kent did but reiterate the reason of the rule when he declared it to be founded, not on any supposed intention of the parties to the conveyance, but on the "unity of husband and wife," and announced, as the necessary result of that unity, that "they cannot take by moieties." 2 Kent, Comm., 132; 4 Kent, Comm., 362.—Stuckey v. construction of the statute Westm. 2, c. 22.<sup>t</sup> So, too, though at common law no action of account lay for one joint tenant against another, unless he had constituted him his bailiff or receiver,<sup>u</sup> yet now by the statute 4 Ann., c. 16 (Joint Tenants, 1705), joint tenants may have actions of account against each other, for receiving more than their due share of the profits of the tenements held in joint tenancy.

§ 259. (6) Doctrine of survivorship.—From the same principle also arises the remaining grand incident of joint estates; viz., the doctrine of survivorship: by which when two or more persons are seised of a joint estate, of inheritance, for their own lives, or pur auter vie (for the life of another), or are jointly possessed of any chattel interest, the entire tenancy upon the decease of any of them remains to the survivors, and at length to the last survivor; and he shall be entitled to the whole estate, whatever it be, whether an inheritance or a common freehold only, or even a less estate.<sup>v</sup> This is the natural and regular consequence of the union and entirety of their interest. The interest of two joint tenants [184] is not only equal or similar, but also is one and the same. One has not originally a distinct moiety from the other; but, if by any subsequent act (as by alienation or forfeiture of either) the interest becomes separate and distinct, the joint tenancy instantly ceases. But, while it continues, each of two joint tenants has a concurrent interest in the whole; and therefore, on the death of his companion, the sole interest in the whole remains to the survivor. For the interest, which the survivor originally had, is clearly not divested by the death of his companion; and no other person can now claim to have a joint estate with him, for no one can now have an interest in the whole, accruing by the same title, and taking effect at the same time as his own; neither can anyone claim a separate interest in any part of the tenements; for that would be to deprive the survivor of the right which he has in all, and every part. As, therefore, the survivor's original interest in the whole still remains; and as no one can now be admitted, either jointly or severally, to any share with him therein; it follows that his own interest must now be entire and several, and that he shall alone be entitled to the whole estate (whatever it be) that was created by the original grant.

5 Joint tenancies.—It will be noticed that the peculiar incidents of joint tenancy must end with the last survivor of those first taking. Whether the inheritance be limited to his heirs or to those of all the joint tenants, they cannot well hold with all the requisite unities. Even if this may be considered theoretically possible under the rule of primogeniture, it would not be so by American law, dividing at each descent among all the heirs of the same degree. Practically the most careful limitation of the kind would be soon wrecked.

This may not be true, however, of the kind of joint tenancy now most common in the United States, in many of them the only kind, where the joint tenants take the estate not "in their own right," but for a particular purpose, such as a railroad mortgage or other trust. Here the ordinary rules of descent are overridden by the power of the courts of equity to substitute new trustees, and there is no reason why such a joint interest might not be continued thus for generation after generation, with continual survivorship among the trustees in each.—HAMMOND.

This right of survivorship is called by our ancient authors<sup>x</sup> the jus accrescendi, because the right, upon the death of one joint tenant, accumulates and increases to the survivors; or, as they themselves express it, "pars illa communis accrescit superstitibus, de persona in personam, usque ad ultimam superstitem (that common share accumulates to the survivors from one person to another even to the last survivor)." And this jus accrescendi ought to be mutual; which I apprehend to be one reason why neither the king,<sup>y</sup> nor any corporation,<sup>z</sup> can be a joint tenant with a private person. For here is no mutuality; the private person has not even the remotest chance of being seised of the entirety, by benefit of survivorship; for the king and the corporation can never die.

§ 260. c. Joint tenancy, how severed and destroyed.—[185]

We are, lastly, to inquire, how an estate in joint tenancy may be severed and destroyed. And this may be done by destroying any of its constituent unities.

§ 261. (1) Destruction of unity of time.—1. That of time, which respects only the original commencement of the joint estate, cannot indeed (being now past), be affected by any subsequent transactions.

§ 262. (2) Partition.—But 2. The joint tenants' estate may be destroyed, without any alienation, by merely disuniting their possession. For joint tenants being seised per my et per tout (by half and by all), everything that tends to narrow that interest, so that they shall not be seised throughout the whole, and throughout every part, is a severance or destruction of the jointure. And therefore, if two joint tenants agree to part their lands, and hold them in severalty, they are no longer joint tenants; for they have now no joint interest in the whole, but only a several interest respectively in the several parts. And for that reason, also, the right of survivorship is by such separation destroyed.<sup>a</sup> By common law all the joint tenants might agree to make partition of the lands, but one of them could not compel the other so to do:<sup>b</sup> for, this being an estate originally created by the act and agreement of the parties, the law would not permit any one or more of them to destroy the united possession without a similar universal consent. But now by the statutes 31 Hen. VIII, c. 1 (Partition, 1539), and 32 Hen. VIII, c. 32 (Partition, 1540), joint tenants, either of inheritances or other less estates, are compellable by writ of partition to divide their lands.<sup>c</sup>

§ 263. (3) Alienation.—3. The jointure may be destroyed by destroying the unity of title. As if one joint tenant aliens and con-

veys his estate to a third person: here the joint tenancy is severed, and turned into tenancy in common;<sup>d</sup> for the grantee and the remaining joint tenant hold by different titles (one derived from the original, the other from the subsequent, grantor), though, till partition made, the unity of possession continues.<sup>7</sup> But a devise of one's share by will [<sup>186</sup>] is no severance of the jointure: for no testament takes effect till after the death of the testator, and by such death the right of the survivor (which accrued at the original creation of the estate, and has therefore a priority to the other*) is already vested.<sup>f</sup>

§ 264. (4) Merger.—4. It may also be destroyed, by destroying the unity of interest. And therefore, if there be two joint tenants for life, and the inheritance is purchased by or descends upon either, it is a severance of the jointure: * though, if an estate is originally limited to two for life, and after to the heirs of one of them, the freehold shall remain in jointure, without merging in the inheritance; because, being created by one and the same conveyance, they are not separate estates (which is requisite in order to a merger), but branches of one entire estate.<sup>h</sup> In like manner, if a joint tenant in fee makes a lease for life of his share, this defeats the jointure: † for it destroys the unity both of title and of interest. And, whenever or by whatever means the jointure ceases or is severed, the right of survivorship or jus accrescendi the same instant ceases with it.<sup>k</sup> Yet, if one of three joint ten-

<sup>7</sup> It is said that the nature of the alienation required to effect a severance is a matter of some doubt; but that probably a mere lease for years by one joint tenant does not work a severance. *Palmer v. ants aliens his share, the two remaining tenants still hold their parts by joint tenancy and survivorship;<sup>1</sup> and, if one of three joint tenants releases his share to one of his companions, though the joint tenancy is destroyed with regard to that part, yet the two remaining parts are still held in jointure;<sup>m</sup> for they still preserve their original constituent unities. But when, by any act or event, different interests are created in the several parts of the estate, or they are held by different titles, or if merely the possession is separated; so that the tenants have no longer these four indispensable properties, a sameness of interest, and undivided possession, a title vesting at one and the same time, and by one and the same act or grant; the jointure is instantly dissolved.

§ 265. (5) Utility of severance of joint estates.—[187] In general it is advantageous for the joint tenants to dissolve the jointure; since thereby the right of survivorship is taken away, and each may transmit his own part to his own heirs. Sometimes, however, it is disadvantageous to dissolve the joint estate: as if there be joint tenants for life, and they make partition, this dissolves the jointure; and, though before they each of them had an estate in the whole for their own lives and the life of their companion, now they have an estate in a moiety only for their own lives merely; and, on the death of either, the reversioner shall enter on his moiety.<sup>n</sup> And therefore, if there be two joint tenants for life, and one grants away his part for the life of his companion, it is a forfeiture;<sup>o</sup> for in the first place, by the severance of the jointure he has given himself in his own moiety only an estate for his own life; and then he grants the same land for the life of another: which grant, by a tenant for his own life merely, is a forfeiture of his estate;<sup>p</sup> for it is creating an estate which may by possibility last longer than that which he is legally entitled to.<sup>q</sup>

<sup>q</sup> By the common law in England, a joint tenancy occurs where there has been a limitation of the same estate, by deed, will, or parol, to two or more persons without words of severance. § 266. 3. Estates in coparcenary.—An estate held in coparcenary is where lands of inheritance descend from the ancestor to two or more persons. It arises either by common law, or particular custom. By common law: as where a person seised in fee simple or in fee-tail dies, and his next heirs are two or more females, his daughters, sisters, aunts, cousins, or their representatives; in this case they shall all inherit, as will be more fully shown, when we treat of descents hereafter: and these coheirs are then called coparceners; or, for brevity, parceners only.<sup>q</sup> Parceners by particular custom are where lands descend, as in gavelkind, to all the males in equal degree, as sons, brothers, uncles, etc.<sup>r</sup> And, in either of these cases, all the parceners put together make but one heir, and have but one estate among them.<sup>s</sup>

§ 267. a. Properties of parceners.—[188] The properties of parceners are in some respects like those of joint tenants; they having the same unities of interest, title, and possession. They may sue and be sued jointly for matters relating to their own lands:† and the entry of one of them shall in some cases inure as the entry of them all.‡ They cannot have an action of trespass against each other: but herein they differ from joint tenants, that they are also excluded from maintaining an action of waste;§ for coparceners could at all times put a stop to any waste by writ of in common, unless a clear intention to the contrary be shown. Cal. Civil Code, § 686; Estate of Hittell, 141 Cal. 432, 75 Pac. 53; Webster v. Vandeventer, 6 Gray (Mass.), 428. In many states the rule of survivorship has been abolished by statute, except in the case of joint trustees or mortgagees. The Cal. Civil Code, § 683, reads: "A joint interest is one owned by several persons in equal shares, by a title created by a single will or transfer, when expressly declared in the will or transfer to be a joint tenancy, or when granted or devised to executors or trustees as joint tenants." Denigan v. San Francisco Sav. Union, 127 Cal. 142, 78 Am. St. Rep. 35, 59 Pac. 390. See 1 Washburn, Real Prop. (6th ed.), § 857, where the statute laws of the several states are discussed in a note. 23 Cyc. 489. Survivorship has never existed in Connecticut. Phelps v. Jepson, 1 Root (Conn.), 48, 1 Am. partition, but till the statute of Henry the Eighth, joint tenants had no such power. Parceners also differ materially from joint tenants in four other points: 1. They always claim by descent, whereas joint tenants always claim by purchase. Therefore, if two sisters purchase lands, to hold to them and their heirs, they are not parceners, but joint tenants: * and hence it likewise follows, that no lands can be held in coparcenary, but estates of inheritance, which are of a descendible nature; whereas not only estates in fee and in tail, but for life or years, may be held in joint tenancy. 2. There is no unity of time necessary to an estate in coparcenary. For if a man hath two daughters, to whom his estate descends in coparcenary, and one dies before the other; the surviving daughter and the heir of the other, or, when both are dead, their two heirs, are still parceners; † the estates vesting in each of them at different times, though it be the same quantity of interest, and held by the same title. 3. Parceners, though they have an unity, have not an entirety, of interest. They are properly entitled each to the whole of a distinct moiety; ‡ and of course there is no jus accrescendi, or survivorship between them: for each part descends severally to their respective heirs, though the unity of possession continues. And as long as the lands continue in a course of descent and united in possession, so long are the tenants therein, whether male or female, called parceners. But if [189] the possession be once severed by partition, they are no longer parceners, but tenants in severalty; or if one parcener aliens her share, though no partition be made, then are the lands no longer held in coparcenary, but in common.<sup>a</sup>

§ 268. b. Partition.—Parceners are so called, saith Littleton<sup>b</sup> because they may be constrained to make partition. And he mentions many methods of making it;<sup>c</sup> four of which are by consent, and one by compulsion. The first is, where they agree to divide the lands into equal parts in severalty, and that each shall have such a determinate part. The second, when they agree to choose some friend to make partition for them, and then the sisters shall choose each of them her part according to seniority of age; or otherwise, as shall be agreed. The privilege of seniority is in this case personal; for if the eldest sister be dead, her issue shall not choose first, but the next sister. But, if an advowson descend in coparcenary, and the sisters cannot agree in the presentation, the eldest and her issue, nay her husband, or her assigns, shall present alone, before the younger.<sup>4</sup> And the reason given is that the former privilege, of priority in choice upon a division, arises from an act of her own, the agreement to make partition; and therefore is merely personal: the latter, of presenting to the living, arises from the act of the law, and is annexed not only to her person, but to her estate also. A third method of partition is, where the eldest divides, and then she shall choose last; for the rule of law is, cujus est divisio, alterius est electio (she who makes the division has the last choice). The fourth method is where the sisters agree to cast lots for their shares. And these are the methods by consent.<sup>9</sup> That by compulsion is, where one or more sue out a writ of partition against the others; whereupon the sheriff shall go to the lands, and make partition thereof by the verdict of a jury there impaneled, and assign to each of the parceners her part in severalty.<sup>10</sup> But there are some things [190] which are in their nature impartible. The mansion-house, common of estovers, common of piscary uncertain, or any other common without stint, shall not be divided; but the elder sister, if she pleases, shall have them, and make the others a reasonable satisfaction in other parts of the inheritance: or, if that cannot be, then they

§ 269. c. Hotchpot.—There is yet another consideration attending the estate in coparcenary; that if one of the daughters has had an estate given with her in frank-marriage by her ancestor (which we may remember was a species of estates-tail, freely given by a relation for advancement of his kinswoman in marriage†), in this case, if lands descend from the same ancestor to her and her sisters in fee simple, she or her heirs shall have no share of them, unless they will agree to divide the lands so given in frank-marriage in equal proportion with the rest of the lands descending.‡ This mode of division was known in the law of the Lombards;§ which directs the woman so preferred in marriage, and claiming her share of the inheritance, mittere in confusum cum sororibus, quantum pater aut frater ei dederit, quando ambulaverit ad maritum (to bring into hotchpot with her sisters, when she shall marry, as much as her father or brother may have given her). With us it is denominated bringing those lands into hotchpot.¶ which term I shall explain in the very words of Littleton:|| “It seemeth that this word hotchpot, is in English a pudding; for in a pudding is not commonly put one thing alone, but one thing with other things together.”<sup>12</sup> By this housewifely metaphor our

11 The Partition Acts of 1868 and 1876 provide now for a sale of the property and division of the proceeds, in lieu of actual partition.

12 The form of hotchpot at common law which Blackstone describes above has, as he says, become obsolete in practice. It still exists in theory, since, the requisite conditions being fulfilled, gifts of frank-marriage are still perfectly valid in England. But the term (French), hochepot; cf. Old Dutch, hutsopot [Skeat] is used in law to signify the mingling in property in various cases, in which a person claiming to share in a common fund is bound, as a condition of so doing, to bring into the fund other property deemed in law to have been previously advanced to him in anticipation of his final share in the fund. Hotchpot resembles in principle, and is perhaps related in origin to, the collatio bonorum of Roman law. According to the Digest (37, 6, 1 pr.), “the right of emancipated children was conditional on their bringing into collatio bonorum (hotchpot) their property, which was reckoned as part of the inheritance, for ancestors meant to inform us,<sup>m</sup> that the lands, both those given in frank-marriage and those descending in fee simple, should be mixed and blended together, and then divided in equal portions among all the daughters. But this was left to the choice of the donee in frank-marriage; and if she did not choose to put her lands in hotchpot, she was presumed to be sufficiently [191] provided for, and the rest of the inheritance was divided among her other sisters. The law of hotchpot took place then only, when the other lands descending from the ancestor were fee simple; for, if they descended in tail, the donee in frank-marriage was entitled to her share, without bringing her lands so given into hotchpot.<sup>n</sup> And the reason is, because lands descending in fee simple are distributed by the policy of law, for the maintenance of all the daughters; and, if one has a sufficient provision out of the same inheritance, equal to the rest, it is not reasonable that she should have more: but lands, descending in tail, are not distributed by the operation of law, but by the designation of the giver, per forman doni (by the form of the gift); it matters not, therefore, how unequal this distribution may be. Also no lands, but such as are given in frank-marriage, shall be brought into hotchpot; for no others are looked upon in law as given for the advancement of woman, or by way of marriage portion.<sup>o</sup> And therefore, as gifts in frank-marriage are fallen into disuse, I should hardly have mentioned the law of hotchpot, had not this method of division been revived and copied by the statute for distribution of personal estates, which we shall hereafter consider at large.

the purpose of dividing it between them and their brothers and sisters living under their father's potestas (power). This was demanded by justice, for the property that the children living under the potestas would have enjoyed if they had been emancipated was necessarily reckoned as part of the inheritance."

Other forms of hotchpot prevail in England: (1) by local custom; (2) by the Statute of Distributions (p. *517, post); (3) by express direction in settlements and wills; (4) in equity: cosureties claiming contribution "must bring into hotchpot every benefit received." § 270. d. Dissolution of estate in coparcenary.—The estate in coparcenary may be dissolved, either by partition, which disunites the possession; by alienation of one parcener, which disunites the title, and may disunite the interest; or by the whole at last descending to and vesting in one single person, which brings it to an estate in severalty.<sup>13</sup>

§ 271. 4. Tenancy in common.—Tenants in common are such as hold by several and distinct titles, but by unity of possession; because none knoweth his own severalty, and therefore they all occupy promiscuously.<sup>p</sup> This tenancy, therefore, happens, where there is a unity of possession merely, but perhaps an entire disunion of interest, of title, and of time. For, if there be two tenants in common of lands, one may hold his part in fee simple, the other in tail, or for life; so that there is no [192] necessary unity of interest: one may hold by descent, the other by purchase; or the one by purchase from A, the other by purchase from B; so that there is no unity of title: one's estate may have been vested fifty years, the other's but yesterday; so there is no unity of time. The only unity there is, is that of possession: and for this Littleton gives the true reason, because no man can certainly tell which part is his own; otherwise even this would be soon destroyed.

§ 272. a. Creation of tenancies in common.—Tenancy in common may be created, either by the destruction of the two other estates, in joint tenancy and coparcenary, or by special limitation in a deed. By the destruction of the two other estates, I mean such destruction as does not sever the unity of possession, but only the unity of title or interest: as, if one of two joint tenants in fee aliens his estate for the life of the alienee, the alienee and the other joint tenant are tenants in common: for they now have several titles, the other joint tenant by the original grant, the alienee by the new alienation;<sup>q</sup> and they also have several interests, the former joint tenant in fee simple, the alienee for his own life only. So, if one joint tenant gives his part to A in tail, and the other gives his to B in tail, the donees are tenants in common, as holding by different titles, and conveyances.<sup>r</sup> If one of two parceners aliens, the alienee and the remaining parcener are tenants in common;<sup>s</sup> because they hold by different titles, the parcener by descent, the alienee by purchase. So likewise, if there be a grant to two men, or two women, and the heirs of their bodies, here the grantees shall be joint tenants of the life estate, but they shall have several inheritances; because they cannot possibly have one heir of their two bodies, as might have been the case had the limitation been to a man and woman, and the heirs of their bodies begotten:<sup>t</sup> and in this, and the like cases, their issues shall be tenants in common; because they must claim by different titles, one as heir of A, and the other as heir of B; and those too not titles by purchase, (193) but descent. In short, whenever an estate in joint tenancy or coparcenary is dissolved, so that there be no partition made, but the unity of possession continues, it is turned into a tenancy in common.

<sup>13</sup> Tenancy in coparcenary was formerly recognized in a few of the older states of the Union. Gilpin v. Hollingsworth, 3 Md. 190, 56 Am. Dec. 737; Stevenson v. Cofferin, 20 N. H. 150. It is now generally nonexistent, or else abolished by statute. In many instances the statutes change such estates into tenancies in common. 38 Cyc. 5; 1 Washburn, Real Prop., §§ 870-875.

§ 273. b. Joint tenancies preferred to tenancies in common.— A tenancy in common may also be created by express limitation in a deed: but here care must be taken not to insert words which imply a joint estate; and then if lands be given to two or more, and it be not joint tenancy, it must be a tenancy in common. But the law is apt in its constructions to favor joint tenancy rather than tenancy in common;<sup>u</sup> because the divisible services issuing from land (as rent, etc.) are not divided, nor the entire services (as fealty) multiplied, by joint tenancy, as they must necessarily be upon a tenancy in common. Land given to two, to be holden the one moiety to one, and the other moiety to the other, is an estate in common;<sup>v</sup> and, if one grants to another half his land, the grantor and grantee are also tenants in common:<sup>w</sup> because, as has been before<sup>r</sup> observed, joint tenants do not take by distinct halves or moieties; and by such grants the division and severalty of the estate is so plainly expressed, that it is impossible they should take a joint interest in the whole of the tenants. But a devise to two persons to hold jointly and severally, is a joint tenancy;<sup>s</sup> because that is necessarily implied in the word “jointly,” the word “severally,” perhaps, only implying the power of partition: and an estate given to A and B, equally to be divided between them, though in deeds it hath been said to be a joint tenancy<sup>a</sup> (for it implies no more than the law has annexed to that estate, viz., divisibility<sup>b</sup>), yet in wills it is certainly a tenancy in common;<sup>c</sup> because the deviser may be presumed to have meant what is most beneficial to both the devisees, though his meaning is imperfectly expressed. And this nicety in the wording of grants makes it the most usual as well as the safest way, when a tenancy in common [194] is meant to be created, to add express words of exclusion as well as description, and limit the estate to A and B, to hold as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants.

§ 274. c. Incidents of tenancies in common.—As to the incidents attending a tenancy in common: tenants in common (like joint tenants) are compellable by the statutes of Henry VIII and William III, before mentioned,<sup>d</sup> to make partition of their lands; which they were not at common law. They properly take by distinct moieties, and have no entirety of interest; and therefore there is no survivorship between tenants in common. Their other incidents are such as merely arise from the unity of possession; and are therefore the same as appertain to joint tenants merely upon that account: such as being liable to reciprocal actions of waste, and of account, by the statutes of Westm. 2, c. 22 (13 Edw. I, 1285), and 4 Ann., c. 16 (Joint Tenants, 1705). For by the common law no tenant in common was liable to account with his companion for embezzling the profits of the estate;<sup>e</sup> though if one actually turns the other out of possession, an action of ejectment will lie against him.<sup>f</sup> But, as for other incidents of joint tenants, which arise from the privity of title, or the union and entirety of interest (such as joining or being joined in actions,<sup>g</sup> unless in the case where some entire or indivisible thing is to be recovered<sup>h</sup>), these are not applicable to tenants in common, whose interests are distinct, and whose titles are not joint but several.

§ 275. d. Dissolution of tenancies in common.—Estates in common can only be dissolved two ways: 1. By uniting all the titles and interests in one tenant, by purchase or otherwise; which brings the whole to one severalty: 2. By making partition between the several tenants in common, which gives them all respective severalties. For indeed tenancies in common differ in nothing from sole estates, but merely in the blending and unity of possession. And this finishes our inquiries with respect to the nature of estates.

OF THE TITLE TO THINGS REAL, IN GENERAL.

§ 276. Title to things real.—The foregoing chapters having been principally employed in defining the nature of things real, in describing the tenures by which they may be holden, and in distinguishing the several kinds of estate or interest that may be had therein, I come now to consider, lastly, the title to things real, with the manner of acquiring and losing it.

§ 277. Definition of title.—A title is thus defined by Sir Edward Coke,<sup>a</sup> titulus est justa causa possidendi id quod nostrum est (a title is the legal ground of possessing that which is our own); or, it is the means whereby the owner of lands hath the just possession of his property.

§ 278. Steps requisite to complete title.—There are several stages or degrees requisite to form a complete title to lands and tenements. We will consider them in a progressive order.

§ 279. 1. Mere possession.—The lowest and most imperfect degree of title consists in the mere naked possession, or actual occupation of the estate; without any apparent right, or any shadow or pretense of right, to hold and continue such possession.<sup>1</sup> This may happen, when one man invades the possession of another, and

1 Nature of possession.—Throughout our inquiry we have to bear in mind that the following elements are quite distinct in conception, and, though very often found in combination, are also separable and often separated in practice. They are:

I. Physical control, detention, or de facto possession. This, as an actual relation between a person and a thing, is matter of fact. Nevertheless questions which the court must decide as matter of law arise as to the proof of the facts.

II. Legal possession, the state of being a possessor in the eye of the law.

This is a definite legal relation of the possessor to the thing possessed. In its most normal and obvious form, it coexists with the fact of physical control, and with other facts making the exercise of that control rightful. But it by force or surprise turns him out of the occupation of his lands; which is termed a disseisin, being a deprivation of that actual may exist either with or without detention, and either with or without a rightful origin.

A tailor sends to J. S.'s house a coat which J. S. has ordered. J. S. puts on the coat, and then has both physical control and rightful possession in law.

J. S. takes off the coat and gives it to a servant to take back to the tailor for some alterations. Now the servant has physical control (in this connection generally called "custody" by our authorities) and J. S. still has the possession in law.

While the servant is going on his errand, Z. assaults him and robs him of the coat. Z. is not only physically master of the coat, but, so soon as he has complete control of it, he has possession in law, though a wrongful possession. To see what is left to J. S. we must look to the next head.

III. Right to possess or to have legal possession. This includes the right to physical possession. It can exist apart from both physical and legal possession; it is, for example, that which remains to a rightful possessor immediately after he has been wrongfully dispossessed. It is a normal incident of ownership or property, and the name of "property" is often given to it. Unlike possession itself, it is not necessarily exclusive. A may have the right to possess a thing as against B and everyone else, while B has at the same time a right to possess it as against everyone except A. So joint tenants have both single possession and a single joint right to possess, but tenants in common have a single possession with several rights to possess. When a person having right to possess a thing acquires the physical control of it, he necessarily acquires legal possession also.

Right to possess, when separated from possession, is often called "constructive possession." The correct use of the term would seem to be coextensive with and limited to those cases where a person entitled to possess is (or was) allowed the same remedies as if he had really been in possession. But it is also sometimes specially applied to the cases where the legal possession is with one person and the custody with his servant, or some other person for the time being in a like position; and sometimes it is extended to other cases where legal possession is separated from detention.

"Actual possession" as opposed to "constructive possession" is in the same way an ambiguous term. It is most commonly used to signify physical control, with or without possession in law. "Bare possession" is sometimes used with the same meaning. "Lawful possession" means a legal possession which is also rightful or at least excusable; this may be consistent with a superior right to possess in some other person.

The whole terminology of the subject, however, is still very loose and unsettled in the books, and the reader cannot be too strongly warned that careful attention must in every case be paid to the context.

In the procedure of the common law (which no longer exists in England, but must be understood in order to understand the substance of the law), an seisin, or corporal freehold of the lands, which the tenant before enjoyed. Or it may happen that after the death of the ancestor action of trespass is the appropriate remedy for a wrong done to existing legal possession.

Wrongs affecting the right to possess are remediable by other forms of action, mainly ejectment (superseding the assizes and other possessory real actions) as to land, and trover (largely superseding detinue) as to personal chattels.

All actual legal possessors can maintain trespass (and control in fact is evidence of possession in law); but they may use the other remedies at their option in so far as they can show a right to possess. An owner who has parted with possession but may resume it at will can also maintain trespass. The right to sue in trespass is therefore not a sufficient test of possession, though it is a necessary one.—POLLOCK & WRIGHT, Possession in the Common Law, 26.

Ownership.—Ownership may be described as the entirety of the powers of use and disposal allowed by law. This implies that there is some power of disposal, and in modern times we should hardly be disposed to call a person an owner who had no such power. If we found anywhere a system of law which did not recognize alienation by acts of parties at all, we should say not that the powers of an owner were very much restricted in that system, but that it did not recognize ownership. The term, however, is not strictly a technical one in the common law; we shall presently see why. We must not suppose that all the powers of an owner need be exercisable at once and immediately; he may remain owner though he has parted with some of them for a time. He may for a time even part with his whole powers of use and enjoyment, and suspend his power of disposal, provided that he reserves, for himself or his successors, the right of ultimately reclaiming the thing and being restored to his power. This is the common case of hiring land, buildings, or goods. Again, the owner's powers may be limited in particular directions for an indefinite time by rights as permanent in their nature as ownership itself. Such is the case where the owner of Whiteacre has a right of way over his neighbor's field of Blackacre. As this example shows, what is thus subtracted from one owner's powers is generally added to another's. In short, the owner of a thing is not necessarily the person who at a given time has the whole power of use and disposal; very often there is no such person. We must look for the person having the residue of all such power when we have accounted for every detached and limited portion of it; and he will be the owner even if the immediate power of control and use is elsewhere. In the same way a political sovereign does not lose his independence merely because he has made a treaty by which he has agreed to forego or limit the exercise of his sovereign power in particular respects.—POLLOCK, First Book of Jurisprudence, 166.

Distinction between possession and ownership.—We are now in a position to take note of the manner in which ownership differs from possession on the one hand, and limited rights over particular things (tura in re aliena) on the

and before the entry of the heir, or [196] after the death of a particular tenant and before the entry of him in remainder or reversion, a stranger may contrive to get possession of the vacant land, and hold out him that had a right to enter. In all which cases, and many others that might be here suggested, the wrongdoer has only a mere naked possession, which the rightful owner may put other. Possession in fact—the effective and exclusive control of a thing—is prior to ownership and indeed to every legal rule and idea. The facts which we call actual or physical possession would still exist in a society where there was no recognition of individual property. But possession, as a fact, is interesting to lawyers only so far as legal results and incidents may attach to it; and to give definite rights to a possessor because he is in possession is to admit individual rights of exclusive use and enjoyment. We say because he is in possession. A system of law which merely forbade personal violence might incidentally protect possession so far as anyone who used actual violence in dispossessing another might thereby render himself liable to a penalty or damages. This would not be saying anything of possession except that it was not a crime which deprived the possessor of his ordinary personal rights, or a condition in itself odious to the law. Still less does this involve any connection of possession with title. When possession as such is regarded as a proper subject of protection, that is to say, when dispossession without just cause (apart from any violence or physical damage incidental to the act) is treated as calling for a remedy, then the relation to ownership becomes apparent. If a person out of possession is to have a standing-point at all, possession must be capable of being wrongful as well as rightful. There must be rights to possess, or to be put in possession, that can be severed from present possession. There must be room for conflicting claims to possession, and rules for deciding which of two claimants has the better right to possess the thing in dispute.

Now, this brings us to very close quarters with ownership. For ownership, as the entirety of legal powers of use and disposal, must include, as the most important of those powers, in fact, as the one thing by which alone the rest can be made effective, the right to maintain or claim possession; a right which, though it may be suspended or deferred, cannot be wholly dissociated from an owner's relation to the thing owned. Again, ownership is most commonly and completely manifested in actual possession and use. To deal with a thing at one's will is to deal with it like an owner; in the absence of manifest reason to the contrary, we suppose that a man is or claims to be owner of anything over which he exercises indefinite control. Thus active possession is a normal index of ownership (though by no means the only one even in common life), and the right to possess (whether immediate or not) is a necessary incident of ownership, or may perhaps rather be called ownership itself in its active or dynamic aspect. One who is out of possession and has a rightful claim to possess has need of the law's assistance. When he has recovered possession, an end to, by a variety of legal remedies, as will more fully appear in the third book of these Commentaries. But in the meantime, till some act be done by the rightful owner to divest this possession and assert his title, such actual possession is, prima facie, evidence of a legal title in the possessor; and it may, by length of time, and negligence of him who hath the right, by degrees ripen he has not any need to ask the law to do more for him. Once in possession he can deal with his own in any lawful manner.

Hence it is commonly sufficient for an owner to rely on his right to possession; and as it is commonly easier to prove the less right than the greater, not to speak for the present of the manner in which this works out in detail, it is often preferable to claim possession only. Nay, more; it is possible for ownership to be sufficiently guarded for all practical purposes by a system of remedies which omits, or has come to omit, any such solemn and express form of asserting ownership as that to which the Romans emphatically gave the name of Vindication. In the common law this has actually happened. For some centuries all practical remedies for the recovery of both land and goods have been possessory, and property has meant, for judicial purposes, the right, or the best right, to possess. Conversely, that which a man was entitled to possess not only was correctly described by him in pleading as res sua, but could not be described in any other way.

But this leads us to a further development. Possession and use being the common outward signs of ownership, it is reasonable to presume, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that existing peaceable possession is rightful, and further to infer ownership from the right to possess which we have thus presumed. Hence we treat the actual possessor not only as legal possessor, but as owner, as against everyone who cannot show a better right. As English lawyers say concerning interests in land, possession is prima facie evidence of seisin in fee: that is, not of legal possession or seisin alone, but of seisin coupled with the largest powers of use and disposal allowed by law. Then, if we regard the possessor as being rightfully in the exercise of control, we must allow him the powers of an owner within the limits of his apparent right. Not only his acts of use and occupation, but his acts of disposal must be valid against everyone who cannot make out a superior claim. And when the superior claim, if any such there be, ceases to be available, the rights founded on possession will be indistinguishable from the rights of ownership. In the case of movable goods which pass from hand to hand without formality, this becomes obvious, for in that case possession is often not merely the natural and usual proof of ownership, but the only proof. We have come, then, to distinctly recognizing possession as an origin of ownership, a "commencement of title" as our law calls it. Again we see that not only we have thus to recognize it, but a system of law can get on without recognizing any other origin. Continuous possession is quite capable of being, not merely a possible foundation of ownership, but its only foundation and evidence. And this, once into a perfect and indefeasible title.<sup>2</sup> And, at all events, without such actual possession no title can be completely good.

§ 280. 2. Right of possession.—The next step to a good and perfect title is the right of possession, which may reside in one man, while the actual possession is not in himself but in another. For if a man be disseised, or otherwise kept out of possession, by more, is exactly what has happened in the common law. With very few exceptions, possession traced through a chain of lawful transfer, or succession for a time long enough to exclude any reasonable apprehension of adverse claims, is the only acceptable proof of title in this country.—POLLOCK, First Book of Jurisprudence, 168.

Hist.* 591; Lightwood, Possession in the Roman Law, 3 Law Quart. Rev. 32. There is an abundant literature on the subject in German and French.

This conclusion is abundantly supported by authority from Bracton's time down: "Longa enim possessio . . . parit jus possidendi et tollit actionem vero domino petenti, quandoque unam, quandoque aliam, quandoque omnem. . . Sic enim . . . acquiritur possessio et liberum tenementum sine titulo et traditione per patientiam et negligentiam veri domini."

Blackstone is even more explicit: "Such actual possession is prima facie evidence of a legal title in the possessor; and it may, by length of time, and negligence of him who hath the right by degrees, ripen into a perfect and indefeasible title." Lord Mansfield may also be cited: "Twenty years' adverse any of the means before mentioned, though the actual possession be lost, yet he has still remaining in him the right of possession; and may exert it whenever he thinks proper, by entering upon the disseisor, and turning him out of that occupancy which he has so illegally gained. But this right of possession is of two sorts: an apparent right of possession, which may be defeated by proving a better; and an actual right of possession, which will stand the test against all opponents. Thus if the disseisor, or other wrongdoer, dies possessed of the land whereof he so became seised by his own unlawful act, and the same descends to his heir; now by the common law the heir hath obtained an apparent right, though the actual right of possession resides in the person disseised; and it shall not be lawful for the person disseised to divest this apparent right by mere entry or other act of his own, but only by an action at law.<sup>b</sup> For, until the contrary be proved by legal demonstration, the law will rather presume the right to [197] reside in the heir, whose ancestor died seised, than in one who has no such presumptive evidence to urge in his own behalf. Which doctrine in some measure arose from the principles of the feudal law, which, after feuds became hereditary, much favored the right of descent; in order that there might be a person always upon the spot to perform the feudal duties and services:<sup>c</sup> and therefore, when a feudatory died in battle, or otherwise, it presumed always that his children were entitled to the feud, till the right was otherwise determined by his fellow-soldiers and fellow-tenants, the peers of the feudal court. But if he, who has the actual right of possession, puts in his claim and brings his action within a reasonable time, possession is a positive title to the defendant; it is not a bar to the action or remedy of the plaintiff only, but takes away his right of possession."

Sir Thomas Plummer, M. R., has expressed himself to the same effect as to equitable interests: "If the negligent owner has forever forfeited by his laches his right to any remedy to recover, he has in effect lost his title forever. The defendant keeps possession without the possibility of being ever disturbed by anyone. The loss of the former owner is necessarily his gain; it is more, he gains a positive title under the statute at law, and by analogy in equity."—AMES, Lectures on Legal History, 197; also in 3 Select Essays in Anglo-Am. Legal Hist. 567.

and can prove by what unlawful means the ancestor became seised, he will then by sentence of law recover that possession, to which he hath such actual right. Yet, if he omits to bring this his possessory action within a competent time, his adversary may imperceptibly gain an actual right of possession, in consequence of the other's negligence. And by this, and certain other means, the party kept out of possession may have nothing left in him, but what we are next to speak of; viz.:

§ 281. 3. Mere right of property.—The mere right of property, the jus proprietatis, without either possession or even the right of possession. This is frequently spoken of in our books under the name of the mere right, jus merum; and the estate of the owner is in such cases said to be totally divested, and put to a right.<sup>4</sup> A person in this situation may have the true ultimate property of the lands in himself; but by the intervention of certain circumstances, either by his own negligence, the solemn act of his ancestor, or the determination of a court of justice, the presumptive evidence of that right is strongly in favor of his antagonist; who has thereby obtained the absolute right of possession. As, in the first place, if a person disseised, or turned out of possession of his estate, neglects to pursue his remedy within the time limited by law: by this means the disseisor or his heirs gain the actual right of possession: [198] for the law presumes that either he had a good right originally, in virtue of which he entered on the lands in question, or that since such his entry he has procured a sufficient title; and, therefore, after so long an acquiescence, the law will not suffer his possession to be disturbed without inquiring into the absolute right of property. Yet, still, if the person disseised or his heir hath the true right of property remaining in himself, his estate is indeed said to be turned into a mere right; but, by proving such his better right, he may at length recover the lands. Again, if a tenant in tail discontinues his estate-tail, by alienating the lands to a stranger in fee, and dies; here the issue in tail hath no right of possession, independent of the right of property: for the law presumes prima facie that the ancestor would not disinherit, or attempt to disinherit, his heir, unless he had power so to do; and therefore, as the ancestor had in himself the right of possession, and has transferred the same to a stranger, the law will not permit that possession now to be disturbed, unless by showing the absolute right of property to reside in another person. The heir, therefore, in this case has only a mere right, and must be strictly held to the proof of it, in order to recover the lands. Lastly, if by accident, neglect, or otherwise, judgment is given for either party in any possessory action (that is, such wherein the right of possession only, and not that of property, is contested), and the other party hath indeed in himself the right of property, this is now turned to a mere right; and upon proof thereof in a subsequent action, denominated a writ of right, he shall recover his seisin of the lands.

§ 282. Title by limitation.—Thus, if a disseisor turns me out of possession of my lands, he thereby gains a mere naked possession, and I still retain the right of possession and right of property. If the disseisor dies, and the lands descend to his son, the son gains an apparent right of possession; but I still retain the actual right both of possession and property. If I acquiesce for thirty years, without bringing any action to recover possession of the lands, the son gains the actual right of possession, and I retain nothing [199] but the mere right of property.<sup>3</sup> And even this

<sup>3</sup> Statutes of limitation.—The English Real Property Limitation Act of 1833 provides that the right and title of the person whose claim has been barred by the operation of the statute, as well as his mere remedy, shall be extinguished at the determination of the period within which it might have been enforced. It is the view of the courts that when all hostile claims are extinguished by lapse of time, the actual occupant has acquired title. Doe v. Sumner (1845), 14 Mees. & W. 39; Asher v. Whitlock (1865), L. R. 1 Q. B. 1; Atkinson & Horsell's Contract, [1912] 2 Ch. 1. On the other hand, registration of title to land, under the Land Transfer Acts of 1875 and 1897, affords protection to the registered owner, and to purchasers from him, against the acquisition of hostile rights by an adverse occupant. The act of 1897 says, in effect, that a registered owner shall be exempt from the operation of the Real Property Limitation Acts. For the prescribed times for bringing actions and claims under statute in England, see 2 Stephen, Comm. (16th ed.) 495 ff., or, more fully, 19 Halsbury, Laws of England, 33 ff.

In the United States the principle of acquiring title by an adverse possessor against the true owner is firmly established. Thornely v. Andrews, 40 Wash. 580, 111 Am. St. Rep. 923, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1036, 82 Pac. 899. The period right of property will fail, or at least it will be without a remedy, unless I pursue it within the space of sixty years. So, also, if the father be tenant in tail, and aliens the estate-tail to a stranger in fee, the alienee, thereby gains the right of possession, and the son hath only the mere right or right of property. And hence it will follow that one man may have the possession, another the right of possession, and the third the right of property. For if tenant in tail enfeoffs A in fee simple, and dies, and B disseises A; now B will have the possession, A the right of possession, and the issue in tail the right of property: A may recover the possession against B; and afterwards the issue in tail may evict A, and unite in himself the possession, the right of possession, and also the right of property. In which union consists, of limitation is various and is fixed by the statutes of the several states. Adverse possession is defined to be an actual and visible appropriation of land commenced and continued under a color of title and claim of right inconsistent with and hostile to the claim of another. White v. Pingenot, 49 Tex. Civ. App. 641, 90 S. W. 672; Willette v. Gifford, 46 Ind. App. 185, 92 N. E. 186. It must include five elements: It must be (1) hostile or adverse; (2) actual; (3) visible, notorious and exclusive; (4) continuous; and (5) under a claim or color of title. Page v. Bellamy, 222 Ill. 556, 78 N. E. 938; Mercer v. Watson, 1 Watts (Pa.), 330, 341; Paldi v. Paldi, 95 Mich. 410, 54 N. W. 903; Sharon v. Tucker, 144 U. S. 533, 36 L. Ed. 532, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 720. There is no adverse possession against the state. Hurst v. Dulany, 84 Va. 701, 5 S. E. 802. Adverse and exclusive occupation of a railroad's right of way does not prevail against the railroad on the doctrine that the railroad is for a public purpose and the statute does not run against it. Southern Pac. Co. v. Hyatt, 132 Cal. 240, 54 L. R. A. 522, 64 Pac. 272.

4 Nature of ownership.—It is customary to speak of one as owner of a thing, although he has ceased to possess it for a time, either by his own act, as in the case of a lease or bailment, or without his consent, as in the case of a loss or disseisin. And yet everyone would admit that the power of present enjoyment is one of the attributes of perfect ownership. It is evident, therefore, that it is only by an inaccurate, or, at least, elliptical use of language, that a landlord, bailor, loser, or disseisee can be called a true owner. The potential is treated as if actually existent. On the other hand, no one will affirm that the tenant, bailee, finder, or disseisor can be properly described as owner. For although they all have the power of present enjoyment, and, consequently, the power of transfer, their interest is either of limited duration, or altogether precarious. It would seem to follow, therefore, that wherever there is a lease, bailment, loss, or disseisin of a res, no one can be said to be the full owner of it. And this, it is submitted, is the fact. Only he in whom the power to enjoy and the unqualified right to enjoy concur can be called an owner in the full and strict sense of the term. The correctness of this conclusion is confirmed by the opinion of Blackstone, expressed with his wonted felicity. After speaking of the union in one person of the possession, the right of possession, and the right of property, he adds: "In which union consists a complete title to lands, tenements, and hereditaments. For it is an ancient maxim of the law, that no title is completely good, unless the right of possession be joined with the right of property; which right is then denominated a double right, jus duplicatum, or droit droit. And when to this double right the actual possession is also united, there is, according to the expression of Fleta, juris et seisinæ conjunctio, then, and then only, is the title completely legal."

A true property may, therefore, be shortly defined as possession coupled with the unlimited right of possession.—AMES, Lectures on Legal History, 193; also in 3 Select Essays in Anglo-Am. Legal Hist., 562.

CHAPTER THE FOURTEENTH. [200]

OF TITLE BY DESCENT.

§ 284. Modes of acquiring and losing title.—The several gradations and stages, requisite to form a complete title to lands, tenements, and hereditaments, having been briefly stated in the preceding chapter, we are next to consider the several manners, in which this complete title (and therein principally the right of propriety) may be reciprocally lost and acquired: whereby the dominion of things real is either continued, or transferred from one man to another. And here we must first of all observe, that (as gain and loss are terms of relation, and of a reciprocal nature) by whatever method one man gains an estate, by that same method or its correlative some other man has lost it. As where the heir acquires by descent, the ancestor has first lost or abandoned his estate by his death: where the lord gains land by escheat, the estate of the tenant is first of all lost by the natural or legal extinction of all his hereditary blood: where a man gains an interest by occupancy, the former owner has previously relinquished his right of possession: where one man claims by prescription or immemorial usage, another man has either parted with his right by an ancient and now forgotten grant, or has forfeited it by the supineness or neglect of himself and his ancestors for ages; and so, in case of forfeiture, the tenant by his own misbehavior or neglect has renounced his interest in the estate; whereupon it devolves to that person who by law may take advantage of such default: and, in alienation by common assurances, the two considerations of loss and acquisition are so [201] interwoven, and so constantly contemplated together, that we never hear of a conveyance, without at once receiving the ideas as well of the grantor as the grantee.

§ 285. 1. Descent and purchase.—The methods, therefore, of acquiring on the one hand, and of losing on the other, a title to estates in things real, are reduced by our law to two: descent, where the title is vested in a man by the single operation of law; and purchase, where the title is vested in him by his own act or agreement.*

* Co. Litt. 18.

§ 286. a. Descent, or hereditary succession.—Descent, or hereditary succession, is the title whereby a man on the death of his ancestor acquires his estate by right of representation, as his heir at law. An heir, therefore, is he upon whom the law casts the estate immediately on the death of the ancestor; and an estate so descending to the heir is in law called the inheritance.

§ 287. (1) Importance of doctrine of descent.—The doctrine of descents, or law of inheritances in fee simple, is a point of the highest importance; and is indeed the principal object of the laws of real property in England. All the rules relating to purchases, whereby the legal course of descents is broken and altered, perpetually refer to this settled law of inheritance, as a datum or first principle universally known, and upon which their subsequent limitations are to work. Thus a gift in tail, or to a man and the heirs of his body, is a limitation that cannot be perfectly understood without a previous knowledge of the law of descents in fee simple. One may well perceive that this is an estate confined in its descent to such heirs only of the donee, as have sprung or shall spring from his body; but who those heirs are, whether all his children both male and female, or the male only, and (among the males) whether the eldest, youngest, or other son alone, or all the sons together, shall be his heir; this is a point, that we must resort back to the standing law of descents in fee simple to be informed of.

§ 288. (2) Descent at common law.—<sup>[202]</sup> In order, therefore, to treat a matter of this universal consequence the more clearly, I shall endeavor to lay aside such matters as will only tend to breed embarrassment and confusion in our inquiries, and shall confine myself entirely to this one object. I shall therefore decline considering at present who are, and who are not, capable of being heirs; reserving that for the chapter of escheats. I shall also pass over the frequent division of descents, in those by custom, statute, and common law: for descents by particular custom, as to all the sons in gavelkind, and to the youngest in borough-English, have already been often<sup>b</sup> hinted at, and may also be incidentally touched upon again; but will not make a separate consideration by themselves, in a system so general as the present: and descents by statute, or in fees-tail per formam doni (by the form of the gift), in pursuance of the statute of Westminster the Second, have also been already<sup>c</sup> copiously handled; and it has been seen that the descent in tail is restrained and regulated according to the words of the original donation, and does not entirely pursue the common-law doctrine of inheritance; which, and which only, it will now be our business to explain.

And, as this depends not a little on the nature of kindred, and the several degrees of consanguinity, it will be previously necessary to state, as briefly as possible, the true notion of this kindred or alliance in blood.<sup>d</sup>

§ 289. (a) Consanguinity.—Consanguinity, or kindred, is defined by the writers on these subjects to be “vinculum personarum ab eodem stipite descendantium”; the connection or relation of persons descended from the same stock or common ancestor. This consanguinity is either lineal or collateral.

§ 290. (i) Lineal consanguinity.—[203] Lineal consanguinity is that which subsists between persons, of whom one is descended in a direct line from the other, as between John Stiles (the propositus* in the table of consanguinity) and his father, grandfather, great-grandfather, and so upwards in the direct ascending line; or between John Stiles and his son, grand-son, great-grandson, and so downwards in the direct descending line. Every generation, in this lineal direct consanguinity, constitutes a different degree, reckoning either upwards or downwards: the father of John Stiles is related to him in the first degree, and so likewise is his son; his grandsire and grandson in the second; his great grandsire, and great-grandson in the third. This is the only natural way of reckoning the degrees in the direct line, and therefore universally obtains, as well in the civil,<sup>e</sup> and canon,<sup>f</sup> as in the common law.<sup>g</sup>

The doctrine of lineal consanguinity is sufficiently plain and obvious; but it is at the first view astonishing to consider the number of lineal ancestors which every man has, within no very great number of degrees: and so many different bloods<sup>h</sup> is a man said to contain in his veins, as he hath lineal ancestors. Of these he hath two in the first ascending degree, his own parents; he hath four in the second, the parents of his father and the parents of his mother; he hath eight in the third, the parents of his two grandfathers and two grandmothers; and by the same rule of progression, he hath an hundred and twenty-eight in the seventh; a thousand and twenty-four in the tenth; and at the twentieth degree, or the distance of twenty generations, every man hath above a million of ancestors, as common arithmetic will demonstrate.<sup>1</sup> This lineal consanguinity, we may observe, falls strictly within the definition of vinculum personarum [204] ab eodem stipite descendentium (the connection of persons from a common ancestor); since lineal relations are such as descend one from the other, and both of course from the same common ancestor.

§ 291. (ii) Collateral consanguinity.—Collateral kindred answers to the same description: collateral relations agreeing with the lineal in this, that they descend from the same stock or ancestor; but differing in this, that they do not descend one from the other. Collateral kinsmen are such then as lineally spring from one and the same ancestor, who is the stirps, or root, the stipes, trunk, or common stock, from whence these relations are branched out. As if John Stiles hath two sons, who have [205] each a numerous issue; both these issues are lineally descended from John h Ibid. 12.

<sup>1</sup> This will seem surprising to those who are unacquainted with the increasing power of progressive numbers; but is palpably evident from the following table of a geometrical progression, in which the first term is 2, and the denominator also 2: or, to speak more intelligibly, it is evident, for that each of us has two ancestors in the first degree; the number of whom is doubled at every

Stiles as their common ancestor; and they are collateral kinsmen to each other, because they are all descended from this common ancestor, and all have a portion of his blood in their veins, which denominates them consanguineos (blood relations).

We must be careful to remember that the very being of collateral consanguinity consists in this descent from one and the same common ancestor. Thus Titius and his brother are related. Why? Because both are derived from one father. Titius and his first cousin are related. Why? Because both descend from the same grandfather; and his second cousin's claim to consanguinity is this, that they both are derived from one and the same great-grandfather. In short, as many ancestors as a man has, so many common stocks he has, from which collateral kinsmen may be derived. And as we are taught by Holy Writ that there is one couple of ancestors belonging to us all, from whom the whole race of mankind is remove, because each of our ancestors has also two immediate ancestors of his own,

A shorter method of finding the number of ancestors at any even degree is by squaring the number of ancestors at half that number of degrees. Thus 16 (the number of ancestors at four degrees) is the square of 4, the number of ancestors at two; 256 is the square of 16; 65,536 of 256; and the number of ancestors at 40 degrees would be the square of 1,048,576, or upwards of a million millions.

descended, the obvious and undeniable consequence is, that all men are in some degree related to each other. For, indeed, if we only suppose each couple of our ancestors to have left, one with another, two children; and each of those children on an average to have left two more (and, without such a supposition, the human species must be daily diminishing); we shall find that all of us have now subsisting near two hundred and seventy millions of kindred in the fifteenth degree, at the same distance from the several common ancestors as ourselves are; besides those that are one or two descents nearer to or further from the common stock, who may amount to as many more.* And, if this calculation should appear incompat-

* This will swell more considerably than the former calculation, for here, though the first term is but 1, the denominator is 4; that is there is one kinsman (a brother) in the first degree, who makes together with the propositus, the two descendants from the first couple of ancestors; and in every other degree the number of kindred must be the quadruple of those in the degree which immediately precedes it. For, since each couple of ancestors has two descendants, who increase in a duplicate ratio, it will follow that the ratio, in which all the descendants increase downwards, must be double to that in which the ancestors increase upwards: but we have seen that the ancestors increase in a duplicate ratio: therefore the descendants must increase in a double duplicate, that is, in a quadruple ratio.

This calculation may also be formed by a more compendious process, viz., by squaring the couples, or half the number, of ancestors at any given degree;

ible with the number of inhabitants on the earth, it is because, by intermarriages among the several descendants from the same ancestor, a hundred or a thousand modes of consanguinity may be consolidated in one person, or he may be related to us a hundred or a thousand different ways.

§ 292. (iii) Computation of degrees.—<sup>[206]</sup> The method of computing these degrees in the canon law,<sup>1</sup> which our law has adopted,<sup>m</sup> is as follows:<sup>1</sup> We begin at the common ancestor, and which will furnish us with the number of kindred we have in the same degree, at equal distance with ourselves from the common stock, besides those at unequal distances. Thus, in the tenth lineal degree, the number of ancestors is 1,024; its half, or the couples, amount to 512; the number of kindred in the tenth collateral degree amounts therefore to 262,144 or the square of 512. And if we will be at the trouble to recollect the state of the several families within our own knowledge, and observe how far they agree with this account; that is, whether, on an average, every man has not one brother or sister, four first cousins, sixteen second cousins, and so on; we shall find that the present calculation is very far from being overcharged.

1 Computation of degrees.—The difference of the computation by the civil and canon laws may be expressed shortly thus: the civilians take the sum of the degrees in both lines to the common ancestor; the canonists take only the number of degrees in the longer line. Hence, when the canon law prohibits all marriages between persons related to each other within the seventh degree, this would restrain all marriages within the fourteenth degree of the civil law. It has been observed that all marriages are prohibited between persons who are related to each other within the third degree, according to the computation of the civil law. This affords a solution to the vulgar paradox, that first cousins may marry, and second cousins cannot. For first cousins and all cousins may marry by the civil law; and neither first nor second cousins can marry by the canon law. The church originally reckoned degrees by the former as the only system known to it while confined to countries of the Roman empire; but adopted the German (common law) computation, because it included nearly twice as many relatives within a certain degree, such as the fourth or sixth, etc. One might consider this the sneer of some enemy, if it were not stated by approved Catholic writers, who explain it by saying that it increased the number of the prohibitions of the canon law which might be dispensed with. It is said, adds Professor Christian, that the canon-law computation has been adopted by the law of England; yet I do not know a single instance in which we have occasion to refer to it. But the civil-law reckon downwards; and in whatsoever degree the two persons, or the most remote of them, is distant from the common ancestor, that is the degree [207] in which they are related to each other. Thus Titius and his brother are related in the first degree; for from the father to each of them is counted only one; Titius and his nephew are related in the second degree; for the nephew is two degrees removed from the common ancestor; viz., his own grandfather, the father of Titius. Or. (to give a more illustrious instance from our English annals), King Henry the Seventh, who slew Richard the Third in the battle of Bosworth, was related to that prince in the fifth degree. Let the propositus, therefore, in the table of consanguinity represent King Richard the Third, and the class marked (e) King Henry the Seventh. Now, their common stock or ancestor was King Edward the Third, the abavus (great-great-grandfather) in the same table: from him to Edmond, Duke of York, the proavus (great-grandfather), is one degree; to Richard, Earl of Cambridge, the avus (grandfather), two; to Richard, Duke of York, the pater (father), three; to King Richard the Third, the propositus, four: and from King Edward the Third to John of Gant (a) is one degree; to John, Earl of Somerset (b), two; to John, Duke of Somerset (c), three; to Margaret, Countess of Richmond (d), four; to King Henry, the Seventh (e), five. Which last mentioned prince, being the furthest removed from the common stock, gives the denomination to the degree of kindred in the canon and municipal law. Though according to the computation of the civilians (who count upwards, from either of the persons related, to the common stock, and then downwards again to the other; reckoning a degree for each person both ascending and descending), these two princes were related in the ninth degree, for from King Richard the Third to Richard, Duke of York, is one degree; to Richard, Earl of Cambridge, two; to Edmond, Duke of York, three; to King Edward the Third, the common ancestor, four; to John of Gant, five; to John, Earl of Somerset, six; to John, Duke of Somerset, seven; to Margaret, Countess of Richmond, eight; to King Henry the Seventh, nine.<sup>2</sup>

computation is of great importance in ascertaining who are entitled to the administration and to the distributive shares of intestate personal property. (See post, *504, *515.) And now this civilian computation has been adopted by statute in most of the United States.—HAMMOND.

The importance of reckoning degrees of collateral kinship is now, for the purposes of descent of real estate, almost at an end. For the new method of tracing the inheritance, prescribed by the Inheritance Act, 1833, which governs all descents taking place on a death which has happened since 31st December, 1833, entirely ignores direct relationship between collaterals, and provides that they shall inherit from one another only as representing the common ancestor. Thus, if A die intestate and without issue, his brother B, if he inherits A's estate at all, will do so, not as A's brother, but as representing their common father, to whom on failure of A's issue the estate will first descend.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 303.

§ 293. (3) Rules of descent.—<sup>[208]</sup> The nature and degrees of kindred being thus in some measure explained, I shall next proceed to lay down a series of rules, or canons of inheritance, according to which estates are transmitted from the ancestor to the heir; together with an explanatory comment, remarking their original and progress, the reasons upon which they are founded, and in some cases their agreement with the laws of other nations.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>2</sup> See the table of consanguinity annexed; wherein all the degrees of collateral kindred to the propositus are computed, so far as the tenth of the civilians and the seventh of the canonists inclusive; the former being distinguished by the numeral letters, the latter by the common ciphers.

<sup>3</sup> Modern English rules of inheritance.—The modern rules of descent in England are governed mainly by the Inheritance Act of 1833. These have been affected in some ways by the Land Transfer Act of 1897, which seem unnecessary to mention here. The canons of inheritance, under the act of 1833, are as follows:

1. The first rule is, that inheritance shall be traced from the purchaser; and "the purchaser" is defined, by the statute, as "the person who last acquired the land otherwise than by descent."
2. The second rule is, that inheritances shall lineally descend, in the first place, to the issue of the last purchaser in infinitum.
3. The third rule is, that the male issue shall be admitted before the female; where two or more of the male issues are in equal degree of consanguinity to the purchaser, the eldest only shall inherit; but the females shall inherit equally.
4. The fourth rule is, that all lineal descendants in infinitum of any person deceased shall represent their ancestor, being preferred among themselves strictly in accordance with the fourth rule.
5. The fifth rule is, that on failure of descendants, or issue of the purchaser, the inheritance shall descend to his nearest lineal ancestor. This rule is materially different from the one that formerly prevailed, as is seen in Blackstone's account. The old rule was that, on failure of lineal descendants or issue of § 294. (a) First rule: inheritances lineally to issue of person last seised.—The first rule is, that inheritances shall lineally descend to the issue of the person last actually seised, in infinitum (indefinitely); but shall never lineally ascend.

§ 295. (i) Heirs apparent and presumptive.—To explain the more clearly both this and the subsequent rules, it must still be observed, that by law no inheritance can vest, nor can any person be the actual complete heir of another, till the ancestor is previously dead. Nemo est hæres viventis (no one is heir of a living person). Before that time the person who is next in the line of succession is called an heir apparent, or heir presumptive. Heirs apparent are such, whose right of inheritance is indefeasible, provided they outlive the ancestor; as the eldest son or his issue, who must by the course of the common law be heirs to the father whenever he happens to die. Heirs presumptive are such who, if the

the person last seised, the inheritance should descend to his collateral relations, being of the blood of the first purchaser, subject to the three preceding rules. The old law never allowed lineal relations in the ascending line, that is, parents or other ancestors, to succeed as heirs. The father is now heir to each of his children who may die intestate and without issue, as is more clearly indicated by the next rule.

6. The sixth rule is, that among the lineal ancestors of the purchaser, the paternal heir is always preferred to the maternal. This rule is a development of the ancient canon, which required that, in collateral inheritances, the male stocks should always be preferred to the female. The preference of males to females was left untouched in the Inheritance Act.

7. The seventh rule is, that, among collaterals, those of the half blood of the purchaser may inherit, but only after collaterals of the whole blood in the same degree; that is, next after collaterals of the whole blood when the common ancestor is a male, and next after the common ancestor, when the latter is a female. This introduction of the half blood is an innovation, like the introduction of the father and other lineal ancestors. It is a logical consequence of the two preceding rules; one of which admits the lineal ancestor to succeed, and the other recognizes the issue of a deceased person as representing their ancestor. There can, of course, be no half blood as between ancestor and issue; and therefore it became necessary to admit, as heirs of the purchaser, persons who might be of the half blood to him. It is said that the Inheritance Act of 1833 has worked so well in practice that decisions upon it are few, and that very little alteration has been made in its provisions. See Williams Real Prop. (21st ed.), 219 ff.; 1 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 302 ff.

ancestor should die immediately, would in the present circumstances of things be his heirs; but whose right of inheritance may be defeated by the contingency of some nearer heir being born: as a brother, or nephew, whose presumptive succession may be destroyed by the birth of a child; or a daughter, whose present hopes may be hereafter cut off by the birth of a son. Nay, even if the estate hath descended, by the death of the owner, to such brother, or nephew, or daughter; in the former cases, the estate shall be divested and taken away by the birth of a posthumous child; and, in the latter, it shall also be totally divested by the birth of a posthumous son.<sup>o</sup>

§ 296. (ii) Seisin necessary in ancestor.—<sup>[209]</sup> We must also remember that no person can be properly such an ancestor, as that an inheritance of lands or tenements can be derived from him. unless he hath had actual seisin of such lands, either by his own entry, or by the possession of his own or his ancestor's lessee for years, or by receiving rent from a lessee of the freehold:<sup>p</sup> or unless he hath had what is equivalent to corporal seisin in hereditaments that are incorporeal; such as the receipt of rent, a presentation to the church in case of an advowson,<sup>q</sup> and the like. But he shall not be accounted an ancestor, who hath had only a bare right or title to enter or be otherwise seised. And therefore all the cases which will be mentioned in the present chapter are upon the supposition that the deceased (whose inheritance is now claimed) was the last person actually seised thereof. For the law requires this notoriety of possession, as evidence that the ancestor had that property in himself, which is now to be transmitted to his heir. Which notoriety hath succeeded in the place of the ancient feudal investiture, whereby, while feuds were precarious, the vassal on the descent of lands was formerly admitted in the lord's court (as is still the practice in Scotland) and there received his seisin, in the nature of a renewal of his ancestors' grant, in the presence of the feudal peers: till at length, when the right of succession became indefeasible, an entry on any part of the lands, within the country (which if disputed was afterwards to be tried by those peers) or other notorious possession, was admitted as equivalent to the formal grant of seisin, and made the tenant capable of transmitting his estate by descent. The seisin, therefore, of any person, thus understood, makes him the root or stock, from which all future inheritance by right of blood must be derived: which is very briefly expressed in this maxim, seisina facit stipitem.<sup>r</sup>

§ 297. (iii) Descent from father to son.—<sup>[210]</sup> When, therefore, a person dies so seised, the inheritance first goes to his issue: as if there be Geoffrey, John, and Matthew, grandfather, father, and son; and John purchases land, and dies; his son Matthew shall succeed him as heir, and not the grandfather Geoffrey; to whom the land shall never ascend, but shall rather escheat to the lord.<sup>s</sup>

§ 298. (aa) Exclusion of lineal ascent.—This rule, so far as it is affirmative and relates to lineal descents, is almost universally adopted by all nations; and it seems founded on a principle of natural reason, that (whenever a right of property transmissible to representatives is admitted) the possessions of the parents should go, upon their decease, in the first place to their children, as those to whom they have given being, and for whom they are therefore bound to provide. But the negative branch, or total exclusion of parents and all lineal ancestors from succeeding to the inheritance of their offspring, is peculiar to our own laws, and such as have been deduced from the same original. For, by the Jewish law, on failure of issue, the father succeeded to the son, in exclusion of brethren, unless one of them married the widow and raised up seed to his brother.<sup>t</sup> And, by the laws of Rome, in the first place the children or lineal descendants were preferred; and, on failure of these, the father and mother or lineal ascendants succeeded together with the brethren and sisters;<sup>u</sup> though by the law of the twelve tables the mother was originally, on account of her sex, excluded.<sup>v</sup> Hence this rule of our laws has been censured and declaimed against, as absurd and derogating from the maxims of equity and natural justice.<sup>v</sup> Yet that there is nothing unjust or absurd in it, but that, on the contrary, it is founded upon very good reason, may appear from considering as well the nature of the rule itself as the occasion of introducing it into our laws.

[211] We are to reflect, in the first place, that all rules of succession to estates are creatures of the civil polity, and juris positivi (of positive law) merely. The right of property, which is gained by occupancy, extends naturally no further than the life of the present possessor: after which the land by the law of nature would again become common, and liable to be seized by the next occupant: but society, to prevent the mischiefs that might ensue from a doctrine so productive of contention, has established conveyances, wills, and successions; whereby the property originally gained by possession is continued, and transmitted from one man to another, according to the rules which each state has respectively thought proper to prescribe. There is certainly, therefore, no injustice done to individuals, whatever be the path of descent marked out by the municipal law.

If we next consider the time and occasion of introducing this rule into our law, we shall find it to have been grounded upon very substantial reasons. I think there is no doubt to be made, but that it was introduced at the same time with, and in consequence of, the feudal tenures. For it was an express rule of the feudal law,<sup>w</sup> that successionis feudi talis est natura, quod ascendentes non succedunt (the nature of feudal succession is such that those in the ascending line do not inherit); and therefore the same maxim obtains also in the French law to this day.<sup>x</sup> Our Henry the First, indeed, among other restorations of the old Saxon laws, restored the right of succession in the ascending line:<sup>y</sup> but this soon fell again into disuse; for so early as Glanvill's time, who wrote under Henry the Second, we find it laid down as established law,<sup>z</sup> that hæreditas nunquam ascendit (the inheritance never ascends); which has remained an invariable maxim ever since. These circumstances evidently show this rule to be of feudal original; and, taken in that light, there are some arguments in its favor, besides those which are drawn [212] merely from the reason of the thing. For if the feud, of which the son died seised, was really feudum antiquum (an ancient fee), or one descended to him from his ancestors, the father could not possibly succeed to it, because it must have passed him in the course of descent, before it could come to the son: unless it were feudum maternum (a maternal fee), or one descended from his mother, and then for other reasons (which will appear hereafter) the father could in no wise inherit it. And if it were feudum novum (a new fee), or one newly acquired by the son, then only the descendants from the body of the feudatory himself could succeed, by the known maxim of the early feudal constitutions; <sup>b</sup> which was founded as well upon the personal merit of the vassal, which might be transmitted to his children but could not ascend to his progenitors, as also upon this consideration of military policy, that the decrepit grandsire of a vigorous vassal would be but indifferently qualified to succeed him in his feudal services. Nay, even if this feudum novum (new fee) were held by the son ut feudum antiquum (as an ancient fee), or with all the qualities annexed of a feud descended from his ancestors, such feud must in all respects have descended as if it had been really an ancient feud; and therefore could not go to the father, because if it had been an ancient feud, the father must have been dead before it could have come to the son. Thus, whether the feud was strictly novum, or strictly antiquum, or whether it was novum held ut antiquum, in none of these cases the father could possibly succeed. These reasons, drawn from the history of the rule itself, seem to be more satisfactory than that quaint one of Bracton, <sup>c</sup> adopted by Sir Edward Coke, <sup>d</sup> which regulates the descent of lands according to the laws of gravitation.

§ 299. (b) Second rule: males preferred to females.—A second general rule or canon is, that the male issue shall be admitted before the female.

[213] Thus sons shall be admitted before daughters; or, as our male lawgivers have somewhat uncomplaisantly expressed it, the worthiest of blood shall be preferred.<sup>o</sup> As if John Stiles hath two sons, Matthew and Gilbert, and two daughters, Margaret and Charlotte, and dies; first Matthew, and (in case of his death without issue) then Gilbert, shall be admitted to the succession in preference to both the daughters.

This preference of males to females is entirely agreeable to the law of succession among the Jews,<sup>1</sup> and also among the states of Greece, or at least among the Athenians;<sup>2</sup> but was totally unknown to the laws of Rome<sup>3</sup> (such of them, I mean, as are at present extant), wherein brethren and sisters were allowed to succeed to equal portions of the inheritance. I shall not here enter into the comparative merit of the Roman and the other constitutions in this particular, nor examine into the greater dignity of blood in the male or female sex; but shall only observe that our present preference of males to females seems to have arisen entirely from the feudal law. For though our British ancestors, the Welsh, appear to have given a preference to males,<sup>4</sup> yet our subsequent Danish predecessors seem to have made no distinction of sexes, but to have admitted all the children at once to the inheritance.<sup>5</sup> But the feudal law of the Saxons on the Continent (which was probably brought over hither, and first altered, by the law of King Canute) gives an evident preference of the male to the female sex. "Pater aut mater, defuncti, filio non filia hæreditatem relinquunt. . . . Qui defunctus non filios sed filias reliquerit, ad eas omnis hæreditas pertineat (The father or mother at their death shall leave their inheritance to their son, not to their daughter. . . . If a man at his death leave no sons, but only daughters, then the whole inheritance shall belong to them.)"<sup>6</sup> It is possible, therefore, that this preference might be a branch of that imperfect system of feuds, which obtained here before the Conquest; especially as it subsists among the customs of gavelkind, and as, in the charter or [214] laws of King Henry the First, it is not (like many Norman innovations) given up, but rather enforced.<sup>m</sup> The true reason of preferring the males must be deduced from feudal principles: for, by the genuine and original policy of that constitution, no female could ever succeed to a proper feud,<sup>n</sup> inasmuch as they were incapable of performing those military services, for the sake of which that system was established. But our law does not extend to a total exclusion of females, as the Salic law, and others, where feuds were most strictly retained: it only postpones them to males; for, though daughters are excluded by sons, yet they succeed before any collateral relations: our law, like that of the Saxon feudists before mentioned, thus steering a middle course, between the absolute rejection of females, and the putting them on a footing with males.

§ 300. (c) Third rule: primogeniture.—A third rule, or canon of descent, is this; that where there are two or more males in equal degree, the eldest only shall inherit; but the females all together.

As if a man hath two sons, Matthew and Gilbert, and two daughters, Margaret and Charlotte, and dies; Matthew, his eldest son, shall alone succeed to his estate, in exclusion of Gilbert, the second son, and both the daughters; but, if both the sons die without issue before the father, the daughters Margaret and Charlotte shall both inherit the estate as coparceners.<sup>o</sup>

obvious and natural way; and has the appearance, at least in the opinion of younger brothers, of the greatest impartiality and justice. But when the emperors began to create honorary feuds, or titles of nobility, it was found necessary (in order to preserve their dignity) to make them impartible,<sup>a</sup> or (as they styled them) feuda individua (indivisible fees), and in consequence descendible to the eldest son alone. This example was further enforced by the inconveniences that attended the splitting of estates; namely, the division of the military services, the multitude of infant tenants incapable of performing any duty, the consequential weakening of the strength of the kingdom, and the inducing younger sons to take up with the business and idleness of a country life, instead of being serviceable to themselves and the public, by engaging in mercantile, in military, in civil, or in ecclesiastical employments.<sup>b</sup> These reasons occasioned an almost total change in the method of feudal inheritances abroad; so that the eldest male began universally to succeed to the whole of the lands in all military tenures: and in this condition the feudal constitution was established in England by William the Conqueror.

§ 302. (ii) Primogeniture in socage estates.—Yet we find that socage estates frequently descended to all the sons equally, so lately as when Glanvill<sup>c</sup> wrote, in the reign of Henry the Second; and it is mentioned in the Mirror<sup>d</sup> as a part of our ancient constitution, that knights' fees should descend to the eldest son, and socage fees should be partible among the male children. However, in Henry the Third's time we find by Bracton<sup>e</sup> that socage lands, in imitation of lands in chivalry, had almost entirely fallen into the right of succession<sup>f</sup> by primogeniture, as the law now stands: [<sup>216</sup>] except in Kent, where they gloried in the preservation of their ancient gavelkind tenure, of which a principal branch was the joint inheritance of all the sons; and except in some particular manors and townships, where their local customs continued the descent, sometimes to all, sometimes to the youngest son only, or in other more singular methods of succession.

§ 303. (iii) Descent as among females.—As to the females, they are still left as they were by the ancient law: for they were all equally incapable of performing any personal service: and therefore one main reason of preferring the eldest ceasing, such preference would have been injurious to the rest; and the other principal purpose, the prevention of the too minute subdivision of estates, was left to be considered and provided for by the lords, who had the disposal of these female heiresses in marriage. However, the succession by primogeniture, even among females, took place as to the inheritance of the crown;* wherein the necessity of a sole and determinate succession is as great in the one sex as the other. And the right of sole succession, though not of primogeniture, was also established with respect to female dignities and titles of honor. For if a man holds an earldom to him and the heirs of his body, and dies, leaving only daughters; the eldest shall not, of course, be countess, but the dignity is in suspense or abeyance till the king shall declare his pleasure; for he, being the fountain of honor, may confer it on which of them he pleases.<sup>a</sup> In which disposition is preserved a strong trace of the ancient law of feuds, before their descent by primogeniture even among the males was established; namely, that the lord might bestow them on which of the sons he thought proper—“progressum est, ut ad filios deveniret, in quem scilicet dominus hoc vellet beneficium confirmare (it was customary for it to descend to the sons, that is, to him on whom the lord wished to settle the estate).”<sup>b</sup>

§ 304. (d) Fourth rule: lineal descendants take by representation.—A fourth rule, or canon of descents, is this; that the lineal descendants, in infinitum, of any person deceased [217] shall represent their ancestor; that is, shall stand in the same place as the person himself would have done, had he been living.

Thus the child, grandchild, or great-grandchild (either male or female) of the eldest son succeeds before the younger son, and so in infinitum.<sup>c</sup> And these representatives shall take neither more nor less, but just so much as their principals would have done. As if there be two sisters, Margaret and Charlotte; and Margaret

dies, leaving six daughters; and then John Stiles, the father of the two sisters, dies, without other issue: these six daughters shall take among them exactly the same as their mother Margaret would have done, had she been living; that is, a moiety of the lands of John Stiles in coparcenary: so that, upon partition made, if the land be divided into twelve parts, thereof Charlotte, the surviving sister, shall have six, and her six nieces, the daughters of Margaret, one apiece.

§ 305. (i) Called succession in stirpes.—This taking by representation is called succession in stirpes, according to the roots; since all the branches inherit the same share that their root, whom they represent, would have done. And in this manner also was the Jewish succession directed;<sup>d</sup> but the Roman somewhat differed from it. In the descending line the right of representation continued in infinitum, and the inheritance still descended in stirpes: as if one of three daughters died, leaving ten children, and then the father died: the two surviving daughters had each one-third of his effects, and the ten grandchildren had the remaining third divided between them. And so among collaterals, if any person of equal degree with the persons represented were still subsisting (as if the deceased left one brother, and two nephews the sons of another brother), the succession was still guided by the roots: but, if both the brethren were dead leaving issue, then (I apprehend) their representatives in equal degree became themselves principals, [218] and shared the inheritance per capita (individually), that is, share and share alike; they being themselves now the next in degree to the ancestor, in their own right, and not by right of representation.<sup>e</sup> So, if the next heirs of Titius be six nieces, three by one sister, two by another, and one by a third; his inheritance by the Roman law was divided into six parts, and one given to each of the nieces; whereas the law of England in this case would still divide it only into three parts, and distribute it per stirpes (by representation), thus: one-third to the three children who represent one sister, another third to the two who represent the second,

§ 306. (ii) Reason for rule of succession in stirpes.—This mode of representation is a necessary consequence of the double preference given by our law, first to the male issue, and next to the first born among the males, to both which the Roman law is a stranger. For if all the children of three sisters were in England to claim per capita in their own right as next of kin to the ancestor, without any respect to the stocks from whence they sprung, and those children were partly male and partly female; then the eldest male among them would exclude not only his own brethren and sisters, but all the issue of the other two daughters; or else the law in this instance must be inconsistent with itself, and depart from the preference which it constantly gives to the males, and the first-born, among persons in equal degree. Whereas, by dividing the inheritance according to the roots, or stirpes, the rule of descent is kept uniform and steady: the issue of the eldest son excludes

3 "Blackstone's discussion of the canons of descent has been by no means free from criticisms. But whether or not he, in this respect, accurately stated the provisions of the civil and of the common law, and the reasons for their distinction, his words are of great importance, because, during the whole formative period of the American law of descent—at least, outside of the original colonies—Blackstone's Commentaries was generally accepted as the embodiment of the common law. Every student resorted to it as teaching the elements of his profession. Most practitioners regarded it as the authoritative statement of the English law at the period of separation. So that those who framed the existing statutes of descent may safely be presumed to have been guided largely by what is there said as to rules of law which they were about to redeclare or alter, and as to the reasons for their existence. Referring to the text in this light, it is significant that in America the most general and earliest departures from the common law were in the abolishment of primogeniture and the preference of males. These changes swept away the reasons given by Blackstone for representation among collaterals, and it must have been in the minds of the framers of the statutes to follow another maxim frequently expressed by Blackstone, and sweep away the law itself, together with the reasons for its existence. (Knapp v. Windsor, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 156; Snow v. Snow, 111 Mass. 389; Balch v. Stone, 149 Mass. 39, 20 N. E. 322.) The significance of these cases is chiefly in the fact that they construe such language as 'next of kin in equal degrees' as implying a taking per capita by the class described." Douglas v. Cameron, 47 Neb. 358, 66 N. W. 430, 432.

all other pretenders, as the son himself (if living) would have done; but the issue of two daughters divide the inheritance between them, provided their mothers (if living) would have done the same: and among these several issues, or representatives of the respective roots, the same preference to males and the same right of primogeniture obtain, as would have obtained at the first among the roots themselves, the sons or daughters of the deceased. As if a man hath two sons, A and B, and A dies leaving two [219] sons, and then the grandfather dies; now the eldest son of A shall succeed to the whole of his grandfather's estate; and if A had left only two daughters, they should have succeeded also to equal moieties of the whole, in exclusion of B and his issue. But if a man hath only three daughters, C, D, and E; and C dies leaving two sons, D leaving two daughters, and E leaving a daughter and a son who is younger than his sister: here when the grandfather dies, the eldest son of C shall succeed to one-third, in exclusion of the younger; the two daughters of D to another third in partnership; and the son of E to the remaining third, in exclusion of his elder sister. And the same right of representation, guided and restrained by the same rules of descent, prevails downwards in infinitum.

§ 307. (iii) History of rule of succession in stirpes.—Yet this right does not appear to have been thoroughly established in the time of Henry the Second, when Glanvill wrote; and therefore in the title to the crown especially, we find frequent contests between the younger (but surviving) brother and his nephew (being the son and representative of the elder deceased) in regard to the inheritance of their common ancestor: for the uncle is certainly nearer of kin to the common stock, by one degree, than the nephew; though the nephew, by representing his father, has in him the right of primogeniture. The uncle also was usually better able to perform the services of the fief; and besides had frequently superior interest and strength, to back his pretensions and crush the right of his nephew. And even to this day, in the lower Saxony, proximity of blood takes place of representative primogeniture; that is, the younger surviving brother is admitted to the inheritance before the son of an elder deceased: which occasioned the disputes between the two houses of Mecklenburg, Schwerin, and Strelitz, in 1692.† Yet Glanvill, with us, even in the twelfth century, seems‡ to declare for the right of the nephew by representation; provided the eldest son had not received a provision in lands from his father (or as the civil law would call it), had not been forisfiliated, [220] in his lifetime. King John, however, who kept his nephew Arthur from the throne, by disputing this right of representation, did all in his power to abolish it throughout the realm:‡ but in the time of his son, King Henry the Third, we find the rule indisputably settled in the manner we have here laid it down,† and so it has continued ever since. And thus much for lineal descents.

§ 308. (e) Fifth rule: collateral descent to blood of first purchaser.—A fifth rule is, that on failure of lineal descendants, or issue, of the person last seised, the inheritance shall descend to the blood of the first purchaser; subject to the three preceding rules.

Thus if Geoffrey Stiles purchases land, and it descends to John Stiles, his son, and John dies seised thereof without issue; whoever succeeds to this inheritance must be of the blood of Geoffrey, the first purchaser of this family.‡ The first purchaser, perquisitor, is he who first acquired the estate to his family, whether the same was transferred to him by sale, or by gift, or by any other method, except only that of descent.

§ 309. (i) Rule peculiar to English law.—This is a rule almost peculiar to our own laws, and those of a similar original. For it was entirely unknown among the Jews, Greeks, and Romans: none of whose laws looked any further than the person himself who died seised of the estate: but assigned him an heir, without considering by what title he gained it, or from what ancestor he derived it. But the law of Normandy† agrees with our law in this respect: nor indeed is that agreement to be wondered at, since the law of descents in both is of feudal original; and this rule or canon cannot otherwise be accounted for than by recurring to feudal principles.

§ 310. (ii) Origin of the rule.—When feuds first began to be hereditary, it was made a necessary qualification of the heir, who would succeed to a feud, that he should be of the blood of, that is lineally <sup>[221]</sup> descended from, the first feudatory or purchaser. In consequence whereof, if a vassal died possessed of a feud of his own acquiring, or feudum novum (a new fee), it could not descend to any but his own offspring; no, not even to his brother, because he was not descended, nor derived his blood, from the first acquirer. But if it was feudum antiquum (an ancient fee), that is, one descended to the vassal from his ancestors, then his brother, or such other collateral relation as was descended and derived his blood from the first feudatory, might succeed to such inheritance. To this purpose speaks the following rule; “frater fratri sine legitimo hærede defuncto, in beneficio quod eorum patris fuit, succedat: sin autem unus e fratribus a domino feudum acceperit, eo defuncto sine legitimo hærede, frater ejus in feudum non succedit (a brother may succeed to his brother dying without a lawful heir, in the estate which was their father’s: but if one of the brothers shall have received the fee from his lord, and die without a lawful heir, his brother does not succeed.)”<sup>m</sup> The true feudal reason for which rule was this; that what was given to a man, for his personal service and personal merit, ought not to descend to any but the heirs of his person. And therefore, as in estates-tail, (which a proper feud very much resembled), so in the feudal donation, “nomen hæredis, in prima investitura expressum, tantum ad descendentes ex corpore primi vasalli extenditur; et non ad collaterales, nisi ex corpore primi vasalli sive stipitis descendant (the name of heir expressed in the first investiture extends only to the descendants of the body of the first vassal, and not to the collaterals unless they descend from the body of the first vassal or stock)”<sup>n</sup>: the will of the donor, or original lord (when feuds were turned from life estates into inheritances), not being to make them absolutely hereditary, like the Roman allodium, but hereditary only sub modo (in a particular way); not hereditary to the collateral relations, or lineal ancestors, or husband, or wife of the feudatory, but to the issue descended from his body only.

However, in process of time, when the feudal rigor was in part abated, a method was invented to let in the collateral relations of the grantee to the inheritance, by granting him a feudum novum to hold ut feudum antiquum; that is, with all the qualities annexed of a feud derived from his ancestors; and then the collateral relations were admitted to succeed even in infinitum, because they might have been of the blood of, that is, descended from, the first imaginary purchaser. For <sup>[222]</sup> since it is not ascertained in such general grants whether this feud shall be held ut feudum paternum (as a paternal fee), or feudum avitum (an ancestral fee), but ut feudum antiquum (as an ancient fee) merely; as a feud of indefinite antiquity; that is, since it is not ascertained from which of the ancestors of the grantee this feud shall be supposed to have descended; the law will not ascertain it, but will suppose any of his ancestors, pro re nata (for the occasion as it may arise), to have been the first purchaser: and therefore it admits any of his collateral kindred (who have the other necessary requisites) to the inheritance, because every collateral kinsman must be descended from some one of his lineal ancestors.

Of this nature are all the grants of fee simple estates of this kingdom; for there is now in the law of England no such thing as a grant of a feudum novum, to be held ut novum; unless in the case of a fee-tail, and there we see that this rule is strictly observed, and none but the lineal descendants of the first donee (or purchaser) are admitted; but every grant of lands in fee simple is with us a feudum novum to be held ut antiquum, as a feud whose antiquity is indefinite: and therefore the collateral kindred of the grantee, or descendants from any of his lineal ancestors, by whom the lands might have possibly been purchased, are capable of being called to the inheritance.

Yet, when an estate hath really descended in a course of inheritance to the person last seised, the strict rule of the feudal law is still observed; and none are admitted, but the heirs of those through whom the inheritance hath passed: for all others have demonstrably none of the blood of the first purchaser in them, and therefore shall never succeed. As, if lands come to John Stiles by descent from his mother, Lucy Baker, no relation of his father (as such) shall ever be his heir of these lands; and, vice versa, if they descend from his father, Geoffrey Stiles, no relation of his mother (as such) shall ever be admitted thereto; for his father's kindred have none of his mother's blood, nor have his mother's relations any share of his father's blood. And so, if the estate descended from his father's father, George Stiles; the relations of <sup>[223]</sup> his father's mother, Cecilia Kempe, shall for the same reason never be admitted, but only those of his father's father. This is also the rule of the French law,<sup>o</sup> which is derived from the same feudal fountain.

Here we may observe, that so far as the feud is really antiquum, the law traces it back, and will not suffer any to inherit but the blood of those ancestors, from whom the feud was conveyed to the late proprietor. But when, through length of time, it can trace it no farther; as if it be not known whether his grandfather, George Stiles, inherited it from his father, Walter Stiles, or his mother, Christian Smith, or if it appear that his grandfather was the first grantee, and so took it (by the general law) as a feud of indefinite antiquity; in either of these cases the law admits the descendants of any ancestor of George Stiles, either paternal or maternal, to be in their due order the heirs to John Stiles of this estate: because in the first case it is really uncertain, and in the second case it is supposed to be uncertain, whether the grandfather derived his title from the part of his father or his mother.

§ 312. (iv) The principle of collateral inheritance.—This, then, is the great and general principle, upon which the law of collateral inheritances depends; that, upon failure of issue in the last proprietor, the estate shall descend to the blood of the first purchaser; or, that it shall result back to the heirs of the body of that ancestor, from whom it either really has, or is supposed by fiction of law to have originally descended: according to the rule laid down in the Year-Books,<sup>p</sup> Fitzherbert,<sup>q</sup> Brook,<sup>r</sup> and Hale;<sup>s</sup> “that he who would have been heir to the father of the deceased” (and, of course, to the mother, or any other purchasing ancestor) "shall also be heir to the son."*

The remaining rules are only rules of evidence, calculated to investigate who that purchasing ancestor was; which <sup>[224]</sup> in feudis vere antiquis (in fees really ancient) has in process of time been forgotten, and is supposed to be in feuds that are held ut antiquis.

§ 313. (f) Sixth rule: next collateral kinsman of the whole blood.—A sixth rule or canon therefore is, that the collateral heir of the person last seised must be his next collateral kinsman, of the whole blood.

§ 314. (i) Who is next collateral kinsman.—First, he must be his next collateral kinsman, either personally or jure representationis (by right of representation); which proximity is reckoned according to the canonical degrees of consanguinity before mentioned. Therefore, the brother being in the first degree, he and his descendants shall exclude the uncle and his issue, who is only in the second. And herein consists the true reason of the different methods of computing the degrees of consanguinity, in the civil law on the one hand, and in the canon law and common law on the other. The civil law regards consanguinity principally with respect to successions, and therein very naturally considers only the person deceased, to whom the relation is claimed: it therefore counts the degrees of kindred according to the number of persons through whom the claim must be derived from him; and makes not only his great-nephew but also his first cousin to be both related to him in the fourth degree; because there are three persons between him and each of them. The canon law regards consanguinity principally with a view to prevent incestuous marriages, between those who have a large portion of the same blood running in their respective veins; and therefore looks up to the author of that blood, or the common ancestor, reckoning the degrees from him: so that the great-nephew is related in the third canonical degree to the person proposed, and the first cousin in the second; the former being distant three degrees from the common ancestor, and therefore deriving only one-fourth of his blood from the same fountain with the propositus; the latter and also the propositus being each of them distant only two degrees from the common ancestor, and therefore having one-half of each of their bloods the same. The common law regards consanguinity principally with respect to descents; and, having therein the same object in view as the civil, it may seem as if it ought <sup>[225]</sup> to proceed according to the civil computation. But as it also respects the purchasing ancestor, from whom the estate was derived, it therein resembles the canon law, and therefore counts its degrees in the same manner. Indeed, the designation of person (in seeking for the next of kin) will come to exactly the same end (though the degrees will be differently numbered), whichever method of computation we suppose the law of England to use; since the right of representation (of the father by the son, etc.) is allowed to prevail in infinitum. This allowance was absolutely necessary, else there would have frequently been many claimants in exactly the same degree of kindred, as (for instance) uncles and nephews of the deceased; which multiplicity though no inconvenience in the Roman law of partible inheritances, yet would have been productive of endless confusion where the right of sole succession, as with us, is established. The issue or descendants, therefore, of John Stiles' brother are all of them in the first degree of kindred with respect to inheritances, as their father also, when living, was: those of his uncle in the second, and so on, and are severally called to the succession in right of such their representative proximity.

The right of representation being thus established, the former part of the present rule amounts to this; that on failure of issue of the person last seised, the inheritance shall descend to the issue of his next immediate ancestor. Thus, if John Stiles dies without issue, his estate shall descend to Francis, his brother, who is lineally descended from Geoffrey Stiles, his next immediate ancestor, or father. On failure of brethren, or sisters, and their issue, it shall descend to the uncle of John Stiles, the lineal descendant of his grandfather George, and so on in infinitum. Very similar to which was the law of inheritance among the ancient Germans, our progenitors: "hæredes successorisque, sui cuique liberi, et nullum testamentum: si liberi non sunt, proximus gradus in possessione, fratres, patruī avunculi (every man's children are his heirs and successors if there be no will; if there be no children the next in degree shall be seized, as brothers, uncles on the father's side, uncles on the mother's side)."†

§ 315. (ii) Lineal ancestors are the common stocks.—[226]

Now, here it must be observed, that the lineal ancestors, though (according to the first rule) incapable themselves of succeeding to the estate, because it is supposed to have already passed them, are yet the common stocks from which the next successor must spring. And therefore in the Jewish law, which in this respect entirely corresponds with ours,‡ the father or other lineal ancestor is himself said to be the heir, though long since dead, as being represented by the persons of his issue; who are held to succeed not in their own rights, as brethren, uncles, etc., but in right of representation, as the offspring of the father, grandfather, etc., of the deceased.¶ But, though the common ancestor be thus the root of the inheritance, yet with us it is not necessary to name him in making out the pedigree or descent. For the descent between two brothers is held to be an immediate descent: and therefore title may be made by one brother or his representatives to or through another, without mentioning their common father.* If Geoffrey Stiles hath two sons, John and Francis, Francis may claim as heir to John, without naming their father Geoffrey; and so the son of Francis may claim as cousin and heir to Matthew, the son of John, without naming the grandfather; viz., as son of Francis, who was the brother of John, who was the father of Matthew. But though the common ancestors are not named in deducing the pedigree, yet the law still respects them as the fountains of inheritable blood: and therefore in order to ascertain the collateral heir of John Stiles, it is in the first place necessary to recur to his ancestors in the first degree; and if they have left any other issue besides John, that issue will be his heir. On default of such, we must ascend one step higher to the ancestors in the second degree, and then to those in the third, and fourth, and so upwards in infinitum; till some ancestors be found, who have other issue descending from them besides the deceased, in a parallel or collateral line. From these ancestors the heir of John Stiles must derive his descent; and in such derivation the same rules must be observed, with regard to sex, [227] primogeniture, and representation, that have before been laid down with regard to lineal descents from the person of the last proprietor.

§ 316. (iii) Exclusion of the half blood.—But, secondly, the heir need not be nearest kinsman absolutely, but only sub modo (in a particular way); that is, he must be the nearest kinsman of the whole blood; for, if there be a much nearer kinsman of the half blood, a distant kinsman of the whole blood shall be admitted, and the other entirely excluded.

A kinsman of the whole blood is he that is derived, not only from the same ancestor, but from the same couple of ancestors. For, as every man's own blood is compounded of the bloods of his respective ancestors, he only is properly of the whole or entire blood with another, who hath (so far as the distance of degrees will permit) all the same ingredients in the composition of his blood that the other hath. Thus, the blood of John Stiles being composed of those of Geoffrey Stiles, his father, and Lucy Baker, his mother, therefore his brother Francis, being descended from both the same parents, hath entirely the same blood with John Stiles; or he is his brother of the whole blood. But if, after the death of Geoffrey, Lucy Baker, the mother, marries a second husband, Lewis Gay, and hath issue by him; the blood of this issue, being compounded of the blood of Lucy Baker (it is true) on the one part, but that of Lewis Gay (instead of Geoffrey Stiles) on the other part, it hath therefore only half the same ingredients with that of John Stiles; so that he is only his brother of the half blood, and for that reason they shall never inherit to each other. So also, if the father has two sons, A and B, by different venters or wives; now these two brethren are not brethren of the whole blood, and therefore shall never inherit to each other, but the estate shall rather escheat to the lord. Nay, even if the father dies, and his lands descend to his eldest son A, who enters thereon, and dies seised without issue; still B shall not be heir to this estate, because he is only of the half blood to A, the person last seised: but,* had A died without entry, then B might have inherited; not as [228] heir to A, his half-brother, but as heir to their common father, who was the person last actually seised.<sup>7</sup>

§ 317. (aa) Reason for excluding half blood.—This total exclusion of the half blood from the inheritance, being almost peculiar to our own law, is looked upon as a strange hardship by such as are unacquainted with the reasons on which it is grounded.<sup>4</sup> But these censures arise from a misapprehension of the rule, which is not so much to be considered in the light of a rule of descent, as of a rule of evidence; an auxiliary rule, to carry

4 Exclusion of the half blood.—The exclusion of the half blood seems to rest upon a notion of relationship quite different from any we now entertain, but which is by no means unreasonable, if we rightly comprehend it. It is that all inheritance must be traced to the same marriage—to the same pair of ancestors, not merely to a single common ancestor. In the direct line this, of course, has no meaning: descent can never be of the half blood. But in collateral lines it makes a broad distinction. Each couple have a separate progeny, and the connection between them is not legally significant: it is only an accident, so to speak.

"To be of the blood of G. is either to be immediately descended from him or to be descended from the same couple of common ancestors. Two persons are consanguinei who are descended from the same two ancestors. The heir and ancestor must not only have two common ancestors with the original purchasers of the estate, but must have two common ancestors with each other; and therefore if the son purchases lands, and dies without issue, and it descends to any heir on the part of the father, if the line of the father should afterwards become extinct, it cannot pass to the line of the mother." (Christian, citing Hale's History of C. L., p. 246; Y. B. 49 Ed. III, 12.)

Blackstone himself has shown that a kinsman of the whole blood is derived from the same couple of ancestors (text, p. *227); and it seems singular that he should have overlooked the bearing of this on the exclusion of the half a former into execution. And here we must again remember, that the great and most universal principle of collateral inheritances being this, that an heir to a feudum antiquum must be of the blood of the first feudatory or purchaser, that is, derived in a lineal descent from him; it was originally requisite, as upon gifts in tail it still is, to make out the pedigree of the heir from the first donee or purchaser, and to show that such heir was his lineal representative. But when, by length of time and a long course of descents, it came (in those rude and unlettered ages) to be forgotten who was really the first feudatory or purchaser, and thereby the proof of an actual descent from him became impossible: then the law substituted what Sir Martin Wright* calls a reasonable, in the stead of an impossible, proof: for it remits the proof of an actual descent from the first purchaser; and only requires in lieu of it, that the claimant be next of the whole blood to the person last in possession (or derived from the same couple of ancestors); which will probably answer the same end as if he could trace his pedigree in a direct line from the first purchaser. For he who is my kinsman of the whole blood can have no ancestors beyond or higher than the common stock, but what are equally my ancestors also; and mine are vice versa his: he therefore is very likely to be derived from that unknown ancestor of mine, from whom the inheritance descended. But a kinsman of the half blood has but one-half of his ancestors above the common stock the same as mine; and therefore there is not the same probability of that standing requisite in the law, that he be derived from the blood of the first purchaser.

[229] To illustrate this by example. Let there be John Stiles, and Francis, brothers by the same father and mother, and another son of the same mother by Lewis Gay a second husband. Now, if John dies seised of lands, but it is uncertain whether they de-blood, and followed Wright's very inconclusive explanation of it as a mere rule of evidence.

But Blackstone could know nothing of the many illustrations of the true force of that principle in the Germanic law of the Continent first made known by recent study; such as the rule requiring a father to divide property with his children by first wife, before proceeding to a second marriage, etc.—HAMMOND.

scended to him from his father or mother; in this case his brother Francis, of the whole blood, is qualified to be his heir; for he is sure to be in the line of descent from the first purchaser, whether it were the line of the father or the mother. But if Francis should die before John, without issue, the mother's son by Lewis Gay (or brother of the half blood) is utterly incapable of being heir; for he cannot prove his descent from the first purchaser, who is unknown, nor has he that fair probability which the law admits as presumptive evidence, since he is to the full as likely not to be descended from the line of the first purchaser, as to be descended: and therefore the inheritance shall go to the nearest relation possessed of this presumptive proof, the whole blood.

And, as this is the case in feudis antiquis (in ancient fees), where there really did once exist a purchasing ancestor, who is forgotten; it is also the case in feudis novis (in new fees) held ut antiquis, where the purchasing ancestor is merely ideal, and never existed but only in fiction of law. Of this nature are all grants of lands in fee simple at this day, which are inheritable as if they descended from some uncertain indefinite ancestor, and therefore any of the collateral kindred of the real modern purchaser (and not his own offspring only) may inherit them, provided they be of the whole blood; for all such are, in judgment of law, likely enough to be derived from this indefinite ancestor: but those of the half blood are excluded, for want of the same probability. Nor should this be thought hard, that a brother of the purchaser, though only of the half blood, must thus be disinherited, and a more remote relation of the whole blood admitted, merely upon a supposition and fiction of law; since it is only upon a like supposition and fiction, that brethren of purchasers (whether of the whole or half blood) are entitled to inherit at all: for we have seen that in feudis stricte novis (in fees strictly new) neither brethren nor any other collaterals [230] were admitted. As therefore in feudis antiquis we have seen the reasonableness of excluding the half blood, if by a fiction of law a feudum novum be made descendible to collaterals as if it was feudum antiquum, it is just and equitable that it should be subject to the same restrictions as well as the same latitude of descent.

Perhaps by this time the exclusion of the half blood does not appear altogether so unreasonable as at first sight it is apt to do. It is certainly a very fine-spun and subtle nicety: but, considering the principles upon which our law is founded, it is not an injustice, nor always a hardship; since even the succession of the whole blood was originally a beneficial indulgence, rather than the strict right of collaterals: and, though that indulgence is not extended to the demi-kindred, yet they are rarely abridged of any right which they could possibly have enjoyed before. The doctrine of the whole blood was calculated to supply the frequent impossibility of proving a descent from the first purchaser, without some proof of which (according to our fundamental maxim) there can be no inheritance allowed of. And this purpose it answers, for the most part effectually enough. I speak with these restrictions, because it does not, neither can any other method, answer this purpose entirely. For though all the ancestors of John Stiles, above the common stock, are also the ancestors of his collateral kinsman of the whole blood; yet, unless that common stock be in the first degree (that is, unless they have the same father and mother), there will be intermediate ancestors below the common stock, that may belong to either of them respectively, from which the other is not descended, and therefore can have none of their blood. Thus, though John Stiles and his brother of the whole blood can each have no other ancestors than what are in common to them both; yet with regard to his uncle, where the common stock is removed one degree higher (that is, the grandfather and grandmother), one-half of John's ancestors will not be the ancestors of his uncle: his patruus, or father's brother, derives not his descent from John's maternal ancestors; nor his avunculus, or mother's brother, from those in the paternal line. Here, then, [231] the supply of proof is deficient, and by no means amounts to a certainty: and, the higher the common stock is removed, the more will even the probability decrease. But it must be observed, that (upon the same principles of calculation) the half blood have always a much less chance to be descended from an unknown indefinite ancestor of the deceased, than the whole blood in the same degree. As, in the first degree, the whole brother of John Stiles is sure to be descended from that unknown ancestor; his half-brother has only an even chance, for half John's ancestors are not his. So, in the second degree, John's uncle of the whole blood has an even chance; but the chances are three to one against his uncle of the half blood, for three-fourths of John's ancestors are not his. In like manner, in the third degree, the chances are only three to one against John's great-uncle of the whole blood, but they are seven to one against his great-uncle of the half blood, for seven-eighths of John's ancestors have no connection in blood with him. Therefore, the much less probability of the half blood's descent from the first purchaser, compared with that of the whole blood, in the several degrees, has occasioned a general exclusion of the half blood in all.

§ 318. (bb) Unjust extension of rule excluding half blood.— But, while I thus illustrate the reason of excluding the half blood in general, I must be impartial enough to own, that, in some instances, the practice is carried further than the principle upon which it goes will warrant. Particularly, when a kinsman of the whole blood in a remoter degree, as the uncle or great-uncle, is preferred to one of the half blood in a nearer degree, as the brother: for the half-brother hath the same chance of being descended from the purchasing ancestor as the uncle; and a thrice better chance than the great-uncle, or kinsman in the third degree. It is also more especially overstrained, when a man has two sons by different venters, and the estate on his death descends from him to the eldest, who enters, and dies without issue; in which case the younger son cannot inherit this estate, because he is not of the whole blood to the last proprietor.* This, it must be [232] owned, carries a hardship with it, even upon feudal principles: for the rule was introduced only to supply the proof of a descent from the first purchaser; but here, as this estate notoriously descended from the father, and as both the brothers confessedly sprung from him, it is demonstrable that the half-brother must be of the blood of the first purchaser, who was either the father or some of the father's ancestors. When, therefore, there is actual demonstration of the thing to be proved, it is hard to exclude a man by a rule substituted to supply that proof when deficient. So far as the inheritance can be evidently traced back, there seems no need of calling in this presumptive proof, this rule of probability, to investigate what is already certain. Had the elder brother indeed been a purchaser, there would have been no hardship at all, for the reasons already given: or had the frater uterinus only, or brother by the mother's side, been excluded from an inheritance which descended from the father, it had been highly reasonable.

* A still harder case than this happened, M. 10 Edw. III (1335). On the death of a man, who had three daughters by a first wife, and a fourth by another, his lands descended equally to all four as coparceners. Afterwards the two eldest died without issue; and it was held, that the third daughter alone should inherit their shares, as being their heir of the whole blood; and that the youngest daughter should retain only her original fourth part of their common father's lands. (10 Ass. 27.) And yet it was clear law in M. 19 Edw. II (1325) that, where, lands had descended to two sisters of the half blood, as coparceners, each might be heir of those lands to the other. (Mayn. Edw. II. 628. Fitzh. Abr.t. Quare Impedit. 177.)

Indeed, it is this very instance of excluding a frater consanguineus, or brother by the father's side, from an inheritance which descended a patre (from the father), that Craig<sup>b</sup> has singled out, on which to ground his strictures on the English law of half blood. And, really, it should seem, as if the custom of excluding the half blood in Normandy<sup>c</sup> extended only to exclude a frater uterinus, when the inheritance descended a patre, and vice versa: and possibly in England also; as even with us it remained a doubt, in the time of Bracton,<sup>d</sup> and of Fleta;<sup>e</sup> whether the half blood on the father's side were excluded from the inheritance which originally descended from the common father, or only from such as descended from the respective mothers, and from newly purchased lands. And the rule of law, as laid [233] down by our Fortescue,<sup>f</sup> extends no further than this; frater fratri uterino non succedet in hæreditate paterna (a brother shall not succeed in the paternal inheritance to his brother by the mother's side). It is, moreover, worthy of observation, that by our law, as it now stands, the crown (which is the highest inheritance in the nation) may descend to the half blood of the preceding sovereign,<sup>g</sup> so as it be the blood of the first monarch, purchaser (or in the feudal language), conqueror, of the reigning family. Thus it actually did descend from King Edward the Sixth to Queen Mary, and from her to Queen Elizabeth, who were respectively of the half blood to each other.

For, the royal pedigree being always a matter of sufficient notoriety, there is no occasion to call in the aid of this presumptive rule of evidence, to render probable the descent from the royal stock, which was formerly King William the Norman, and is now (by act of parliament<sup>h</sup>) the Princess Sophia of Hanover. Hence also it is, that in estates-tail, where the pedigree from the first donee must be strictly proved, half blood is no impediment to the descent:<sup>1</sup> because, when the lineage is clearly made out, there is no need of this auxiliary proof. How far it might be desirable for the legislature to give relief, by amending the law of descents in one or two instances, and ordaining that the half blood might always inherit, where the estate notoriously descended from its own proper ancestor, and, in cases of new-purchased lands or uncertain descents, should never be excluded by the whole blood in a remoter degree; or how far a private inconvenience should be submitted to, rather than a long established rule should be shaken, it is not for me to determine.

§ 319. (cc) Summary of reasons for rule.—The rule, then, together with its illustration, amounts to this: that, in order to keep the estate of John Stiles as nearly as possible in the line of his purchasing ancestor, it must descend to the issue of the nearest couple of ancestors that have left descendants behind them; because the descendants of one ancestor only are not so likely to be in the line of that purchasing ancestor, as those who are descended from two.

[234] But here another difficulty arises. In the second, third, fourth, and every superior degree, every man has many couples of ancestors, increasing according to the distances in a geometrical progression upwards,<sup>k</sup> the descendants of all which respective couples are (representatively) related to him in the same degree. Thus in the second degree, the issue of George and Cecilia Stiles and of Andrew and Esther Baker, the two grandsires and grandmothers of John Stiles, are each in the same degree of propinquity; in the third degree, the respective issues of Walter and Christian

Stiles, of Luke and Frances Kempe, of Herbert and Hannah Baker, and of James and Emma Thorpe, are (upon the extinction of the two inferior degrees) all equally entitled to call themselves the next kindred of the whole blood to John Stiles. To which, therefore, of these ancestors must we first resort, in order to find out descendants to be preferably called to the inheritance? In answer to this, and to avoid the confusion and uncertainty that might arise between the several stocks, wherein the purchasing ancestor may be sought for.*

§ 320. (g) Seventh rule: preference of male stocks in collateral descent.—The seventh and last rule or canon is, that in collateral inheritances the male stock shall be preferred to the female (that is, kindred derived from the blood of the male ancestors shall be admitted before those from the blood of the female) unless where the lands have, in fact, descended from a female.

Thus the relations on the father's side are admitted in infinitum, before those on the mother's side are admitted at all;<sup>1</sup> and the relations of the father's father, before those of the father's mother; and so on. And in this the English law is not singular, but warranted by the examples of the Hebrew and Athenian laws, as stated by Selden,<sup>m</sup> and Petit;<sup>n</sup> though among the Greeks in the time of Hesiod,<sup>o</sup> when a man died without wife or children, all his kindred (without any distinction) [235] divided his estate among them. It is likewise warranted by the example of the Roman laws: wherein the agnati, or relations by the father, were preferred to the cognati, or relations by the mother, till the edict of the Emperor Justinian<sup>p</sup> abolished all distinction between them. It is also conformable to the customary law of Normandy,<sup>q</sup> which indeed in most respects agrees with our English law of inheritance.

* Ninth edition adds, "another qualification is requisite, besides the proximity and entirety, which is that of dignity or worthiness, of blood. For."

§ 321. (i) Reasons for rule preferring male stocks.—However, I am inclined to think, that this rule of our laws does not owe its immediate original to any view of conformity to those which I have just now mentioned; but was established in order to effectuate and carry into execution the fifth rule or canon before laid down; that every heir must be of the blood of the first purchaser. For, when such first purchaser was not easily to be discovered after a long course of descents, the lawyers not only endeavored to investigate him by taking the next relation of the whole blood to the person last in possession; but also considering that a preference had been given to males (by virtue of the second canon) through the whole course of lineal descent from the first purchaser to the present time, they judged it more likely that the lands should have descended to the last tenant from his male than from his female ancestors; from the father (for instance) rather than from the mother; from the father's father, rather than the father's mother: and therefore they hunted back the inheritance (if I may be allowed the expression) through the male line; and gave it to the next relations on the side of the father, the father's father, and so upwards; imagining with reason that this was the most probable way of continuing it in the line of the first purchaser. A conduct much more rational than the preference of the agnati, by the Roman laws: which, as they gave no advantage to the males in the first instance or direct lineal succession, had no reason for preferring them in the transverse collateral one: upon which account this preference was very wisely abolished by Justinian.

[236] That this was the true foundation of the preference of the agnati or male stocks, in our law, will further appear, if we consider, that, whenever the lands have notoriously descended to a man from his mother's side, this rule is totally reversed, and no relation of his by the father's side, as such, can ever be admitted to them; because he cannot possibly be of the blood of the first purchaser. And so, e converso, if the lands descended from the father's side, no relation of the mother, as such, shall ever inherit. So, also, if they in fact descended to John Stiles from his father's mother, Cecilia Kempe; here not only the blood of Lucy Baker, his mother, but also of George Stiles, his father's father, is perpetually excluded. And, in like manner, if they be known to have descended from Frances Holland, the mother of Cecilia Kempe, the line not only of Lucy Baker, and of George Stiles, but also of Luke Kempe, the father of Cecilia, is excluded. Whereas, when the side from which they descended is forgotten, or never known (as in the case of an estate newly purchased to be holden ut feudum antiquum), here the right of inheritance first runs up all the father's side, with a preference to the male stocks in every instance; and, if it finds no heirs there, it then, and then only, resorts to the mother's side; leaving no place untried, in order to find heirs that may by possibility be derived from the original purchaser. The greatest possibility of finding such was among those descended from the male ancestors; but, upon failure of issue there, they may possibly be found among those derived from the females.

This I take to be the true reason of the constant preference of the agnatic succession, or issue derived from the male ancestors, through all the stages of collateral inheritance; as the ability for personal service was the reason for preferring the males at first in the direct lineal succession. We see clearly, that, if males had been perpetually admitted, in utter exclusion of females, the tracing the inheritance back through the male line of ancestors must at last have inevitably brought us up to the first purchaser: but, as males have not been perpetually <sup>[237]</sup> admitted, but only generally preferred; as females have not been utterly excluded, but only generally postponed to males; the tracing the inheritance up through the male stocks will not give us absolute demonstration, but only a strong probability, of arriving at the first purchaser: which, joined with the other probability, of the wholeness or entirety of blood, will fall little short of a certainty.

§ 322. (4) Tracing a pedigree.—Before we conclude this branch of our inquiries, it may not be amiss to exemplify these rules by a short sketch of the manner in which we must search for the heir of a person, as John Stiles, who dies seised of land which he acquired, and which therefore he held as a feud of indefinite antiquity.*

In the first place succeeds the eldest son, Matthew Stiles, or his issue: (No. 1.)—if his line be extinct, then Gilbert Stiles and the other sons, respectively, in order of birth, or their issue; (No. 2.)—in default of these, all the daughters together, Margaret and Charlotte Stiles, or their issue; (No. 3.)—on failure of the descendants of John Stiles himself, the issue of Geoffrey and Lucy Stiles, his parents, is called in: viz., first, Francis Stiles, the eldest brother of the whole blood, or his issue; (No. 4.)—then Oliver Stiles, and the other whole brothers, respectively, in order of birth or their issue; (No. 5.)—then the sisters of the whole blood all together, Bridget and Alice Stiles, or their issue; (No. 6.)—in defect of these, the issue of George and Cecilia Stiles, his father's parents; respect being still had to their age and sex; (No. 7.)—then the issue of Walter and Christian Stiles, the parents of his paternal grandfather; (No. 8.)—then the issue of Richard and Anne Stiles, the parents of his paternal grandfather's father; (No. 9.)—and so on in the paternal grandfather's paternal line, or blood of Walter Stiles, in infinitum. In defect of these, the issue of William and Jane Smith, the parents of his paternal grandfather's mother: (No. 10.)—and so on in the paternal grandfather's maternal line, or blood of Christian Smith, in infinitum; till both the [238] immediate bloods of George Stiles, the paternal grandfather, are spent. Then we must resort to the issue of Luke and Frances Kempe, the parents of John Stiles' paternal grandmother: (No. 11.)—then to the issue of Thomas and Sarah Kempe, the parents of his paternal grandmother's father: (No. 12.)—and so on in the paternal grandmother's paternal line, or blood of Luke Kempe, in infinitum. In default of which we must call in the issue of Charles and Mary Holland, the parents of his paternal grandmother's mother: (No. 13.)—and so on in the paternal grandmother's maternal line, or blood of Frances Holland, in infinitum; till both the immediate bloods of Cecilia Kempe, the paternal grandmother, are also spent. Whereby the paternal blood of John Stiles entirely failing, recourse must then, and not before, be had to his maternal relations; or the blood of the Bakers (No. 14, 15, 16), Willis's (No. 17), Thorpes (No. 18, 19), and Whites (No. 20); in the same regular successive order as in the paternal line.

The student should, however, be informed, that the class, No. 10, would be postponed to No. 11, in consequence of the doctrine laid down, arguendo (in the course of argument), by Justice Manwoode, in the case of Clere and Brooke; * from whence it is adopted by Lord Bacon † and Sir Matthew Hale." And yet, notwithstanding these respectable authorities, the compiler of this table hath ventured to give the preference therein to No. 10 before No. 11; for the following reasons: 1. Because this point was not the principal question in the case of Clere and Brooke; but the law concerning it is delivered obiter (cursorily) only, and in the course of argument, by Justice Manwoode; though afterwards said to be confirmed by the three other justices in separate, extrajudicial, conferences with the reporter. 2. Because the chief justice, Sir James Dyer, in reporting the resolution of the court in what seems to be the same case, ‡ takes no notice of this doctrine. 3. Because it appears from Plowden's report, that very many gentlemen of the law were dissatisfied [239] with this position of Justice Manwoode. 4. Because the position itself destroys the otherwise entire and regular symmetry of our legal course of descents, as is manifest by inspecting the table; and destroys also that constant preference of the male stocks in the law of inheritance, for which an additional reason is before given, besides the mere dignity of blood. 5. Because it introduces all that uncertainty and contradiction, which is pointed out by an ingenious author; § and establishes a collateral doctrine, incompatible with the principal point resolved in the case of Clere and Brooke, viz., the preference of No. 11 to No. 14. And, though that learned writer proposes to rescind the principal point then resolved, in order to clear this difficulty; it is apprehended, that the difficulty may be better cleared, by rejecting the collateral doctrine, which was never yet resolved at all. 6. Because by the reason that is given for this doctrine, in Plowden. Bacon, and Hale (viz., that in any degree, paramount the first, the law respecteth proximity, and not dignity of blood), No. 18 ought also to be preferred to No. 16; which is directly contrary to the eighth rule laid down by Hale himself. ¶ 7. Because this position seems to contradict the allowed doctrine of Sir Edward Coke;<sup>a</sup> who lays it down (under different names) that the blood of the Kempes (alias Sandies) shall not inherit till the blood of the Stiles (alias Fairfields) fail. Now, the blood of the Stiles does certainly not fail, till both No. 9 and No. 10 are extinct. Wherefore, No. 11 (being the blood of the Kempes) ought not to inherit till then. 8. Because in the case, Mich. 12 Edw. IV, 14<sup>a</sup> (1472) (much relied on in that of Clere and Brooke), it is laid down as a rule, that "cestuy, que doit inheriter al pere, doit inheriter al fits (he who should inherit from the father should inherit from the son)." And so Sir Matthew Hale<sup>b</sup> says "that though the law excludes the father from inheriting, yet it substitutes and directs the descent, as it should have been, had the father inherited." Now, it is settled, by the resolution in Clere [240] and Brooke, that No. 10 should have inherited to Geoffrey Stiles, the father, before No. 11; and therefore No. 10 ought also to be preferred in inheriting to John Stiles, the son.

In case John Stiles was not himself the purchaser, but the estate in fact came to him by descent from his father, mother, or any higher ancestor, there is this difference; that the blood of that line of ancestors, from which it did not descend, can never inherit. Thus, if it descended from Geoffrey Stiles, the father, the blood of Lucy Baker, the mother, is perpetually excluded: and so, vice versa, if it descended from Lucy Baker, it cannot descend to the blood of Geoffrey Stiles. This, in either case, cuts off one-half of the table from any possible succession. And further, if it can be shown to have descended from George Stiles, this cuts off three-fourths; for now the blood, not only of Lucy Baker, but also of Cecilia Kempe, is excluded. If, lastly, it descended from Walter Stiles, this narrows the succession still more, and cuts off seven-eighths of the table; for now neither the blood of Lucy Baker, nor of Cecilia Kempe, nor of Christian Smith, can ever succeed to the inheritance. And the like rule will hold upon descents from any other ancestors.

The student should bear in mind, that, during this whole process, John Stiles is the person supposed to have been last actually seised of the estate. For if ever it comes to vest in any other person, as heir to John Stiles, a new order of succession must be observed upon the death of such heir; since he, by his own seisin, now becomes himself an ancestor, or stipes, and must be put in the place of John Stiles. The figures, therefore, denote the order in which the several classes would succeed to John Stiles, and not to each other: and before we search for an heir in any of the higher figures (as No. 8), we must be first assured that all the lower classes (from No. 1 to No. 7) were extinct at John Stiles' decease.

OF TITLE BY PURCHASE, AND FIRST BY ESCHEAT.

§ 323. Definition of purchase.—Purchase, perquisitio, taken in its largest and most extensive sense, is thus defined by Littleton;<sup>a</sup> the possession of lands and tenements, which a man hath by his own act or agreement, and not by descent from any of his ancestors or kindred. In this sense it is contradistinguished from acquisition by right of blood, and includes every other method of coming to an estate, but merely that by inheritance: wherein the title is vested in a person, not by his own act or agreement, but by the single operation of law.<sup>b</sup>

§ 324. Legal conception of purchase.—Purchase, indeed, in its vulgar and confined acceptation, is applied only to such acquisitions of land, as are obtained by way of bargain and sale, for money, or some other valuable consideration. But this falls far short of the legal idea of purchase: for, if I give land freely to another, he is in the eye of the law a purchaser;<sup>c</sup> and falls within Littleton's definition, for he comes to the estate by his own agreement, that is, he consents to the gift. A man who has his father's estate settled upon him in tail, before he was born, is also a purchaser; for he takes quite another estate than the law of descents would have given him. Nay, even if the ancestor devises his estate to his heir at law by will, with other limitations or in any other shape than the course of descents would direct, such heir shall take by purchase.<sup>d</sup> But if a man, seised in fee, devises his whole estate to his heir at law, so that the heir takes neither a greater nor a less estate by the [242] devise than he would have done without it, he shall be adjudged to take by descent,<sup>e</sup> even though it be charged with encumbrances,<sup>f</sup> for the benefit of creditors, and others, who have demands on the estate of the ancestor. If a remainder be limited to the heirs of Sempronius, here Sempronius himself takes nothing; but, if he dies during the continuance of the particular estate, his heirs shall take as purchasers.* But, if an estate be made to A for life, remainder to his right heirs in fee, his heirs shall take by descent: for it is an ancient rule of law, that wherever the ancestor takes an estate for life, the heir cannot by the same conveyance take an estate in fee by purchase, but only by descent.<sup>b</sup> And, if A dies before entry, still his heir shall take by descent, and not by purchase; for, where the heir takes anything that might have vested in the ancestor, he takes by way of descent.<sup>1</sup> The ancestor, during his life, beareth in himself all his heirs;<sup>k</sup> and therefore, when once he is or might have been seised of the lands, the inheritance so limited to his heirs vests in the ancestor himself: and the word "heirs" in this case is not esteemed a word of purchase, but a word of limitation, inuring so as to increase the estate of the ancestor from a tenancy for life to a fee simple.<sup>1</sup> And, had it been otherwise, had the heir (who is uncertain till the death of the ancestor) been allowed to take as a purchaser originally nominated in the deed, as must have been the case if the remainder had been expressly limited to Matthew or Thomas by name; then, in the times of strict feudal tenure, the lord would have been defrauded by such a limitation of the fruits of his seignior, arising from a descent to the heir.

§ 325. 1. "Conquest" of the feudists.—What we call purchase, perquisitio, the feudists called conquest, conquæstus, or conquisitio:<sup>1</sup> both denoting any means of acquiring an estate out of the common course of inheritance. And this is still the proper phrase in the law of Scotland:<sup>m</sup> as it was among the Norman jurists, who styled [243] the purchaser (that is, he who brought the estate into the family which at present owns it) the conqueror or conquereur.<sup>n</sup> Which seems to be all that was meant by the appellation which was given to William the Norman, when his manner of ascending the throne of England was, in his own and his successors' charters, and by the historians of the times, entitled

conquæstus, and himself conquæstor or conquisitor;• signifying that he was the first of his family who acquired the crown of England, and from whom therefore all future claims by descent must be derived: though now, from our disuse of the feudal sense of the word, together with the reflection on his forcible method of acquisition, we are apt to annex the idea of victory to this name of conquest or conquisition: a title which, however just with regard to the crown, the conqueror never pretended with regard to the realm of England; nor, in fact, ever had.¶

§ 326. Differences between descent and purchase.—The difference, in effect, between the acquisition of an estate by descent and by purchase, consists principally in these two points: 1. That by purchase the estate acquires a new inheritable quality, and is descendible to the owner's blood in general, and not the blood only of some particular ancestor. For, when a man takes an estate by purchase, he takes it not ut feudum, paternum or maternum (as a fee paternal or maternal), which would descend only to the heirs by the father's or the mother's side: but he takes it ut feudum antiquum (as an ancient fee), as a feud of indefinite antiquity; whereby it becomes inheritable to his heirs general, first of the paternal, and then of the maternal line.¶ 2. An estate taken by purchase will not make the heir answerable for the acts of the ancestor, as an estate by descent will. For, if the ancestor by any deed, obligation, covenant, or the like, bindeth himself and his heirs, and he dieth; this deed, obligation, or covenant, shall be binding upon the heirs so far forth only as he had any estate of inheritance vested in him (or in some other in trust for him ¶) by descent [244] from that ancestor, sufficient to answer the charge; ¶ whether he remains in possession, or hath aliened it before action brought; ¶ which sufficient estate is in the law called assets; from the French word "assez," enough.¶ Therefore, if a man covenants, for himself and his heirs to keep my house in repair, I can then (and then only) compel his heir to perform this covenant, when he has an estate sufficient for this purpose, or assets, by descent from the covenantor: for though the covenant descends to the heir, whether he inherits any estate or no, it lies dormant, and is not compulsory, until he has assets by descent.<sup>v</sup>

§ 327. Five modes of acquiring title by purchase.—This is the legal signification of the word “perquisitio,” or purchase; and in this sense it includes the five following methods of acquiring a title to estates: 1. Escheat. 2. Occupancy. 3. Prescription. 4. Forfeiture, 5. Alienation. Of all these in their order.

§ 328. I. Escheat.—Escheat, we may remember,<sup>w</sup> was one of the fruits and consequences of feudal tenure. The word itself is originally French or Norman,<sup>x</sup> in which language it signifies chance or accident; and with us it denotes an obstruction of the course of descent, and a consequent determination of the tenure, by some unforeseen contingency: in which case the land naturally results back, by a kind of reversion, to the original grantor or lord of the fee.<sup>y</sup>

§ 329. 1. Requisites of escheat.—Escheat, therefore, being a title frequently vested in the lord by inheritance, as being the fruit of a seigniorship to which he was entitled by descent (for which reason the lands escheated shall attend the seigniorship, and be inheritable by such only of his heirs as are capable of inheriting the other<sup>z</sup>), it may seem in such cases to fall more properly under the former general head of acquiring title to estates, viz., by descent (being vested in him by act of law, and not by his own act [245] or agreement), than under the present, by purchase. But it must be remembered that, in order to complete this title by escheat, it is necessary that the lord perform an act of his own, by entering on the lands and tenements so escheated, or suing out a writ of escheat:<sup>a</sup> on failure of which, or by doing any act that amounts to an implied waiver of his right, as by accepting homage or rent of a stranger who usurps the possession, his title by escheat is barred.<sup>b</sup> It is therefore in some respect a title acquired by his own act, as well as by act of law.<sup>3</sup> Indeed, this may also be said

<sup>2</sup> It is said in Digby, Hist. of Real Prop. (5th ed.), 425 n, that "this necessity for the lord to do some act on his part induced Blackstone to class escheat under title by purchase." On the other hand, it is said in 1 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 301, that "Blackstone, somewhat unaccountably, treats escheat as a branch of purchase. At any rate since the passing of the Inheritance Act, 1833, this view can no longer be maintained."

<sup>3</sup> Escheat, feudal and modern.—The difficulty which has been found, not by Blackstone only, but by many later writers, in assigning escheat to a particular class of titles, arises from the fact that it is not, strictly speaking, a title at all. No new estate is given by it. The lord or king who takes possession by escheat on the termination of a fee simple is, or stands in place of, the person (feoffor) by whom that fee simple was first created; and he claims under his former title, and not under that of the escheat. He is in the same position, as to this, with the landlord who retakes his land when a tenant's term expires. "When there is no longer any tenant, the land returns by reason of tenure to the lord by whom, or by whose predecessors in title, the tenure was created." (Attorney General of Ontario v. Mercer, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 767, 772.) (Only the word "tenure" here is used in different senses in this short extract. If "subtenure" were the word used in the last line it would be clear.)

Escheat resembles a reversion; but the latter can only take place after an estate less than a fee simple, while escheat always follows the end of a fee simple, never of a less estate. It is produced by act of the law, and thus differs from all other cases of purchase; but it differs also from descent, because the lord is not seised, like the heir of the same estate which the ancestor had, but of one paramount to it. He comes in, not in the per but in the post.

It is this connection with tenure that requires the limitation of escheat to legal estates in land. The equitable estate of cestui que use or cestui que trust being only "collateral to the land" and not a tenement cannot escheat, as was correctly held by the equity judges in Burgess v. Wheate, 1 Eden, 177, against the dissent of Lord Mansfield, the head of the common-law courts. (See, also, Sir George Sand's Case, 2 Freem. 129; Henchman v. Attorney General, 3 Mylne & K. 485; Taylor v. Hayzarth, 14 Sim. 8; Beale v. Symonds, 16 Beav. 406.) But in 1884 the rule was changed by the Intestate Estates Act, 47 & 48 Vict., c. 71, section 4, extending the law of escheat to equitable estates in land, and to any estate, legal or equitable, in incorporeal heredita-of descents themselves in which an entry or other seisin is required, in order to make a complete title: and therefore this distribution by our legal writers seems in this respect rather inaccurate: for, as escheats must follow the nature of the seigniorship to which they belong, they may vest by either purchase or descent, according as the seigniorship is vested. And, though Sir Edward Coke considers the lord by escheat as in some respects the assignee of the last tenant,<sup>c</sup> and therefore taking by purchase; yet, on the other hand, the lord is more frequently considered as being ultimus hæres (the last heir), and therefore taking by descent in a kind of caducary succession.

ments. In America there are weighty opinions in favor of the same holding, without the aid of statute, upon the general change in the nature of equitable estates, and of the doctrine of escheat now to be mentioned.

At common law there was no such thing as escheat to the sovereign, state, or king, as such. When the king took an escheat, it was only as the lord of whom it was holden. But after the statute of quia emptores forbade the creation of new tenures by subjects it became in every century more difficult to determine who was the immediate lord of whom a fee was holden. And as all land was holden mediately or immediately of the king, the result was to give every escheat, not shown to belong to some mesne lord, to the king. In the older states of the Union there might also be tenures of mesne lords, especially where the statute of quia emptores was not held to be in force, as in New York and Pennsylvania, etc. There have been a few cases of such escheats in our books. But for the most part, the same presumption of holding directly of the state exists, as in England of the king: and in all the newer states where the federal government is actually the source of all titles, the right of escheat is uniformly held to be in the state where the land lies. Thus in England and the United States alike, the doctrine of escheat in its practical consequences comes to coincide with the doctrine of eminent domain, familiar in public law to all Christian nations, by which the state or nation is the ultimate owner of all individual property within it, and in particular is entitled to bona vacantia, or all goods and lands which by the death of the owner without heirs, or otherwise, are left without individual owners. Applying alike to all property, real or personal, legal or equitable, this is evidently destined to absorb the limited and technical doctrine of escheat, and the American statutes and decisions show that it has already begun to do so. For its effect in English law see an article in 4 L. Q. R. 318, July, 1888, on the Law of Escheat, by F. W. Hardman, esp. pp. 334-336, and note 6, c. 1, ante.—HAMMOND.

§ 330. 2. Principle of escheat.—The law of escheats is founded upon this single principle, that the blood of the person last seised in fee simple is, by some means or other, utterly extinct and gone: and, since none can inherit his estate but such as are of his blood and consanguinity, it follows as a regular consequence that when such blood is extinct, the inheritance itself must fail; the land must become what the feudal writers denominate feudum apertum (an open fee); and must result back again to the lord of the fee, by whom, or by those whose estate he hath, it was given.

§ 331. 3. Failure of hereditary blood.—Escheats are frequently divided into those propter defectum sanguinis (through failure of issue) and those propter delictum tenentis (through the fault of the tenant): the one sort, if the tenant dies without heirs; the other, if his blood be attainted.<sup>4</sup> But both these species may well be comprehended [246] under the first denomination only; for he that is attainted suffers an extinction of his blood, as well as he that dies without relations. The inheritable quality is expunged in one instance, and expires in the other; or, as the doctrine of escheats is very fully expressed in Fleta,* “dominus capitalis feodi loco hæredis habetur, quoties per defectum vel delictum extinguitur sanguis tenentis (the chief lord of the fee is accounted heir whenever the blood of the tenant is extinct either by failure of issue or corruption).”

§ 332. a. Cases of failure of hereditary blood.—Escheats, therefore, arising merely upon the deficiency of the blood, whereby the descent is impeded, their doctrine will be better illustrated by considering the several cases wherein hereditary blood may be deficient, than by any other method whatsoever.

<sup>4</sup> After considerable modifications by statute of the doctrine of attainder, the recent Statute 33 & 34 Vict., c. 23 (Forfeiture, 1870), has totally abolished forfeiture, and escheat (except when forfeiture is consequent upon outlawry), and provides instead for the appointment of an administrator to the property of the convict, and for the vesting of his property in such administrator during the continuance of his punishment.—DIGBY, Hist. Real Prop. (5th ed.), 426.

§ 333. (1) Tenant dying without any relations at all; (2) Tenant dying without relations representing ancestor from whom estate descended; (3) Tenant dying without relations of whole blood.—The first three cases, wherein inheritable blood is wanting, may be collected from the rules of descent laid down and explained in the preceding chapter, and therefore will need very little illustration or comment. First, when the tenant dies without any relations on the part of any of his ancestors: secondly, when he dies without any relations on the part of those ancestors from whom his estate descended: thirdly, when he dies without any relations of the whole blood. In two of these cases the blood of the first purchaser is certainly, in the other it is probably, at an end; and therefore in all of them the law directs that the land shall escheat to the lord of the fee: for the lord would be manifestly prejudiced, if, contrary to the inherent condition tacitly annexed to all feuds, any person should be suffered to succeed to the lands, who is not of the blood of the first feudatory, to whom for his personal merit the estate is supposed to have been granted.

§ 334. (4) Monsters.—A monster, which hath not the shape of mankind, but in any part evidently bears the resemblance of the brute creation, hath no inheritable blood, and cannot be heir to any land, albeit it be brought forth in marriage: but, although it hath deformity in any part of its body, yet if it [247] hath human shape, it may be heir.† This is a very ancient rule in the law of England; * and its reason is too obvious, and too shocking, to bear a minute discussion. The Roman law agrees with our own in excluding such births from successions: <sup>h</sup> yet accounts them, however, children in some respects, where the parents, or at least the father, could reap any advantage thereby; <sup>1</sup> (as the jus trium liberorum (the right of three children), and the like) esteeming them the misfortune, rather than the fault, of that parent. But our law will not admit a birth of this kind to be such an issue as shall entitle the husband to be tenant by the curtesy; <sup>k</sup> because it is not capable of inheriting. And therefore, if there appears no other heir than such a prodigious birth, the land shall escheat to the lord.

* Qui contra formam humani generis converso more procreantur, ut si mulier monstrosam vel prodigiosam enixa sit, inter liberos non computentur. Partus tamen, cui natura aliquantulum addiderit vel diminuerit, ut si sex vel tantum quatuor digitos habuerit, bene debet inter liberos connumerari: et, si membra sint inutilia aut tortuosa, non tamen est partus monstrosus. (Those who are born with a form not human are not considered children; as when a woman by a perversion of nature brings forth something monstrous or prodigious. Nevertheless the offspring to which nature has only added, or from which withheld something, as if it should have six or only four fingers, ought to be reckoned among children; and though its limbs be useless or distorted, yet it is not a monstrous birth.) Bracton l. 1. c. 6. & l. 5. tr. 5. c. 30.

<sup>5</sup> In most states of the Union, illegitimate children inherit the mother's estate with the legitimate children, share and share alike. In a few states, they are heirs of the mother, and inherit real and personal property in default of lawful issue. In many states, they both inherit from the mother and represent her so as to inherit from her kin share and share alike with the legitimate children. But in many others, bastards do not represent the mother so as to claim any intestate estate from her kindred, either lineal or collateral. In several states bastards may inherit from their fathers. Stimson, Am. Stat. Law, § 3151; Sanford v. Marsh, 180 Mass. 210, 62 N. E. 268; Ford v. Boone, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 550, 75 S. W. 353; Cox v. Rash, 82 Ind. 519; Cope v. Cope, 137 U. S. 682, 34 L. Ed. 832, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 222.

illegitimate children, the land shall escheat to the lord.<sup>m</sup> The civil law differs from ours in this point, and allows a bastard to succeed to an inheritance, if after its birth the mother was married to the father;<sup>o</sup> and also, if the father had no lawful wife or child, then, even if the concubine was never married to the father, yet she and her bastard son were admitted each to one-twelfth of the inheritance:<sup>p</sup> and a bastard was likewise [<sup>248</sup>] capable of succeeding to the whole of his mother's estate, although she was never married; the mother being sufficiently certain, though the father is not.<sup>q</sup> But our law, in favor of marriage, is much less indulgent to bastards.

§ 336. (a) Case of bastard eigné and mulier puisné.—There is indeed one instance in which our law has shown them some little regard; and that is usually termed the case of bastard eigné (an elder son, born before the marriage of his parents) and mulier puisné (a legitimate son, whose elder brother is illegitimate). This happens when a man has a bastard son, and afterwards marries the mother, and by her has a legitimate son, who in the language of the law is called a mulier, or, as Glanvill<sup>r</sup> expresses it in his Latin, filius mulieratus; the woman before marriage being concubina (a concubine), and afterwards mulier (wife).

<sup>7</sup> Inheritance of a legitimated child.—This legitimation by subsequent marriage, as it is technically called, is now the law of Virginia and many other states, by statute.

It is also the law of Scotland: and is there limited, as by the canonists, to cases where no marriage of either with other persons intervened. (7 Clark & F. 842.) Whether such a limitation or others familiar to students of the civil and canon laws would be attached by interpretation in this country, has not yet been decided.

The law of England still adheres so firmly to the nolimus of the barons, that even a child born in Scotland, or America, as a bastard, and so legitimated in the country of his birth, will not be regarded as lawful heir of lands in England; although it is the general rule that legitimacy depends on the law of the domicile. (Birtwhistle v. Vardell, 5 Barn. & C. 238.) By which rule, a child so legitimated by the law of Scotland cannot inherit there if his domicile be in England. (6 Bligh, 468, 2 Ves. & B. 127.)—HAMMOND.

Now, here the eldest son is bastard, or bastard eignè; and the younger son is legitimate, or mulier puisnè. If, then, the father dies, and the bastard eignè enters upon his land, and enjoys it to his death, and dies seised thereof, whereby the inheritance descends to his issue; in this case the mulier puisnè, and all other heirs (though minors, feme coverts, or under any incapacity whatsoever), are totally barred of their right.* And this, 1. As a punishment on the mulier for his negligence in not entering during the bastard's life, and evicting him. 2. Because the law will not suffer a man to be bastardized after his death, who entered as heir and died seised, and so passed for legitimate in his lifetime. 3. Because the canon law (following the civil) did allow such bastard eignè to be legitimate, on the subsequent marriage of his mother: and therefore the laws of England (though they would not admit either the civil or canon law to rule the inheritances of this kingdom, yet) paid such a regard to a person thus peculiarly circumstanced, that, after the land had descended to his issue, they would not unravel the matter again, and suffer his estate to be shaken. But this indulgence was shown to no other kind of bastard; for, if the mother was never married to the father, such bastard could have no colorable title at all.†<sup>8</sup>

§ 337. (b) Bastards have no collateral kindred.—[249] As bastards cannot be heirs themselves, so neither can they have any heirs but those of their own bodies. For, as all collateral kindred consists in being derived from the same common ancestor, and as a bastard has no legal ancestors, he can have no collateral kindred; and, consequently, can have no legal heirs, but such as claim by a lineal descent from himself. And therefore if a bastard purchases land, and dies seised thereof without issue, and intestate, the land shall escheat to the lord of the fee.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>8</sup> It is said that probably with the abolition of seisin as the basis of inheritance by the Inheritance Act, 1833, this whole doctrine of bastard eignè as set forth by Blackstone, though never formally repealed, has ceased to be applicable. 1 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 330.

§ 338. (6) Aliens.—Aliens also are incapable of taking by descent, or inheriting: <sup>w</sup> for they are not allowed to have any inheritable blood in them; rather, indeed, upon a principle of national or civil policy, than upon reasons strictly feudal. Though, if lands had been suffered to fall into their hands who owe no allegiance to the crown of England, the design of introducing our feuds, the defense of the kingdom, would have been defeated. Wherefore if a man leaves no other relations but aliens, his land shall escheat to the lord.

As aliens cannot inherit, so far they are on a level with bastards; but as they are also disabled to hold by purchase,<sup>x</sup> they are under still greater disabilities. And, as they can neither hold by purchase nor by inheritance, it is almost superfluous to say that they can have no heirs, since they can have nothing for an heir to inherit; but so it is expressly holden,<sup>y</sup> because they have not in them any inheritable blood.

§ 339. (a) Denizens.—And further, if an alien be made a denizen by the king's letters patent, and then purchases lands (which the law allows such a one to do), his son, born before his denization, shall not (by the common law) inherit those lands; but a son born afterwards may, even though his elder brother be living; for the father, before denization, had no inheritable blood to communicate to his eldest son; but by denization it acquires <sup>[250]</sup> an hereditary quality, which will be transmitted to his subsequent posterity. Yet, if he had been naturalized by act of parliament, such eldest son might then have inherited; for that cancels all defects, and is allowed to have a retrospective energy, which simple denization has not.<sup>z</sup>

§ 340. (b) Direct descent between brothers.—Sir Edward Coke<sup>a</sup> also holds that if an alien cometh into England, and there hath issue two sons, who are thereby natural-born subjects; and one of them purchases land, and dies; yet neither of these brethren can be heir to the other. For the commune vinculum, or common stock of their consanguinity, is the father; and as he had no inheritable blood in him, he could communicate none to his sons; and, when the sons can by no possibility be heirs to the father, the one of them shall not be heir to the other. And this opinion of his seems founded upon solid principles of the ancient law; not only from the rule before cited,<sup>b</sup> that cestuy, que doit inheriter al pere, doit inheriter al fits (he who should inherit from the father should inherit from the son); but also because we have seen that the only feudal foundation, upon which newly purchased land can possibly descend to a brother, is the supposition and fiction of law, that it descended from some one of his ancestors: but in this case as the immediate ancestor was an alien, from whom it could by no possibility descend, this should destroy the supposition, and impede the descent, and the land should be inherited ut feudum stricte novum (as a fee strictly new); that is, by none but the lineal descendants of the purchasing brother; and on failure of them, should escheat to the lord of the fee. But this opinion hath been since overruled:<sup>c</sup> and it is now held for law, that the sons of an alien, born here, may inherit to each other. And reasonably enough upon the whole; for, as (in common purchases) the whole of the supposed descent from indefinite ancestors is but fictitious, the law may as well suppose the requisite ancestor as suppose the requisite descent.

§ 341. (c) Descent through an alien.—[251] It is also enacted, by the statute 11 & 12 W. III, c. 6 (Aliens, 1700), that all persons, being natural-born subjects of the king, may inherit and make their titles by descent from any of their ancestors, lineal or collateral; although their father, or mother, or other ancestor, by, from, through, or under whom they derive their pedigrees, were born out of the king's allegiance. But inconveniences were afterwards apprehended, in case persons should thereby gain a future capacity to inherit, who did not exist at the death of the person last seised. As, if Francis, the elder brother of John Stiles, be an alien, and Oliver, the younger, be a natural-born subject, upon John's death without issue his lands will descend to Oliver, the younger brother: now, if afterwards Francis has a child born in England, it was feared that, under the statute of King William, this new-born child might defeat the estate of his uncle, Oliver. Wherefore it is provided, by the statute 25 Geo. II, c. 39 (Title by Descent, 1751), that no right of inheritance shall accrue by virtue of the former statute to any persons whatsoever, unless they are in being and capable to take as heirs at the death of the person last seised:—with an exception, however, to the case, where lands shall descend to the daughter of an alien; which descent shall be divested in favor of an after-born brother, or the inheritance shall be divided with an after-born sister or sisters, according to the usual rule<sup>d</sup> of descents by the common law.<sup>9</sup>

§ 342. (7) Attainder.—By attainder, also, for treason or other felony, the blood of the person attainted is so corrupted as to be rendered no longer inheritable.<sup>10</sup>

Great care must be taken to distinguish between forfeiture of lands to the king, and this species of escheat to the lord; which, by reason of their similitude in some circumstances, and because the crown is very frequently the immediate lord of the fee, and therefore entitled to both, have been often confounded together. Forfeiture of lands, and of whatever else the offender possessed, was the doctrine of the old Saxon law,<sup>9</sup> as a part of punishment for the offense; [252] and does not at all relate to the feudal system, nor is the consequence of any seigniori or lordship para-

<sup>9</sup> By the Naturalization Act, 1870, it is now provided, with regard to all titles accruing after May 14th, 1870, that real property of every description may be taken, acquired, held, and disposed of by an alien, in the same manner in all respects as by a natural-born British subject, and that a title thereto may be devised through, from, or in succession to an alien, as if he had been a natural-born British subject.

<sup>10</sup> The constitution of the United States (art. III, § 3), declares that “no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted.” An act of Congress of July 17, 1862, provided for the seizure and condemnation of enemies’ estates. This act was held as not in conflict with the above section, on the ground that the forfeiture was only during the life of the offender. Bigelow v. Forrest, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 339, 19 L. mount:† but, being a prerogative vested in the crown, was neither superseded nor diminished by the introduction of the Norman tenures; a fruit and consequence of which, escheat must undoubtedly be reckoned. Escheat therefore operates in subordination to this more ancient and superior law of forfeiture.

§ 343. (a) Doctrine of escheat upon attainder.—The doctrine of escheat upon attainder, taken singly, is this: that the blood of the tenant, by the commission of any felony (under which denomination all treasons were formerly comprised*), is corrupted and stained, and the original donation of the feud is thereby determined, it being always granted to the vassal on the implied condition of dum bene se gesserit (whilst he shall have conducted himself well). Upon the thorough demonstration of which guilt, by legal attainder, the feudal covenant and mutual bond of fealty are held to be broken, the estate instantly falls back from the offender to the lord of the fee, and the inheritable quality of his blood is extinguished and blotted out forever. In this situation the law of feudal escheat was brought into England at the Conquest; and in general superadded to the ancient law of forfeiture. In consequence of which corruption and extinction of hereditary blood, the land of all felons would immediately revert in the lord, but that the superior law of forfeiture intervenes, and intercepts it in its passage; in case of treason, forever; in case of other felony, for only a year and a day, after which time it goes to the lord in a regular course of escheat,<sup>b</sup> as it would have done to the heir of the felon in case the feudal tenures had never been introduced. And that this is the true operation and genuine history of escheats will most evidently appear from this incident to gavelkind lands (which seems to be the old Saxon tenure), that they are in no case subject to escheat for felony, though they are liable to forfeiture for treason.<sup>1</sup>

was liable to lose her dower, till the statute 1 Edw. VI, c. 12 (Dower, 1547), enacted, that albeit any person be attainted of misprision of treason, murder, or felony, yet his wife shall enjoy her dower. But she has not this indulgence where the ancient law of forfeiture operates, for it is expressly provided by the statute 5 & 6 Edw. VI, c. 11 (Treason, 1551), that the wife of one attaint of high treason shall not be endowed at all.

§ 344. (b) Corruption of blood.—Hitherto we have only spoken of estates vested in the offender, at the time of his offense or attainder. And here the law of forfeiture stops; but the law of escheat pursues the matter still further. For, the blood of the tenant being utterly corrupted and extinguished, it follows, not only that all that he now has shall escheat from him, but also that he shall be incapable of inheriting anything for the future. This may further illustrate the distinction between forfeiture and escheat. If, therefore, a father be seised in fee, and the son commits treason and is attainted, and then the father dies: here the land shall escheat to the lord; because the son, by the corruption of his blood, is incapable to be heir, and there can be no other heir during his life: but nothing shall be forfeited to the king, for the son never had any interest in the lands to forfeit.* In this case the escheat operates, and not the forfeiture; but in the following instance the forfeiture works, and not the escheat. As where a new felony is created by act of parliament, and it is provided (as is frequently the case) that it shall not extend to corruption of blood: here the lands of the felon shall not escheat to the lord, but yet the profits of them shall be forfeited to the king so long as the offender lives.<sup>1</sup>

There is yet a further consequence of the corruption and extinction of hereditary blood, which is this: that the person [254] attainted shall not only be incapable himself of inheriting, or transmitting his own property by heirship, but shall also obstruct the descent of lands or tenements to his posterity, in all cases where they are obliged to derive their title through him from any remoter ancestor. The channel, which conveyed the hereditary blood from his ancestors to him, is not only exhausted for the present, but totally dammed up and rendered impervious for the future. This is a refinement upon the ancient law of feuds, which allowed that the grandson might be heir to his grandfather, though the son in the intermediate generation was guilty of felony.<sup>m</sup> But, by the law of England, a man's blood is so universally corrupted by attainder, that his sons can neither inherit to him nor to any other ancestor,<sup>n</sup> at least on the part of their attainted father.

This corruption of blood cannot be absolutely removed but by authority of parliament. The king may excuse the public punishment of an offender; but cannot abolish the private right, which has accrued or may accrue to individuals as a consequence of the criminal's attainder. He may remit a forfeiture, in which the interest of the crown is alone concerned: but he cannot wipe away the corruption of blood; for therein a third person hath an interest, the lord who claims by escheat. If, therefore, a man hath a son, and is attainted, and afterwards pardoned by the king; this son can never inherit to his father, or father's ancestors; because his paternal blood being once thoroughly corrupted by his father's attainder, must continue so: but if the son had been born after the pardon, he might inherit; because by the pardon the father is made a new man, and may convey new inheritable blood to his after-born children.<sup>o</sup>

Herein there is, however, a difference between aliens and persons attainted. Of aliens, who could never by any possibility be heirs, the law takes no notice: and therefore we have [255] seen that an alien elder brother shall not impede the descent to a natural-born younger brother. But in attainders it is otherwise: for if a man hath issue a son, and is attainted, and afterwards pardoned, and then hath issue a second son, and dies; here the corruption of blood is not removed from the eldest, and therefore he cannot be heir: neither can the youngest be heir, for he hath an elder brother living, of whom the law takes notice, as he once had a possibility of being heir; and therefore the younger brother shall not inherit, but the land shall escheat to the lord: though had the elder died without issue in the life of the father, the younger son born after the pardon might well have inherited, for he hath no corruption of blood.<sup>p</sup> So if a man hath issue two sons, and the elder in the lifetime of the father hath issue, and then is attainted and executed, and afterwards the father dies, the lands of the father shall not descend to the younger son: for the issue of the elder, which had once a possibility to inherit, shall impede the descent to the younger, and the land shall escheat to the lord.<sup>q</sup> Sir Edward Coke in this case allows,<sup>r</sup> that if the ancestor be attainted, his sons born before the attainder may 'be heirs to each other, and distinguishes it from the case of the sons of an alien, because in this case the blood was inheritable when imparted to them from the father: but he makes a doubt (upon the same principles, which are now overruled<sup>s</sup>) whether sons, born after the attainder, can inherit to each other, for they never had any inheritable blood in them.

Upon the whole it appears that a person attainted is neither allowed to retain his former estate, nor to inherit any future one, nor to transmit any inheritance to his issue, either immediately from himself, or mediately through himself from any remoter ancestor; for his inheritable blood, which is necessary either to hold, to take, or to transmit any feudal property, is blotted out, corrupted, and extinguished forever: the consequence of which is, that estates, thus impeded in their descent, result back and escheat to the lord.

[256] This corruption of blood, thus arising from feudal principles, but perhaps extended further than even those principles will warrant, has been long looked upon as a peculiar hardship: because the oppressive parts of the feudal tenures being now in general abolished, it seems unreasonable to reserve one of their most inequitable consequences; namely, that the children should not only be reduced to present poverty (which, however severe, is sufficiently justified upon reasons of public policy), but also be laid under future difficulties of inheritance, on account of the guilt of their ancestors. And therefore in most (if not all) of the new felonies created by parliament since the reign of Henry the Eighth, it is declared that they shall not extend to any corruption of blood: and by the statute 7 Ann., c. 21 (Treason, 1708), (the operation of which is postponed by the statute 17 Geo. II, c. 39, 1743), it is enacted, that, after the death of the late pretender, and his sons, no attainder for treason shall extend to the disinheriting any heir, nor the prejudice of any person, other than the offender himself: which provisions have indeed carried the remedy farther than was required by the hardship above complained of; which is only the future obstruction of descents, where the pedigree happens to be deduced through the blood of an attainted ancestor.<sup>11</sup>

§ 345. 4. Exception to rule of escheat: corporations.—Before I conclude this head of escheat, I must mention one singular instance in which lands held in fee simple are not liable to escheat to the lord, even when their owner is no more, and hath left no heirs to inherit them. And this is the case of a corporation; for if that comes by any accident to be dissolved, the donor or his heirs shall have the land again in reversion, and not the lord by escheat; which is perhaps the only instance where a reversion can be expectant on a grant in fee-simple absolute. But the law, we are told,<sup>1</sup> doth tacitly annex a condition to every such gift or grant, that if the corporation be dissolved, the donor or grantor shall re-enter; for the cause of the gift or grant [<sup>257</sup>] faileth.<sup>12</sup> This

<sup>11</sup> Corruption of blood abolished.—These, however, were all practically superseded by the Forfeiture Act, 1870, which provides that no confession, verdict, inquest, conviction, or judgment for any treason or felony or felo de se, after the 4th day of July, 1870, is to cause any attainder or corruption of blood, or any forfeiture or escheat. (The act preserves untouched the law of forfeiture consequent on outlawry; but inasmuch as outlawry in all civil proceedings has been abolished by the Civil Procedure Acts Repeal Act, 1879, the exception of outlawry can now only refer to criminal proceedings.) The act provides that the property of a convict shall vest in an administrator to be appointed by the crown. But in the case of a trustee or mortgagee becoming a convict within the meaning of the act, it has now been provided by the Trustee Act, 1893, following older legislation, that the legal estate shall remain in such convict, or survive to his cotrustee or cotrustees, or descend to his representative, as if he had not become a convict.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 334.

On outlawry, see article in 18 Law Quart. Rev. 297, "Is Outlawry Obsolete?"

<sup>12</sup> Estate of a corporation.—The long discussions whether this is a reversion or a possibility of reverter—or even an escheat, as was said by Vavisoar, J.,

is indeed founded upon the self-same principle as the law of escheat: the heirs of the donor being only substituted instead of the chief lord of the fee: which was formerly very frequently the case in subinfeudations, or alienations of lands by a vassal to be holden as of himself; till that practice was restrained by the statute of quia emptores, 18 Edw. I, st. 1 (1290), to which this very singular instance still in some degree remains an exception.

§ 346. 5. Question of nonjuring papists.—There is one more incapacity of taking by descent, which, not being productive of any and Danby, J., in Y. B. Trin. 5 Hen. VII, fol. 37—might have been ended if recent writers had noticed Blackstone's remark, that "this very singular instance remains an exception to the statute of quia emptores": by which statute the distinction between escheat and reversion first became important. The donor's title depends on the fact that the estate granted by him has expired: and as neither donor nor donee now holds of the chief lord any more than one holds of the other, the question is meaningless. (See Viner, Escheat A. 2, 3, 4; vol. 10, p. 139; Co. Litt. 13 b, and Hargrave's note 2; 2 Dr. & Stud., c. 35; Challis, 31, 174.)

The practical importance of the question is in its bearing on Blackstone's and Coke's doctrine of a reversion to the donor: when that life is determined by the dissolution of the body politic, the grantor takes it back by reversion, as in the case of every grant for life. (1 Comm. 484.)

Chitty confirms this by 9 Mod. 326, and says "the lands will revert to the donor and not escheat," making the modern distinction between the two. So they would have done, as a life estate, after the statute of quia emptores. But as a freehold or fee they would not have returned to the donor if granted over to another: for which he cites cases in Bacon's Abr., Corporations, J., and 1 Roll. 816, 1, 10, 20. And if the corporation takes a fee (and it may certainly convey one to another) there seems no reason in the present law why the land should revert to the donor, since it is no longer held of him.

Upon the view taken by Blackstone it would be a more important question, practically, whether a corporation, the existence of which is limited to twenty, fifty, or any determinate number of years (as in the case of most American corporations under the general incorporation acts) can take a fee simple, or freehold estate of any kind. That it can sell again and give to an individual grantee such a fee simple, may be taken for granted, provided it has a freehold of any kind. This is "having a fee simple for the purpose of alienation, but only a determinable fee for the purpose of enjoyment," as Mr. Preston said long ago. (1 Abstracts of Title, 272.) But can its estate be even a determinable fee, when the life of the owner is limited to a term? Could the fact that the corporation may be renewed for any number of such terms, one after another, make it a fee, any more than the right of indefinite renewal in a lease?—HAMMOND.

escheat, is not properly reducible to this head, and yet must not be passed over in silence. It is enacted by the statute 11 & 12 Will. III, c. 4 (1700), that every papist who shall not abjure the errors of his religion by taking the oaths to the government, and making the declaration against transubstantiation, within six months after he has attained the age of eighteen years, shall be incapable of inheriting, or taking, by descent as well as purchase, any real estates whatsoever; and his next of kin being a Protestant, shall hold them to his own use till such time as he complies with the terms imposed by the act. This incapacity is merely personal; it affects himself only, and does not destroy the inheritable quality of his blood, so as to impede the descent to others of his kindred. In like manner as, even in the times of popery, one who entered into religion and became a monk professed was incapable of inheriting lands, both in our own<sup>u</sup> and the feudal law; eo quod desiit esse miles seculi qui factus est miles Christi; nec beneficium pertinet ad eum qui non debet gerere officium (he who becomes a soldier of Christ hath ceased to be a soldier of the world, nor is he entitled<sup>o</sup> to any reward who acknowledges no duty).<sup>w</sup> But yet he was accounted only civiliter mortuus (dead in law); he did not impede the descent to others, but the next heir was entitled to his or his ancestor's estate.<sup>13</sup>

These are the several deficiencies of hereditary blood, recognized by the law of England; which, so often as they happen, occasion lands to escheat to the original proprietary or lord.

<sup>13</sup> Abolition of laws against Roman Catholics and Jews.—In 1832 Roman Catholics were placed on a level with Protestant dissenters in respect of their schools, churches and charitable institutions, and also in respect of the property held in trust for such purposes. In 1846 the same legal status was accorded to Jewish endowments; and partly in that year, partly in 1844, a clean sweep was made of all the remaining acts directed against Roman Catholics, which the Relief Act of 1829 had left in existence, perhaps from inadvertence, owing to their being practically obsolete.—SIR R. ## OF TITLE BY OCCUPANCY.

§ 347. II. Occupancy.—Occupancy is the taking possession of those things which before belonged to nobody.<sup>1</sup> This, as we have seen,<sup>a</sup> is the true ground and foundation of all property, or of holding those things in severalty, which by the law of nature, unqualified by that of society, were common to all mankind. But, when once it was agreed that everything capable of ownership

<sup>1</sup> Original occupation obsolete in England.—Original occupation of land is not now (as to the old law of occupancy in an estate pur auter vie, see Co. Litt. 41 b, Blackst., ii, 258) practically possible in England. One can enter on land either under a lawful title to possess it, or in some public or particular right, such as the use of a highway or exercise of an easement, which is consistent with the rightful possession, or under the authority or license, express or implied, of the person entitled to possess, or by authority of law. There is no other kind of lawful entry, and whoever enters otherwise is a trespasser. Legal theory has nothing to do with the fact that a great deal of trespassing is tolerated by reasonable owners and occupiers as being substantially harmless, or with the difficulty that may sometimes be found in drawing the line between such toleration and a tacit but real license. We shall have something to say hereafter of the relation of seisin to possession. For the present it is enough to say that (subject to one exceptional state of things to be mentioned) the whole soil of England is in law possessed by occupying owners or other occupiers for various estates and interests, or by the crown if there is no estate of freehold or possessory interest in any subject. Even the unauthorized appropriation of new foreshore created by a permanent receding of the low-water mark at any part of the coast would in modern law be a trespass against the crown.

The exceptional case above indicated is when the freehold is in abeyance (see Challis on Real Property, p. 78. It should seem that section 30 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, has per incuriam introduced a new occasion of abeyance, viz., when a sole trustee dies intestate. See per Pearson, J., Pilling's Trust, [1884] 26 Ch. D., at p. 433), and no tenant in possession. It seems that a person entering without title during such abeyance would acquire a wrongful possession without disseising or dispossessing anyone. He would not even infringe any existing right to possession. And it seems that he could not be made liable in an action founded on the actual possession as distinct from the title of the plaintiff, such as trespass qu. cl. fr.—POLLOCK & WRIGHT, Possession in the Common Law, p. 45.

should have an owner, natural reason suggested, that he who could first declare his intention of appropriating anything to his own use, and, in consequence of such intention, actually took it into possession, should thereby gain the absolute property of it; according to that rule of the law of nations, recognized by the laws of Rome,<sup>b</sup> quod nullius est, id ratione naturali occupanti conceditur (that which belongs to no one, is by natural reason granted to the occupant thereof).<sup>2</sup>

2 Title by occupancy, prescription, and limitation.—Title by occupancy, title by prescription, and title by limitation are treated as distinct topics in all the books. But I see no reason why all three may not be considered as different applications of the same principle. That principle is, that quiet possession shall not only be protected by the state against violence, but that after the lapse of a certain time, this protection shall become absolute, and no inquiry be permitted with regard to its origin.

It is true that occupancy as a source of title in natural law assumes that the property has no individual owner, and that the occupant, therefore, acquires a title which is valid from the moment of taking possession; while prescription, on the other hand, assumes that there is a superior right in someone else, and only recognizes a title after the lapse of a certain time. But this distinction does not go to the essence of the right.

In an established state it can hardly be certain of any piece of property that there are not outlying dormant titles, and even if there are not, the state itself must be regarded as the owner of all vacant land within its limits.

Consequently the question in all cases resolves itself into this: to what extent will the state protect the mere possession of land, not based on any derivative title, and on what terms will this possession become absolute and conclusive?

Now, if we say that the state will protect a peaceably acquired possession in all cases, until a superior title is shown, and that after a certain period of limitation it will refuse to allow any such superior title to be shown, we give a rule that applies equally to occupation, prescription, and limitation. All the other distinctions that can be stated between them refer rather to the evidence of title and the effect of such evidence, than to the title itself.

In all these cases the title is original and not derivative. The fact that there is another and conflicting title is purely accidental, and has nothing to do with the reasons for which the title given by the state vests.

It is true that prescription at common law was supposed to rest on the fiction of a lost grant. But this was a mere fiction, and may now be entirely dispensed with, and the true reason of the law recognized, as it is in the analogous case of the statute of limitations to debts.

“Formerly it was thought that the statute of limitations was designed to raise a presumption of payment or adjustment from the lapse of time, but the

§ 348. 1. Occupancy of estate per auter vie.—This right of occupancy, so far as it concerns real property (for of personal chattels I am not in this place to speak), hath been confined by the laws of England within a very narrow compass; and was extended only to a single instance: namely, where a man was tenant per auter vie, or had an estate granted to himself only (without mentioning his heirs) for the life of another man, and died during the life of cestuy que vie, or him by whose life it was holden: in this case he, that could first enter on the land, might lawfully retain the possession so long as cestuy que vie lived, by right of occupancy.*

better view is now the prevailing one, that it is a statute of repose, and intended to afford security against stale demands when the circumstances would be unfavorable to just examination and decision." (Per Graves, J., in Jenny v. Perkins, 17 Mich. 28, 33, 1868.)

"The gradual change of opinion here noticed has been attended by a corresponding one in the application of the statute, and in the administration of those principles of equity which have the same foundation. The policy of the statute as now considered so harmonizes with the kindred doctrine of the court of equity, that in many cases they seem to be nearly blended." Upon the general subject of title by prescription, limitation, or possession, see 3 Washburn, c. 2, §§ 3, 7; 2 Hilliard, c. 75, 76; 3 Kent, pp. *441-443; Wharton on Conv. Trac., tit. 4, c. 3; 2 Smith's Leading Cases, *466, Nepean v. Doe; Taylor v. Horde.—HAMMOND.

Pre-emption and homestead rights.—Under this head seems to be the proper place to speak of those interests in the public lands which are acquired by actual settlers, viz., pre-emption and homestead rights (not to be confounded with homestead rights under state law).

I do not see why these are not perfectly legitimate examples of the "taking possession of those things which formerly belonged to nobody." (2 Blackst. 258.) It is true that in most cases occupancy alone does not vest a complete title. It is necessary either that a certain price should be paid, or certain conditions of residence, etc., fulfilled before the settler's title becomes a fee simple. But he has some rights recognized and protected by law, immediately on taking possession; and these rights cannot well be traced to any source but occupancy.

It is not inconsistent with this that such rights are recognized by the law, only when they arise by virtue of some express statute. This is only equivalent to saying that the government, which is the entire owner of all the public lands, will not recognize individual occupancy except in cases where the proper permission has been given. The statute does not create a right of occupancy: it only regulates it. But the rule that no pre-emption right exists, unless given by some special statutory enactment, is well settled. (Perrin v. Griffith, 13 Iowa, 151; Frisbie v. Whitney, 9 Wall. 187, 19 L. Ed. 668.)

§ 349. a. Common and special occupant.—[259] This seems to have been recurring to first principles, and calling in the law of nature to ascertain the property of the land, when left without a legal owner. For it did not revert to the grantor, though formerly<sup>cc</sup> held so to do; for he had parted with all his interest, so long as cestuy que vie lived: it did not escheat to the lord of the fee; for all escheats must be of the absolute entire fee, and not of any particular estate carved out of it; much less of so minute a remnant as this; it did not belong to the grantee; for he was dead: it did not descend to his heirs; for there were no words of inheritance in the grant: nor could it vest in his executors; for no executors could succeed to a freehold. Belonging, therefore, to

A much more difficult and important question is as to the nature of the estate thus acquired, prior to the completion of the title. What is a claim, personal or real estate, a chattel interest or freehold? The decisions on this point are conflicting. In Iowa it was expressly decided that it is not an inheritable estate. Bowers v. Keesecker, 14 Iowa, 301, followed in Corbett v. Berryhill, 29 Iowa, 157, and overruling Davis v. O'Ferrall, 4 G. Greene (Iowa), 358, so far as the same held that a widow was entitled to dower in such a claim, as real estate. The opinion in B. v. K., claims to be supported by Davenport v. Farrar, 1 Scam. (2 Ill.) 315; Harrington v. Sharp, 1 G. Greene (Iowa), 131, 48 Am. Dec. 365; Delaunay v. Burnett, 4 Gilm. (9 Ill.) 454; Brown v. Throckmorton, 11 Ill. 529; Clark v. Shultz, 4 Mo. 235. Stewart v. Chadwick, 8 Iowa, 463, discusses the same question, and seems to decide the same way, though some of the reasoning (see p. 467) is very ambiguous.

But in Illinois, Lester v. White's Heirs, 44 Ill. 464, 1867, is express, that "this right is not a mere chattel interest. The pre-emption laws grant to the pre-emptor an estate in land upon conditions which become[s] absolute upon the performance of those conditions. (Jackson v. Wilcox, 1 Scam. (2 Ill.) 344; Isaacs v. Steel, 3 Scam. (4 Ill.) 97; Bruner v. Manlove, 3 Scam. (4 Ill.) 339, 36 Am. Dec. 551.) It has been said by this court in subsequent cases that the interest acquired by a pre-emption right is not an estate, within any definition known to the common law. It is not an interest in the legal title, but merely a right of occupancy for the time being, with the privilege of purchasing at some future period, at a stipulated price. Such interests, however, are regarded by the courts of this state as property which may pass by deed nobody, like the hæreditas jacens (inheritance not yet vested) of the Romans, the law left it open to be seized and appropriated by the first person that could enter upon it, during the life of cestuy que vie, under the name of an occupant. But there was no right of occupancy allowed, where the king had the reversion of the lands; for the reversioner hath an equal right with any other man to enter upon the vacant possession, and where the king's title and a subject's concur, the king's shall be always preferred: against the king, therefore, there could be no prior occupant, because nullum tempus occurrit regi (time runs not against the king).<sup>4</sup> And, even in the case of a subject, had the estate pur auter vie, being granted to a man and his heirs during the life of cestuy que or other transfer (Delaunay v. Burnett, 4 Gilm. (9 Ill.) 454; May v. Symms, 20 Ill. 95), and is liable to be taken and sold under execution, and of passing to an assignee under a decree of bankruptcy. (Turney v. Saunders, 4 Scam. (5 Ill.) 527; French v. Carr, 2 Gilm. (7 Ill.) 664.) The interest in the land occupied by the pre-emption is such an interest as descends to the heir at law, and does not go to the executor." (Lester v. White's Heirs, 44 Ill. 466, 467.) Phelps v. Kellogg, 15 Ill. 131, held that pre-emption gave no title to the land, and yet recognizes the pre-emption right as the subject of a sale. Thredgill v. Pintard, 12 How. 24, 13 L. Ed. 877, is an authority on the latter point.

In the recent case of Frisbie v. Whitney, 9 Wall. 187, 19 L. Ed. 668, and 4 West. Jur. 69, 1870, the supreme court of the United States decides that while occupation and improvement on the public lands with a view to pre-emption do not confer a vested right in the land so occupied [against the United States is clearly the meaning], they do confer a preference over others in the purchase of such lands by the bona fide settler, which will enable him to perfect his possession against other individuals, and which the land officers are bound to respect. This inchoate right may be protected by the courts against the claims of other persons who have not an equal or superior right, though it is not valid against the United States.

But this limitation or denial of right against the United States is consistent with good right against all other individuals, which may as well be of the nature of a freehold as a chattel. For analogies in this respect, see the case of possession of crown lands, Harper v. Charlesworth, 4 Barn. & C. 474.

The true classification of a claim seems to be among equitable estates, not legal, and this at once disposes of most of the arguments by which it is denied to be a fee. Then the question recurs, As an equitable estate, what would be its nature and place in the system? and to answer it, we need only ask what would be the estate of such a vendee in possession under the offer of a private vie, there the heir might, and still may, enter and hold possession, and is called in law a special occupant; as having a special exclusive right, by the terms of the original grant, to enter upon and occupy this hæreditas jacens, during the residue of the estate granted: though some have thought him so called with no very great propriety;* and that such estate is rather a descendible freehold.<sup>3</sup>

§ 350. b. Common occupancy abolished; special occupancy devisable.—But the title of common occupancy is now reduced almost to nothing by two statutes: the one, 29 Car. II, c. 3 (Statute of Frauds, 1677), which enacts (according to the ancient rule of law†) that where there is no special occupant, in whom the estate may vest, the tenant pur auter vie may devise it by will, or it shall [260] go to the executors or administrators and be assets in their hands for payment of debts: the other that of 14 Geo. II, c. 20 (Common Recoveries, 1740), which enacts that the surplus of such estate pur auter vie, after payment of debts, shall go in a course of distribution like a chattel interest.

By these two statutes the title of common occupancy is utterly extinct and abolished: though that of special occupancy by the owner. Plainly that which he anticipates having at law when the transaction is complete—a fee. Properly speaking, therefore, a pre-emption claim should be treated as an equitable fee conditional.

And this seems to be Washburn's view when he says: "It constitutes an equity in favor of the occupant, located upon, and identified and attached to the particular quarter section occupied and cultivated by the claimant . . . in a court of equity, the person who has first appropriated the land has the best title."

Hunt v. Wickliffe, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 201, 7 L. Ed. 397 (by Marshall, C. J.), holds expressly that an entry in the name of "heirs" is good, i. e., that the claim passes to heirs and that it is an equitable title, though no point was made on the latter. That a pre-emption right descends to heirs was expressly held in Johnson v. Collins, 12 Ala. 322, cited 3 Washburn, 183.—HAMMOND.

heir at law continues to this day;<sup>4</sup> such heir being held to succeed to the ancestor's estate, not by descent, for then he must take an estate of inheritance, but as an occupant, specially marked out and appointed by the original grant. But, as before the statutes there could no common occupancy be had of incorporeal hereditaments, as of rents, tithes, advowsons, commons, or the like<sup>a</sup> (because, with respect to them, there could be no actual entry made, or corporal seisin had; and therefore by the death of the grantee pur auter vie a grant of such hereditaments was entirely determined), so now, I apprehend, notwithstanding these statutes, such grant would be determined likewise; and the hereditaments would not be devisable, nor vest in the executors, nor go in a course of distribution. For these statutes must not be construed so as to create any new estate, or keep that alive which by the common law was determined, and thereby to defer the grantor's reversion; but merely to dispose of an interest in being, to which by law there was no owner, and which, therefore, was left open to the first occupant. When there is a residue left, the statutes give it to the executors and administrators, instead of the first occupant; but they will not create a residue on purpose to give it to either.<sup>b</sup> They only meant to provide an appointed instead of a casual, a certain instead of an uncertain, owner, of lands which before were nobody's; and thereby to supply this casus omissus (omitted case), and render the disposition of law in all respects entirely uniform:

<sup>b</sup> See the statute 5 Geo. III. c. 17 (Leases, 1765), which makes leases for one, two, or three lives by ecclesiastical persons or any eleemosynary corporation of tithes or other incorporeal hereditaments, as good and effectual to all intents and purposes as leases of corporeal possessions.

<sup>4</sup> Special occupancy.—Blackstone's doctrine that executor cannot take as special occupant even by force of the statutes was sustained by Lord Redesdale in Campbell v. Sandys, 1 Schoales & L. 289; but is controverted by Professor Wooddesson's Lectures, ii. 163, by Sugden, Powers, 198, and by Ripley v. Waterworth, 7 Ves. 425. (See Cruise's Digest, tit. 3, c. 1, §§ 53, 59.)

In America the question is of no practical importance. By statutes in most states the executor, or even the administrator, takes all such estates by occupancy: and as there is now no difference between the heirs of realty and the next of kin entitled to personality, there is no dispute to be litigated by the persons beneficially entitled.—HAMMOND.

this being the only instance wherein a title to a real estate could ever be acquired by occupancy.<sup>5</sup>

[261] This, I say, was the only instance; for I think there can be no other case devised wherein there is not some owner of the land appointed by the law. In the case of a sole corporation, as a parson of a church, when he dies or resigns, though there is no actual owner of the land till a successor be appointed, yet there is a legal, potential ownership, subsisting in contemplation of law; and when the successor is appointed, his appointment shall have a retrospect and relation backwards, so as to entitle him to all the profits from the instant that the vacancy commenced. And, in all other instances, when the tenant dies intestate, and no other owner of the lands is to be found in the common course of descents, there the law vests an ownership in the king, or in the subordinate lord of the fee by escheat.

§ 351. 2. Islands; alluvion; dereliction.—So, also, in some cases, where the laws of other nations give a right by occupancy, as in lands newly created, by the rising of an island in a river, or by the alluvion or dereliction of the sea; in these instances the law of England assigns them an immediate owner.<sup>6</sup> For Brac-

<sup>5</sup> The Wills Act of 1837 provides that every estate pur autre vie, of whatever tenure, and whether it be a corporeal or incorporeal hereditament, may be devised by will; that if no disposition by will be made of an estate pur autre vie of a freehold nature, it shall be chargeable in the hands of the heir (if it comes to him by reason of special occupancy) as assets by descent, as in the case of freehold land in fee simple; and that, in case there shall be no special occupant of an estate pur autre vie, of whatever tenure, and whether a corporeal or incorporeal hereditament, it shall go to the executor or administrator of the party that had the estate thereof by virtue of the grant, and that it shall in every case be assets of the deceased, to be applied and distributed in the same manner as personal estate.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 337.

<sup>6</sup> Islands—Alluvion—Avulsion.—The owner in fee of the bed of a river or other submerged land is the owner of any bar, island, or dry land which may be formed therein. St. Louis v. Rutz, 138 U. S. 226, 34 L. Ed. 941, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337. Where an island arises in a navigable river and by accretion is united to the shores of the mainland, the owner of the mainland is not entitled to the island, but only to such accretion as formed on his land. Cooley v. Golden, 117 Mo. 33, 21 L. R. A. 300, 23 S. W. 100. If an island arises in a navigable stream, it belongs to the state, and not to the owner of the land on either side. If the accretion had been to the plaintiff's land and had gradually ton tells us,<sup>1</sup> that if an island arise in the middle of a river, it belongs in common to those who have lands on each side thereof; but if it be nearer to one bank than the other, it belongs only to him who is proprietor of the nearest shore: which is agreeable to, and probably copied from, the civil law.* Yet this seems only to be reasonable, where the soil of the river is equally divided between the owners of the opposite shores: for if the whole soil is the freehold of any one man, as it must be whenever a several fishery is extended to the island, the plaintiff would have acquired both accretions and island. Glassell v. Hansen, 135 Cal. 547, 67 Pac. 964.

As defined in the Roman law, alluvion is an addition of soil to land by a river, so gradual that in short periods the change is imperceptible; or, to use a common expression, a latent addition (Gaius. Inst., ii, § 70); and Justinian says (Inst. ii, 1, § 20) that that is added by alluvion, which is added so gradually that no one can perceive at what moment of time it is added. The same rule was introduced into English law, Bracton repeating the language of the Roman law. The test as to what is gradual and imperceptible in the sense of the rule is that the witnesses could see from time to time what progress had been made in the formation of the land, but could not perceive it while the process of formation was going on. The land thus formed belongs to the proprietor of the adjacent land to which it is attached. Title by alluvion is a purely accessory right, attaching exclusively to riparian proprietorship, and incapable of existing without it. Jefferies v. East Omaha Land Co., 134 U. S. 178, 33 L. Ed. 872, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 518; Kansas v. Meriwether, 182 Fed. 457, 106 C. C. A. 191; Wilson v. Watson, 144 Ky. 352, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 774, 138 S. W. 283; Adams v. Frothingham, 3 Mass. 352, 3 Am. Dec. 151; Cook v. McClure, 58 N. Y. 437, 17 Am. Rep. 270; White v. Leovy, 49 La. Ann. 1660, 22 South. 931.

While alluvion is the gradual and imperceptible accretion of the soil to one side of a stream or the shore of the mainland, avulsion is the sudden and perceptible removal of a considerable quantity of the soil from the land of one man and its deposit upon or annexation to the land of another. In such case the property continues to belong to the first owner. Bouvier v. Stricklett, 40 Neb. 792, 59 N. W. 550; Chicago v. Ward, 169 Ill. 392, 61 Am. St. Rep. 185, 38 L. R. A. 849, 48 N. E. 927. For instance, avulsion by the Missouri river, the middle of whose channel forms the boundary line between the states of Missouri and Nebraska, works no change in such boundary, but leaves it in the center line of the old channel. Missouri v. Nebraska, 196 U. S. 23, 49 L. Ed. 372, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 155.

claimed,<sup>17</sup> there it seems just (and so is the usual practice) that the eyotts or little islands, arising in any part of the river, shall be the property of him who owneth the piscary and the soil. However, in case a new island rise in the sea, though the civil law gives it to the first occupant,<sup>m</sup> yet ours gives it to the king.<sup>n</sup> And as to lands gained from [<sup>262</sup>] the sea, either by alluvion, by the washing up of sand and earth, so as in time to make terra firma; or by dereliction, as when the sea shrinks back below the usual water-mark; in these cases the law is held to be, that if this gain be by little and little, by small and imperceptible degrees, it shall go to the owner of the land adjoining.<sup>o</sup> For de minimis non curat lex (the law takes not cognizance of small things): and, besides, these owners being often losers by the breaking in of the sea, or at charges to keep it out, this possible gain is therefore a reciprocal consideration for such possible charge or loss. But, if the alluvion or dereliction be sudden and considerable, in this case it belongs to the king; for, as the king is lord of the sea, and so owner of the soil while it is covered with water, it is but reasonable he should have the soil, when the water has left it dry.<sup>p</sup> So that the quantity of ground gained, and the time during which it is gaining, are what make it either the king's or the subject's property. In the same manner if a river, running between two lordships by degrees gains upon the one, and thereby leaves the other dry; the owner who loses his ground thus imperceptibly has no remedy: but if the course of the river be changed by a sudden and violent flood, or other hasty means, and thereby a man loses his ground, he shall have what the river has left in any other place, as a recompense for this sudden loss.<sup>q</sup><sup>8</sup> And this law of alluvions and derelictions, with regard to rivers, is nearly the same in the imperial law; <sup>r</sup> from whence indeed those our determinations seem to have been drawn and adopted: but we our-

OF TITLE BY PRESCRIPTION.

§ 352. III. Prescription.—A third method of acquiring real property by purchase is that by prescription; as when a man can show no other title to what he claims than that he, and those under whom he claims, have immemorially used to enjoy it.<sup>1</sup> Concerning customs, or immemorial usages, in general, with the several requisites and rules to be observed, in order to prove their existence and validity, we inquired at large in the preceding part of

1 Prescription and limitation; occupying claimants.—Prescription and limitation, strictly speaking, in the language of the older books differ between themselves in this. Prescription applies only to incorporeal hereditaments, and by common law furnishes a positive title. Limitation refers to corporeal hereditaments; is based entirely on the statutes; and does not furnish a positive title but only a negative one. The statute of limitations in respect to lands operates as an extinguishment of the remedy of the one, though not a gift of the estate to the other. Whereas the enjoyment of an incorporeal hereditament for the requisite period of time raises a conclusive presumption of a right or a grant, as the case may be. (3 Washburn, p. 52, citing Davenport v. Tyrrel, 1 W. Black. 575; Tyler v. Wilkinson, Fed. Cas. No. 14,312, 4 Mason, 397, 402; 2 Greenleaf's Evidence, § 579.) But these distinctions have lost their importance. Our statutes of limitation apply to both corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments alike. The abolition of forms of action has taken away the importance of the distinction between positive and negative titles. Even so long ago as when Cruise's Digest was written, the title prescription was made to cover the acquisition of land by possession or limitation. (See tit. 31, c. 2; also c. 1, §§ 5, 6. And as to the analogy between them, see Hilliard, c. 76, §§ 1, 4.) Wharton on Conveyancing, tract 4, c. 3, pp. 587, 588, uses prescription in the same way, but distinguishes positive prescription or prescription proper from negative prescription or the effect of the statutes of limitations.

Title by possession, then, may be divided into three branches, for the purpose of retaining the old and familiar distinctions.

First. Title by occupancy, or such rights as accrue from the commencement of possession, as to which see note 2 to preceding chapter.

Second. Title by negative prescription, or such title as accrues when all conflicting rights are cut off by statute: now confined to the case of statutory limitations upon actions to recover money and the like.

Third. Positive prescription, where the title itself is directly affirmed.

An incidental advantage of this arrangement will be, that it enables us to place properly a class of questions which have not been satisfactorily classified these Commentaries.* At present, therefore, I shall only, first, distinguish between custom, strictly taken, and prescription; and then show, what sort of things may be prescribed for.

§ 353. 1. Distinction between custom and prescription.—And, first, the distinction between custom and prescription is this; that custom is properly a local usage, and not annexed to any person: such as a custom in the manor of Dale that lands shall descend to the youngest son: prescription is merely a personal usage; as, before. These relate to the rights of occupying claimants, sometimes called betterment rights. They resemble our first class in this, that they accrue from the beginning of the occupancy, but they usually attach to such titles as require a certain period of time to become perfect. And in this fact we have another argument in favor of uniting all these titles under one head. As to occupying claimants, see a valuable account of the origin and growth of the doctrine by Judge Dillon, in Parsons v. Moses, 16 Iowa, 440.

But the distinction, as to all specific property at least, made between the second and third classes, seems to have only a historical value. A title by statute of limitation is now held to be as positive as one by any other mode of acquisition.

“A legal title is equally valid when once acquired, whether it be by disseisin or by deed: it will vest the fee simple, although the modes of proof adduced to establish it may differ. Nor is a judgment at law necessary to perfect a title by disseisin, any more than one by deed. In either case, when the title is in controversy, it is to be shown by legal proof; and a continued disseisin for twenty years [i. e., for whatever term the statute of the state may require], is as effectual for that purpose as a deed duly executed. The title is created by the existence of the facts, and not by the exhibition of them in evidence. An open, notorious, exclusive, and adverse possession for twenty years operates to convey a complete title to the plaintiffs, as much so as any written conveyance. And such title is not only an interest in the land, but it is one of the highest character, the absolute dominion over it.” (Per Wells, J., in School District No. 4 v. Benson, 31 Me. 381, 384, 52 Am. Dec. 618, quoted in 3 Washington on Real Property, 145, [*514], and see, also, authorities cited in note 1, on page 146; Bowen v. Preston, 48 Ind. 367; 2 Cent. L. J. 251, 1875.)

But such a title does not cut off the right of the widow of disseisee to dower, provided it is not begun until after the inchoate right has accrued. An adverse occupation of the premises during her husband's life will not affect her rights. The statute does not begin to run against her until his death. (2 Scribner on Dower, 542; May v. Fletcher, 40 Ind. 575; Bowen v. Preston, supra.) As to the effect of a change in the statute between the conveyance and death, see Strong v. Clem, 12 Ind. 37, 74 Am. Dec. 200; Harrow v. Myers, 29 Ind. 469.—HAMMOND.

that Sempronius, and his ancestors, or those whose estate he hath, have used time out of mind to have such an advantage or privilege.<sup>b</sup> As for example: if there be a usage in the parish of Dale, that all the inhabitants of that parish may dance on a certain close, at all times, for their recreation (which is held<sup>c</sup> to be a lawful usage); this is strictly a custom, for it is applied to the place in general, and not to any particular persons: but if the [264] tenant, who is seised of the manor of Dale in fee, alleges that he and his ancestors, or all those whose estate he hath in the said manor, have used time out of mind to have common of pasture in such a close, this is properly called a prescription; for this is a usage annexed to the person of the owner of this estate. All prescription must be either in a man and his ancestors, or in a man and those whose estate he hath;<sup>d</sup> which last is called prescribing in a que estate.<sup>2</sup> And formerly a man might, by the common law, have prescribed for a right which had been enjoyed by his ancestors or predecessors at any distance of time, though his or their enjoyment of it has been suspended<sup>e</sup> for an indefinite series of years. But by the statute of limitations, 32 Hen. VIII, c. 2 (Prescription, 1540), it is enacted, that no person shall make any prescription by the seisin or possession of his ancestor or predecessor, unless such seisin or possession hath been within three-score years next before such prescription made.<sup>f 3</sup>

<sup>f</sup> This title, of prescription, was well known in the Roman law by the name of usucapio (Ff. 41. 3. 3.); so called, because a man, that gains a title by prescription, may be said usu rem capere (to take the thing by use).

<sup>2</sup> Rights of common, other than those enjoyed by freehold tenants of a manor as such, created by grant or prescription and attached to the ownership of lands, are called rights of "common appurtenant." Where, as is usually the case, the claim rests on prescription, it is said in technical language that the tenant in fee of the lands and all those whose estate he has (technically called prescribing in a que estate) have enjoyed the right from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, or during the period required by the Prescription Act (2 and 3 Will. IV, c. 71, 1832).—DIGBY, Hist. Law Real Prop. (5th ed.), 194.

<sup>3</sup> The Prescription Act of 1832.—The Prescription Act, 1832, which is described as an act for shortening the time of prescription in certain cases, is

§ 354. 2. Rules governing prescription—a. Incorporeal hereditaments.—Secondly, as to the several species of things which may, or may not, be prescribed for: we may in the first place, observe, that nothing but incorporeal hereditaments can be claimed by prescription; as a right of way, a common, etc.; but that no prescription can give a title to lands, and other corporeal substances, of which more certain evidence may be had.<sup>ε</sup> For no man can be said to prescribe that he and his ancestors have immemorably used to hold the castle of Arundel: for this is clearly another sort of title; a title of corporal seisin and inheritance, which is more permanent, and therefore more capable of proof, than that of prescription. But, as to a right of way, a common, or the like, ε Dr. & St. dial. 1. c. 8. Finch. 132.

chiefly concerned with the periods of user necessary to found a claim by prescription under the act; but, incidentally, the statute made so many other alterations in the law, that a summary of its provisions will be useful.

The Prescription Act classifies the rights with which it deals under the three heads of (a) profits à prendre, (b) easements other than rights of light, and (c) rights of light. With regard to the first, it provides that where there shall have been enjoyment of them by any person claiming right thereto, without interruption, for thirty years next before the commencement of any action upon the subject, the claim shall no longer be defeated, by showing only that the enjoyment commenced at a period subsequent to the era of legal memory; but that it may be defeated in any other way in which it was defeasible before the statute passed. So that, e. g., a claim founded on thirty years' enjoyment would still be satisfactorily answered, by showing that the enjoyment was without knowledge of the adverse party, or that it was by his mere license or permission. For it is to be understood, though the act does not lay down any express rules on the subject, that "enjoyment," for purposes of the act, like "long user" at the common law, must, to be a ground of prescription, be open, continuous, peaceful, and as of right. (Dalton v. Angus, [1881] L. R. 6 App. Cas., at p. 812, per Lord Blackburn.) But it is provided by the act that nothing is to be deemed an interruption of the right, unless it shall have been submitted to or acquiesced in for the space of one year; a mere cessation of the enjoyment being neither an interruption nor a discontinuance of the right. (Hollins v. Verney, [1884] 13 Q. B. D. 304.)

The act also provides, that the time during which the adverse party shall have been an infant, idiot, non compos mentis, feme covert, or tenant for life, or during which any action as to the claim shall have been pending and diligently prosecuted, shall be excluded in the computation of the period of thirty years; but that where there has been an enjoyment for sixty years, the claim a man may be allowed to prescribe; for of these there is no corporal seisin, the enjoyment will be frequently by intervals, and therefore the right to enjoy them can depend on nothing else but immemorial usage.

§ 355. b. In tenant of the fee.—2. A prescription must always be <sup>[265]</sup> laid in him that is tenant of the fee. A tenant for life, for years, at will, or a copyholder, cannot prescribe, by reason of the imbecility of their estates.<sup>a</sup> For, as prescription is usage beyond time of memory, it is absurd that they should pretend to prescribe, whose estates commenced within the remembrance of man. And therefore the copyholder must prescribe under cover of his lord's estate, and the tenant for life under cover of the ten-shall be absolute and indefeasible, unless proof is given that the enjoyment took place under some consent or agreement in writing, expressly given for the purpose.

With regard to ways and other easements, watercourses, and the use of water, not being claims to lights, the act contains similar provisions; but the periods conferring a prescriptive right in the case of ways and other easements, watercourses and waters, are twenty and forty years (in lieu of thirty and sixty years) respectively. But, when the land or water as against which the claim is made has been held for a term of life or for a term exceeding three years, such term is to be excluded from the computation of the forty years, in the event of the person who may be entitled in reversion resisting the claim within three years after the term expires. (S. 8.) (A curious omission in this section has raised a doubt as to whether it applies to easements other than ways and watercourses. It obviously does not apply to profits à prendre.)

Finally, as regards the valuable easement of lights, the act provides that the uninterrupted enjoyment of these for twenty years shall constitute at once an absolute and indefeasible right to them, any local usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding; but, of course, even as regards lights, the claim may be defeated by showing that the enjoyment took place under some agreement in writing, inconsistent with its continuance. It is further to be noticed that whereas, in regard to other easements and profits à prendre, no person can, by the ordinary principles of tenure, acquire a right by prescription against his own landlord (e. g., by walking over an adjacent tenement belonging to him). (Gayford v. Moffatt, [1868] L. R. 4 Ch. App. 133; Kilgour v. Gaddess, [1904] 1 K. B. 457), yet, by virtue of the express words of the section which deals with lights, it has been held possible for a claim of light to be substantiated by similar user; even though the servient tenement was not in the occupation ant in fee simple. As, if tenant for life of a manor would prescribe for a right of common as appurtenant to the same, he must prescribe under cover of the tenant in fee simple; and must plead that John Stiles and his ancestors had immemorially used to have this right of common, appurtenant to the said manor, and that John Stiles demised the said manor, with its appurtenances, to him, the said tenant, for life.

§ 356. c. Prescription presupposes a grant.—3. A prescription cannot be for a thing which cannot be raised by grant. For

of the landlord himself, but of another of his tenants (Morgan v. Fear, [1907] App. Cas. 425; Richardson v. Graham, [1908] 1 K. B. 39). A claim of light by prescription under the act does not, however, bind the crown (Wheaton v. Maple, [1893] 3 Ch. 48).—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 296.

Prescription in the United States.—Properly speaking, prescription applies only to incorporeal hereditaments. Ferris v. Brown, 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 105. Thus, to easements of various kinds: Foster v. Sebago Imp. Co., 100 Me. 196, 60 Atl. 894; Princeton v. Gustavson, 241 Ill. 566, 89 N. E. 653; Anthony v. Kennard Bldg. Co., 188 Mo. 704, 87 S. W. 921; Christ Church v. Lavezzolo, 156 Mass. 89, 30 N. E. 471. The elements necessary to a prescriptive right or prescription to the use of an irrigating ditch are held to be that the user by the claimant during the irrigation season be actual, open, and notorious; that it be hostile; that it be under claim of title; that it be continuous and uninterrupted for the statutory period of five years; and that the right must have been asserted with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner and permitted to the commencement of the action. Silva v. Hawn, 10 Cal. App. 544, 102 Pac. 952; Strong v. Baldwin, 137 Cal. 432, 438, 70 Pac. 288.

While the term "prescription" is more properly confined to the case of incorporeal hereditaments, it is also very commonly used as equivalent to the term "limitations" as occurring in American statutes, and means the time prescribed by statute within which title to property may be acquired by adverse possession. Brock v. Kirkpatrick, 69 S. C. 231, 48 S. E. 72; Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Rice, 7 Ind. Ter. 514, 104 S. W. 819. The distinction is sometimes marked, both in England and in the United States, by calling prescription proper "positive prescription," and the limitation of actions as "negative prescription." The principle is this: Possession may ripen into ownership; and this result may be produced either positively by the law declaring that the possessor is fully entitled after a certain time, or negatively by depriving adverse claimants of their remedies if during a certain time they omit to exercise them.

An instructive comparison of the English and Roman law on the subject may be found in Markby's Elements of Law (3d ed.), c. xiii. And Professor Hammond has a learned note on prescription in corporeal hereditaments at the common law. (Hammond's Bl. 422.)

the law allows prescription only in supply of the loss of a grant, and therefore every prescription presupposes a grant to have existed. Thus the lord of a manor cannot prescribe to raise a tax or toll upon strangers; for, as such claim could never have been good by any grant, it shall not be good by prescription.<sup>1</sup>

§ 357. d. No prescription in matter of record.—4. A fourth rule is, that what is to arise by matter of record cannot be prescribed for, but must be claimed by grant, entered on record; such as, for instance, the royal franchises of deodands, felons' goods, and the like.<sup>4</sup> These, not being forfeited till the matter on which they arise is found by the inquisition of a jury, and so made a matter of record, the forfeiture itself cannot be claimed by any inferior title. But the franchises of treasure-trove, waifs, estrays, and the like may be claimed by prescription; for they arise from private contingencies, and not from any matter of record.<sup>5</sup>

§ 358. e. Prescription in a que estate.—5. Among things incorporeal, which may be claimed by prescription, a distinction must be made with regard to the manner of prescribing; that is, whether a man shall prescribe in a que estate, or in himself and his ancestors. For, if a man prescribes in a que estate (that is, in himself and those whose estate he holds), nothing [266] is claimable by this prescription, but such things as are incident, appendant, or appurtenant to lands; for it would be absurd to claim anything as the consequence, or appendix, of an estate, with which the thing claimed has no connection: but, if he prescribes in himself and his ancestors, he may prescribe for anything whatsoever that lies in grant; not only things that are appurtenant, but also such as may be in gross.<sup>1</sup> Therefore a man may prescribe that he, and those whose estate he hath in the manor of Dale, have used to hold the advowson of Dale, as appendant to that manor: but, if the advowson be a distinct inheritance, and not appendant, then he can only prescribe in his ancestors. So, also, a man may prescribe in a que estate for a common appurtenant to a manor; but if he would prescribe for a common in gross, he must prescribe in himself and his ancestors.<sup>5</sup>

§ 359. f. Descent of estates prescribed.—6. Lastly, we may observe that estates gained by prescription are not, of course, descendible to the heirs general, like other purchased estates, but are an exception to the rule. For, properly speaking, the prescription is rather to be considered as an evidence of a former acquisition, than as an acquisition de novo: and therefore, if a man prescribes for a right of way in himself and his ancestors, it will descend only to the blood of that line of ancestors in whom he so prescribes; the prescription in this case being indeed a species of descent. But if he prescribes for it in a que estate, it will follow the nature of that estate in which the prescription is laid, and be inheritable in the same manner, whether that were acquired by descent or purchase: for every accessory followeth the nature of its principal.

<sup>5</sup> There are two kinds of prescription: Prescription in a man or his ancestors, which is generally referred to as prescription in gross, and prescription in a man and those whose estate he has, which is generally referred to as prescription in a que estate. Austin v. Amhurst, [1877] 7 Ch. D. 689, 692, per Fry, J.

                         OF TITLE BY FORFEITURE.

§ 360. IV. Forfeiture.—Forfeiture is a punishment annexed by law to some illegal act, or negligence, in the owner of lands, tenements, or hereditaments; whereby he loses all his interest therein, and they go to the party injured, as a recompense for the wrong which either he alone, or the public together with himself, hath sustained.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Forfeiture in America—Military occupation.—The English doctrine of forfeiture of lands to the state for crime or corruption of blood is generally if not universally done away with in this country. (3 Washburn on Real Property, 47; 4 Kent, 425; 3 Greenleaf's Cruise, 398, n.; U. S. Const., art. 3, § 3.) Forfeiture of land by illegal alienation is repealed by implication at least, and may even be regarded as obsolete. Of the other cases of forfeiture enumerated by Blackstone one only seems to be still recognized by our laws. Statutes usually provide that a guardian, tenant, joint tenant, or tenant in common is not only liable for waste in treble damages, but that when such damages amount to two-thirds the value of his interest, the reversioner may have judgment of forfeiture and eviction. But the power of forfeiture seems to be only a single application of the broader power discussed in recent books under the title of the police power, which is itself only a branch of the power of eminent domain in the wider sense of the words, though to be carefully distinguished from the power of taking private property for public use (eminent domain in narrower sense), inasmuch as the police power is not dependent in its exercise upon the payment of compensation. It is the power which every government possesses to regulate the use of all private property, so as to prevent each citizen from making his own a means of injury to his neighbor or to the whole community. When this is done by taking away the property as a punishment for misuse, it is a case of forfeiture: when restrictions are imposed in advance upon its use, or when infractions of ordinary private rights become necessary to the public welfare, such cases are included under the general term of "police power." (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, c. 16, pp. 472-597; Sedgwick's Statutory and Constitutional Law, 2d ed., pp. 434-441; Dillon on Municipal Corporations.) The power belongs to the states of the Union and cannot be assumed by the federal government. (United States v. De Witt, 9 Wall. 41, 19 L. Ed. 593; License Cases, 5 How. 504, 12 L. Ed. 256; Passenger Cases, 7 How. 283, 12 L. Ed. 702; License Tax Cases, 5 Wall. 462, 471, 18 L. Ed. 497, 501.) See remarks on this subject by Judge Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, p. 574.

A military commander may, under circumstances of necessity, take the private property of the citizen without being liable personally, in which case the § 361. 1. Causes of forfeiture.—Lands, tenements, and hereditaments may be forfeited in various degrees and by various means: 1. By crimes and misdemeanors. 2. By alienation contrary to law. 3. By nonpresentation to a benefice, when the forfeiture is denominated a lapse. 4. By simony. 5. By nonperformance of condition. 6. By waste. 7. By breach of copyhold customs. 8. By bankruptcy.

§ 362. a. Forfeitures for crimes and misdemeanors.—The foundation and justice of forfeitures for crimes and misdemeanors, and the several degrees of those forfeitures, proportioned to the several offenses, have been hinted at in the preceding volume;<sup>a</sup> but will be more properly considered, and more at large, in the fourth book of these Commentaries. At present I shall only observe in general that the offenses which induce a forfeiture of lands and tenements to the crown are principally the following six: 1. Treason. 2. Felony. 3. Misprision of treason. 4. Præmunire. 5. Drawing [<sup>268</sup>] a weapon on a judge, or striking any-owner must look to the government for compensation. The necessity must be actual and urgent; and its existence is for the jury to determine. (Holmes v. Sheridan, Fed. Cas. No. 6644, 1 Dill. 351, citing Mitchell v. Harmony, 13 How. 115, 135, 14 L. Ed. 75; Wellman v. Wickerman, 44 Mo. 484.) Police regulations of this character are uniformly held legal and binding, because they are for the general benefit, and do not proceed to the length of impairing any private right in the proper sense of that term. The sovereign power in a community may prescribe the manner of exercising individual rights over property. They may prohibit the erection of wooden buildings, the keeping of gunpowder and other dangerous combustibles for sale within the city in greater than specified quantities, fix market places and regulate the times when they shall be open, and prohibit the sale of market produce at other places; and, on the same principles and for the same reasons, may establish and regulate wharves and landings, regulate the anchorage of all boats, rafts, or other vessels landing within its limits, and as a necessary incident to this power, may prohibit the landing of such boats and rafts at any other places than are prescribed in the ordinances or by-laws made for that purpose. The powers rest upon the implied right and duty of the supreme power to protect all by statutory regulations, so that, on the whole, the benefit of all is promoted. (Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 349; Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, 30 Am. Rep. 323; also in 18 Am. Law Reg. 111; Commonwealth v. Alger, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 53, 84; State v. Paul, 5 R. I. 185.)—HAMMOND.

one in the presence of the king's principal courts of justice. 6. Popish recusancy, or nonobservance of certain laws enacted in restraint of papists. But at what time they severally commence, how far they extend, and how long they endure, will with greater propriety be reserved as the object of our future inquiries.

§ 363. b. Forfeiture for alienation contrary to law.—Lands and tenements may be forfeited by alienation, or conveying them to another, contrary to law. This is either alienation in mortmain, alienation to an alien, or alienation by particular tenants; in the two former of which cases the forfeiture arises from the incapacity of the alienee to take; in the latter from the incapacity of the alienor to grant.

§ 364. (1) Alienation in mortmain.—Alienation in mortmain, in mortua manu (in dead-hand), is an alienation of lands or tenements to any corporation, sole or aggregate, ecclesiastical or temporal.<sup>2</sup> But these purchases having been chiefly made by religious houses, in consequence whereof the lands became perpetually inherent in one dead-hand, this hath occasioned the general appellation of mortmain to be applied to such alienations,<sup>b</sup> and the religious houses themselves to be principally considered in forming

<sup>2</sup> The word "mortmain" is a transcription rather than translation of the Latin manus mortua, a term probably used, as Mr. Digby suggests, because the regular clergy against whose endowment this legislation was chiefly directed were treated for legal purposes as dead, "civiliter mortui," Coke's explanation (after mentioning two or three wild ones "framed out of wit and invention") is that "the lands were said to come to dead-hands as to their lords, for that by alienation in mortmain they lost wholly their escheats, and in effect their knight services for the defense of the realm, wards, marriages, reliefs, and the like; and therefore [it] was called a dead-hand, for that a dead-hand yieldeth no service." Whatever be its exact derivation, the expression was felt to be forcible and appropriate, and has passed into common speech. Of late years it has been inexactly made use of in reference to family settlements, as if the "dead-hand" were the hand of the settler by whose grant the successive interests are limited, to use a technical, but in this connection an easily understood, word.—POLLOCK, Land Laws, 90.

the statutes of mortmain:<sup>3</sup> in deducing the history of which statutes it will be matter of curiosity to observe the great address and subtle contrivance of the ecclesiastics in eluding from time to time the laws in being, and the zeal with which successive parliaments have pursued them through all their finesses: how new remedies were still the parents of new evasions; till the legislature at last, though with difficulty, hath obtained a decisive victory.

"The early history of church property in England has never yet been written, and we cannot aspire to write it. We do not, for example, know how the parish church became an owning unit with rights distinct from those of the bishop and his cathedral church on the one hand and from those of the founder or patron on the other. But there is a supernatural element in the story. Great changes take place behind a mystic veil. At least for the purposes of popular thought and speech, God and the saints become the subjects of legal rights, if not of legal duties. 'God's property and the church's twelve-fold': such were the first written words of English law. In the old land-books this notion is put before us in many striking phrases. In the oldest of them the newly converted Aethelbert says, 'To thee Saint Andrew and to thy church at Rochester where Justus the Bishop presides do I give a portion of my land.' The saint is the owner; his church at this place or that is mentioned because it is necessary to show of which of his many estates the gift is to form part. If a man will give land to the chief of the Apostles he should give it to St. Peter and his church at Gloucester, or to St. Peter and his church at Westminster; Justinian himself had been obliged to establish a rule for the interpretation of testaments by which the Savior or some archangel or martyr was nominated heir and no church or monastery was named. The Anglo-Saxon charters and Domesday Book seem to suppose even a physical connection between the land given to a saint and the particular church with which it is, or is to be, legally connected; geography must yield to law; the acres may be remote from the hallowed spot, nevertheless they 'lie in the church.' Just as the earl or thegn may have many manors and a piece of land remote from the manorial center may 'lie in' or 'be of' one of those manors, so the saint will have many churches each with land belonging to it. Gradually (if we may so speak) the saint retires behind his churches; the church rather than the saint is thought of as the holder of lands and chattels. When it comes to precise legal thinking the saint is an impracticable person, for if we ascribe rightful, we may also have to ascribe wrongful possession to him, and from this we shrink, though Domesday Book courageously charges St. Paul with an 'invasion' of land that is not his own. But how is the church conceived? In the first instance very grossly as a structure of wood and stone. Land belongs to a church, is an appurtenance of a church, just as other land belongs to or is appurtenant

§ 365. (a) Licenses in mortmain.—By the common law any man might dispose of his lands to any other private man at his own discretion, especially when the feudal restraints of alienation were worn away. Yet in consequence of these it was always, and is still, necessary<sup>c</sup> for corporations to have a license in mortmain [269] from the crown, to enable them to purchase lands: for as the king is the ultimate lord of every fee, he ought not, unless by his own consent, to lose his privilege of escheats and other feudal profits, by the vesting of lands in tenants that can never be attainted or die. And such licenses of mortmain seem to have been necessary among the Saxons, above sixty years before the Norman Conquest.<sup>d</sup> But, besides this general license from the king, as lord paramount of the kingdom, it was also requisite, whenever there to some hall or dwelling-house. But, as the saint retires, the idea of the church is spiritualized; it becomes a person and, we may say, an ideal, juristic person.

“All this while there are human beings who are directing the affairs of the saint and the church, receiving, distributing, enjoying the produce of the land. They are the saint’s administrators; they are the rectores of his church. Some of them, notably the bishops, since their powers of administration are very large, may be spoken of as landholders; but still the land which the bishop has as bishop is hardly his own; when he demands it, he demands it not ut ius suum, but ut ius ecclesiæ suæ.

“Very often in Domesday Book the saint is the land owner; Saint Paul holds land, Saint Constantine holds land, the Count of Mortain holds land of Saint Petroc. Leofstan held land under ‘the glorious King Edmund.’ Often a particular ecclesia, or an abbatia, holds land. Sometimes the land is described as that of the saint, but the church is said to hold it; sometimes this relation is reversed, the land is the land of the church but the saint holds it. Often, again, the land is spoken of as that of the ruler of the church; this is frequently the case when a bishop is concerned: the land is the land of the Bishop of Exeter and the Bishop of Exeter holds it. Still this is no invariable rule; the Church of Worcester, an episcopal church, has lands and St. Mary of Worcester holds them; and it is not the Bishop of Rome, but the Roman church of St. Peter the Apostle who holds land in Somerset. Sometimes the abbey holds land, sometimes the abbot, sometimes again a distinction is drawn between abbey and abbot; the demesne manors are held by the church itself, but the manors given to knights are held of the abbot. There are cases (not very many) in which groups of canons are said to hold lands, to hold them in common.”

was a mesne or intermediate lord between the king and the alienor, to obtain his license also (upon the same feudal principles) for the alienation of the specific land. And if no such license was obtained, the king or other lord might respectively enter on the lands so aliened in mortmain as a forfeiture. The necessity of this license from the crown was acknowledged by the constitutions of Clarendon,* in respect of advowsons, which the monks always greatly coveted, as being the groundwork of subsequent appropriations.†

§ 366. (b) Evasions of rule by clergy.—Yet such were the influence and ingenuity of the clergy, that (notwithstanding this fundamental principle) we find that the largest and most considerable dotations of religious houses happened within less than two centuries after the Conquest. And (when a license could not be obtained) their contrivance seems to have been this: that, as the forfeiture for such alienations accrued in the first place to the immediate lord of the fee, the tenant who meant to alienate first conveyed his lands to the religious house, and instantly took them back again, to hold as tenant to the monastery; which kind of instantaneous seisin was probably held not to occasion any forfeiture: and then, by pretext of some other forfeiture, surrender, or escheat, the society entered into those lands in right of such their newly acquired seignior, as immediate lords of the fee.

§ 367. (c) Prohibition in Magna Carta.—But, when these dotations began to grow numerous, it was observed that the feudal services, ordained for the defense of the kingdom, were every day visibly withdrawn; that the circulation of landed property from man to man began to [270] stagnate; and that the lords were curtailed of the fruits of their seignories, their escheats, wardships, reliefs, and the like: and therefore, in order to prevent this, it was ordained by the second of King Henry III's great charters,‡ and afterwards by that printed in our common statute-books, that all such attempts should be void, and the land forfeited to the lord of the fee.<sup>h</sup>

* Ecclesie de feudo domini regis non possunt in perpetuum dari, absque assensu et consensione ipsius. (Advowsons, of which the king has the fee, cannot be given in perpetuity without his consent and approval.) c. 2. A. D. 1164.

But, as this prohibition extended only to religious houses, bishops and other sole corporations were not included therein; and the aggregate ecclesiastical bodies (who, Sir Edward Coke observes,<sup>1</sup> in this were to be commended, that they ever had of their counsel the best learned men that they could get) found many means to creep out of this statute, by buying in lands that were bona fide holden of themselves as lords of the fee, and thereby evading the forfeiture; or by taking long leases for years, which first introduced those extensive terms, for a thousand or more years, which are now so frequent in conveyances.

§ 368. (d) Statute De Religiosis, 1279.—This produced the statute de religiosis (of religious persons), 7 Edw. I (1279); which provided, that no person, religious or other whatsoever, should buy, or sell, or receive, under pretense of a gift, or term of years, or any other title whatsoever, nor should by any art or ingenuity appropriate to himself, any lands or tenements in mortmain; upon pain that the immediate lord of the fee, or, on his default for one year, the lords paramount, and, in default of all of them, the king, might enter thereon as a forfeiture.

§ 369. (e) Common recoveries.—This seemed to be a sufficient security against all alienations in mortmain: but as these statutes extended only to gifts and conveyances between the parties, the religious houses now began to set up a fictitious title to the land, which it was intended they should have, and to bring an

<sup>h</sup> Non licet alicui de cætero dare terram suam alicui domui religiosæ, ita quod illam resumat tenendam de eadem domo; nec liceat alicui domui religiosæ terram alicujus sic accipere, quod tradat illam ei a quo ipsum recepit tenendam; si quis autem de cætero terram suam domui religiosæ sic dederit, et super hoc convincatur, donum suum penitus cassetur, et terra illa domino suo illius feodi incurratur. (It is not lawful for anyone to give his land to a religious house for the purpose of taking it again to hold of that house; neither is it lawful for any religious house thus to receive land in order to restore it to its original owner to hold of that house: but if anyone shall have so given his land, and can be convicted of the fact, his gift shall be utterly void, and the land escheat to the lord of the fee.) [271] action to recover it against the tenant; who, by fraud and collusion made no defense, and thereby judgment was given for the religious house, which then recovered the land by sentence of law upon a supposed prior title. And thus they had the honor of inventing those fictitious adjudications of right which are since become the great assurance of the kingdom, under the name of common recoveries. But upon this the statute of Westminster the Second, 13 Edw. I, c. 32 (Mortmain, 1285), enacted, that in such cases a jury shall try the true right of the demandants or plaintiffs to the land, and if the religious house or corporation be found to have it, they shall still recover seisin; otherwise it shall be forfeited to the immediate lord of the fee, or else to the next lord, and finally to the king, upon the immediate or other lord's default. And the like provision was made by the succeeding chapter,<sup>k</sup> in case the tenants set up crosses upon their lands (the badges of knights templars and hospitalers) in order to protect them from the feudal demands of their lords, by virtue of the privileges of those religious and military orders. And so careful was this provident prince to prevent any future evasions, that when the statute of quia emptores, 18 Edw. I (1290), abolished all subinfeudations, and gave liberty for all men to alienate their lands to be holden of their next immediate lord,<sup>l</sup> a proviso was inserted<sup>m</sup> that this should not extend to authorize any kind of alienation in mortmain. And when afterwards the method of obtaining the king's license by writ of ad quod damnum (at what loss)<sup>4</sup> was marked out, by the statute 27 Edw. I, st. 2 (1298), it was further provided by statute 34 Edw. I, st. 3 (1306), that no such license should be effectual, without the consent of the mesne or intermediate lords.

§ 370. (f) Invention of uses.—Yet still it was found difficult to set bounds to ecclesiastical ingenuity: for when they were driven out of all their former holds, they devised a new method of conveyance, by which the lands were granted, not to themselves directly, but to nominal feoffees to the use of the religious houses; thus distinguishing between the possession and the use, and receiving [372] the actual profits, while the seisin of the lands remained in the nominal feoffee; who was held by the courts of equity (then under the direction of the clergy) to be bound in conscience to account to his cestuy que use (he who benefits by the use) for the rents and emoluments of the estate. And it is to these inventions that our practicers are indebted for the introduction of uses and trusts, the foundation of modern conveyancing. But, unfortunately for the inventors themselves, they did not long enjoy the advantage of their new device; for the statute 15 Rich. II, c. 5 (Mortmain, 1391), enacts that the lands which had been so purchased to uses should be amortized by license from the crown, or else be sold to private persons; and that for the future, uses shall be subject to the statutes of mortmain, and forfeitable like the lands themselves. And whereas the statutes had been eluded by purchasing large tracts of land, adjoining to churches, and consecrating them by the name of churchyards, such subtle imagination is also declared to be within the compass of the statutes of mortmain. And civil or lay corporations, as well as ecclesiastical, are also declared to be within the mischief, and of course within the remedy provided by those salutary laws. And, lastly, as during the times of popery lands were frequently given to superstitious uses, though not to any corporate bodies; or were made liable in the hands of heirs and devisees to the charge of obits, chanteries, and the like, which were equally pernicious in a well-governed state as actual alienations in mortmain; therefore, at the dawn of the Reformation, the statute 23 Hen. VIII, c. 10 (Mortmain, 1531), declares, that all future grants of lands for any of the purposes aforesaid, if granted for any longer term than twenty years, shall be void.

§ 371. (g) Power of crown to remit forfeitures.—But, during all this time, it was in the power of the crown, by granting a license of mortmain, to remit the forfeiture, so far as related to its own rights; and to enable any spiritual or other corporation to purchase and hold any lands or tenements in perpetuity: which prerogative is declared and confirmed by the statute 18 Edw. III, st. 3, c. 3 (Mortmain, 1344). But, as doubts were conceived at the time of the revolution how far such license was valid,<sup>n</sup> since the king had no [273] power to dispense with the statutes of mortmain by a clause of non obstante,<sup>o</sup><sup>5</sup> which was the usual course, though it seems to have been unnecessary:<sup>p</sup> and as, by the gradual declension of mesne seigniories through the long operation of the statute of quia emptores (1290), the rights of intermediate lords were reduced to a very small compass; it was therefore provided by the statute 7 & 8 W. III, c. 37 (Mortmain, 1696), that the crown for the future at its own discretion may grant licenses to alien or take in mortmain, of whomsoever the tenements may be holden.

§ 372. (h) Suspension of statutes of mortmain.—After the dissolution of monasteries under Henry VIII, though the policy of the next popish successor affected to grant a security to the possessors of abbey lands, yet, in order to regain so much of them as either the zeal or timidity of their owners might induce them to part with, the statutes of mortmain were suspended for twenty years by the statute 1 & 2 P. & M., c. 8 (Mortmain, 1554), and, during that time, any lands or tenements were allowed to be granted to any spiritual corporation without any license whatsoever. And, long afterwards, for a much better purpose, the augmentation of poor livings, it was enacted by the statute 17 Car. II, c. 3 (Mortmain, 1665), that appropriators may annex the great tithes to the vicarages; and that all benefices under 100*l.* per annum may be augmented by the purchase of lands, without license of mortmain in either case: and the like provision hath been since made, in favor of the governors of Queen Anne's bounty.<sup>q</sup>

§ 373. (1) Charitable uses.—It hath also been held,<sup>r</sup> that the statute 23 Hen. VIII (Mortmain, 1531), before mentioned did not extend to anything but superstitious uses; and that therefore a man may give lands for the maintenance of a school, an hospital, or any other charitable uses.<sup>6</sup> But as it was apprehended from recent experience that persons on their death-beds might make large and improvident dispositions even for these good purposes, and defeat the political ends of the statutes of mortmain; it is therefore enacted by the statute 9 Geo. II, c. 36 (Charitable Uses, 1736), that no lands or tenements, or money to be laid out thereon, shall be given for or charged [<sup>274</sup>] with any charitable uses whatsoever, unless by deed indented, executed in the presence of two witnesses twelve calendar months before the death of the donor, and enrolled in the court of chancery within six months after its execution (except stocks in the public funds, which may be transferred within six months previous to the donor's death), and unless such gift be made to take effect immediately, and be without power of revocation: and that all other gifts shall be void. The two universities, their colleges, and the scholars upon the foundation of the colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster, are excepted out of this act: but such exemption was granted with this proviso, that no college shall be at liberty to purchase more advowsons, than are equal in number to one moiety of the fellows or students, upon the respective foundations.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>7</sup> Mortmain Act of 1888.—It has for centuries been the policy of English law to prohibit the accumulation of lands by individuals or bodies who would withdraw it from circulation. The various ecclesiastical foundations were the first great offenders in this respect, and there can be no doubt that they are the delinquents aimed at in the earlier mortmain statutes (9 Hen. III [1225], st. I, c. 36; 7 Edw. I [1279], st. II, preamble, etc.). Religious foundations rarely parted with lands which came to them (e. g., It was very doubtful if they had power to do so [Stat. West. II, 13 Edw. I [1285], c. 41]); and, what was at first even more important to the crown and other great land owners, they gave no opportunities for claiming escheats, wardships, marriages, reliefs, and many of the other feudal incidents which formed at one time an important part of a great land owner's revenue. Later on, it was discovered that the same unfortunate consequences resulted from the acquisition of

§ 374. (2) Alienation to an alien.—Secondly, alienation to an alien is also a cause of forfeiture to the crown of the lands so alienated; not only on account of his incapacity to hold them, which occasions him to be passed by in descents of land,* but likewise on account of his presumption in attempting, by an act of his own, to acquire any real property; as was observed in the preceding volume.†

lands by trade guilds, municipal burgesses, colleges, and other bodies, whose common characteristic was that they had perpetual succession and a fictitious personality, which enabled them, though really composite bodies, to act more or less as individuals. And so the prohibition against alienation in mortmain, which at first had only referred to the “dead-hand” of the saint, was gradually extended to cover all cases in which land was alienated to a corporation, i. e., a body having perpetual succession, and a fictitious personality. (It would, of course, be a gross anachronism to speak of a “corporation” in connection with statutes of the thirteenth century. But the important notion of “corporateness” is clearly recognized by the mortmain statute of 1391 [15 Rich. II, c. 5].)

The prohibition against mortmain was from the first capable of being relaxed, by the license of the crown and all the mesne lords of the estate which was proposed to be “amortized”; and this rule has been retained by recent legislation, with the exception that the license of the mesne lords is no longer necessary. (Apparently Edward I had to promise to grant no licenses without the consent of the mesne lords (so-called statute of 34 Edw. I, st. III, ann. 1306). But the same reasons which led to the loss of escheats by mesne lords rendered it difficult to prove their rights in the matter of mortmain, and they were abolished by 7 & 8 Will. [1696], c. 37.) By the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict., c. 42, § 1), it is now provided that upon any assurance of land “to or for the benefit of . . . any corporation in mortmain” (not duly authorized by license), the land shall be forfeited to Her Majesty. But the prima facie right of the crown may be defeated by entry on the land by a mesne lord of whom the land is directly held, if such entry is made within twelve months of the date of the assurance; and, if the land is held of more than one mesne lord in gradation, each mesne after the direct lord has six months in which to enforce his claim, after the expiry of the right of his inferior. It is expressly provided by the act that rents and services due in respect of the forfeited land are not to be extinguished by the forfeiture. (Ib. § 3.)—JENKS, Modern Land Law, 217.

Charitable Uses: Acts of 1888 and 1891.—An assurance of land, even though made to noncorporate persons, was, until recently, prima facie irregular, if it contemplated the devotion of the land or proceeds of it to a charitable § 375. (3) Tortious alienation by particular tenants.—Lastly, alienations by particular tenants, when they are greater than the law entitles them to make, and divest the remainder or reversion,<sup>u</sup> are also forfeitures to him whose right is attacked thereby. As, if tenant for his own life aliens by feoffment or fine for the life of another, or in tail, or in fee; these being estates, which either must or may last longer than his own, the creating them is not only beyond his power, and inconsistent with the nature of his interest, but is also a forfeiture of his own particular estate to him in remainder or reversion.<sup>v</sup> For which there seem to be two reasons. First, because such alienation amounts to a renunciation of the feudal connection and dependence; it implies a refusal to perform the due purpose, unless the assurance were made in a particular form. (9 Geo. II [1736], c. 36.) But the effect of the irregularity was merely to render the attempted assurance inoperative, not to work a forfeiture; and herein it differed completely from the effect of an assurance in mortmain. (Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict., c. 42), § 4 (1).) The object of the special forms was, undoubtedly, to secure a fair and impartial consideration of the consequences of the assurance by the alienor, uninfluenced by circumstances likely to cause a hasty determination. The rules laid down by the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, for an assurance to charitable objects, are as follows:

(a) It must be made to take effect in possession immediately, without power of revocation or other provision for the benefit of the assurer, except such provisions as are expressly authorized by the act.

(b) It must be made by deed executed in the presence of two witnesses.

(c) It must, unless made in good faith for full and valuable consideration, be executed at least twelve months before the death of the assurer.

(d) It must be enrolled within six months after its execution in the central office of the supreme court.

But these provisions of the act of 1888 have been greatly modified by the amending act of 1891 (54 & 55 Vict., c. 73, § 5), which authorizes the assurance by will of land for charitable purposes, without any restrictions as to amount, date of execution, or formality, other than the formalities required by the Wills Act. Inasmuch as, previously to 1891, land could not be devised at all for charitable purposes, it is obvious that the recent statute has effected a complete change of policy. But the tying up of land devised for charities is still prohibited by the clause of the act which directs, that all such land shall be sold within a year of the testator's death, or such extended period as the court may allow. Any land not so sold vests in the official trustee of renders and services to the lord of [275] the fee, of which fealty is constantly one; and it tends in its consequence to defeat and divest the remainder or reversion expectant: as, therefore, that is put in jeopardy, by such act of the particular tenant, it is but just that, upon discovery, the particular estate should be forfeited and taken from him, who has shown so manifest an inclination to make an improper use for it. The other reason is, because the particular tenant, by granting a larger estate than his own, has by his own act determined and put an entire end to his own original interest; and on such determination the next taker is entitled to enter regularly, as in his remainder or reversion. The same law, which is thus laid down with regard to tenants for life, holds also with respect to all tenants of the mere freehold or of chattel interests; but if tenant in tail aliens in fee, this is no immediate forfeiture to the remainderman, but a mere discontinuance (as it is called <sup>w</sup>) of the estate-tail, which the issue may afterwards avoid by due course of law: <sup>x</sup> for he in remainder or reversion hath only a very remote and barely possible interest therein, until the issue in tail is extinct. But, in case of such forfeitures by particular tenants, all legal estates by them before created, as if tenant for twenty years grants a lease for fifteen, and all charges by him lawfully made on the lands, shall be good and available in law.<sup>y</sup> For the law will not hurt an innocent lessee for the fault of his lessor; nor permit the lessor, after he has granted a good and lawful estate, by his own act to avoid it, and defeat the interest which he himself has created.<sup>z</sup> charity lands, and must forthwith be sold under the direction of the Charity Commissioners, for the benefit of the charity. A bequest of personalty to a charity, accompanied by a direction to invest in land, will be treated as a bequest of the personalty unfettered by such direction. But where any land devised to a charity, or directed to be purchased with a bequest, is required for actual occupation by the charity, the court or the Charity Commissioners may sanction the retention or acquisition of such land. The act of 1891 only applies to the wills of persons dying after August 4, 1891; but it applies to them whether they were executed before or after the passing of the act.—JENKS, Modern Land Law, 291.

<sup>z</sup> The subject of forfeiture upon a wrongful alienation has now lost much of its importance. For fines and recoveries were abolished by the Fines and

§ 376. (4) Disclaimer of tenure.—Equivalent, both in its nature and its consequences, to an illegal alienation by the particular tenant, is the civil crime of disclaimer; as where a tenant, who holds of any lord, neglects to render him the due services, and, upon an action brought to recover them, disclaims to hold of his lord. Which disclaimer of tenure in any court of record is a forfeiture of the lands to the lord,<sup>a</sup> upon reasons most apparently feudal. And so, likewise, if in any court of record the [276] particular tenant does any act which amounts to a virtual disclaimer; if he claims any greater estate than was granted him at the first infeudation, or takes upon himself those rights which belong only to tenants of a superior class;<sup>a</sup> if he affirms the reversion to be in a stranger, by accepting his fine, attorning as his tenant, collusive pleading, and the like;<sup>b</sup> such behavior amounts to a forfeiture of his particular estate.<sup>9</sup>

§ 377. c. Right of lapse.—Lapse is a species of forfeiture, whereby the right of presentation to a church accrues to the ordinary by neglect of the patron to present, to the metropolitan by neglect of the ordinary, and to the king by neglect of the metropolitan. For it being for the interest of religion, and the good of the public, that the church should be provided with an officiating

Recoveries Act, 1833; and by the Real Property Act, 1845, it is provided, that a feoffment made after October 1, 1845, shall not have any tortious operation. STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 350.

<sup>9</sup> Disclaimer of title in United States.—A disclaimer of title, as distinguished from a mere denial by a tenant, is his setting up a claim of ownership in himself, in opposition to the landlord. Doe v. Evans, 9 Mees. & W. 48; Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. (U. S.) 43, 7 L. Ed. 596; De Lancey v. Ganong, 9 N. Y. 1. The general rule in the United States to-day is that an attempted disclaimer, whether by matter of record or by mere oral statement, may result in a forfeiture of the lease; and the landlord may eject the tenant. But in some states, such as New York, this is not the effect, unless the disclaimer is by matter of record. Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. (U. S.) 43, 7 L. Ed. 596; Newman v. Rutter, 8 Watts (Pa.), 51, 55; Zeller v. Eckert, 4 How. (U. S.) 289, 11 L. Ed. 979; North v. Barnum, 10 Vt. 220; Doty v. Burdick, 83 Ill. 473; *Abbey v. Homestead Assn. v. minister, the law has therefore given this right of lapse, in order to quicken the patron; who might otherwise, by suffering the church to remain vacant, avoid paying his ecclesiastical dues, and frustrate the pious intentions of his ancestors. This right of lapse was first established about the time (though not by the authority<sup>c</sup>) of the council of Lateran,<sup>d</sup> which was in the reign of our Henry the Second, when the bishops first began to exercise universally the right of institution to churches.<sup>e</sup> And therefore, where there is no right of institution, there is no right of lapse: so that no donative can lapse to the ordinary,<sup>f</sup> unless it hath been augmented by the queen's bounty.<sup>g</sup> But no right of lapse can accrue, when the original presentation is in the crown.<sup>h</sup>

The term, in which the title to present by lapse accrues from the one to the other successively, is six calendar months<sup>i</sup> (following in this case the computation of the church, and not the usual one of the common law); and this exclusive of [277] the day of the avoidance.<sup>k</sup> But, if the bishop be both patron and ordinary, he shall not have a double time allowed him to collate in;<sup>l</sup> for the forfeiture accrues by law, whenever the negligence has continued six months in the same person. And also if the bishop doth not collate his own clerk immediately to the living, and the patron presents, though after the six months are lapsed, yet his presentation is good, and the bishop is bound to institute the patron's clerk.<sup>m</sup> For as the law only gives the bishop this title by lapse, to punish the patron's negligence, there is no reason that, if the bishop himself be guilty of equal or greater negligence, the patron should be deprived of his turn. If the bishop suffer the presentation to lapse to the metropolitan, the patron also has the same advantage if he presents before the archbishop has filled up the benefice; and that for the same reason. Yet the ordinary cannot, alter lapse to the metropolitan, collate his own clerk to the prejudice of the archbishop.<sup>n</sup> For he had no permanent right and interest in the advowson, as the patron hath, but merely a temporary one; which having neglected to make use of during the time, he cannot afterwards retrieve it. But if the presentation lapses to the king, prerogative here intervenes and makes a difference; and the patron shall never recover his right, till the king has satisfied his turn by presentation: for nullum tempus occurrit regi (no time runs against the king).<sup>o</sup> And therefore it may seem as if the church might continue void forever, unless the king shall be pleased to present; and a patron thereby be absolutely defeated of his advowson. But to prevent this inconvenience, the law has lodged a power in the patron's hand, of as it were compelling the king to present. For if, during the delay of the crown, the patron himself presents, and his clerk is instituted, the king indeed by presenting another may turn out the patron's clerk; or, after induction, may remove him by quare impedit (why he has hindered); but if he does not, and the patron's clerk dies incumbent, or is canonically deprived, the king hath lost his right, which was only to the next or first presentation.<sup>p</sup>

[278] In case the benefice becomes void by death, or cession through plurality of benefices, there the patron is bound to take notice of the vacancy at his own peril; for these are matters of equal notoriety to the patron and ordinary: but in case of a vacancy by resignation, or canonical deprivation, or if a clerk presented be refused for insufficiency, these being matters of which the bishop alone is presumed to be cognizant, here the law requires him to give notice thereof to the patron, otherwise he can take no advantage by way of lapse.<sup>q</sup> Neither shall any lapse thereby accrue to the metropolitan or to the king; for it is universally true, that neither the archbishop or the king shall ever present by lapse, but where the immediate ordinary might have collated by lapse, within the six months, and hath exceeded his time: for the first step or beginning faileth, et quod non habet principium, non habet

finem (and that which has no beginning has no end).<sup>r</sup> If, the bishop refuse or neglect to examine and admit the patron's clerk, without good reason assigned or notice given, he is styled a disturber by the law, and shall not have any title to present by lapse; for no man shall take advantage of his own wrong.<sup>s</sup> Also if the right of presentation be litigious or contested, and an action be brought against the bishop to try the title, no lapse shall incur till the question of right be decided.<sup>t</sup>

§ 378. d. Simony.—By simony, the right of presentation to a living is forfeited and vested pro hac vice (for this occasion) in the crown. Simony is the corrupt presentation of anyone to an ecclesiastical benefice for money, gift, or reward. It is so called from the resemblance it is said to bear to the sin of Simon Magus, though the purchasing of holy orders seems to approach nearer to his offense. It was by the canon law a very grievous crime: and is so much the more odious, because, as Sir Edward Coke observes,<sup>u</sup> it is ever accompanied with perjury; for the presentee is sworn to have committed no simony. However, it was not an offense punishable in a criminal way at the common law; <sup>v</sup> it being thought sufficient to leave the clerk to ecclesiastical censures. But as these did not affect <sup>[279]</sup> the simoniacal patron, nor were efficacious enough to repel the notorious practice of the thing, divers acts of parliament have been made to restrain it by means of civil forfeitures; which the modern prevailing usage, with regard to spiritual preferments, calls aloud to be put in execution. I shall briefly consider them in this place, because they divest the corrupt patron of the right of presentation, and vest a new right in the crown.

§ 379. (1) Statutes, 1588, 1688, 1713.—By the statute 31 Eliz., c. 6 (Benefices, 1588), it is for avoiding of simony enacted, that if any patron for any corrupt consideration, by gift or promise, directly or indirectly, shall present or collate any person to an ecclesiastical benefice or dignity; such presentation shall be void, and the presentee be rendered incapable of ever enjoying the same benefice: and the crown shall present to it for that turn only.<sup>x</sup> But if the presentee dies, without being convicted of such simony in his lifetime, it is enacted by stat. 1 W. & M., c. 16 (Benefices, 1688), that the simoniacal contract shall not prejudice any other innocent patron, on pretense of lapse to the crown or otherwise. Also by the statute 12 Ann., st. 2, c. 12 (Simony, 1713), if any person for money or profit shall procure, in his own name or the name of any other, the next presentation to any living ecclesiastical, and shall be presented thereupon, this is declared to be a simoniacal contract; and the party is subjected to all the ecclesiastical penalties of simony, is disabled from holding the benefice, and the presentation devolves to the crown.

§ 380. (2) What constitutes simony.—Upon these statutes many questions have arisen, with regard to what is and what is not simony. And, among others, these points seem to be clearly settled: 1. That to purchase a presentation, the living being actually vacant, is open and notorious simony;<sup>y</sup> this being expressly in the face of the statute. 2. That for a clerk to bargain for the next presentation, the incumbent being sick and about to die, was simony, even before the statute of Queen Anne:<sup>z</sup> and now, by that statute, to purchase, either in his own name or another's, the next presentation, and be thereupon presented [<sup>280</sup>] at any future time to the living, is direct and palpable simony. But, 3. It is held that for a father to purchase such a presentation, in order to provide for his son, is not simony: for the son is not concerned in the bargain, and the father is by nature bound to make a provision for him.<sup>a</sup> 4. That if a simoniacal contract be made with the patron, the clerk not being privy thereto, the presentation for that turn shall indeed devolve to the crown, as a punishment of the guilty patron; but the clerk, who is innocent, does not incur any disability or forfeiture.<sup>b</sup> 5. That bonds given to pay money to charitable uses, on receiving a presentation to a living, are not simoniacal,* provided the patron or his relations be not benefited thereby;<sup>d</sup> for this is no corrupt consideration, moving to the patron. 6. That bonds of resignation, in case of nonresidence or taking any other living, are not simoniacal;* there being no corrupt consideration herein, but such only as is for the good of the public. So also bonds to resign, when the patron's son comes to canonical age, are legal; upon the reason before given, that the father is bound to provide for his son.<sup>e</sup> 7. Lastly, general bonds to resign at the patron's request are held to be legal:<sup>f</sup> for they may possibly be given for one of the legal considerations before mentioned; and where there is a possibility that a transaction may be fair, the law will not suppose it iniquitous without proof. But, if the party can prove the contract to have been a corrupt one, such proof will be admitted, in order to show the bond simoniacal, and therefore void. Neither will the patron be suffered to make an ill use of such a general bond of resignation; as by extorting a composition for tithes, procuring an annuity for his relation, or by demanding a resignation wantonly or without good cause, such as is approved by the law; as, for the benefit of his own son, or on account of nonresidence, plurality of livings, or gross immorality in the incumbent.<sup>h 10</sup>

§ 381. e. Breach of condition.—<sup>[281]</sup> The next kind of forfeitures are those by breach or nonperformance of a condition annexed to the estate, either expressly by deed at its original creation, or impliedly by law from a principle of natural reason. wasted, in case a writ of waste were issued against the tenant. But this writ, having been superseded in modern times by an action for damages, was abolished by the Real Property Limitation Act of 1833; and a tenant for life is now liable only to pay damages for waste already done, or to be restrained by injunction from committing any other act of waste which he may be known to contemplate. Williams, Real Prop. (21st ed.), 116. On the creation of estates without impeachment of waste, see note 2, p. *122, ante.

<sup>12</sup> Law of waste in the United States.—“The term ‘waste,’ as used in the statute, and in the bond given in conformity with the provisions of the statute, should be construed according to its accepted legal significance. Blackstone’s (Chitty) definition of the term is: ‘Waste is a spoil or destruction in houses, gardens, trees, or other corporeal hereditaments to the disherison of him that hath the remainder or reversion in fee simple or fee-tail.’ Pomeroy, in paragraph 1348 (Equity, vol. 4), defines the term as follows: ‘Waste is the destruction or improper deterioration or material alteration of things forming an essential part of the inheritance, done or suffered by the person rightfully in possession by virtue of a temporary or partial estate—as, for example, a tenant for life or for years. . . .’ Washburn, in his work on Real Property (volume 1 [4th ed.], p. 140), says: ‘But whatever the act or omission is, in order to its constituting waste, it must either diminish the value of the estate, or increase the burdens upon it, or impair the evidence of title of him who has the inheritance. Waste, in short, may be defined to be whatever does a lasting damage to the freehold or inheritance, and tends to the permanent loss of the owner of the fee, or to destroy or lessen the value of the inheritance.’ An action to recover for waste, within the meaning of any of these generally accepted definitions, must be brought by the owner of the fee for some act of omission or commission done by one in possession under an inferior estate; or, by a mortgagee or other lienholder to protect his security, or recover for an injury thereto, where the security would be or is rendered inadequate by the commission of such waste. Now, while the mortgagor remained in possession of the mortgaged premises pending the final confirmation freehold of a house, is waste.<sup>m</sup> If a house be destroyed by tempest, lightning, or the like, which is the act of Providence, it is no waste: but otherwise, if the house be burnt by the carelessness or negligence of the lessee; though now by the statute 6 Ann., c. 31 (Apprehension of Housebreakers, 1706), no action will lie against a tenant for an accident of this kind. Waste may also be committed in ponds, dove-houses, warrens, and the like; by so reducing the number of the creatures therein, that there will not be sufficient for the reversioner when he comes to the inheritance.<sup>n</sup> Tim-of the sale, he was then holding as owner of the fee, with a right to redeem at any time before the sale was finally confirmed and the deed ordered, and his position toward the mortgagee and the purchaser at the foreclosure sale was that of a debtor to a creditor, and not that of one in possession by an inferior estate, to the remainderman, or the owner of the inheritance." United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. Rieck, 76 Neb. 300, 107 N. W. 389. What constitutes waste by a tenant for a term of years is determined by a consideration as to whether or not an act done results in injury to the inheritance, and whether or not an act is waste is determined by the conditions which exist at the time the act is committed. Moss Point Lumber Co. v. Supervisors, 89 Miss. 448, 42 South. 290, 873. Destruction of fruit trees; carrying away sand and gravel from shore of land bordering on a stream; sinking an oil or gas well by one tenant in common, are acts of waste. Welling v. Strickland, 161 Mich. 235, 126 N. W. 471; Potomac Dredging Co. v. Smoot, 108 Md. 54, 69 Atl. 507; Dangerfield v. Caldwell, 151 Fed. 554, 81 C. C. A. 400. The plowing up of blue-grass sod on a farm, or the cutting of timber from wild lands in a careful and prudent manner, keeping in view the future value of the land, is not waste. Mize v. Burnett, 162 Mo. App. 441, 145 S. W. 150; McNichol v. Eaton, 77 Me. 246. The extent to which wood and timber may be cut on land to be cleared without waste is a question for the jury. Jackson v. Brownson, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 227, 5 Am. Dec. 258. "Technically there is a difference between 'waste' and 'trespass.' 'Waste' is some unauthorized act which goes to the injury or destruction of an estate committed by one in the rightful possession thereof, while 'trespass' is the act of a mere intruder. But, as we have seen, there is no substantial distinction, so far as the remedy is concerned. The law gives for trespass, by which the substance of an estate is injured or destroyed, and which cannot be adequately compensated in damages, the remedies for waste (30 Am. & Eng. Ency. [2d ed.], 258), and therefore, while in a technical sense the appropriate remedy for the plaintiff, under the facts disclosed by the testimony, would have been a suit to restrain waste, rather than a suit to enjoin a trespass, the relief sought is substantially the same." Roots v. Boring Junction Lumber Co., 50 Or. 298, 92 Pac. 811, 818, 94 Pac. 182.

ber also is part of the inheritance.<sup>o</sup> Such are oak, ash, and elm in all places: and in some particular countries, by local custom, where other trees are generally used for building, they are for that reason considered as timber; and to cut down such trees, or top them, or do any other act whereby the timber may decay, is waste.<sup>p</sup> But under-wood the tenant may cut down at any reasonable time [282] that he pleases;<sup>q</sup> and may take sufficient estovers of common right for house-bote and cart-bote; unless restrained (which is usual) by particular covenants or exceptions.<sup>r</sup> The conversion of land from one species to another is waste. To convert wood, meadow, or pasture, into arable; to turn arable, meadow, or pasture, into woodland; or to turn arable or woodland into meadow or pasture; are all of them waste.<sup>s</sup> For, as Sir Edward Coke observes,<sup>t</sup> it not only changes the course of husbandry, but the evidence of the estate; when such a close, which is conveyed and described as pasture, is found to be arable, and e converso. And the same rule is observed, for the same reason, with regard to converting one species of edifice into another, even though it is improved in its value.<sup>u</sup> To open the land to search for mines of metal, coal, etc., is waste; for that is a detriment to the inheritance:<sup>v</sup> but, if the pits or mines were open before, it is no waste for the tenant to continue digging them for his own use;<sup>w</sup> for it is now become the mere annual profit of the land. These three are the general heads of waste, viz., in houses, in timber, and in land. Though, as was before said, whatever else tends to the destruction, or depreciating the value of the inheritance, is considered by the law as waste.

§. 384. (2) Who liable for waste.—Let us next see who are liable to be punished for committing waste. And by the feudal law, feuds being originally granted for life only, we find that the rule was general for all vassals or feudatories; “Si vasallus feudum dissipaverit, aut insigni detrimento deterius fecerit, privabitur (If a vassal shall have wasted the fee, or lessened its value by any notorious injury, he shall be deprived of it).”<sup>x</sup> But in our ancient common law the rule was by no means so large: for not only he that was seised of an estate of inheritance might do as he pleased with it, but also waste was not punishable in any tenant, save only in three persons; guardian in chivalry, tenant in dower, and tenant by the curtesy;<sup>y</sup> [293] and not in tenant for life or years.<sup>a</sup> And the reason of the diversity was, that the estate of the three former was created by the act of the law itself, which therefore gave a remedy against them; but tenant for life, or for years, came in by the demise and lease of the owner of the fee, and therefore he might have provided against the committing of waste by his lessee; and if he did not, it was his own default. But, in favor of the owners of the inheritance, the statutes of Marlbridge<sup>a</sup> and Gloucester<sup>b</sup> provided, that the writ of waste shall not only lie against tenants by the law of England (or curtesy), and those in dower, but against any farmer or other that holds in any manner for life or years. So that, for above five hundred years past, all tenants merely for life, or for any less estate (except tenants by statute merchant, statute staple, recognizance, or elegit, against whom the debtor may set off the damages in account<sup>c</sup>) have been punishable or liable to be impeached for waste, both voluntary and permissive; unless their leases be made, as sometimes they are, without impeachment of waste, absque impetitione vasti; that is, with a provision or protection that no man shall impetere, or sue him, for waste committed.*

* Ninth edition adds, “But tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct is not impeachable for waste; because his estate was at its creation an estate of inheritance, and so not within the statutes.<sup>a</sup> Neither does an action of waste lie for the debtor against tenant by statute, recognizance, or elegit; because against them the debtor may set off the damages in account: <sup>b</sup> but it seems reasonable that it should lie for the reversioner, expectant on the determination of the debtor’s own estate, or of these estates derived from the debtor.”<sup>c</sup>

§ 385. (3) Punishment for waste.—The punishment for waste committed was, by common law and the statute of Marlbridge, only single damages;<sup>d</sup> except in the case of a guardian, who also forfeited his wardship<sup>e</sup> by the provisions of the great charter:<sup>f</sup> but the statute of Gloucester directs that the other four species of tenants shall lose and forfeit the place wherein the waste is committed, and also treble damages, to him that hath the inheritance. The expression of the statute is, “he shall forfeit the thing which he hath wasted”; and it hath been determined, that under these words the place is also included.<sup>g</sup> And if waste be done sparsim, or here and there, all over a wood, the whole wood shall be recovered; or if in several rooms of a [284] house, the whole house shall be forfeited;<sup>h</sup> because it is impracticable for the reversioner to enjoy only the identical places wasted, when lying interspersed with the other. But if waste be done only in one end of a wood (or perhaps in one room of a house, if that can be conveniently separated from the rest), that part only is the locus vastatus, or thing wasted, and that only shall be forfeited to the reversioner.<sup>i</sup>

§ 386. g. Forfeiture of copyholds by breach of custom.—A seventh species of forfeiture is that of copyhold estates, by breach of the customs of the manor. Copyhold estates are not only liable to the same forfeitures as those which are held in socage, for treason, felony, alienation, and waste; whereupon the lord may seize them without any presentment by the homage;<sup>k</sup> but also to peculiar forfeitures, annexed to this species of tenure, which are incurred by the breach of either the general customs of all copyholds, or the peculiar local customs of certain particular manors.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>13</sup> Modern forfeitures of copyholds.—It is a survival of the ancient principles of tenure, which clings to copyholds after it has practically disappeared from other tenures, that any act of the tenant which, either expressly or by implication, denies his lord's title, is an occasion of forfeiture. Thus waste, voluntary or permissive, works a forfeiture; because it virtually asserts the right of the copyholder in a manner inconsistent with his lord's title. And, as we have seen, the law of waste is stricter in respect of a copyholder than

And we may observe that, as these tenements were originally holden by the lowest and most abject vassals, the marks of feudal dominion continue much the strongest upon this mode of property. Most of the offenses, which occasioned a resumption of the fief of the feudal law, and were denominated feloniæ, per quas vassallus amitteret feudum (felonies, by which the vassal would lose his fee),<sup>1</sup> still continue to be causes of forfeiture in many of our modern copyholds. As, by subtraction of suit and service:<sup>m</sup> si dominum deservire noluerit;<sup>n</sup> by disclaiming to hold of the lord, or swearing himself not his copyholder: <sup>o</sup> si dominum ejuravit, i. e. negavit se a domino feudum habere;<sup>p</sup> by neglect to be admitted tenant within a year and a day: <sup>q</sup> si per annum et diem cessaverit in

in respect of a socage tenant for life, or a tenant for years. A lease without license by a common-law assurance for any term longer than a year is a cause of forfeiture; formerly a feoffment had a similar effect. (Owing to the facts that a feoffment has no longer any tortious operation (8 & 9 Vict. [1845], c. 106, § 4), that fines and recoveries are abolished (3 & 4 Will. IV [1833], c. 74, § 2), and that bargains and sales and grants have always been "innocent" conveyances, a demise for years appears to be the only process by which a copyholder can alienate to his lord's prejudice. The term is valid as against all persons but the lord (Doe ex dem. Tresidder v. Tresidder, [1841] 1 Q. B. 416, 113 Eng. Reprint, 1192); and is, therefore, a cause of forfeiture to him). So, also, is a willful refusal on the part of the copyholder to render his dues and services after sufficient notice; but a mere failure through inability is not. (Willowe's Case, [1608] 13 Rep. 1.) Willful confusion of boundaries is also an occasion of forfeiture; but the lord cannot obtain assistance from the high court to remedy the confusion, except upon the terms of waiving the forfeiture. (Bishop of Durham v. Rippon, [1826] 4 L. J. Ch. 32.)

In the case of copyholds, the high court will not give relief against a forfeiture legally incurred (Peachy v. Duke of Somerset, [1721] 1 Strange, 447, 93 Eng. Reprint, 626; Hill v. Barclay, [1811] 18 Ves. Jr., at p. 64, 34 Eng. Reprint, 238), unless the lord has another remedy (Paston v. Uthert, [1629] Litt., at p. 267, 124 Eng. Reprint, 238), or unless it is satisfied that the wrongdoing of the tenant arose through inadvertence (Cox v. Higford, [1710] 2 Vern. 664, 23 Eng. Reprint, 1032; Nash v. Earl of Derby, [1705] 2 Vern. 537, 23 Eng. Reprint, 948), or at least that pecuniary compensation can be made to the lord for any loss which he may have suffered. (Thomas v. Porter, [1668] 1 Ch. Ca. 95, 22 Eng. Reprint, 711.)—JENKS, Modern Land Law, 223.

petenda investitura; <sup>r</sup> by contumacy in not appearing in court after three proclamations: <sup>s</sup> si a domino ter citatus non comparuerit; <sup>t</sup> or by refusing, when sworn of the homage, to present the truth according to his oath: <sup>u</sup> [285] si pares veritatem noverint, et dicant se nescire, cum sciant.<sup>v</sup> In these, and a variety of other cases, which it is impossible here to enumerate, the forfeiture does not accrue to the lord till after the offenses are presented by the homage, or jury of the lord's court-baron; <sup>x</sup> per laudamentum parium suorum: <sup>y</sup> or, as it is more fully expressed in another place, <sup>a</sup> nemo miles adimatur de possessione sui beneficii, nisi convicta culpa, quæ sit laudanda <sup>a</sup> per iudicium parium suorum (no soldier shall be removed from the possession of his benefice, unless convicted of some offense, which must be pronounced by the judgment of his peers).

§ 387. h. Bankruptcy.—The eighth and last method, whereby lands and tenements may become forfeited, is that of bankruptcy, or the act of becoming a bankrupt: which unfortunate person may from the several descriptions given of him in our statute law be thus defined; a trader, who secretes himself, or does certain other acts, tending to defraud his creditors.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>14</sup> English Bankrupt Act of 1883.—Freeholds are subject to involuntary alienation for debt in the tenant's lifetime in the case of his bankruptcy. Bankruptcy is the name given to the judicial proceedings, first introduced by statutes of Henry VIII and Elizabeth, by which a man may be released from his debts, after surrendering all his property to his creditors. By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, when a debtor is adjudged bankrupt, the whole of his freehold as well as his personal estate vests in the trustee under the act, who is empowered to sell the same and divide the proceeds amongst the creditors who have proved their debts. And any real estate which may be acquired by or revolve on a bankrupt before his discharge vests at once in like manner in

Who shall be such a trader, or what acts are sufficient to denominate him a bankrupt, with the several connected consequences resulting from that unhappy situation, will be better considered in a subsequent chapter; when we shall endeavor more fully to explain its nature, as it most immediately relates to personal goods and chattels. I shall only here observe the manner in which the property of lands and tenements are transferred, upon the supposition that the owner of them is clearly and indisputably a bankrupt, and that a commission of bankrupt is awarded and issued against him.

By the statute 13 Eliz., c. 7 (Bankruptcy, 1571), the commissioners for that purpose, when a man is declared a bankrupt, shall have full power to dispose of all his lands and tenements, which he had in his own right at the time when he became a bankrupt, or which shall descend or come to him at any time afterwards, before his debts are satisfied or agreed for; and all lands and tenements which were purchased by him jointly with his wife or children to his own use (or such interest therein as [286] he may lawfully part with), or purchased with any other person upon secret trust for his own use; and to cause them to be appraised to their full value, and to sell the same by deed indented and enrolled, or divide them proportionably among the creditors. This statute expressly included not only free, but customary and copyhold, lands: but did not extend to estates-tail further than for the bankrupt's life; nor to equities of redemption on a mortgaged estate, wherein the bankrupt has no legal interest, but only an equitable reversion. Whereupon the statute 21 Jac. I, c. 19 (Bankruptcy, 1623), enacts, that the commissioners shall be empowered to sell or convey, by deed indented and enrolled, any lands or tenements of the bankrupt, wherein he shall be seised of an estate-tail in possession, remainder, or reversion, unless the remainder or reversion thereof shall be in the crown; and that such sale shall be good against all such issues in tail, remaindermen, and reversioners, whom the bankrupt himself might have barred by a com-

the trustee; and the bankrupt himself has no power to dispose thereof. Also where a debtor is released from his debts by a composition or scheme of arrangement approved by the court under the present bankruptcy law (1890), all or any part of his property may by the terms of the composition or scheme be vested in the trustee appointed to carry out the same.—WILLIAMS, Real Prop. (21st ed.), 278.

mon recovery, or other means: and that all equities of redemption upon mortgaged estates shall be at the disposal of the commissioners; for they shall have power to redeem the same, as the bankrupt himself might have done, and after redemption to sell them. And also, by this and a former act,<sup>b</sup> all fraudulent conveyances to defeat the intent of these statutes are declared void; but that no purchaser bona fide, for a good or valuable consideration, shall be affected by the bankrupt laws, unless the commission be sued forth within five years after the act of bankruptcy committed.

By virtue of these statutes a bankrupt may lose all his real estates; which may at once be transferred by his commissioners to their assignees, without his participation or consent.

OF TITLE BY ALIENATION.

§ 388. Acquisition of title by conveyance or alienation.—The most usual and universal method of acquiring a title to real estates is that of alienation, conveyance, or purchase in its limited sense: under which may be comprised any method wherein estates are voluntarily resigned by one man and accepted by another: whether that be effected by sale, gift, marriage settlement, devise, or other transmission of property by the mutual consent of the parties.<sup>1</sup>

§ 389. 1. Former restrictions on alienation.—This means of taking estates, by alienation, is not of equal antiquity in the law of England with that of taking them by descent. For we may remember that, by the feudal law,<sup>a</sup> a pure and genuine feud could not be transferred from one feudatory to another without the consent of the lord; lest thereby a feeble or suspicious tenant might have been substituted and imposed upon him to perform the feudal services, instead of one on whose abilities and fidelity he could depend. Neither could the feudatory then subject the land to his debts; for, if he might, the feudal restraint of alienation would

<sup>1</sup> Modes of alienation.—Title by alienation, according to Blackstone, comprises any method wherein estates are voluntarily resigned by one man and accepted by another. In this sense it comprises title by devise as well as by deed and by matter of record. (Ch. 20, 21.) Washburn prefers to classify titles by grant, excluding devises (or, in other words, alienation inter vivos), and embraces therein titles by public grant and office grant, which do not come within Blackstone's definition. His divisions are three: (1) Public grants, or titles derived to an individual from a state or the United States. (2) Office grants, or conveyances made by some officer of the law to effect certain purposes, where the owner is either unable or unwilling to execute the requisite deeds to pass the title. (3) Private grants, or conveyances from one individual to another. General references: 4 Kent, Com. Lect., 67; 3 Washburn, ch. 3, 4, 5, pl. 162-424 (top); 2 Hilliard's Real Property, ch. 79-89, inclusive; Cruise's Digest, tit. 32, occupying all of vol. 4; Walker's Am. have been easily frustrated, and evaded.<sup>b</sup> And, as he could not alien it in his lifetime, so neither could he by will defeat the succession, by devising his feud to another family; nor even alter the course of it, by imposing particular limitations, or prescribing an unusual path of descent. Nor, in short, could he alien the estate, even with the consent of the lord, unless he had also obtained the consent of his own next apparent or presumptive heir.<sup>c</sup> And therefore it was very usual in ancient feoffments to express, [288] that the alienation was made by consent of the heirs of the feoffor; or sometimes for the heir apparent himself to join with the feoffor in the grant.<sup>d</sup> And, on the other hand, as the feudal obligation was looked upon to be reciprocal, the lord could not alien or transfer his seigniorship without the consent of his vassal: for it was esteemed unreasonable to subject a feudatory to a new superior, with whom he might have a deadly enmity, without his own approbation; or even to transfer his fealty, without his being thoroughly apprised of it, that he might know with certainty to whom his renders and services were due, and be able to distinguish a lawful distress for rent from a hostile seizing of his cattle by the lord of a neighboring clan.<sup>e</sup> This consent of the vassal was expressed by what was called attorning,<sup>f</sup> or professing to become the tenant of the new lord: which doctrine of attornment was afterwards extended to all lessees for life or years. For if one bought an estate with any lease for life or years standing out thereon, and the lessee or tenant refused to attorn to the purchaser, and to become his tenant, the grant or contract was in most cases void, or at least incomplete: * which was also an additional clog upon alienations.<sup>2</sup>

§ 390. 2. Freedom of alienation: history.—But by degrees this feudal severity is worn off, and experience hath shown, that property best answers the purposes of civil life, especially in commercial countries, when its transfer and circulation are totally free and unrestrained. The road was cleared, in the first place, by a law of King Henry the First, which allowed a man to sell and dispose of lands which he himself had purchased; for over these he was thought to have a more extensive power than over what had been transmitted to him in a course of descent from his ancestors: <sup>h</sup> [289] a doctrine which is countenanced by the feudal constitutions themselves: <sup>i</sup> but he was not allowed to sell the whole of his own acquirements, so as totally to disinherit his children, any more than he was at liberty to alien his paternal estate.<sup>k</sup> Afterwards a man seems to have been at liberty to part with all his own acquisitions, if he had previously purchased to him and his assigns by name; but, if his assigns were not specified in the purchase deed, he was not empowered to alien:<sup>1</sup> and also he might part with one-fourth of the inheritance of his ancestors without the consent of his heir.<sup>m</sup> By the great charter of Henry III.<sup>n</sup> no subinfeudation was permitted of part of the land, unless sufficient was left to answer the services due to the superior lord, which sufficiency was probably interpreted to be one-half or moiety of the land.<sup>o</sup> But these restrictions were in general removed by the statute of quia emptores,<sup>p</sup> whereby all persons, except the king's tenants in capite (in chief, i. e., directly of the king), were left at liberty to alien all or any part of their lands at their own discretion.<sup>q</sup> And even these tenants in capite were by the statute 1 Edw. III, c. 12 (Sale of Land, 1326), permitted to alien, on paying a fine to the king.<sup>r</sup> By the temporary statutes 7 Hen. VII, c. 3 (Soldiers' Privileges, 1491), and 3 Hen. VIII, c. 4 (Soldiers' Privileges, 1511), all persons attending the king in his wars were allowed to alien their lands without license, and were relieved from other feudal burdens. And, lastly, these very fines for alienations were, in all cases of freehold tenure, entirely abolished by the statute 12 Car. II, c. 24 (Military Tenures, 1660). As to the power of charging lands with the debts of the owner, this was introduced so early as statute Westm. 2, which<sup>r</sup> subjected a moiety of the tenant's lands to executions, for debts recovered by law; as the whole of them was likewise subjected to be pawned in a statute merchant by the statute de mercatoribus, made the same year, and in a statute staple by statute 27 Edw. III, c. 9 (1353), and in other similar recognizances by statute 23 Hen. [290] VIII, c. 6 (Recognizances for Debt, 1531). And now, the whole of them is not only subject to be pawned for the debts of the owner, but likewise to be absolutely sold for the benefit of trade and commerce by the several statutes of bankruptcy. The restraint of devising lands by will, except in some places by particular custom, lasted longer; that not being totally removed, till the abolition of the military tenures. The doctrine of attornments continued still later than any of the rest, and became extremely troublesome, though many methods were invented to evade them: till at last, they were made no longer necessary, by statutes 4 & 5 Ann., c. 16 (Attornment, 1705),* and 11 Geo. II, c. 19 (Distress for Rent, 1737).<sup>3</sup>

* Ninth edition reads after the words "4 & 5 Ann., c. 16," "nor shall, by statute 11 Geo. II, c. 19, the attornment of any tenant affect the possession of any lands, unless made with consent of the landlord, or to a mortgagee after the mortgage is forfeited, or by direction of a court of justice."

<sup>3</sup> Restraints on alienation.—In the early law, alienability of property and rights of any sort was the exception, not the rule. Maine, Ancient Law (Pollock ed.), pp. 281–283. In the earliest stages of the English law of which we have record, chattels seem to have been practically the only kind of property as to which there was, in general, freedom of alienation. Land, under the feudal system, was not the subject of unrestrained conveyance. It was not until 1290, by virtue of the Statute of Quia Emptores, that even a fee simple could be transferred without a fine paid to the feudal lord. By that statute, a fee simple was made freely alienable. But only five years before the date of Quia Emptores, estates-tail were declared to be inalienable, by the Statute De Donis. The ingenuity of lawyers and judges avoided, to a great extent, the purpose of this statute, nearly two centuries later, when it was determined in Taltarum's case that an estate-tail might be conveyed by means of a common recovery. In modern law, practically every interest in real property, even the right of entry for breach of condition, is freely transferable, and the transfer may be made not only by conveyance inter vivos but by will. Rights under contracts were not assignable, and in some jurisdictions still remain unassignable at law, though equity would everywhere protect the assignee. Rights arising out of tortious injuries to property have by various statutes been made assignable. Practically the only part of the law of torts in which the old rule of nonalienability continues to exist is in the field of injuries to person and reputation. It may be stated as a general rule to-day that property and rights of every description are alienable, unless their alienation is prohibited by some rule of public policy, as in the case of a pension, under section 4745 of the United States Revised Statutes; or unless the rights are in their essence personal, as in the case of contracts for personal service, or rights of action for injuries to person or reputation; or unless the alienation is forbidden by the contract or grant creating the rights.

The power to forbid the alienation of an estate or interest by the deed, will, or other conveyance creating it, however, is by no means unlimited. On the

In examining the nature of alienation, let us first inquire, briefly, who may alien and to whom; and then, more largely, how a man may alien, or the several modes of conveyance.

§ 391. 3. Who may alien: who may purchase.—Who may alien, and to whom: or, in other words, who is capable of conveying and who of purchasing. And herein we must consider rather the incapacity, than capacity, of the several parties: for all persons in possession are prima facie, capable both of conveying and purchasing, unless the law has laid them under any particular disabilities. But, if a man has only in him the right of either possession or property, he cannot convey it to any other, lest pretended titles might be granted to great men, whereby justice might be contrary, the general favor which courts have shown towards freedom of alienation has resulted in certain rules forbidding a seller or donor, a grantor or testator from restraining the power of alienation of the property transferred by him. One cannot, by any device, absolutely restrain the grantee or devisee of a fee-simple estate, or the owner of personal property from conveying it. Gray, Restraints on Alienation (2d ed.), § 279. A limited power of restraining the transfer of life interests in real estate or personal property by the employment of conditions or conditional limitations exists, but even in that case, unless the language plainly provides a forfeiture or termination of the estate or interest for breach of such condition, the courts will refuse to give the provision effect. In the case of married women, equity made an exception to these rules, but only for the protection of the women—it permitted a restraint to be imposed in respect to the alienation of married women's separate estates, and even allowed them to enjoy the same free from the risk of execution and sale by their creditors. But this rule was exceptional and is itself becoming obsolete by reason of the fact that statutes have in general supplanted that branch of equity jurisprudence which deals with married women's estates. If B is granted an estate upon condition that he shall not sell for ten years, or that he shall not sell without the grantor's consent during his lifetime, B in each case takes an absolute interest, freed from the condition, which is wholly void.

A seller of a chattel may not affix a condition to the sale, restraining the purchaser from reselling the article. It has been held under this principle that a manufacturer of articles, even under a secret process, cannot by contract fix the price at which the articles may be sold (Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (1911), 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. Ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376), though the effect of this decision has been somewhat impaired by the subsequent decision in Henry v. A. B. Dick Co. (1911), 224 U. S. 1, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 880, 56 L. Ed. 645, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 364, holding that the principle does not extend to price restrictions upon patented articles. These cases, trodden down, and the weak oppressed.* Yet reversions and vested remainders may be granted; because the possession of the particular tenant is the possession of him in reversion or remainder: but contingencies, and mere possibilities, though they may be released, or devised by will, or may pass to the heir or executor, yet cannot (it hath been said) be assigned to a stranger, unless coupled with some present interest."<sup>3</sup>

§ 392. a. Persons attainted.—Persons attainted of treason, felony, and præmunire, are incapable of conveying, from the time of the offense committed, provided attainder follows:† for such conveyance by them may tend to defeat the king of his forfeiture, or the [291] lord of his escheat. But they may purchase for the benefit of the crown, or the lord of the fee, though they are disabled to hold; the lands so purchased, if after attainder, being subject to immediate forfeiture; if before, to escheat as well as forfeiture, according to the nature of the crime."<sup>4</sup> So, also, corporations, religious or others, may purchase lands: yet, unless they have a license to hold in mortmain, they cannot retain such purchase; but it shall be forfeited to the lord of the fee.<sup>4</sup>

however, deal with the question whether or not a contract fixing prices at which sales may be made is valid. There is no dispute upon the fundamental proposition that one who buys articles in violation of such restriction takes a good title.

In New York and some other jurisdictions further limits are placed by statute upon the right of limiting the power of alienation, but the discussion of these statutory rules as well as of other matters connected with the general subject can best be studied in the late Professor John Chipman Gray's classical monograph on Restraints on the Alienation of Property.—MCMURRAY.

<sup>4</sup> The general effect of modern English statutes is that attainder has been abolished from July 4, 1870, and that no conviction for treason or felony has any effect upon title.

duress, are not totally disabled either to convey or purchase, but sub modo (to a certain extent) only. For their conveyances and purchases are voidable, but not actually void. The king indeed, on behalf of an idiot, may avoid his grants or other acts.<sup>w</sup> But it hath been said, that a non compos himself, though he be afterwards brought to a right mind, shall not be permitted to allege his own insanity in order to avoid such grant: for that no man shall be allowed to stultify himself, or plead his own disability. The progress of this notion is somewhat curious. In the time of Edward I, non compos was a sufficient plea to avoid a man's own bond:<sup>x</sup> and there is a writ in the register<sup>y</sup> for the alienor himself to recover lands aliened by him during his insanity; dum fuit non compos mentis suæ, ut dicit, etc. (while he was of unsound mind, as he says). But under Edward III a scruple began to arise, whether a man should be permitted to blemish himself, by pleading his own insanity:<sup>z</sup> and, afterwards, a defendant in assize having pleaded a release by the plaintiff since the last continuance, to which the plaintiff replied (ore tenus—by word of mouth—as the manner then was) that he was out of his mind when he gave it, the court adjourned the assize; doubting, whether as the plaintiff was sane both then and at the commencement of the suit, he should be permitted to plead an intermediate deprivation of reason; and the question was asked, how he came to remember the release, if out of his senses when he gave it.<sup>a</sup> Under Henry VI this way of [292] reasoning (that a man shall not be allowed to disable himself, by pleading his own incapacity, because he cannot know what he did under such a situation) was seriously adopted by the judges in argument;<sup>b</sup> upon a question, whether the heir was barred of his right of entry by the feoffment of his insane ancestor. And from these loose authorities, which Fitzherbert does not scruple to reject as being contrary to reason,<sup>c</sup> the maxim that a man shall not stultify himself hath been handed down as settled law: <sup>d</sup> <sup>e</sup> though later opinions, feeling the inconvenience of the rule, have in many points endeavored to restrain it.<sup>o</sup> And, clearly, the next heir, or other person interested, may, after the death of the idiot or non compos, take advantage of his incapacity and avoid the grant.<sup>f</sup> And so, too, if he purchases under this disability, and does not afterwards upon recovering his senses agree to the purchase, his heir may either waive or accept the estate at his option.<sup>g</sup> In like manner, an infant may waive such purchase or conveyance, when he comes to full age; or, if he does not then actually agree to it, his heirs may waive it after him.<sup>h</sup> Persons also, who purchase or convey under duress, may affirm or avoid such transaction, whenever the duress is ceased.<sup>i</sup> For all these are under the protection of the law; which will not suffer them to be imposed upon, through the imbecility of their present condition; so that their acts are only binding, in case they be afterwards agreed to, when such imbecility ceases. Yet the guardians or committees of a lunatic, by the statute of 11 Geo. III, c. 20 (Lunacy, 1770), are empowered to renew in his right under the directions of the court of chancery any lease for lives or years, and apply the profits of such renewal for the benefit of such lunatic, his heirs, or executors.

§ 394. c. Feme covert.—The case of a feme covert is somewhat different. She may purchase an estate without the consent of her husband, and the conveyance is good during the coverture, till he avoids [293] it by some act declaring his dissent.<sup>k</sup> And, though he does nothing to avoid it, or even if he actually consents, the feme covert herself may, after the death of her husband, waive or disagree to the same: nay, even her heirs may waive it after her, if she dies before her husband, or if in her widowhood she does nothing to express her consent or agreement.<sup>1</sup> But the conveyance or other contract of a feme covert (except by some matter of record) is absolutely void, and not merely voidable;<sup>m</sup> and therefore cannot be affirmed or made good by any subsequent agreement.

<sup>o</sup> Stultifying one's self.—The rule that a man shall not avoid his own deed or other act done in a condition of insanity seems never to have been adopted by the ecclesiastical courts (Turner v. Meyers, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 414), and is now entirely rejected alike in England and in this country. (See 2 Kent, Comm., 451.)—HAMMOND.

§ 395. d. Aliens.—The case of an alien born is also peculiar. For he may purchase anything; but after purchase he can hold nothing, except a lease for years of a house for convenience of merchandise, in case he be an alien friend; all other purchases (when found by an inquest of office) being immediately forfeited to the king.<sup>n 6</sup>

<sup>6</sup> Capacity to purchase or convey as affected by age, status, or mental condition.—Infants.—The common-law rules as to the capacity of infants to be grantors or grantees of real property prevail generally in the United States. The voidable deed of an infant as grantor differs from most other voidable contracts, in that he cannot disaffirm it until he reaches his majority. Sims v. Everhardt, 102 U. S. 300, 26 L. Ed. 87. The ordinary statement of the courts is that after he is of age, if he fail to ratify the deed, he may disaffirm it within a reasonable time. MacGreal v. Taylor, 167 U. S. 688, 42 L. Ed. 326, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961. It is now generally held that any unequivocal act clearly indicating his intention to set aside the deed will be a sufficient disaffirmance. Tucker v. Moreland, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 58, 9 L. Ed. 345. A deed to an infant as grantee is ordinarily valid, unless he repudiates it within a reasonable time after he becomes of age. Cecil v. Salisbury, 2 Vern. 224; Henry v. Root, 33 N. Y. 526; 2 Reeves, Real Prop., 1442.

Persons under mental disability.—Idiocy, insanity, and drunkenness are the more common causes of mental disability. "In the great majority of jurisdictions, the deed of a mentally incapacitated person as grantor is voidable; and not absolutely void, unless after judicial investigation he has been adjudged incompetent, and a committee or guardian has been accordingly appointed to take charge of his property (Lubrs v. Hancock, 181 U. S. 567, 574, 45 L. Ed. 1005, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 726; Smith v. Ryan, 191 N. Y. 452, 123 Am. St. Rep. 609, 14 Ann. Cas. 505, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 461, 84 N. E. 402; Blinn v. Schwarz, 177 N. Y. 252, 101 Am. St. Rep. 806, 69 N. E. 542; Eaton v. Eaton, 37 N. J. L. 108, 18 Am. Rep. 716; Crawford v. Scovell, 94 Pa. St. 48, 39 Am. Rep. 766; Howe v. Howe, 99 Mass. 98; Hovey v. Hobson, 53 Me.

§ 396. c. Papists.—Papists, lastly, and persons professing the popish religion, are by statute 11 & 12 W. III, c. 4 [11 Wm. 3, c. 4, Popery, 1699], (1700), disabled to purchase any lands, rents, or hereditaments; and all estates made to their use, or in trust for them, are void. But this statute is construed to extend only to papists above the age of eighteen; such only being absolutely disabled to purchase: yet the next Protestant heir of a papist under eighteen shall have the profits, during his life; unless he renounces his errors within the time limited by law.*

• 1 P. Wms. 354.

451, 89 Am. Dec. 705; Clay v. Hammond, 199 Ill. 370, 93 Am. St. Rep. 146, 65 N. E. 352; Nichol v. Thomas, 53 Ind. 42; Biggan v. Green, 80 N. C. 236, 30 Am. Rep. 77; 4 Kent, Comm., p. *451). The deed of a person thus adjudged incompetent, and for whom a committee or guardian has been appointed, is absolutely void (Ibid.; Imhoff v. Witmer, 31 Pa. St. 243; Griswold v. Butler, 3 Conn. 227, 231; Thorpe v. Hanscom, 64 Minn. 201, 66 N. W. 1). Like the deed of an infant, that of a mentally incapacitated person, when voidable, may be disaffirmed by him after he regains his mental ability, or by his heirs, devisees, or other persons in privity with him, after his death, if it has never been validly affirmed (Smith v. Ryan, 191 N. Y. 452, 123 Am. St. Rep. 609, 14 Ann. Cas. 505, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 461, 84 N. E. 402; Allis v. Billings, 6 Met. (Mass.) 415, 39 Am. Dec. 744; Valpey v. Rea, 130 Mass. 384; Brown v. Freed, 43 Ind. 253; Fitzgerald v. Shelton, 95 N. C. 519). The right to affirm, and the method of doing so, are substantially the same as in the case of the deed of an infant. But by the weight of authority a difference is here insisted on, in that, if the grantee of a mentally incapacitated person act in good faith and without knowledge of the defect, the instrument cannot be set aside without the return of the consideration; nor, as a rule, can the disability follow the title into the hands of an innocent purchaser for value without notice (Elliott v. Ince, 7 De Gex, M. & G. 475; Eaton v. Eaton, 37 N. J. L. 108, 18 Am. Rep. 716; Boyer v. Berryman, 123 Ind. 451, 24 N. E. 249; Odom v. Riddick, 104 N. C. 515, 17 Am. St. Rep. 686, 7 L. R. A. 118, 10 S. E. 609; New England Loan & T. Co. v. Spitler, 54 Kan. 560, 38 Pac. 799. See Smith v. Ryan, 191 N. Y. 452, 123 Am. St. Rep. 609, 14 Ann. Cas. 505, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 461, 84 N. E. 402; Crawford v. Scovell, 94 Pa. St. 48, 39 Am. Rep. 766; Hovey v. Hobson, 53 Me. 451, 89 Am. Dec. 705; Henry v. Fine, 23 Ark. 417). In a few of the states of this country, of which Colorado and Oregon may be named as illustrations, the deed of a person lacking mental ability is absolutely void, and not merely voidable (Elder v. Schumacher, 18 Colo. 433, 33 Pac. 175; Farley v. Parker, 6 Or. 105, 25 Am. Rep. 504; Rogers v. Blackwell, 49 Mich. 192, 13 N. W. 512). This means that it needs no disaffirmance, and that its invalidity may be set up directly or collaterally by

§ 397. 4. Modes of conveying.—We are next, but principally, to inquire, how a man may alien or convey; which will lead us to consider the several modes of conveyance.

In consequence of the admission of property, or the giving a separate right by the law of society to those things which by the law of nature were in common, there was necessarily some means to be devised, whereby that separate right or exclusive property should be originally acquired; [294] which, we have more than once observed, was that of occupancy or first possession. But this possession, when once gained, was also necessarily to be continued; or else, upon one man's dereliction of the thing he had seized, it would again become common, and all those mischiefs and contentions would ensue, which property was introduced to prevent. For this purpose, therefore, of continuing the possession, the anyone interested in the property. Like the conveyance to an infant, that to a person mentally deficient at the time may pass a good title; and it is presumed to do so, unless it is shown not to be for his benefit (2 Bl. Comm., p. *291; Concord Bk. v. Bellis, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 276). He may disaffirm a deed to him, within a reasonable time after he regains his mental strength (Ibid..)” 2 Reeves, Real Prop., 1445.

Married women.—“In most states, a married woman now has as full capacity as her husband to deal with property; and in some states her ability in this respect is greater than his, in that she alone can bar his curtesy while he alone cannot bar her dower (N. Y. Laws 1848, c. 200; N. Y. Laws 1849, c. 375; N. Y. Laws 1909, c. 19, art. 4; Hatfield v. Sneden, 54 N. Y. 280, 287; Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 361; 1 Stim. Amer. Stat. Law, § 6500; § 460, supra.) Her position as to dealing with realty may be briefly summarized. At common law, the deed of a married woman alone was absolutely void. She could not convey her property inter vivos, except by uniting with her husband in the cumbersome procedure of a fine or common recovery (2 Bl. Comm., p. *292; 2 Kent, Comm., p. *150; Albany Fire Ins. Co. v. Bay, 4 N. Y. 9, 12; Bradley v. Walker, 138 N. Y. 291, 297, 33 N. E. 1079). She is now universally permitted by statute to unite with him in a direct conveyance of her land; and, while an acknowledgment of the instrument separate and apart from him is still retained as a requisite in some states. (1 N. J. Gen. Stats., p. 854; Armstrong v. Ross, 20 N. J. Eq. 109; 1 Stim. Amer. Stat. Law, § 3245; Mexia v. Oliver, 148 U. S. 664, 37 L. Ed. 602, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 754), in most of them this feature of her transfer is abolished; and in many states she may deed away her property alone, the same as if she were single. The enabling statutes are quite commonly made, also, to extend to her transfer of her property as grantor through the medium of an attorney, who may even be her own husband, as was heretofore explained (Williams v. Paine, 169 U. S.

municipal law has established descents and alienations: the former to continue the possession in the heirs of the proprietor, after his involuntary dereliction of it by his death; the latter to continue it in those persons, to whom the proprietor, by his own voluntary act, shall choose to relinquish it in his lifetime. A transaction, or transfer, of property being thus admitted by law, it becomes necessary that this transfer should be properly evidenced: in order to prevent disputes, either about the fact, as whether there was any transfer at all; or concerning the persons, by whom and to whom it was transferred; or with regard to the subject matter, as what the thing transferred consisted of; or, lastly, with relation to the mode and quality of the transfer, as for what period of time (or, in other words, for what estate and interest) the conveyance was made. The legal evidences of this translation of property are called the common assurances of the kingdom; whereby every man's estate is assured to him, and all controversies, doubts, and difficulties are either prevented or removed.

55, 42 L. Ed. 658, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 279; Wronkow v. Oakley, 133 N. Y. 505, 28 Am. St. Rep. 661, 16 L. R. A. 209, 31 N. E. 521; 1 Stim. Amer. Stat. Law, § 6506; § 503, supra. Contra, Earle v. Earle, 20 N. J. L. 347; Sumner v. Conant, 10 Vt. 9; Dawson v. Shirley, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 531). A deed to a married woman was ordinarily effectual to pass the title, at common law; but the husband might dissent, and repudiate it, and thus nullify its effect (2 Bl. Comm., p. *293; Schouler, Dom. Rel., § 92). Modern statutes have taken this power from him, and left the married woman, in every material respect, capable of being a grantee of realty." 2 Reeves, Real Prop., 1446.

Aliens.—Generally speaking, an alien grantor may transfer any interest he holds. 1 Stimson, Am. Stat. Law, § 6013. "The divergent forms of legislation in the United States may be grouped, generally, into three kinds, or classes: first, in most of the states, aliens may take, hold, and dispose of real property, the same as if they were citizens (1 N. J. Gen. Stats., p. 23; 1 Dembitz, Land Titles, p. 303; 1 Stim. Amer. Stat. Law, § 1013); second, in a number of others, this sweeping ability is conferred on resident aliens, but not generally on those who are nonresidents (Ibid.); and, third, in the other group of states, resident aliens are authorized thus to deal freely with property for a prescribed period, provided they properly make and file a declaration of their intent to become citizens of the United States (N. Y. Laws 1909, c. 52, §§ 12, 13; 1 Stim. Amer. Stat. Law, § 6013)." 2 Reeves, Real Prop., 1448.

Modifications in the English law by recent statutes in respect to the capacity of lunatics, infants, married women, and aliens to make purchases and alienations may be found in 1 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 372 ff.

§ 398. a. Common assurances. — These common assurances are of four kinds: 1. By matter in pais, or deed; which is an assurance transacted between two or more private persons in pais, in the country; that is (according to the old common law) upon the very spot to be transferred. 2. By matter of record, or an assurance transacted only in the king's public courts of record. 3. By special custom, obtaining in some particular places, and relating only to some particular species of property. Which three are such as take effect during the life of the party conveying or assuring. 4. The fourth takes no effect, till after his death; and that is by devise, contained in his last will and testament. We shall treat of each in its order.

OF ALIENATION BY DEED.

§ 399. Deeds.—In treating of deeds I shall consider, first, their general nature; and, next, the several sorts or kinds of deeds, with their respective incidents. And in explaining the former, I shall examine, first, what a deed is; secondly, its requisites; and, thirdly, how it may be avoided.

§ 400. 1. General nature of deeds.—First, then, a deed is a writing sealed and delivered by the parties.<sup>a</sup> It is sometimes called a charter, carta, from its materials; but most usually, when applied to the transactions of private subjects, it is called a deed, in Latin factum, κατ' ἐξοχήν (pre-eminently), because it is the most solemn and authentic act that a man can possibly perform, with relation to the disposal of his property; and therefore a man shall always be estopped by his own deed, or not permitted to aver or prove anything in contradiction to what he has once so solemnly and deliberately avowed.<sup>b</sup> If a deed be made by more parties than one, there ought to be regularly as many copies of it as there are parties, and each should be cut or indented (formerly in acute angles instar dentium (like teeth, or serrated), but at present in a waving line) on the top or side, to tally or correspond with the other; which deed, so made, is called an indenture. Formerly, when deeds were more concise than at present, it was usual to write both parts on the same piece of parchment, with some word or letters of the alphabet written between them; through which the parchment was cut, either in a straight or indented line, in such a manner as to leave half the word on [296] one part and half on the other. Deeds thus made were denominated syngrapha by the canonists;<sup>c</sup> and with us chirographa, or handwritings;<sup>d</sup> the word cirographum or cyrographum being usually that which is divided in making the indenture: and this custom is still preserved in making out the indentures of a fine, whereof hereafter. But at length indenting only has come into use, without cutting through any letters at all; and it seems at present to serve for little other purpose, than to give name to the species of the deed. When the several parts of an indenture are interchangeably executed by the several parties, that part or copy which is executed by the grantor is usually called the original, and the rest are counterparts: though of late it is most frequent for all the parties to execute every part; which renders them all originals. A deed made by one party only is not indented, but polled or shaved quite even; and therefore called a deed poll, or a single deed.*<sup>1</sup>

§ 401. 2. Requisites of a deed.—We are in the next place to consider the requisites of a deed.

• Ibid. Litt. § 371, 372.

1 Indentures and deeds poll.—The English Real Property Act of 1845 provides that a deed, purporting to be an indenture, is to have the effect of an indenture, though not actually indented. In most jurisdictions in the United States the requirement of the grantee's signature is replaced by the theory that he becomes bound by his acceptance of the deed, so that recovery may be had against him in an action of covenant for a breach of any of its stipulations. Bowen v. Beck, 94 N. Y. 86, 46 Am. Rep. 124; Hagerty v. Lee, 54 N. J. L. 580, 20 L. R. A. 631, 25 Atl. 319; Midland Ry. Co. v. Fisher, 125 Ind. 19, 21 Am. St. Rep. 189, 8 L. R. A. 604, 24 N. E. 756. The name of the old form is, however, retained; and the deed still begins with the words: "This indenture made this — day of —, 19—, between A B," etc. The date of the indenture is uniformly at the beginning, and is not repeated in the in testimonium (in witness) clause.

A deed poll was originally treated as the act or instrument of one party, the grantor, alone; and therefore the grantee could not be bound by its covenants or stipulations. This is said still to be the theory in some of the New England states, such as Massachusetts, Vermont, and Connecticut, and also in Pennsylvania. Kennedy v. Owen, 136 Mass. 199; Johnson v. Muzzy, 45 Vt. 419, 12 Am. Rep. 214; Hinsdale v. Humphrey, 15 Conn. 431; Maule v. Weaver, 7 Pa. St. 329. In the great majority of the American states, however, as also in England, the modern principle that obligates a party to an instrument by his acceptance of it has been fully applied to the deed poll. The effect of a deed poll is thus substantially the same as that of an indenture. Nevertheless, in practice a deed poll is looked on as an instrument of lesser pretensions and effect, and is usually employed in a secondary capacity. Its form of beginning is: "Know all men by these presents that I, A B," etc. Its date is at the end, in the in testimonium clause. See 2 Reeves, Real Prop., 1403.

§ 402. a. Parties and subject matter.—The first of which is, that there be persons able to contract and be contracted with, for the purposes intended by the deed; and also a thing, or subject matter to be contracted for; all which must be expressed by sufficient names.<sup>f</sup> So as in every grant there must be a grantor, a grantee, and a thing granted; in every lease a lessor, a lessee, and a thing demised.<sup>g</sup>

§ 403. b. Consideration.—Secondly, the deed must be founded upon good and sufficient consideration. Not upon an usurious contract; <sup>h</sup> nor upon fraud or collusion, either to deceive purchasers bona fide,<sup>h</sup> or just and lawful creditors;<sup>i</sup> any of which bad considerations will vacate the deed, and subject such persons, as put the same in use, to forfeitures, and often to imprisonment. A deed also, or other grant, made without any consideration, is, as it were, of no effect; for it is construed to inure, or to be effectual, only to the use of the grantor himself.<sup>k</sup> The [297] consideration may be either a good or a valuable one. A good consideration is such as that of blood, or of natural love and affection, when a man grants an estate to a near relation; being founded on motives of generosity, prudence, and natural duty: a valuable consideration is such as money, marriage, or the like, which the law esteems an equivalent given for the grant;<sup>l</sup> and is therefore founded in motives of justice. Deeds made upon good consideration only, are considered as merely voluntary, and are frequently set aside in favor of creditors, and bona fide purchasers.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Consideration.—Consideration in a deed is regarded in England as an important, but not essential, part of the transaction. The omission to men-

§ 404. c. Writing.—Thirdly; the deed must be written, or I presume, printed, for it may be in any character or any language; but it must be upon paper or parchment. For if it be written on stone, board, linen, leather, or the like, it is no deed.<sup>m</sup> Wood or stone may be more durable, and linen less liable to rasures; but writing on paper or parchment unites in itself, more perfectly than any other way, both those desirable qualities: for there is nothing else so durable, and at the same time so little liable to alteration; nothing so secure from alteration, that is at the same time so durable. It must also have the regular stamps, imposed on it by the several statutes for the increase of the public revenue; else it cannot be given in evidence. Formerly many conveyances were made by parol, or word of mouth only, without writing; but this giving a handle to a variety of frauds, the statute 29 Car. II, c. 3 (Statute of Frauds, 1677), enacts, that no lease or estate in lands, tenements, or hereditaments (except leases, not exceeding three years from the making, and whereon the reserved rent is at least two-thirds of the real value) shall be looked upon as of greater force than a lease or estate at will; unless put in writing, and tion a valuable consideration, where it has in fact been paid, gives rise to grave suspicion of fraud, and is, moreover, a penal offense under the revenue laws, as tending to defraud the revenue. (Stamp Act, 1891.) Again, the absence of a valuable consideration brings the transaction within the class of voluntary conveyances, which are subject to various risks. 1 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 384. A bargain and sale deed (p. *338, post), operating by virtue of the Statute of Uses, must have a valuable consideration. Otherwise, the chief advantage of having a valuable consideration recited in the deed is to make it effectual against the grantor's creditors, and give the grantee the position of an innocent purchaser for value without notice. It is not necessary to recite the true consideration. The statement of the amount operates as an estoppel only in preventing the grantor from denying, against his own recital, that he received a valuable consideration. At common law a seal is in itself conclusive evidence of consideration. But equity may investigate the actual character of the transaction and set aside the presumption. And other courts are generally given like jurisdiction by statute in the American states. In some states a seal is made only presumptive evidence of consideration on an executory contract, and this applies to those parts of a deed, such as its covenants, that are executory. 1 Stimson, Am. Stat. Law, §§ 4120 ff; 2 Reeves, Real Prop., 1457.

§ 405. d. Formal and orderly parts.—Fourthly; the matter written must be legally and orderly set forth: that is, there must be words sufficient to specify the agreement and bind the parties: which sufficiency [298] must be left to the courts of law to determine.<sup>a</sup> For it is not absolutely necessary in law to have all the formal parts that are usually drawn out in deeds, so as there be sufficient words to declare clearly and legally the party's meaning. But, as these formal and orderly parts are calculated to convey that meaning in the clearest, distinctest, and most effectual manner, and have been well considered and settled by the wisdom of successive ages, it is prudent not to depart from them without good reason or urgent necessity; and therefore I will here mention them in their usual<sup>o</sup> order.

§ 406. (1) Premises.—The premises may be used to set forth the number and names of the parties, with their additions or titles. They also contain the recital, if any, of such deeds, agreements, or matters of fact as are necessary to explain the reasons upon which the present transaction is founded: and herein also is set down the consideration upon which the deed is made. And then follows the certainty of the grantor, grantee, and thing granted.<sup>p</sup>

§ 407. (2) Habendum.—Next come the habendum and tenendum.<sup>q</sup> The office of the habendum is properly to determine what estate or interest is granted by the deed: though this may be performed, and sometimes is performed, in the premises. In which case the habendum may lessen, enlarge, explain, or qualify, but not totally contradict or be repugnant to, the estate granted in the premises. As if a grant be “to A and the heirs of his body,” in the premises, habendum “to him and his heirs forever,” or vice versa: here A has an estate-tail, and a fee simple expectant thereon.<sup>r</sup> But, had it been in the premises “to him and his heirs,”

habendum "to him for life," the habendum would be utterly void;* for an estate of inheritance is vested in him before the habendum comes, and shall not afterwards be taken away, or divested, by it.

§ 408. (3) Tenendum.—The tenendum, "and to hold," is now of very little use, and is only kept in by custom. It was sometimes formerly [299] used to signify the tenure, by which the estate granted was to be holden; viz., "tenendum per servitium militare, in burgagio, in libero socagio, etc. (to hold by military service. in burgage, in free socage)." But, all these being now reduced to free and common socage, the tenure is never specified. Before the statute of quia emptores, 18 Edw. I (1290), it was also sometimes used to denote the lord of whom the land should be holden: but that statute directing all future purchasers to hold, not of the immediate grantor, but of the chief lord of the fee, this use of the tenendum hath been also antiquated; though for a long time after we find it mentioned in ancient charters, that the tenements shall be holden de capitalibus dominis feodi (of the chief lords of the fee);† but, as this expressed nothing more than the statute had already provided for, it gradually grew out of use.

§ 409. (4) Reddendum.—Next follow the terms of stipulation, if any upon which the grant is made: the first of which is the reddendum or reservation, whereby the grantor doth create or reserve some new thing to himself out of what he had before granted. As "rendering, therefore, yearly the sum of ten shillings, or a pepper corn, or two days' plowing, or the like."<sup>u</sup> Under the pure feudal system, this render, reditus, return or rent, consisted in chivalry principally of military services; in villeinage, of the most slavish offices; and in socage, it usually consists of money, though it may consist of services still, or of any other certain profit.<sup>v</sup> To make a reddendum good, if it be of anything newly created by the deed, the reservation must be to the grantors, or some, or one of them, and not to any stranger to the deed.<sup>z</sup> But if it be of ancient services or the like, annexed to the land, then the reservation may be to the lord of the fee.<sup>7</sup>

§ 410. (5) Conditions.—Another of the terms upon which a grant may be made is a condition: which is a clause of contingency, on the happening of which the estate granted may be defeated; as “provided always, that if the mortgagor shall pay the mortgagee [<sup>300</sup>] 500*l.*, upon such a day, the whole estate granted shall determine”<sup>z</sup>; and the like.<sup>z</sup>

§ 411. (6) Warranties: implied and express.—Next may follow the clause of warranty; whereby the grantor doth, for himself and his heirs, warrant and secure to the grantee the estate so granted.<sup>a</sup> By the feudal constitution, if the vassal’s title to enjoy the feud was disputed, he might vouch, or call, the lord or donor to warrant or insure his gift;<sup>4</sup> which if he failed to do, and the

<sup>4</sup> Warranty of title.—The feudal origin of our law of warranty might well be doubted on the simple ground of its early application to socage lands, which were not feudal as yet, and to chattels which never were so, equally with the military tenures of lord and vassal. That it was largely developed under a system of tenure is as clear as that the development was much assisted by the elaborate doctrine of Roman law de evictionibus. (See Dig. xxi. 2; Cod. viii. 45.) But it is equally certain that it made its first appearance in English law as a natural outgrowth of the mode in which the title of stolen cattle and other property was traced from one possessor to another, and each in turn made responsible for the title which he had transferred, in the Anglo-Saxon law.

To satisfy one’s self of the true origin of the law of warranty, it is only needful to compare with this Anglo-Saxon law of team, Bracton’s treatment of the same topic in lib. 3, tr. 2, c. 32, de furtis, fol. 150–152, and the latter again with the full treatment of the subject in its relation to titles to land in lib. 5, tr. 4, fol. 378–399. Glanvill (lib. 3, de warrantia), adds little to the evidence, for it is not needed to establish the connection between the tenth century and the thirteenth. But it contains some instructive passages as to the earlier stages of the more elaborate feudal doctrine, and especially shows the identity of the institution in its nonfeudal as well as feudal applications.

Glanvill says nothing of escambium or recompense by a warrantor: the warranty as yet is merely a mode of tracing and proving title. But a century vassal was evicted, the lord was bound to give him another feud of equal value in recompense.<sup>b</sup> And so, by our ancient law, if before the statute of quia emptores a man enfeoffed another in fee, by the feudal verb dedi (I have given), to hold of himself and his heirs by certain services; the law annexed a warranty to this grant, which bound the feoffor and his heirs, to whom the services (which were the consideration and equivalent for the gift) were originally stipulated to be rendered.<sup>c</sup> Or if a man and his ances-

later the doctrine of escambium is fully developed, and Bracton's treatment of it, and the cases he quotes (lib. 5, tr. 4, de warrantia, c. 7, fol. 387 b) show that it has become a subject of practical importance. This is due, doubtless to the increased value of land as an article of commerce. The doctrine is one upon which English judges could have found little authority in any other system, though the methods of the Roman law were no doubt of the greatest help in preparing them for their task. Bracton points out the different cases that may arise, and the principles upon which they should be disposed of, in a way that reminds one of the best decisions of the great chancellors who molded English equity. In some points the resemblance becomes a real identity; as in the "marshaling," to use the later expression, of the warrantor's means to satisfy different claims, when he has not enough for all. (Ib., § 7, fol. 388 b.)

The resemblance throws light on the mode in which our law even then was developed, and its relation to Roman law. It tends to prove that the supposed importation of foreign law in Bracton's time may have been only that same use of a discipline derived from it, and of some of its most general principles, which we find in modern equity judges—and no more.

Upon the origin of the law of warranty see remarks of Sir T. Twiss in his introduction to volume 6 of Bracton. He shows it to be English, or at least not to be derived from the Leges Barbarorum, or other known sources: and his suggestion as to Roman jurisprudence as distinguished from their written law will deserve attention when he shows us where that jurisprudence could have been found. He notices also the intimate connection between vouching to warranty and questions of title, in connection with the statute of Hayles. But at that period there is abundant evidence of the close connection of all the forms into which the doctrine afterwards divided. We have only to show that the proof of title to land and chattels alike after the Conquest was made in the same manner as that of chattels before that period, to establish the origin of warranty in both its forms, as defense of title and as recompense.

The intimate connection of these two institutions is clearly expressed by Britton: "For warranty in one sense signifies the defending of the tenant in his seisin, and in another sense it signifies that if he does not defend him tors had immemorially holden land of another and his ancestors by the service of homage (which was called homage auncestrel) this also bound the lord to warranty;<sup>d</sup> the homage being an evidence of such a feudal grant. And, upon a similar principle, in case, after a partition or exchange of lands of inheritance, either party or his heirs be evicted of his share, the other and his heirs are bound to warranty,<sup>e</sup> because they enjoy the equivalent. And so, even at this day, upon a gift in tail or lease for life, rendering rent, the donor or lessor and his heirs (to whom the rent is payable) are bound to warrant the title<sup>f</sup> But in a feoffment in fee by the verb dedi, since the statute of quia emptores (1290), the feoffor only is bound to the implied warranty, and not his heirs;<sup>g</sup> because after being properly summoned, the warrantor is bound to exchange and to make him satisfaction to the value." (Lib. 3, c. 11, pl. 9; Nichols, ii. 102.) And this is only an expansion of Bracton's definition of warrantizare—"defendere et acquietare." (Fol. 380 b, and pp. 258, 259.) To trace the development of the two from the simple form in which they appear in the Kentish and Wessex laws to the elaborate doctrine of the common law, would throw great light on the law of property, and particularly of property in land. As to movables, with which alone the team dealt, instruction must be found in the results caused by the almost entire disappearance of the doctrine, except in the simple form of warranty of title between vendor and vendee.

From the nature of the case warranty was originally a duty incumbent on every person who gave or sold land or chattel to another, since it was merely the duty of vindicating the honesty of his own action and his own title to the thing. When the law of the subject became more complicated, this duty was supposed to grow out of the act of delivery, or in case of land out of the words of the charta—such as do, dedi (Hengham Magna, c. 13, p. 28), or the sale of a chattel. (Bract., fol. 151.) But its true origin is shown by the rule that in case of an exchange, excambium, where no written charter or words of any kind were needed, there was a duty to warrant on both sides. (Cowell, Inst., iv, 24, § 2; Brooke, Abt. "Exchange," 2. 12. And see Blackstone's remark on this page as to partition.) So, also, by the early rule that warranty was not the effect of an express contract between the parties, but a consequence of the mere transfer of land, or of chattels. It required no written or even express contract. All that the voucher had to show was a charter of simple gift, or of feoffment: and if the vouchee denied the obligation, he was bound to show an express exception contained in the charter. (Bract. lib. 5, tr. 4, c. 8, § 1, fol. 388 b.) That when homage proved the tenure no it is a mere personal contract on the part of the feoffor, the tenure (and of course the ancient services) resulting back to the superior lord of the fee. And in other forms of alienation, gradually introduced since that statute, [301] no warranty whatsoever is implied; <sup>h</sup> they bearing no sort of analogy to the original feudal donation. And therefore in such cases it became necessary to add an express clause of warranty, to bind the grantor and his heirs; which is a kind of covenant real, and can only be created by the verb warrantizo or warrant.<sup>1</sup>

§ 412. (a) Origin of express warranties.—These express warranties were introduced, even prior to the statute of quia emptores, in order to evade the strictness of the feudal doctrine of nonalienation without the consent of the heir. For, though he, at the death of his ancestor, might have entered on any tenements that were aliened without his concurrence, yet, if a clause of warranty was added to the ancestor's grant, this covenant descending upon the heir insured the grantee; not so much by confirming his title, as by obliging such heir to yield him a recompense in lands of equal value: the law, in favor of alienations, supposing that no ancestor would wantonly disinherit his next of blood; <sup>k</sup> and therefore presuming that he had received a valuable consideration, either in land, or in money which had purchased land, and that this equivalent descended to the heir together with the ancestor's warranty. So that when either an ancestor, being the rightful tenant of the freehold, conveyed the land to a stranger and his heirs, or released the right in fee simple to one who was already in possession, and written charter was needed, is expressly said (c. 1, § 4, fol. 380 b), though it is clear enough otherwise. It did not even require a person capable of contracting; though that is true only of minors, femes covert, etc., on whom the obligation had descended from him qui dedit aut vendidit. (380 b.) There was no limit to the number of successive vouchings, as long as one could be found in the series—(donec non sit aliquis ulterius qui vocari possit, ib. § 2)—usque ad decem vel amplius in infinitum, ib. § 3. His examples show that three or four were a common number, though even these imply four or five ranks of feudatories or the passage of a tract of land through as many feoffments.—HAMMOND.

superadded a warranty to his deed, it was held that such warranty not only bound the warrantor himself to protect and assure the title of the warrantee, but it also bound his heir: and this, whether the warranty was lineal, or collateral to the title of the land.

§ 413. (i) Lineal and collateral warranties.—Lineal warranty was where the heir derived or might by possibility have derived, his title to the land warranted, either from or through the ancestor who made the warranty: as where a father, or an elder son in the life of the father, released to the disseisor of either themselves or the grandfather, with warranty, this was lineal to the younger son.<sup>1</sup> Collateral warranty was where the heir's title to the land neither was, nor could have been, derived from the [302] warranting ancestor; as where a younger brother released to his father's disseisor, with warranty, this was collateral to the elder brother.<sup>2</sup> But where the very conveyance, to which the warranty was annexed, immediately followed a disseisin, or operated itself as such (as, where a father tenant for years, with remainder to his son in fee, aliened in fee simple with warranty) this, being in its original manifestly founded on the tort or wrong of the warrantor himself, was called a warranty commencing by disseisin; and, being too palpably injurious to be supported, was not binding upon any heir of such tortious warrantor.<sup>3</sup>

§ 414. (ii) Effect of warranties.—In both lineal and collateral warranty, the obligation of the heir (in case the warrantee was evicted, to yield him other lands in their stead) was only on condition that he had other sufficient lands by descent from the warranting ancestor.<sup>4</sup> But though, without assets, he was not bound to insure the title of another, yet, in case of lineal warranty, whether assets descended or not, the heir was perpetually barred from claiming the land himself; for, if he could succeed in such claim, he would then gain assets by descent (if he had them not before) and must fulfill the warranty of his ancestor: and the same rule<sup>5</sup> was with less justice adopted also in respect of collateral warranties, which likewise (though no assets descended) barred the heir of the warrantor from claiming the land by any collateral title; upon the presumption of law that he might hereafter have assets by descent either from or through the same ancestor.

§ 415. (iii) Restrained by statutes.—The inconvenience of this latter branch of the rule was felt very early, when tenants by the curtesy took upon them to alien their lands with warranty; which collateral warranty of the father descending upon his son (who was the heir of both his parents) barred him from claiming his maternal inheritance: to remedy which the statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I, c. 3 (1278), declared, that such warranty should be no bar to the son, unless assets descend from the father. It was afterwards attempted in 50 Edw. III (1376) [303] to make the same provision universal, by enacting that no collateral warranty should be a bar, unless where assets descended from the same ancestor;<sup>q</sup> but it then proceeded not to effect. However, by the statute 11 Hen. VII, c. 20 (Recovery, 1495), notwithstanding any alienation with warranty by tenant in dower, the heir of the husband is not barred, though he be also heir to the wife. And by statute 4 & 5 Ann., c. 16 (1705), all warranties by any tenant for life shall be void against those in remainder or reversion; and all collateral warranties by any ancestor who has no estate of inheritance in possession shall be void against his heir. By the wording of which last statute it should seem, that the legislature meant to allow, that the collateral warranty of tenant in tail, descending (though without assets) upon a remainderman or reversioner, should still bar the remainder or reversion. For though the judges, in expounding the statute de donis, held that, by analogy to the statute of Gloucester, a lineal warranty by the tenant in tail without assets should not bar the issue in tail, yet they held such warranty with assets to be a sufficient bar;<sup>r</sup> which was therefore formerly mentioned<sup>s</sup> as one of the ways whereby an estate-tail might be destroyed; it being indeed nothing more in effect than exchanging the lands entailed for others of equal value. They also held that collateral warranty was not within the statute de donis; as that act was principally intended to prevent the tenant in tail from disinheriting his own issue: and therefore collateral warranty (though without assets) was allowed to be, as at common law, a sufficient bar of the estate-tail and all remainders and reversions expectant thereon.<sup>t</sup> And so it still continues to be, notwithstanding the statute of Queen Anne, if made by tenant in tail in possession: who therefore may now, without the forms of a fine or recovery, in some cases make a good conveyance in fee simple, by superadding a warranty to his grant; which, if accompanied with assets, bars his own issue, and without them bars such of his heirs as may be in remainder or reversion.

§ 416. (7) Covenants.—<sup>[304]</sup> After warranty usually follow covenants, or conventions, which are clauses of agreement contained in a deed, whereby either party may stipulate for the truth of certain facts, or may bind himself to perform, or give, something to the other. Thus the grantor may covenant that he hath a right to convey; or for the grantee's quiet enjoyment; or the like: the grantee may covenant to pay his rent, or keep the premises in repair, etc.<sup>u</sup> If the covenantor covenants for himself and his heirs, it is then a covenant real, and descends upon the heirs; who are bound to perform it, provided they have assets by descent, but not otherwise: if he covenants also for his executors and administrators, his personal assets, as well as his real, are likewise pledged for the performance of the covenant; which makes such covenant a better security than any warranty, and it has therefore in modern practice totally superseded the other.<sup>5</sup>

§ 417. (8) Conclusion of the deed.—Lastly, comes the conclusion, which mentions the execution and date of the deed, or the time of its being given or executed, either expressly, or by reference to some day and year before mentioned.<sup>v</sup> Not but a deed is good, although it mention no date: or hath a false date; or even if it hath an impossible date, as the thirtieth of February; provided the real day of its being dated or given, that is, delivered, can be proved.<sup>2</sup>

§ 418. e. Reading of the deed.—I proceed now to the fifth requisite for making a good deed; the reading of it. This is necessary, wherever any of the parties desire it; and, if it be not done on his request, the deed is void as to him. If he can, he should read it himself: if he be blind or illiterate, another must read it to him. If it be read falsely it will be void; at least for so much as is misrecited: unless it be agreed by collusion that the deed shall be read false, on purpose to make it void; for in such case it shall bind the fraudulent party.<sup>7</sup>

§ 419. f. Signing and sealing.—<sup>[305]</sup> Sixthly, it is requisite that the party, whose deed it is, should seal,<sup>6</sup> and in most cases I apprehend should sign it also. The use of seals, as a mark of authenticity to letters and other instruments in writing, is extremely ancient. We read of it among the Jews and Persians in the earliest and most sacred records of history.<sup>5</sup> And in the book follows: "And the said party of the first part doth covenant with said party of the second part as follows:

"First. That the party of the first part is seised of said premises in fee simple, and has good right to convey the same.

"Second. That the party of the second part shall quietly enjoy the said premises.

"Third. That the said premises are free from encumbrances.

"Fourth. That the party of the first part will execute or procure any further necessary assurance of the title to said premises.

"Fifth. That the party of the first part will forever warrant the title to the said premises." See Rawle, Covenants for Title; 2 Reeves, Real Prop. 1521.

<sup>6</sup> In England, the seal is now usually a colored wafer, on which the party supposed to seal places his finger, by way of adopting the device. In a number of the American states the distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments is done away with by statute. In many states a scroll or similar device may constitute a valid seal. Where the requirement of a seal, in one form or another, is not abolished by statute, the uniform and safe practice is to affix a seal to all deeds. 1 Stimson, Am. Stat. Law, § 1564.

of Jeremiah there is a very remarkable instance, not only of an attestation by seal, but also of the other usual formalities attending a Jewish purchase.<sup>a</sup> In the civil law, also,<sup>b</sup> seals were the evidence of truth; and were required, on the part of the witnesses at least, at the attestation of every testament. But in the times of our Saxon ancestors, they were not much in use in England. For though Sir Edward Coke<sup>c</sup> relies on an instance of King Edwin's making use of a seal about an hundred years before the Conquest, yet it does not follow that this was the usage among the whole nation: and perhaps the charter he mentions may be of doubtful authority, from this very circumstance, of being sealed: since we are assured by all our ancient historians that sealing was not then in common use. The method of the Saxons was for such as could write to subscribe their names, and, whether they could write or not, to affix the sign of the cross: which custom our illiterate vulgar do, for the most part to this day keep up; by signing a cross for their mark, when unable to write their names. And indeed this inability to write, and therefore making a cross in its stead, is honestly avowed by Cædwalla, a Saxon king, at the end of one of his charters.<sup>d</sup> In like manner, and for the same unsurmountable reason, the Normans, a brave but [306] illiterate nation, at their first settlement in France, used the practice of sealing only, without writing their names: which custom continued, when learning made its way among them, though the reason for doing it had ceased; and hence the charter of Edward the Confessor to Westminster Abbey, himself being brought up in Normandy, was witnessed only by his seal, and is generally thought to be the oldest

And I subscribed the evidence, and sealed it and took witnesses, and weighed him the money in the balances. And I took the evidence of the purchase, both that which was sealed according to the law and custom, and also that which was open." c. 32.

And this (according to Procopius) the Emperor Justin in the East, and Theodoric king of the Goths in Italy, had before authorized by their example, on account of their inability to write.

sealed charter of any authenticity in England.* At the Conquest, the Norman lords brought over into this kingdom their own fashions; and introduced waxen seals only, instead of the English method of writing their names, and signing with the sign of the cross.<sup>1</sup> The impressions of these seals were sometimes a knight on horseback, sometimes other devices: but coats of arms were not introduced into seals, nor indeed into any other use, till about the reign of Richard the First, who brought them from the crusade in the holy land; where they were first invented and painted on the shields of the knights, to distinguish the variety of persons of every Christian nation who resorted thither, and who could not, when clad in complete steel, be otherwise known or ascertained.

This neglect of signing, and resting only upon the authenticity of seals, remained very long among us; for it was held in all our books that sealing alone was sufficient to authenticate a deed: and so the common form of attesting deeds, "sealed and delivered," continues to this day; notwithstanding the statute 29 Car. II, c. 3 (Statute of Frauds, 1677), before mentioned, revives the Saxon custom,<sup>7</sup> and expressly directs the signing, in all grants of lands, and many other species of deeds: in which, therefore, signing seems to be now as necessary as sealing, though it hath been sometimes held that the one includes the other.<sup>8</sup>

§ 420. g. Delivery of the deed.—A seventh requisite to a good deed is that it be delivered, by the party himself or his certain attorney: which, therefore, is <sup>[307]</sup> also expressed in the attesta-

<sup>7</sup> Blackstone was of the opinion that the statute [of frauds] restored the old Saxon form of signing and superadded it to sealing and delivery in the case of a deed. This view seems not to be the true one, however; for the reason on which the statute was based could hardly apply in the case of sealed instruments. Accordingly, by modern authority the statute applies only to simple contracts. (Cooch v. Goodman, 2 Q. B. 580, 114 Eng. Reprint, 228; Aveline v. Whisson, 4 M. & G. 801, 184 Eng. Reprint, 330.)—STREET, 2 Foundations of Legal Liability, 172.

tion, "sealed and delivered." A deed takes effect only from this tradition or delivery; for if the date be false or impossible, the delivery ascertains the time of it. And if another person seals the deed, yet if the party delivers it himself, he thereby adopts the sealing,<sup>h</sup> and by a parity of reason the signing also, and makes them both his own. A delivery may be either absolute, that is, to the party or grantee himself; or to a third person, to hold till some conditions be performed on the part of the grantee: in which last case it is not delivered as a deed, but as an escrow; that is, as a scroll or writing, which is not to take effect as a deed till the conditions be performed; and then it is a deed to all intents and purposes.<sup>i</sup> <sup>8</sup>

§ 421. h. Attestation or execution.—The last requisite to the validity of a deed is the attestation, or execution of it in the presence of witnesses: though this is necessary, rather for preserving the evidence than for constituting the essence of the deed. Our modern deeds are in reality nothing more than an improvement or amplification of the brevia testata (witnessed memoranda) mentioned by the feudal writers;<sup>1</sup> which were written memorandums, introduced to perpetuate the tenor of the conveyance and investiture when grants by parol only became the foundation of frequent dispute and uncertainty. To this end they registered in the deed the persons who attended as witnesses, which was formerly done without their signing their names (that not being always in their power), but they only heard the deed read; and then the clerk or scribe added their names, in a sort of memorandum; thus: "hijis testibus, Johanne Moore, Jacobo Smith, et aliis ad hanc rem convocatis. (Witness John Moore, Jacob Smith and others, for this purpose assembled.)"<sup>1</sup> This like all other solemn transactions, was originally done only coram paribus (before the peers),<sup>m</sup> and frequently when assembled in the court-baron, hundred, or county court: which was then expressed in the attestation, teste comitatu, hundredo, etc. (witness the county, hundred, etc.).<sup>n</sup> Afterwards the attestation of other witnesses was allowed, the trial in [308] case of a dispute being still reserved to the pares (peers); with whom the witnesses (if more than one) were associated and joined in the verdict:<sup>o</sup> till that also was abrogated by the statute of York, 12 Edw. II, st. 1, c. 2 (1318). And in this manner, with some such clause of hijis testibus, are all old deeds and charters, particularly magna carta, witnessed. And in the time of Sir Edward Coke, creations of nobility were still witnessed in the same manner.<sup>p</sup> But in the king's common charters, writs, or letters patent, the style is now altered: for at present the king is his own witness, and attests his letters patent thus; "teste meipso, witness, ourself at Westminster, etc.," a form which was introduced by Richard the First,<sup>q</sup> but not commonly used till about the beginning of the fifteenth century; nor the clause of hijis testibus entirely discontinued till the reign of Henry the Eighth: which was also the era of discontinuing it in the deeds of subjects, learning being then revived, and the faculty of writing more general; and therefore ever since that time the witnesses have subscribed their attestation, either at the bottom, or on the back of the deed.*

§ 422. 3. Deeds how avoided.—We are next to consider how a deed may be avoided, or rendered of no effect. And from what has been before laid down it will follow, that if a deed wants any of the essential requisites before mentioned; either, 1. Proper parties, and a proper subject matter: 2. A good and sufficient consideration: 3. Writing, on paper or parchment, duly stamped: 4. Sufficient and legal words, properly disposed: 5. Reading, if desired, before the execution: 6. Sealing; and, by the statute, in many cases signing also: or, 7. Delivery, it is a void deed ab initio (from the beginning). It may also be avoided by matter ex post facto (after the fact): as, 1. By rasure, interlining, or other alteration in any material part; unless a memorandum be made thereof at the time of the execution and attestation.†<sup>9</sup> 2. By breaking off,

<sup>9</sup> Effect of alteration of deed.—The generally accepted rule is that a material alteration of a deed after its delivery, if made by the act or consent of all the interested parties, is effectual, if there be a redelivery of the instrument after the change is made, and not otherwise; in other words, a new conveyance must be made (Moelle v. Sherwood, 148 U. S. 21, 27, 37 L. Ed. 350, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426; Malarin v. United States, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.) 282, 288, 17 L. Ed. 594; Bassett v. Bassett, 55 Me. 127; Burns v. Lynde, 6 Allen (Mass.), 305; Fitzpatrick v. Fitzpatrick, 6 R. I. 64, 74, 75 Am. Dec. 681; Tucker v. Allen, 16 Kan. 312); but such a variation of its effect will not usually be sustained to the extent of divesting title already vested, or injuriously affecting the intervening rights of innocent purchasers or encumbrancers for value (Ibid.; Moelle v. Sherwood, 148 U. S. 21, 37 L. Ed. 350, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426; Herrick v. Malin, 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 388; Wallace v. Harmstad, 15 Pa. St. 462, 53 Am. Dec. 603; Woods v. Hilderbrand, 46 Mo. 284, 2 Am. Rep. 513; Webb v. Mullins, 78 Ala. 111; 1 Greenl. Ev., § 568). An alteration of the nature last mentioned, that is material and after the delivery of the deed, if made by the grantee alone or his successor in interest and not innocently or unintentionally but with wrongful motive, is now held practically everywhere in the United States to vitiate and nullify an executory instrument, or the or defacing the seal.* 3. By delivering it up to be canceled; (309) that is, to have lines drawn over it in the form of lattice work or cancelli; though the phrase is now used figuratively for any manner of obliteration or defacing it. 4. By the disagreement of such, whose concurrence is necessary, in order for the deed to stand: as, the husband, where a feme covert is concerned; an infant, or person under duress, when those disabilities are removed; and the like. 6. By the judgment or decree of a court of judicature. This was anciently the province of the court of star-chamber, and now of the chancery: when it appears that the deed was obtained by fraud, force, or other foul practice; or is proved to be an absolute forgery.† In any of these cases the deed may be voided, either in part or totally, according as the cause of avoidance is more or less extensive.

§ 423. 4. The several species of deeds.—And, having thus explained the general nature of deeds, we are next to consider their several species, together with their respective incidents. And herein I shall only examine the particulars of those, which, from long practice and experience of their efficacy, are generally used in the alienation of real estates: for it would be tedious, nay infinite, to descant upon all the several instruments made use of in personal concerns, but which fall under our general definition of a deed; that is, a writing sealed and delivered. The former, being principally such as serve to convey the property of lands and tenements from man to man, are commonly denominated conveyances:

which are either conveyances at common law, or such as receive their force and efficacy by virtue of the statute of uses.

§ 424. a. Conveyances at common law.—Of conveyances by the common law, some may be called original, or primary conveyances; which are those by means whereof the benefit or estate is created or first arises: others are derivative or secondary; whereby the benefit or estate, originally created, is enlarged, restrained, transferred, or extinguished.

§ 425. (1) Original conveyances. — [310] Original conveyances are the following: 1. Feoffment; 2. Gift; 3. Grant; 4. Lease; 5. Exchange; 6. Partition. Derivative are, 7. Release; 8. Confirmation; 9. Surrender; 10. Assignment; 11. Defeasance.

§ 426. (a) Feoffment or grant.—A feoffment,<sup>10</sup> feoffamentum, is a substantive derived from the verb, to enfeoff, feoffare or

10 History of feoffment.—When the history of English conveyancing comes to be written, the feoffment will occupy an honorable place in its pages. From the time at which our land law assumed its definite shape in the thirteenth century, until the practice of conveyancers was revolutionized by the Statute of Uses, it was the normal assurance of freehold interests in land, whether held by military or by socage tenure. Fines and recoveries were, in truth, but evasions of a recognized rule; the clumsy conveyance by lease with entry, followed by release, was only possible or advantageous in special cases. Even after the Statute of Uses (27 Henry VIII, c. 10, 1535) and the Statute of Wills (32 Henry VIII, c. 1, 1540) had opened up new worlds to the conveyancer, the feoffment still remained the orthodox assurance of the common law. The language of Coke, usually so crabbed and turgid, rises into something like dignified simplicity as he speaks of its powers. The feoffment is “the ancient and the most necessary conveyance, both for that it is solemn and public, and therefore best remembered and proved, and also for that it cleareth all disseisins, abatements, intrusions and other wrongful or defeasible estates.” Coke speaks of Ephron as enfeoffing Abraham of the field of Machpelah; being, apparently, of opinion that the mediæval feoffment was a direct descendant of the ceremonies employed on that occasion. Without entering into this interesting antiquarian speculation, it may be sufficient to say, that the feoffment is essential to the feudal view of a freehold estate, which is, that it is an interest in land of which the holder is seised, i. e., corporeally possessed, by virtue of a gift from a superior. A feoffment is, as the language of mediæval writers warrants us in saying, a livery (or delivery) of seisin, infeudare, to give one a feud, and therefore feoffment is properly donatio feudi (the gift of a fee).<sup>x</sup> It is the most ancient method of conveyance, the most solemn and public, and therefore the most easily remembered and proved. And it may properly be defined, the gift of any corporeal hereditament to another. He that so gives, or enfeoffs, is called the feoffor; and the person enfeoffed is denominated the feoffee.

This is plainly derived from, or is indeed itself the very mode of the ancient feudal donation; for though it may be performed by the word, "enfeoff" or "grant," yet the aptest word of feoffment is "do or dedi."<sup>y</sup> And it is still directed and governed by the same feudal rules; insomuch that the principal rule relating to the extent and effect of the feudal grant, "tenor est qui legem dat feudo (it is the condition or tenor of the deed which gives validity to a fee)," is, in other words, become the maxim of our law with relation to feoffments, "modus legem dat donationi (measure gives validity to the grant)."<sup>z</sup> And therefore as in pure feudal donations the lord, from whom the feud moved, must expressly limit and declare the continuance or quantity of estate which he meant to confer, "ne quis plus donasse præsumatur, quam in donatione expresserit (lest anyone be presumed to have given more than is expressed in the donation)";<sup>a</sup> so, if one grants by feoffment lands or tenements to another, and limits or expresses no estate, the grantee (due ceremonies of law being performed), hath barely an estate for life.<sup>b</sup> For, as the personal abilities of

i. e., an actual corporeal transfer of possession. By the common law, no documentary evidence was necessary to render a feoffment valid; although from very early times prudence suggested that the transaction should be recorded in a subsequently executed charter or deed. But, though no written conveyance was necessary, it was necessary that the livery should be intended to pass a freehold tenement, and if it was intended to pass more than a life estate, the appropriate words of inheritance had to be added. Neither the copyholder nor the tenant for years can convey or take, as such, by feoffment; nor can any interest less than an estate in possession—e. g., an equitable interest, a servitude or a remainder—pass by feoffment. On the other hand, the feoffee were originally presumed to be the immediate or principal inducements to the feoffment, the feoffee's estate ought to be confined to his person and subsist only for his life: unless the feoffor, by express provision [<sup>311</sup>] in the creation and constitution of the estate, hath given it a longer continuance. These express provisions are indeed generally made; for this was for ages the only conveyance, whereby our ancestors were wont to create an estate in fee simple,<sup>c</sup> by giving the land to the feoffee, to hold to him and his heirs forever; though it serves equally well to convey any other estate of freehold.<sup>d 11</sup> until the "tortious" operation of a feoffment was abolished in 1845, every feoffment operated to confer an estate, albeit the feoffor had no lawful title. For, if the feoffor were actually seised, his seisin at least passed; if he were not, he could not, in fact, deliver seisin.

At the present time, it must be confessed, the feoffment plays but a small part in conveyancing. The blows inflicted on its popularity by the statutes of Henry VIII, which rendered the secret conveyance at last possible, were followed by other attacks. The Statute of Frauds (29 Car. II, c. 3, 1677) provided that interests in land created by "livery and seisin" only, without writing, should be taken to have the force and effect of estates at will only; and this provision was supplemented by the act to amend the law of real property, which rendered all feoffments void at law unless evidenced by deed. Thus the charter, which had previously been a mere optional means of proving the existence of a feoffment, became, in fact, the important part of the conveyance, while the livery of seisin sank into a mere solemnity. From the operation of the act of 1845 was, however, excepted the case of a feoffment by an infant under a special custom; and of this exception use is now occasionally made, when an infant desires to convey gavelkind lands. In other cases, a formal livery of seisin would merely add an element of publicity to a conveyance which it may be desired to keep secret. But it is worthy of note that the disuse of the feoffment is largely responsible for the agitation in favor of registration of title; although a Land Registry is not by any means the same thing as a Register of Seisins.—JENKS, Modern Land Law, 299. See, also, Digby, Hist. Real Prop. (5th ed.), 144 ff; Jenks, Short Hist. of Eng. Law, 106 ff., 259.

In some of the American states feoffment with livery of seisin is expressly abolished, and in many of them it is declared by statute to be unnecessary. 1 Stimson, Am. Stat. Law, § 1470.

<sup>11</sup> Freehold by wrong.—In several American editions this sentence is made to convey a wrong meaning by printing "estate or freehold." The feoffment could not convey an estate not of freehold. Even if made by a tarmor

§ 427. (i) Feudal investiture.—But by the mere words of the deed the feoffment is by no means perfected; there remains a very material ceremony to be performed, called livery of seisin; without which the feoffee has but a mere estate at will.* This livery of seisin is no other than the pure feudal investiture, or delivery of corporal possession of the land or tenement; which was held

or other person who had no freehold in himself but simply a possession, its operation was to give the feoffee a “freehold by wrong” or “tortious freehold,” while it never gave a term of years or estate at will or sufferance.

This is not an abstruse and technical doctrine, unintelligible by the laity and devised by feudal tyrants to oppress the laity. It is simply the consequence of the very nature of the feoffment as the delivery of the land itself, and not of an estate in the land. By such a transfer the feoffee took presumptively the freehold (liberum tenementum) of the land, for the reason which Blackstone has stated in another work: “Since no one at common law was said to have or to be in possession of land, unless it were conveyed to him by the livery of seisin, which gave him the corporal investiture and bodily occupation thereof; and this ceremony of delivering seisin could not convey a less interest than for term of life. For as it is observed by St. Germain (Dr. & Stud. Dial. 2, c. 22) ‘the possession of the land is after the law of England called the frank-tenement or freehold.’” (Blackstone, Law Tracts, i. 140.) Therefore, as Blackstone says in the same place, he that enjoys an estate for years is not said to be possessed of the land, but only of his term of years. (Blackstone, Law Tracts, i, 140.) The termor’s possession of the land in fact enables him to transfer it in fact to another person, but that transfer will not make the new possessor a termor. It is not an assignment of the term, for that must be effected in a different mode.

There is indeed an anomaly here, in allowing a freehold even “by wrong” to be given by the feoffment of one who has not a freehold himself: seisin to be given by one who has never received it. We find a similar anomaly in other rules respecting the termor’s estate. He cannot take seisin himself, yet may take it for the benefit of the next estate of freehold: and this estate of freehold will be immediately created and vested in the freehold tenant during the continuance of the term, and yet will be treated for many purposes as a remainder after the term. (2 Comm. *164, *166.) The only explanation of these anomalies is to be found in the fact that seisin originally meant possession as an actual fact, and of chattels as well as land: and that the feoffment was at first the actual transfer of possession of the land itself, without reference to any “estate.” When seisin afterwards became a technical term for possession of certain kinds of estate only, it was too late to change the legal phraseology which had become fixed by usage.—HAMMOND.

absolutely necessary to complete the donation. "Nam feudum sine investitura nullo modo constitui potuit (for a fee can in nowise be perfected without investiture)";† and an estate was then only perfect, when, as Fleta expresses it in our law, "fit juris et seisinæ conjunctio (there is a conjunction of law and seisin)."‡

Investitures, in their original rise, were probably intended to demonstrate in conquered countries the actual possession of the lord; and that he did not grant a bare litigious right, which the soldier was ill-qualified to prosecute, but a peaceable and firm possession. And, at a time when writing was seldom practiced, a mere oral gift, at a distance from the spot that was given, was not likely to be either long or accurately retained in the memory of bystanders, who were very little interested in the grant. Afterwards they were retained as a public and notorious act, that the country might take notice of and testify the transfer of the estate; and that such, as claimed title by other means, might know against whom to bring their actions.

In all well-governed nations, some notoriety of this kind has been ever held requisite, in order to acquire and ascertain [312] the property of lands. In the Roman law plenum dominium (absolute ownership) was not said to subsist, unless where a man had both the right, and the corporal possession; which possession could not be acquired without both an actual intention to possess, and an actual seisin, or entry into the premises, or part of them in the name of the whole.‡ And even in ecclesiastical promotions, where the freehold passes to the person promoted, corporal possession is required at this day, to vest the property completely in the new proprietor; who, according to the distinction of canonists,† acquires

But it is not to be understood that he who wishes to take possession must walk over every clod, for it is enough if he enter on any part of the land.) (Ff. 41. 2, 3.) And again: traditionibus dominia rerum, non nudis pactis, transferuntur (the ownership of a thing is transferred by delivery, not by mere agreement). (Cod. 2, 3. 20.)

the jus ad rem (a right to the thing), or inchoate and imperfect right, by nomination and institution; but not the jus in re (a right in the thing), or complete and full right, unless by corporal possession. Therefore, in dignities possession is given by installment; in rectories and vicarages by induction, without which no temporal rights accrue to the minister, though every ecclesiastical power is vested in him by institution. So, also, even in descents of lands, by our law, which are cast on the heir by act of the law itself, the heir has not plenum dominium, or full and complete ownership, till he has made an actual corporal entry into the lands: for if he dies before entry made, his heir shall not be entitled to take the possession, but the heir of the person who was last actually seised.<sup>k</sup> It is not, therefore, only a mere right to enter, but the actual entry, that makes a man complete owner; so as to transmit the inheritance to his own heirs: non jus, sed seisinā, facit stipitem (not right, but seisin, makes the stock).<sup>l</sup>

§ 428. (ii) Symbolical delivery of possession.—Yet, the corporal tradition of lands being sometimes inconvenient, a symbolical delivery of possession was in many cases anciently allowed; by transferring something near at hand, in the presence of credible witnesses, which by agreement should serve to represent the very thing designed to be conveyed; and an occupancy of this sign or symbol was permitted [313] as equivalent to occupancy of the land itself. Among the Jews we find the evidence of a purchase thus defined in the book of Ruth:<sup>m</sup> “now this was the manner in former time in Israel, concerning redeeming and concerning changing, for to confirm all things: a man plucked off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbor; and this was a testimony in Israel.” Among the ancient Goths and Swedes, contracts for the sale of lands were made in the presence of witnesses who extended the cloak of the buyer, while the seller cast a clod of the land into it, in order to give possession; and a staff or wand was also delivered from the vendor to the vendee, which passed through the hands of the witnesses.<sup>n</sup> With our Saxon ancestors the delivery of a turf was a necessary solemnity, to establish the conveyance of lands.<sup>o</sup>

And, to this day, the conveyance of our copyhold estates is usually made from the seller to the lord or his steward by delivery of a rod or verge, and then from the lord to the purchaser, by redelivery of the same in the presence of a jury of tenants.

§ 429. (iii) Conveyances in writing.—Conveyances in writing were the last and most refined improvement. The mere delivery of possession, either actual or symbolical, depending on the ocular testimony and remembrance of the witnesses, was liable to be forgotten or misrepresented, and became frequently incapable of proof. Besides the new occasions and necessities, introduced by the advancement of commerce, required means to be devised of charging and encumbering estates, and of making them liable to a multitude of conditions and minute designations for the purposes of raising money, without an absolute sale of the land; and sometimes the like proceedings were found useful in order to make a decent and competent provision for the numerous branches of a family, and for other domestic views. None of which could be effected by a mere, simple, corporal transfer of the soil from one man to another, which was principally calculated for conveying an absolute unlimited dominion. Written <sup>[314]</sup> deeds were therefore introduced, in order to specify and perpetuate the peculiar purposes of the party who conveyed: yet still, for a very long series of years, they were never made use of, but in company with the more ancient and notorious method of transfer, by delivery of corporal possession.

§ 430. (iv) Livery of seisin.—Livery of seisin, by the common law, is necessary to be made upon every grant of an estate of freehold in hereditaments corporeal, whether of inheritance or for life only. In hereditaments incorporeal it is impossible to be made; for they are not the object of the senses: and in leases for years, or other chattel interests, it is not necessary. In leases for years, indeed, an actual entry is necessary, to vest the estate in the lessee: for the bare lease gives him only a right to enter, which is called his interest in the term, or interesse termini: and, when he enters in pursuance of that right, he is then and not before in possession of his term, and complete tenant for years.<sup>9</sup> This entry by the tenant himself serves the purpose of notoriety, as well as livery of seisin from the grantor could have done; which it would have been improper to have given in this case, because that solemnity is appropriated to the conveyance of a freehold. And this is one reason why freeholds cannot be made to commence in futuro (at a future day), because they cannot (at the common law) be made but by livery of seisin; which livery, being an actual manual tradition of the land, must take effect in præsentî (immediately), or not at all.<sup>9</sup>

On the creation of a freehold remainder, at one and the same time with a particular estate for years, we have before seen that at the common law livery must be made to the particular tenant.<sup>9</sup> But if such a remainder be created afterwards, expectant on a lease for years now in being, the livery must not be made to the lessee for years, for then it operates nothing; "nam quod semel meum est, amplius meum esse non potest (for what is once mine cannot be mine more fully),"<sup>9</sup> but it must be made to the remainderman [315] himself, by consent of the lessee for years: for without his consent no livery of the possession can be given; partly because such forcible livery would be an ejectionment of the tenant from his term, and partly for the reasons before given<sup>9</sup> for introducing the doctrine of attornments.

§ 431. (aa) Livery in deed.—Livery of seisin is either in deed, or in law. Livery in deed is thus performed. The feoffor, lessor, or his attorney, together with the feoffee, lessee, or his attorney (for this may as effectually be done by deputy or attorney, as by the principals themselves in person) come to the land, or to the house; and there, in the presence of witnesses, declare the contents of the feoffment or lease, on which livery is to be made. And then the feoffor, if it be of land, doth deliver to the feoffee, all other persons being out of the ground, a clod or turf, or a twig or bough there growing, with words to this effect. "I deliver these to you in the name of seisin of all the lands and tenements contained in this deed." But if it be of a house, the feoffor must take the ring, or latch of the door, the house being quite empty, and deliver it to the feoffee in the same form; and then the feoffee must enter alone, and shut to the door, and then open it, and let in the others.<sup>w</sup> If the conveyance or feoffment be of divers lands, lying scattered in one and the same county, then in the feoffor's possession, livery of seisin of any parcel, in the name of the rest, sufficeth for all;<sup>x</sup> but if they be in several counties, there must be as many liveries as there are counties. For, if the title to these lands comes to be disputed, there must be as many trials as there are counties, and the jury of one county are no judges of the notoriety of a fact in another. Besides, anciently this seisin was obliged to be delivered coram paribus de vicineto, before the peers or freeholders of the neighborhood, who attested such delivery in the body or on the back of the deed; according to the rule of the feudal law,<sup>y</sup> pares debent interesse investiturae feudi, et non alii (the peers, and no others, should be present at the investiture of the fee): for which this reason is expressly given; because [<sup>316</sup>] the peers or vassals of the lord, being bound by their oath of fealty, will take care that no fraud be committed to his prejudice, which strangers might be apt to connive at. And though, afterwards, the ocular attestation of the pares was held unnecessary, and livery might be made before any credible witnesses, yet the trial, in case it was disputed (like that of all other attestations),<sup>z</sup> was still reserved to the pares or jury of the county.<sup>a</sup> Also, if the lands be out on lease, though all lie in the same county, there must be as many liveries as there are tenants: because no livery can be made in this case, but by the consent of the particular tenant; and the consent of one will not bind the rest.<sup>b</sup> And in all these cases it is prudent, and usual, to indorse the livery of seisin on the back of the deed, specifying the manner, place, and time of making it; together with the names of the witnesses.<sup>c</sup> And thus much for livery in deed.

§ 432. (bb) Livery in law.—Livery in law is where the same is not made on the land, but in sight of it only; the feoffor saying to the feoffee, "I give you yonder land; enter and take possession." Here, if the feoffee enters during the life of the feoffor, it is a good livery, but not otherwise; unless he dares not enter, through fear of his life or bodily harm: and then his continual claim, made yearly, in due form of law, as near as possible to the lands,<sup>d</sup> will suffice without an entry.<sup>e</sup> This livery in law cannot, however, be given or received by attorney, but only by the parties themselves.<sup>f</sup>

§ 433. (b) Gifts.—The conveyance by gift, donatio, is properly applied to the creation of an estate-tail, as feoffment is to that of an estate in fee, and lease to that of an estate for life or years. It differs in nothing from a feoffment, but in the nature of the estate passing by it: for the operative words of conveyance in this case are do or dedi;<sup>g</sup> and gifts in tail are equally imperfect without livery of seisin, as feoffments in fee simple.<sup>h</sup> [317] And this is the only distinction that Littleton seems to take, when he says,<sup>i</sup> "it is to be understood that there is feoffor and feoffee, donor and donee, lessor and lessee"; viz., feoffor is applied to a feoffment in fee simple, donor to a gift in tail, and lessor to a lease for life, or for years, or at will. In common acceptance gifts are frequently confounded with the next species of deeds: which are, ditament; but an incorporeal hereditament, which is the right itself to a thing, or inherent in the person, does not admit of delivery)." These, therefore, pass merely by the delivery of the deed. And in seigniories, or reversions of lands, such grant, together with the attornment of the tenant (while attornments were requisite) were held to be of equal notoriety with, and therefore equivalent to, a feoffment and livery of lands in immediate possession. It therefore differs but little from a feoffment, except in its subject matter: for the operative words therein commonly used are dedi et concessi, "have given and granted."

§ 435. (d) Leases.—A lease is properly a conveyance of any lands or tenements (usually in consideration of rent or other annual recompense) made for life, for years or at will, but always for a less time than the lessor hath in the premises: for if it be for the whole interest, it is more properly an assignment than a lease. The usual words of operation in it are, "demise, grant, and to farm let; dimisi, concessi, et ad firmam [318] tradidi." Farm, or feorme, is an old Saxon word signifying provisions:<sup>a</sup> and it came to be used instead of rent or render, because anciently the greater part of rents were reserved in provisions; in corn, in poultry, and the like; till the use of money became more frequent. So that a farmer, firmarius, was one who held his lands upon payment of a rent or feorme: though at present, by a gradual departure from the original sense, the word "farm" is brought to signify the very estate or lands so held upon farm or rent. By this conveyance an estate for life, for years, or at will, may be created, either in corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments; though livery of seisin is indeed incident and necessary to one species of leases, viz., leases for life of corporeal hereditaments; but to no other.

§ 436. (i) Right to make leases.—Whatever restriction, by the severity of the feudal law, might in times of very high antiquity be observed with regard to leases; yet by the common law, as it has stood for many centuries, all persons seised of any estate might let leases to endure so long as their own interest lasted, but no longer. Therefore, tenant in fee simple might let leases of any duration; for he hath the whole interest: but tenant in tail, or tenant for life, could make no leases which should bind the issue in tail or reversioner; nor could a husband, seised jure uxoris (in right of his wife), make a firm or valid lease for any longer term than the joint lives of himself and his wife, for then his interest expired. Yet some tenants for life, where the fee simple was in abeyance, might (with the concurrence of such as have the guardianship of the fee) make leases of equal duration with those granted by tenants in fee simple, such as parsons and vicars with consent of the patron and ordinary.<sup>o</sup> So, also, bishops, and deans, and such other sole ecclesiastical corporations as are seised of the fee simple of lands in their corporate right, might, with the concurrence and confirmation of such persons as the law requires, have made leases for years, or for life, estates in tail, or in fee, without any limitation or control. And corporations aggregate [319] might have made what estates they pleased, without the confirmation of any other person whatsoever. Whereas now, by several statutes, this power where it was unreasonable, and might be made an ill use of, is restrained; and, where in the other cases the restraint by the common law seemed too hard, it is in some measure removed. The former statutes are called the restraining, the latter the enabling statute. We will take a view of them all, in order of time.

§ 437. (aa) Enabling statute of 32 Henry VIII.—And first the enabling statute, 32 Hen. VIII, c. 28 (Leaseholds, 1540), empowers three manner of persons to make leases, to endure for three lives or one and twenty years, which could not do so before. As, first, tenant in tail may by such leases bind his issue in tail, but not those in remainder or reversion. Secondly, a husband seised in right of his wife, in fee simple or fee-tail, provided the wife joins in such lease, may bind her and her heirs thereby. Lastly, all persons seised of an estate of fee simple in right of their churches, which extends not to parsons and vicars, may (without the concurrence of any other person) bind their successors. But then there must many requisites be observed, which the statute specifies, otherwise such leases are not binding.<sup>p</sup> 1. The lease must be by indenture; and not by deed poll, or by parol. 2. It must begin from the making, or day of the making, and not at any greater distance of time. 3. If there be any old lease in being, it must be first absolutely surrendered, or be within a year of expiring. 4. It must be either for twenty-one years, or three lives; and not for both.<sup>12</sup> 5. It must not exceed the term of three lives, or twenty-one years, but may be for a shorter term. 6. It must be of corporeal hereditaments, and not of such things as lie merely in grant; for no rent can be reserved thereout by the common law, as the lessor cannot resort to them to distrain.<sup>a</sup> 7. It must be of [320] lands and tenements most commonly letten for twenty years past; so that if they have been let for above half the time (or eleven years out of the twenty) either for life, for years, at will, or by copy of court roll, it is sufficient. 8. The most usual and customary feorm or rent, for twenty years past, must be reserved yearly on such lease. 9. Such leases must not be made without impeachment of waste. These are the guards, imposed by the statute (which was avowedly made for the security of farmers and the consequent improvement of tillage) to prevent unreasonable abuses, in prejudice of the issue, the wife, or the successor, of the reasonable indulgence here given.

§ 438. (bb) Disabling statutes.—Next follows, in order of time, the disabling or restraining statute, 1 Eliz., c. 19 (Bishoprics, 1559) (made entirely for the benefit of the successor), which enacts, that all grants by archbishops and bishops (which include even those confirmed by the dean and chapter; the which, however long or unreasonable, were good at common law) other than for the term of one and twenty years or three lives from the making, or without reserving the usual rent, shall be void. Concurrent leases, if confirmed by the dean and chapter, are held to be within the exception of this statute, and therefore valid; provided they do not exceed (together with the lease in being) the term permitted by the act.<sup>r</sup> But, by a saving expressly made, this statute of 1 Eliz. did not extend to grants made by any bishop to the crown; by which means Queen Elizabeth procured many fair possessions to be made over to her by the prelates, either for her own use, or with intent to be granted out again to her favorites, whom she thus gratified without any expense to herself. To prevent which<sup>s</sup> for the future, the statute 1 Jac. I, c. 3 (Leases, 1603), extends the prohibition to grants and leases made to the king, as well as to any of his subjects.

<sup>a</sup> But now by the statute 5 Geo. III, c. 17 (Leases, 1765), a lease of tithes or other incorporeal hereditaments, alone, may be granted by any bishop or any such ecclesiastical or eleemosynary corporation, and the successor shall be entitled to recover the rent by an action of debt, which (in case of a freehold lease) he could not have brought at the common law.

<sup>12</sup> Church leases.—The limitation of leases of church lands to three lives (illustrated so fully by the examples of Archbishop Oswald's leases in Kemble and Thorpe), no doubt had its origin in the law of Justinian. (Nov. vii, c. 3, § 3.) But this cannot be taken as evidence of the general use or knowledge of that law among the Anglo-Saxons. As a matter of general interest to the church, the rule would be made known by its canons to every bishop who recognized a submission to the Roman church.—HAMMOND.

Next comes the statute 13 Eliz., c. 10 (Dilapidations, 1571), explained and enforced by the statutes 14 Eliz., c. 11 & 14 (Leases, 1572), 18 Eliz., c. 11 (Dilapidations, 1576), and 43 Eliz., c. 29 (Leases, 1601), which extend the restrictions laid by [321] the last mentioned statute on bishops, to certain other inferior corporations, both sole and aggregate. From laying all which together we may collect, that all colleges, cathedrals, and other ecclesiastical, or eleemosynary corporations, and all parsons and vicars, are restrained from making any leases of their lands; unless under the following regulations: 1. They must not exceed twenty-one years, or three lives, from the making. 2. The accustomed rent, or more, must be yearly reserved thereon. 3. Houses in corporations, or market towns, may be let for forty years; provided they be not the mansion-houses of the lessors, nor have above ten acres of ground belonging to them: and provided the lessee be bound to keep them in repair: and they may also be aliened in fee simple for lands of equal value in recompense. 4. Where there is an old lease in being, no concurrent lease shall be made, unless where the old one will expire within three years. 5. No lease (by the equity of the statute) shall be made without impeachment of waste.<sup>t</sup>

6. All bonds and covenants tending to frustrate the provisions of the statutes of 13 & 18 Eliz. shall be void.

§ 439. (aaa) Effect of disabling statutes.—Concerning these restrictive statutes there are two observations to be made. First, that they do not, by any construction, enable any persons to make such leases as they were by common law disabled to make. Therefore, a parson, or vicar, though he is restrained from making longer leases than for twenty-one years or three lives, even with the consent of patron and ordinary, yet is not enabled to make any lease at all, so as to bind his successor, without obtaining such consent.<sup>u</sup> Secondly, that though leases contrary to these acts are declared void, yet they are good against the lessor during his life, if he be a sole corporation; and are also good against an aggregate corporation so long as the head of it lives, who is presumed to be the most concerned in interest. For the act was intended for the benefit of the successor only; and no man shall make an advantage of his own wrong.<sup>w</sup>

§ 440. (bbb) College leases.—<sup>[322]</sup> There is yet another restriction with regard to college leases, by statute 18 Eliz., c. 6 (Leases, 1575), which directs, that one-third of the old rent, then paid, should for the future be reserved in wheat or malt, reserving a quarter of wheat for each 6s. 8d., or a quarter of malt for every 5s.; or that the lessees should pay for the same according to the price that wheat and malt should be sold for, in the market next adjoining to the respective colleges, on the market-day before the rent becomes due. This is said <sup>x</sup> to have been an invention of Lord Treasurer Burleigh and Sir Thomas Smith, then principal secretary of state, who, observing how greatly the value of money had sunk, and the price of all provisions risen, by the quantity of bullion imported from the new-found Indies (which effects were likely to increase to a greater degree), devised this method for upholding the revenues of colleges. Their foresight and penetration has in this respect been very apparent: for, though the rent so reserved in corn was at first but one-third of the old rent, or half of what was still reserved in money, yet now the proportion

§ 441. (ccc) Leases of nonresident clergy.—The leases of beneficed clergymen are further restrained, in case of their non-residence, by statutes 13 Eliz., c. 20 (Benefices, 1571), 14 Eliz., c. 11 (Leases, 1572), 18 Eliz., c. 11 (Dilapidations, 1576), and 43 Eliz., c. 9 (Leases, 1601), which direct, that if any beneficed clergyman be absent from his cure above fourscore days in any one year, he shall not only forfeit one year's profit of his benefice, to be distributed among the poor of the parish; but that all leases made by him, of the profits of such benefice, and all covenants and agreements of like nature, shall cease and be void: except in the case of licensed pluralists, who are allowed to demise the living, on which they are nonresident, to their curates only; provided such curates do not absent themselves above [323] forty days in any one year. And thus much for leases, with their several enlargements and restrictions.<sup>7 13</sup>

§ 442. (e) Exchange.—An exchange is a mutual grant of equal interests, the one in consideration of the other. The word "exchange" is so individually requisite and appropriated by law to this case, that it cannot be supplied by any other word or expressed by any circumlocution.<sup>a</sup> The estates exchanged must be equal in quantity;<sup>a</sup> not of value, for that is immaterial, but of interest; as fee simple for fee simple, a lease for twenty years for a lease for twenty years, and the like. And the exchange may be of things that lie either in grant or in livery.<sup>b</sup> But no livery of.

<sup>7</sup> For the other learning relating to leases, which is very curious and diffusive, I must refer the student to 3 Bac. Abridg. 295. (title, Leases and Terms for Years) where the subject is treated in a perspicuous and masterly manner; being supposed to be extracted from a manuscript of Sir Geoffrey Gilbert.

seisin, even in exchanges of freehold, is necessary to perfect the conveyance: for each party stands in the place of the other and occupies his right, and each of them hath already had corporal possession of his own land. But entry must be made on both sides; for, if either party die before entry, the exchange is void, for want of sufficient notoriety.<sup>4</sup> And so, also, if two parsons, by consent of patron and ordinary, exchange their preferments; and the one is presented, instituted, and inducted, and the other is presented, and instituted, but dies before induction; the former shall not keep his new benefice, because the exchange was not completed, and therefore he shall return back to his own.<sup>5</sup> For if, after an exchange of lands or other hereditaments, either party be evicted of those which were taken by him in exchange, through defect of the other's title; he shall return back to the possession of his own, by virtue of the implied warranty contained in all exchanges.<sup>14</sup>

§ 443. (f) Partition.—A partition is when two or more joint tenants, coparceners, or tenants in common, agree to divide the [324] lands so held among them in severalty, each taking a distinct part. Here, as in some instances there is a unity of interest, and in all a unity of possession, it is necessary that they all mutually convey and assure to each other the several estates, which they are to take and enjoy separately. By the common law coparceners, being compellable to make partition, might have made it by parol only; but joint tenants and tenants in common must have done it by deed: and in both cases the conveyance must have been perfected by livery of seisin.<sup>5</sup> And the statutes of 31 Hen. <sup>14</sup> By the Statute of Frauds (1677) an exchange had to be evidenced in writing; and by the Real Property Act of 1845, it must now be by deed in every case except that of an exchange of copyhold. And by the Real Property Act of 1845 an exchange of any tenements or hereditaments made by deed executed after October 1, 1845, does not imply any condition in law. The conveyance by exchange at common law is almost obsolete. In lieu thereof the parties execute mutual conveyances of their respective lands, the one to the other. 1 Stephen's Comm. <sup>15</sup> Partition in United States.—By the English Real Property Act of 1845, partitions of all hereditaments, not being copyhold, made after October 1, 1845, will be void at law, unless made by deed. In most of the American states, co-owners of any kind may partition the property by oral agreement, followed by actual exclusive possession and occupation of their respective portions. Accordingly, when A and B own a tract of land as joint tenants, tenants in common, or owners by the entirety, where husband and wife may convey directly to each other, and agree orally that A shall thereafter own the northern half in severalty and B the southern half, and then each takes possession of his individual pieces and occupies it exclusively, the partition becomes complete. *Wood v. 16 Release and quitclaim.—This has been criticised, by Mr. Sweet and others, as not accurately expressed. The examples given are those of other releases, such as those which pass an estate, pass the right, etc., where Blackstone says nothing of possession; or by saying that tenant at will may take a release, as if Blackstone had required seisin and not possession.

It is conceived that this rule is still in force, although many of our American books speak of land as passing by quitclaims (which is only another name for release) to one who had no interest or possession before. The explanation is that the term "quitclaim deed" is very commonly used, even by lawyers and judges, for a simple deed of conveyance without covenants, as opposed to a warranty deed, or to a deed with covenants against grantor. Such deeds pass the land and its legal possession by virtue of the granting words in them: they do not merely "remit, release, and quitclaim," which presupposes possession in the grantee. If a deed in the latter form be held to pass the title, it can only be by virtue of that loose construction which disregards all words and rules, in order to carry out the understood intention of the parties. Such "equitable constructions" are denials of right, not to the parties themselves, but to the countless unborn litigants whose rights will be taken away or squandered in useless litigation by reason of the precedents thus created. In some cases we find judges already applying to simple deeds of conveyance rules of law that belong only to releases proper, because of this misuse of the term "quitclaim." (See cases collected in Boone on Real Property, § 324, notes 7, 8.)

two joint disseisors, and the disseisee releases to one of them, he shall be sole seised, and shall keep out his former companion: which is the same in effect as if the disseisee had entered, and thereby put an end to the disseisin, and afterwards had enfeoffed one of the disseisors in fee.<sup>p</sup> And hereupon we may observe that when a man has in himself the possession of lands, he must at the common law convey the freehold by feoffment and livery; which makes a notoriety in the country: but if a man has only a right or a future interest, he may convey that right or interest by a mere release to him that is in possession of the land: for the occupancy of the relessee is a matter of sufficient notoriety already.<sup>17</sup>

<sup>17</sup> Quitclaim deeds.—A release, once in very frequent use, judging from the length at which it is treated by Littleton and Coke, is now a comparatively unimportant instrument. Jenks, Mod. Land Law, 344. The quitclaim deed is an outgrowth of the common-law release. United States v. California & O. Land Co., 148 U. S. 31, 37 L. Ed. 354, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 458; Blacksmith v. Fellows, 7 N. Y. 401, 422; Lewis v. Shearer, 189 Ill. 184, 59 N. E. 580; Wholey v. Cavanaugh, 88 Cal. 132, 25 Pac. 1112; State v. Kemmerer, 14 S. D. 169, 84 N. W. 771; Bryan v. Eason, 147 N. C. 284, 61 S. E. 71; Mosier v. Momson, 13 Okl. 41, 74 Pac. 905. Its operative words, like those of the release, are "remise, release and forever quitclaim." It derives its names from the last of these, which is thus explained. "The curious term quietum clamare, the origin of our 'to cry quits,' is extremely common, especially when the right that is to be transferred is an adverse right; for example, a disseisee will quitclaim his disseisor. Very possibly in the past such transactions have been effected without written instruments. We often read of the transfer of a rod in connection with a quitclaim, and the term itself may point to some formal renunciatory cry." 2 Pollock & Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 91. The quitclaim has been enlarged, in most jurisdictions, into a primary or original conveyance. United States v. California & O. Land Co., 148 U. S. 31, 37 L. Ed. 354, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 458; Hall's Lessee v. Ashby, 9 Ohio, 96, 34 Am. Dec. 424; Bryan v. Eason, 147 N. C. 284, 61 S. E. 71; Doe v. Reed, 4 Scam. (5 Ill.) 117, 38 Am. Dec. 124; Kyle v. Kavanagh, 103 Mass. 356, 4 Am. Rep. 560. The quitclaim deed conveys whatever interest the grantor had to convey at the time. It likewise transfers as complete a title as any other form of conveyance. Pleasants v. Blodgett, 39 Neb. 741, 42 Am. St. Rep. 624, 58 N. W. 423; Moelle v. Sherwood, 148 U. S. 21, 37 L. Ed. 350, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426; Bryan v. Eason, 147 N. C. 284, 61 S. E. 71. It does not, however, imply any covenant of title. French v. Spencer, 21 How. (U. S.) 228, 16 L. Ed. 97; Wilhelm v. Wilken, 149 N. Y. 447, 52 Am. St. Rep. 743, 32 L. R. A. 370, 44 N. E. 82; Gage v.

§ 446. (b) Confirmation. — A confirmation is of a nature nearly allied to a release. Sir Edward Coke defines it<sup>a</sup> to be a conveyance of an estate or right in esse, whereby a voidable estate is made sure and unavoidable, or whereby a particular estate is increased: and the words of making it are these, “have given, granted, ratified, approved, and confirmed.”<sup>r</sup> An instance of the first branch of the definition is, if tenant for life leaseth for forty years, and dieth during that term; here the lease for years is voidable by him in reversion: yet, if he [326] hath confirmed the estate of the lessee for years, before the death of tenant for life, it is no longer voidable but sure.<sup>s</sup> The latter branch, or that which tends to the increase of a particular estate, is the same in all respects with that species of release, which operates by way of enlargement.<sup>18</sup>

Formerly, and still in a few states, the grantee of a quitclaim deed was put upon inquiry by the very nature of deed as to any outstanding defects in the title. But the receipt of a quitclaim deed does not of itself prevent the grantee from showing that he is a bona fide purchaser. Moelle v. Sherwood, 148 U. S. 21, 37 L. Ed. 350, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426. And in some states an innocent purchaser for value by quitclaim has the benefit of his position as such purchaser. Stanley v. Schwalby, 162 U. S. 255, 277, 40 L. Ed. 960, 16 Sup. Ct. <sup>18</sup> Confirmation.—A confirmation cannot give validity to a deed absolutely void. Bradley v. Walker, 138 N. Y. 291, 297, 33 N. E. 1079; Barr v. Schroeder, 32 Cal. 609. It is often supplied by a quitclaim deed, yet sometimes distinguished therefrom. For instance, it has been held that a patent from the United States government, confirming the Mexican title to certain lands in territory acquired from Mexico, and releasing that of the United States, is a confirmation rather than a quitclaim. Boquillas Land & C. Co. v. Curtis, 213 U. S. 339, 344, 53 L. Ed. 822, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493, quoting and adopting the definition in Gilbert, Tenures, p. 75. While a confirmation is a conveyance, secondary in form, yet modern courts, in seeking to carry out the intention of the parties, if reasonably possible, will construe an instrument in form a deed of confirmation as a grant, or a bargain and sale, or some other instru-

§ 447. (c) Surrender.—A surrender, sursumredditio, or rendering up, is of a nature directly opposite to a release; for, as that operates by the greater estate's descending upon the less, a surrender is the falling of a less estate into a greater. It is defined,† a yielding up of an estate for life or years to him that hath the immediate reversion or remainder, wherein the particular estate may merge or drown, by mutual agreement between them. It is done by these words, "hath surrendered, granted, and yielded up." The surrenderor must be in possession;‡ and the surrenderee must have a higher estate, in which the estate surrendered may merge: therefore, tenant for life cannot surrender to him in remainder for years.¶ In a surrender there is no occasion for livery of seisin;‡ for there is a privity of estate between the surrenderor, and the surrenderee; the one's particular estate and the other's remainder are one and the same estate; and livery having been once made at the creation of it, there is no necessity for having it afterwards. And, for the same reason, no livery is required on a release or confirmation in fee to tenant for years or at will, though a freehold thereby passes: since the reversion of the lessor, or confirmor, and the particular estate of the lessee, or confirmer, are one and the same estate: and where there is already a possession, derived from such a privity of estate, any further delivery of possession would be vain and nugatory.‡<sup>19</sup>

ment sufficient to pass the title originally. Heath v. Hewitt, 127 N. Y. 166, 24 Am. St. Rep. 438, 13 L. R. A. 46, 27 N. E. 959; Fautleroy v. Dunn, 3 B. Mon. (Ky.) 594; 2 Reeves, Real Prop., 1388.

<sup>19</sup> Surrender: express and implied.—A surrender, or more particularly, an express surrender, described above by Blackstone, is a yielding up of possession of an estate of life or years to him who has the immediate reversion or remainder, by which the lesser estate is merged in the greater by mutual agreement. Welcome v. Hess, 90 Cal. 507, 25 Am. St. Rep. 145, 27 Pac. 369; Parsons & Sweeney Oil Co. v. McCormick, 68 W. Va. 604, 70 S. E. 371; Bailey v. Wells, 8 Wis. 141, 158, 76 Am. Dec. 233; Young v. Berman, 96 Ark. 78, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 977, 131 S. W. 62. A quitclaim deed now frequently takes the place of the deed of surrender.

By the Statute of Frauds (1677), no lease, except of copyhold, could be surrendered otherwise than by deed or note in writing; and by the Real Property

§ 448. (d) Assignment.—An assignment is properly a transfer, or making over to another, of the right one has in any estate; but it is usually applied to an estate for life or years. And it differs from a lease only in this; that by a lease one grants an interest less <sup>[327]</sup> than his own, reserving to himself a reversion; in assignments he parts with the whole property, and the assignee stands to all intents and purposes in the place of the assignor.<sup>20</sup>

§ 449. (e) Defeasance.—A defeasance is a collateral deed, made at the same time with a feoffment or other conveyance, containing certain conditions, upon the performance of which the estate then created may be defeated* or totally undone. And in

Act of 1845, a surrender of any interest which had to be in writing, is void unless made by deed.

An implied surrender, or surrender by operation of law, occurs when an estate incompatible with the existing estate is accepted, or the lessee takes a new lease of the same lands, or the owner of a particular estate has been a party to some act the validity of which he is by law afterwards estopped from disputing and which would not be valid if his particular estate had continued to exist. Bouvier, Law Dict., Rawle's 3d revision; Livingston v. Potts, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 28; Haycock v. Johnston, 97 Minn. 289, 114 Am. St. Rep. 715, 106 N. W. 304.

<sup>20</sup> Assignment.—The lessee may alienate his term like any other right of property. He may do this either by way of underlease or assignment. An underlease is where a lessee makes a lease for a shorter term than he himself holds, leaving thereby a reversion, of however short a duration, in himself. In its legal attributes an underlease in no way differs from a lease. The grant of the whole term by the lessee is called an assignment. Digby, Hist. Law Real Prop. (5th ed.), 414; Davis v. Vidal, 105 Tex. 444, 151 S. W. 290. Under the Statute of Frauds (1677), assignments had to be in writing, and the Real Property Act, 1845, requires them to be by deed. An assignment is used in our modern law to include a transfer of a mortgage, a judgment lien, a rent, an easement, or any other outstanding claim or encumbrance on realty. 2 Reeves, Real Prop., 1389; Brown v. Smith, 13 N. D. 580, 102 N. W. 171; Scott v. Blades Lumber Co., 144 N. C. 44, 56 S. E. 548. The operative words of an assignment are "assign, transfer, and set over," but like other deeds it is construed according to the intent of the parties. The New York statute, for instance, declares: "Every instrument creating, transferring, assigning or surrendering an estate or interest in real property must be construed according to the intent of the parties, so far as such intent can be gathered from the whole instrument, and is consistent with the rules of law." Real Prop. L., § 240, originally 1 B. S. 748, § 2.—REEVES, 2 Real Prop., 1389.

this manner mortgages were in former times usually made; the mortgagor enfeoffing the mortgagee, and he at the same time executing a deed of defeasance, whereby the feoffment was rendered void on repayment of the money borrowed at a certain day. And this, when executed at the same time with the original feoffment, was considered as part of it by the ancient law;<sup>a</sup> and, therefore only, indulged: no subsequent secret revocation of a solemn conveyance, executed by livery of seisin, being allowed in those days of simplicity and truth;<sup>21</sup> though, when uses were afterwards introduced, a revocation of such uses was permitted by the courts of equity. But things that were merely executory, or to be completed by matter subsequent (as rents, of which no seisin could be had till the time of payment; and so, also, annuities, conditions, war-

21 Revocation and resulting uses.—It was not the “solemnity” of the act, or the simplicity and truth of the actors, that made the distinction, but the very nature of the feoffment as a transfer of the land itself, and not of a mere estate in it. The land having actually passed by the feoffment, no defeasance or other agreement between the parties could change the effect of this transfer. But when a use was created, it might be subsequently revoked or modified, and so of all instruments that merely transferred an estate in the land and not the land itself. Coke has well explained this by calling the feoffment an executed conveyance. (Co. Litt. 204 a.) For the same reason, apparently, if a feoffment be made, or a fine be levied, or recovery be suffered, without consideration, and no uses be expressed, the use results to the feoffor and his heirs. But if any uses be expressed, it shall be to those uses, though no consideration be had; and herein is the difference between raising uses by fine, feoffment, or other conveyance operating by transmutation of possession and uses raised by covenant; for, upon the first, if no uses were expressed, it is equity that assigns the feoffor to have the resulting use; by the law, the feoffor has parted with all his interest (see Cave v. Holford, 3 Ves. 667), but where he expresses uses there can be no equity in giving him the use against his own will. (See Gilbert on Uses, c. 222.) On the other hand, in case of a covenant there can be no use without a consideration; for the covenantee in such case can have no right by law, and there is no reason why equity should give him the use. (And see Calthrop's Case, Moor, 101; Stephen's Case, 1 Leon, 138; Jenkins' Case, Cent. 6, 36.) Perhaps no better illustration of this difference between the operation of a feoffment and that of the conveyance of a use can be given, than the well-known rule that a feoffment to a man and his intended wife before marriage will give the entire land to the husband alone, while the conveyance to the use of him and his intended wife will operate in favor of both of them.—HAMMOND.

ranties, and the like), were always liable to be recalled by defeasances made subsequent to the time of their creation.<sup>b 22</sup>

§ 450. (3) Conveyances under the statute of uses.—There yet remain to be spoken of some few conveyances, which have their force and operation by virtue of the statute of uses.

§ 451. (a) Uses and trusts.—Uses and trusts are in their original of a nature very similar, or rather exactly the same: answering more to the fideicommissum (trust) than the usufructus (usufruct) of the civil law; which latter was the temporary right of using a thing, without having the ultimate property or full dominion of the substance.<sup>c</sup> But the fideicommissum, which usually was created by will, was the disposal of an inheritance to one, in confidence that he [328] should convey it or dispose of the profits at the will of another. And it was the business of a particular magistrate, the prætor fideicommissarius (trust prætor), instituted

<sup>22</sup> Defeasance.—Defeasances of land are now of rare occurrence; the practice in modern times being (as in the case of mortgages) to include in the deed only the conveyance of the land to the alienee, and the conditions (if any) to which it is to be subject. When those conditions are fulfilled, the alienee is bound to reconvey. 1 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 420. The modern mortgage originated in an absolute conveyance, accompanied by a separate deed, in which it was provided that, if the money loaned were repaid or the specified conditions otherwise complied with, the conveyance should become null and void. This accompanying deed was a defeasance. Naturally, in the unfolding of landed security for debt, the defeasance and conveyance were combined into one document, and took the form of the modern mortgage. Tersely, then, a deed of defeasance started as a separate instrument, and has found its usual office of to-day in the defeasance clause of a mortgage. 2 Reeves, Real Prop., 1390. Courts regard with disfavor conditions and defeasances which are calculated to prevent or defeat the absolute resting of titles. Nevertheless, where the condition or defeasance is clear and explicit, they do not hesitate to give effect to the intention of the parties. Where, then, a deed of land conveyed in consideration of a contract for support, and a stipulation for the avoidance of the agreement in case of failure to perform the contract embraced in a separate instrument form parts of one transaction, the stipulation for avoidance constitutes a defeasance. Epperson v. Epperson, 108 Va. 471, 62 S. E. 344.

by Augustus, to enforce the observance of this confidence.<sup>d 23</sup> So that the right thereby given was looked upon as a vested right, and entitled to a remedy from a court of justice; which occasioned that known division of rights by the Roman law, into jus legitimum, a legal right, which was remedied by the ordinary course of law; jus fiduciarium, a right in trust, for which there was a remedy in conscience; and jus precarium, a right in courtesy, for which the remedy was only by entreaty or request.* In our law, a use might be ranked under the rights of the second kind; being a confidence reposed in another who was tenant of the land, or terre-tenant, that he should dispose of the land according to the intentions of cestuy que use, or him to whose use it was granted, and suffer him to take the profits.<sup>f 24</sup> As, if a feoffment was made

<sup>23</sup> Nay, what is more, the emperors were able, by means of their jurisdiction, to call into being a number of institutions entirely unknown to the previous law. The most important of these was the "fideicommissum." Down to Augustus the only kind of bequest recognized by Roman law was one made in accordance with the strict, formal requirements of a legatum. The Emperor Augustus was the first to introduce into the administration of justice the principle that, where a testator requested a person who was benefited under his will to make over the benefit he received to a third party—this is the meaning of fideicommissum—the request should be legally enforceable, even though it had been made without any form whatever. Augustus entrusted the consuls with the exercise of the new jurisdiction; after Titus, a special prætor fideicommissarius was appointed to adjudicate on such matters extra ordinem as the emperor's delegate, and in the provinces the like function was imposed on the governors. In this way the fideicommissum, or informal bequest, came into use as a legal institution, and such was its subsequent development that it gradually revolutionized the whole Roman law of bequests, and even—when "universal" fideicommissa were introduced—the whole Roman law of succession of the older type.—SOHM, Institutes of Roman Law (trans. by Ledlie, 3d ed.), 108.

<sup>24</sup> Meaning of cestui que use and cestui que trust.—"What is the plural of cestui que trust? Some write cestuis que trust, others cestui que trusts, and some cestuis que trustent. The first is probably the best, but there is not much to choose between it and the second; the third is hopelessly wrong. The present writer is not aware when cestui que trust was introduced into our language. It is, of course, bastard Norman-French, and was probably introduced in the seventeenth century. It is obviously coined after the pattern of cestui to A and his heirs, to the use of (or in trust for) B and his heirs; here at the common law A the terre-tenant, had the legal property and possession of the land, but B, the cestuy que use, was in conscience and equity to have the profits and disposal of it.

This notion was transplanted into England from the civil law, about the close of the reign of Edward III,<sup>a</sup> by means of the foreign ecclesiastics; who introduced it to evade the statutes of mortmain, by obtaining grants of lands, not to their religious houses directly, but to the use of the religious houses:<sup>b</sup> which the clerical chancellors of those times held to be fideicommissa (trusts), and binding in conscience; and therefore assumed the jurisdiction, que use, and when we come to cestui que use we are on sure ground so far as plurals are concerned, for it is familiar knowledge that use is derived from the Norman-French oes, which in its turn comes from the Latin opus, meaning 'benefit'; thus, in Britton (34 a) the king orders an inquiry to be made as to the moneys which his officers have received a noster oes, 'for our benefit,' and the statute 15 Rich. II, c. 5 contains provisions designed to prevent land being held al oeps de gentz de religion, or al oeps des gildes & fraternitees. That oes or use in these passages means 'benefit' and not 'use' in the sense of employment or user, is clear from a case cited by Littleton (§ 383), where an executor took the profits of his testator's lands to his own use, instead of applying them, as he ought to have done, to the use of the dead (al use le mort) by distributing the money for his soul.

"Cestui que use, therefore, means 'he for whose benefit,' and cestui que trust means 'he upon trust for whom' certain property is held. Que is frequently used in law French in the sense of 'whose'; thus Blackstone says (Comm. ii, 264), 'All prescription must be either in a man and his ancestors, or in a man and those whose estate he hath; which last is called prescribing in a que estate.' So the phrase cestui que vie means 'he for whose life,' not 'he who lives.' It seems, however, that the word was originally spelled qui, for in his admirable introduction to the Year-Books published by the Selden Society, the late Professor Maitland remarked (vol. i, p. xlviii): 'The qui that is the case of the indirect object, the qui (formerly cui) that is doing the work of the Latin cuius and the Latin cui (as in the common phrase qi heir il est, "whose heir he is"), does not so readily degenerate into que. Our phrase "to prescribe in a que estate" is less [This is obviously a lapsus calami; "less" should be "more"] justifiable than our cestui que trust, since it represents qi estate il ad, "whose [not which] estate he has."'"—26 Law Quart. Rev. 196.

which Augustus had vested in his prætor, of compelling the execution of such trust in the chancery. And, as it was most easy to obtain such grants from dying persons, a maxim was established, that though by law the lands themselves were not devisable, yet if a testator had enfeoffed another to his own use and so was [329] possessed of the use only, such use was devisable by will. But we have seen<sup>1</sup> how this evasion was crushed in its infancy, by statute 15 Rich. II, c. 5 (Mortmain, 1391), with respect to religious houses.

Yet, the idea being once introduced, however fraudulently, it afterwards continued to be often innocently, and sometimes very laudably, applied to a number of civil purposes: particularly as it removed the restraint of alienations by will, and permitted the owner of lands in his lifetime to make various designations of their profits, as prudence, or justice, or family convenience, might from time to time require. Till at length, during our long wars in France and the subsequent civil commotions between the houses of York and Lancaster, uses grew almost universal; through the desire that men had (when their lives were continually in hazard) of providing for their children by will, and of securing their estates from forfeitures; when each of the contending parties, as they became uppermost, alternately attainted the other. Wherefore about the reign of Edward IV (before whose time, Lord Bacon remarks,<sup>2</sup> there are not six cases to be found relating to the doctrine of uses), the courts of equity began to reduce them to something of a regular system.

§ 452. (i) Doctrine of uses.—Originally it was held that the chancery could give no relief, but against the very person himself intrusted for cestuy que use, and not against his heir or alienee. This was altered in the reign of Henry VI with respect to the heir;<sup>1</sup> and afterwards the same rule, by a parity of reason, was extended to such alienees as had purchased either without a valuable consideration, or with an express notice of the use.<sup>2</sup> But a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, might hold the land discharged of any trust or confidence. And also it was held that neither the king or queen, on account of their dignity royal,<sup>p</sup> nor any corporation aggregate, [330] on account of its limited capacity,<sup>o</sup> could be seised to any use but their own; that is, they might hold the lands, but were not compellable to execute the trust. And, if the feoffee to uses died without heir, or committed a forfeiture or married, neither the lord who entered for his escheat or forfeiture, nor the husband who retained the possession as tenant by the curtesy, nor the wife to whom dower was assigned, were liable to perform the use;<sup>p</sup> because they were not parties to the trust, but came in by act of law; though doubtless their title in reason was no better than that of the heir.

On the other hand, the use itself, or interest of cestuy que use, was learnedly refined upon with many elaborate distinctions. And, 1. It was held that nothing could be granted to a use, whereof the use is inseparable from the possession; as annuities, ways, commons, and authorities, quæ ipso usu consumuntur (which are consumed by the use itself):<sup>q</sup> or whereof the seisin could not be instantly given.<sup>r</sup> 2. A use could not be raised without a sufficient consideration. For where a man makes a feoffment to another without any consideration, equity presumes that he meant it to the use of himself:<sup>s</sup> unless he expressly declares it to be to the use of another, and then nothing shall be presumed contrary to his own expressions.<sup>t</sup> But, if either a good or a valuable consideration appears, equity will immediately raise a use correspondent to such consideration.<sup>u</sup> 3. Uses were descendible according to the rules of the common law, in the case of inheritances in possession;<sup>w</sup> for in this and many other respects æquitas sequitur legem (equity follows the law), and cannot establish a different rule of property from that which the law has established. 4. Uses might be assigned by secret deeds between the parties,<sup>x</sup> or be devised by last will and testament:<sup>y</sup> for, as the legal estate in the soil was not transferred by these transactions, no livery of seisin was necessary: [331] and as the intention of the parties was the leading principle in this species of property, any instrument declaring that intention was allowed to be binding in equity. But, cestuy que use could not at common law alien the legal interest of the lands, without the concurrence of his feoffee;<sup>z</sup> to whom he was accounted by law to be only tenant at sufferance.<sup>a</sup> 5. Uses were not liable to any of the feudal burdens; and particularly did not escheat for felony or other defect of blood; for escheats, etc., are the consequences of tenure, and uses are held of nobody; but the land itself was liable to escheat, whenever the blood of the feoffee to uses was extinguished by crime or by defect; and the lord (as was before observed) might hold it discharged of the use.<sup>b</sup> 6. No wife could be endowed, or husband have his curtesy, of a use:<sup>c</sup> for no trust was declared for their benefit, at the original grant of the estate. And therefore it became customary, when most estates were put in use, to settle before marriage some joint estate to the use of the husband and wife for their lives; which was the original of modern jointures.<sup>d</sup> 7. A use could not be extended by writ of elegit, or other legal process, for the debts of cestuy que use.<sup>e</sup> For, being merely a creature of equity, the common law, which looked no further than to the person actually seised of the land, could award no process against it.<sup>25</sup>

It is impracticable, upon our present plan, to pursue the doctrine of uses through all the refinements and niceties, which the ingenuity of the times (abounding in subtle disquisitions) deduced from this child of imagination; when once a departure was permitted from the plain, simple rules of property established by the ancient law. These principal outlines will be fully sufficient to show the ground of Lord Bacon's complaint,<sup>f</sup> that this course of proceeding "was turned to deceive many of their just and reasonable rights. A man, that had cause to sue for land, knew not against whom to [332] bring his action, or who was the owner of it. The wife was defrauded of her thirds; the husband of his courtesy; the lord of his wardship, relief, heriot, and escheat; the creditor of his extent for debt; and the poor tenant of his lease." To remedy these inconveniences abundance of statutes were provided, which made the lands liable to be extended by the creditors of cestuy que use;<sup>g</sup> allowed actions for the freehold to be brought against him, if in the actual permanency or enjoyment of the profits;<sup>h</sup> made him liable to actions of waste;<sup>i</sup> established his conveyances and leases made without the concurrence of his feoffees;<sup>k</sup> and gave the lord the wardship of his heir, with certain other feudal prerequisites.<sup>l</sup>

§ 453. (ii) Statute of Uses, 1535. — These provisions all tended to consider cestuy que use as the real owner of the estate; and at length that idea was carried into full effect by the statute 27 Hen. VIII, c. 10 (Statute of Uses, 1535), which is usually called the statute of uses, or, in conveyances and pleadings, the statute for transferring uses into possession.<sup>26</sup> The hint seems to have been derived from what was done at the accession of King Richard III; who having, when Duke of Gloucester, been frequently made a feoffee to uses, would upon the assumption of the crown (as the law was then understood) have been entitled to hold the lands discharged of the use. But, to obviate so notorious an injustice, an act of parliament was immediately passed,<sup>m</sup> which ordained that, where he had been so enfeoffed jointly with other persons, the land should vest in the other feoffees, as if he had never been named; and that, where he stood solely enfeoffed, the estate itself should vest in cestuy que use in like manner as he had the use. And so the statute of Henry VIII, after reciting the various inconveniences before mentioned, and many others, enacts, that "when any person shall be seised of lands, etc., to the use, confidence, or trust, of any other person or body [333] politic, the person or corporation entitled to the use in fee simple, fee-tail, for life, or years, or otherwise, shall from thenceforth stand and be seised or possessed of the land, etc., of and in the like estates as they have in the use, trust, or confidence; and that the estate of the person so seised to uses shall be deemed to be in him or them that have the use, in such quality, manner, form, and condition, as they had before in the use." The statute thus executes the use as our lawyers term it; that is, it conveys the possession to the use, and transfers the use into possession: thereby making cestuy que use complete owner of the lands and tenements, as well at law as in equity.

§ 454. (aa) Decisions of common-law courts.—The statute having thus, not abolished the conveyance to uses, but only annihilated the intervening estate of the feoffee, and turned the interest of cestuy que use into a legal instead of an equitable ownership; the courts of common law began to take cognizance of uses, instead of sending the party to seek his relief in chancery. And, considering them now as merely a mode of conveyance, very many unite the beneficial enjoyment of land to the legal estate; it was likewise intended to abolish the power of disposing of lands by will, which had been introduced by the machinery of uses, and was now in common exercise.—POLLOCK, Land Laws, 97.

of the rules before established in equity were adopted with improvements by the judges of the common law. The same persons only were held capable of being seised to a use, the same considerations were necessary for raising it, and it could only be raised of the same hereditaments, as formerly. But as the statute, the instant it was raised, converted it into an actual possession of the land, a great number of the incidents, that formerly attended it in its fiduciary state, were now at an end. The land could not escheat or be forfeited by the act or defect of the feoffee, nor be aliened to any purchaser discharged of the use, nor be liable to dower or curtesy on account of the seisin of such feoffee; because the legal estate never rests in him for a moment, but is instantaneously transferred to cestuy que use, as soon as the use is declared. And, as the use and the land were now convertible terms, they became liable to dower, curtesy and escheat, in consequence of the seisin of cestuy que use, who was now become the terre-tenant also; and they likewise were no longer devisable by will.<sup>27</sup>

[334] The various necessities of mankind induced also the judges very soon to depart from the rigor and simplicity of the rules of the common law, and to allow a more minute and complex construction upon conveyances to uses than upon others. Hence it was adjudged that the use need not always be executed the instant the conveyance is made: but, if it cannot take effect at that time,

<sup>27</sup> The resulting effect of the Statute of Uses is thus set out by Sir Frederick Pollock (Land Laws, 99): "If Stanford made a feoffment to More, Fisher, and Brooke, to hold to the use of himself, the statute made this ineffectual. Before the statute, More, Fisher, and Brooke would have become the only tenants whom the common-law courts could notice, and the only persons liable for the feudal dues (which, however, would mostly never become demandable), while the court of chancery would compel them to allow Stanford all the benefit of the estate. By the operation of the statute, More, Fisher, and Brooke would not become owners at all; Stanford, by being named to take the use, would at once come into their place. He would be as much the legal tenant as before, and liable to all the legal burdens and incidents. A feoffment to John, or to John and William, or to John and William and Peter, to the use of Peter, or in trust or confidence for Peter, was made by the statute equivalent to a feoffment to Peter. The use carried with it the legal estate; in the curious technical phrase which has ever since been current in the books, the use was said to be executed in Peter by the statute. And the law thus made by the Statute of Uses is law to this day."

the operation of the statute may wait till the use shall arise upon some future contingency, to happen within a reasonable period of time; and in the meanwhile the ancient use shall remain in the original grantor: as, when lands are conveyed to the use of A and B, after a marriage shall be had between them,<sup>2</sup> or to the use of A and his heirs till B shall pay him a sum of money, and then to the use of B and his heirs.<sup>3</sup> Which doctrine, when devised by will were again introduced, and considered as equivalent in point of construction to declarations of uses, was also adopted in favor of executory devises.<sup>4</sup> But herein these, which are called contingent or springing, uses differ from an executory devise; in that there must be a person seised to such uses at the time when the contingency happens, else they can never be executed by the statute; and therefore, if the estate of the feoffee to such use be destroyed by alienation or otherwise, before the contingency arises, the use is destroyed forever:<sup>5</sup> whereas by an executory devise the freehold itself is transferred to the future devisee. And, in both these cases, a fee may be limited to take effect after a fee:<sup>6</sup> because, though that was forbidden by the common law in favor of the lord's escheat, yet, when the legal estate was not extended beyond one fee simple, such subsequent uses (after a use in fee) were before the statute permitted to be limited in equity; and then the statute executed the legal estate in the same manner as the use before subsisted. It was also held that a use, though executed, may change from one to another by circumstances ex post facto (after the fact);<sup>7</sup> as, if A makes a feoffment [335] to the use of his intended wife and her eldest son for their lives, upon the marriage the wife takes the whole use in severalty; and, upon the birth of a son, the use is executed jointly in them both.<sup>8</sup> This is sometimes called a secondary, sometimes a shifting, use. And, whenever the use limited by the deed expires, or cannot vest, it returns back to him who raised it, after such expiration or during such impossibility, and is styled a resulting use. As, if a man makes a feoffment to the use of his intended wife for life, with remainder to the use of her first-born son in tail: here, till he marries, the use results back to himself; after marriage, it is executed in the wife for life; and, if she dies without issue, the whole results back to him in fee.<sup>u</sup> It was likewise held, that the uses originally declared may be revoked at any future time, and new uses be declared of the land, provided the grantor reserved to himself such a power at the creation of the estate; whereas the utmost that the common law would allow, was a deed of defeasance coeval with the grant itself (and therefore esteemed a part of it) upon events specifically mentioned.<sup>w</sup> And, in case of such a revocation, the old uses were held instantly to cease, and the new ones to become executed in their stead.<sup>x</sup> And this was permitted, partly to indulge the convenience and partly the caprice of mankind; who (as Lord Bacon observes<sup>y</sup>) have always affected to have the disposition of their property revocable in their own time, and irrevocable ever afterwards.

§ 455. (bb) Decisions of the court of chancery.—By this equitable train of decisions in the courts of law, the power of the court of chancery over landed property was greatly curtailed and diminished. But one or two technical scruples, which judges found it hard to get over, restored it with tenfold increase. They held, in the first place, that “no use could be limited on a use,”<sup>z</sup> and

<sup>z</sup> Tyrrel's Case and the origin of trusts.—“The strange doctrine of Tyrrel's Case [Dyer, 155].’ ‘The object of the legislature appears to have been the annihilation of the common-law use. The courts, by a strained construction of the statute, preserved its virtual existence.’ ‘Perhaps, however, there is not another instance in the books in which the intention of an act of Parliament has been so little attended to.’ ‘This doctrine must have surprised every one who was not sufficiently learned to have lost his common sense.’ Such are a few of the many criticisms passed upon the common-law judges who decided, in 1557, that a use upon a use was void, and therefore not executed by the Statute of Uses. It has, indeed, come to be common learning that this decision in Tyrrel's Case was due to ‘the absurd narrowness of the courts of law’; that the liberality of the chancellor at once corrected the error of the judges by supporting the second use as a trust; and ‘by this means a statute made upon that when a man bargains and sells his land for money, which raises a use by implication to the bargainee, the limitation of further use to another person is repugnant, and therefore [336] void.<sup>a</sup> And therefore, on a feoffment to A and his heirs, to the use of B and his heirs, in trust for C and his heirs, they held that the statute executed only the first use, and that the second was a mere nullity: not adverting, that the instant the first use was executed in B, he became seised to the use of C, which second use the statute might as well be permitted to execute as it did the first; and so the legal estate might be instantaneously transmitted down, through a hundred uses upon uses, till finally executed in the last cestuy que use. Again; as the statute mentions only such persons as were seised to the use of others, this was held not to extend to terms of years, or other chattel interests, whereof the termor is not seised, but only possessed;<sup>b</sup> and therefore, if a term of one thousand years be limited to A, to the use of (or in trust for) B, the statute does great consideration, introduced in a solemn and pompous manner, has had no other effect than to add at most three words to a conveyance.'

"This common opinion finds, nevertheless, no support in the old books. On the contrary, they show that the doctrine of Tyrrel's Case was older than the Statute of Uses—presumably, therefore, a chancery doctrine—and that the statute so far accomplished its purpose that for a century there was no such thing as the separate existence in any form of the equitable use in land."—AMES. Lect. on Leg. Hist., 243.

The concluding paragraph of this brief essay is as follows: "In the light of the preceding authorities, Lord Hardwicke's oft-quoted remark that the Statute of Uses had no other effect than to add three words to a conveyance must be admitted to be misleading. Lord Hardwicke himself, some thirty years afterwards, in Buckinghamshire v. Drury, put the matter much more justly: 'As property stood at the time of the statute, personal estate was of little or trifling value; copyholds had hardly then acquired their full strength, trusts of estates in land did not arise till many years after (I wonder how they ever happened to do so).' The modern passive trust seems to have arisen for substantially the same reasons which gave rise to the ancient use. The spectacle of one retaining for himself a legal title, which he had received on the faith that he would hold it for the benefit of another, was so shocking to the sense of natural justice that the chancellor at length compelled the faithless legal owner to perform his agreement." Ibid., 247.

not execute this use, but leaves it as at common law.* And lastly (by more modern resolutions), where lands are given to one and his heirs in trust to receive and pay over the profits to another, this use is not executed by the statute: for the land must remain in the trustee to enable him to perform the trust.<sup>4</sup>

§ 456. (cc) Modern law of trusts.—Of the two more ancient distinctions the courts of equity quickly availed themselves. In the first case it was evident that B was never intended by the parties to have any beneficial interest; and, in the second, the cestuy que use of the term was expressly driven into the court of chancery to seek his remedy: and therefore that court determined, that though these were not uses, which the statute could execute, yet still they were trusts in equity, which in conscience ought to be performed.* To this the reason of mankind assented, and the doctrine of uses was revived, under the denomination of trusts: and thus, by this strict construction of the courts of law, a statute made upon great deliberation, and introduced in the most solemn manner, has had little other effect than to make a slight alteration in the formal words of a conveyance.†

[337] However, the courts of equity, in the exercise of this new jurisdiction, have wisely avoided in a great degree those mischiefs which made uses intolerable. They now consider* a trust estate (either when expressly declared or resulting by necessary implication) as equivalent to the legal ownership, governed by the same rules of property, and liable to every charge in equity, which the other is subject to in law:<sup>29</sup> and, by a long series of uniform determinations, for now near a century past, with some assistance from the legislature, they have raised a new system of rational jurisprudence, by which trusts are made to answer in general all the beneficial ends of uses, without their inconvenience or frauds. The trustee is considered as merely the instrument of conveyance, and can in no shape affect the estate, unless by alienation for a valuable consideration to a purchaser without notice;<sup>g</sup> which, as cestuy que use is generally in possession of the land, is a thing that can rarely happen. The trust will descend, may be aliened, is liable to debts, to forfeiture, to leases and other encumbrances, nay even to the curtesy of the husband, as if it was an estate at law. It has not yet indeed been subjected to dower, more from a cautious adherence to some hasty precedents,<sup>h</sup> than from any well-grounded principle. It hath also been held not liable to escheat to the lord, in consequence of attainder or want of heirs:<sup>i</sup> because the trust could never be intended for his benefit. But let us now return to the statute of uses.

The only service, as was before observed, to which this statute is now consigned, is in giving efficacy to certain new and secret species of conveyances; introduced in order to render transactions of this sort as private as possible, and to save the trouble of making livery of seisin, the only ancient conveyance of corporeal freeholds: the security and notoriety of which public investiture abundantly overpaid the labor of going to the land, or of sending an attorney in one's stead. But this now has given way to worth observation, because from these three words of a single exception have been formed the three great classes of trusts not necessary to be declared in writing, viz., implied trusts, resulting trusts, constructive trusts. As might be expected, the bounds between them are not easily fixed.—HAMMOND.

<sup>30</sup> Covenant to stand seised in United States.—The covenant to stand seised to uses was once much used in England for marriage settlements. But, as estates to preserve contingent remainders could not thereby be created, it by which a man, seised of lands, covenants in consideration of blood or marriage that he will stand seised of the same to the use of his child, wife, or kinsman; for life, in tail, or in fee. Here the statute executes at once the estate; for the party intended to be benefited, having thus acquired the use, is thereby put at once into corporal possession of the land,<sup>k</sup> without ever seeing it, by a kind of parliamentary magic. But this conveyance can only operate, when made upon such weighty and interesting considerations as those of blood or marriage.

§ 458. (c) Bargain and sale.—A thirteenth species of conveyance, introduced by this statute, is that of a bargain and sale of lands;<sup>31</sup> which is a kind of a real contract, whereby the bargainor for some pecuniary consideration bargains and sells, that is, contracts to convey, the land to the bargainee; and becomes by such bargain a trustee for, or seised to the use of, the bargainee; and then the statute of uses completes the purchase:<sup>1</sup> or, as it hath been well expressed,<sup>m</sup> the bargain first vests the use, and then the statute vests the possession. But as it was foreseen that conveyances, thus made, would want all those benefits of notoriety, which the old common-law assurances were calculated to give; to prevent, therefore, clandestine conveyances of freeholds, it was enacted in the same session of parliament by statute 27 Hen. VIII, c. 16

gradually became obsolete. As a method of transferring property it is still theoretically recognized in this country, but, because of shorter and better methods, is practically obsolete here also. The doctrine of the covenant to stand seised is often resorted to by courts in order to give effect to the intention of the parties who have undertaken to convey lands by deeds which are insufficient for the purpose under the rules required in other forms of conveyance. Corwin v. Corwin, 6 N. Y. 342, 57 Am. Dec. 453; Wallis v. Wallis, 4 Mass. 136, 3 Am. Dec. 210; 4 Kent, Comm., 493; 2 Reeves, Real Prop., 1392.

(Enrollments, 1536),<sup>32</sup> that such bargains and sales should not inure to pass a freehold, unless the same be made by indenture, and enrolled within six months in one of the courts of Westminster Hall, or with the custos rotulorum (Keeper of the Rolls) of the county. Clandestine bargains and sales of chattel interests, or leases for years, were thought not worth regarding, as such interests were very precarious till about six years before;<sup>a</sup> which also occasioned them to be overlooked in framing the statute of uses: and therefore such bargains and sales are not directed to be enrolled.<sup>33</sup> But how impossible it is to [339] foresee, and provide against, all the consequences of innovations! <sup>33</sup> Modern bargain and sale deed.—Since the statute of enrollment was generally held to have no application in this country, the deed of bargain and sale, terse, convenient, and effective as it was, came to be, and may be said to remain the prevailing type of conveyance in the states. (Kent, Comm., p. *495; 1 Stim. Amer. Stat. L., § 1470; § 1053, supra.) It has been simplified; and in many instances by statute made to operate, like a grant, only from the time of its delivery. (N. Y. L. 1909, c. 52, §§ 244, 246; 1 Stim. Amer. Stat. L., §§ 1470–1472; Schafer v. Reilly, 50 N. Y. 61, 66; Diefendorf v. Diefendorf, 132 N. Y. 100, 30 N. E. 375; Ten Eyck v. Whitbeck, 156 N. Y. 341, 50 N. E. 963. Since the original bargain and sale transfer operated under the Statute of Uses, the title passed when the bargain was complete and the statute operated, and did not await the delivery of the deed.) It employs the operative words 'bargain and sell,' and recites usually the actual, valuable consideration. (Jackson v. Cadwell, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 622; Wood v. Chapin, 13 N. Y. 509, 517, 67 Am. Dec. 62; Baird v. Baird, 145 N. Y. 659, 28 L. R. A. 375, 40 N. E. 222; Fetrow v. Merriwether, 53 Ill. 275, 278; Jackson v. Dillon, 2 Overt. (Tenn.) 261.) It describes the parties and the land, effects a simple transfer of the property from one party to the other, and in its simplest and most common form it contains no covenants for title. In several states it is in effect a grant. (N. Y. L. 1909, c. 52, § 246; 1 Stim. Amer. Stat. L., §§ 1470–1472.) In many of them, while it is a higher deed than a quitclaim in its origin and history, yet, like the quitclaim deed, it now accomplishes no more than the mere transfer of any interest owned at the time by the grantor; and so in such jurisdictions it does not affect any interest acquired by him after its delivery. (N. Y. L. 1909, c. 52, § 251; 1 Stim. Amer. Stat. L., § 1500; Leggett v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 53 N. Y. 394, 398.)—REEVES, 2 Real Prop. 1399.

§ 459. (d) Lease and release.—A fourteenth species of conveyance, viz., by lease and release; first invented by Serjeant Moore, soon after the statute of uses, and now the most common of any, and therefore not to be shaken; though very great lawyers (as, particularly, Mr. Noy) have formerly doubted its validity.<sup>o</sup> It is thus contrived. A lease, or rather bargain and sale, upon some pecuniary consideration, for one year, is made by the tenant of the freehold to the lessee or bargainee. Now this, without any enrollment, makes the bargainor stand seised to the use of the bargainee, and vests in the bargainee the use of the term for a year; and then the statute immediately annexes the possession. He therefore being thus in possession, is capable of receiving a release of the freehold and reversion; which, we have seen before,<sup>p</sup> must be made to a tenant in possession: and accordingly, the next day, a release is granted to him.<sup>q</sup> This is held to supply the place of livery of seisin; and so a conveyance by lease and release is said to amount to a feoffment.<sup>r</sup><sup>34</sup>

act was in its turn repealed and superseded by the provisions of the act to amend the law of real property. The second section of this act gives the power of creating and transferring a leasehold estate in possession by a simple deed of grant. The effect of the Statute of Uses is, however, still preserved, and a grant to uses under the act to amend the law of real property operates in precisely the same way, and is subject to precisely the same rules as any of the other conveyances to uses above noticed. The form of the conveyance of land has been still further shortened and simplified by the Conveyancing Acts, 1881, 1882, 44 and 45 Vict., c. 41, and 45 and 46 Vict., c. 39; but the principles of the law as affected by the previous statutes remain unaltered.”—DIGBY, Hist. Real Prop. (5th ed.) 366.

After the passage of the Real Property Act of 1845, the conveyance by lease and release rapidly fell out of use. In most of the states of the Union it has been held that the statute of enrollments was never in force. This explains why the bargain and sale deed, developed and condensed from its original form, is so commonly found on this side of the Atlantic, and why the lease and release has been used but little here. 2 Reeves, Real Prop., 1396.

administrators, to pay a certain sum of money to another at a day appointed. If this be all, the bond is called a single one, simplex obligatio (single bond, i. e., bond without a condition); but there is generally a condition added, that if the obligor does some particular act, the obligation shall be void, or else shall remain in full force: as, payment of rent; performance of covenants in a deed; or repayment of a principal sum of money borrowed of the obligee, with interest, which principal sum is usually one-half of the penal sum specified in the bond. In case this condition is not performed, the bond becomes forfeited, or absolute at law, and charges the obligor while living; and after his death the obligation descends upon his heir, who (on defect of personal assets) is bound to discharge it, provided he has real assets by descent as a recompense. So that it may be called, though not a direct, yet a collateral, charge upon the lands. How it affects the personal property of the obligor, will be more properly considered hereafter.

If the condition of a bond be impossible at the time of making it, or be to do a thing contrary to some rule of law that is merely positive, or be uncertain, or insensible, the condition alone is void, and the bond shall stand single and unconditional: for it is the folly of the obligor to enter into such an obligation, from which he can never be released. If it be to do a thing that is malum in se (wrong in itself), the obligation itself is void: for the whole is an unlawful contract, and the obligee shall take no advantage from such a transaction. And if the condition be possible at the time of making it, and afterwards [341] becomes impossible by the act of God, the act of law, or the act of the obligee himself, there the penalty of the obligation is saved: for no prudence or foresight of the obligor could guard against such a contingency.* On the forfeiture of a bond, or its becoming single, the whole penalty was formerly recoverable at law; but here the courts of equity interposed, and would not permit a man to take more than in conscience he ought; viz., his principal, interest, and expenses, in case the forfeiture accrued by nonpayment of money borrowed; the damages sustained, upon nonperformance of covenants; and the like. And the like practice having gained some footing in the courts of law,† the statute 4 & 5 Ann., c. 16 (1705), at length enacted, in the same spirit of equity, that in case of a bond, conditioned for the payment of money, the payment or tender of the principal sum due, with interest, and costs, even though the bond be forfeited and a suit commenced thereon, shall be a full satisfaction and discharge.

§ 464. b. Recognizance.—A recognizance is an obligation of record, which a man enters into before some court of record or magistrate duly authorized,<sup>7</sup> with condition to do some particular act; as to appear at the assizes, to keep the peace, to pay a debt, or the like. It is in most respects like another bond: the difference being chiefly this: that the bond is the creation of a fresh debt or obligation de novo, the recognizance is an acknowledgment of a former debt upon record; the form whereof is “that A B doth acknowledge to owe to our lord the king, to the plaintiff, to C D or the like, the sum of ten pounds,” with condition to be void on performance of the thing stipulated: in which case the king, the plaintiff, C D, etc., is called the cognizee, “is cui cognoscitur (he to whom it is acknowledged)” ; as he that enters into the recognizance is called the cognizor, “is qui cognoscit (he who acknowledges).” This, being either certified to, or taken by the officer of some court, is witnessed only by the record of that court, and not by the party’s seal: so that it is not in strict propriety a deed, though the effects of it are greater than a [342] common obligation; being allowed a priority in point of payment, and binding the lands of the cognizor, from the time of enrollment on record.<sup>8</sup> There are also other recognizances, of a private kind, in nature of a statute staple, by virtue of the statute 23 Hen. VIII, c. 6 (Recognizances for Debt, 1531), which have been already explained,<sup>9</sup> and shown to be a charge upon real property.

§ 465. c. Defeasance.—A defeasance, on a bond, or recognizance, or judgment recovered, is a condition which; when performed, defeats or undoes it, in the same manner as a defeasance of an estate before mentioned. It differs only from the common condition of a bond, in that the one is always inserted in the deed or bond itself, the other is made between the same parties by a separate, and frequently a subsequent deed.<sup>b</sup> This, like the condition of a bond, when performed, discharges and disencumbers the estate of the obligor.

§ 466. 6. Question of registering deeds.—These are the principal species of deeds or matter in pais, by which estates may be either conveyed or at least affected.<sup>35</sup> Among which the

<sup>35</sup> Recording acts and registration of title.—The common law made no provision for recording conveyances. Title to land passed by livery of seisin, and the unbending rule of the common law was that when the owner of land once transferred his legal interest, he had nothing left to convey. Accordingly, if he made a second conveyance, even to a bona fide purchaser for value, the latter took nothing. The validity of conveyances was determined strictly by the order in which they were executed. 2 Pomeroy, Eq. Juris. (3d ed.), § 679.

Equity never adopted the same strictness with regard to priorities as did the common law. It enforced prior equitable rights and estates only against those who took with notice or without consideration, and the bona fide purchaser for value and without notice took the land freed from all equitable interests. Where the rights of bona fide purchasers were not concerned, however, the rule in equity was generally the same as that at law, namely, the first equity in order of time was the first in right. Even in equity the bona fide purchaser of land, the legal title to which had been previously conveyed to another, took nothing. 2 Pomeroy, Eq. Juris. (3d ed.), §§ 679-682.

The recording acts enable a wider effect to be given to equitable principles than equity, unaided by such statutes, could give. Thus, in the instance mentioned, of successive deeds to equally innocent grantees, the rule is general, under the recording acts, that the grantee who first records his deed will take the title. Thus, in such a case, the dates of the records control, not the dates of the deeds. One, therefore, who omits to record his deed, is subject to the risk that his grantor may make a second deed to another purchaser, who will, in the absence of notice that a former deed has been made, secure the title if he take the precaution to record his deed. Though the recording of a deed is not essential to the passing of title as between the parties; it is essential to secure the new owner from the risk of being disturbed or dispossessed by subsequent purchasers or encumbrancers.

The recording acts are peculiarly a product of the development of legislation in the United States. It is said that such laws exist in every state of the Union. 2 Tiffany, Real Property, § 476. In England, there never has been a uniform system of recording conveyances. A purchaser of lands in that conveyances to uses are by much the most frequent of any; though in these there is certainly one palpable defect, the want of sufficient notoriety: so that purchasers or creditors cannot know with any absolute certainty what the estate, and the title to it, in reality are, upon which they are to lay out or to lend their money. In the ancient feudal method of conveyance (by giving corporal seisin of the lands) this notoriety was in some measure answered; but all the advantages resulting from thence are now totally defeated by the introduction of death-bed devises and secret conveyances: and there has never been yet any sufficient guard provided against fraudulent charges and encumbrances; since the disuse of the old Saxon custom of transacting all conveyances at country relies upon the title deeds themselves; here, he relies in the main upon the title as it is deduced of record. The American courts have frequently held that a purchaser is not obligated to buy the land for which he contracted unless the title is fairly deducible of record. (29 Am. & Eng. Ency. p. 614.) Accordingly, after the destruction of the public records in the fire of 1906, in San Francisco, purchasers who agreed to buy land were entitled to refuse to carry out their contracts unless the title were restored of record under the Burnt Records Act,—a judicial proceeding to re-establish the record title. Crim v. Umbesen (1909), 155 Cal. 697, 132 Am. St. Rep. 127, 103 Pac. 178. On the other hand, the destruction of the records does not affect the rights of persons who have recorded their conveyances; subsequent purchasers are affected with notice of what the records contained before their destruction. (24 Am. & Eng. Ency. L., 2d ed., p. 153.) A good brief discussion of the recording acts will be found in 2 Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence (3d ed.), §§ 644–666.

It is worthy of note that the scope of the recording statutes has been so extended that now many instruments not affecting land are required to be recorded. Trademarks, bills of sale, certificates of partnership, contracts of conditional sale of chattels, are a few instances out of many that might be cited, where statutes in various states require recording.

Notwithstanding the greater security and fairness obtained by the American recording system over the older methods of the common law and equity, the system falls far short of ideal perfection. One who purchases land the record title to which is perfect may find that he has received nothing. A deed regular on its face may, for example, have been a forgery, or may have been made by an insane person, or someone may have a title by adverse possession, which, of course, does not appear on the records. In addition to these grave faults, the transfer of title is at present attended with considerable expense and delay, and the examination of the records becomes increasingly difficult and expensive with the lapse of time. Professor H. W. Chaplin in an article in 6 Harvard the county court, and entering a memorial of them in the chartulary or ledger-book of some adjacent monastery;° and the failure of the general register established by King Richard the First, for the stars or mortgages made to [343] Jews, in the capitula de Judæis, of which Hoveden has preserved a copy. How far the establishment of a like general register, for deeds, and wills, and other acts affecting real property, would remedy this inconvenience, deserves to be well considered. In Scotland every act and event, regarding the transmission of property, is regularly entered on record.<sup>4</sup> And some of our own provincial divisions, particularly the extended county of York, and the populous county

Law Review, at page 302, and Professor John R. Bood in 12 Mich. Law Review, at page 379, point out many of the defects in the recording system. These shortcomings have led many persons to desire a system whereby the title itself should pass rather than an apparent title, which may prove worthless. The Torrens system, named after Sir R. R. Torrens, who in 1858 secured the introduction of the system into South Australia, is intended to bring about this result. The plan has been thus explained: "The essential feature of the Torrens is this: that title to land passes only by the entry of the transfer upon an official register. A deed between the parties is entirely inoperative in so far as the legal title is concerned. Land, in fact, becomes as to its title entirely like stock in a corporation; it is transferable only on the official books. The owner of land shows his right, not by a deed from an individual grantor, but by a certificate of title issued to him by the official registrar of titles, in form a copy of the official entry, and in every respect like a certificate of stock. In order to transfer his title, the owner must bring or send to the registrar his certificate which is then surrendered and canceled; and after the proper entry on the register, a new certificate is issued to the transferee, certifying that the land now stands in his name on the register. The person in whose name the land stands on the register is the legal owner of the land, or, in less scientific, but no less accurate, language, the land always goes with the certificate." (Professor J. H. Beale, in 6 Harvard Law Review, p. 369.)

A system of registered titles similar to that under the Torrens Act has been in force in many European countries for centuries. It has been adopted in most of the English-speaking colonies of Great Britain. It has been introduced in part in England. It has been authorized by law, though on an optional basis, in New York, Massachusetts, Illinois, Minnesota, Oregon, Colorado, Ohio, Washington, North Carolina, Mississippi and California. A recent writer says: "A system of adjudicated title by the so-called Torrens system of Middlesex, have prevailed with the legislature* to erect such registers in their several districts. But, however plausible these provisions may appear in theory, it hath been doubted by very competent judges, whether more disputes have not arisen in those counties by the inattention and omissions of parties, than prevented by the use of registers.

is practical, workable, satisfactory, and increasing in favor, where given a fair opportunity. And it is submitted that this is the only system yet devised whereby titles to land can be made open to the public, easily and cheaply ascertainable, and safe and secure to the purchaser. Its chief merit is not its cheapness, but its security, though it does have the additional merit lacking under the old system, of not dragging a lengthening chain of expense, obscurity, doubt and danger with every transfer." (Professor John R. Rood, 12 Michigan Law Review, p. 393, March, 1914.)

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FIRST. [344]

OF ALIENATION BY MATTER OF RECORD.

§ 467. Assurances by matter of record.—Assurances by matter of record are such as do not entirely depend on the act or consent of the parties themselves: but the sanction of a court of record is called in to substantiate, preserve, and be a perpetual testimony of, the transfer of property from one man to another; or of its establishment, when already transferred. Of this nature are, 1. Private acts of parliament. 2. The king's grants. 3. Fines. 4. Common recoveries.

§ 468. 1. Private acts of parliament.—Private acts of parliament are, especially of late years, become a very common mode of assurance.<sup>1</sup> For it may sometimes happen, that by the ingenuity of some, and the blunders of other practitioners, an estate is most grievously entangled by a multitude of contingent remainders, resulting trusts, springing uses, executory devises, and the like artificial contrivances (a confusion unknown to the simple conveyances of the common law); so that it is out of the power of

<sup>1</sup> Private acts as conveyances.—All our legislatures pass what are known as private in contradistinction from public or general acts; but for private acts in the English sense, as modes of conveyance to accomplish objects for which common forms and private powers would fail, there is little occasion in this country; nor would our constitutions allow them to be valid, if passed. Even in England, their number and importance has been very much diminished by recent statutes conferring enlarged power on the courts; e. g., to authorize leases and sales of settled estates, contrary to the terms of settlement. (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, 1856.)

In this country the legislature cannot interfere with private property for private purposes: cannot take the property of A and give it to B. (Miller, J., in Citizens' Sav. etc. Assn. v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655, 22 L. Ed. 455; Hoke v. Henderson, 15 N. C. 1, 25 Am. Dec. 677.) It may dispense with formal rules, or disregard the distinction between real and personal property, or change forms and investments. (Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet. 627, 657, 7 L. Ed. 542, 553; Norris v. Clymer, 2 Pa. St. 277.) The subject is admirably discussed by Judge Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, chapter 5, pages 97–106, and also pages 388, 390. (See, also, Judge Dillon's discussion of the power to waive legal requirements; Allen v. Armstrong, 16 Iowa, 508.)—HAMMOND.

either the courts of law or equity to relieve the owner. Or it may sometimes happen, that by the strictness or omission of family settlements, the tenant of the estate is abridged of some reasonable power (as letting leases, making a jointure for a wife, or the like), which power cannot be given him by the ordinary judges either in common law or equity. Or it may be necessary, in settling an estate, to secure it against the claims of infants or other persons under legal disabilities; who are not bound by any judgments or decrees of the ordinary courts of justice. In these, or other cases of [345] the like kind, the transcendent power of parliament is called in, to cut the Gordian knot; and by a particular law, enacted for this very purpose, to unfetter an estate; to give its tenant reasonable powers; or to assure it to a purchaser, against the remote or latent claims of infants or disabled persons, by settling a proper equivalent in proportion to the interest so barred. This practice was carried to a great length in the year succeeding the restoration; by setting aside many conveyances alleged to have been made by constraint, or in order to screen the estates from being forfeited during the usurpation. And at last it proceeded so far, that, as the noble historian expresses it,* every man had raised an equity in his own imagination, that he thought was entitled to prevail against any descent, testament, or act of law, and to find relief in parliament: which occasioned the king at the close of the session to remark<sup>b</sup> that the good old rules of law are the best security; and to wish that men might not have too much cause to fear, that the settlements which they make of their estates shall be too easily unsettled when they are dead, by the power of parliament.

Acts of this kind are, however, at present carried on, in both houses, with great deliberation and caution; particularly in the house of lords they are usually referred to two judges to examine and report the facts alleged, and to settle all technical forms. Nothing, also, is done without the consent, expressly given, of all parties in being and capable of consent, that have the remotest interest in the matter; unless such consent shall appear to be perversely and without any reason withheld. And, as was before hinted, an equivalent in money or other estate is usually settled upon infants, or persons not in esse, or not of capacity to act for themselves, who are to be concluded by this act. And a general saving is constantly added, at the close of the bill, of the right and interest of all persons whatsoever; except those whose consent is so given or purchased, and who are therein particularly named.

[346] A law, thus made, though it binds all parties to the bill, is yet looked upon rather as a private conveyance, than as the solemn act of the legislature. It is not therefore allowed to be a public, but a mere private statute; it is not printed or published among the other laws of the session; it hath been relieved against, when obtained upon fraudulent suggestions;<sup>c</sup> and no judge or jury is bound to take notice of it, unless the same be specially set forth and pleaded to them. It remains, however, enrolled among the public records of the nation, to be forever preserved as a perpetual testimony of the conveyance or assurance so made or established.<sup>2</sup>

§ 469. 2. The king's grants.—The king's grants are also matter of public record. For, as St. Germyn says,<sup>cc</sup> the king's excel-

2 Legislative power to transfer private titles.—The power of legislatures in this country to transfer private titles is restricted by constitutional principles and express limitations. "The courts of the states, whenever the question has been presented to them for decision, have, without exception, held that it is beyond the legislative power to take, against his will, the property of one and give it to another for what the court deems private uses, even though full compensation for the taking be required. But the decisions have been rested on different grounds. (1 Lewis, Eminent Domain, 2d ed., § 157.) Some cases proceed on the express and some on the implied prohibitions of state constitutions, and some on the vaguer reasons derived from what seems to the judges, to be the spirit of the constitution or the fundamental principles of free government." Hairston v. Danville & Western Ry. Co., 208 U. S. 598, 606, 13 Ann. Cas. 1008, 52 L. Ed. 637, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 331. But there are, nevertheless, circumstances under which statutes changing legal titles are allowed. "The cases in which it has been held that a legislative act may avail in creating a good title to land seem to be of three classes, and the authority to pass such acts seems to be limited to these: 1st. In confirming a title, where the proceedings or sale, by which it has been attempted to convey land, have proved lency is so high in the law, that no freehold may be given to the king, nor derived from him, but by matter of record. And to this end a variety of offices are erected, communicating in a regular subordination one with another through which all the king's grants must pass, and be transcribed, and enrolled; that the same may be narrowly inspected by his officers, who will inform him if anything contained therein is improper, or unlawful to be granted. These grants, whether of lands, honors, liberties, franchises, or aught besides, are contained in charters, or letters patent, that is, open letters, literæ patentæ: so called because they are not sealed up, but exposed to open view, with the great seal pendant at the bottom; and are usually directed or addressed by the king to all his subjects at large. And therein they differ from certain other letters of the king, sealed also with his great seal, but directed to particular persons, and for particular purposes: which, therefore, not being proper for public inspection, are closed up and sealed on the outside, and are thereupon called writs close, literæ clausæ; and are recorded in the close-rolls, in the same manner as the others are in the patent-rolls.

§ 470. a. The practice in royal grants.—Grants or letters patent must first pass by bill: which is prepared by the attorney and solicitor general, in consequence [347] of a warrant from the crown; and is then signed, that is, superscribed at the top, with the king's own sign manual, and sealed with his privy signet, which is always in the custody of the principal secretary of state; and then sometimes it immediately passes under the great seal, in which case the patent is subscribed in these words, "per ipsum regem, by the king himself."<sup>4</sup> Otherwise the course is to carry an extract of the bill to the keeper of the privy seal, who makes out a writ or warrant thereupon to the chancery; so that the sign to be defective or incomplete for informality; 2d. Where the owners of the land to be conveyed have been under a disability, like that of infancy, lunacy, or the like, where the state acts as a kind of parens patriæ in taking care of the property of its subjects incapable of managing their own affairs; 3d. Where the sale is made for the purpose of satisfying the debts of a person deceased." § Washburn, Real Prop. (6th ed.), § 2053.

manual is the warrant to the privy seal, and the privy seal is the warrant to the great seal: and in this last case the patent is subscribed, "per breve de privato sigillo, by writ of privy seal."<sup>o</sup> But there are some grants, which only pass through certain offices, as the admiralty or treasury, in consequence of a sign manual, without the confirmation of either the signet, the great, or the privy seal.

§ 471. b. Construction of royal grants.—The manner of granting by the king does not more differ from that by a subject, than the construction of his grants, when made. 1. A grant made by the king, at the suit of the grantee, shall be taken most beneficially for the king, and against the party: whereas the grant of a subject is construed most strongly against the grantor.<sup>3</sup> Where-

• Ibid. 2 Inst. 555.

<sup>3</sup> Interpretation of public grants.—Similar rules of construction are often applied to public grants by the state or United States in this country; and correctly so, with the qualification that all construction is now more liberal and equal between the parties than was formerly the case. There is, of course, no opportunity among us for public grants ex speciali gratia, or ex mero motu; but if there were, these would no doubt be construed more strictly, rather than liberally. Indeed, the fact that a public grant has been made as a matter of interest, for a valuable consideration, has been said with us to relax the rule, and put the grantee on the same footing with the grantee of a private person. (Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 589, 9 L. Ed. 841.) The strict rule applies rather to the grant of franchises or prerogatives. (Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. 367, 10 L. Ed. 997; Dubuque etc. R. Co. v. Litchfield, 23 How. 66, 16 L. Ed. 500; Lansing v. Smith, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 9; 21 Am. Dec. 89; Hyman v. Read, 13 Cal. 444.)—HAMMOND.

Public grants.—The place of king's grants is taken in this country by public grants, by which a title is created in an individual to lands previously belonging either to the federal government or to one of the states. The public domain of the United States was acquired by the government by treaty, conquest, cession by the other nations or by individual states of the Union, and by purchase. The Indians are regarded as having only an occupational title. Their rights must, however, be divested either by purchase or by war. Godfrey v. Beardsley, 2 McLean, 412, Fed. Cas. No. 5497; Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 543, 5 L. Ed. 681. After this right of the Indians has been extinguished, the lands in the public domain are disposed of under the authority of the national government. The system in vogue provides for surveys of the public lands, and their division into townships and sections, and a subdivision fore it is usual to insert in the king's grants, that they are made, not at the suit of the grantee, but "ex speciali gratia, certa scientia, et mero motu regis (by the special favor, certain knowledge, and mere motion of the king)"; and then they have a more liberal construction.<sup>f</sup> 2. A subject's grant shall be construed to include many things, besides what are expressed, if necessary for the operation of the grant. Therefore, in a private grant of the profits of land for one year, free ingress, egress, and regress, to cut and carry away those profits, are also inclusively granted:<sup>g</sup> and if a feoffment of land was made by a lord to his villein, this operated as a manumission;<sup>h</sup> for he was otherwise unable to hold it. But the king's grant shall not inure to any other intent than that which is precisely expressed in the grant. As, if he grants land to an alien, it operates nothing; for [348] such grant shall not also inure to make him a denizen, that so he may be capable into halves, quarters, and eighths of sections, the township consisting of 23,040 acres, and each section of 640 acres. In disposing of the public lands, various modes have been adopted. Many of them have been disposed of by public sale; others by private entry, as it is called, upon the records of certain officers within the districts where the lands lie; others are selected by persons holding warrants from the government, given as rewards for services or for other causes; and in still other cases, lands have been disposed of by treaty or by special acts of Congress in the way of land grants.

Ordinarily, an acquisition of land from the United States by an individual involves four steps, namely, entry, payment, certificate, and patent. Entry means the designation in the books of the land officer of the specific parcel to be acquired. It is the incipient act which gives to the claimant a prima facie right to go on and perform the other acts necessary to complete the title. Holt v. Murphy, 207 U. S. 407, 52 L. Ed. 271, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 212. The purchaser then makes the required payment and is entitled to a certificate. This certificate makes him the equitable owner of the land, which is then held by the government in trust for him. Hawley v. Diller, 178 U. S. 476, 44 L. Ed. 1157, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 986. A patent is a deed of grant, signed by the President of the United States, or his authorized agent, sealed with the great seal, and countersigned by the recorder. A federal patent is said by the supreme court of the United States to be the highest and best deed known to the law. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Smith, 159 U. S. 66, 68, 40 L. Ed. 77, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 994. See 3 Washburn, Real Prop. (6th ed.), 164 ff.; Reeves, Real Prop., 1405 ff.

of taking by grant.<sup>1</sup> 3. When it appears, from the face of the grant, that the king is mistaken, or deceived, either in matter of fact or matter of law, as in case of false suggestion, misinformation, or misrecital of former grants; or if his own title to the thing granted be different from what he supposes; or if the grant be informal; or if he grants an estate contrary to the rules of law; in any of these cases the grant is absolutely void.<sup>2</sup> For instance; if the king grants lands to one and his heirs male, this is merely void: for it shall not be an estate-tail, because there want words of procreation, to ascertain the body, out of which the heirs shall issue; neither is it a fee simple, as in common grants it would be; because it may reasonably be supposed, that the king meant to give no more than an estate-tail:<sup>1</sup> the grantee is therefore (if anything) nothing more than tenant at will.<sup>m</sup> And, to prevent deceits of the king, with regard to the value of the estate granted, it is particularly provided by the statute 1 Hen. IV, c. 6 (Petitions to the King for Lands, 1399), that no grant of his shall be good, unless, in the grantee's petition for them, express mention be made of the real value of the lands.

§ 472. 3. Fines.—We are next to consider a very usual species of assurance, which is also of record; viz., a fine of lands and tenements.<sup>4</sup> In which it will be necessary to explain, 1. The nature of a fine; 2. Its several kinds; and 3. Its force and effect.

<sup>4</sup> Abolition of fines and recoveries.—Fines and common recoveries were abolished by the Fines and Recoveries Act of 1833 (3 & 4 Wm. IV, c. 74). For the forms of conveyance, the disentailing assurance and the deed acknowledged, which have taken the place of the old fictitious lawsuits of fine and recovery, see Jenks, Mod. Land Law, 357 ff.

Fines and common recoveries were never in much use in this country. They have been now abolished by statute, or, in most states, were never in practice. 4 Kent, Comm., 497; Croxall v. Shererd, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 268, 18 L. Ed. 572; Lyle v. Richards, 9 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 322; Stump v. Findlay, 2 Rawle (Pa.), 168, 19 Am. Dec. 632; Dudley v. Sumner, 5 Mass. 438; McGregor v. Comstock, 17 N. Y. 162.

§ 473. a. Nature of a fine.—A fine is sometimes said to be a feoffment of record:<sup>a</sup> though it might with more accuracy be called, an acknowledgment of a feoffment on record. By which is to be understood, that it has at least the same force and effect with a feoffment, in the conveying and assuring of land: though it is one of those methods of transferring estates of freehold by the common law, in which livery of seisin is not necessary [349] to be actually given; the supposition and acknowledgment thereof in a court of record, however fictitious, inducing an equal notoriety. But, more particularly, a fine may be described to be an amicable composition or agreement of a suit, either actual or fictitious, by leave of the king or his justices; whereby the lands in question become, or are acknowledged to be, the right of one of the parties.<sup>o</sup> In its original it was founded on an actual suit, commenced at law for recovery of the possession of land or other hereditaments; and the possession thus gained by such composition was found to be so sure and effectual, that fictitious actions were, and continue to be, every day commenced, for the sake of obtaining the same security.

A fine is so called because it puts an end, not only to the suit thus commenced, but also to all other suits and controversies concerning the same matter. Or, as it is expressed in an ancient record of parliament,<sup>p</sup> 18 Edw. I (Fines, 1290), “non in regno Angliæ providetur, vel est, aliqua securitas major vel solennior, per quam aliquis statum certiozem habere possit, neque ad statum suum verificandum aliquod solennius testimonium producere, quam finem in curia domini regis levatum: qui quidem finis sic vocatur, eo quod finis et consummatio omnium placitorum esse debet, et hac de causa providebatur (there is no greater or more common security provided in the kingdom of England, or by which a person can acquire a surer title, than by a fine levied in the king’s court: nor can any testimony be produced more customary for confirming a title. It is called a fine because it is finis, that is, the end and consummation of all suits; and for this purpose it was provided).” Fines indeed are of equal antiquity with the first rudiments of the law itself; are spoken of by Glanvill<sup>a</sup> and Bracton<sup>r</sup> in the reigns of Henry II and Henry III, as things then well known and long established; and instances have been produced of them even before the Norman invasion.<sup>s</sup> So that the statute 18 Edw. I, called modus levandi fines (the manner of levying fines), did not give them original, but only declared and regulated the manner in which they should be levied or carried on. And that is as follows:

§ 474. b. Mode of levying fines—(1) Writ of præcipe.—The party, to whom the land is to be conveyed or assured, commences an action or suit at law against the other, [350] generally an action of covenant,<sup>t</sup> by suing out a writ or præcipe,<sup>5</sup> called a writ of covenant: "the foundation of which is a supposed agreement or covenant, that the one shall convey the lands to the other; on the breach of which agreement the action is brought. On this writ there is due to the king, by ancient prerogative, a primer fine, or a noble for every five marks of land sued for; that is, one-tenth of the annual value." The suit being thus commenced, then follows,

§ 475. (2) Licentia concordandi.—The licentia concordandi, or leave to agree the suit.<sup>w</sup> For, as soon as the action is brought, the defendant, knowing himself to be in the wrong, is supposed to make overtures of peace and accommodation to the plaintiff. Who, accepting them, but having, upon suing out the writ, given pledges to prosecute his suit, which he endangers if he now deserts it without license, he therefore applies to the court for leave to make the matter up. This leave is readily granted, but for it there is also another fine due to the king by his prerogative which is an ancient revenue of the crown, and is called the king's silver, or sometimes the post fine, with respect to the primer fine before mentioned. And it is as much as the primer fine, and half as much more, or ten shillings for every five marks of land; that is, threewentieths of the supposed annual value.*

§ 476. (3) Concord or agreement.—Next comes the concord, or agreement itself,<sup>7</sup> after leave obtained from the court; which is usually an acknowledgment from the deforciant (or those who keep the other out of possession) that the lands in question are the right of the complainant. And from this acknowledgment, or recognition of right, the party levying the fine is called the [351] cognizor, and he to whom it is levied the cognizee. This acknowledgment must be made either openly in the court of common pleas, or before one of the judges of that court, or else before commissioners in the country, empowered by a special authority, called a writ of dedimus potestatem (we have given power); which judges and commissioners are bound by statute 18 Edw. I, st. 4 (Fines, 1290), to take care that the cognizors be of full age, sound memory, and out of prison. If there be any feme covert among the cognizors, she is privately examined whether she does it willingly and freely, or by compulsion of her husband.

By these acts all the essential parts of a fine are completed: and, if the cognizor dies the next moment after the fine is acknowledged, provided it be subsequent to the day on which the writ is made returnable,<sup>8</sup> still the fine shall be carried on in all its remaining parts: of which the next is be enrolled of record in the proper office, by direction of the statute 5 Hen. IV, c. 14 (Fines, 1403).

§ 478. (5) The foot of the fine.—The fifth part is the foot of the fine, or conclusion of it: which includes the whole matter, reciting the parties, day, year, and place, and before whom it was acknowledged or levied.<sup>b</sup> Of this there are indentures made, or engrossed, at the chirographer's office, and delivered to the cognizor and the cognizee; usually beginning thus, "hæc est finalis concordia, this is the final agreement," and then reciting the whole proceeding at length. And thus the fine is completely levied at common law.

§ 479. (6) Other solemnities.—By several statutes still more solemnities are superadded, in order to render the fine more universally public, and less liable to be levied by fraud or covin. And, first, by 27 Edw. I, [352] c. 1, (Fines, 1299), the note of the fine shall be openly read in the court of common pleas at two several days in one week, and during such reading all pleas shall cease. By 5 Hen. IV, c. 14 (Fines, 1403), and 23 Eliz., c. 3 (Fines and Recoveries, 1580), all the proceedings on fines either at the time of acknowledgment, or previous, or subsequent thereto, shall be enrolled of record in the court of common pleas. By 1 Rich. III, c. 7 (Fines, 1483), confirmed and enforced by 4 Hen. VII, c. 24 (Fines, 1488), the fine, after engrossment, shall be openly read and proclaimed in court sixteen times; viz., four times in the term in which it is made, and four times in each of the three succeeding terms; during which time all pleas shall cease: but this is reduced to once in each term by 31 Eliz., c. 2 (Fines, 1588), and these proclamations are indorsed on the back of the record.<sup>c</sup> It is also enacted by 23 Eliz., c. 3 (1580), that the chirographer of fines shall every term write out a table of the fines levied in each county in that term, and shall affix them in some open part of the court of common pleas all the next term: and shall also deliver the contents of such table to the sheriff of every county, who shall at the next assizes fix the same in some open place in the court, for the more public notoriety of the fine.

§ 480. c. Kinds of fines.—Fines, thus levied, are of four kinds.

1. What in our law French is called a fine “sur cognizance de droit, come ceo que il ad de son done”; or, a fine upon acknowledgment of the right of the cognizee, as that which he hath of the gift of the cognizor.<sup>4</sup> This is the best and surest kind of fine; for thereby the deforciant, in order to keep his covenant with the plaintiff, of conveying to him the lands in question, and at the same time to avoid the formality of an actual feoffment and livery, acknowledges in court a former feoffment, or gift in possession, to have been made by him to the plaintiff. This fine is therefore said to be a feoffment of record; the livery thus acknowledged in court, being equivalent to an actual livery: so that this assurance is rather a confession of a former conveyance, than a conveyance now originally made; for the deforciant, or cognizor, acknowledges, [353] cognoscit, the right to be in the plaintiff, or cognizee, as that which he hath de son done, of the proper gift of himself the cognizor. 2. A fine “sur cognizance de droit tantum,” or, upon acknowledgment of the right merely; not with the circumstance of a preceding gift from the cognizor. This is commonly used to pass a reversionary interest, which is in the cognizor. For of such reversions there can be no feoffment, or donation with livery, supposed; as the possession during the particular estate belongs to a third person.<sup>5</sup> It is worded in this manner: “that the cognizor acknowledges the right to be in the cognizee; and grants for himself and his heirs, that the reversion, after the particular estate determines, shall go to the cognizee.” 3. A fine “sur concessit” is where the cognizor, in order to make an end of disputes, though he acknowledges no precedent right, yet grants to the cognizee an estate de novo, usually for life or years, by way of supposed composition. And this may be done reserving a rent, or the like: for it operates as a new grant.<sup>6</sup> 4. A fine “sur done, grant, et render,” is a double fine, comprehending the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo etc., and the fine sur concessit: and may be used to create particular limitations of estate: whereas the

fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, etc., conveys nothing but an absolute estate, either of inheritance or at least of freehold.<sup>b</sup> In this last species of fine, the cognizee, after the right is acknowledged to be in him, grants back again, or renders to the cognizor, or perhaps to a stranger some other estate in the premises. But, in general, the first species of fine, "sur cognizance de droit come ceo, etc.", is the most used, as it conveys a clean and absolute freehold and gives the cognizee a seisin in law without any actual livery; and is therefore called a fine executed, whereas the others are but executory.

§ 481. d. Force and effect of a fine.—We are next to consider the force and effect of a fine. These principally depend, at this day, on the common law, and the two statutes, 4 Hen. VII, c. 24 (Fines, 1488), and 32 Hen. VIII, c. 36 (Fines, 1540). The ancient common law, with respect to this point, [354] is very forcibly declared by the statute 18 Edw. I (1290), in these words. "And the reason, why such solemnity is required in the passing of a fine, is this; because the fine is so high a bar, and of so great force, and of a nature so powerful in itself, that it precludes not only those which are parties and privies to the fine, and their heirs, but all other persons in the world, who are of full age, out of prison, of sound memory, and within the four seas the day of the fine levied; unless they put in their claim on the foot<sup>1</sup> of the fine within a year and a day." But this doctrine, of barring the right by nonclaim, was abolished for a time by a statute made in 34 Edw. III, c. 16 (Fines, 1360), which admitted persons to claim, and falsify a fine, at any indefinite distance:<sup>1</sup> whereby, as Sir Edward Coke observes,<sup>k</sup> great contention arose, and few men were sure of their possessions, till the parliament held 4 Hen. VII (1488),

<sup>1</sup> Sur la pie as it is in the Cotton MS. and not pur la pais as printed by Berthelet and in 2 Inst.*511. There were then four methods of claiming, so as to avoid being concluded by a fine: 1. By action. 2. By entering such claim on the record at the foot of the fine. 3. By entry on the lands. 4. By continual claim. 2 Inst. 518. The second is not now in force under the statute of Henry VII.

reformed that mischief, and excellently moderated between the latitude given by the statute and the rigor of the common law. For the statute, then made,<sup>1</sup> restored the doctrine of nonclaim; but extended the time of claim. So that now, by that statute, the right of all strangers whatsoever is bound, unless they make claim, by way of action or lawful entry, not within one year and a day, as by the common law, but within five years after proclamations made: except feme coverts, infants, prisoners, persons beyond the seas, and such as are not of whole mind; who have five years allowed to them and their heirs, after the death of their husbands, their attaining full age, recovering their liberty, returning into England, or being restored to their right mind.

It seems to have been the intention of that politic prince, King Henry VII, to have covertly by this statute extended fines to have been a bar of estates-tail, in order to unfetter the more easily the estates of his powerful nobility, and lay <sup>[355]</sup> them more open to alienations; being well aware that power will always accompany property. But doubts have arisen whether they could, by mere implication, be adjudged a sufficient bar (which they were expressly declared not to be by the statute de donis), the statute 32 Hen. VIII, c. 36 (Fines, 1540), was thereupon made; which removes all difficulties, by declaring that a fine levied by any person of full age, to whom or to whose ancestors lands have been entailed, shall be a perpetual bar to them and their heirs claiming by force of such entail: unless the fine be levied by a woman after the death of her husband, of lands which were, by the gift of him or his ancestor, assigned to her in tail for her jointure;<sup>m</sup> or unless it be of lands entailed by act of parliament or letters patent, and whereof the reversion belongs to the crown.

From this view of the common law, regulated by these statutes, it appears, that a fine is a solemn conveyance on record from the cognizor to the cognizee, and that the persons bound by a fine are parties, privies, and strangers.

§ 482. (1) Parties to a fine.—The parties are either the cognizers, or cognizees; and these are immediately concluded by the fine, and barred of any latent right they might have, even though under the legal impediment of coverture. And indeed, as this is almost the only act that a feme covert, or married woman, is permitted by law to do (and that because she is privately examined as to her voluntary consent, which removes the general suspicion of compulsion by her husband), it is therefore the usual and almost the only safe method, whereby she can join in the sale, settlement, or encumbrance, of any estate.

§ 483. (2) Privies to a fine.—Privies to a fine are such as are any way related to the parties who levy the fine, and claim under them by any right of blood, or other right of representation. Such as are the heirs general of the cognizor, the issue in tail since the statute of Henry the Eighth, the vendee, the devisee, and all others who must make title by the persons who levied the fine. For the act of the ancestor shall bind the heir, and the act <sup>[356]</sup> of the principal his substitute, or such as claim under any conveyance made by him subsequent to the fine so levied.<sup>a</sup>

§ 484. (3) Strangers to a fine.—Strangers to a fine are all other persons in the world, except only parties and privies. And these are also bound by a fine, unless, within five years after proclamations made, they interpose their claim; provided they are under no legal impediments, and have then a present interest in the estate. The impediments, as hath before been said, are coverture, infancy, imprisonment, insanity, and absence beyond sea: and persons, who are thus incapacitated to prosecute their rights, have five years allowed them to put in their claims after such impediments are removed. Persons also that have not a present, but a future interest only, as those in remainder or reversion, have five years allowed them to claim in, from the time that such right accrues.<sup>o</sup> And if within that time they neglect to claim, or (by the statute 4 Ann., c. 16—Fines, 1705), if they do not bring an action to try the right, within one year after making such claim, and prosecute the same with effect, all persons whatsoever are barred of whatever right they may have, by force of the statute of nonclaim.

§ 485. (4) Freehold interest essential to a fine.—But, in order to make a fine of any avail at all, it is necessary that the parties should have some interest or estate in the lands to be affected by it. Else it were possible that two strangers, by a mere confederacy, might without any risk defraud the owners by levying fines of their lands; for if the attempt be discovered, they can be no sufferers, but must only remain in statu quo (in the same condition as before): whereas if a tenant for life levies a fine, it is an absolute forfeiture of his estate to the remainderman or reversioner,<sup>p</sup> if claimed in proper time. It is not, therefore, to be supposed that such tenants will frequently run so great a hazard; but if they do, and the claim is not duly made within five years after their respective terms expire,<sup>q</sup> the estate is forever barred by it. Yet where a stranger, whose presumption cannot thus be punished, officiously interferes in an estate which in no wise belongs to him, [357] his fine is of no effect; and may at any time be set aside (unless by such as are parties or privies thereunto<sup>r</sup>) by pleading that “partes finis nihil habuerunt (the parties to the fine had no interest in the land).” And, even if a tenant for years, who hath only a chattel interest, and no freehold in the land, levies a fine, it operates nothing, but is liable to be defeated by the same plea.<sup>s</sup> Wherefore, when a lessee for years is disposed to levy a fine, it is usual for him to make a feoffment first, to displace the estate of the reversioner,<sup>t</sup> and create a new freehold by disseisin. And thus much for the conveyance or assurance by fine: which not only, like other conveyances, binds the grantor himself, and his heirs; but also all mankind, whether concerned in the transfer or no, if they fail to put in their claims within the time allotted by law.

<sup>6</sup> Procedure in common recoveries.—It was not till the fifteenth century that a completely effectual method of breaking through the statutory restraint on alienation—or “barring the entail” as we say—was in regular use. This was an elaborate form of collusive lawsuit called a recovery—original of which, it was formerly observed,<sup>a</sup> that common recoveries were invented by the ecclesiastics to elude the statutes of mortmain; and afterwards encouraged by the finesse of the courts of law in 12 Edw. IV (1472), in order to put an end to all fettered inheritances, and bar not only estates-tail, but also all remainders and reversions expectant thereon. I am now, therefore, only to first, a feigned or fictitious recovery, afterwards, when it was well established and familiar, a "common recovery"—and depending for its efficacy on the doctrine of warranty just mentioned. The device, in its simplest form, was of this nature: the tenant in tail (let us call him Littleton) being in possession, some person (say Brian) acting in concert with him would bring the real action called a "writ of right" for the recovery of the freehold (whence the name of the proceeding) claiming to be himself the true owner. Littleton, instead of defending his title for himself, would "vouch to warranty" a third person (say Catesby), from whom or whose ancestors he professed that his title was derived, and who was supposed bound to warrant the tenant against all comers. Catesby, the "vouchee," as he was called, was brought in as a party, and acknowledged the warranty. Brian, the nominal plaintiff, then asked and obtained leave of the court to "imparl," or privately confer with him, thus providing—if one may be so irreverent as to take an illustration from the stage—a sort of carpenters' scene to cover the production of the final effect. When Brian came back into court, as if to report the result of the "imparlance," it was found that Catesby had disappeared, "departed in contempt of the court," as it was formally recorded. Thereupon judgment went by default against Catesby, and the lands were awarded to Brian for an estate in fee simple; as to Littleton, he and his heirs in tail became entitled to a recompense in lands of equal value against Catesby, by virtue of his supposed warranty. Thus, if Littleton's lineal heirs who would otherwise have succeeded to the entailed estate were to make any claim on it in the future, the answer to them would be that their only remedy was against Catesby, through whose default a stranger claiming in some wholly independent right, or in the technical phrase "by title paramount," had deprived them of their inheritance. It remained to deal with the land according to the preconcerted arrangement: this was the affair not of the court but of the parties. If Littleton's purpose was to make a sale to Brian, then Brian had only to keep the land in which the judgment of the court gave him full title and possession. If not, Brian would dispose of it according to Littleton's directions, by reconveying it to Littleton for an estate in fee simple, or otherwise as might be desired.

The proceeding is here stated, as above said, in its simplest form; and it is supposed that all the steps in the collusive action are really taken in the consider, first, the nature of a common recovery; and, secondly, its force and effect.

§ 487. a. Nature of a common recovery.—And, first, the nature of it; or what a common recovery is. A common recovery is so far like a fine that it is a suit or action, either actual or fictitious: and in it the lands are recovered against the tenant of the freehold; which recovery, being a supposed adjudication of the right, binds all persons, and vests a free and absolute fee simple in the recoverer. A recovery, therefore, being in the nature of an action at law, not immediately compromised like a fine, but carried on regular way. But the practice of later times, as described by Blackstone, and minutely explained by the text-writers on the law of real property before 1833, was more artificial and complex. The action was not merely collusive but fictitious. Nothing was really done in the court of common pleas or its offices, after the issue of the writ which commenced the supposed proceedings, but the making up of a record stating, as in the case of a genuine action, the demand, defense, voucher, imparlance, default, and judgment; the same or equivalent fees, however, were paid to the officers of the court as if everything had been done in detail. Only where the party “suffering the recovery” was a nobleman, he did appear in court, and a serjeant went through the form of pleading for him, as I learn on the authority of those who remember the old practice. On the other hand, the form was complicated by additional precautions intended to make sure that every possible claim of the inheritable issue of the tenant in tail, or of those who in their failure would become entitled under the further dispositions of the grant in tail, or ultimately of the original grantor and his heirs, should be effectually barred. The developed modern shape of a “common recovery” can hardly be understood by anyone but a special historical student of the law, nor is there any need that it should. It was possible, even after these developments, to raise doubts whether the fiction was in theory quite satisfying; and the rationalizing lawyers of the eighteenth century, while some of them at least inclined to think these doubts unanswerable, dismissed them as idle, and considered recoveries “as common assurances, and not at all as real transactions,” the artificial reasoning by which a systematic justification of them was attempted being “a thing in its nature inexplicable.” One question, however, may naturally occur to the candid reader, and must not be neglected. Was not the vouchee, Catesby, as we called him in our imaginary example, put in an extremely awkward position by being made liable to find a recompense in value for the tenant in tail’s issue? And how was he induced to take such a risk? No doubt the position would have been anxious and dangerous for a man of substance: for, in the Middle Ages at any rate, the court could not have confessed that it had lent the forms of its most solemn proceedings to a concerted evasion of the statute. But all through every regular stage of proceeding, I am greatly apprehensive that its form and method will not be easily understood by the student, who is not yet acquainted [358] with the course of judicial proceedings; which cannot be thoroughly explained, till treated of at large in the third book of these Commentaries. However, I shall endeavor to state its nature and progress, as clearly and concisely as I can; avoiding, as far as possible, all technical terms, and phrases not hitherto interpreted.

§ 488. (1) Single voucher.—Let us, in the first place, suppose David Edwards<sup>w</sup> to be tenant of the freehold, and desirous to suffer a common recovery, in order to bar all entails, remainders, and reversions, and to convey the same in fee simple to Francis Golding. To effect this, Golding is to bring an action against him for the lands; and he accordingly sues out a writ, called a præcipe quod reddat (command him to restore), because those were its initial or most operative words, when the law proceedings were in Latin. In this writ the demandant Golding alleges, that the defendant Edwards (here called the tenant) has no legal title to the land; but that he came into possession of it after one Hugh Hunt trouble on this score was avoided by choosing as vouchee someone who notoriously had no lands to make recompense withal, and therefore was, as we now say, not worth powder and shot. In later times this office was assigned by settled usage to the crier of the court, who in this capacity was called "the common vouchee," and thus cheerfully and, we presume, not ungainfully passed his life, or so much thereof as was covered by the legal terms, in perpetual contempt of the court of common pleas and liability to be fined at the king's discretion. It may also seem that the nominal plaintiff in the action must have been greatly trusted by the parties: for what if after the judgment in his favor he disavowed the arrangement, and insisted on taking the thing seriously and remaining in possession? He had the strongest possible title on the face of the proceedings, and no remedy known to the old common law could touch him. It is possible that in the earlier days of common recoveries everything was left to his honor. But before the latter end of the fifteenth century the growing jurisdiction of the chancellor, of which we shall have to speak presently, had ample means of enforcing the fulfillment of his undertaking according to its intention. In later times the ingenuity of conveyancers made assurance doubly sure by a complication of provisos and counter-checks which it is needless to specify.—POLLOCK, Land Laws, 80.

had turned the demandant out of it.<sup>2</sup> The subsequent proceedings are made up into a record or recovery roll,<sup>7</sup> in which the writ and complaint of the demandant are first recited: whereupon the tenant appears, and calls upon one Jacob Morland, who is supposed, at the original purchase, to have warranted the title to the tenant; and thereupon he prays, that the said Jacob Morland may be called in to defend the title which he so warranted. This is called the voucher, vocatio, or calling of Jacob Morland to warranty; and Morland is called the vouchee. Upon this, Jacob Morland, the vouchee, appears, is impleaded, and defends the title. Whereupon, Golding, the demandant, desires leave of the court to imparl, or confer with the vouchee in private; which is (as usual) allowed him. And soon afterwards the demandant, Golding, returns to court, but Morland the vouchee disappears, or makes default. Whereupon judgment is given for the demandant, Golding, now called the recoverer, to recover the lands in question against the tenant, Edwards, who is now the recoveree; [359] and Edwards has judgment to recover of Jacob Morland lands of equal value, in recompense for the lands so warranted by him, and now lost by his default; which is agreeable to the doctrine of warranty mentioned in the preceding chapter.<sup>8</sup> This is called the recompense, or recovery in value. But Jacob Morland having no lands of his own, being usually the crier of the court (who, from being frequently thus vouched, is called the common vouchee), it is plain that Edwards has only a nominal recompense for the lands so recovered against him by Golding; which lands are now absolutely vested in the said recoverer by judgment of law, and seisin thereof is delivered by the sheriff of the county. So that this collusive recovery operates merely in the nature of a conveyance in fee simple, from Edwards the tenant in tail, to Golding the purchaser.

§ 489. (2) Double voucher.—The recovery, here described, is with a single voucher only; but sometimes it is with double, treble, or further voucher, as the exigency of the case may require. And indeed it is now usual always to have a recovery with double voucher at the least: by first conveying an estate of freehold to any indifferent person, against whom the præcipe is brought; and then he vouches the tenant in tail, who vouches over the common vouchee.<sup>a</sup> For, if a recovery be had immediately against tenant in tail, it bars only such estate in the premises of which he is then actually seised; whereas, if the recovery be had against another person, and the tenant in tail be vouched, it bars every latent right and interest which he may have in the lands recovered.<sup>b</sup> If Edwards, therefore, be tenant of the freehold in possession, and John Barker be tenant in tail in remainder, here Edwards doth first vouch Barker, and then Barker vouches Jacob Morland, the common vouchee; who is always the last person vouched, and always makes default; whereby the demandant Golding recovers the land against the tenant Edwards, and Edwards recovers a recompense of equal value against Barker, the first vouchee; who recovers the like against Morland, the common<sup>(360)</sup> vouchee, against whom such ideal recovery in value is always ultimately awarded.

§ 490. (3) Supposed recompense from the common vouchee. This supposed recompense in value is the reason why the issue in tail is held to be barred by a common recovery. For, if the recoveree should obtain a recompense in lands from the common vouchee (which there is a possibility in contemplation of law, though a very improbable one, of his doing), these lands would supply the place of those so recovered from him by collusion, and would descend to the issue in tail.<sup>c</sup> This reason will also hold with equal force, as to most remaindermen and reversioners; to whom the possibility will remain and revert, as a full recompense for the reality, which they were otherwise entitled to; but it will not always hold; and therefore, as Pigott says,<sup>d</sup> the judges have been even astuti (cunning), in inventing other reasons to maintain the authority of recoveries. And, in particular, it hath been said, that, though the estate-tail is gone from the recoveree, yet it is not destroyed, but only transferred; and still subsists, and will ever continue to subsist (by construction of law) in the recoverer, his heirs and assigns: and, as the estate-tail so continues to subsist forever, the remainders or reversions expectant on the determination of such estate-tail can never take place.

§ 491. (4) Improvements desirable.—To such awkward shifts, such subtle refinements, and such strange reasoning, were our ancestors obliged to have recourse, in order to get the better of that stubborn statute de donis. The design, for which these contrivances were set on foot, was certainly laudable; the unriveting the fetters of estates-tail, which were attended with a legion of mischiefs to the commonwealth: but, while we applaud the end, we cannot but admire the means. Our modern courts of justice have indeed adopted a more manly way of treating the subject; by considering common recoveries in no other light than as the formal mode of conveyance, by which tenant in tail is enabled to alien his lands. But, since the ill consequences of fettered inheritances are now generally seen and [361] allowed, and of course the utility and expedience of setting them at liberty are apparent, it hath often been wished, that the process of this conveyance was shortened, and rendered less subject to niceties, by either totally repealing the statute de donis; which perhaps, by reviving the old doctrine of conditional fees, might give birth to many litigations: or by vesting in every tenant in tail of full age the same absolute fee simple at once, which now he may obtain whenever he pleases, by the collusive fiction of a common recovery; though this might possibly bear hard upon those in remainder or reversion, by abridging the chances they would otherwise frequently have, as no recovery can be suffered in the intervals between term and term, which sometimes continue for near five months together: or, lastly, by empowering the tenant in tail to bar the estate-tail by a solemn deed, to be made in term time and enrolled in some court of record; which is liable to neither of the other objections, and is warranted not only by the usage of our American colonies, but by the precedent of the statute 21 Jac. I, c. 19 (Bankruptcy, 1623), which, in case of a bankrupt tenant in tail, empowers his commissioners to sell the estate at any time, by deed indented and enrolled. And if, in so national a concern, the emoluments of the officers, concerned in passing recoveries, are thought to be worthy attention, those might be provided for in the fees to be paid upon each enrollment.

§ 492. b. Force and effect of common recoveries.—The force and effect of common recoveries may appear, from what has been said, to be an absolute bar not only of all estates-tail, but of remainders and reversions expectant on the determination of such estates. So that a tenant in tail may, by this method of assurance, convey the lands held in tail to the recoverer, his heirs and assigns, absolutely free and discharged of all conditions and limitations in tail, and of all remainders and reversions. But, by statute 34 & 35 Hen. VIII, c. 20 (Fines and Recoveries, 1543), no recovery had against tenant in tail, of the king's gift, whereof the remainder or reversion is in the king, shall bar such estate-tail, or the remainder or reversion of the crown. And by the statute 11 Hen. VII, c. 20 (Bar of Entail, 1495), no [362] woman, after her husband's death, shall suffer a recovery of lands settled on her by her husband or settled on her husband and her by any of his ancestors. And by statute 14 Eliz., c. 8 (Recoveries, 1572), no tenant for life, of any sort, can suffer a recovery, so as to bind them in remainder or reversion. For which reason, if there be tenant for life, with remainder in tail, and other remainders over, and the tenant for life is desirous to suffer a valid recovery; either he, or the tenant to the præcipe by him made, must vouch the remainderman in tail, otherwise the recovery is void: but if he does vouch such remainderman, and he appears and vouches the common vouchee, it is then good; for if a man be vouched and appears, and suffers the recovery to be had, it is as effectual to bar the estate-tail as if he himself were the recoveree.<sup>f</sup>

§ 493. (1) Recoveree must be seised of the freehold.—In all recoveries it is necessary that the recoveree, or tenant to the præcipe, as he is usually called, be actually seised of the freehold, else the recovery is void.<sup>g</sup> For all actions, to recover the seisin of lands, must be brought against the actual tenant of the freehold, else the suit will lose its effect; since the freehold cannot be recovered of him who has it not. And, though these recoveries are in themselves fabulous and fictitious, yet it is necessary that there be actores fabulæ (actors of the fiction), properly qualified. But the nicety thought by some modern practitioners to be requisite in conveying the legal freehold, in order to make a good tenant to the præcipe, is removed by the provisions of the statute 14 Geo. II, c. 20 (Common Recoveries, 1740), which enacts, with a retrospect and conformity to the ancient rule of law,<sup>b</sup> that, though the legal freehold be vested in lessees, yet those who are entitled to the next freehold estate in remainder or reversion may make a good tenant to the præcipe: and that, though the deed or fine which creates such tenant be subsequent to the judgment of recovery; yet, if it be in the same term, the recovery shall be valid in law: and that, though the recovery itself do not appear to be entered, or be not regularly entered, on record, yet the deed to make a tenant to the præcipe, and declare the uses of the recovery, shall [363] after a possession of twenty years be sufficient evidence, on behalf of a purchaser for valuable consideration, that such recovery was duly suffered. And this may suffice to give the student a general idea of common recoveries, the last species of assurances by matter of record.

§ 494. c. Deeds to lead or declare uses.—Before I conclude this head, I must add a word concerning deeds to lead, or to declare, the uses of fines, and of recoveries. For if they be levied or suffered without any good consideration, and without any uses declared, they, like other conveyances, inure only to the use of him who levies or suffers them.<sup>1</sup> And if a consideration appears, yet as the most usual fine, “sur cognizance de droit come ceo, etc.,” conveys an absolute estate, without any limitations, to the cognizee; and as common recoveries do the same to the recoverer; these assurances could not be made to answer the purpose of family settlements (wherein a variety of uses and designations is very often expedient), unless their force and effect were subjected to the direction of other more complicated deeds, wherein particular uses can be more particularly expressed. The fine or recovery itself, like a power once gained in mechanics, may be applied and directed to give efficacy to an infinite variety of movements, in the vast and intricate machine of a voluminous family settlement. And, if these deeds are made previous to the fine or recovery, they are called deeds to lead the uses; if subsequent, deeds to declare them. As, if A tenant in tail, with reversion to himself in fee, would settle his estate on B for life, remainder to C in tail, remainder to D in fee; this is what by law he has no power of doing effectually, while his own estate-tail is in being. He therefore usually covenants to levy a fine (or, if there be any intermediate remainders, to suffer a recovery) to E, and that the same shall inure to the uses in such settlement mentioned. This is now a deed to lead the uses of the fine or recovery; and the fine when levied, or recovery when suffered, shall inure to the uses so specified and no other. For though E, the cognizee or recoverer, hath a fee simple vested in himself by the fine or recovery; yet, by the operation of [364] this deed, he becomes a mere instrument or conduit-pipe seised only to the use of B, C, and D, in successive order: which use is executed immediately, by force of the statute of uses.* Or, if a fine or recovery be had without any previous

* This doctrine may perhaps be more clearly illustrated by example. In the deed or marriage settlement in the appendix, No. II. § 2. we may suppose the lands to have been originally settled on Abraham and Cecilia Barker for life, remainder to John Barker in tail, with divers other remainders over, reversion to Cecilia Barker in fee; and now intended to be settled to the several uses therein expressed, viz., to Abraham and Cecilia Barker till the marriage; remainder to John Barker for life; remainder to trustees to preserve the contingent remainders: remainder to his widow for life, for her jointure; remainder to other trustees, for a term of five hundred years; remainder to their first and other sons in tail; remainder to their daughters in tail; remainder to John Barker in tail; remainder to Cecilia Barker in fee. Now it is necessary, in order to bar the estate-tail of John Barker, and the remainders expectant thereon, that a recovery be suffered of the premises: and it is thought proper (for though usual, it is by no means necessary: see Forrester. 167.) that in order to make a good tenant of the freehold, or tenant to the præcipe, during the coverture, a fine should be levied by Abraham, Cecilia, and John Barker; and that the recovery itself be suffered against this tenant to the præcipe, who shall vouch John Barker, and thereby bar his estate-tail, and become tenant of the fee simple by virtue of such recovery: the uses of which estate, so acquired, are to be those expressed in this deed. Accordingly the parties covenant to do these several acts (see pag. viii.): and in consequence thereof the fine and recovery are had and suffered (No. IV. and No. V.) of which this conveyance is a deed to lead the uses.

settlement, and a deed be afterwards made between the parties, declaring the uses to which the same shall be applied, this will be equally good, as if it had been expressly levied or suffered in consequence of a deed directing its operation to those particular uses. For by statute 4 & 5 Ann., c. 16 (1705), indentures to declare the uses of fines and recoveries, made after the fines and recoveries had and suffered, shall be good and effectual in law, and the fine and recovery shall inure to such uses, and be esteemed to be only in trust, notwithstanding the statute of frauds 29 Car. II, c. 3 (1677), enacts that all trusts shall be declared in writing, at (and not after) the time when such trusts are created.

OF ALIENATION BY SPECIAL CUSTOM.

§ 495. Alienation of copyhold and customary estates.—We are next to consider assurances by special custom, obtaining only in particular places, and relative only to a particular species of real property.<sup>1</sup> This, therefore, is a very narrow title; being confined to copyhold lands, and such customary estates, as are holden in ancient demesne, or in manors of a similar nature: which, being of a very peculiar kind, and originally no more than tenancies in pure or privileged villeinage, were never alienable by deed; for, as that might tend to defeat the lord of his seignior, it is therefore a forfeiture of a copyhold.<sup>a</sup> Nor are they transferable by matter of record, even in the king's courts, but only in the court-baron of the lord. The method of doing this is generally by surrender; though in some manors, by special custom, recoveries may be suffered of copyholds:<sup>b</sup> but these differing in nothing material from recoveries of free land, save only that they are not suffered in the king's courts, but in the court-baron of the manor, I shall confine myself to conveyances by surrender, and their consequences.

<sup>1</sup> Special customs in United States.—Copyhold does not exist in the United States, and the English law on the subject has been much modified by modern statutes. See 1 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 520 ff.

Alienation by special custom has very little interest in the United States, for "there are practically no important special customs in this country affecting real property. The right of a tenant for years, by custom in some jurisdictions, to take away-going crops may be considered as one such incident of real property interests (Shaw v. Bowman, 91 Pa. St. 414; Van Doren v. Everitt, 5 N. J. L. 460 (539), 8 Am. Dec. 615); and the local usages or customs, whereby fixtures that otherwise would remain on the land are made the property of temporary owners and may be removed by them, may simply be mentioned for the sake of completeness (Bircher v. Parker, 40 Mo. 118; 13 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, pp. 655, 661)."—REEVES, Real Prop., 1568.

purposes as in the surrender are expressed. As, it may be, to the use and behoof of A and his heirs; to the use of his own will: and the like. The process, in most manors, is, that [366] the tenant comes to the steward, either in court (or, if the custom permits, out of court), or else to two customary tenants of the same manor, provided there be also a custom to warrant it; and there, by delivering up a rod, a glove, or other symbol, as the custom directs, resigns into the hands of the lord, by the hands and acceptance of his said steward, or of the said two tenants, all his interest and title to the estate; in trust to be again granted out by the lord, to such persons and for such uses as are named in the surrender, and the custom of the manor will warrant. If the surrender be made out of court, then, at the next or some subsequent court, the jury or homage must present and find it upon their oaths; which presentment is an information to the lord or his steward of what has been transacted out of court. Immediately upon such surrender in court, or upon presentment of a surrender made out of court, the lord by his steward grants the same land again to cestuy que use (who is sometimes, though rather improperly, called the surrenderee), to hold by the ancient rents and customary services; and thereupon admits him tenant to the copyhold, according to the form and effect of the surrender, which must be exactly pursued. And this is done by delivering up to the new tenant the rod, or glove, or the like, in the name, and as the symbol, of corporal seisin of the lands and tenements. Upon which admission he pays a fine to the lord according to the custom of the manor, and takes the oath of fealty.

§ 497. 1. Feudal origin of surrender.—In this brief abstract of the manner of transferring copyhold estates we may plainly trace the visible footsteps of the feudal institutions. The fief, being of a base nature and tenure, is unalienable without the knowledge and consent of the lord. For this purpose it is resigned up, or surrendered into his hands. Custom, and the indulgence of the law, which favors liberty, has now given the tenant a right to name his successor; but formerly it was far otherwise. And I am apt to suspect that this right is of much the same antiquity with the introduction of uses with respect to freehold lands: for the alienee of a copyhold had merely jus fiduciarium (a right of trust), for which [367] there was no remedy at law, but only by subpœna in chancery.<sup>o</sup> When, therefore, the lord had accepted a surrender of his tenant's interest, upon confidence to regrant the estate to another person, either then expressly named or to be afterwards named in the tenant's will, the chancery enforced this trust as a matter of conscience; which jurisdiction, though seemingly new in the time of Edward IV,<sup>4</sup> was generally acquiesced in, as it opened the way for the alienation of copyholds, as well as of freehold estates, and as it rendered the use of them both equally devisable by testament. Yet, even to this day, the new tenant cannot be admitted but by composition with the lord, and paying him a fine by way of acknowledgment for the license of alienation. Add to this the plain feudal investiture, by delivering the symbol of seisin in presence of the other tenants in open court; "quando hasta vel aliud corporeum quidlibet porrigitur a domino se investituram facere dicente; quæ saltem coram duobus vasallis solemniter fieri debet (when a spear, or other corporeal thing, is presented by the lord, saying, that he hereby invested him; which should be solemnly done in the presence of at least two vassals)";• and, to crown the whole, the oath of fealty annexed, the very bond of feudal subjection. From all which we may fairly conclude, that, had there been no other evidence of the fact in the rest of our tenures and estates, the very existence of copyholds, and the manner in which they are transferred, would incontestably prove the very universal reception, which this northern system of property for a long time obtained in this island; and which communicated itself, or at least its similitude, even to our very villeins and bondmen.

§ 498. 2. Surrender only conveyance of copyholds.—This method of conveyance is so essential to the nature of a copyhold estate, that it cannot possibly be transferred by any other assurance. No feoffment, fine, or recovery (in the king's court) has any operation thereupon. If I would exchange a copyhold estate with another, I cannot do it by an ordinary deed of exchange at the common law; but we must surrender to each other's use, and the lord will admit us accordingly. If I would devise a copyhold, I must surrender [368] it to the use of my last will and testament; and in my will I must declare my intentions, and name a devisee, who will then be entitled to admission.*

• Feud. l. 2. t. 2.

4 Bro. Abr. tit. Tenant. per copie. 10.

§ 499. 3. The several parts of conveyance by surrender.— In order the more clearly to apprehend the nature of this peculiar assurance, let us take a separate view of its several parts; the surrender, the presentment, and the admittance.

§ 500. a. Surrender.—A surrender, by an admittance subsequent whereto the conveyance is to receive its perfection and confirmation, is rather a manifestation of the alienor's intention than a transfer of any interest in possession. For, till admittance of cestuy que use, the lord taketh notice of the surrenderer as his tenant; and he shall receive the profits of the land to his own use, and shall discharge all services due to the lord. Yet the interest remains in him not absolutely, but sub modo (conditionally); for he cannot pass away the land to any other, or make it subject to any other encumbrance than it was subject to at the time of the surrender. But no manner of legal interest is vested in the nominee before admittance. If he enters, he is a trespasser and punishable in an action of trespass: and if he surrenders to the use of another, such surrender is merely void, and by no matter ex post facto can be confirmed. For though he be admitted in pursuance of the original surrender, and thereby acquires afterwards a sufficient and plenary interest as absolute owner, yet his second surrender previous to his own admittance is absolutely void ab initio (from the beginning); because at the time of such surrender he had but a possibility of an interest, and could therefore transfer nothing: and no subsequent admittance can make an act good, which was ab initio void. Yet, though upon the original surrender the nominee hath but a possibility, it is, however, such a possibility as may whenever he pleases be reduced to a certainty: for he cannot either by force or fraud be deprived or deluded of the effect and fruits of the surrender; but if the lord refuse to admit him, he is compellable to do it by a bill in chancery, or a mandamus:<sup>5</sup> and the surrenderer can in nowise defeat his grant; his hands being forever bound from disposing of the land (369) in any other way, and his mouth forever stopped from revoking or countermanding his own deliberate act.<sup>6</sup>

§ 501. b. Presentment.—As to the presentment: that, by the general custom of manors, is to be made at the next court-baron immediately after the surrender; but by special custom in some places it will be good, though made at the second or other subsequent court. And it is to be brought into court by the same persons that took the surrender, and then presented by the homage; and in all points material must correspond with the true tenor of the surrender itself. And therefore, if the surrender be conditional, and the presentment be absolute, both the surrender, presentment, and admittance thereupon are wholly void:<sup>1</sup> the surrender, as being never truly presented; the presentment, as being false; and the admittance, as being founded on such untrue presentment. If a man surrenders out of court, and dies before presentment, and presentment be made after his death, according to the custom, this is sufficient.<sup>2</sup> So, too, if cestuy que use dies before presentment, yet, upon presentment made after his death, his heir according to the custom shall be admitted. The same law is, if those, into whose hands the surrender is made, die before presentment; for, upon sufficient proof in court that such a surrender was made, the lord shall be compelled to admit accordingly. And if the steward, the tenants, or others into whose hands such surrender is made, refuse or neglect to bring it in to be presented, upon a petition preferred to the lord in his court-baron, the party grieved shall find remedy. But if the lord will not do him right and justice, he may sue both the lord, and them, that took the surrender, in chancery, and shall there find relief.<sup>1</sup>

§ 502. c. Admittance.—<sup>[370]</sup> Admittance is the last stage, or perfection, of copyhold assurances. And this is of three sorts: first, an admittance upon a voluntary grant from the lord; secondly, an admittance upon surrender by the former tenant; and thirdly, an admittance upon a descent from the ancestor.

§ 503. (1) Admittance upon a voluntary grant.—In admittances, even upon a voluntary grant from the lord, when copyhold lands have escheated or reverted to him, the lord is considered as an instrument. For, though it is in his power to keep the lands in his own hands, or to dispose of them at his pleasure, by granting an absolute fee simple, a freehold, or a chattel interest therein; and quite to change their nature from copyhold to socage tenure, so that he may well be reputed their absolute owner and lord; yet if he will still continue to dispose of them as copyhold, he is bound to observe the ancient custom precisely in every point, and can neither in tenure nor estate introduce any kind of alteration; for that were to create a new copyhold: wherefore in this respect the law accounts him custom's instrument. For if a copyhold for life falls into the lord's hands, by the tenant's death, though the lord may destroy the tenure and enfranchise the land, yet if he grants it out again by copy, he can neither add to nor diminish the ancient rent, nor make any the minutest variation in other respects: <sup>m</sup> nor is the tenant's estate, so granted, subject to any charges or encumbrances by the lord.<sup>2</sup>

§ 504. (2) Admittance upon a surrender.—In admittances upon surrender of another, the lord is to no intent reputed as owner, but wholly as an instrument: and the tenant admitted shall likewise be subject to no charges or encumbrances of the lord; for his claim to the estate is solely under him that made the surrender.*

§ 505. (3) Admittance upon a descent.—And, as in admittances upon surrenders, so in admittances upon descents by the death of the ancestor, the lord <sup>[371]</sup> is used as a mere instrument; and, as no manner of interest passes into him by the surrender or the death of his tenant, so no interest passes out of him by the act of admittance. And therefore neither in the one case, nor the other, is any respect had to the quantity or quality of the lord's estate in the manor. For whether he be tenant in fee or for years, whether he be in possession by right or by wrong, it is not material; since the admittances made by him shall not be impeached on account of his title, because they are judicial, or rather ministerial, acts, which every lord in possession is bound to perform.<sup>p</sup>

Admittances, however, upon surrender differ from admittances upon descent in this: that by surrender nothing is vested in cestuy que use before admittance, no more than in voluntary admittances; but upon descent the heir is tenant by copy immediately upon the death of his ancestor: not, indeed, to all intents and purposes, for he cannot be sworn on the homage nor maintain an action in the lord's court as tenant; but to most intents the law taketh notice of him as of a perfect tenant of the land instantly upon the death of his ancestor, especially where he is concerned with any stranger. He may enter into the land before admittance; may take the profits; may punish any trespass done upon the ground;<sup>q</sup> may, upon satisfying the lord for his fine due upon the descent, may surrender into the hands of the lord to whatever use he pleases. For which reasons we may conclude, that the admittance of an heir is principally for the benefit of the lord, to entitle him to his fine, and not so much necessary for the strengthening and completing the heir's title. Hence, indeed, an observation might arise, that if the benefit, which the heir is to receive by the admittance, is not equal to the charges of the fine, he will never come in and be admitted to his copyhold in court; and so the lord may be defrauded of his fine. But to this we may reply in [372] the words of Sir Edward Coke,<sup>r</sup> "I assure myself, if it were in the election of the heir to be admitted or not to be admitted, he would be best contented without admittance; but the custom in every manor is in this point compulsory. For, either upon pain of forfeiture of their copyhold, or of incurring some great penalty, the heirs of copyholders are enforced, in every manor, to come into court and be admitted according to the custom, within a short time after notice given of their ancestor's decease."

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-THIRD. [373]

OF ALIENATION BY DEVISE.

§ 506. Conveyance by devise.—The last method of conveying real property is by devise, or disposition contained in a man's last will and testament.<sup>1</sup> And, in considering this subject, I shall not at present inquire into the nature of wills and testaments, which are more properly the instruments to convey personal estates; but only into the original and antiquity of devising real estates by will, and the construction of the several statutes upon which that power is now founded.

§ 507. 1. Feudal restraints on power to devise.—It seems sufficiently clear, that, before the Conquest, lands were devisable by will.<sup>a</sup> But, upon the introduction of the military tenures, the restraint of devising lands naturally took place, as a branch of

<sup>1</sup> Power to devise.—The best account of the origin of wills in Roman law is in Maine's Ancient Law, c. 6, 7, pp. 166–231. For their history in England, see Digby's History of the Law of Real Property, esp. c. 8, pp. 298–312. The right to devise land may undoubtedly be considered a common-law right in America, the statute of 1540 having been passed before the settlement of the country, and applying from the beginning to all socage lands. All lands in the colonies were socage.

In most, if not all of the United States, the power to devise is expressly given and regulated by statute. As a rule, a person of full age and sound mind may dispose by will of all his property, except what is needed to pay his debts, or what is allowed as a homestead or otherwise given by law as privileged property to his wife and family. As to title by devise generally, see Jarman on Wills (Am. ed. by Perkins); Redfield on Wills; Redfield's Leading Cases on the Law of Wills; Cruise's Digest, tit. 38 (occupying the whole of vol. 6); 4 Kent, Lect., 68; 3 Washburn, c. 6, pp. 421–465 (top); 2 Hilliard, c. 90–98, inclusive; and latest and best on this subject, the treatment in Woerner, American Law of Administration, 2 vols.

An instrument may be partly a deed and partly a devise. If it passes a present interest, although the right to its possession and enjoyment may not accrue till some future time, it is a deed or contract; but if the instrument does not pass an interest or right till the death of the maker, it is a will or testamentary paper. (Burlington University v. Barrett, 22 Iowa, 60, with cases cited pp. 72, 73.)—HAMMOND.

the feudal doctrine of nonalienation without the consent of the lord.<sup>b</sup> And some have questioned, whether this restraint (which we may trace even from the ancient Germans<sup>c</sup>) was not founded upon truer principles of policy than the power of wantonly disinheriting the heir by will, and transferring the estate, through the dotage or caprice of the ancestor, from those of his blood to utter strangers. For this, it is alleged, maintained the balance of property, and prevented one man from growing too big or powerful for his neighbors; since it rarely happens [<sup>374</sup>] that the same man is heir to many others, though by art and management he may frequently become their devisee. Thus the ancient law of the Athenians directed that the estate of the deceased should always descend to his children; or, on failure of lineal descendants, should go to the collateral relations: which had an admirable effect in keeping up equality and preventing the accumulations of estates. But when Solon<sup>d</sup> made a slight alteration, by permitting them (though only on failure of issue) to dispose of their lands by testament, and devise away estates from the collateral heir, this soon produced an excess of wealth in some, and of poverty in others: which, by a natural progression, first produced popular tumults and dissensions; and these at length ended in tyranny, and the utter extinction of liberty; which was quickly followed by a total subversion of their state and nation. On the other hand, it would now seem hard, on account of some abuses (which are the natural consequence of free agency, when coupled with human infirmity) to debar the owner of lands from distributing them after his death, as the exigence of his family affairs, or the justice due to his creditors, may perhaps require. And this power, if prudently managed, has with us a peculiar propriety; by preventing the very evil which resulted from Solon's institution, the too great accumulation of property: which is the natural consequence of our doctrine of succession by primogeniture, to which the Athenians were strangers. Of this accumulation the ill effects were severely felt even in the feudal times: but it should always be strongly discouraged in a commercial country, whose welfare depends on the number of moderate fortunes engaged in the extension of trade.

However this be, we find that, by the common law of England since the Conquest, no estate, greater than for term of years, could be disposed of by testament; * except only in Kent, and in some ancient burghs, and a few particular manors, where their Saxon immunities by special indulgence subsisted.<sup>f</sup> And though the feudal restraint on alienations [375] by deed vanished very early, yet this on wills continued for some centuries after; from an apprehension of infirmity and imposition on the testator in extremis (in his last moments), which made such devises suspicious.<sup>g</sup> Besides, in devises there was wanting that general notariety, and public designation of the successor, which in descents is apparent to the neighborhood, and which the simplicity of the common law always required in every transfer and new acquisition of property.

§ 508. 2. Devise of the use; Statute of Wills, 1540.—But when ecclesiastical ingenuity had invented the doctrine of uses, as a thing distinct from the land, uses began to be devised very frequently,<sup>h</sup> and the devisee of the use could in chancery compel its execution. For it is observed by Gilbert,<sup>i</sup> that, as the popish clergy then generally sat in the court of chancery, they considered that men are most liberal when they can enjoy their possessions no longer: and therefore at their death would choose to dispose of them to those who, according to the superstition of the times, could intercede for their happiness in another world. But, when the statute of uses<sup>j</sup> had annexed the possession to the use, these uses, being now the very land itself, became no longer devisable: which might have occasioned a great revolution in the law of devises, had not the statute of wills been made about five years after, viz., 32 Hen. VIII, c. 1 (Wills, 1540), explained by 34 Hen. VIII, c. 5 (Wills, 1542), which enacted that all persons being seised in fee simple (except feme covert, infants, idiots and persons of nonsane memory)<sup>2</sup> might by will and testament in writing devise to any other person, but not to bodies corporate, two-thirds of their lands, tenements, and hereditaments, held in chivalry, and the whole of those held in socage: which now, through the alteration of tenures by the statute of Charles the Second, amounts to the whole of their landed property, except their copyhold tenements.

§ 509. 3. Devises to corporations for charitable uses.—Corporations were excepted in these statutes, to prevent the extension of gifts in mortmain;<sup>3</sup> but now, by construction [376] of the statute 43 Eliz., c. 4 (Charitable Gifts, 1601), it is held, that a devise to a corporation for a charitable use is valid, as operating in the nature of an appointment, rather than of a bequest. And indeed the piety of the judges hath formerly carried them great

<sup>3</sup> Statutes of mortmain.—The statutes of mortmain never having been regarded as a part of our common law, or re-enacted in terms, and there being no power of a corporation to devise or make a will of any kind, in the very nature of the case the only question that can arise with us is not of the right of the testator to give, but that of the corporation to take a devise. And this depends on the general statutes of the state or the constitutive acts of the corporation. Most charters contain the power to take real estate requisite for the use of the corporation, or in cases where it is necessary to secure debts due it, etc. Some few have unlimited power to take it as an investment. A corporation may be formed under general incorporation acts for the purpose of buying and selling lands for profit, as well as for dealing in other property.

But it is conceived that the power of a corporation to take land by devise is not entirely free from question, where it is not given by positive law, and that it is going too far to say, as some of the books do, that they have the right at common law to take, hold and dispose of real property for any purposes not inconsistent with the object of their creation. Like most questions of the limitation upon free disposal of land, this has attracted little attention during the century in which our national domain has seemed inexhaustible, and public opinion is but just awakened to it. The natural consequence will be legislative, if not judicial, restraints upon any ownership that tends toward monopoly.

The statutes of mortmain as they are commonly reckoned are the following: (1) Magna Carta. 9 Hen. III, c. 36, A. D. 1225. (2) De Religiosis. 7 Edw. I, stat. 2, A. D. 1279. (3) Recoveries of land by default. Westm. 2, or 13 Edw. I, c. 32, A. D. 1285. (4) Proviso in quia emptores. 18 Edw. I, c. 3, A. D. 1290. (5) What shall be mortmain (lands purchased to the use of religious houses, etc.). 15 Rich. II, c. 5, 1392. (6) Of superstitious uses. 23 Hen. VIII, c. 10, A. D. 1532.—HAMMOND.

lengths in supporting such charitable uses; * it being held that the statute of Elizabeth, which favors appointments to charities, supercedes and repeals all former statutes,<sup>1</sup> and supplies all defects of assurances:<sup>m</sup> and therefore not only a devise to a corporation, but a devise by a copyhold tenant without surrendering to the use of his will,<sup>n</sup> and a devise (nay, even a settlement) by tenant in tail without either fine or recovery, if made to a charitable use, are good by way of appointment.<sup>o</sup>

§ 510. 4. Statute of Frauds, 1677.—With regard to devises in general, experience soon showed how difficult and hazardous a thing it is, even in matters of public utility, to depart from the rules of the common law; which are so nicely constructed and so artificially connected together, that the least breach in any one of them disorders for a time the texture of the whole. Innumerable frauds and perjuries were quickly introduced by this parliamentary method of inheritance: for so loose was the construction made upon this act by the courts of law, that bare notes in the handwriting of another person were allowed to be good wills within the statute.<sup>p</sup> To remedy which, the statute of frauds and perjuries, 29 Car. II, c. 3 (1677), directs, that all devises of lands and tenements shall not only be in writing, but signed by the testator, or some other person in his presence, and by his express direction; and be subscribed, in his presence, by three or four credible witnesses.<sup>4</sup> And a solemnity nearly similar is requisite for revoking a devise.*

* Ninth edition adds, "by writing; though the same may be also revoked by burning, canceling, tearing, or obliterating thereof by the devisor, or in his presence and with his consent: as likewise impliedly, by such a great and entire alteration in the circumstances and situation of the devisor, as arises from marriage and the birth of a child." <sup>4</sup> A similar provision is incorporated into the statutes of all the American states, varying, however, as to the number of witnesses required, and as to the

further requirement that the witnesses shall subscribe in the presence of each other.—Woerner, Administration (2d ed.), 66. The required number of attesting witnesses in England was reduced to two by the Wills Act, 1837.

moving all possibility of their interest affecting their testimony. The same statute likewise established the competency of creditors, by directing the testimony of all such creditors to be admitted, but leaving their credit (like that of all other witnesses) to be considered, on a view of all the circumstances, by the court [378] and jury before whom such will shall be contested. And in a much later case<sup>u</sup> the testimony of three witnesses, who were creditors, was held to be sufficiently credible, though the land was charged with the payment of debts; and the reasons given on the former determination were said to be insufficient.

§ 512. b. Specialty creditors.—Another inconvenience was found to attend this new method of conveyance by devise; in that creditors by bond and other specialties, which affected the heir provided he had assets by descent, were now defrauded of their securities, not having the same remedy against the devisee of their debtor. To obviate which, the statute 3 & 4 W. & M., c. 14 (Wills, 1691), hath provided, that all wills, and testaments, limitations, dispositions, and appointments of real estates, by tenants in fee simple or having power to dispose by will, shall (as against such creditors only) be deemed to be fraudulent and void: and that such creditors may maintain their actions jointly against both the heir and the devisee.

§ 513. 5. Distinction between wills of land and of chattels.—A will of lands, made by the permission and under the control of these statutes, is considered by the courts of law not so much in the nature of a testament, as of a conveyance declaring the uses to which the land shall be subject: with this difference, that in other conveyances the actual subscription of the witnesses is not required by law,<sup>v</sup> though it is prudent for them so to do, in order to assist their memory when living and to supply their evidence when dead; but in devises of lands such subscription is now absolutely necessary by statute, in order to identify a conveyance, which in its nature can never be set up till after the death of the devisor. And upon this notion, that a devise affecting lands is merely a species of conveyance, is founded this distinction between such devises and testaments of personal chattels; <sup>5</sup> that the latter will operate upon whatever the testator dies possessed of, the former only upon such real estates as were his at the time of executing and publishing his will.* Wherefore no <sup>[379]</sup> after-purchased lands will pass under such devise,<sup>7</sup> unless, subsequent to the purchase or contract,<sup>8</sup> the devisor republishes his will.*<sup>6</sup>

<sup>5</sup> Devise as conveyance.—Even the making of a will does not take away the distinction between real and personal property, as to the passage of title. If a man deviseth, either by special name or generally, goods or chattels, real or personal, and dieth, the devisee cannot take them without the assent of the executors. But when a man is seised of lands in fee and deviseth the same, in fee or tail, for life or for years, the devisee shall enter; for in that case the executor has no meddling therewith. And in the case of a devise by will of lands whereof the devisor is seised in fee, the freehold or interest in law is in the devisee before he enter, and in that case nothing (having regard to the estate or interest devised) descendeth to the heir. But if the heir of the devisor entereth and hold the devisee out, he may enter, as Littleton here saith (§ 167) or have his writ, called Ex gravi querela. After an actual possession this writ lieth not, for then the devisee may have his ordinary remedy by the common law. (Co. Litt. 111 c.)

Consistently with this doctrine it will be seen that in all the older books devise is treated quite apart from other matters relating to the will, and as a species of conveyance from the devisor directly to the devisee, with which the ecclesiastical courts, the proper forum for probate matters, had nothing to do. But the law does not cast the estate on the devisee as it does upon the heir, without reference to his own consent. The acceptance of a devisee will ordinarily be presumed, but he may disclaim it, and it will then go to the heir. (3 Washburn, c. 6, pl. 43. And see cases collected in n. 1, p. 461.)

"The earliest definite juristic conception which was formed of an English will of lands, seems to have been that it operated as a declaration of the testator's intention, as to the use or beneficial interest in lands; as in fact a conveyance of the particular beneficial interest intended to be dealt with. Thus a will of land has always been regarded as a conveyance of a particular interest, coming into operation immediately upon the death of the testator, and not as creating a succession in the sense of Roman law. . . . After the statute of Hen. VIII, a will operated as a conveyance, dealing with the legal interest possessed by the testator at the date of the will, and intended to be disposed of, but coming into effect only at his death, and being of course subject to revocation at any time before his death." (Digby, Hist. of the Law of Real Property, pp. 301-303.)—HAMMOND.

<sup>6</sup> Operation of devise.—This view of a devise was no doubt due in the first place to historical facts: especially to the desire to keep devises of land

§ 514. Rules and maxims for construing conveyances.—We have now considered the several species of common assurances, whereby a title to lands and tenements may be transferred and conveyed from one man to another. But, before we conclude this head, it may not be improper to take notice of a few general rules and maxims, which have been laid down by courts of justice, for the construction and exposition of them all. These are,<sup>7</sup> entirely free from the ecclesiastical jurisdiction over testamentary matters. It originated long before the statute of 32 Hen. VIII, c. 1, to which it has sometimes been ascribed. (Ld. Mansfield in Cowp. 90.) But it is now so completely obsolete, and wills of land and of chattels so generally identified, that both are regarded as speaking from the time of testator's death, and operating on all property, real or personal, then owned by him, even when this is not declared by statute, as it now is in most of the United States, and even in England. (Stat. 1 Vict., c. 26, § 24.) After-acquired lands pass by a will, unless a contrary intention shall appear in the will itself.

It is not a real, even if apparent exception to this rule (that the will speaks from the date of death) that when the testator's ability or capacity to make a will is in question, it is with reference to the date when the will offered was actually executed, and not to the date of death that the proof must be directed. A will made in sound mind is not shaken by subsequent incapacity. A will made in a fit of lunacy is not validated by his subsequent death in sound mind. A will made under disability remains invalid though the disability be removed before death. (Girard v. Philadelphia, 4 Rawle (Pa.), 323, 336, 26 Am. Dec. 145, and cases cited.) Of course the law at the time of death governs the interpretation of devises as well as bequests, and even the formalities of execution. In one respect, however, devises of real property must be distinguished from bequests of personalty. The latter are governed by the law of the domicile: the former by the law of the state in which they lie. This is a general principle of universal application; but is modified by statute in many states, which admit to proof and effect wills of land within their borders, executed in conformity with the law of the testator's domicile. How far this shall go in respect to effect must of course depend in each state upon the language of its statutes.—HAMMOND.

<sup>7</sup> Principles of construction.—1. The rules for construing conveyances are correctly given by Blackstone. A modern statement of them would consist largely in annotations and in setting forth the variety of circumstances under which they have been applied. As to the intention of the parties, the rule is that the intention is to be ascertained by considering all the provisions of the deed, as well as the situation of the parties, and then, when practicable, to give effect to the intention so ascertained. Pike v. Munroe, 36 Me. 309, 58 Am. Dec. 751; Clute v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 120 N. Y. 267, 24 N. E. 817; Burnett v. Piercy, 149 Cal. 178, 86 Pac. 603. Chief Justice Shaw has thus expressed the method to be adopted in arriving at the intent of the parties: “The same individual owning two tenements adjoining, may carve out and sell any portion that he pleases, and the terms of the grant, as they can be learned either by words clearly expressed, or by just and sound construction, will regulate and measure the rights of the grantee. In construing the words of such a grant, where the words are doubtful or ambiguous, several rules are applicable, all, however, designed to aid in ascertaining what was the intent of the parties, such intent, when ascertained, being the governing principle of construction.

§ 515. 1. Favorable to apparent intent.—That the construction be favorable, and as near the minds and apparent intents of the parties as the rules of law will admit.<sup>b</sup> For the maxims of law are, that “verba intentioni debent inservire (words should be subservient to the intention)”; and “benigne interpretamur chartas propter simplicitatem laicorum (we interpret deeds favorably on account of the ignorance of the laity).” And therefore the construction must also be reasonable, and agreeable to common understanding.<sup>c</sup>

“And first, as the language of the deed is the language of the grantor, the rule is, that all doubtful words shall be construed most strongly against the grantor, and most favorably and beneficially for the grantee. Again, every provision, clause and word in the same instrument shall be taken into consideration in ascertaining the meaning of the parties, whether words of grant, of covenant or description, or words of qualification, restraint, exception or explanation. Again, every word shall be presumed to have been used for some purpose, and shall be deemed to have some force and effect, if it can have. And further, although parol evidence is not admissible, to prove that the parties intended something different from that which the written language expresses, or which may be the legal inference and conclusion to be drawn from it, yet it is always competent to give in evidence existing circumstances, such as the actual condition and situation of the land, buildings, passages, water-courses, and other local objects, in order to give a definite meaning to language used in the deed, and to show the sense, in which particular words were probably used by the parties, especially in matters of description.” Salisbury v. Andrews, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 250, 252.

2. “A grammatical construction is not always to be followed, and it has been well said that neither false English nor bad Latin will make void a deed when the meaning of the party is apparent. In construing an instrument, that construction is always to be adopted which will accomplish the object for which the instrument was executed.” Cope, J., in Hancock v. Watson, 18 Cal. 137, 139. Cotting v. Boston, 201 Mass. 97, 87 N. E. 205; Jackson v. Topping, 1

§ 516. 2. Words taken in ordinary sense.—That quoties in verbis nulla est ambiguitas, ibi nulla expositio contra verba fienda est (where there is no ambiguity in the words, they should be construed according to their obvious meaning):<sup>4</sup> but that, where the intention is clear, too minute a stress be not laid on the strict and precise signification of words; nam qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice (for he who confines himself to the letter, goes but half-way). Therefore, by a grant of a remainder a reversion may well

Wend. (N. Y.) 388, 19 Am. Dec. 515. "Punctuation," says Mr. Justice Baldwin, "is a most fallible standard by which to interpret a writing. It may be resorted to when all other means fail; but the court will first take the instrument by its four corners in order to ascertain its true meaning; if that is apparent, on judicially inspecting the whole, the punctuation will not be suffered to change it." Ewing v. Burnet, 11 Pet. (U. S.) 41, 54, 9 L. Ed. 624.

3. A deed should be construed in its entirety; it should be viewed as a whole; effect should be given to every part, if possible. If a person claims under a deed, he must accept it as a whole, and cannot adopt those parts which are favorable, and reject those that are unfavorable. Lyford v. Laconia, 75 N. H. 220, 139 Am. St. Rep. 680, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062, 72 Atl. 1085; Davenport v. Gwilliams, 133 Ind. 142, 22 L. R. A. 244, 31 N. E. 790; Jones v. Pashby, 62 Mich. 614, 29 N. W. 374; Crocker v. Cotting, 166 Mass. 183, 33 L. R. A. 245, 44 N. E. 214; Young v. Camp Mfg. Co., 110 Va. 678, 66 S. E. 843.

4. "The plaintiffs insist that the part of the deed which precedes the granting clause manifests an intention of the grantor to convey the interest he owned in the lands or to which he was, by curtesy, entitled as tenant for life; and, further, that this theory is strengthened and made more tenable by the habendum clause. If this be true, then, bearing in mind what has been said of the granting clause, two conflicting intentions are expressed, and the deed should be construed according to the well-recognized rules of interpretation. One of the cardinal rules is that deeds of bargain and sale founded upon a valuable consideration are to be construed most strongly against the grantor and in favor of the grantee. Seay v. McCormick, 68 Ala. 549; 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 848; Lamb v. Medsker, 35 Ind. App. 662, 74 N. E. 1012; Whetstone v. Hunt, 78 Ark. 230, 8 Ann. Cas. 443, 93 S. W. 979; Budd v. Brooke, 3 Gill (Md.), 198, 43 Am. Dec. 321." Denson, J., in Dickson v. Van Hoose, 157 Ala. 459, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 719, 47 South. 718.

5. In illustration of the rule that conveyances will, if possible, be given effect, the following case may be cited. A father gave and granted to his daughter, in consideration of love and affection, "all that tract of land constituting his residence in said county, to have and hold the aforesaid premises pass, and e converso.* And another maxim of law is, that "mala grammatica non vitiat chartam (bad grammar does not vitiate a deed); neither false English nor bad Latin will destroy a deed."

* Hob. 27.

after his death during her natural life." The grantor reserved the right of controlling the premises during his lifetime, and expressed his desire that at his daughter's death the property should be sold and divided between the balance of his children. In construing this instrument, the court said: "It is not easy to say what this instrument is. It has the form and general requisites of a deed, including the attestation. Construed as a deed, it would have validity and take effect; construed as a will, it would be a nullity, as it has but two witnesses, and the law requires three. We do not certainly know what it is. Its construction is very doubtful. Taking all its terms together, it would seem that the grantor intended to pass something presently, for he defines what it was his purpose to reserve, namely: the control during his own life. By control, he most probably meant possession, use and enjoyment; not absolute title, with power of disposition beyond the term of his own life. To hold the instrument to be a will would be to make the reservation altogether idle and useless. By holding it to be a deed, effect can be given to the reservation as a part of the instrument—to all the words, without rejecting any as superfluous. This, we think, is the safer and better construction." Bleckley, J., in Dismukes v. Parrott, 56 Ga. 513.

6. While the courts will avoid, if possible, a construction which will create a repugnance between different parts of a deed, Chew v. Kellar, 171 Mo. 215, 71 S. W. 172; if a deed contains two clauses clearly repugnant to each other, the first will prevail. Blackwell v. Blackwell, 124 N. C. 269, 32 S. E. 676; Owensboro & N. R. Co. v. Griffith, 92 Ky. 137, 17 S. W. 277. In the case of wills, however, the latter of two inconsistent dispositions must prevail. Van Nostrand v. Moore, 52 N. Y. 12; Iglehart v. Kirwan, 10 Md. 559; Snively v. Stover, 78 Pa. St. 484; Orr v. Moses, 52 Me. 287; Brownfield v. Wilson, 78 Ill. 467; Holdefer v. Teifel, 51 Ind. 343; Hendershot v. Shields, 42 N. J. Eq. 317, 3 Atl. 355; Armstrong v. Crapo, 72 Iowa, 604, 34 N. W. 437.

7. A summary of the rules of construction of wills may be found in 2 Bigelow's Jarman on Wills, *1654 ff. Also see 2 Woerner, Am. Law of Administration (2d ed.), *870 ff. For a full treatment of the principles of construction of deeds, see 2 Devlin, Real Estate and Deeds (3d ed.), 1504 ff. As a comment on the whole subject the remarks of Mr. Justice Sanderson are well worth observing: "In the construction of written instruments, we have never derived much aid from the technical rules of the books. The only rule of much value—one which is frequently shadowed forth, but seldom, if ever, expressly stated in the books—is to place ourselves as near as possible in the seats which were occupied by the parties at the time the instrument was executed; then, taking it by its four corners, read it." Walsh v. Hill, 38 Cal. 481, 487.

Which perhaps a classical critic may think to be no unnecessary caution.

§ 517. 3. Effect to every part.—That the construction be made upon the entire deed, and not merely upon disjointed parts of it. “Nam ex antecedentibus et consequentibus fit optima interpretatio (for a deed is best interpreted by the bearing of all its parts).”<sup>a</sup> And [380] therefore that every part of it, be (if possible) made to take effect; and no word but what may operate in some shape or other.<sup>b</sup> “Nam verba debent intelligi cum effectu, ut res magis valeat quem pareat (for words should be understood with an effect that may tend more to strengthen than destroy the subject matter).”<sup>1</sup>

§ 518. 4. Taken most strongly against maker.—That the deed be taken most strongly against him that is the agent or contractor, and in favor of the other party. “Verba fortius accipiuntur contra proferentem (words should be taken most strongly against him who uses them).” As, if tenant in fee simple grants to anyone an estate for life, generally, it shall be construed an estate for the life of the grantee.<sup>1</sup> For the principle of self-preservation will make men sufficiently careful, not to prejudice their own interest by the too extensive meaning of their words: and hereby all manner of deceit in any grant is avoided; for men would always affect ambiguous and intricate expressions, provided they were afterwards at liberty to put their own construction upon them. But here a distinction must be taken between an indenture and a deed poll: for the words of an indenture, executed by both parties, are to be considered as the words of them both; for, though delivered as the words of one party, yet they are not his words only, but the other party hath given his consent to every one of them. But in a deed poll, executed only by the grantor, they are the words of the grantor only, and shall be taken most strongly against him.<sup>2</sup> And, in general, this rule being a rule of some strictness and rigor, is the last to be resorted to, and is never to be relied upon, but where all other rules of exposition fail.<sup>1</sup>

§ 519. 5. Validity preferred.—That, if the words will bear two senses, one agreeable to, and another against, law; that sense be preferred, which is most agreeable thereto.<sup>m</sup> As if tenant in tail lets a lease for life generally, it shall be construed for his own life only, for that stands with the law; and not for the life of the lessee, which is beyond his power to grant.

§ 520. 6. Where clauses repugnant.—<sup>[381]</sup> That, in a deed, if there be two clauses so totally repugnant to each other, that they cannot stand together, the first shall be received and the latter rejected:<sup>n</sup> wherein it differs from a will; for there, of two such repugnant clauses the latter shall stand.<sup>o</sup> Which is owing to the different natures of the two instruments; for the first deed, and the last will are always most available in law. Yet in both cases we should rather attempt to reconcile them.<sup>p</sup>

§ 521. 7. The devisor's intention to be attained.—That a devise be most favorably expounded, to pursue, if possible, the will of the devisor, who for want of advice or learning may have omitted the legal or proper phrases. And therefore many times the law dispenses with the want of words in devises, that are absolutely requisite in all other instruments. Thus a fee may be conveyed without words of inheritance;<sup>q</sup> and an estate-tail without words of procreation.<sup>r</sup> By a will, also, an estate may pass by mere implication, without any express words to direct its course. As, where A devises lands to his heir at law, after the death of his wife: here, though no estate is given to the wife in express terms, yet she shall have an estate for life by implication;<sup>s</sup> for the intent of the testator is clearly to postpone the heir till after her death; and, if she does not take it, nobody else can. So, also, where a devise is of black-acre to A and of white-acre to B in tail, and if they both die without issue, then to C in fee; here A and B have cross-remainders by implication, and on the failure of either's issue, the other or his issue shall take the whole; and C's remainder over shall be postponed till the issue of both shall fail.<sup>t</sup> But, to avoid confusion, no such cross-remainders are allowed between more than two devisees: "8 and, in general, where any implications are allowed, they must be such as are necessary (or at least highly [382] probable) and not merely possible implication." And herein there is no distinction between the rules of law and of equity; for the will, being considered in both courts in the light of a limitation of uses,<sup>8</sup> is construed in each with equal favor and benignity, and expounded rather on its own particular circumstances, than by any general rules of positive law.

§ 522. Recapitulation of subject of common assurances.—

And thus we have taken the transient view, in this and the three preceding chapters, of a very large and diffusive subject, the doctrine of common assurances: which concludes our observations on the title to things real, or the means by which they may be reciprocally lost and acquired. We have before considered the estates which may be had in them, with regard to their duration or quantity of interest, the time of their enjoyment, and the number and connections of the persons entitled to hold them: we have examined the tenures, both ancient and modern, whereby those estates have been, and are now, holden: and have distinguished the object of all these inquiries, namely, things real, into the corporeal or substantial, and incorporeal or ideal kind; and have thus considered the rights of real property in every light wherein they are contemplated by the laws of England. A system of laws that differs much from every other system, except those of the same feudal origin, in its notions and regulations of landed estates; and which therefore could in this particular be very seldom compared with any other.

8 Cross-remainders.—This restriction was done away with soon after Blackstone wrote, as is shown by a note of his first commentator, Christian. Lord Mansfield said that there was a presumption against cross-remainders between more than two, but the intention of the testator would defeat it. (Pery v. White, 2 Cowp. 777, 797, 98 Eng. Reprint, 1356; Doe v. Burville, 2 East, 47, 102 Eng. Reprint, 285; Atherton v. Pye, 4 Term Rep. 710, 100 Eng. Reprint, 1258.) Stronger evidence in favor of that intention is required of a cross-remainder among three or more, than when it is to two only. (Hannaford v. Hannaford, L. R. 7 Q. B. 116; Re Ridge's Trusts, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 665; Powell v. Howells, L. R. 3 Q. B. 654.)—HAMMOND.

The subject, which has thus employed our attention, is of very extensive use, and of as extensive variety. And yet, I am afraid, it has offered the student less amusement and pleasure in the pursuit, than the matters discussed in the preceding volume. To say the truth, the vast alterations which the doctrine of real property has undergone from the Conquest to the present time; the infinite determinations upon points that continually arise, and which have been heaped one upon another for a course of seven centuries, without any order or [393] method; and the multiplicity of acts of parliament which have amended, or sometimes only altered the common law: these causes have made the study of this branch of our national jurisprudence a little perplexed and intricate. It hath been my endeavor principally to select such parts of it, as were of the most general use, where the principles were the most simple, the reasons of them the most obvious, and the practice the least embarrassed. Yet I cannot presume that I have always been thoroughly intelligible to such of my readers, as were before strangers even to the very terms of art, which I have been obliged to make use of: though, whenever those have first occurred, I have generally attempted a short explication of their meaning. These are indeed the more numerous, on account of the different languages which our law has at different periods been taught to speak; the difficulty arising from which will insensibly diminish by use and familiar acquaintance. And therefore I shall close this branch of our inquiries with the words of Sir Edward Coke: * "Albeit the student shall not at any one day, do what he can, reach to the full meaning of all that is here laid down, yet let him no way discourage himself but proceed; for on some other day, in some other place" (or perhaps upon a second perusal of the same), "his doubts will be probably removed."

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FOURTH. [384]

OF THINGS PERSONAL.

§ 523. Former inferiority of things personal.—Under the name of things personal are included all sorts of things movable, which may attend a man's person wherever he goes; <sup>1</sup> and therefore, being only the objects of the law while they remain within the limits of its jurisdiction, and being also of a perishable quality, are not esteemed of so high a nature, nor paid so much regard to by the

1 Definition of things personal; choses in action.—Blackstone's account of things personal has been criticised without any reference to his own limitation of the term "things" to the objects of the right of property, and to such as are "unconnected with the person" (2 Comm. 1); and therefore he has been accused of an error in not making his definitions large enough to include damages for purely personal wrongs, which are not things in his estimation. On the other hand, he has been judged by a definition which limited "things" to "permanent objects, sensible or perceptible through the senses" (Austin, Lect. xiii), and therefore accused of overlooking things incorporeal altogether. (Williams on Personal Property, p. 4.) A recent writer has even succeeded in combining the two objections in one. (Schouler on Personal Property, § 11.) Again, he has been criticised for choosing mobility as the distinctive mark of things personal, when Lord Coke had given him the choice between that and "for that they are to be recovered in personal actions" (Co. Litt. 118 b; Williams on Personal Property, *2), and per contra has been criticised for not confining personal property more carefully to movables. (Amos, Systematic Jurisprudence, pp. 134, 135.) Mr. Rawle, the American editor of Williams, has defended Blackstone's position on this last question, without going into the inquiry as to the historical origin of the term.

I have expressed elsewhere my opinion as to the reasons that led Blackstone deliberately to reject all the civilian distinctions based on the difference of remedies in rem and in personam, and it is enough to say here that he would have been inconsistent with his plan, in choosing that definition. The one he adopts was perhaps the most important trait, when he wrote, of personal property in general, though it is of modern origin, and therefore unknown to the Roman law. It appears to have originated with the writers on the "conflict of laws" or Private International Law, who express it in the form mobilia ossibus inherent or mobilia legibus domicilii judicantur. (See Story, Conflict of Laws, §§ 377-379.) It is founded on the character of personal property as movable, which is by no means fully conclusive as a test, and has become of less importance since Blackstone wrote.

It is now very generally held that personal property may have its own situs. The right of a state to tax it, when within its jurisdiction, even though it may law, as things that are in their nature more permanent and immovable, as lands, and houses, and the profits issuing thereout. These being constantly within the reach, and under the protection of the law, were the principal favorites of our first legislators: who took all imaginable care in ascertaining the rights, and directing the disposition, of such property as they imagined to be lasting, and which would answer to posterity the trouble and pains that their ancestors employed about them; but at the same time entertained a very low and contemptuous opinion of all personal estate, which they regarded only as a transient commodity. The amount of it indeed was, comparatively, very trifling, during the scarcity of money and the ignorance of luxurious refinements, which prevailed be taxed also in the owner's domicile, is distinctly affirmed in Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. Ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475; and for many other purposes the lex rei sitæ is now extended to it.

It should be noticed that Blackstone does not use the term "property" for the things, but for the ownership or title to the things which constitute personal property in the modern sense. He treats in this chapter of property in the recent sense, and in the next of "property in things personal." The word itself is ambiguous, as Mr. Smith long ago pointed out (Real and Personal Property, p. 1; and compare Austin, ii. 816, 836), and leads to the same confusion of thought as that by which "tenements," "hereditaments," and other things real have been mixed up with the "estates" in them, as shown in a previous note. The same confusion now lurks under the ancient common-law distinction of "things in possession" and "things in action," and if it has not led Blackstone himself into a false classification, it has certainly sent some of his critics and improvers astray when they try to combine it with the distinction of things corporeal and things incorporeal, "objects of the sense and mere rights," in order to cover the forms of personal property, of which the common law knew nothing. (E. g., Schouler on Personal Property, § 11.) Kent's designation of things in action as quasi tangible (2 Comm. 340, n.) is much nearer the true notion. Wooddesson long ago pointed out that the two terms corresponded to the jus in re, jus ad rem, of the civilians, except that the latter was a distinction of rights (jura), and the common law expresses it as a distinction of the objects of rights, the things themselves. (2 Lectures, 235.) This last point must not be lost sight of in discussing our own law. It deserves attention, because some recent attempts to improve on Blackstone's classification of things personal seem to rest on the assumption that things in action and things incorporeal are of the same nature, or the one only an extension of the other. This leads to another great mistake—the identification of the thing in action with the right to the thing, which appears in so many forms in recent books, and even in the new codes of New York and other in the feudal ages. Hence it was, that a tax of the fifteenth, tenth, or sometimes a much larger proportion, of all the movables of the subject, was frequently laid without scruple, and is mentioned with much unconcern by our ancient historians, though now it would justly alarm our opulent merchants and stockholders. And hence likewise may be derived the frequent forfeitures inflicted by the common [385] law, of all a man's goods and chattels, for misbehaviors and inadvertencies that at present hardly seem to deserve so severe a punishment. Our ancient law books, which are founded upon the feudal provisions, do not, therefore, often condescend to states. (N. Y. 1885, §§ 502, 503.) The proof seems easy: all choses in action are jura incorporalia; all rights to things are jura incorporalia; therefore all choses in action are rights to things. Not only is the syllogism fallacious, but the first premise is also untrue. Whether in possession or in action, the thing or chose is always the object of a right, and not the right itself.

Blackstone never treats a chose in action as a mere right or title to choses in possession, or to other property, as it is so frequently regarded now. It is to him distinctly a kind of property, not of right to property. This is implied in his entire treatment of the subject, beginning with the first statement of the distinction in chapter 25, and carried out in his enumeration of the various titles to personal property, which are all placed in the same series and on the same level, whether they give title in possession or in action, as in chapter 30.

It need hardly be pointed out that this is inconsistent with any distinction between rights in rem and in personam. If he had intended to deny the existence of any such distinction in English law, he could hardly have done so more plainly. For example, in this chapter 30, the gift or grant transfers a title in rem, the property in the chattel or the chattel itself in possession; but the contract, as he himself says, gives property in action only, or in civilian terms rights in personam, obligations, or at the most rights ad rem. I cannot believe that Blackstone did this without being fully aware of its meaning. He saw that the common law recognized no such distinction between rights in rem and in personam as was fundamental in the civil law. This is more commonly stated in a different form, by saying that the common law recognized no right in rem to chattels. But this is not quite accurate. Property in chattels is not protected by so elaborate a system of actions as that in land was, while the real actions were in use, but it was essentially of the same nature where it existed. The most important difference was that property in land depended on seisin, which was very rigidly defined, while property in chattels might pass from one person to another without delivery of possession and even without formal act or writing of any kind.

Savigny has pointed out very clearly, in his System (§ 56, Bd. 1, pp. 371-375), that the distinction of jura in rem and jura in personam, or of property regulate this species of property. There is not a chapter in Britton or the Mirror, that can fairly be referred to this head; and the little that is to be found in Glanvill, Bracton, and Fleta, seems principally borrowed from the civilians.

§ 524. Modern importance of things personal.—But of later years, since the introduction and extension of trade and commerce, which are entirely occupied in this species of property, and have greatly augmented its quantity and of course its value, we have learned to conceive different ideas of it. Our courts now regard a man's personalty in a light nearly, if not quite, equal to his realty: and have adopted a more enlarged and less technical mode of considering the one than the other; frequently drawn from the rules and obligations, can only be fully carried out where actions in rem and in personam are kept distinct, and each preserved in its purity—and that when this is not done property rights may become merely the incidents of obligations (as in Domat's treatment), or obligations be treated as merely the mode of acquiring property rights. The latter condition seems to have been the primitive one in English (Germanic law) and justifies Blackstone's studied disregard of the division of rights themselves as above.

Mr. Williams (Personal Property, p. 4) was the first modern writer, I think, to point out the true nature of the "choses in action," after judges and authors had long been trying to decide whether notes and bills, bank stock, and other shares, etc., were in action or in possession by the mere test of assignability. Whether he is right in saying that incorporeal hereditaments were the only res incorporales known to the common law or not, must be discussed apart; but he is certainly right in saying that res incorporales, as such, were not choses in action. The latter always implied choses in possession: a thing in action was, so to speak, the complement, the shadow of the thing in possession, and it was a thing in action, because the very purpose of an action was to make of it a thing in possession, to the proper owner. But this was equally true whether the thing itself was corporeal or incorporeal.

It may be true, as Mr. Williams and others have said, that the common law originally dealt with tangible chattels only, and knew nothing of res incorporales except in the form of incorporeal hereditaments (Personal Property, p. *2), yet we must not suppose this crude state of legal conceptions to have governed the formation of such a term as "choses in action." The date at which that term made its appearance could not have been before Bracton, for it was by him that the word "action" was introduced into English law. But Bracton and his contemporaries were familiar with the notion of res incorporales. No man of clerical education or of training in the civil and canon law could have been otherwise in the middle ages. Moreover, the word "choses" which they found already established by the Roman law, wherever those rules appeared to be well-grounded and apposite to the case in question, but principally from reason and convenience, adapted to the circumstances of the times; preserving withal a due regard to ancient usages, and a certain feudal tincture, which is still to be found in some branches of personal property.

§ 525. Meaning of things personal, or chattels.—But things personal, by our law, do not only include things movable, but also something more: the whole of which is comprehended under the general name of chattels, which, Sir Edward Coke says <sup>a</sup> is a French is of itself a sufficient proof that tangible things were not the only ones then regarded. The identification of this word with causa (Lat.) is philologically certain, however different the meaning of the two afterward became; and neither causa nor res could ever have been used by an educated man for tangible things only. The chose in possession itself was not necessarily then a tangible object. Beside incorporeal hereditaments, the law was full of terms denoting mere abstractions which might be possessed, sued for, transferred. The very expressions do ut facias, etc., which Blackstone has copied from Bracton, are sufficient to show that something to be done (i. e., a mere act or prestation in civilian language), was a chose as well as something that could be given. The actions of debt and detinue, originally one, differentiated themselves as the object was a corporeal or incorporeal thing: though in both alike this object was a chose in action to the plaintiff, a chose in possession to the defendant. Whether freehold or chattel, corporeal or incorporeal, when “they are things whereof a man is not possessed, but for recovery of them is driven to his action, they are called things in action.” (Termes de la Ley, sub voce.)

It is not inconsistent with this that in the great majority of actual cases, the familiar actions by which most men’s notions of law are formed, the thing in possession was a tangible chattel, the thing in action a mere abstraction; but an abstraction, be it remembered, of that chattel, not of the right to it. It is probable, too, that as the middle ages with their realism gave place to later modes of thought, there was a tendency to limit the term “possession” to tangible objects, and to disregard abstractions generally. “Things” became less definitely the objects of rights, until Blackstone at last treated them as the objects of property rights only, “unconnected with the person.” (See note 3 to book 1, page 332, and introduction to Sandar’s Justinian, pp. l. lvi.) Thus the chose in action came to mean the object of any action for the recovery of money or property, of any right to have money or property not already in plaintiff’s possession, as it appears in the text.—HAMMOND.

word, signifying goods. The appellation is in truth derived from the technical Latin word "catalla"; which primarily signified only beasts of husbandry, or (as we still call them) cattle, but in its secondary sense was applied to all movables in general.<sup>b</sup> In the grand coustumier of Normandy<sup>c</sup> a chattel is described as a mere movable, but at the same time it is set in opposition to a fief or feud: so that not only goods, but whatever was not a feud, were accounted chattels. And it is in this latter, more [386] extended, negative sense, that our law adopts it; the idea of goods, or movables only, being not sufficiently comprehensive to take in everything that the law considers as a chattel interest. For since, as the commentator on the coustumier<sup>d</sup> observes, there are two requisites to make a fief or heritage, duration as to time, and immobility with regard to place; whatever wants either of these qualities is not, according to the Normans, an heritage or fief; or, according to us, is not a real estate: the consequence of which in both laws is, that it must be a personal estate, or chattel.

§ 526. Division of chattels.—Chattels, therefore, are distributed by law into two kinds: chattels real, and chattels personal.<sup>e</sup>

§ 527. 1. Chattels real.—Chattels real, saith Sir Edward Coke,<sup>f</sup> are such as concern, or savor of, the realty; as terms for years of land, wardships in chivalry (while the military tenures subsisted) the next presentation to a church, estates by statute-merchant, statute-staple, elegit, or the like; of all which we have already spoken. And these are called real chattels, as being interests issuing out

<sup>e</sup> So, too, in the Norman law, Cateux sont meubles et immeubles: siccome vrais meubles sont qui transporter se peuvent, et ensuivre le corps; immeubles sont choses qui ne peuvent ensuivre le corps, niestre transportees, et tout ce qui n'est point en heritage. (Chattels are movable and immovable: those which can be transported and follow the person are movable; immovable chattels are such as cannot follow the person, or be transported from place to place; and everything which is not in the inheritance.) of, or annexed to, real estates: of which they have one quality, viz., immobility, which denominates them real; but want the other, viz., a sufficient, legal, indeterminate duration: and this want it is that constitutes them chattels. The utmost period for which they can last is fixed and determinate, either for such a space of time certain, or till such a particular sum of money be raised out of such a particular income; so that they are not equal in the eye of the law to the lowest estate of freehold, a lease for another's life: their tenants were considered upon feudal principles, as merely bailiffs or farmers; and the tenant of the freehold might at any time have destroyed their interest, till the reign of Henry VIII.<sup>a</sup> A freehold, which alone is a real estate, and seems (as has been said) to answer to the fief in Normandy, is conveyed by corporal investiture and <sup>[387]</sup> livery of seisin; which gives the tenant so strong a hold of the land, that it never after can be wrested from him during his life, but by his own act, of voluntary transfer or of forfeiture; or else by the happening of some future contingency, as in estates pur autre vie, and the determinable freeholds mentioned in a former chapter.<sup>b</sup> And even these, being of an uncertain duration, may by possibility last for the owner's life; for the law will not presuppose the contingency to happen before it actually does, and till then the estate is to all intents and purposes a life estate, and therefore a freehold, interest. On the other hand, a chattel interest in lands, which the Normans put in opposition to fief, and we to freehold, is conveyed by no seisin or corporal investiture, but the possession is gained by the mere entry of the tenant himself; and it will certainly expire at a time prefixed and determined, if not sooner. Thus a lease for years must necessarily fail at the end and completion of the term; the next presentation to a church is satisfied and gone the instant it comes into possession, that is, by the first avoidance and presentation to the living; the conditional estates by statutes and elegit are determined as soon as the debt is paid; and so guardianships in chivalry expired, of course, the moment that the heir came of age. And if there be any other chattel real, it will be found to correspond with the rest in this essential quality, that its duration is limited to a time certain, beyond which it cannot subsist.

§ 528. 2. Chattels personal.—Chattels personal are, properly and strictly speaking, things movable; which may be annexed to or attendant on the person of the owner, and carried about with him from one part of the world to another. Such are animals, household stuff, money, jewels, corn, garments, and everything else that can properly be put in motion, and transferred from place to place. And of this kind of chattels it is that we are principally to speak in the remainder of this book; having been unavoidably led to consider the nature of chattels real, and their incidents, in the former chapters which were [388] employed upon real estates: that kind of property being of a mongrel amphibious nature, originally endowed with one only of the characteristics of each species of things; the immobility of things real, and the precarious duration of things personal.

Chattel interests being thus distinguished and distributed, it will be proper to consider, first, the nature of that property, or dominion, to which they are liable; which must be principally, nay solely, referred to personal chattels: and, secondly, the title to that property, or how it may be lost and acquired. Of each of these in its order.

[389] CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FIFTH.

OF PROPERTY IN THINGS PERSONAL.

§ 529. Property in possession.—Property, in chattels personal, may be either in possession; which is where a man hath not only the right to enjoy, but hath the actual enjoyment of, the thing: or else it is in action; where a man hath only a bare right, without any occupation or enjoyment. And of these the former, or property in possession, is divided into two sorts, an absolute and a qualified property.

§ 530. 1. Absolute property.—First, then, of property in possession absolute; which is where a man hath, solely and exclusively, the right, and also the occupation, of any movable chattels; so that they cannot be transferred from him, or cease to be his, without his own act or default. Such may be all inanimate things, as goods, plate, money, jewels, implements of war, garments, and the like: such, also, may be all vegetable productions, as the fruit or other parts of a plant, when severed from the body of it; or the whole plant itself when severed from the ground; none of which can be moved out of the owner's possession without his own act or consent, or at least without doing him an injury, which it is the business of the law to prevent or remedy. Of these, therefore, there remains little to be said.

§ 531. a. Property in animals.—But with regard to animals, which have in themselves a principle and power of motion, and (unless particularly confined) can convey themselves from one part of the world to <sup>[390]</sup> another, there is a great difference made with respect to their several classes, not only in our law, but in the law of nature and of all civilized nations.

§ 532. (1) Tame animals.—They are distinguished into such as are domitæ, and such as are feræ, naturæ: some being of a tame and others of a wild disposition. In such as are of a nature tame and domestic (as horses, kine, sheep, poultry, and the like), a man may have as absolute a property as in any inanimate beings; because these continue perpetually in his occupation, and will not stray from his house or person, unless by accident or fraudulent enticement, in either of which cases the owner does not lose his property: <sup>a</sup> in which our law agrees with the laws of France and Holland.<sup>b</sup> The stealing, or forcible abduction, of such property as this, is also felony; for these are things of intrinsic value, serving for the food of man, or else for the use of husbandry.<sup>c</sup> But in animals feræ naturæ a man can have no absolute property.

Of all tame and domestic animals, the brood belongs to the owner of the dam or mother; the English law agreeing with the civil, that "partus sequitur ventrem (the offspring follows the condition of the mother)" in the brute creation, though for the most part in the human species it disallows that maxim. And therefore in the laws of England,<sup>d</sup> as well as Rome,<sup>e</sup> "si equam meam equus tuus prægnantem fecerit, non est tuum sed meum quod natum est (if my mare be with foal by your horse, the offspring is not yours but mine)." And, for this, Puffendorf<sup>f</sup> gives a sensible reason: not only because the male is frequently unknown; but also because the dam, during the time of her pregnancy, is almost useless to the proprietor, and must be maintained with greater expense and care: wherefore, as her owner is the loser by her pregnancy, he ought to be the gainer by her brood. An exception to this rule is in the case of young cygnets; which belong equally to the owner of the cock and hen, and shall be divided between them.<sup>g</sup> But here the reasons of the general rule cease, [<sup>391</sup>] and "cessante ratione cessat et ipsa lex (the reason ceasing, the law itself ceases)": for the male is well known, by his constant association with the female; and for the same reason the owner of the one doth not suffer more disadvantage, during the time of pregnancy and nurture, than the owner of the other.

§ 533. 2. Qualified property.—Other animals, that are not of a tame and domestic nature, are either not the objects of property at all,<sup>1</sup> or else fall under our other division, namely, that of quali- fied, limited, or special property: which is such as is not in its nature permanent, but may sometimes subsist, and at other times not subsist. In discussing which subject I shall, in the first place, show how this species of property may subsist in such animals as are feræ naturæ, or of a wild nature; and then, how it may subsist in any other things, when under particular circumstances.

§ 534. a. Property in wild animals.—First, then, a man may be invested with a qualified, but not an absolute, property, in all creatures that are feræ naturæ, either per industriam, propter impotentiam, or propter privilegium (by the industry of man, on account of the inability of the animal, or by reason of privilege).

§ 535. (1) Property in wild animals per industriam.—A qualified property may subsist in animals feræ naturæ, per industriam hominis (by the industry of man): by a man's reclaiming and making them tame by art, industry, and education; or by so confining them within his own immediate power, that they cannot escape and use their natural liberty. And under this head some writers have ranked all the former species of animals we have mentioned, apprehending none to be originally and naturally tame, but only made so by art and custom: as horses, swine, and other cattle; which if originally left to themselves, would have chosen to rove up and down, seeking their food at large,<sup>2</sup> and are only made domestic by use and familiarity; and are therefore, say they, called mansueta, quasi manui assueta (tame, as accustomed to the hand). But however well this notion may be founded, abstractedly considered, our law apprehends the most obvious distinction to be, between such animals as we generally see tame, and are therefore seldom, if ever, found wandering at large, which it calls domitæ naturæ; [392] and such creatures as are usually found at liberty, which are therefore supposed to be more emphatically feræ naturæ, though it may happen that the latter shall be sometimes tamed and confined by the art and industry of man. Such as are deer in a park, hares or rabbits in an inclosed warren, doves in a dovehouse, pheasants or partridges in a mew, hawks that are fed and commanded by their owner, and fish in a private pond or in trunks.

These are no longer the property of a man, than while they continue in his keeping or actual possession: but if at any time they regain their natural liberty, his property instantly ceases; unless they have animus revertendi (the intention of returning), which is only to be known by their usual custom of returning.<sup>b</sup> A maxim which is borrowed from the civil law; <sup>1</sup> “revertendi animus videntur desinere habere tunc, cum revertendi consuetudinem deseruerint (they seem no longer to have the intention of returning when they forsake the custom).” The law therefore extends this possession further than the mere manual occupation; for my tame hawk that is pursuing his quarry in my presence, though he is at liberty to go where he pleases, is nevertheless my property; for he hath animus revertendi. So are my pigeons, that are flying at a distance from their home (especially of the carrier kind), and likewise the deer that is chased out of my park or forest, and is instantly pursued by the keeper or forester: all which remain still in my possession, and I still preserve my qualified property in them. But if they stray without my knowledge, and do not return in the usual manner, it is then lawful for any stranger to take them.<sup>k</sup> But if a deer, or any wild animal reclaimed, hath a collar or other mark put upon him, and goes and returns at his pleasure; or if a wild swan is taken, and marked and turned loose in the river, the owner’s property in him still continues, and it is not lawful for anyone else to take him: <sup>1</sup> but otherwise, if the deer has been long absent without returning, or the swan leaves the neighborhood. Bees also are feræ naturæ; but, when hived and reclaimed, a man may have a qualified property in them, by the law of nature, as well as by the civil law.<sup>m</sup> And to the same purpose, [393] not to say in the same words, with the civil law, speaks Bracton: <sup>n</sup> occupation, that is, hiving or including them, gives the property in bees; for, though a swarm lights upon my tree, I have no more property in them till I have hived them, than I have in the birds which make their nest thereon; and therefore if another hives them, he shall be their proprietor; but a swarm, which fly from and out of my hive, are mine so long as I can keep them in sight, and have power to pursue them; and in these circumstances no one else is entitled to take them. But it hath been also said,<sup>o</sup> that with us the only ownership in bees is ratione soli (on account of the soil); and the charter of the forest,<sup>p</sup> which allows every freeman to be entitled to the honey found within his own woods, affords great countenance to this doctrine, that a qualified property may be had in bees, in consideration of the property of the soil whereon they are found.<sup>3</sup>

In all these creatures, reclaimed from the wildness of their nature, the property is not absolute, but defeasible: a property, that may be destroyed if they resume their ancient wildness, and are found at large. For if the pheasants escape from the mew, or the fishes from the trunk, and are seen wandering at large in their proper element, they become feræ naturæ again; and are free and open to the first occupant that has ability to seize them. But while they thus continue my qualified or defeasible property, they are as much under the protection of the law, as if they were absolutely and indefeasibly mine: and an action will lie against any man that detains them from me, or unlawfully destroys them. It is also as much felony by common law to steal such of them as are fit for food, as it is to steal tame animals:<sup>q</sup> but not so, if they are only kept for pleasure, curiosity, or whim, as dogs, bears, cats, apes, parrots, and singing birds;<sup>r</sup> because their value is not intrinsic, but depending only on the caprice of the owner:<sup>s</sup> though it is such an invasion of property as may [394] amount to a civil injury, and be redressed by a civil action.<sup>t</sup> Yet to steal a reclaimed hawk is felony both by common law and statute;<sup>u</sup> which seems to be a relic of the tyranny of our ancient sportsmen.<sup>4</sup> And among our elder ancestors, the ancient Britons, another species of reclaimed animals, viz., cats, were looked upon as creatures of intrinsic value; and the killing or stealing one was a grievous crime, and subjected the offender to a fine; especially if it belonged to the king's household, and was the custos horrei regii (the guard of the royal granary), for which there was a very peculiar forfeiture.* And thus much of qualified property in wild animals, reclaimed per industriam.

§ 536. (2) Property in wild animals propter impotentiam.—A qualified property may also subsist with relation to animals feræ naturæ, ratione impotentia, on account of their own inability. As when hawks, herons, or other birds build in my trees, or conies or other creatures make their nests or burrows in my land, and have young ones there; I have a qualified property in those young ones till such time as they can fly or run away, and then my property expires: † but, till then, it is in some cases trespass, and in others, felony, for a stranger to take them away.‡ For here, as the owner of the land has it in his power to do what he pleases with them, the law therefore vests a property in him of the young ones, in the same manner as it does of the old ones if reclaimed and confined: for these cannot through weakness, any more than the others through restraint, use their natural liberty and forsake him.

§ 537. (3) Property in wild animals propter privilegium.—A man may, lastly, have a qualified property in animals feræ naturæ, propter privilegium: that is, he may have the privilege of hunting, taking, and killing them, in exclusion [395] of other persons. Here he has a transient property in these animals, usually called game, so long as they continue within his liberty;* and may restrain any stranger from taking them therein: but the instant they depart into another liberty, this qualified property ceases. The manner in which this privilege is acquired will be shown in a subsequent chapter.

§ 538. b. Property in air, light, and water.—The qualified property which we have hitherto considered, extends only to animals feræ naturæ, when either reclaimed, impotent, or privileged. Many other things may also be the objects of qualified property. It may subsist in the very elements, of fire or light, of air, and of water. A man can have no absolute permanent property in these, as he may in the earth and land; since these are of a vague and fugitive nature, and therefore can admit only of a precarious and qualified ownership, which lasts so long as they are in actual use and occupation, but no longer. If a man disturbs another, and deprives him of the lawful enjoyment of these; if one obstructs another's ancient windows,<sup>a</sup> corrupts the air of his house or gardens,<sup>b</sup> fouls his water,<sup>c</sup> or unpens and lets it out, or if he diverts an ancient watercourse that used to run to the other's mill or meadow;<sup>d</sup> the law will animadvert hereon as an injury, and protect the party injured in his possession. But the property in them ceases the instant they are out of possession: for, when no man is engaged in their actual occupation, they become again common, and every man has an equal right to appropriate them to his own use.

§ 539. c. Qualified property arising from circumstances.—These kinds of qualification in property depend upon the peculiar circumstances of the subject matter, which is not capable of being under the absolute dominion of any proprietor. But property may also be of a qualified or special nature, on account of the peculiar circumstances of the owner, when the thing itself is very capable of absolute ownership. [396] As in case of bailment, or delivery, of goods to another person for a particular use; as to a carrier to convey to London, to an innkeeper to secure in his inn, or the like. Here there is no absolute property in either the bailor or the bailee, the person delivering, or him to whom it is delivered: for the bailor hath only the right, and not the immediate possession, the bailee hath the possession, and only a temporary right. But it is a qualified property in them both; and each of them is entitled to an action, in case the goods be damaged or taken away: the bailee on account of his immediate possession; the bailor, because the possession of the bailee is, mediately, his possession also.* So, also, in case of goods pledged or pawned upon condition, either to repay money or otherwise; both the pledgor and the pledgee have a qualified, but neither of them an absolute, property therein: the pledgor's property is conditional, and depends upon the performance of the condition of repayment, etc.; and so, too, is that of the pledgee, which depends upon its nonperformance.† The same may be said of goods distrained for rent, or other cause of distress: which are in the nature of a pledge, and are not, at the first taking, the absolute property of either the distrainor or party distrained; but may be redeemed, or else forfeited, by the subsequent conduct of the latter. But a servant, who hath the care of his master's goods or chattels, as a butler of plate, a shepherd of sheep, and the like, hath not any property or possession either absolute or qualified, but only a mere charge or oversight.‡

§ 540. Property in action: choses in action.—Having thus considered the several divisions of property in possession, which subsists there only, where a man hath both the right and also the occupation of the thing; we will proceed next to take a short view of the nature of property in action, or such where a man hath not the occupation, but merely a bare right to occupy the thing in question; the possession whereof may, however, be recovered by a suit or action at law: from whence the thing so recoverable is called

[397] a thing, or chose, in action.<sup>h</sup> Thus money due on a bond is a chose in action; for a property in the debt vests at the time of forfeiture mentioned in the obligation, but there is no possession till recovered by course of law. If a man promises, or covenants with me, to do any act, and fails in it, whereby I suffer damage, the recompense for this damage is a chose in action: for though a right to some recompense vests in me, at the time of the damage

<sup>h</sup> The same idea, and the same denomination of property prevailed in the civil law. "Rem in bonis nostris habere intelligimur, quotiens ad recuperandam eam actionem habeamus. (We are supposed to have a property in our goods whenever we can have an action to recover them.)" (Ff. 41. 1. 52.) And again, "æque bonis adnumerabitur etiam, si quid est in actionibus, petitionibus, persecutionibus. Nam et hæc in bonis esse videntur. (All things to which we have a right by action, petition, or prosecution, are justly reckoned among our possessions. For these also appear to belong to us.)" (Ff. 50. 16. 49.)

<sup>5</sup> Meaning of chose in action.—"It is to be observed that since the day when the French was the familiar language of our courts, the term 'chose in action' has been generally used to convey the same idea as 'right of action.' But it cannot be said that this phrase, however ancient and familiar, is a happy one. Chose in action literally means 'thing in action,' and 'right of action' does not embody the idea of 'thing' at all. Indeed, it is the very absence of the notion of 'thing' which is the chief characteristic of the mere right of action. In its essence the mere right of action is an intangible entity. . . . Rastell's Termes de la Ley is a book which, like St. Germain's Doctor and Student, reflects the common law at the close of the year-book period with much fidelity. In it is to be found a definition of chose in action which is worth noting. It is there said: 'Chose or thing in action is when a man hath cause or may bring an action for some duty due to him; as an action of debt upon an obligation, annuity, or rent, action of covenant or ward, trespass of goods taken away, beating or such like; and because they are things whereof a man is not possessed, but for recovery of them is driven to his action, they are called things in action.'

"If we let the mind dwell upon the situations which this old book fits to the term chose in action, it must strike us that 'chose' in sense of thing is a misnomer, and at most can be used only in a metaphorical sense. What is here meant is the cause or right of action, a conception as far removed from that of material thing as can possibly be. Still, it must be observed that there has always been a sort of mental difficulty in conceiving of the right of action in this highly abstract and immaterial sense. The visualizing faculty constantly impels us to think of the thing to be recovered, albeit only damages, as a specific material thing. Even Blackstone seems to have been unable to conceive of the chose in action in any other sense than that of a specific chattel done, yet what and how large such recompense shall be, can only be ascertained by verdict; and the possession can only be given me by legal judgment and execution. In the former of these cases the student will observe that the property, or right of action, depends upon an express contract or obligation to pay a stated sum: and in the latter it depends upon an implied contract, that if the covenantor does not perform the act he engaged to do, he shall pay me the damages I sustain by this breach of covenant. And hence it may be collected, that all property in action depends entirely wrongfully withheld and recoverable by a proper action. Joshua Williams, a lucid and accurate writer, says, with perfect truth, that the chose in action is 'the liberty of proceeding in courts of law either to recover pecuniary damage for the infliction of a wrong or the nonperformance of a contract, or else to procure the payment of money due.' According to this definition the term 'chose in action' includes all personal rights of action arising either from the breach of a contract or from a tort, and there can be no question that such is its true import."—STREET, 3 Foundations of Legal Liability, 78.

"If we examine the nature of things in action, we shall soon see that they are merely claims enforceable at law; and that a man entitled to a thing in action has no thing (in the primary sense), and has not even anything which he can take. For example, in the case of a chose in action proper, as a debt, what is the thing, which is or lies in action, and which the person entitled thereto is said to have? It cannot be anything tangible, for the contracting of a debt (otherwise than by judgment and except to the crown) gives the creditor no interest whatever in, or charge upon, any money or other property of the debtor. If the debtor refuse payment, the creditor cannot take the amount due to him out of the debtor's money without committing theft; he has no legal remedy but to sue the debtor. When a debt is paid, the creditor ceases to have a chose in action: but the true effect of payment is not that the thing, which he had before in action, is handed over to him and so becomes a thing in possession. It is that the debtor's obligation is discharged and extinguished, and the former creditor (if paid in cash) acquires the ownership of certain coins, in which he previously had no interest at all. The thing, therefore, which lies in or is to be exacted by action, and which the creditor has, appears to be no tangible object, but to be the debtor's duty to pay the amount owing. That is to say, what the creditor has is the right to enforce an obligation, which has always been considered to be an incorporeal thing. The incorporeal nature of a debt is emphasized by the fact that the obligation to pay may be discharged by the debtor's bankruptcy. That the right which constitutes a debt is valuable is sufficiently apparent from the fact that people are found to pay money for its transfer to them. That the right is property is proved by the fact that it will pass under a bequest of all the creditor's property, or to the trustee, on the creditor's bankruptcy."—T. CYPRIAN WILLIAMS, "Prop upon contracts, either express or implied; which are the only regular means of acquiring a chose in action, and of the nature of which we shall discourse at large in a subsequent chapter.

At present we have only to remark, that upon all contracts or promises, either express or implied, and the infinite variety of cases into which they are and may be spun out, the law gives an action of some sort or other to the party injured in case of non-performance; to compel the wrongdoer to do justice to the party with whom he has contracted, and, on failure of performing the identical thing he engaged to do, to render a satisfaction equivalent to the damage sustained. But while the thing, or its equivalent, remains in suspense, and the injured party has only the right and not the occupation, it is called a chose in action; being a thing rather in potentia (in possibility) than in esse (in being): though the owner may have as absolute a property [398] in, and be as well entitled to, such things in action, as to things in possession.<sup>6</sup>

Chose in action is defined in California Civil Code, § 953, as the right to recover money or other personal property by judicial proceeding. Driscoll v. Driscoll, 143 Cal. 528, 77 Pac. 471. It includes all debts and all claims for damages for breach of contract: Bushnell v. Kennedy, 9 Wall. 387, 19 L. Ed. 736; open or unliquidated accounts: Sere v. Pitot, 6 Cranch, 332, 3 L. Ed. 240; certificates of deposit: Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. Ed. 500, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 415; personal rights not reduced to possession, but recoverable by suit at law, including money due on bond, note, or other contract, damages due for breach of covenant, for the detention of chattels, or for torts: 2 Kent, Comm., 351. § 541. Time of enjoyment of personal property.—And, having thus distinguished the different degree or quantity of dominion or property to which things personal are subject, we may add a word or two concerning the time of their enjoyment, and the number of their owners; in conformity to the method before observed in treating of the property of things real.

First, as to the time of enjoyment. By the rules of the ancient common law, there could be no future property, to take place in expectancy, created in personal goods and chattels; because, being things transitory, and by many accidents subject to be lost, destroyed, or otherwise impaired, and the exigencies of trade requiring also a frequent circulation thereof, it would occasion perpetual suits and quarrels, and put a stop to the freedom of commerce, if such limitations in remainder were generally tolerated and allowed. But yet in last wills and testaments such limitations of personal goods and chattels, in remainder after a bequest for life, were per-

R. 6 Eq. 198; a personal right not reduced into possession but recoverable by a suit at law: 2 Kent, 351; a mere right of action as to a chattel, not in actual possession: Yerby v. Lynch, 3 Gratt. (Va.) 460, 494.—BOUVIER, 1 Law Dict. (Rawle's 3d rev.) 483.

The term "choses in action" may be used either in the broad sense of all rights of action, whether ex contractu or ex delicto, or in the narrower, but more general, sense as referring to assignable rights of action ex contractu and perhaps ex delicto, for injuries to property, but not for personal injuries. Gibson v. Gibson, 43 Wis. 23, 28 Am. Rep. 527.

"The phrases 'chose in action' and 'debt' are often used as synonymous. But they are rather correlative than synonymous. They represent the same thing, but viewed from opposite sides. The 'chose in action' is the right of the creditor to be paid, while the 'debt' is the obligation of the debtor to pay. This distinction is brought out in the common phrase, 'the choses in action and debts of a partnership, upon the death of one of the partners, survive.' Here both terms are used in the same sentence, but with opposite meanings: the former term signifying the firm's right to be paid certain sums of money, the latter signifying the firm's obligation to pay certain sums of money. Yet the term 'debt' is often used indiscriminately to convey both these ideas. Much confusion has resulted from the failure to observe this distinction, and perhaps mitted: ' though originally that indulgence was only shown, when merely the use of the goods, and not the goods themselves, was given to the first legatee; * the property being supposed to continue all the time in the executor of the devisor. But now that distinction is disregarded: ' and therefore if a man either by deed or will limits his books or furniture to A for life, with remainder over to B, this remainder is good. But where an estate-tail in things personal is given to the first or any subsequent possessor, it vests in him the total property, and no remainder over shall be permitted on such a limitation.<sup>m</sup> For this, if allowed, would tend to a perpetuity, as the devisee or grantee in tail of a chattel has no method of barring the entail: and therefore the law vests in him at once the entire dominion of the goods, being analogous to the fee simple which a tenant in tail may acquire in a real estate.

§ 542. Number of owners of personal property.—[399] Next, as to the number of owners. Things personal may belong to their owners, not only in severalty, but also in joint tenancy, and in common, as well as real estates. They cannot, indeed, be vested in coparcenary; because they do not descend from the ancestor to the heir, which is necessary to constitute coparceners. But if a horse, or other personal chattel, be given to two or more, absolutely, they still more from the failure to notice carefully the essential characteristics of these several conceptions.

“The chose in action, or right of the creditor, is a personal right which adheres to him wherever his situs may be. It may for some purposes be his legal situs (or domicile), for others his actual situs. Just as, in the case of tangible chattels, though the title thereto follows the owner, and its transfer will be regulated by the law of the owner's situs, yet his or his transferee's ability to enforce that title may be in the exceptional cases determinable by a different system of law should the chattels be actually situated elsewhere; so also in the case of debts, though the right to enforce them follows the owner (the creditor), and his transfer is therefore to be governed by the law of his situs, actual or legal, yet his or his transferee's ability to enforce that right may depend upon another jurisdiction and system of law, if he has to resort to another state to sue the debtor. In other words, though the situs of the creditor's right follows the creditor, the situs of the debtor's obligation follows the debtor, in the sense that the debtor's legal obligation exists only in the state where it can be enforced against him.”—MINOR, Conflict of Laws, 275.

are joint tenants hereof; and, unless the jointure be severed, the same doctrine of survivorship shall take place as in estates of lands and tenements.<sup>a</sup> And, in like manner, if the jointure be severed, as by either of them selling his share, the vendee and the remaining part owner shall be tenants in common, without any jus accrescendi or survivorship.<sup>o</sup> So, also, if 100*l.* be given by will to two or more, equally to be divided between them, this makes them tenants in common; <sup>p</sup> as we have formerly seen,<sup>q</sup> the same words would have done, in regard to real estates. But, for the encouragement of husbandry and trade, it is held that a stock on a farm, though occupied jointly, and also a stock used in a joint undertaking, by way of partnership in trade, shall always be considered as common and not as joint property; and there shall be no survivorship therein.<sup>r</sup> <sup>7</sup>

<sup>7</sup> So far as the legal ownership is concerned, partners may be joint tenants of the partnership property; and, in such a case, the survivor or his representative can pass the legal ownership, and, if the conveyance is made in due exercise of his powers, or is made to an innocent purchaser for value, can give a good title. ## CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SIXTH. [400]

OF TITLE TO THINGS PERSONAL BY OCCUPANCY.

§ 543. The modes of acquiring things personal.—We are next to consider the title to things personal, or the various means of acquiring, and of losing, such property as may be had therein: both which considerations of gain and loss shall be blended together in one and the same view, as was done in our observations upon real property; since it is for the most part impossible to contemplate the one, without contemplating the other also. And these methods of acquisition or loss are principally twelve: 1. By occupancy. 2. By prerogative. 3. By forfeiture. 4. By custom. 5. By succession. 6. By marriage. 7. By judgment. 8. By gift, or grant. 9. By contract. 10. By bankruptcy. 11. By testament. 12. By administration.

§ 544. 1. Title by occupancy.—And, first, a property in goods and chattels may be acquired by occupancy: which, we have more than once<sup>a</sup> remarked, was the original and only primitive method of acquiring any property at all; but which has since been restrained and abridged, by the positive laws of society, in order to maintain peace and harmony among mankind. For this purpose, by the laws of England, gifts, and contracts, testaments, legacies, and administrations have been introduced and countenanced, in order to transfer and continue that property and possession in things personal, which [401] has once been acquired by the owner. And, where such things are found without any other owner, they for the most part belong to the king by virtue of his prerogative; except in some few instances, wherein the original and natural right of occupancy is still permitted to subsist, and which we are now to consider.

§ 545. 1. Goods of alien enemy.—Thus, in the first place, it hath been said, that anybody may seize to his own use such goods as belong to an alien enemy.<sup>b</sup> For such enemies, not being looked upon as members of our society, are not entitled during their state of enmity to the benefit or protection of the laws; and therefore every man that has opportunity is permitted to seize upon their chattels, without being compelled as in other cases to make restitution or satisfaction to the owner. But this, however generally laid down by some of our writers, must in reason and justice be restrained to such captors as are authorized by the public authority of the state, residing in the crown;<sup>1</sup> and to such goods as are brought into this country by an alien enemy, after a declaration of war, without a safe-conduct or passport. And therefore it hath been holden,<sup>2</sup> that where a foreigner is resident in England, and afterwards a war breaks out between his country and ours, his goods are not liable to be seized. It hath also been adjudged, that if an enemy take the goods of an Englishman, which are afterwards retaken by another subject of this kingdom, the former owner shall lose his property therein, and it shall be indefeasibly vested in the second taker; unless they were retaken the same day, and the owner before sunset puts in his claim of property.* Which is agreeable to the law of nations, as understood in the time of Grotius,† even with regard to captures made at sea, which were held to be the property of the captors after a possession of twenty-four hours; though the modern authorities‡ require that before the property can be changed, the goods must have been brought into port, [402] and have continued a night intra præsidia, in a place of safe custody, so that all hope of recovering them was lost.§

1 The Declaration of Paris, of 1856, greatly limited the former practice of valid capture at sea by abolishing privateering, that is, the authorization of private persons to make captures. The same document also protected enemies' goods carried in neutral ships, except in cases of contraband and blockade running.

2 By the modern usage of nations neither the twenty-four hours' possession, nor the prize intra præsidia, is sufficient to change the property in the case of a maritime capture. Until the capture becomes invested with the character of prize by a sentence of condemnation, the right of property is in abeyance. Wheaton, Internat. Law (4th Eng. ed.), § 359.

And, as in the goods of an enemy, so also in his person, a man may acquire a sort of qualified property, by taking him a prisoner in war; <sup>a</sup> at least till his ransom be paid.<sup>1</sup> And this doctrine seems to have been extended to negro servants,<sup>1</sup> who are purchased, when captives, of the nations with whom they are at war, and are therefore supposed to continue in some degree the property of their masters who buy them: though, accurately speaking, that property (if it indeed continues) consists rather in the perpetual service, than in the body or person of the captive.<sup>b</sup>

§ 546. 2. Treasure-trove.—Thus again, whatever movables are found upon the surface of the earth, or in the sea, and are unclaimed by any owner, are supposed to be abandoned by the last proprietor; and, as such, are returned into the common stock and mass of things: and therefore they belong, as in a state of nature, to the first occupant or fortunate finder, unless they fall within the description of waifs, or estrays, or wreck, or hidden treasure; for these, we have formerly seen,<sup>1</sup> are vested by law in the king, and form a part of the ordinary revenue of the crown.

§ 547. 3. Light, air, and water.—Thus, too, the benefit of the elements, the light, the air, and the water can only be appropriated by occupancy. If I have an ancient window overlooking my neighbor's ground, he may not erect any blind to obstruct the light: but if I build my house close to his wall, which darkens it, I cannot

§ 548. 4. Wild animals.—With regard likewise to animals feræ naturæ, all mankind had by the original grant of the Creator a

<sup>3</sup> Coming to a nuisance.—Blackstone declared (Commentaries, vol. II, p. 403) that if one fixes his habitation near a nuisance, he has no remedy for the damage which the nuisance causes him, on the ground of "volenti non fit injuria." This view has long been discarded, both in England (St. Helens's Smelting Co. v. Tipping (1865), 11 H. L. C. 642, 11 Eng. Reprint, 1482, 35 L. J. Q. B. 66; Bamford v. Turnley (1862), 3 B. & S. 62, 66, 122 Eng. Reprint, 25, 27), and in this country. (Hurlbut v. McKone (1887), 55 Conn. 31, 3 Am. St. Rep. 17, 36 A. L. J. 168, 10 Atl. 164; Laffin & Rand Powder Co. v. Tearney (1890), 131 Ill. 322, 19 Am. St. Rep. 34, 7 L. R. A. 262, 23 N. E. 389; Susquehanna Fertilizer Co. v. Malone (1890), 73 Md. 268, 25 Am. St. Rep. 595, 9 L. R. A. 737, 20 Atl. 900; Bushnell v. Robeson (1883), 62 Iowa, 540, 17 N. W. 888; King v. Morris etc. Ry. Co. (1867), 18 N. J. Eq. 397; Campbell v. Seaman (1876), 63 N. Y. 568, 584, 20 Am. Rep. 567; Sherman v. Langham (1890), 13 S. W. 1042). If one property owner by devoting his premises to a particular trade, at a time when the surrounding property is vacant, can acquire a right to continue the business, however offensive it may be to dwellers coming into the neighborhood, then he has it in his power to virtually control the uses to which such property may be put, or to destroy its value.

Nor is it any answer for the defendant, whose use of his premises amounts to a nuisance, that the place is a convenient one for him and for the public. "In the eye of the law, no place can be convenient for the carrying on of a business which is a nuisance and which causes substantial injury to the property of another. Nor can any use of one's land be said to be a reasonable use, which deprives an adjoining owner of the lawful use and enjoyment of his property." (Susquehanna Fertilizer Co. v. Malone, 73 Md. 268, 277, 25 Am. St. Rep. 595, 9 L. R. A. 737, 20 Atl. 900. A contrary doctrine seems to be applied in Dolan v. Chicago etc. Ry. Co. (1903), 118 Wis. 362, 95 N. W. 385. But see Anderson v. Chicago etc. Ry. Co. (1902), 85 Minn. 337, 88 N. W. 1001.)—BURDICK, Torts (3d ed.), 462.

right to pursue and take any fowl or insect of the air, any fish or inhabitant of the waters, and any beast or reptile of the field: and this natural right still continues in every individual, unless where it is restrained by the civil laws of the country. And when a man has once so seized them, they become while living his qualified property, or, if dead, are absolutely his own: so that to steal them, or otherwise invade this property, is, according to their respective values, sometimes a criminal offense, sometimes only a civil injury. The restrictions which are laid upon this right, by the laws of England, relate principally to royal fish, as whale and sturgeon, and such terrestrial, aerial, or aquatic animals as go under the denomination of game; the taking of which is made the exclusive right of the prince, and such of his subjects to whom he has granted the same royal privilege. But those animals, which are not expressly so reserved, are still liable to be taken and appropriated by any of the king's subjects, upon their own territories; in the same manner as they might have taken even game itself, till these civil prohibitions were issued: there being in nature no distinction between one species of wild animals and another, between the right of acquiring property in a hare or a squirrel, in a partridge or a butterfly: but the difference, at present made, arises merely from the positive municipal law.

§ 549. 5. Emblements.—To this principle of occupancy also must be referred the method of acquiring a special personal property in corn growing on the ground, or other emblements, by any possessor [404] of the land who hath sown or planted it, whether he be owner of the inheritance in fee or in tail, or be tenant for life, for years, or at will: which emblements are distinct from the real estate in the land, and subject to many, though not all, the incidents attending personal chattels. They were devisable by testament before the statute of wills,<sup>m</sup> and at the death of the owner shall vest in his executor and not his heir; they are forfeitable by outlawry in a personal action:<sup>n</sup> and by the statute 11 Geo. II, c. 19 (Distress for Rent, 1737), though not by the common law,<sup>o</sup> they may be distrained for rent arrear. The reason for admitting the acquisition of this special property, by tenants who have temporary interests, was formerly given;<sup>3</sup> and it was extended to tenants in fee, principally for the benefit of their creditors: and therefore, though the emblements are assets in the hands of the executor, are forfeitable upon outlawry, and distrainable for rent, they are not in other respects considered as personal chattels; and particularly they are not the object of larceny, before they are severed from the ground.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>4</sup> Accession and confusion.—The general rule of accession is that the thing added goes with the principal thing. The subject is one which is regarded as difficult to reduce to precise rules, and the general rules which have been laid down are subject to qualifications and exceptions. Lampton v. Preston, 24 Ky. 454, 19 Am. Dec. 104; Peirce v. Goddard, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 559, 33 Am. Dec. 764. If the materials of one person are united by labor to the materials of another forming a joint product, the owner of the principal material acquires the right of property in the whole. Pulcifer v. Page, 32 Me. 404, 54 Am. Dec. 582; Merritt v. Johnson, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 473, 5 Am. Dec. 289; Ryder v. Hathaway, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 298, 305.

Sometimes the test of relative values is used in determining the ownership of a joint product. "No test which satisfied the reason of the law can be applied in the adjustment of questions of title to chattels by accession, unless it keeps in view the circumstance of relative values. When we bear in mind the fact that what the law aims at is the accomplishment of substantial equity, we shall readily perceive that the fact of the value of the materials having been increased a hundred-fold, is of more importance in the adjustment than any chemical change or mechanical transformation, which, however radical, neither is expensive to the party making it, nor adds materially to the value." Cooley, J., in Wetherbee v. Green, 22 Mich. 311, 320, 7 Am. Rep. 653.

Where by the labor of one man the property of another has been converted into a different species, so that its identity is lost, the title to the new product goes to the person effecting the change, if he believed the material to belong to him. Examples effecting a change of species are: When wheat is made into grain or into whisky, grapes into wine, olives into oil. Examples of changes not amounting to the creation of a new species are the making of leather into shoes, of cloth into garments, or timber into boards or shingles. Lampton v. Preston, 24 Ky. 454, 19 Am. Dec. 104; Silsbury v. McCoon, 4 Denio (N. Y.),

Roman law, if any given corporeal substance received afterwards an accession by natural or by artificial means, as by the growth of vegetables, the pregnancy of animals, the embroidering of cloth, or the conversion of wood or metal into vessels and utensils, the original owner of the thing was entitled by his right of possession to the property of it under such its state of improvement:† but if the thing itself, by such operation, was changed into a different species, as by making wine, oil, or bread, out of another's grapes, olives, or wheat, it belonged to the new operator; who was only to make a satisfaction to the former proprietor for the materials, which he had so converted.* And these doctrines are implicitly

Where goods of similar character belonging to two persons are so mixed that the mass is indistinguishable, the two owners, if the mixture is through the consent of both parties, by mistake or accident, or the wrongful act of a stranger, have an interest in proportion to their respective shares. Silsbury & Calkins v. McCoon & Sherman, 6 Hill (N. Y.), 425, 41 Am. Dec. 753; Moore v. Bowman, 47 N. H. 494; Bryant v. Ware, 30 Me. 295. If the mixture has been brought about by the fault of one party there is some difference of opinion as to the rule to be applied. Lord Eldon, in Lupton v. White, 15 Ves. 432, 442, 33 Eng. Reprint, 817, said: "What are the cases in the old law of a mixture of corn or flour? If one man mixes his corn or flour with that of another and they were of equal value, the latter must have the given quantity, but if articles of different values are mixed, producing a third value, the aggregate of both, and through the fault of the person mixing them, the other party cannot-tell what was the original value of his property, he must have the whole." Upon this Professor Williston remarks: "The first part of this quotation indicates that Lord Eldon thought that even if the confusion of similar goods was brought about by a tort, the wrongdoer would not be punished by losing all interest in the mass. Commenting upon this passage, Mr. Justice O. W. Holmes, before his elevation to the bench, wrote: 'This seems hardly borne out by the old cases, but would perhaps be followed, as there seems to be no substantial reason for depriving the wrongdoer of his whole property in such a case. *Hesseltine v. thought legal proceedings necessary for a partition in this instance.' 6 Am. L. Rep. 455. Chancellor Kent lays down the rule that where the goods of two persons are indistinguishably mingled, they become tenants in common if the mingling was by consent, but if made wrongfully by one of the owners, the common law gave the entire property to the other. 2 Kent, Comm., 264, 365.¶ Williston, Sales, § 153 n.

This matter of confusion of goods finds one of its best applications in the case of grain elevators. On this subject Professor Williston speaks as follows: "It is the practice to mingle grain as it is brought into the elevator with grain of similar kind and quality, previously delivered by other owners. The authorities cited in the previous section make it clear that there is no reason why the depositor, by consenting to such practice, should lose the property in his grain unless it is so intended. It is the further practice of the elevators, however, to deliver from the mass, as called upon by holders of the warehouseman's receipts for the grain, such quantities as the receipts call for. The deliveries of grain to and by the warehouseman may result in the entire contents of the elevator being changed several times over before a particular depositor reclaims the grain which he deposited, so that we must deal with a situation where not only has the plaintiff's property been mingled with other property so that its identity is confused, but also the whole mass with which it was confused has given place to another mass of goods of the same sort. Even in this case, however, there seems no reason why the intention of the parties cannot be effectuated. That their intention is that the depositor shall retain a property right, there can be little doubt. It is the duty of the warehouseman to keep in his elevator sufficient grain to meet all outstanding receipts. The American cases clearly recognize the validity of the custom in use in regard to grain elevators, and give effect to the intention of the parties that the depositor shall retain title. (Rahilly v. Wilson, Fed. Cas. No. 11,532, 3 Dill. 420; National Bank of Pontiac v. Langan, 28 Ill. App. 401; Woodward v. Semans, 125 Ind. 330, 21 Am. St. Rep. 225, 25 N. E. 444; *Arthur v. § 551. 7. Confusion.—But in the case of confusion of goods, where those of two persons are so intermixed, that the several portions can be no longer distinguished, the English law partly agrees with, and partly differs from, the civil. If the intermixture be by consent, I apprehend that in both laws the proprietors have an interest in common, in proportion to their respective shares.* But, if one willfully intermixes his money, corn, or hay, with that of another man, without his approbation or knowledge, or casts gold in like manner into another's melting pot or crucible, the civil law, though it gives the sole property of the whole to him who has not interfered in the mixture, yet allows a satisfaction to the other for what he has so improvidently lost.† But our law, to guard against fraud, allows no remedy in such a case; but gives the entire property, without any account, to him, whose original dominion is invaded, and endeavored to be rendered uncertain, without his own consent.‡

§ 552. 8. Copyright.—There is still another species of property, which (if it subsists) being grounded on labor and invention, is more properly reducible to the head of occupancy than any

(See 3 Doug. 293; 3 B. & Cr. 541; 2 Ves. & B. 218; 2 Keen, 213; 3 Myl. & Cr. 1, 338; 5 Scott, N. R., 562)." Sweet, in 2 Wendell's Blackstone, 405 n. <sup>6</sup> Copyright.—As Blackstone states, much doubt has existed whether copyright in published books existed at common law. "Much discussion of the principles involved in the question of 'copyright at common law' may be found in the great case of Jefferys v. Boosey (1854), 4 H. L. C. 815, 10 Eng. Reprint, 681, where, however, it is unavoidably mixed up with points of detail arising on the facts. The arguments for and against the existence of such a right are most distinctly put in the opinions of Erle, J., Maule, J., and Coleridge, J. (pro); and Pollock, C. B., Lord Brougham, and Lord St. Leonards (contra). The negative conclusion is now generally accepted by lawyers. Mr. Herbert Spencer, whose philosophy of political and legal institutions really belongs to the eighteenth century, has consistently maintained the older view." Pollock, First Book of Jurisprudence, 189 n. The law of copyright in Great Britain from him, or vary the disposition he has made of it, is an invasion of his right of property. Now, the identity of a literary composition consists entirely in the sentiment and the language; the same conceptions, clothed in the same words, must necessarily be the same composition: and whatever method be taken of conveying that composition to the ear or the eye of another, by recital, by writing, or by printing, in any number of copies or at any period of time, it is always the identical work of the author which is so conveyed; and no other man (it hath been thought) can have a right to convey or transfer it without his consent, either tacitly or expressly given. This consent may perhaps be tacitly given, when is now mainly governed by the Copyright Act, 1907. See 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 41 ff.

The supreme court of the United States has stated the American law of copyright as follows: "As a result of the decisions of this court certain general propositions may be affirmed. Statutory copyright is not to be confounded with the common-law right. At common law the exclusive right to copy existed in the author until he permitted a general publication. Thus, when a book was published in print, the owner's common-law right was lost. At common law an author had a property in his manuscript, and might have an action against anyone who undertook to publish it without authority. The statute created a new property right, giving to the author, after publication, the exclusive right to multiply copies for a limited period. This statutory right is obtained in a certain way and by the performance of certain acts which the statute points out. That is, the author having complied with the statute and given up his common-law right of exclusive duplication prior to general publication, obtained by the method pointed out in the statute an exclusive right to multiply copies and publish the same for the term of years named in the statute. Congress did not sanction an existing right; it created a new one." Caliga v. Inter-Ocean Newspaper Co., 215 U. S. 182, 188, 54 L. Ed. 150, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 38.

The constitution of the United States (art. 1, § 8) has authorized Congress "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and inventions." Copyright is now secured by the act of March 4, 1909. A succinct statement of the provisions of this law may be found in 1 Bouvier's Law Dict. (Rawle's 3d Rev.), 674. Copyright is for twenty-eight years from the date of first publication. The copyright may be renewed for an additional period of twenty-eight years by the author, or if not living, by his widow or children, or in default thereof, by his executor or next of kin. See Bowker, Copyright, Its Hist. and Law, with especial reference to the American Code of 1909 and the British Act of 1911.

an author permits his work to be published, without any reserve of right, and without stamping on it any marks of ownership: it is then a present to the public, like the building of a church, or the laying out a new highway: but, in case of a bargain for a single impression, or a total sale or gift of the copyright, in the one case the reversion hath been supposed to continue in the original proprietor; in the other the whole property, with all its exclusive rights, to be perpetually transferred to the grantee. On the other hand, it is urged, that though the exclusive property of the manuscript, and all which it contains, undoubtedly belongs to the author, before it is printed or published; yet from the instant of publication, the exclusive right of an author or his assigns to the sole communication of his ideas immediately vanishes and evaporates; as being a right of too subtle and unsubstantial a nature to become the subject of property at the common law, and only capable of being guarded by positive statutes and special provisions of the magistrate.

The Roman law adjudged, that if one man wrote anything, though never so elegantly, on the paper or parchment of another, the writing should belong to the original owner of the materials on which it was written: * meaning certainly [407] nothing more thereby than the mere mechanical operation of writing, for which it directed the scribe to receive a satisfaction; especially as in works of genius and invention, such as a picture painted on another man's canvas, the same law<sup>d</sup> gave the canvas to the painter. We find no other mention in the civil law of any property in the works of the understanding, though the sale of literary copies, for the purposes of recital or multiplication, is certainly as ancient as the times of Terence,<sup>e</sup> Martial,<sup>f</sup> and Statius.<sup>g</sup> Neither with us in England

<sup>7</sup> Patent rights.—The early history of patent law in England may be found in an article in 12 Law Quart. Rev. 141, and the provisions of the Patents and Designs Act of 1907 may be found discussed in 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 26 ff.

The provision of the United States Constitution (art. 1, § 8) quoted in the last note empowers Congress to grant letters patent to inventors for limited periods of time. The act of July 8, 1870, repealed all previous laws, and, with amendments of minor importance, is the prevailing law on the subject. The grant of letters patent is for seventeen years. The law provides for the granting of a patent to the first inventor or discoverer of any new and useful art

tions appear to have been suggested by the exception in the statute of monopolies, 21 Jac. I, c. 3 (1623), which allows a royal patent of privilege to be granted for fourteen years to any inventor of a new manufacture, for the sole working or making of the same; by virtue whereof it is held that a temporary property therein becomes vested in the king's patentee.<sup>1</sup> *

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SEVENTH. [408]
OF TITLE BY PREROGATIVE, AND FORFEITURE.

§ 553. II. Title by prerogative.—A second method of acquiring property in personal chattels is by the king's prerogative: whereby a right may accrue either to the crown itself, or to such as claim under the title of the crown, as by grant or by prescription.

§ 554. 1. Taxes and customs.—Such, in the first place, are all tributes, taxes, and customs; whether constitutionally inherent in the crown, as flowers of the prerogative and branches of the census regalis or ancient royal revenue, or whether they be occasionally created by authority of parliament; of both which species of revenue we treated largely in the former volume. In these the king acquires and the subject loses a property the instant they become due; if paid, they are a chose in possession; if unpaid, a chose in action. Hither also may be referred all forfeitures, fines, and ameracements due to the king, which accrue by virtue of his ancient prerogative, or by particular modern statutes: which revenues created by statute do always assimilate, or take the same nature, with the ancient revenues; and may therefore be looked upon as arising from a kind of artificial or secondary prerogative. And, in either case, the owner of the thing forfeited, and the person fined or amerced, lose and part with the property of the forfeiture, fine, or amercement, the instant the king or his grantee acquires it.

§ 555. 2. King cannot be joint owner.—[409] In these several methods of acquiring property by prerogative there is also this peculiar quality, that the king cannot have a joint property with any person in one entire chattel, or such a one as is not capable of division or separation; but where the titles of the king and a subject concur, the king shall have the whole: in like manner as the king can, neither by grant nor contract, become a joint tenant of a chattel real with another person;<sup>a</sup> but by such grant or contract shall become entitled to the whole in severalty. Thus, if a horse be given to the king and a private person, the king shall have the sole property: if a bond be made to the king and a subject, the king shall have the whole penalty; the debt or duty being one single chattel;<sup>b</sup> and, so, if two persons have the property of a horse between them, or have a joint debt owing them on bond, and one of them assigns his part to the king, or is attainted, whereby his moiety is forfeited to the crown; the king shall have the entire horse, and entire debt.<sup>c</sup> For, as it is not consistent with the dignity of the crown to be partner with a subject, so neither does the king ever lose his right in any instance; but, where they interfere, his is always preferred to that of another person:<sup>d</sup> from which two principles it is a necessary consequence, that the innocent, though unfortunate, partner must lose his share in both the debt and the horse, or in any other chattel in the same circumstances.

§ 556. 3. King's special property.—This doctrine has no opportunity to take place in certain other instances of title by prerogative, that remain to be mentioned: as the chattels thereby vested are originally and solely vested in the crown, without any transfer or derivative assignment either by deed or law from any former proprietor. Such is the acquisition of property in wreck, in treasure-trove, in waifs, in estrays, in royal fish, in swans and the [410] like; which are not transferred to the sovereign from any former owner, but are originally inherent in him by the rules of law, and are derived to particular subjects, as royal franchises, by his bounty. These are ascribed to him, partly upon the particular reasons mentioned in the eighth chapter of the former book; and partly upon the general principle of their being bona vacantia (goods having no claimant), and therefore vested in the king, as well to preserve the peace of the public, as in trust to employ them for the safety and ornament of the commonwealth.

§ 557. 4. Prerogative copyright.—There is also a kind of prerogative copyright subsisting in certain books, which is held to be vested in the crown upon different reasons. Thus, 1. The king, as the executive magistrate, has the right of promulgating to the people all acts of state and government. This gives him the exclusive privilege of printing, at his own press, or that of his grantees, all acts of parliament, proclamations, and orders of council. 2. As supreme head of the church, he hath a right to the publication of all liturgies and books of divine service. 3. He is also said to have a right by purchase to the copies of such law books, grammars, and other compositions, as were compiled or translated at the expense of the crown. And upon these two last principles, combined, the exclusive right of printing the translation of the Bible is founded.*

§ 558. 5. Property in game.—There still remains another species of prerogative property, founded upon a very different principle from any that have been mentioned before; the property of such animals feræ naturæ, as are known by the denomination of game, with the right of pursuing, taking, and destroying them: which is vested in the king alone, and from him derived to such of his subjects as have received the grants of a chase, a park, a freewarren, or free fishery. This may lead us into an inquiry concerning the original of these franchises, or royalties, on which we touched a little in a former chapter;† [411] the right itself being an incorporeal hereditament, though the fruits and profits of it are of a personal nature.

In the first place, then, we have already shown, and indeed it cannot be denied, that by the law of nature every man from the prince to the peasant has an equal right of pursuing, and taking to his own use, all such creatures as are feræ naturæ, and therefore the property of nobody, but liable to be seized by the first occupant. And so it was held by the imperial law, even so late

* Prior editions have here, "4. Almanacks have been said to be prerogative copies, either as things derelict, or else as being substantially nothing more than the calendar prefixed to our liturgy.º And indeed the regulation of time has been often considered as a matter of state. The Roman fasti were under the care of the pontifical college: and Romulus, Numa, and Julius Cæsar, successively regulated the Roman calendar." [º 1 Mod. 257.]

as Justinian's time: "feræ igitur, bestiæ, et volucres, et omnia animalia quæ mari, cælo, et terra nascuntur, simul atque ab aliquo capta fuerint, jure gentium statim illius esse incipiunt. Quod enim nullius est, id naturali ratione occupanti conceditur (therefore, wild beasts and birds, and all animals which are produced in air, sea, or earth, when taken by anyone, immediately become his property by the law of nations. For that which belongs to no one, belongs by natural reason to the taker)."<sup>6</sup> But it follows from the very end and constitution of society, that this natural right, as well as many others belonging to man as an individual, may be restrained by positive laws enacted for reasons of state, or for the supposed benefit of the community.<sup>1</sup> This restriction may be either with respect to the place in which this right may, or

<sup>1</sup> Game laws.—The supreme court of the United States has upheld a statute of Connecticut providing that "no person shall at any time kill any woodcock, ruffed grouse or quail for the purpose of conveying the same beyond the limits of this state; or shall transport or have in possession, with intent to procure the transportation beyond said limits, any of such birds killed within this state."

In his able opinion, Mr. Justice White, after quoting at length from Blackstone, continues: "The practice of the government of England from the earliest time to the present has put into execution the authority to control and regulate the taking of game.

"Undoubtedly this attribute of government to control the taking of animals feræ naturæ, which was thus recognized and enforced by the common law of England, was vested in the colonial governments, where not denied by their charters, or in conflict with grants of the royal prerogative. It is also certain that the power which the colonies thus possessed passed to the states with the separation from the mother country, and remains in them at the present day, in so far as its exercise may be not incompatible with, or restrained by, the rights conveyed to the federal government by the constitution. Kent, in his Commentaries, states the ownership of animals feræ naturæ to be only that of a qualified property. 2 Kent, Comm., 347. In most of the states laws have been passed for the protection and preservation of game. We have been referred to no case where the power to so legislate has been questioned, although the books contain cases involving controversies as to the meaning of some of the statutes. Commonwealth v. Hall, 128 Mass. 410, 35 Am. Rep. 387; Commonwealth v. Wilkinson, 139 Pa. St. 304, 21 Atl. 14; People v. O'Neil, 71 Mich. 325, 39 N. W. 1. There are also cases where the validity of some particular method of enforcement provided in some of the statutes has been drawn in may not, be exercised; with respect to the animals that are the subject of this right; or with respect to the persons allowed or forbidden to exercise it. And, in consequence of this authority, we find that the municipal laws of many nations have exerted such power of restraint; have in general forbidden the entering on another man's grounds, for any cause without the owner's leave; have extended their protection to such particular animals as are usually the objects of pursuit; and have invested the prerogative of hunting and taking such animals in the sovereign of the state only, and such as he shall authorize.<sup>b</sup> Many reasons have concurred for making these constitutions: as, 1. question. State v. Saunders, 19 Kan. 127, 27 Am. Rep. 98; Territory v. Evans, 2 Idaho, 634, 23 Pac. 115.

"The adjudicated cases recognizing the right of the states to control and regulate the common property in game are numerous. In McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 391, 395, 24 L. Ed. 248, the power of the state of Virginia to prohibit citizens of other states from planting oysters within the tide waters of that state was upheld by this court. In Manchester v. Massachusetts, 139 U. S. 240, 35 L. Ed. 159, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 559, the authority of the state of Massachusetts to control and regulate the catching of fish within the bays of that state was also maintained. See, also, Phelps v. Racey, 60 N. Y. 10, 19 Am. Rep. 140; Magner v. People, 97 Ill. 320; American Express Co. v. People, 133 Ill. 649, 23 Am. St. Rep. 641, 9 L. R. A. 138, 24 N. E. 758; State v. Northern Pacific Express Co., 58 Minn. 403, 59 N. W. 1100; State v. Rodman, 58 Minn. 393, 59 N. W. 1098; Ex parte Maier, 103 Cal. 476, 42 Am. St. Rep. 129, 37 Pac. 402; Organ v. State, 56 Ark. 267, 270, 19 S. W. 840; Allen v. Wyckoff, 48 N. J. L. 90, 93, 57 Am. Rep. 548, 2 Atl. 359; Roth v. State, 51 Ohio St. 209, 46 Am. St. Rep. 566, 37 N. E. 259; Gentile v. State, 29 Ind. 409, 415; State v. Farrell, 23 Mo. App. 176, and cases there cited; State v. Saunders, [19 Kan. 127, 27 Am. Rep. 98]; Territory v. Evans [2 Idaho, 634, 23 Pac. 115].

"Whilst the fundamental principles upon which the common property in game rests have undergone no change, the development of free institutions has led to the recognition of the fact that the power or control lodged in the state, resulting from this common ownership, is to be exercised, like all other powers of government, as a trust for the benefit of the people, and not as a prerogative for the advantage of the government, as distinct from the people, or for the benefit of private individuals as distinguished from the public good. Therefore, for the purpose of exercising this power, the state, as held by this court in Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. 367, 410, 10 L. Ed. 997, 1013, represents its people, and the ownership is that of the people in their united sovereignty.

ment of agriculture and improvement of lands, by giving every man an exclusive dominion over his own soil. 2. For preservation of the several species of these animals, which would soon be extirpated by a general liberty. 3. For prevention of idleness and dissipation in husbandmen, artificers, and [412] others of lower rank; which would be the unavoidable consequence of universal license. 4. For prevention of popular insurrections and resistance to the government, by disarming the bulk of the people: 'which last is a reason oftener meant, than avowed, by the makers of forest or game laws. Nor, certainly, in these prohibitions is there any natural injustice, as some have weakly enough supposed: since, as Puffendorf observes, the law does not hereby take from any man

The common ownership, and its resulting responsibility in the state, is thus stated in a well-considered opinion of the supreme court of California:

"The wild game within a state belongs to the people in their collective sovereign capacity. It is not the subject of private ownership except in so far as the people may elect to make it so; and they may, if they see fit, absolutely prohibit the taking of it, or traffic and commerce in it, if it is deemed necessary for the protection or preservation of the public good.' Ex parte Maier [103 Cal. 476, 42 Am. St. Rep. 129, 37 Pac. 402].

"The same view has been expressed by the supreme court of Minnesota, as follows:

"We take it to be the correct doctrine in this country, that the ownership of wild animals, so far as they are capable of ownership, is in the state, not as a proprietor but in its sovereign capacity as the representative and for the benefit of all its people in common.' State v. Rodman [58 Minn. 393, 59 N. W. 1098].

"The foregoing analysis of the principles upon which alone rests the right of an individual to acquire a qualified ownership in game, and the power of the state, deduced therefrom, to control such ownership for the common benefit, clearly demonstrates the validity of the statute of the state of Connecticut here in controversy. The sole consequence of the provision forbidding the transportation of game, killed within the state, beyond the state, is to confine the use of such game to those who own it, the people of that state. The proposition that the state may not forbid carrying it beyond her limits involves, therefore, the contention that a state cannot allow its own people the enjoyment of the benefits of the property belonging to them in common, without at the same time permitting the citizens of other states to participate in that which they do not own. It was said in the discussion at bar, although it be conceded that the state has an absolute right to control and regulate the killing his present property, or what was already his own, but barely abridges him of one means of acquiring a future property, that of occupancy; which indeed the law of nature would allow him, but of which the laws of society have in most instances very justly and reasonably deprived him.

Yet, however defensible these provisions in general may be, on the footing of reason, or justice, or civil policy, we must notwithstanding acknowledge that, in their present shape, they owe their immediate original to slavery. It is not till after the irruption of the northern nations into the Roman empire, that we read of any other prohibitions, than that natural one of not sporting on any private grounds without the owner's leave; and another of a more spiritual nature, which was rather a rule of ecclesiastical discipline, than a branch of municipal law. The Roman or civil law, though it knew no restriction as to persons or animals, so far regarded the article of place, that it allowed no man to hunt or sport upon another's ground, but by consent of the owner of the soil. "Qui alienum fundum ingreditur, venandi aut aucupandi gratia, potest a domino prohiberi ne ingrediatur. (He who enters on another man's ground for the purpose of hunting or fowling may be proof game as its judgment deems best in the interest of its people, inasmuch as the state has here chosen to allow the people within her borders to take game, to dispose of it, and thus cause it to become an object of state commerce, as a resulting necessity such property has become the subject of interstate commerce, and is hence controlled by the provisions of article 1, section 8, of the constitution of the United States. But the errors which this argument involves are manifest. It presupposes that where the killing of game and its sale within the state is allowed, that it thereby becomes commerce in the legal meaning of that word. In view of the authority of the state to affix conditions to the killing and sale of game, predicated as is this power on the peculiar nature of such property and its common ownership by all the citizens of the state, it may well be doubted whether commerce is created by an authority given by a state to reduce game within its borders to possession, provided such game be not taken, when killed, without the jurisdiction of the state. The common ownership imports the right to keep the property, if the sovereign so chooses, always within its jurisdiction for every purpose." Geer v. State of Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 527, 40 L. Ed. 793, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 600.

The game laws of Great Britain were revised by the Game Act of 1831 and subsequent statutes. The provisions of these laws may be found in 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 18 ff.

hibited from so doing by the owner.)”<sup>k</sup> For if there can, by the law of nature, be any inchoate imperfect property supposed in wild animals before they are taken, it seems most reasonable to fix it in him upon whose land they are found. And as to the other restriction, which relates to persons and not to place, the pontifical or canon law<sup>l</sup> interdicts “venationes, et sylvaticas vagationes cum canibus, et accipitribus (hunting and excursions in the woods with hawks, and hounds)” to all clergymen without distinction; grounded on [413] a saying of St. Jerome,<sup>m</sup> that it never is recorded that these diversions were used by the saints, or primitive fathers. And the canons of our Saxon church, published in the reign of King Edgar,<sup>n</sup> concur in the same prohibition: though our secular laws, at least after the Conquest, did even in the times of popery dispense with this canonical impediment; and spiritual persons were allowed by the common law to hunt for their recreation, in order to render them fitter for the performance of their duty: as a confirmation whereof we may observe, that it is to this day a branch of the king’s prerogative, at the death of every bishop, to have his kennel of hounds, or a composition in lieu thereof.<sup>o</sup>

§ 559. a. Forest and game laws.—But, with regard to the rise and original of our present civil prohibitions, it will be found that all forest and game laws were introduced into Europe at the same time, and by the same policy, as gave birth to the feudal system; when those swarms of barbarians issued from their northern hive, and laid the foundation of most of the present kingdoms of Europe, on the ruins of the western empire. For when a conquering general came to settle the economy of a vanquished country, and to part it out among his soldiers or feudatories, who were to render him military service for such donations: it behoved him, in order to secure his new acquisitions, to keep the rustici or natives of the country, and all who were not his military tenants, in as low a condition as possible, and especially to prohibit them the use of arms. Nothing could do this more effectually than a prohibition of hunting and sporting; and therefore it was the policy of the conqueror to reserve this right to himself, and such on whom he should bestow it; which were only his capital feudatories, or greater barons. And accordingly we find, in the feudal constitutions,<sup>p</sup> one and the same law prohibiting the rustici in general from carrying arms, and also proscribing the use of nets, snares, or other engines for destroying the game. [414] This exclusive privilege well suited the martial genius of the conquering troops, who delighted in a sport<sup>q</sup> which in its pursuit and slaughter bore some resemblance to war. Vita omnis (says Cæsar, speaking of the ancient Germans), in venationibus atque in studiis rei militaris consistit. (Their whole life consists in hunting, and the study of military affairs.)<sup>r</sup> And Tacitus in like manner observes, that quotiens bella non ineunt, multum venatibus, plus per otium transigunt (when-ever they are not engaged in war they pass much time in hunting, and still more in idleness).<sup>s</sup> And indeed, like some of their modern successors, they had no other amusement to entertain their vacant hours; despising all arts as effeminate, and having no other learning than was couched in such rude ditties as were sung at the solemn carousals which succeeded these ancient huntings. And it is remarkable that, in those nations where the feudal policy remains the most uncorrupted, the forest or game laws continue in their highest rigor. In France all game is properly the king's; and in some parts of Germany it is death for a peasant to be found hunting in the woods of the nobility.<sup>t</sup>

§ 560. (1) Saxon customs as to game.—With us in England, also, hunting has ever been esteemed a most princely diversion and exercise. The whole island was replenished with all sorts of game in the times of the Britons; who lived in a wild and pastoral manner, without inclosing or improving their grounds, and derived much of their subsistence from the chase, which they all enjoyed in common. But when husbandry took place under the Saxon government, and lands began to be cultivated, improved, and inclosed, the beasts naturally fled into the woody and desert tracts; which were called the forests, and, having never been disposed of in the first distribution of lands, were therefore held to belong to the crown. These were filled with great plenty of game, which our royal sportsmen reserved for their own diversion, on pain of a pecuniary forfeiture [415] for such as interfered with their sovereign. But every freeholder had the full liberty of sporting upon his own territories, provided he abstained from the king's forests: as is fully expressed in the laws of Canute,<sup>u</sup> and of Edward the Confessor: <sup>v</sup> "Sit quilibet homo dignus venatione sua, in sylva, et in agris, sibi propriis, et in dominio suo: et abstineat omnis homo a venariis regis, ubicunque pacem eis habere voluerit (Let every man be entitled to hunt in his own wood, fields, and manor; and let every man abstain from the royal forests, if he wish to live in peace)": which indeed was the ancient law of the Scandinavian continent, from whence Canute probably derived it. "Cuique enim in proprio fundo quamlibet feram quoquo modo venari permissum (For everyone is permitted to hunt any wild animal on his own grounds, in whatever manner he pleases.)"<sup>w</sup>

§ 561. (2) Norman customs as to game.—However, upon the Norman Conquest, a new doctrine took place; and the right of pursuing and taking all beasts of chase or venary, and such other animals as were accounted game, was then held to belong to the king, or to such only as were authorized under him. And this, as well upon the principles of the feudal law, that the king is the ultimate proprietor of all the lands in the kingdom, they being all held of him as the chief lord, or lord paramount of the fee; and that therefore he has the right of the universal soil, to enter thereon, and to chase and take such creatures at his pleasure: as also upon another maxim of the common law, which we have frequently cited and illustrated, that these animals are bona vacantia, and, having no other owner, belong to the king by his prerogative. As, therefore, the former reason was held to vest in the king a right to pursue and take them anywhere; the latter was supposed to give the king, and such as he should authorize, a sole and exclusive right.

This right, thus newly vested in the crown, was exerted with the utmost rigor, at and after the time of the Norman establishment; not only in the ancient forests, but in the new ones which the conqueror made, by laying together vast [416] tracts of country, depopulated for that purpose, and reserved solely for the king's royal diversion; in which were exercised the most horrid tyrannies, and oppressions, under color of forest law, for the sake of preserving the beasts of chase; to kill any of which, within the limits of the forest, was as penal as the death of a man. And, in pursuance of the same principle, King John laid a total interdict upon the winged as well as the four-footed creation: capturam avium per totam Angliam interdixit (he forbade fowling throughout all England).''* The cruel and insupportable hardships, which these forest laws created to the subject, occasioned our ancestors to be as zealous for their reformation, as for the relaxation of the feudal rigors and the other exactions introduced by the Norman family; and accordingly we find the immunities of carta de foresta as warmly contended for, and extorted from the king with as much difficulty, as those of magna carta itself. By this charter, confirmed in parliament,† many forests were disafforested, or stripped of their oppressive privileges, and regulations were made in the regimen of such as remained; particularly ‡ killing the king's deer was made no longer a capital offense, but only punished by a fine, imprisonment, or abjuration of the realm. And by a variety of subsequent statutes, together with the long acquiescence of the crown without exerting the forest laws, this prerogative is now become no longer a grievance to the subject.

But, as the king reserved to himself the forests for his own exclusive diversion, so he granted out from time to time other tracts of lands to his subjects under the names of chases or parks;§ or gave them license to make such in their own grounds; which indeed are smaller forests, in the hands of a subject, but not governed by the forest laws; and by the common law no person is at liberty to take or kill any beasts of chase, but such as hath an ancient chase or park; unless they be also beasts of prey.

§ 562. (3) Free fishery and freewarren.—[417] As to all inferior species of game, called beasts and fowls of warren, the liberty of taking or killing them is another franchise or royalty, derived likewise from the crown, and called freewarren; a word, which signifies preservation or custody: as the exclusive liberty of taking and killing fish in a public stream or river is called a free fishery; of which, however, no new franchise can at present be granted, by the express provision of magna carta, c. 16.<sup>b</sup> The principal intention of granting to anyone these franchises or liberties was in order to protect the game, by giving the grantee a sole and exclusive power of killing it himself, provided he prevented other persons. And no man, but he who has a chase or freewarren, by grant from the crown, or prescription which supposes one, can justify hunting or sporting upon another man's soil; nor indeed, in thorough strictness of common law, either hunting or sporting at all.

§ 563. (4) Sole right of taking originally in king.—However novel this doctrine may seem, it is a regular consequence from what has been before delivered; that the sole right of taking and destroying game belongs exclusively to the king.<sup>2</sup> This appears,

<sup>2</sup> "By the common law of England the owner of land had no absolute property in animals feræ naturæ while at liberty in the wild state, but had a qualified interest or property in such as were found, and so long as they remained, on his territory, and, when killed or captured thereon, became his absolute property. Blackstone's treatment of this subject is not altogether clear, though he seems to have considered the complete ownership of game, in the strictest proprietary sense, to have been in the crown, as a personal prerogative, even since Magna Carta. Yet he recognized the right or privilege of one to take game or fish on his own premises without restraint as a substantial and valuable one. 2 Bl. Comm. 418, 419. Mr. Christian, in his learned notes, combats, with the approval of Mr. Justice Coleridge, the doctrine apparently laid down by Blackstone to the effect that the sole right to take game rests primarily with the king, and maintains that at common law every person, ratione soli, had a right to take game on his own land. 2 Bl. Comm. p. 418, note 8. In Blades

as well from the historical deduction here made, as because he may grant to his subjects an exclusive right of taking them; which he could not do, unless such a right was first inherent in himself. And hence it will follow, that no person whatever, but he who has such derivative right from the crown, is by common law entitled to take or kill any beasts of chase, or other game whatsoever. It is true, that by the acquiescence of the crown, the frequent grants of freewarren in ancient times, and the introduction of new penalties of late by certain statutes for preserving the game, this exclusive prerogative of the king is little known or considered; every man, that is exempted from these modern penalties, looking upon himself as at liberty to do what he pleases with the game: whereas the contrary is strictly true, that no man, however well qualified he [418] may vulgarly be esteemed, has a right to encroach on the royal prerogative by the killing of game, unless he can show a particular grant of freewarren: or a prescription which presumes a grant; or some authority under an act of parliament. As for the latter, I know but of two instances wherein an express permission to kill game was ever given by statute; the one by 1 Jac. I, cap. 27 (Game, 1603), altered by 7 Jac. I, cap. 11 (Game, 1609), and virtually repealed by 22 & 23 Car. II, c. 25 (Game, 1670), which gave authority, so long as they remained in force, to the owners of freewarren, to lords of manors, and to all freeholders having 40*l.* per annum in lands of inheritance, or 80*l.* for life or lives, or 400*l.* personal estate (and their servants), to take partridges and pheasants upon their own, or their master's, freewarren, inheritance, or freehold: the other by 5 Ann., c. 14 (1705), which empowers lords and ladies of manors to appoint gamekeepers to kill game for the use of such lord or lady; which with some alteration still subsists, and plainly supposes such power not to have been in them before.

v. Hicks, 11 H. L. Cas. 621, Lord Westbury says: 'Property ratione soli is the common-law right which every owner of land has to kill and take all such animals feræ naturæ as may from time to time be found on his land, and as soon as this right is exercised the animals so killed or caught become the absolute property of the owner of the soil.' . . . The American cases not only generally treat the right of the owner of land to take game thereon as a property right inhering from the ownership of the soil, but recognize the establishment of that right at common law." State v. Mallory, 73 Ark. 236, 3 Ann. Cas. 852, 67 L. R. A. 773, 83 S. W. 955, 957.

The truth of the matter is, that these game laws (of which we shall have occasion to speak again in the fourth book of these Commentaries) do indeed qualify nobody, except in the instance of a game-keeper, to kill game: but only, to save the trouble and formal process of an action by the person injured, who perhaps too might remit the offense, these statutes inflict additional penalties, to be recovered either in a regular or summary way, by any of the king's subjects from certain persons of inferior rank who may be found offending in this particular. But it does not follow that persons, excused from these additional penalties, are therefore authorized to kill game. The circumstance of having 100*l. per annum*, and the rest, are not properly qualifications, but exemptions. And these persons, so exempted from the penalties of the game statutes, are not only liable to actions of trespass by the owners of the land; but also, if they kill game within the limits of any royal franchise, they are liable to the actions of such who may have the right of chase or freewarren therein.

§ 564. (5) Privilege of hunting.—<sup>[410]</sup> Upon the whole, it appears that the king, by his prerogative, and such persons as have, under his authority, the royal franchises of chase, park, freewarren, or free fishery, are the only persons who may acquire any property, however fugitive and transitory, in these animals feræ naturæ, while living; which is said to be vested in them, as was observed in a former chapter, propter privilegium (by privilege). And it must also be remembered, that such persons as may thus lawfully hunt, fish, or fowl, ratione privilegii (by reason of their privilege), have (as has been said) only a qualified property in these animals: it not being absolute or permanent, but lasting only so long as the creatures remain within the limits of such respective franchise or liberty, and ceasing the instant they voluntarily pass out of it. It is held, indeed, that if a man starts any game within his own grounds, and follows it into another's, and kills it there, the property remains in himself.<sup>o</sup> And this is grounded on reason and natural justice:<sup>d</sup> for the property consists in the possession; which possession commences by the finding it in his own liberty, and is continued by the immediate pursuit. And so, if a stranger starts game in one man's chase or freewarren, and hunts it into another liberty, the property continues in the owner of the chase or warren; this property arising from privilege,* and not being changed by the act of a mere stranger. Or if a man starts game on another's private grounds and kills it there, the property belongs to him in whose ground it was killed, because it was also started there;† this property arising ratione soli (on account of the soil). Whereas, if, after being started there, it is killed in the grounds of a third person, the property belongs not to the owner of the first ground, because the property is local; nor yet to the owner of the second, because it was not started in his soil; but it vests in the person who started and killed it,‡ though guilty of a trespass against both the owners.

§ 565. III. Title by forfeiture. — [420] I proceed now to a third method, whereby a title to goods and chattels may be acquired and lost, viz., by forfeiture; as a punishment for some crime or misdemeanor in the party forfeiting, and as a compensation for the offense and injury committed against him to whom they are forfeited. Of forfeitures, considered as the means whereby real property might be lost and acquired, we treated in a former chapter.<sup>h</sup> It remains, therefore, in this place only to mention by what means or for what offenses goods and chattels become liable to forfeiture.

§ 566. 1. Forfeiture for offenses.—In the variety of penal laws with which the subject is at present encumbered, it were a tedious and impracticable task to reckon up the various forfeitures, inflicted by special statutes, for particular crimes and misdemeanors: some of which are mala in se, or offenses against the divine law, either natural or revealed; but by far the greatest part are mala prohibita, or such as derive their guilt merely from their prohibition by the laws of the land: such as is the forfeiture of 40s. per month by the statute 5 Eliz., c. 4 (Artificers and Apprentices, 1562), for exercising a trade without having served seven years as an apprentice thereto; and the forfeiture of 10*l.* by 9 Ann., c. 23 (1710), for printing an almanac without a stamp. I shall therefore confine myself to those offenses only, by which all the goods and chattels of the offender are forfeited; referring the student for such, where pecuniary mulcts of different quantities are inflicted, to their several proper heads, under which very many of them have been or will be mentioned: or else to the collections of Hawkins, and Burn, and other laborious compilers. Indeed, as most of these forfeitures belong to the crown, they may seem as if they ought to have been referred to the preceding method of acquiring personal property, namely, by prerogative. But as, in the instance of partial forfeitures, a moiety often goes to the informer, the poor, or sometimes to other persons; and as one total forfeiture, namely, that by a bankrupt who is guilty of felony by concealing <sup>[421]</sup> his effects, accrues entirely to his creditors, I have therefore made it a distinct head of transferring property.

§ 567. a. Forfeiture for treason and felony.—Goods and chattels, then, are totally forfeited by conviction of high treason, or misprision of treason; of petit treason; of felony in general, and particularly of felony de se, and of manslaughter; nay, even by conviction of excusable homicide;<sup>1</sup> by outlawry for treason or felony; by conviction of petit larceny; by flight in treason or felony, even though the party be acquitted of the fact; by standing mute, when arraigned of felony; by drawing a weapon on a judge, or striking anyone in the presence of the king's courts; by præmunire: by pretended prophecies, upon a second conviction; by owling; by the residing abroad of artificers; and by challenging to fight on account of money won at gaming. All these offenses, as will more fully appear in the fourth book of these Commentaries, induce a total forfeiture of goods and chattels.<sup>3</sup>

There were numerous other forfeitures of this class (enumerated 2 Burn, Justice, 17th ed., 302, 303), including forfeiture of the goods of a person against whom a verdict of felo de se is returned. All these forfeitures, after a gradual relaxa-

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-EIGHTH. [422]

OF TITLE BY CUSTOM.

§ 569. IV. Title by custom.—A fourth method of acquiring property in things personal, or chattels, is by custom; whereby a right vests in some particular persons, either by the local usage of some particular place, or by the almost general and universal usage of the kingdom. It were endless, should I attempt to enumerate all the several kinds of special customs, which may entitle a man to a chattel interest in different parts of the kingdom: I shall therefore content myself with making some observations on three sorts of customary interests, which obtain pretty generally throughout most parts of the nation, and are therefore of more universal concern; viz., heriots, mortuaries, and heirlooms.

§ 570. 1. Heriots.—Heriots, which were slightly touched upon in a former chapter,<sup>a</sup> are usually divided into two sorts, heriot service and heriot custom. The former are such as are due upon a special reservation in a grant or lease of lands, and therefore amount to little more than a mere rent:<sup>b</sup> the latter arise upon no special reservation whatsoever, but depend merely upon immemorial usage and custom.<sup>c</sup> Of these, therefore, we are here principally to speak: and they are defined to be a customary tribute of goods and chattels, payable to the lord of the fee on the decease of the owner of the land.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> A modern instance of heriot service.—On heriots, see Pollock and Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), i, 312–314, 316, 317; ii, 259, 322, 338; Holdsworth, Hist. Eng. Law, ii, 65, 317; iii, 51, 53, 168. A note in 23 Law Quart. Rev. 251, of which the following is an extract, shows that heriot service was claimed as late as 1907: “Copestake v. Hoper, [1907] 1 Ch. 366, is a case of great interest to conveyancers and to students of real property law. For one thing it affords an instance of a manor (that of Ewhurst in Sussex), whereof the free tenants still hold their lands by fealty, suit of court, an annual quit rent, a relief on the death of the tenant or alienation of the tenement, and a heriot of the tenant’s best beast on his death. Land so held had been mortgaged by the tenant in the year 1887 by an indenture of statutory mortgage;

§ 571. a. Heriots of Danish origin.—<sup>[423]</sup> The first establishment, if not introduction, of compulsory heriots into England, was by the Danes: and we find in the laws of King Canute<sup>d</sup> the several heregeates or heriots specified, which were then exacted by the king on the death of divers of his subjects, according to their respective dignities; from the highest eorle down to the most inferior thegne or landholder. These, for the most part, consisted in arms, horses, and habiliments of war; which the word itself, according to Sir Henry Spelman,<sup>e</sup> signifies. These were delivered up to the sovereign on the death of the vassal, who could no longer use them, to be put into other hands for the service and defense of the country. And upon the plan of this Danish establishment did William the Conqueror fashion his law of reliefs, as was formerly observed;<sup>f</sup> when he ascertained the precise relief to be taken of every tenant in chivalry, and, contrary to the feudal custom and the usage of his own Duchy of Normandy, required arms and implements of war to be paid instead of money.<sup>g</sup>

The Danish compulsive heriots, being thus transmuted into reliefs, underwent the same several vicissitudes as the feudal tenures, and in socage estates do frequently remain to this day, in the shape of a double rent payable at the death of the tenant: the heriots which now continue among us, and preserve that name, seeming rather to be of Saxon parentage, and at first to have been merely discretionary.<sup>h</sup> These are now for the most part confined to copyhold tenures, and are due by custom only, which is the life of all estates by copy; and perhaps are the only instance where custom has favored the lord. For this payment was originally a voluntary donation, or gratuitous legacy of the tenant; perhaps in acknowledgment of his having been raised a degree above villeinage, when the mortgagor remained in possession until his death; and thereupon the lord claimed a heriot. The claim was resisted on the ground that the mortgagee was seised of the land as tenant of the manor, and was still living. Mr. Justice Kekewich, however, decided in favor of the lord's claim, on the ground that the mortgagee was not, before entry into possession, seised as a freehold tenant of the land."

all his goods and chattels were quite at the mercy of the lord: and custom, which has on the [424] one hand confirmed the tenant's interest in exclusion of the lord's will, has on the other hand established this discretionary piece of gratitude into a permanent duty. An heriot may also appertain to free land, that is held by service and suit of court; in which case it is most commonly a copyhold enfranchised, whereupon the heriot is still due by custom. Bracton<sup>1</sup> speaks of heriots as frequently due on the death of both species of tenants: "Est quidem alia præstatio quæ nominatur herietum; ubi tenens, liber vel servus in morte sua dominum suum, de quo tenuerit, respicit de meliori averio suo, vel de secundo meliori, secundum diversam locorum consuetudinem (There is indeed another prestation, which is called a heriot; where a tenant at his death, whether a freeman or a slave, acknowledges the lord of whom he held, by giving his best beast or the second best, according to the custom of the place)." And this, he adds, "magis fit de gratia quam de jure (it is more a matter of favor than of right)"; in which Fleta<sup>2</sup> and Britton<sup>1</sup> agree: thereby plainly intimating the original of this custom to have been merely voluntary, as a legacy from the tenant; though now the immemorial usage has established it as of right in the lord.

§ 572. b. Heriots always personal chattels.—This heriot is sometimes the best live beast, or averium, which the tenant dies possessed of (which is particularly denominated the villein's relief in the twenty-ninth law of King William the Conqueror), sometimes the best inanimate good, under which a jewel or piece of plate may be included: but it is always a personal chattel, which, immediately on the death of the tenant who was the owner of it, being ascertained by the option of the lord,<sup>m</sup> becomes vested in him as his property; and is no charge upon the lands, but merely on the goods and chattels. The tenant must be the owner of it, else it cannot be due; and therefore on the death of a feme covert no heriot can be taken; for she can have no ownership in things personal.<sup>n</sup> In some places there is a customary composition in money, as ten or twenty shillings in lieu of a heriot, by which the lord and tenant are both bound, if it be an indisputably ancient custom: but a new composition of this sort will not bind the representatives of either party; for that amounts to the creation of a new custom, which is now impossible.<sup>o</sup>

§ 573. 2. Mortuaries.—[425] Mortuaries are a sort of ecclesiastical heriots being a customary gift claimed by and due to the minister in very many parishes on the death of his parishioners. They seem originally to have been, like lay heriots, only a voluntary bequest to the church; being intended, as Lyndewode informs us from a constitution of Archbishop Langham, as a kind of expiation and amends to the clergy for the personal tithes, and other ecclesiastical duties, which the laity in their lifetime might have neglected or forgotten to pay. For this purpose, after<sup>p</sup> the lord's heriot or best good was taken out, the second best chattel was reserved to the church as a mortuary: "Si decedens plura habuerit animalia, optimo cui de jure fuerit debitum reservato, ecclesie sue sine dolo, fraude, seu contradictione qualibet, pro recompensatione subtractionis decimarum personalium, necnon et oblationum, secundum melius animal reservetur, post obitum, pro salute anime sue (if a man when dying shall have many animals, the best being reserved for him to whom it was of right due, let the second best, after his death, be set apart for the church for the good of his soul, without any deceit, fraud, or objection, as an amends for the withholding of personal tithes and oblations)."<sup>q</sup> And therefore in the laws of King Canute<sup>r</sup> this mortuary is called soul-scot (sawlseat) or symbolum anime (passport of the soul). And, in pursuance of the same principle, by the laws of Venice, where no personal tithes have been paid during the life of the party, they are paid at his death out of his merchandise, jewels, and other movables.<sup>s</sup> So, also, by a similar policy, in France, every man that died without bequeathing a part of his estate to the church, which was called dying without confession, was formerly deprived of Christian burial: or, if he died intestate, the relations of the deceased, jointly with the bishop, named proper arbitrators to determine what he ought to have given to the church, in case he had made a will. But the parliament, in 1409, redressed this grievance.†

It was anciently usual in this kingdom to bring the mortuary to church along with the corpse when it came to be buried; and thence it is sometimes called a corse-present: a [426] term, which bespeaks it to have been once a voluntary donation. However, in Bracton's time, so early as Henry III we find it riveted into an established custom: insomuch that the bequests of heriots and mortuaries were held to be necessary ingredients in every testament of chattels. "Imprimis autem debet quilibet, qui testamentum fecerit, dominum suum de meliori re quam habuerit recognoscere; et postea ecclesiam de alia meliori (whoever shall make a will, should in the first place acknowledge his lord by a bequest of the best chattel he may possess; and afterwards the church by the second best)": the lord must have the best good left him as an heriot; and the church the second best as a mortuary. But yet this custom was different in different places: "in quibusdam locis habet ecclesia melius animal de consuetudine; in quibusdam secundum, vel tertium melius; et in quibusdam nihil: et ideo consideranda est consuetudo loci (in some places the church has the best animal by custom; in others the second or third best; and in others again nothing; and therefore it is the custom of the place which determines the matter)."‡ This custom still varies in different places, not only as the mortuary to be paid, but the person to whom it is payable. In Wales a mortuary or corse-present was due upon the death of every clergyman to the bishop of the diocese; till abolished, upon a recompense given to the bishop, by the statute 12 Ann., st. 2, c. 6 (Mortuaries, 1713). And in the archdeaconry of Chester a custom also prevailed, that the bishop, who is also archdeacon, should have at the death of every clergyman dying therein his best horse or mare, bridle, saddle, and spurs, his best gown or cloak, hat, upper garment under his gown, and tippet, and also his best signet or ring.‡ But by statute 28 Geo. II, c. 6 (Mortuaries, 1754), this mortuary is directed to cease, and the act has settled upon the bishop an equivalent in its room. The king's claim to many goods, on the death of all prelates in England, seems to be of the same nature: though Sir Edward Coke<sup>1</sup> apprehends, that this is a duty due upon death and not a mortuary: a distinction which seems to be without a difference. For not only the king's ecclesiastical character, as supreme ordinary, but also the species of the goods claimed, which bear so near a resemblance to those in the archdeaconry of Chester, which was an acknowledged mortuary, puts the matter out of dispute. The king, according to the record vouched by Sir Edward Coke, is entitled to six things: the bishop's best horse or palfrey, with his furniture: his cloak, [427] or gown, and tippet: his cup, and cover: his basin and ewer: his gold ring: and lastly, his muta canum, his mew or kennel of hounds; as was mentioned in the preceding chapter.<sup>2</sup>

This variety of customs, with regard to mortuaries, giving frequently a handle to exactions on the one side, and frauds or expensive litigations on the other; it was thought proper by statute 21 Hen. VIII, c. 6 (Mortuaries, 1529) to reduce them to some kind of certainty. For this purpose it is enacted, that all mortuaries, or corse-presents to parsons of any parish, shall be taken in the following manner; unless where by custom less or none at all is due: viz., for every person who does not leave goods to the value of ten marks, nothing: for every person who leaves goods to the value of ten marks and under thirty pounds, 3s. 4d. if above thirty pounds, and under forty pounds, 6s. 8d. if above forty pounds, of what value soever they may be, 10s. and no more. And no mortuary shall throughout the kingdom be paid for the death of any feme covert; nor for any child; nor for anyone of full age, that is not a housekeeper; nor for any wayfaring man; but such wayfaring man's mortuary shall be paid in the parish to which he belongs. And upon this statute stands the law of mortuaries to this day.

§ 574. 3. Heirlooms.—Heirlooms are such goods and personal chattels, as, contrary to the nature of chattels, shall go by special custom to the heir along with the inheritance, and not to the executor of the last proprietor.<sup>2</sup> The termination, loom, is of Saxon original; in which language it signifies a limb or member; <sup>a</sup> so that an heirloom is nothing else, but a limb or member of the inheritance. They are generally such things as cannot be taken away without damaging or dismembering the freehold: otherwise the general rule is, that no chattel interest whatsoever shall go to the heir, notwithstanding it be expressly limited to a man and his heirs, but shall vest in the executor.<sup>b</sup> But deer in a real authorized park, fishes in a pond, doves in a dove-house, etc., though in themselves personal [428] chattels, yet they are so annexed to and so necessary to the well-being of the inheritance, that they shall accompany the land wherever it vests, by either descent or purchase.<sup>c</sup> For this reason, also, I apprehend it is, that the ancient jewels of the crown are held to be heirlooms;<sup>d</sup> for they are necessary to maintain the state, and support the dignity, of the sovereign for the time being. Charters likewise, and deeds, court rolls, and other evidences of the land, together with the chests in which they are contained, shall pass together with the land to the heir, in the nature of heirlooms, and shall not go to the executor.*<sup>3</sup> By special custom also, in some places, carriages, utensils, and other

Comm. *74, and 2 Comm. *263, which are of local force. Nor is it a custom "used among one set of subjects" like the law-merchant and trade usages (1 Comm. *75), for the heirloom is not so used. It is plain, too, that by the reasoning of 2 Comm. *263, *264, the right to an heirloom must be prescriptive and not customary in its nature, and thus again a part of the common law: which defeats the reasoning of Blackstone (p. *429), where he tries to show that a devise must necessarily be postponed to such a custom. For while that may be true of a local custom, which, by its nature, excludes common-law rights, it is meaningless when applied to a rule of the common law itself. And even if the heirloom be considered as a fixture, or as an extension of the same principle by which fixtures are made a part of the realty, this would not account for the rule that a devise of the heirloom by a tenant in fee simple is void, as Blackstone states in the passage last cited. * * *—HAMMOND.

<sup>3</sup> Heirlooms in United States.—Heirlooms, in the accurate sense as used by Blackstone, have probably never been recognized in this country, unless title deeds passing with the land may be so treated. But they are not regarded as property in and of themselves, and cannot, it would seem, be treated as heirlooms. See Parrott v. Avery, 159 Mass. 594, 38 Am. 1st. Rep. 465, 22 L. R. A. 153, 35 N. E. 94; Huse v. Den, 85 Cal. 390, 20 Am. St. Rep. 232, 24 household implements, may be heirlooms;† but such custom must be strictly proved. On the other hand, by almost general custom, whatever is strongly affixed to the freehold or inheritance, and cannot be severed from thence without violence or damage, “quod ab ædibus non facile revellitur (whatever is not easily severed from houses),”‡ is become a member of the inheritance, and shall thereupon pass to the heir; as chimney-pieces, pumps, old fixed or dormant tables, benches, and the like.‡ A very similar notion to which prevails in the Duchy of Brabant; where they rank certain things movable among those of the immovable kind, calling them by a very particular appellation, prædia volantia, or volatile estates: such as beds, tables, and other heavy implements of furniture, which (as an author of their own observes), “dignitatem istam nacta sunt, ut villis, sylvis, et ædibus, aliisque prædiis, comparentur; quod solidiora mobilia ipsis ædibus ex destinatione patrisfamilias cohærere videantur, et pro parte ipsarum ædium æstimentur (have obtained this estimation; that they are classed with towns, woods, houses, and other estates; because the more solid movables seem to be fixed to the houses by the will of the ancestor, and are considered as a part of the buildings themselves).”<sup>1</sup>

Other personal chattels there are, which also descend to the heir in the nature of heirlooms, as a monument or tombstone in a church, or the coat-armor of his ancestor there [420] hung up, with the pennons and other ensigns of honor, suited to his degree. In this case, albeit the freehold of the church is in the parson, and these are annexed to that freehold, yet cannot the parson or any other take them away or deface them, but is liable to an action from the heir.<sup>k</sup> Pews in the church are somewhat of the same nature,<sup>4</sup> which may descend by custom immemorial (without any ecclesiastical concurrence) from the ancestor to the heir.<sup>1</sup> But though the heir has a property in the monuments and escutcheons of his ancestors, yet he has none in their bodies or ashes; nor can he bring any civil action against such as indecently at least, if not impiously, violate and disturb their remains, when dead and buried. The parson, indeed, who has the freehold of the soil, may bring an action of trespass against such as dig and disturb it: and, if anyone in taking up a dead body steals the shroud or other apparel, it will be felony;<sup>m</sup> for the property thereof remains in the executor, or whoever was at the charge of the funeral.<sup>5</sup>

Pac. 790; Smith v. McGregor, 10 Ohio St. 461; 1 Reeves, Real Prop., 70. In Haven v. Haven, 181 Mass. 573, 64 N. E. 410, the question was waived, the court saying: “This renders it unnecessary to consider whether the direction that the portraits should remain in the mansion so long as it was occupied by any of Ann Haven’s lineal descendants could be supported as a disposition of the portraits as heirlooms, as the respondent contends it can. In regard to this contention it may be observed that, assuming that under our law as under the English law (see Hill v. Hill, [1897] 1 Q. B. 483) personal chattels may be disposed of by will so as to pass with the realty as heirlooms or as fixtures in the nature of heirlooms, there is no intention manifested that the title to, or even the possession of, the portraits should pass with or accompany the title to the mansion-house.”

But to return to heirlooms: these, though they be mere chattels, yet cannot be devised away from the heir by will; but such a devise

<sup>4</sup> Pew rights.—When, in the United States, pew rights are granted to a person in perpetuity or for life, his ownership thereof may be regarded as real property; when they are leased to him for one or more years, his interest therein is personal property, a chattel real. 1 Reeves, Real Prop., 67. In Massachusetts and New Hampshire pews are personal property by statute. In Pennsylvania they are held personal property as to devolution, although an interest in realty. Church v. Well's Exr., 24 Pa. 249. In any case, the right of the owner to occupy the pew is only for divine service and other recognized occasions. The rights of the parish are paramount. First Baptist Society v. Grant, 59 Me. 245.

<sup>5</sup> Property in dead bodies.—Nor, as it appears, has the personal representative or the widow of deceased [any property in the body or ashes of the deceased]. As the disposition of the dead was entirely within the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts during the period when the common law was in process of formation, it is not surprising that we find little light on the subject in the latter. But it has been often discussed of late years, and the general opinion seems to be that the duty of burial or other proper disposal of the body lies with the personal representative, but terminates with that act, and that so far as property in the remains can be said to exist, it belongs to the next of kin, who in this country are identical with the heirs at common law. (Wynkoop v. Wynkoop, 42 Pa. St. 293, 82 Am. Dec. 506, is void,<sup>a</sup> even by a tenant in fee simple. For, though the owner might during his life have sold or disposed of them, as he might of the timber of the estate, since, as the inheritance was his own, he might mangle or dismember it as he pleased; yet, they being at his death instantly vested in the heir, the devise (which is subsequent, and not to take effect till after his death) shall be postponed to the custom, whereby they have already descended.

City of Indianapolis*, 13 Ind. 134; Lowry v. Plitt, 16 Am. Law Reg., N. S., 155.) Most cases, however, follow Blackstone in holding the corpse to be res nullius.

“In a buried coffin containing a corpse there is no ownership that can be asserted by one person against another in a civil action; but an ownership of a character sufficient to support a charge of larceny will be taken to exist somewhere. It is not necessary for the purposes of the criminal law, to fix this ownership, and an indictment is sufficient which charges that the coffin is the property of some person to the jurors unknown.”

“The property may be said to be in the person who bought the coffin for the purpose of interment. Articles which may have no market value may nevertheless have a value which the law will recognize.” (State v. Doepke, 5 Mo. App. 590, quoted in 17 Alb. L. J. 296; and on appeal in 68 Mo. 208, 30 Am. Rep. 785; Meagher v. Driscoll, 99 Mass. 281, 96 Am. Dec. 759; Weld v. Walker, 130 Mass. 423, 39 Am. Rep. 465.) The most thorough and discriminating discussion of the subject may be found in Pierce v. The Proprietors of Swan Point Cemetery, 10 R. I. 227, 14 Am. Rep. 667, holding that a dead body is not strictly property, but that there may be rights and duties of certain persons in relation to it, arisen out of common humanity, of analogous nature. (See, also, the report of S. B. Ruggles on the Law of Burial, in 4 Bradford’s Surrogate Reports, 528.)—HAMMOND.

However, it may be added that the right of the widow, or probably of next of kin, to control the disposition of the body or place of burial is recognized. O’Donnell v. Slack, 123 Cal. 285, 43 L. R. A. 388, 55 Pac. 906; Buchanan v. Buchanan, 28 Misc. Rep. 261, 59 N. Y. Supp. 810; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wilson, 123 Ga. 62, 3 Ann. Cas. 128, 51 S. E. 24; Pettigrew v. Pettigrew, 207 Pa. 313, 99 Am. St. Rep. 795, 64 L. R. A. 179, 56 Atl. 878. The laws of California, Connecticut, Louisiana and Vermont recognize the interest of relatives in the body of a deceased person. The right to make testamentary direction concerning the disposal of the body is conferred by statute in certain states. After burial, the only right of control that remains is to protect it from unlawful interference. Peters v. Peters, 43 N. J. Eq. 140, 10 Atl. 742; Meagher v. Driscoll, 99 Mass. 281, 96 Am. ## CHAPTER THE TWENTY-NINTH. [430]

OF TITLE BY SUCCESSION, MARRIAGE, AND JUDGMENT.

In the present chapter we shall take into consideration three other species of title to goods and chattels.

§ 575. V. Title by succession.—The fifth method, therefore, of gaining a property in chattels, either personal or real, is by succession: which is, in strictness of law, only applicable to corporations aggregate of many, as dean and chapter, mayor and commonalty, master and fellows, and the like; in which one set of men may, by succeeding another set, acquire a property in all the goods, movables, and other chattels of the corporation. The true reason whereof is, because in judgment of law a corporation never dies; and therefore the predecessors, who lived a century ago, and their successors now in being, are one and the same body corporate.<sup>a</sup> Which identity is a property so inherent in the nature of a body politic, that, even when it is meant to give anything to be taken in succession by such a body, that succession need not be expressed: but the law will of itself imply it. So that a gift to such a corporation, either of lands or of chattels, without naming their successors, vests an absolute property in them so long as the corporation subsists.<sup>b</sup> And thus a lease for years, an obligation, [431] a jewel, a flock of sheep, or other chattel interest, will vest in the successors, by succession, as well as in the identical members, to whom it was originally given.

§ 576. 1. Distinction as to sole corporations.—But with regard to sole corporations, a considerable distinction must be made. For if such sole corporation be the representative of a number of persons; as the master of an hospital, who is a corporation for the benefit of the poor brethren; an abbot, or prior, by the old law before the Reformation, who represented the whole convent; or the dean of some ancient cathedral, who stands in the place of, and represents in his corporate capacity, the chapter; such sole corporations as these have in this respect the same powers, as corporations aggregate have, to take personal property or chattels in succession. And therefore a bond of such a master, abbot, or dean, and his successors, is good in law; and the successor shall have the advantage of it, for the benefit of the aggregate society, of which he is in law the representative.* Whereas in the case of sole corporations, which represent no others but themselves, as bishops, parsons, and the like, no chattel interest can regularly go in succession: and therefore, if a lease for years be made to the bishop of Oxford and his successors, in such case his executors or administrators, and not his successors, shall have it.<sup>d</sup> For the word "successors," when applied to a person in his political capacity, is equivalent to the word "heirs" in his natural; and as such a lease for years, if made to John and his heirs, would not vest in his heirs, but his executors; so if it be made to John, Bishop of Oxford, and his successors, who are the heirs of his body politic, it shall still vest in his executors and not in such his successors. The reason of this is obvious: for, besides that the law looks upon goods and chattels as of too low and perishable a nature to be limited either to heirs, or such successors as are equivalent to heirs; it would also follow, that if any such chattel interest (granted to a sole corporation and his successors) were allowed to descend to such successor, the property thereof must be in abeyance from the [432] death of the present owner until the successor be appointed; and this is contrary to the nature of a chattel interest, which can never be in abeyance or without an owner;° but a man's right therein, when once suspended, is gone forever. This is not the case in corporations aggregate, where the right is never in suspense; nor in the other sole corporations before mentioned, who are rather to be considered as heads of an aggregate body, than subsisting merely in their own right: the chattel interest, therefore, in such a case, is really and substantially vested in the hospital, convent, chapter, or other aggregate body; though the head is the visible person in whose name every act is carried on, and in whom every interest is therefore said (in point of form) to vest. But the general rule, with regard to corporations merely sole, is this, that no chattel can go or be acquired by right of succession.<sup>f</sup>

† Co. Litt. 46.

Yet to this rule there are two exceptions. One in the case of the king, in whom a chattel may vest by a grant of it formerly made to a preceding king and his successors.<sup>5</sup> The other exception is, where, by a particular custom, some particular corporations sole have acquired a power of taking particular chattel interests in succession. And this custom, being against the general tenor of the common law, must be strictly interpreted, and not extended to any other chattel interests than such immemorial usage will strictly warrant. Thus the chamberlain of London, who is a corporation sole, may by the custom of London take bonds and recognizances to himself and his successor, for the benefit of the orphan's fund:<sup>h</sup> but it will not follow from thence, that he has a capacity to take a lease for years to himself and his successors for the same purpose; for the custom extends not to that: nor that he may take a bond to himself and his successors, for any other purpose than the benefit of the orphan's fund; for that also is not warranted by the custom. Wherefore, upon the whole, we may close this head with laying down this general rule; that such right of succession to chattels is universally [433] inherent by the common law in all aggregate corporations, in the king, and in such single corporations as represent a number of persons; and may, by special custom, belong to certain other sole corporations for some particular purposes: although, generally, in sole corporations no such right can exist.

<sup>1</sup> Law of property of married women.—Professor Dicey, in his "Law and Public Opinion in England," discusses the history of the law as to the property of married women by way of illustrating the effect of judge-made law on parliamentary legislation. He considers married women's property rights as determined, first, by the common-law decisions, secondly, by the decisions of the court of chancery, and thirdly, by the Married Women's Property Acts, 1870–1893. The first portion of this critical discussion, the property rights of married women at common law as it prevailed down to 1870, is as follows: "A married woman's position in regard to her property was the natural result, worked out by successive generations of lawyers with logical thoroughness, of the principle that, in the words of Blackstone, 'by marriage, the husband and wife are one person in law: that is, the very being or legal existence of the chattels, which belonged formerly to the wife, are by act of law vested in the husband, with the same degree of property and with the same powers, as the wife, when sole, had over them.

This depends entirely on the notion of an unity of person between the husband and wife; it being held that they are one person in law,<sup>1</sup> so that the very being and existence of the woman is suspended during the coverture, or entirely merged or incorporated in that of the husband. And hence it follows, that whatever per-woman is suspended during the marriage, or at least is incorporated and consolidated into that of the husband.'

"If, for the sake of clearness, we omit all limitations and exceptions, many of which are for the purpose of these lectures unimportant, the result at common law of this merger of a wife's legal status in that of her husband may be thus broadly stated. Marriage was an assignment of a wife's property rights to her husband at any rate during coverture. Much of her property, whether possessed by her at, or coming to her after, her marriage, either became absolutely his own, or during coverture might, if he chose, be made absolutely his own, so that even if his wife survived him it went to his representatives.

"This statement is, from a technical point of view, as every lawyer will perceive, lacking in precision, or even in strict accuracy, but it conveys to a student, more clearly than can otherwise be expressed in a few words, the real effect between 1800 and 1870 of the common law (in so far as it was not controlled by the rules of equity) on the position of a married woman in regard to her property. The statement lacks precision, because at common law the effect of marriage on a woman's property varied with the nature of the property; the interest which a husband acquired in his wife's freeholds differed from the interest which he acquired in her leaseholds; of the goods and chattels again which were at the time of marriage in, or after marriage came into, the possession of his wife, he acquired an interest different from his rights over her choses in action, such as debts due to her, e. g., on a bond, or as money deposited at her bankers. The statement, however, is substantially true, because a husband on marriage became for most purposes the almost absolute master of his wife's property. The whole of her income, from whatever source it came (even if it were the earnings of her own work or professional skill), belonged to her husband. Then, too, a married woman, because her personality was merged in that of her husband, had no contractual capacity, i. e., she could not bind herself by a contract. Her testamentary capacity was extremely limited; she could not make a devise of her freehold property, and such testamentary power as she possessed with regard to personal property could be exercised only with the consent of her husband, and this consent, when given, might be at any time revoked. If she died intestate the whole of her personal

sonal property belonged to the wife, before marriage, is by marriage absolutely vested in the husband. In a real estate, he only gains a title to the rents and profits during coverture: for that, depending upon feudal principles, remains entire to the wife after the death of her husband, or to her heirs, if she dies before him; unless by the birth of a child, he becomes tenant for life by the curtesy. But, in chattel interests, the sole and absolute property vests in the husband; to be disposed of at his pleasure, if he chooses estate either remained her husband's or became his on her death. The way in which the rules of the common law might, occasionally at any rate, deprive a rich woman of the whole of her wealth may be seen by the following illustration. A lady is possessed of a large fortune; it consists of household furniture, pictures, a large sum in money and bank notes, as well as £10,000 deposited at her bankers, of leasehold estates in London, and of freehold estates in the country. She is induced, in 1850, to marry, without having made any settlement whatever, an adventurer, such as the Barry Lyndon of fiction, or the Mr. Bowes of historical reality, who supplied, it is said, the original for Thackeray's picture of Barry Lyndon's married life. He at once becomes the actual owner of all the goods and money in the possession of his wife. He can, by taking the proper steps, with or without her consent, obtain possession for his own use of the money at her bankers, and exact payment to himself of every debt due to her. He can sell her leaseholds and put the proceeds in his own pocket. Her freehold estate, indeed, he cannot sell out and out, but he can charge it to the extent of his own interest therein at any rate during coverture, and if under the curtesy of England he acquires a life interest in the freehold estate after the death of his wife, he can charge the estate for the term of his natural life. In any case he can spend as he pleases the whole of his wife's income. He turns out a confirmed gambler. In the course of a few years he has got rid of the whole of his wife's property, except the freehold estate, but though it has not been sold, he has charged it with the payment of all his debts up to the very utmost of his power. If he outlives his wife she will never receive a penny of rent from the estate. He and his wife are in truth penniless; she earns, however, £1,000 a year as a musician or an actress. This is a piece of rare good luck—for her husband. He is master of the money she earns. Let him allow her enough, say £200 a year, to induce her to exert her talents, and he may live in idleness and modest comfort on the remaining £800. Under this state of things, which up to 1870 was possible, though, of course, not common, it is surely substantially true to say that marriage transferred the property of a wife to her husband. Blackstone, indeed, though he knew the common law well enough, tells us that, 'even the disabilities which the wife lies under, are for the most part intended for her protection and benefit. So great a favorite is the female sex of the laws of England.' But this splendid optimism of 1765 is too much for even the complacent toricism

to take possession of them: for unless he reduces them to possession, by exercising some act of ownership upon them, no property vests in him, but they shall remain to the wife, or to her representatives, after the coverture is determined.

§ 578. 1. Difference between chattels real and personal.— There is therefore a very considerable difference in the acquisition of 1809, and at that date, Christian, an editor of Blackstone's Commentaries, feels bound to deny that the law of England has shown any special partiality to women, and protests that he is not so much in love with his subject 'as to be inclined to leave it in possession of a glory which it may not justly deserve.'" DICEY, Law and Opinion in England (2d ed.), 371 ff.

It may be serviceable to add Professor Dicey's formulation of Blackstone's title by marriage in this "Outline of effect of marriage at common law as assignment of wife's (W.'s) property to husband (H.)."

"(A) W.'s personal property.

"I. Goods, e. g., money and furniture in actual possession of W. became the absolute property of H.

"II. W.'s choses in action (e. g., debts due to W.) became H.'s if he recovered them by law, or reduced them into possession during coverture, but not otherwise.

"III. W.'s chattels real (leaseholds) did not become H.'s property, but he might, during coverture, dispose of them (give them away or sell them) at his pleasure, and, if he sold them, the proceeds of the sale were his property.

"On the death of W. before H. all her personal property, if it had not already absolutely become his, passed to H.

"On the death of H. before W., her choses in action if not reduced into possession, and her leaseholds, if not disposed of by H., remained W.'s.

"(B) W.'s freehold estate.

"Any freehold estate of which W. was seised vested in W. and H. during coverture, but was during coverture under his sole management and control.

"On the death of W. before H. her freehold estate went at once to her heir, unless H. was entitled, through the birth of a child of the marriage, to an interest therein for life by the curtesy of England.

"On the death of H. before W., W.'s freehold estate remained her own.

"N. B.—(1) These rules apply to property coming to W. during coverture as well as to property possessed by her at the time of marriage.

"(2) H. was entitled during coverture to the whole of W.'s income from whatever source it came, e. g., if it were rent from her leasehold or freehold property, or if it were her own earnings. The income, when paid to her or to H., was his, whilst still unpaid it was a chose in action which he might reduce into possession. See Blackstone, Comm., II, 433-435; Stephen, Comm., II (14th ed.), 308-314."—DICEY, Law and Opinion in England (2d ed.), 372 n.

of this species of property by the husband, according to the subject matter; viz., whether it be a chattel real, [434] or a chattel personal; and, of chattels personal, whether it be in possession, or in action only. A chattel real vests in the husband, not absolutely, but sub modo. As in case of a lease for years, the husband shall receive all the rents and profits of it, and may, if he pleases, sell, surrender, or dispose of it during the coverture: <sup>k</sup> if he be outlawed or attainted, it shall be forfeited to the king; <sup>l</sup> it is liable to execution for his debts: <sup>m</sup> and, if he survives his wife, it is to all intents and purposes his own. <sup>n</sup> Yet, if he has made no disposition thereof in his lifetime, and dies before his wife, he cannot dispose of it by will: <sup>o</sup> for, the husband having made no alteration in the property during his life, it never was transferred from the wife; but after his death she shall remain in her ancient possession, and it shall not go to his executors. So it is also of chattels personal (or choses) in action; as debts upon bond, contracts, and the like: these the husband may have if he pleases; that is, if he reduces them into possession by receiving or recovering them at law. And, upon such receipt or recovery, they are absolutely and entirely his own; and shall go to his executors or administrators, or as he shall bequeath them by will, and shall not revest in the wife. But, if he dies before he has recovered or reduced them into possession, so that at his death they still continue choses in action, they shall survive to the wife; for the husband never exerted the power he had of obtaining an exclusive property in them. <sup>p</sup> And so, if an estray comes into the wife's franchise, and the husband seizes it, it is absolutely his property: but, if he dies without seizing it, his executors are not now at liberty to seize it, but the wife or her heirs; <sup>q</sup> for the husband never exerted the right he had, which right determined with the coverture. Thus in both these species of property the law is the same, in case the wife survives the husband; but, in case the husband survives the wife, the law is very different with respect to chattels real and choses in action: for he shall have [435] the chattel real by survivorship, but not the chose in action; <sup>r</sup> except in the case of arrears of rent, due to the wife before her coverture, which in case of her death are given to the husband by statute 32 Hen. VIII, c. 37 (Administration of Estates, 1540). And the reason for the general law is this: that the husband is in absolute possession of the chattel real during the coverture, by a kind of joint tenancy with his wife; wherefore the law will not wrest it out of his hands, and give it to her representatives; though, in case he had died first, it would have survived to the wife, unless he thought proper in his lifetime to alter the possession. But a chose in action shall not survive to him, because he never was in possession of it at all, during the coverture; and the only method he had to gain possession of it, was by suing in his wife's right: but as, after her death, he cannot (as husband) bring an action in her right, because they are no longer one and the same person in law, therefore he can never (as such) recover the possession. But he still will be entitled to be her administrator; and may, in that capacity, recover such things in action as became due to her before or during the coverture.

Thus, and upon these reasons, stands the law between husband and wife, with regard to chattels real, and choses in action: but, as to chattels personal (or choses) in possession, which the wife hath in her own right, as ready money, jewels, household goods, and the like, the husband hath therein an immediate and absolute property, devolved to him by the marriage, not only potentially but in fact, which never can again revest in the wife or her representative.<sup>a</sup>

§ 579. 2. Paraphernalia.—And, as the husband may thus generally, acquire a property in all the personal substance of the wife, so in one particular instance the wife may acquire a property in some of her husband's goods; which shall remain to her after his death, and not go to his executors. These are called her paraphernalia,<sup>2</sup> [436] which is a term borrowed from the civil law,† and is derived from the Greek language, signifying something over and above her dower. Our law uses it to signify the apparel and ornaments of the wife, suitable to her rank and degree: which she becomes entitled to at the death of her husband, over and above her jointure or dower, and preferably to all other representatives: <sup>u</sup> and the jewels of a peeress, usually worn by her, have been held to be paraphernalia.<sup>w</sup> Neither can the husband devise by his will such ornaments and jewels of his wife; though during his life perhaps he hath the power (if unkindly inclined to exert it) to sell them or give them away.<sup>x</sup> But if she continues in the use of them till his death, she shall afterwards retain them against his executors and administrators, and all other persons, except creditors, where there is a deficiency of assets.<sup>y</sup> And her necessary apparel is protected even against the claim of creditors.<sup>z</sup> <sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> "Community property."—The common law of England with respect to the property rights of married persons was peculiar to that country. That the early lawyers recognized the fact that the English law was in some respect svi generis is illustrated by the existence of such a phrase as "tenancy by the curtesy of England." Manifestly those who used this expression were contrasting this right of the husband with his right under some other system, possibly that of Normandy. 2 Poll. & Maitl. Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 414. The convenient formula that husband and wife are one does not accurately represent the wife's position at common law. For example, the wife, even in the early times, was required to be personally summoned as a party in actions affecting her land. Y. B. 4 Edw. II, p. 122 (1311). Moreover, she had certain capacities at common law,—for example, the capacity to act as agent, even for her husband,—which are inconsistent with the theory of "unity of person." If her of vesting the right and property of chattel interests in the prevailing party. And here we must be careful to distinguish between property, the right of which is before vested in the party, and of which only possession is recovered by suit or action; and property, to which a man before had no determinate title or certain claim, but he gains as well the right as the possession by the process and judgment of the law. Of the former sort are all debts and choses in action; as if a man gives bond for 20*l.* or agrees to buy a horse at a stated sum, or takes up goods of a tradesman upon an implied contract to pay as much as they are reasonably worth: in all these cases the right accrues to the creditor, and is completely vested in him, at the time of the bond being sealed, or the contract position had to be characterized in a single phrase, it would be more proper to substitute for the "unity of person," the statement that the wife was, with relation to her husband, under "an exaggerated guardianship."

The common-law system of property between the spouses, whatever its origin, is fundamentally different from the theory of community of goods, which prevails in most European countries, and in several of the states of our Union. However much particular systems of community may differ in details (as to which see Garrozi v. Dastas (1907). 204 U. S. 64, 51 L. Ed. 369, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224), the fundamental idea underlies all of them that husband and wife, with respect to property rights, are regarded as partners. Though in Scotland, for example, the wife's interest is most shadowy, while in France it is a clear, definite interest, both France and Scotland possess the theory that the spouses form a sort of partnership. De Nicols v. Curlier, [1900] App. Cas. 21.

For the American student, the Spanish form of the community has the chief interest, for that system has most influenced American law. It is at the basis of the system of property rights between the spouses which exists in Louisiana, Texas, California, Washington, New Mexico, Idaho, Arizona and Nevada. It is true that ideas derived from the common law have much modified the original theory in these jurisdictions, but the fundamental idea of the community remains.

The law of California will serve as an illustration of the relation of the spouses with reference to property under the community system. All property owned by either of the spouses before marriage and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise, bequest or descent, together with the rents, issues and profits of such property, remains the separate property of the spouses. All other property, acquired during the marriage, is community property. Civil Code, California, §§ 162-164. The rule which treats the profits of separate property as separate property is a departure from the Spanish system under which such rents and profits were a part of the community,—a rule which remains the law in most of the states where the community system exists. Arizona, Nevada or agreement made; and the law only gives him a remedy to <sup>[437]</sup> recover the possession of that right, which already in justice belongs to him. But there is also a species of property to which a man has not any claim or title whatsoever, till after suit commenced and judgment obtained in a court of law: where the right and the remedy do not follow each other, as in common cases, but accrue at one and the same time; and where, before judgment had, no man can say that he has any absolute property, either in possession or in action. Of this nature are,

§ 581. 1. Penalties.—Such penalties as are given by particular statutes, to be recovered on an action popular; or, in other words, to be recovered by him or them that will sue for the same. Such and Washington alone follow the California modification. McKay, Community Property, § 76. The community property is managed and controlled by the husband, subject to the limitation that he cannot give any part of it away without the wife's written consent. Civil Code, § 172. The husband, however, has power to dispose of only one-half of the community property by will; the other half goes to the wife. Upon the death of the wife, the entire community property goes to the husband. Civil Code, § 1401. This rule of succession was not always the law of California,—formerly, the wife's half went to her descendants upon her death, subject to the husband's right of management and control during his lifetime. The older rule in California was nearer the Spanish system than the present one. Loewy, The Spanish Community of Acquests, 1 Cal. Law Rev., 44.

In the Spanish law and in most of the jurisdictions which have followed that law, the right of the wife during the existence of the marriage has been said to be in the nature of an "expectancy, like the interest which an heir may possess in the property of his ancestor." Van Maren v. Johnson (1860), 15 Cal. 308. The husband so long as he lives is the "real and veritable owner of said property." Reade v. De Lea (1908), 14 N. M. 442, 95 Pac. 131. Cf., however, same case, sub nomine Arnett v. Reade (1911), 220 U. S. 311, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1040, 55 L. Ed. 477, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 425. In both Texas and Washington, particularly in the latter state, the wife's interest is much more extensive, amounting to a vested proprietary interest. McKay, Community Property, § 291.

Those who desire to investigate the origin and history of the community system may examine with profit, Brissaud, History of French Private Law, §§ 552-572; 2 Poll. & Maitl., Hist. Eng. Law, 399-436; Garrozi v. Dastas (1907), 204 U. S. 64, 51 L. Ed. 369, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224; Reade v. De Lea (1908), 14 N. M. 442, 95 Pac. 131, and Arnett v. Reade (1911), 220 U. S. 311, 36 L. as the penalty of 500*l.* which those persons are by several acts of parliament made liable to forfeit, that, being in particular offices or situations in life, neglect to take the oaths to the government: which penalty is given to him or them that will sue for the same. Now, here it is clear that no particular person, A or B, has any right, claim, or demand, in or upon this penal sum, till after action brought; <sup>a</sup> for he that brings his action, and can bona fide obtain judgment first, will undoubtedly secure a title to it, in exclusion of everybody else. He obtains an inchoate imperfect degree of property, by commencing his suit: but it is not consummated till judgment; for, if any collusion appears, he loses the priority he had gained.<sup>b</sup> But, otherwise, the right so attaches in the first informer, that the king (who before action brought shall grant a pardon which shall be a bar to all the world) cannot after suit commenced remit anything but his own part of the penalty.<sup>c</sup> For by commencing the suit the informer has made the popular action his own private action, and it is not in the power of the crown, or of anything but parliament to release the informer's interest. This, therefore, is one instance, where a suit and judgment at law are [438] not only the means of recovering, but also of acquiring, property. And what is said of this one penalty is equally true of all others, that are given thus at large to a common informer, or to any person that will sue for the same. They are placed, as it were, in a state of nature, accessible by all the king's subjects, but the acquired right of none of them: open, therefore, to the first occupant, who declares his intention to possess them by bringing his action; and who carries that intention into execution, by obtaining judgment to recover them.

§ 582. 2. Damages.—Another species of property that is acquired and lost by suit and judgment at law, is that of damages given to a man by a jury, as a compensation and satisfaction for some injury sustained; as for a battery, for imprisonment, for slander, or for trespass. Here the plaintiff has no certain demand till after verdict; but, when the jury has assessed his damages, and judgment is given thereupon, whether they amount to twenty pounds or twenty shillings, he instantly acquires, and the defendant loses at the same time, a right to that specific sum. It is true, that this is not an acquisition so perfectly original as in the former instance: for here the injured party has unquestionably a vague and indeterminate right to some damages or other, the instant he receives the injury; and the verdict of the jurors, and judgment of the court thereupon, do not in this case so properly vest a new title in him, as fix and ascertain the old one; they do not give, but define, the right. But, however, though strictly speaking the primary right to a satisfaction for injuries is given by the law of nature, and the suit is only the means of ascertaining and recovering that satisfaction; yet, as the legal proceedings are the only visible means of this acquisition of property, we may fairly enough rank such damages, or satisfaction assessed, under the head of property acquired by suit and judgment at law.

§ 583. 3. Costs.—[439] 3. Hither also may be referred, upon the same principle, all title to costs and expenses of suit; which are often arbitrary, and rest entirely on the determination of the court, upon weighing all circumstances, both as to the quantum (amount), and also (in the courts of equity especially, and upon motions in the courts of law) whether there shall be any costs at all. These costs, therefore, when given by the court to either party, may be looked upon as an acquisition made by the judgment of law.

CHAPTER THE THIRTIETH. [440]

OF TITLE BY GIFT, GRANT AND CONTRACT.

We are now to proceed, according to the order marked out, to the discussion of two of the remaining methods of acquiring a title to property in things personal, which are much connected together, and answer in some measure to the conveyances of real estates; being those by gift or grant, and by contract: whereof the former vests a property in possession, the latter a property in action.

§ 584. VIII. Title by gift or grant.—1. Chattels real.—Gifts, then, or grants, which are the eighth method of transferring personal property, are thus to be distinguished from each other, that gifts are always gratuitous, grants are upon some consideration or equivalent: and they may be divided; with regard to their subject matter, into gifts or grants of chattels real, and gifts or grants of chattels personal. Under the head of gifts or grants of chattels real, may be included all leases for years of land, assignments, and surrenders of those leases; and all the other methods of conveying an estate less than freehold; which were considered in the twentieth chapter of the present book, and therefore need not be here again repeated: though these very seldom carry the outward appearance of a gift, however freely bestowed; being usually expressed to be made in consideration of blood, or natural affection, or of five or ten shillings nominally paid to the grantor; and in case of leases, always reserving a rent, though it be but a peppercorn: any of which considerations will, in the eye of the law, convert the gift, if executed, into a grant; if not executed, into a contract.

§ 585. 2. Chattels personal.—[<sup>441</sup>] Grants or gifts, of chattels personal, are the act of transferring the right and the possession of them; whereby one man renounces, and another man immediately acquires, all title and interest therein: which may be done either in writing, or by word of mouth<sup>a</sup> attested by sufficient evidence, of which the delivery of possession is the strongest and most essential.<sup>1</sup> But this conveyance, when merely voluntary, is somewhat suspicious; and is usually construed to be fraudulent, if creditors or others become sufferers thereby. And, particularly, by statute 3 Hen. VII, c. 4 (Fraudulent Deeds of Gift, 1487), all deeds of gift of goods, made in trust to the use of the donor, shall be void; because otherwise persons might be tempted to commit treason or felony, without danger of forfeiture; and the creditors of the donor might also be defrauded of their rights. And by statute 13 Eliz., c. 5 (Fraudulent Conveyance, 1571), every grant or gift of chattels, as well as lands, with intent to defraud creditors or others,<sup>b</sup> shall be void as against such persons to whom such fraud would be prejudicial; but, as against the grantor himself, shall stand good and effectual: and all persons partakers in, or privy to, such fraudulent grants, shall forfeit the whole value of the goods, one moiety to the king, and another moiety to the party grieved: and also on conviction shall suffer imprisonment for half a year.

§ 586. 3. Delivery of possession.—A true and proper gift or grant is always accompanied with delivery of possession, and takes effect immediately: as if A gives to B 100*l.* or a flock of sheep, and puts him in possession of them directly, it is then a gift executed in the donee; and it is not in the donor's power to retract it, though he did it without any consideration or recompense:<sup>c</sup> unless it be prejudicial to creditors; or the donor were under any legal incapacity, as infancy, coverture, duress, or the like; or if he were drawn in, circumvented, or imposed upon, by false pretenses, ebriety, or surprise. But if the gift does not take effect, by delivery of immediate possession, it is then not properly a gift, but a contract: and this a man [442] cannot be compelled to perform, but upon good and sufficient consideration; as we shall see under our next division.

<sup>1</sup> Gifts.—A gift is a voluntary transfer of property by one to another without any consideration or compensation therefor. Ingram v. Colgan, 106 Cal. 113, 46 Am. St. Rep. 221, 28 L. R. A. 187, 38 Pac. 315, 39 Pac. 437. A gift must be perfected by delivery and acceptance. It is immaterial whether delivery precedes or follows or is contemporaneous with the acceptance. Harris v. Harris' Estate, 82 Vt. 199, 72 Atl. 912. Acceptance is required both under the common and civil law. De Levillain v. Evans, 39 Cal. 120. Delivery must be according to the nature of the thing. If the thing be not capable of actual delivery, there must be some act equivalent to it, something sufficient to work an immediate change of dominion. Gartside v. Pahlman, 45 Mo. App. 160. The transfer of a claim or chose in action by a written instrument under seal, duly executed, has the effect to divest the title of the donor, and has the same

§ 587. IX. Title by contract.—A contract, which usually conveys an interest merely in action, is thus defined: “an agreement, upon sufficient consideration, to do or not to do a particular thing.”<sup>2</sup> From which definition there arise three points to be contemplated effect as actual delivery. Matson v. Abbey, 70 Hun, 475, 24 N. Y. Supp. 284. And a delivery of a chose in action not negotiable and negotiable paper not indorsed which rests in the donee the equitable title is sufficient without a complete transfer of the legal title. First Nat. Bank v. Holland, 99 Va. 495, 86 Am. St. Rep. 898, 55 L. R. A. 155, 39 S. E. 126.

2 Definition of contract.—The definition by Sir W. R. Anson (Contracts, Huffcutt's ed., 10) is: “An agreement enforceable at law, between two or more persons, by which rights are acquired by one or more to acts or forbearances on the part of the other or others.” Sir Frederick Pollock (Contracts, 1) says: “The most popular description of a contract that can be given is also the most exact one, namely, that it is a promise or set of promises which the law will enforce.” Mr. Justice Washington (Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 518, 656, 4 L. Ed. 629, 664), says of contract: “It may be defined to be a transaction between two or more persons, in which each party comes under an obligation to the other, and each reciprocally acquires a right to whatever is promised by the other.” In the Indian Contract Act, which was enacted in 1872 as a serious attempt to codify the English law on the subject, the following analytical definition of a contract is given (Pollock's Indian Contract Act, 10):

“(a) When one person signifies to another his willingness to do or to abstain from doing anything, with a view to obtaining the assent of that other to such act or abstinence, he is said to make a proposal;

“(b) When the person to whom the proposal is made signifies his assent thereto the proposal is said to be accepted. A proposal, when accepted, becomes a promise;

“(c) The person making the proposal is called the ‘promisor,’ and the person accepting the proposal is called the ‘promisee’;

“(d) When, at the desire of the promisor, the promisee or any other person has done or abstained from doing, or does or abstains from doing, or promises to do or to abstain from doing, something, such act or abstinence or promise is called a consideration for the promise;

in all contracts; 1. The agreement: 2. The consideration: and 3. The thing to be done or omitted, or the different species of contracts.

§ 588. 1. Agreement.—First, then it is an agreement, a mutual bargain or convention; and therefore there must at least be two contracting parties, of sufficient ability to make a contract: as where A contracts with B to pay him 100*l.* and thereby transfers a property in such sum to B. Which property is, however, not in possession, but in action merely, and recoverable by suit at law; wherefore it could not be transferred to another person by the strict rules of the ancient common law: for no chose in action could be assigned or granted over,<sup>4</sup> because it was thought to be a great encouragement to litigiousness if a man were allowed to make over to a stranger his right of going to law.<sup>3</sup> But this nicety is now disregarded: though, in compliance with the ancient principle, the form of assigning a chose in action is in the nature of a declaration of trust, and an agreement to permit the assignee to make use of

“(e) Every promise and every set of promises, forming the consideration for each other, is an agreement;

“(f) Promises which form the consideration or part of the consideration for each other are called reciprocal promises;

“(g) An agreement not enforceable by law is said to be void;

“(h) An agreement enforceable by law is a contract;

“(i) An agreement which is enforceable by law at the option of one or more of the parties thereto, but not at the option of the other or others, is a voidable contract;

“(j) A contract which ceases to be enforceable by law becomes void when it ceases to be enforceable.”

<sup>3</sup> Assignability of choses in action.—“In 1 Lilly's Abr. 125, it is said: ‘A statute merchant or staple, or bond, etc., cannot be assigned over to another so as to vest an interest whereby the assignee may sue in his own name, but they are every day transferred by letter of attorney, etc. Mich. 22 Car. B. R.’ See, also, Deering v. Carrington, 1 Lilly, Abr. 124; Shep. Touchst., 6th ed., 240; 2 Blackst. Comm., 442; Leake, Cont., 2d ed., 1183; Gerard v. Lewis, L. R. 2 C. P. 308, 309, per Willes, J. These letters of attorney for the attorney's own use, whether borrowed from the similar procuratio in rem suam of the Roman law or not, are of great antiquity. Riley, Memorials of London (1309), 68. ‘Know ye that I do assign and attorn in my stead E., my dear partner, to demand and receive the same rent of forty shillings with the arrears and by distress the same to levy in my name . . . and all things to do as to the same matter FOR HER OWN PROFIT as well as ever I myself could have done in the name of the assignor, in order to recover the possession. And therefore, when in common acceptance a debt or bond is said to be assigned over, it must still be sued in the original creditor's name; the person, to whom it is transferred, being rather an attorney than an assignee. But the king is an exception to this general rule; for he might always either grant or receive a chose in action by assignment: * and our courts of equity, considering that in a commercial country almost all personal property must necessarily lie in contract, will protect the assignment of a chose in action, as much as the law will that of a chose in possession. †

my own proper person.' See, also, West, Symbol., § 521."—AMES, Lect. in Leg. Hist., 213 n, also in 3 Sel. Essays in Anglo-Am. Leg. Hist., 584 n.

This note occurs in Professor Ames' learned essay on "The Inalienability of Choses in Action," the opening paragraphs of which are as follows: "The rule that a chose in action is not assignable was a rule of the widest application. A creditor could not assign his debt. A reversioner could not convey his reversion, nor a remainderman his remainder. A bailor was unable to transfer his interest in a chattel. And, as we have seen, the disseisee of land or chattels could not invest another with his right to recover the res or its value. In a word, no right of action, whether a right in rem or a right in personam, whether arising ex contractu or ex delicto, was assignable either by act of the party or by operation of law.

"A right of action for the recovery of land or chattels, or of a debt which, like land or chattels, was regarded as a specific res, did, indeed, descend to one's representative in the case of death. But this was hardly a departure from the rule, since the representative was looked upon as a continuation of the persona of the deceased.

"There were, however, a few exceptions to the rule. The king, as might be supposed, could grant or receive the benefit of a chose in action. So, too, a reversion or a remainder was transferable by fine in the king's court, or by a customary devise, which, when recorded in the local court, operated like a fine. Again, certain obligations, by the tenor of which the obligor expressly bound himself to the obligee and his assigns, could be enforced by a transferee. If, for instance, one granted an annuity to A. and his assigns, or covenanted to enfeoff A. and his assigns, or made a charter of warranty to A. and his assigns, the assignee was allowed to bring an action in his own name against the grantor, covenantor, and warrantor, respectively.

"The significance of this exception lies in the fact that it goes far to explain the reason of the rule which prohibits the assignment of rights of action in general. The traditional opinion that this rule had its origin in the aversion

§ 589. a. Express and implied contracts.—<sup>[443]</sup> This contract or agreement may be either express or implied. Express contracts are where the terms of the agreement are openly uttered and avowed at the time of the making, as to deliver an ox, or ten loads, of timber, or to pay a stated price for certain goods. Implied are such as reason and justice dictate, and which therefore the law presumes that every man undertakes to perform.<sup>4</sup> As, if I employ a of the 'sages and founders of our law' to the 'multiplying of contentions and suits' shows the power of a great name for the perpetuation of error. The inadequacy of this explanation by Lord Coke was first pointed out by Mr. Spence. The rule is not only older than the doctrine of maintenance in English law, but is believed to be a principle of universal law." See, also, Ames, Lect. on Legal Hist., 258, and the chapter in 3 Street, Foundations of Legal Liability, on "Assignment of Right of Action," 76.

"It may be said that the general tendency has constantly been toward the extension of the right to assign. The ancient argument based on the idea of preventing litigation by discouraging assignments has ceased to appeal to the courts, and consequently that idea is looked upon as a mere legal curiosity and relic of the past.

"As regards particular results, it is pretty generally held in America that the only causes or rights of action which are not transferable or assignable in any sense are those which are founded upon wrongs of a purely personal nature, such as slander (Renfro v. Prior, 25 Mo. App. 402; Miller v. Newell, 20 S. C. 123, 47 Am. Rep. 833; Dillard v. Collins, 25 Gratt. (Va.) 343), assault and battery (McGlinchy v. Hall, 58 Me. 152; Averill v. Longfellow, 66 Me. 237), negligent personal injuries (Central R. etc. Co. v. Brunswick etc. R. Co., 87 Ga. 386, 13 S. E. 520; Stone v. Boston etc. R. Co., 7 Gray (Mass.), 539), criminal conversation, seduction (Howard v. Crowther, 8 Mees. & W. 601, 1 D. & L. 383, 7 Jur. 953; People v. Tioga Common Pleas, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 73), breach of marriage promise, malicious prosecution (Brewer v. Dew, 11 Mees. & W. 625; Lawrence v. Martin, 22 Cal. 173; Hunt v. Conrad, 47 Minn. 557, 14 L. R. A. 512, 50 N. W. 614; Noonan v. Orton, 34 Wis. 259, 17 Am. Rep. 441), and others of like nature. All other demands, claims and rights of action whatever are generally held to be transferable (McKee v. Judd, 12 N. Y. 622, 625, 64 Am. Dec. 515; Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y. 320; North v. Turner, 9 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 244, 248, 249)."—STREET, 3 Foundations of Legal Liability, 86.

<sup>4</sup> Quasi contracts.—Obligaciones quasi ex contractu. Both in Roman and in English law there are certain obligations which are not in truth contractual, but which the law treats as if they were. They are contractual in law, but not in fact, being the subject matter of a fictitious extension of the sphere of contract to cover obligations which do not in reality fall within it. The Romans called them obligaciones quasi ex contractu. English lawyers call them quasi contracts, or implied contracts, or often enough contracts simply and without qualification. We are told, for example, that a judgment is a contract, and person to do any business for me, or perform any work; the law implies that I undertook, or contracted to pay him as much as his labor deserves. If I take up wares from a tradesman, without any agreement of price, the law concludes that I contracted to pay their real value. And there is also one species of implied contracts, which runs through and is annexed to all other contracts, conditions and covenants, viz., that if I fail in my part of the agreement, I shall pay the other party such damages as he has sustained by such my neglect or refusal. In short, almost all the rights of that a judgment debt is a contractual obligation. "Implied (contracts)," says Blackstone, "are such as reason and justice dictate, and which, therefore, the law presumes that every man undertakes to perform." "Thus it is that every person is bound, and hath virtually agreed, to pay such particular sums of money as are charged on him by the sentence, or assessed by the interpretation, of the law." (3 Bl. 159.) So the same author speaks, somewhat too widely indeed, of the "general implication and intendment of the courts of judicature that every man hath engaged to perform what his duty or justice requires." (Ibid. 3, 162.)

From a quasi contract, or contract implied in law, we must carefully distinguish a contract implied in fact. The latter is a true contract, though its existence is only inferred from the conduct of the parties, instead of being expressed. Thus when I enter an omnibus, I impliedly, yet actually agree to pay the usual fare. A contract implied in law, on the contrary, is merely fictitious, for the parties to it have not agreed at all, either expressly or tacitly.

In what cases, then, does the law recognize this fiction of quasi contract? What classes of obligations are regarded as contractual in law, though they are not so in fact? To this question it is not possible to give any complete answer here. We can, however, single out two classes of cases, which include most, though not all, of the quasi-contractual obligations known to English law.

In the first place, we may say, in general, that in the theory of the common law all debts are deemed to be contractual in origin. A debt is an obligation to pay a liquidated sum of money, as opposed to an obligation to pay an unliquidated amount, and as opposed also to all nonpecuniary obligations. Most debts are obligationes ex contractu in truth and in fact, but there are many which have a different source. A judgment creates a debt which is noncontractual; so also does the receipt of money paid by mistake or obtained by fraud. Nevertheless in the eye of the common law they all fall within the sphere of contract; for the law conclusively presumes that every person who owes a debt has promised to pay it. "Whatever, therefore," says Blackstone (3, 160), "the laws order anyone to pay, that becomes instantly a debt which he hath beforehand contracted to discharge." * * *

The second class of quasi contracts includes all those cases in which a person injured by a tort is allowed by the law to waive the tort and sue in contract

personal property (when not in actual possession) do in great measure depend upon contracts of one kind or other, or at least might be reduced under some of them: which indeed is the method taken by the civil law; it having referred the greatest part of the duties and rights, which it treats of, to the head of obligations ex contractu (arising from a contract) and quasi ex contractu (from something in the nature of a contract).<sup>5</sup>

§ 590. b. Executed and executory contracts.—A contract may also be either executed, as if A agrees to change horses with B, and they do it immediately; in which case the possession and the right are transferred together: or it may be executory, as if they agree to change next week; here the right only vests, and their reciprocal property in each other's horse is not in possession but in action; for a contract executed (which differs nothing from a grant) conveys a chose in possession; a contract executory conveys only a chose in action.

§ 591. 2. Consideration.—Having thus shown the general nature of a contract, we are, secondly, to proceed to the consideration upon which it is founded; or the reason which moves the contracting party to [444] enter into the contract.<sup>5</sup> “It is an agreement,

instead. That is to say, there are certain obligations which are in truth delictual, and not contractual, but which may at the option of the plaintiff be treated as contractual, if he so pleases. Thus if one wrongfully takes away my goods and sells them, he is guilty of the tort known as trespass, and his obligation to pay damages for the loss suffered by me is in reality delictual. Nevertheless I may, if I think it to my interest, waive the tort, and sue him on a fictitious contract, demanding from him the payment of the money so received by him as having rightly sold the goods as my agent, and therefore as being indebted to me in respect of the price received by him; and he will not be permitted to plead his own wrongdoing in bar of any such claim. So if a man obtains money from me by fraudulent misrepresentation, I may sue him either in tort for damages for the deceit, or on a fictitious contract for the return of the money.—SALMOND, Jurisprudence, 560.

<sup>5</sup> Consideration.—Consideration, according to the traditional definition, is either a detriment incurred by the promisee or a benefit received by the promisor in exchange for the promise. Professor Langdell has pointed out the irrelevancy of the notion of benefit to the promisor, and makes detriment to the upon sufficient consideration." The civilians hold, that in all contracts, either express or implied, there must be something given in exchange, something that is mutual or reciprocal.<sup>b</sup> This thing, which is the price or motive of the contract, we call the consideration: and it must be a thing lawful in itself, or else the contract is void. A good consideration, we have before seen,<sup>1</sup> is that of blood or natural affection between near relations; the satisfaction accruing from which the law esteems an equivalent for whatever benefit may move from one relation to another.<sup>1</sup> This consideration may sometimes, however, be set aside, and the contract become void, when it tends in its consequences to defraud creditors or other third persons of their just rights. But a contract for any valuable consideration, as for marriage, for money, for work done, or for other reciprocal contract, can never be impeached at law; and, if it be of sufficient adequate value, is never set aside in equity: for the person contracted with has been given an equivalent in recompense, and is therefore as much an owner, or a creditor, as any other person.

promisee the universal test of consideration. The simplified definition has met with much favor. It is concise, and it preserves the historic connection between the modern simple contract and the ancient assumpsit in its primitive form of an action for damage to a promisee by a deceitful promisor. In one respect only does the definition leave anything to desire. What is to be understood by detriment?

The incurring of a detriment by the promisee involves of necessity a change of position on his part; there must be some act or some forbearance by him. But will every act or every forbearance be a detriment, or must the word be restricted to certain acts and forbearances? It is certainly a common opinion that the word is to be interpreted in the restricted sense and cannot properly include an act or forbearance already due from the promisee by reason of some pre-existing legal obligation. The inability of the writer to reconcile this opinion with the decided cases has led him to give to detriment its widest interpretation and to define consideration as any act or forbearance or promise, by one person given in exchange for the promise of another.—AMES, Lect. on Leg. Hist., 323, in the opening paragraphs of his valuable essay on "Two Theories of Consideration."

§ 592. a. Consideration in the civil law.—These valuable considerations are divided by the civilians<sup>k</sup> into four species.<sup>6</sup> 1. Do ut des (I give that you may give): as when I give money or goods, on a contract that I shall be repaid money or goods for them again. Of this kind are all loans of money upon bond, or promise of repayment; and all sales of goods, in which there is either an express contract to pay so much for them,

<sup>6</sup> Roman law of contracts.—Blackstone seems to imply that the Romans generalized the principle of consideration, and refused to enforce an agreement which was not founded on a valuable consideration. This is not, true, nor is his explanation of the Roman jurist Paul's famous classification of unnamed contracts (Do tibi ut des; do ut facias; facio ut des; facio ut facias) correct. In explaining these misconceptions of Blackstone, I shall take occasion to make a brief statement of the Roman law of contracts.

The pervading principle of Roman law was that not every promise which was intended to create an obligation was legally valid and actionable. In addition to the promise there had to be some definite legal ground (causa civilis) for the promise. The term "contract" was reserved to such agreements as resulted in an obligation actionable at law. Now, there were four ways in which a promise intended to create an obligation might become actionable or enforceable, leading to the well-known fourfold classification of Roman law. The statement in the Institutes of both Gaius (2d century, A. D.) and Justinian (6th century, A. D.) is in these words: "Et prius videamus de his [obligationibus] quæ ex contractu nascuntur. Harum quattuor genera sunt: aut enim re contrahitur obligatio, aut verbis, aut literis, aut consensu." (And first let us look at those [obligations] that arise from contract. Of these there are four kinds: for contract is concluded (1) by performance, or acts (re), (2) by (originally particular) words (verbis), (3) by (special) writing, or (4) by (mere) consent (consensu). The meaning of this is that: (1) in contracts re, the promise becomes actionable because there has been a delivery of property (res) by one party, by which he is entitled to claim a redelivery or counter-performance, as the case may be, from the other party; (2) in the contract verbis, the promise becomes actionable because the agreement has been orally expressed in a very particular way, in a particular form of question and answer; (3) in the contract literis, the promise becomes actionable, because the agreement has been expressed in the form of an entry in the domestic account-book; and (4) in contracts consensu, nothing is needed to make the agreement actionable except the consent itself of the parties.

These four classes of contracts constitute the contractual system of the Roman law. They have received the English names (misleading unless the above explanation be held in mind) of (1) Real, (2) Verbal, (3) Literal, and (4) Conor else the law implies a contract to pay so much as they are worth. 2. The second species is, facio ut facias (I do that you may do): as when I agree with a man to do his work for him, if he will do mine for me; or if two persons agree to marry together: or to do any other positive acts on both sides. Or, it may be to forbear on one side on consideration of something done on the other; as, that in consideration A, the tenant, will repair his house, B, the landlord, will not sue him for waste. Or, it may sensual. These classes with the recognized contracts falling thereunder may be exhibited in a table as follows:

- I. Real Contracts (re—acts, or performance).
  1. Mutuum, or Loan (for consumption).
  2. Commodatum, or Loan for use.
  3. Depositum, or Deposit.
  4. Pignus, or Pledge.
- II. The Verbal Contract (verbis—spoken words).
  1. Stipulatio, or Stipulation.
- III. The Literal Contract (litteris).
  1. Expensilatio or nomina trans-scripticia, Entry in the creditor's account-book.
- IV. Consensual Contracts (consensu—by consent alone).
  1. Emptio Venditio, or Sale.
  2. Locatio Conductio, or Hire.
  3. Societas, or Partnership.
  4. Mandatum, or Agency.

Of these contracts, mutuum, commodatum, depositum, and mandatum were gratuitous contracts. It was only with the progress of time that any pecuniary element, such as payment of interest, was allowed to enter in. Three of the consensual contracts, emptio venditio, locatio conductio, and societas, were founded upon a valuable consideration. The stipulatio was an ancient form of making any sort of promise binding. For this purpose, the agreement had to be expressed in due legal form by a question (spondesne mihi centum dare?—do you promise to give me one hundred?) on the part of the creditor and a corresponding answer (spondeo—I promise) on the part of the debtor. Given these conditions, the contract is valid and actionable on the ground of the form in which the words are put. It was immaterial whether the debtor received any consideration for his promise or not. All that the creditor had to prove was that the stipulation had in fact been made. That is to say, the obligation rested on the verba or words. Stipulation was used (1) for originating an obligation, putting it into this solemn form, or converting an informal unenforceable promise into a formal, obligatory one; and (2) for transforming, be for mutual forbearance on both sides; [445] as, that in consideration that A will not trade to Lisbon, B will not trade to Marseilles: so as to avoid interfering with each other. 3. The third species of consideration is facio ut des (I do that you may give): when a man agrees to perform anything for a price, either specifically mentioned, or left to the determination of the law to set a value to it. And when a servant hires himself to his master for or "novating," an obligation. The latter use was employed in a variety of cases, as for changing the nature of the obligation, or for changing the parties.

The literal contract was based on the business habits of the Romans in keeping domestic account-books. From this arose the practice of utilizing this business habit to create obligations. B. writes in his account-book (codex) that a certain sum has been paid him by A. As a matter of fact no money has been paid, but the purpose and effect are to create legal rights and liabilities, a legal relationship. A. usually made a corresponding entry in his account-book; but that was unnecessary. The creditor's entry (expensilatio) was all that was necessary. The debtor was then bound literis, that is, by the writing as such in the codex.

The important real contracts were mutuum, commodatum, and depositum. Mutuum was the gratuitous loan of things to be consumed (res fungibiles), such as corn, wine, oil, and money, also. The duty of the borrower was to return, not the same things, but things like in kind. Commodatum was the gratuitous loan of something to be used according to its purpose and returned, a horse or a book, for instance. Depositum was a contract in which A. delivered to B. something for the purpose of gratuitous safekeeping. The ground of liability in these real contracts was that there had been an act, or performance (res), on one side, and justice demanded that the debtor should perform on his side. There was an agreement (consensus), but plus the consensus there was a res, or performance on one side. These were real contracts, nominate, or named, real contracts. On these the Romans generalized in the formula of Paul: do ut des, do ut facias, facio ut des, facio ut facias. And these latter have received with us the designation of innominate, or unnamed, real contracts. They rest upon the equitable principle that one person having delivered something or performed some act, the law will on that ground enforce a counter-delivery or a counter-performance.

The consensual contracts (except mandatum) were in fact, though not in a generalized statement, founded on a valuable consideration. It was part of the definition of sale that a price (pretium), and of hire that the rent or wages (pensio, reditus, merces), should be paid, and in partnership it was essential that there should be a valuable consideration moving from each of the partners. But the Romans said that these contracts, and also mandatum, were actionable upon consent without more, that is to say, the contract was valid the moment the parties were agreed in regard to the terms of the contract.

certain wages or an agreed sum of money: here the servant contracts to do his master's service, in order to earn that specific sum. Otherwise, if he be hired generally; for then he is under an implied contract to perform this service for what it shall be reasonably worth. 4. The fourth species, is, do ut facias (I give that you may do): which is the direct counterpart of the other. As when I agree with the servant to give him such wages upon his performing such work: which, we see, is nothing else but the last species inverted; for servus facit, ut herus det (the servant performs, that the heir may give), and herus dat, ut servus faciat (the heir gives, that the servant may perform).

§ 593. b. Nude pacts.—A consideration of some sort or other is so absolutely necessary to the forming of a contract, that a nudum pactum (nude pact) or agreement to do or pay anything on one side, without any compensation on the other, is totally void in law: and a man cannot be compelled to perform it.<sup>1</sup> As if one man promises to give another 100*l.*, here there is nothing contracted for or given on the one side, and therefore there is nothing binding on the other. And, however, a man may or may not be bound to perform it, in honor or conscience, which the municipal laws do not take upon them to decide; certainly those municipal laws will not compel the execution of what he had no visible inducement to engage for: and therefore our law has adopted<sup>m</sup> the maxim of the civil law,<sup>n</sup> that ex nudo pacto non oritur actio (no action arises from a nude pact).<sup>7</sup> But any degree of reciprocity will prevent the pact from being nude: nay, even if the thing be founded on a prior moral obligation (as a promise to pay a just debt, though barred by the statute of limitations), it is no longer nudum pactum. And as this rule was principally established, to avoid the inconvenience that would arise from setting up mere verbal promises, for which no good reason could [446] be assigned,<sup>o</sup> it therefore does not hold in some cases, where such promise is authentically proved by written documents. For if a man enters into a voluntary bond, or gives a promissory note, he shall not be allowed to aver the want of a consideration in order to evade the payment: for every bond from the solemnity of the instrument,<sup>p</sup> and every note from the subscription of the drawer,<sup>q</sup> carries with it an internal evidence of a good consideration. Courts of justice will therefore support them both, as against the contractor himself;<sup>r</sup> but not to, the prejudice of creditors, or strangers to the contract.

<sup>7</sup> Nude pacts.—Although it is true, as Blackstone says, that our law has borrowed this from the Roman, where it is found in various forms, e. g., ex nudo pacto inter cives Romanos actio non nascitur (Paulus, R. S. ii. 14, 1), and nuda pactio obligationem non parit (Dig. ii. 14, 7, § 4; see, also, Cod. Just. iv. 65, 27, and Consultatio veteris J. Ci. iv. 9.), yet it must not be inferred that in that law the phrase meant as in ours the absence of a consideration. The notion of a consideration as necessary or able to make a contract binding was foreign to that law: the statements to the contrary made in books of so much reputation as Story on Promissory Notes, section 183, are misleading. The nude pact of the civilians was any promise or agreement that did not constitute an actionable contract, that was not clothed with the established forms requisite

to make it binding. Besides, to a certain extent, such pacts were more effective in that system than mere promises without consideration are with us. They gave a natural obligation, though not a civil one, and could be used in defense of actions ope exceptionis, but not in support of them. . . . The only sense in which the maxim can properly be used of a mere promise in our law is that the lack of consideration prevents it from being a contract in any legal sense of the word, Roman or English. Unfortunately, the promise taken by itself is hardly more of a pact than it is of a contract * * * .—HAMMOND.

<sup>8</sup> Lord Mansfield became chief justice of the king's bench in 1756, a position which he retained till 1788. He was Scotch by extraction and, being better versed than his predecessors in the civil law, showed a decided bias for the legal conceptions of that system. His genuine learning and great ability together with his wonderful personality enabled him to effect, without opposition from the other judges, most radical changes. He left a very deep mark in our law of contract, but he came too late to revolutionize it or put it on a different basis. . . . In Pillans v. Van Mierop (1765), 3 Burr. 1663, 97 Eng. Reprint, 1035, his lordship and his associates held that a bill of exchange is good without a consideration. His idea was that this quality was derived from the law merchant. But he further suggested that any contract which by a rule of law is required to be put in writing and which conforms to that requirement is valid without regard to the presence of a consideration. Said he: "I take it that the ancient notion about the want of consideration was for the sake of evidence only, for when it is reduced into writing, as in covenants, specialties, bonds, etc., there was no objection to the want of consideration, and the statute

§ 594. 3. The several species of contract.—We are next to consider, thirdly, the thing agreed to be done or omitted. “A contract is an agreement, upon sufficient consideration, to do or not to do a particular thing.” The most usual contracts, whereby the right of chattels personal may be acquired in the laws of England, are, 1. That of sale or exchange. 2. That of bailment. 3. That of hiring and borrowing. 4. That of debt.

§ 595. a. Sale or exchange.—Sale or exchange is a transmutation of property from one man to another, in consideration of some price or recompense in value: for there is no sale without a recompense; there must be quid pro quo (something for something of frauds proceeded upon the same principle.” Wilmot, J., agreed with this suggestion and unearthed the old learning of the civil law concerning nudum pactum, which was of course more or less irrelevant to the subject of nudum pactum in the common law.

If this view had prevailed we should have in English law three classes of contracts: (1) specialties, (2) contracts supported by a consideration, and (3) contracts in writing. Sir Frederick Pollock thinks that if this notion had occurred a century or two earlier to a judge of anything like Mansfield’s ability, the English law of contract might have been shaped along the same lines as those of the law of Scotland. This is doubtful, however.

At any rate, Lord Mansfield’s suggestion came too late and was barren of results. (Mansfield’s opinion that contracts in writing, under the law-merchant, require no consideration, evidently made impression on Blackstone, whose Commentaries were published (1767) a short while after Pillans v. Van Mierop was decided. [The writer here quotes from Blackstone as above.]) It only served to challenge attention to the point in question, and a few years later a judgment was delivered (1778) in the house of lords in which Skynner, L. C. B., used the memorable words: “It is undoubtedly true that every man is by the law of nature bound to fulfill his engagements. It is equally true that the law of this country supplies no means nor affords any remedy to compel the performance of an agreement made without sufficient consideration; such agreement is nudum pactum ex quo non oritur actio; and whatsoever may be the sense of this maxim in the civil law, it is in the last-mentioned sense only that it is to be understood in our law.” (Rann v. Hughes, 7 Term. Rep. 346, note a.)

From whatever direction we approach this case of Rann v. Hughes, whether by retracing our steps from the present day or by traveling more tediously over the three preceding centuries, it must appear to mark an epoch in the history of the development of English contract law. The fact that it does mark an epoch is easily lost to the modern reader, because it is in such complete harmony with accepted views.—STREET, 2 Foundations of Legal Liability, 141.

thing).<sup>r</sup> If it be a commutation of goods for goods, it is more properly an exchange; but, if it be a transferring of goods for money, it is called a sale: which is a method of exchange introduced for the convenience of mankind, by establishing an universal medium, which may be exchanged for all sorts of other property; whereas if goods were only to be exchanged for goods, by way of barter, it would be difficult to adjust the respective values, and the carriage would be intolerably cumbersome. All civilized nations adopted, therefore, very early the use of money; for we

• English Sale of Goods Act of 1893.—The law relating to sale of personal property in Great Britain was codified by the Sale of Goods Act of 1893. The act deals only with the rules of law that are peculiar to the law of sale; if the whole law of contracts were codified, the act would form merely a chapter in that code. It does not deal, consequently, with questions common to the whole law of contract. For example, if any question arises on a contract of sale as to what constitutes a valid offer or acceptance of the offer, or whether there has been a sufficient consensus as to the subject matter or the personality of the parties, or whether the contract has been validly rescinded or performed by substitution, reference must be made to the general law of contract. "Goods" are defined in the act to include all chattels personal other than things in action and money; it includes emblements, industrial growing crops, and things attached to or forming part of the land which are agreed to be severed before sale or under the contract of sale. The definition of sale as given is: "A contract of sale of goods is a contract whereby the seller transfers or agrees to transfer the property in goods to the buyer for a money consideration, called the price."

American Uniform Sales Acts.—A Uniform Sales Law, drafted by Professor Samuel Williston, has been adopted in a number of the states. It follows, but with important variations, the English Sale of Goods Acts. The definition of sale is: "A sale of goods is an agreement whereby the seller transfers the property in goods to the buyer for a consideration called the price." The whole law of sale, both at common law and under the uniform act is treated in Williston, Sales. Both the American and English statutes are given in this book.

Barter or exchange differs from sale at common law, in that the consideration, instead of being paid in money, is paid in goods or merchandise susceptible of a valuation. Mitchell v. Gile, 12 N. H. 390; Stevenson v. State, 65 Ind. 409. Under the American uniform statute, this difference is done away with by the provision that in sale the price may be payable in any personal property.

find Abraham giving "four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant," for the field of Machpelah:<sup>a</sup> though the practice of exchanges still subsists among several of the savage nations. But, with regard to law of [447] sales and exchanges, there is no difference. I shall therefore treat of them both under the denomination of sales only; and shall consider their force and effect, in the first place where the vendor hath in himself, and secondly where he hath not, the property of the thing sold.

§ 596. (1) Sale after execution.—Where the vendor hath in himself the property of the goods sold, he hath the liberty of disposing of them to whomever he pleases, at any time, and in any manner: unless judgment has been obtained against him for a debt or damages, and the writ of execution is actually delivered to the sheriff. For then, by the statute of frauds,<sup>u</sup> the sale shall be looked upon as fraudulent, and the property of the goods shall be bound to answer the debt, from the time of delivering the writ. Formerly it was bound from the teste, or issuing, of the writ,<sup>t</sup> and any subsequent sale was fraudulent; but the law was thus altered in favor of purchasers, though it still remains the same between the parties: and therefore if a defendant dies after the awarding and before the delivery of the writ, his goods are bound by it in the hands of his executors.<sup>u</sup>

§ 597. (2) Contract of sale when complete.—If a man agrees with another for goods at a certain price, he may not carry them away before he hath paid for them; for it is no sale without payment, unless the contrary be expressly agreed. And therefore, if the vendor says, the price of a beast is four pounds, and the vendee says he will give four pounds, the bargain is struck; and they neither of them are at liberty to be off, provided immediate possession be tendered by the other side. But if neither the money be paid, nor the goods delivered, nor tender made, nor any subsequent agreement be entered into, it is no contract, and the owner may dispose of the goods as he pleases.<sup>v</sup> But if any part of the price is paid down, if it be but a penny, or any portion of the goods delivered by way of earnest, which the civil law calls arrha, and interprets to be "emptiois-venditionis [<sup>448</sup>] contractæ argumentum (a token of a contract for purchase and sale)," <sup>v</sup> the property of the goods is absolutely bound by it: and the vendee may recover the goods by action, as well as the vendor may the price of them.<sup>x</sup>

§ 598. (3) Statute of Frauds, 1677.—And such regard does the law pay to earnest as an evidence of a contract, that, by the same statute 29 Car. II, c. 3, no contract for the sale of goods, to the value of 10*l.* or more, shall be valid, unless the buyer actually receives part of the goods sold, by way of earnest on his part; or unless he gives part of the price to the vendor by way of earnest to bind the bargain, or in part of payment; or unless some note in writing be made and signed by the party, or his agent, who is to be charged with the contract. And, with regard to goods under the value of 10*l.* no contract or agreement for the sale of them shall be valid, unless the goods are to be delivered within one year, or unless the contract be made in writing, and signed by the party who is to be charged therewith. Anciently, among all the northern nations, shaking of hands was held necessary to bind the bargain; a custom which we still retain in many verbal contracts.<sup>10</sup> A sale thus made was called hand-sale, "venditio per mutuum manuum complexionem (a sale by the mutual joining of hands);" till in process of time the same word was used to signify the price or earnest, which was given immediately after the shaking of hands, or instead thereof.

<sup>10</sup> Shaking hands over a bargain.—We find among the Franks and Lombards undertakings guaranteed by "making one's faith"—Fides Facta. This was symbolized or solemnized by such formal acts as the giving of a rod, the handshake, or the placing of one's hands in those of another. The obligation, for instance, between creditor and surety was made in this way. The debtor, according to the Lombard law, gave the "festuca" or "wadium" to the creditor, who handed it to the surety. The binding force is derived from the ceremony, and not, as in the case of the real contracts, from the fact that something has passed from the creditor to the debtor. These formal acts will live long in the law as parts of legal ceremonies very distant from one another. Men will long make their faith by the help of rods; and for a still longer period they will convey property by their means. We still, as Blackstone noted, shake hands over a bargain. In the most solemn ceremony of feudal law, the act of homage the tenant placed his hands within his lord's.—HOLDSWORTH, 2 Hist. Eng. Law, 73.

§ 599. (4) When title passes.—As soon as the bargain is struck, the property of the goods is transferred to the vendee, and that of the price to the vendor; but the vendee cannot take the goods, until he tenders the price agreed on.<sup>r</sup> But if he tenders the money to the vendor, and he refuses it, the vendee may seize the goods, or have an action against the vendor for detaining them. And by a regular sale, without delivery, the property is so absolutely vested in the vendee, that if A sells a horse to B for 10*l.* and B pays him earnest, or signs a note in writing of the bargain; and afterwards, before the delivery of the horse or money paid, the horse dies in the vendor's custody; still he is entitled to the money, because by the [<sup>449</sup>] contract, the property was in the vendee.<sup>s</sup> Thus may property in goods be transferred by sale, where the vendor hath such property in himself.

§ 600. (5) Sale by one not owner.—But property may also in some cases be transferred by sale, though the vendor hath none at all in the goods: for it is expedient that the buyer, by taking proper precautions, may at all events be secure of his purchase; otherwise all commerce between man and man must soon be at an end.

§ 601. (a) Market overt.—And therefore the general rule of law is,<sup>b</sup> that all sales and contracts of anything vendible, in fairs or markets overt (that is, open), shall not only be good between the parties, but also be binding on all those that have any right or property therein.<sup>11</sup> And for this purpose, the Mirror informs

§ 602. (b) Stolen goods.—But if my goods are stolen from me, and sold, but of market overt, my property is not altered, and I may take them wherever I find them. And it is expressly provided by statute 1 Jac. I, c. 21 (Broker, 1603), that the sale of any goods wrongfully taken, to any pawnbroker in London, or within two miles thereof, shall not alter the property: for this, being usually a clandestine trade, is therefore made an exception to the general rule. And, even in market overt, if the goods be the property of the king, such sale (though regular in all other respects) [450] will in no case bind him; though it binds infants, feme covert, idiots, or lunatics, and men beyond sea or in prison: or if the goods be stolen from a common person, and then taken by the king's officer from the felon, and sold in open market; still, if the owner has used due diligence in prosecuting the thief to conviction, he loses not his property in the goods.<sup>6</sup>

nized as part of our law. The student, therefore, must be careful not to regard the exceptions and qualifications of this rule in this and the next paragraph, as applicable to the law of sales in general.—HAMMOND.

§ 603. (c) Knowledge of defective title.—So, likewise, if the buyer knoweth the property not to be in the seller; or there be any other fraud in the transaction; if he knoweth the seller to be an infant, or feme covert not usually trading for herself; if the sale be not originally and wholly made in the fair or market, or not at the usual hours; the owner's property is not bound thereby.<sup>1</sup> If a man buys his own goods in a fair or market, the contract of sale shall not bind him so as that he shall render the price, unless the property had been previously altered by a former sale.<sup>2</sup> And, notwithstanding any number of intervening sales, if the original vendor, who sold without having the property, comes again into possession of the goods, the original owner may take them, when found in his hands who was guilty of the first breach of justice.<sup>1</sup> By which wise regulations the common law has secured the right of the proprietor in personal chattels from being divested, so far as was consistent with that other necessary policy, that purchasers, bona fide, in a fair, open and regular manner, should not be afterwards put to difficulties by reason of the previous knavery of the seller.

§ 604. (d) Sale of horses.—But there is one species of personal chattels, in which the property is not easily altered by sale, without the express consent of the owner, and those are horses.<sup>m</sup> For a purchaser gains no property in a horse that has been stolen, unless it be bought in a fair or market overt, according to the directions of the statutes 2 P. & M., c. 7 (Horses, Markets and Fairs, 1555), and 31 Eliz., c. 12 (Horses, Markets and Fairs, 1588). By which it is enacted that the horse shall be openly exposed, in the time of such fair or market, for one whole hour together, between 10 in the morning and sunset, in the public place used for such sales, and not in any private yard or stable; and afterwards brought by both the vendor and vendee to the bookkeeper of such fair or market: that toll be paid, if any [<sup>451</sup>] be due; and if not, one penny to the bookkeeper, who shall enter down the price, color and marks of the horse, with the names, additions, and abode of the vendee and vendor; the latter being properly attested. Nor shall such sale take away the property of the owner, if within six months after the horse is stolen he puts in his claim before some magistrate, where the horse shall be found; and, within forty days more, proves such his property by the oath of two witnesses, and tenders to the person in possession such price as he bona fide paid for him in market overt. But in case any one of the points before mentioned be not observed, such sale is utterly void; and the owner shall not lose his property, but at any distance of time may seize or bring an action for his horse, wherever he happens to find him.*

§ 605. (6) Warranty.—By the civil law<sup>m</sup> an implied warranty was annexed to every sale, in respect to the title of the vendor: and so, too, in our law, a purchaser of goods and chattels may have a satisfaction from the seller, if he sells them as his own and the title proves deficient, without any express warranty for that purpose.<sup>o</sup> But, with regard to the goodness of the wares so purchased, the vendor is not bound to answer; unless he expressly warrants them to be sound and good,<sup>p</sup> or unless he knew them to be otherwise and hath used any art to disguise them,<sup>q</sup> or unless they turn out to be different from what he represented to the buyer.

§ 606. b. Bailment.—Bailment, from the French bailler, to deliver, is a delivery of goods in trust, upon a contract expressed or implied, that the trust shall be faithfully executed on the part of the bailee.<sup>12</sup> As if cloth be delivered, or (in our legal dialect) bailed, to a tailor to make a suit of clothes, he has it upon an implied contract to render it again when made, and that in a workmanly manner.<sup>r</sup> If money or goods be delivered to a common carrier, to convey from Oxford to London, he is under a contract in law to pay, or carry, them to the person appointed.<sup>s</sup> If a horse, or other goods, be delivered to an innkeeper or his servants, he is bound to keep [<sup>452</sup>] them safely, and restore them when his guest leaves the house.<sup>t</sup> If a man takes in a horse, or other cattle, tels into his house. So, also, on the next page his only example of a pledge is in the case of a public pawnbroker; which is always strictly regulated by statute to a much greater degree than that of an ordinary pledgee.

One who, not being a common carrier, undertakes to carry the goods of another from place to place for a reward, is a bailee, and liable for negligence only to the same extent as other paid bailees. (Gordon v. Hutchinson, 1 Watts & S. (Pa.) 285, 37 Am. Dec. 464; Shelden v. Robinson, 7 N. H. 157, 26 Am. Dec. 726; Pennewill v. Cullen, 5 Harr. (Del.) 238; Roberts v. Turner, 12 Johns. (N. But the liability of a common carrier is very different. There are not a few dicta to the contrary, especially in the older states, nearly all of which will be found collected in O'Hear v. De Goesbriand, 33 Vt. 593, 80 Am. Dec. 653; or in the editor's note in the last-named volume. But these are usually based on the repetition of the common-law phraseology without reference to principles, except where the case depends on some statute peculiar to a state, or is consistent with either view of the property in question.—HAMMOND.

18 The law of public calling.—At about the beginning of the last quarter of the nineteenth century the principle, which had from the earliest times of the common law governed the relations of the public and the common carrier and innkeeper, was generalized into an active principle regulating the relations of all those engaged in public employment or calling with the community. Under the police powers "the government regulates the conduct of its citizens one toward another, and the manner in which each shall use his own property, when such regulation becomes necessary for the public good. In their exercise it has been customary in England from time immemorial, and in this country from its first colonization, to regulate ferries, common carriers, hackmen, bakers, millers, wharfingers, innkeepers, etc., and in so doing to fix a maximum of charges to be made for services rendered, accommodations furnished, and articles sold. To this day, statutes are to be found in many of the states upon some or all of these subjects; and we think it has never yet been successfully contended that such legislation came within any of the constitutional prohibitions against interference with private property." Waite, C. J., in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. Ed. 77. Later on in the same opinion the grounds for sustaining such power of regulation were thus set forth: "This brings us to inquire as to the principles upon which this power of regulation rests, in order that we may determine what is within and what is without its operative effect. Looking, then, to the common law, from whence came the right which the constitution protects, we find that when private property is 'affected with a public interest, it ceases to be juris privati only.' This was said by Lord Chief Justice Hale more than two hundred years ago, in his treatise De Portibus Maris, 1 Harg. Law Tracts, 78, and has been accepted without objection as an essential element in the law of property ever since. Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use; but, so long as he maintains the use, he must submit to the control." Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. Ed. 77.

"The difference between public callings and private business is a distinction in the law governing business relations which has always had and will always have most important consequences. Those in a public calling have always been under the extraordinary duty to serve all comers, while those in a private business may always refuse to sell if they please. So great a distinction as this constitutes a difference in kind of legal control rather than merely one of degree. The causes of this division are, of course, rather economic than strictly legal; and the relative importance of these two classes at any given time therefore, depends ultimately upon the industrial conditions which prevail at that period. Thus in the England which we see through the medium of our earliest law reports the mediæval system of established monopolies called for the legal requirement of indiscriminate service from those engaged in almost all employments. There followed in succeeding centuries an expansion of trade which Money by False Pretenses, 1756). And so if a landlord distrains goods for rent, or a parish officer for taxes, these for a time are only a pledge in the hands of the distrainers, and they are bound by an implied contract in law to restore them on payment of the debt, duty, and expenses, before the time of sale; or, when sold, to render back the overplus. If a friend delivers anything to his friend to keep for him, the receiver is bound to restore it on demand: and it was formerly held that in the meantime he was gradually did away with the necessity for coercive law. Indeed, in the early part of the nineteenth century, free competition became the very basis of the social organization, with the consequence that the recognition of the public callings as a class almost ceased. It is only in very recent years that it has again come to be recognized that the process of free competition fails in some cases to secure the public good; and it has been reluctantly admitted that state control is again necessary over such lines of industry as are affected with a public interest. Thus with varying importance the distinction between the public callings and the private callings has been present in our law from the earliest times to the present day. The common law requiring public service from those who profess a public calling has been ready to deal with every public employment at the instant of its recognition as such, for the protection of the whole people so far as it was generally felt that such protection was necessary." Wyman, Pub. Service Corporations, § 1.

The early law as to common carriers is thus given in a case of the date of 1683: "Action on the case, for that whereas defendant is a common carrier from London to Lymmington et abinde retrorsum, and setting it forth as the custom of England, that he is bound to carry goods, and that the plaintiff brought him such a pack, he refused to carry them, though offered his hire. And held by Jefferies, C. J., that the action is maintainable, as well as it is against an innkeeper for refusing a guest, or a smith on the road who refuses to shoe my horse, being tendered satisfaction for the same. Note, That it was alleged and proved that he had convenience to carry the same; and the plaintiff had a verdict." Jackson v. Rogers, 2 Show. 327, 89 Eng. Reprint, 968.

It was of the public character of a wharfinger that Lord Hale, in the De Portibus Maris, was speaking in his famous statement quoted above in the case of Munn v. Illinois. And of the innkeeper, it was said: "The innkeeper is not to select his guests. He has no right to say to one, you shall come into my inn, and to another, you shall not, as everyone coming and conducting himself in a proper manner has a right to be received; and for this purpose innkeepers are a sort of public servants, they having in return a kind of privilege of entertaining travelers, and supplying them with what they want." Rex v. Ivens, 7 Car. & P. 213.

nesses and enterprises as might be brought under these heads, have been the ones to which this nature has been attached. The economic interests of the present day have demanded the extension of the principle to all businesses that owe their existence either to virtual monopoly, to legal monopoly, or to the favor of the state for an exclusive franchise, for aid or exemption from taxation, for the use of the public highways, or for the exercise of the power of eminent domain. Perhaps it would be more correct to say these are criteria determining the fact that the callings are public in nature. Under one or other of these classes, there have been held as affected with a public interest: Waterworks (Haugen v. Albina Light & Water Co., 21 Or. 411, 14 L. R. A. 424, 28 Pac. 244); irrigation systems (Slosser v. Salt River Valley Canal Co., 7 Ariz. 376, 65 Pac. 332); natural gas companies (State v. Consumers' Gas Trust Co., 157 Ind. 345, 55 L. R. A. 245, 61 N. E. 674); grain elevators (Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. Ed. 77; Budd v. People, 143 U. S. 517, 36 L. Ed. 247, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 468; Brass v. State of North Dakota, 153 U. S.) 834, 86 Pac. 150; Cotting v. Godard, 183 U. S. 79, 46 L. Ed. 92, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 30); messenger service (Haskell v. Boston Dist. Messenger Co., 190 Mass. 189, 112 Am. St. Rep. 324, 5 Ann. Cas. 796, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1091, 76 N. E. 215); gasworks (Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co., 130 U. S. 396, 32 L. Ed. 979, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553); electric plants (Snell v. Clinton El. Light, Heat & Power Co., 196 Ill. 626, 89 Am. St. Rep. 341, 58 L. R. A. 284, 63 N. E. 1082); telegraph systems (Green v. Western Union Tel. Co., 136 N. C. 489, 103 Am. St. Rep. 955, 1 Ann. Cas. 349, 67 L. R. A. 985, 49 S. E. 165); telephone systems (Chesapeake & Potomac Tel. Co. v. Manning, 186 U. S. 238, 46 L. Ed. 1144, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 881); sleeping-cars (Nevin v. Pullman Palace Car Co., 106 Ill. 222, 46 Am. Rep. 688); refrigerator-cars (In re Transportation of Fruit, 10 Int. Com. Rep. 360).

The duties which public service companies are under are fourfold: (1) to serve all, (2) with adequate facilities, (3) for a reasonable compensation, and (4) without discrimination. In State v. Nebraska Telephone Co., 17 Neb. 126, 52 Am. Rep. 404, 22 N. W. 237, it was held that the telephone company is a public servant in the commerce of the country, and that respondent, having undertaken to supply the demand, must supply all alike, without discrimination; and that having undertaken to supply the demand in the city of L. wherein relator resides and being fully able to furnish him a telephone instrument, the same as other subscribers, it was its duty to do so. In Baily v. Fayette Gas-Fuel Co., 193 Pa. St. 175, 44 Atl. 251, it was held that a gas company incorporated for supplying natural gas to customers for heat and light, which is a quasi-public corporation, cannot discriminate by charging more for gas used for lighting than for that used for heating, there being no reason therefor except that it is worth more to the consumer measured by what he would have to pay for substitutes for such purposes.

<sup>14</sup> Interest of the bailee.—The assignee of an equitable chose in action, e. g., a trust, of course sues in his own name without the aid of a statute. But here, too, there is no novation. If the Hibernicism may be pardoned, the assignee of a trust, like an attorney, stands in the place of his assignor, but does not displace him. A release from the assignor to the innocent trustee frees the latter's legal title from the equitable encumbrance. Newman v. Newman, 28 Ch. D. 674. So, if a cestui que trust should assign his trust first to A. and then to B., and B. should, in good faith, obtain a conveyance of the legal title from the trustee, he could hold it against A. What is true of the equitable trust is equally true of the analogous legal bailment. By judicial legislation the purchaser from a bailor is allowed to proceed in his own name against the bailee. But a bailee who, for value and in ignorance of the bailor's sale of his interest, receives a release from the latter, may keep the chattel. If a bailee, in ignorance of a sale by the bailor, should deliver the goods to the bailor or to some person designated by the bailor, he could not be charged by the bailor's vendee. He would simply have performed his contract according to its tenor. Saxeby v. Wynne, 3 Stark. Ev., 3d ed., 1159; Glyn etc. Co. v. East & West India Dock Co., 7 App. Cas. 591; Jones v. Hodgkins, 61 Me. 480; Woods v. McGee, 7 Ohio, 127, 30 Am. Dec. 220 (as explained in Newhall v.

having still left in him the right to a chose in action, grounded upon such contract. And, on account of this qualified property of the bailee, he may (as well as the bailor) maintain an action against such as injure or take away these chattels. The tailor, the carrier, the innkeeper, the agisting farmer, the pawnbroker, the distrainer, and the general bailee, may all of them vindicate, in their own right, this their possessory interest, against any stranger or third person.<sup>b</sup> For, being responsible to the bailor, if the goods

As late as 1844, that great master of the common law, Mr. Baron Parke, ruled that a purchaser from a pledgor could not maintain in action on his own name against the pledgee. The court in banc reversed this ruling. Franklin v. Neate, 13 Mees. & W. 481. See, also, Goodman v. Boycott, 2 B. & S. 1, 121 Eng. Reprint, 974; Bristol etc. Bank v. Midland Ry. Co., [1891] 2 Q. B. 653. The innovation has been followed in this country. Carpenter v. Hale, 8 Gray (Mass.), 157; Hubbard v. Bliss, 12 Allen (Mass.), 590; Meyers v. Briggs, 11 R. I. 180; Jack v. Eagles, 2 All. (N. B.) 95.—AMES, Lect. on Leg. Hist. 214 n., also in 3 Sel. Essays in Anglo-Am. Leg. Hist., 585 n.

"In a short discussion of the nature of a bailor's interest, in the sixth volume of the [Harvard Law] Review, p. 43, it was maintained that Blackstone was right in saying (2 Comm. 453) that 'the bailor hath nothing left in him but the right to a chose in action.' Consistently with this view, the vendee of a bailor should not be permitted to sue the bailee in his own name. This was formerly the law. As late as 1844 it was urged at Nisi Prius that a sale by a bailor was 'merely an assignment of a right of action,' and Parke, B., being of that opinion, directed a verdict for the defendant in an action by the bailor's vendee. The court of exchequer, however, in disregard of the precedents, held this ruling of the learned judge to be a misdirection; and this innovation in procedure must now be regarded as established. (3 Harvard Law Review, 342, n. 1.)

"But Blackstone's statement should still control in settling the substantive rights of the parties, and is believed to be the only ground upon which certain decisions can be supported. For example, in Saxeby v. Wynne, 3 Stark, Law of Evidence (3d ed.), 1159, A. deposited goods with B. and then sold them to

are lost or damaged by his willful default or gross negligence, or if he do not deliver up the chattels on lawful demand, it is therefore reasonable that he should have a right of action against all other persons who may have purloined or injured them; that he may always be ready to answer the call of the bailor.

§ 608. c. Hiring and borrowing.—Hiring and borrowing are also contracts by which a qualified property may be transferred to the hirer or borrower: in which there is only this difference,

C., and afterwards directed B. to deliver them to D. B., it was decided, was not guilty of a conversion in delivering them to D. If C. was simply the assignee of A.'s chose in action against B. the decision was clearly right, for A. could not have recovered against B. If, on the other hand, C. acquired a full title as owner of the goods, the decision must be wrong. Jones v. Hodgkins, 61 Me. 480, is a similar case in favor of the bailee.

"It is familiar learning that one who acquires the possession of goods as a fraudulent vendee holds the title so acquired as a constructive trustee for the vendor, and that this fraudulent vendee may, like any trustee, pass the title to a bona fide purchaser free from the equitable encumbrance. Suppose, however, that the defrauded vendor simply sells without delivering possession. The fraudulent vendee gets not the res, but a conditional right in rem, the right to have the res on paying the purchase money. His legal right is the same as if he had received possession at the time of the sale, and had immediately given back the possession to the vendor as a security for the purchase money. In other words, he is substantially a pledgor, and has like any bailor only a legal chose in action. And this legal chose in action, which he obtained by fraud, he holds as a constructive trustee for the defrauded vendor. If, therefore, he purports to sell the goods to an innocent purchaser, the latter will acquire only the assignment of this legal chose in action subject to the equitable encumbrance in favor of the defrauded vendor. The bona fide purchaser, therefore, and not the original vendor, will be the victim of the rascality of the fraudulent vendee. This was the result of the decisions in Globe Milling Co. v. Minneapolis E. Co., 44 Minn. 153, 46 N. W. 306, and Dean v. Yates, 22 Ohio St. 388." 10 Harv. Law Rev., 57.

Special property of the bailee.—Having now seen that the bailee undoubtedly has possession at common law, it becomes necessary to inquire whether he has any more extensive interest. Undoubtedly there are frequently found in the old decisions and in the old text-writers' statements to the effect that the bailee has a property in the chattel bailed, or at least a special property. (2 Bl. Comm. 452.) But it is apparent that the possessory right of the bailee sufficiently accounts for all or nearly all of the phenomena presented by the decisions touching his interest. Hence it seems to be unnecessary to attribute to bailees generally any property right at all. The persistence, however, of the that hiring is always for a price, a stipend, or additional recompense; borrowing is merely gratuitous. But the law in both cases is the same. They are both contracts, whereby the possession and a transient property is transferred for a particular time or use, on condition to restore the goods so hired or borrowed, as soon as the time is expired or use performed; together with the price or stipend (in case of hiring) either expressly agreed on by the parties, or left to be implied by law according to the value of the ser-

At the outset it is plain that there may well be a distinction between gratuitous bailments, such as deposits, mandates, and loans on the one hand, and bailments for hire on the other. It may be conceded that the bailee for hire, especially the pledgee, has a higher interest than the gratuitous bailee. But if by the term "special property" is meant something in the nature of an estate carved out of the general ownership or property right in a thing, the depositary, mandatary and commodatary certainly did not have such property. The interest commensurate with the legal remedies accorded to these bailees is possession only.

Recent investigation has given to possessory rights much greater recognition than was formerly accorded to them. Thus Sir Frederick Pollock tells us truly, that possession in law is a substantive right or interest which exists and has legal incidents and advantages apart from the true owner's title. Hence it is itself a kind of title, and it is a natural development of the law that a possessor should be able to deal with his apparent interest in the fashion of an owner, and that as regards every one not having a better title those acts should be valid. When possession is understood in this light, it certainly becomes unnecessary to suppose the existence of an actual property right in the gratuitous bailee to account for the consideration given to him by our law.

Some countenance has been given to the idea that gratuitous bailees have a special property in the bailment by the circumstance that trover can be maintained by such bailee against one who interferes with his possession and converts the property. But this is not a conclusive test. Trover, to be sure, is often founded on a property right, but not exclusively so. It is clear that a remedy which is founded exclusively on the right of property, like replevin, will not lie at the instance of the gratuitous bailee. In other words, he has no real property, general or special. (Waterman v. Robinson, 5 Mass. 303.)

The nature of the interest acquired by the depositary was discussed in Hartop v. Hoare (1736), 3 Atk. 44, 26 Eng. Reprint, 328, where jewels were deposited in a sealed packet with a jeweler for safekeeping. The jeweler broke the seal and then pledged the jewels for an advancement of three hundred pounds. It was held, upon the authority of Coke's interpretation of Bonion's Case, that the jeweler had the mere custody, as the owner had not entrusted him with the vice. By this mutual contract, the hirer or borrower gains a temporary property in the thing hired, accompanied with an implied condition to use it with moderation and not abuse it; and the owner or lender retains a reversionary interest in the same, and acquires a new property in the price or reward. Thus if a man hires or borrows a horse for a month, he has the possession and a qualified property therein during that period; on the expiration of which his qualified property determines, and the owner goods. From this it necessarily followed that the bailee had no interest which he could transmit, and that the original owner could maintain trover against the pledgee who refused to surrender the jewels without the repayment of his advancement.

As to pledgees, the opinion that they have a special property in the goods pledged is an old one. Coke referred to it in Southcote's Case, and the fact that pledgees have such an interest in the bailment was sufficient to relieve the pledgee from any higher degree of diligence in caring for the pledge than he exhibited in keeping his own goods.

Likewise there is little difficulty in ascribing a special property to all bailees to whom things are let for hire and to bailees employed to perform service on things for hire. In an old case where a horse had been let to one for two days, and the bailor, suspecting that the bailee was about to abscond with the horse, forcibly retook the animal, the court, in giving judgment for the plaintiff in a suit for damages arising out of the assault connected with the taking, said the plaintiff had a special property good for the two days against all the world.

This special property of the bailee for hire is not, however, of a definite nature, and the more it is examined the more shadowy it appears. Thus, in Lilley v. Barnsley (1844), 2 M. & Rob. 548, it was held that, where goods are bailed for the purpose of having work done upon them, the bailor can countermand the order and have the goods back with the work incomplete, on the payment of the reasonable value of the work done. Of course the bailee can recover damages for the breach of the contract, but he cannot hold the chattels bailed in order to secure this claim. This is a practical denial of any special property in the bailee. It puts the bailee in such cases on a lower plane than that of an agent where the agency is coupled with an interest.—STREET, 2 Foundations of Legal Liability, 311.

The reasoning of Blackstone with reference to the qualified property of the bailee, Professor Holland says, "though found also in Beaumanoir, XXX, 1, and in Y. B. 11 H. IV, seems to be erroneous. See Holmes, Common Law, pp. 167, 170. It is probably derived from a misunderstanding of the remedies given in Roman law to certain bailees for the protection of interests other than those resulting from bare possession. Cf. Inst. iv. 1. 14 and 17; Dig. xlvii. 2. 46. The right of the bailee was held to be irrespective of his liability to the bailor in the Winkfield, L. R. [1902] Prob. Div. 42." Holland, Jurisprudence (11th ed.), 200 n.

becomes (in case of hiring) entitled also to the price, for which the horse was hired.*

§ 609. (1) Interest.—<sup>[454]</sup> There is one species of this price or reward, the most usual of any, but concerning which many good and learned men have in former times very much perplexed themselves and other people, by raising doubts about its legality in foro conscientia (in the forum of the conscience). That is, when money is lent on a contract to receive not only the principal sum again, but also an increase by way of compensation for the use; which generally is called interest by those who think it lawful, and usury by those who do not so. For the enemies to interest in general make no distinction between that and usury, holding any increase of money to be indefensibly usurious. And this they ground as well on the prohibition of it by the law of Moses among the Jews, as also upon what is said to be laid down by Aristotle,<sup>d</sup> that money is naturally barren, and to make it breed money is preposterous, and a perversion of the end of its institution, which was only to serve the purposes of exchange, and not of increase. Hence the school divines have branded the practice of taking interest, as being contrary to the divine law both natural and revealed; and the canon law<sup>e</sup> has proscribed the taking any, the least, increase for the loan of money as a mortal sin.

But, in answer to this, it may be observed, that the mosaical precept was clearly a political, and not a moral, precept. It only prohibited the Jews from taking usury from their brethren, the Jews: but in express words permitted them to take it of a stranger:† which proves that the taking of moderate usury, or a reward for the use, for so the word signifies, is not malum in se, since it was allowed where any but an Israelite was concerned. And as to the reason supposed to be given by Aristotle, and deduced from the natural barrenness of money, the same may with equal force be alleged of houses, which never breed houses; and twenty other things, which nobody doubts it is lawful to make profit of, by letting them to hire. And though money was originally used only for the purposes of exchange, yet the laws of any state [455] may be well justified in permitting it to be turned to the purposes of profit, if the convenience of society (the great end for which money was invented) shall require it. And that the allowance of moderate interest tends greatly to the benefit of the public, especially in a trading country, will appear from that generally acknowledged principle, that commerce cannot subsist without mutual and extensive credit. Unless money, therefore, can be borrowed, trade cannot be carried on: and if no premium were allowed for the hire of money, few persons would care to lend it; or at least the ease of borrowing at a short warning (which is the life of commerce) would be entirely at an end. Thus, in the dark ages of monkish superstition and civil tyranny, when interest was laid under a total interdict, commerce was also at its lowest ebb, and fell entirely into the hands of the Jews and Lombards: but when men's minds began to be more enlarged, when true religion and real liberty revived, commerce grew again into credit; and again introduced with itself its inseparable companion, the doctrine of loans upon interest. And, as to any scruples of conscience, since all other conveniences of life may either be bought or hired, but money can only be hired, there seems to be no greater oppression in taking a recompense or price for the hire of this, than of any other convenience. To demand an exorbitant price is equally contrary to conscience, for the loan of a horse, or the loan of a sum of money: but a reasonable equivalent for the temporary inconvenience, which the owner may feel by the want of it, and for the hazard of his losing it entirely, is not more immoral in one case than it is in the other. Indeed, the absolute prohibition of lending upon any, even moderate interest, introduces the very inconvenience which it seems meant to remedy. The necessity of individuals will make borrowing unavoidable. Without some profit allowed by law, there will be but few lenders: and those principally bad men, who will break through the law, and take a profit; and then will endeavor to indemnify themselves from the danger of the penalty, by making that profit exorbitant. A capital distinction [456] must therefore be made between a moderate and exorbitant profit; to the former of which we usually give the name of interest, to the latter the truly odious appellation of usury: the former is necessary in every civil state, if it were but to exclude the latter, which ought never to be tolerated in any well-regulated society. For, as the whole of this matter is well summed up by Grotius,<sup>s</sup> "if the compensation allowed by law does not exceed the proportion of the hazard run, or the want felt, by the loan, its allowance is neither repugnant to the revealed nor the natural law; but if it exceeds those bounds, it is then oppressive usury; and though the municipal laws may give it impunity, they never can make it just."

We see that the exorbitance or moderation of interest, for money lent, depends upon two circumstances; the inconvenience of parting with it for the present, and the hazard of losing it entirely. The inconvenience to individual lenders can never be estimated by laws; the rate, therefore, of general interest must depend upon the usual or general inconvenience. This results entirely from the quantity of specie or current money in the kingdom; for, the more specie there is circulating in any nation, the greater superfluity there will be, beyond what is necessary to carry on the business of exchange and the common concerns of life. In every nation or public community, there is a certain quantity of money thus necessary; which a person well skilled in political arithmetic might perhaps calculate as exactly, as a private banker can the demand for running cash in his own shop: all above this necessary quantity may be spared, or lent, without much inconvenience to the respective lenders; and the greater this national superfluity is, the more numerous will be the lenders, and the lower ought the rate of the national interest to be: but where there is not enough, or barely enough, circulating cash, to answer the ordinary uses of the public, interest will be proportionably high; for lenders will be but few, as few can submit to the inconvenience of lending.

[457] So, also, the hazard of an entire loss has its weight in the regulation of interest: hence, the better the security, the lower will the interest be; the rate of interest being generally in a compound ratio, formed out of the inconvenience, and the hazard. And as, if there were no inconvenience, there should be no interest but what is equivalent to the hazard, so if there were no hazard, there ought to be no interest, save only what arises from the mere inconvenience of lending. Thus, if the quantity of specie in a nation be such, that the general inconvenience of lending for a year is computed to amount to three per cent: a man that has money by him will perhaps lend it upon good personal security at five per cent, allowing two for the hazard run; he will lend it upon landed security or mortgage at four per cent, the hazard being proportionably less: but he will lend it to the state, on the maintenance of which all his property depends, at three per cent, the hazard being none at all.

But sometimes the hazard may be greater than the rate of interest allowed by law will compensate. And this gives rise to the practice of, 1. Bottomry, or respondentia. 2. Policies of insurance. 3. Annuities upon lives.

§ 610. (a) Bottomry or respondentia.—And first, bottomry (which originally arose from permitting the master of a ship, in a foreign country, to hypothecate the ship in order to raise money to refit) is in the nature of a mortgage of a ship; when the owner takes up money to enable him to carry on his voyage, and pledges the keel or bottom of the ship (pars pro toto—a part for the whole) as a security for the repayment. In which case it is understood, that if the ship be lost, the lender loses also his whole money; but if it returns in safety, then he shall receive back his principal, and also the premium or interest agreed upon, however it may exceed the legal rate of interest. And this is allowed to be a valid contract in all trading nations, for the benefit of commerce, and by reason of the extraordinary hazard run by the lender.<sup>a</sup> [458] And in this case the ship and tackle, if brought home, are answerable (as well as the person of the borrower) for the money lent. But if the loan is not upon the vessel, but upon the goods and merchandise, which must necessarily be sold or exchanged in the course of the voyage, then only the borrower, personally, is bound to answer the contract; who therefore in this case is said to take up money at respondentia. These terms are also applied to contracts for the repayment of money borrowed, not on the ship and goods only, but on the mere hazard of the voyage itself; when a man lends a merchant 1,000*l.* to be employed in a beneficial trade, with condition to be repaid with extraordinary interest, in case such a voyage be safely performed:† which kind of agreement is sometimes called fœnus nauticum (naval usury), and sometimes usura maritima (maritime usury).* But as this gave an opening for usurious and gaming contracts, especially upon long voyages, it was enacted by the statute 19 Geo. II, c. 37 (Marine Insurance, 1745), that all moneys lent on bottomry or at respondentia, on vessels bound to or from the East Indies, shall be expressly lent only upon the ship or upon the merchandise; that the lender shall have the benefit of salvage; and that if the borrower has not on board effects to the value of the sum borrowed, he shall be responsible to the lender for so much of the principal as hath not been laid out, with legal interest and all other charges, though the ship and merchandise be totally lost.

§ 611. (b) Insurance.—Secondly, a policy of insurance is a contract between A and B, that, upon A's paying a premium equivalent to the hazard run, B will indemnify or insure him against a particular event. This is founded upon one of the same principles as the doctrine of interest upon loans, that of hazard; but not that of inconvenience. For if I insure a ship to the Levant, and back again, at five per cent; here I calculate the chance that she performs her voyage to be twenty to one against her being lost; and, if she be lost, I lose 100*l.* and get 5*l.* Now, this is much the same as if I lend the merchant whose whole fortunes are embarked in this vessel, 100*l.* at <sup>[459]</sup> the rate of eight per cent. For by a loan I should be immediately out of possession of my money, the inconvenience of which we have computed equal to three per cent: if, therefore, I had actually lent him 100*l.* I must have added 3*l.* on the score of inconvenience, to the 5*l.* allowed for the hazard, which together would have made 8*l.* But, as upon an insurance, I am never out of possession of my money till the loss actually happens, nothing is therein allowed upon the principle of inconvenience, but all upon the principle of hazard. Thus too, in a loan, if the chance of repayment depends upon the borrower's life, it is frequent (besides the usual rate of interest) for the borrower to have his life insured till the time of repayment; for which he is loaded with an additional premium, suited to his age and constitution.

† 1 Sid. 27.

§ 612. (i) Life insurance.—Thus, if Sempronius has only an annuity for his life, and would borrow 100*l.* of Titius for a year; the inconvenience and general hazard of this loan, we have seen, are equivalent to 5*l.*, which is therefore the legal interest: but there is also a special hazard in this case; for if Sempronius dies within the year, Titius must lose the whole of his 100*l.* Suppose this chance to be as one to ten: it will follow that the extraordinary hazard is worth 10*l.* more, and therefore that the reasonable rate of interest in this case would be fifteen per cent. But this the law, to avoid abuses, will not permit to be taken; Sempronius therefore gives Titius, the lender, only 5*l.* the legal interest; but applies to Gaius an insurer, and gives him the other 10*l.* to indemnify Titius against the extraordinary hazard. And in this manner may any extraordinary or particular hazard be provided against, which the established rate of interest will not reach; that being calculated by the state to answer only the ordinary and general hazard, together with the lender's inconvenience in parting with his specie for the time. But, in order to prevent these insurances from being turned into a mischievous kind of gaming, it is enacted by statute 14 Geo. III, c. 48 (Life Insurance, 1774), that no insurance shall be made on lives, or on any other event, wherein the party insured hath no interest; that in all policies the name of such interested party shall be inserted; [460] and nothing more shall be recovered thereon than the amount of the interest of the insured.

§ 613. (ii) Marine insurance.—This doth not, however, extend to marine insurances, which were provided for by a prior law of their own, and the learning relating to which hath of late years been greatly improved by a series of judicial decisions, which have now established the law in such a variety of cases, that (if well and judiciously collected) they would form a very complete title in a code of commercial jurisprudence. But, being founded on equitable principles, which chiefly result from the special circumstances of the case, it is not easy to reduce them to any general heads in mere elementary institutes. Thus much, however, may be said; that, being contracts, the very essence of which consists in observing the purest good faith and integrity, they are vacated by any the least shadow of fraud or undue concealment: and, on the other hand, being much for the benefit and extension of trade, by distributing the loss or gain among a number of adventures, they are greatly encouraged and protected both by common law and acts of parliament. But, as a practice had obtained of insuring large sums without having any property on board, which were called insurances, interest or no interest; and also of insuring the same goods several times over; both of which were a species of gaming, without any advantage to commerce, and were denominated wagering policies: it is therefore enacted by the statute 19 Geo. II, c. 37 (Marine Insurance, 1745), that all insurances, interest or no interest, or without further proof of interest than the policy itself, or by way of gaming or wagering, or without benefit of salvage to the insurer (all which had the same pernicious tendency), shall be totally null and void, except upon privateers, or ships on the Spanish and Portuguese trade, for reasons sufficiently obvious; and that no reinsurance shall be lawful, except the former insurer shall be insolvent, a bankrupt, or dead; and lastly that, in the East India trade, the lender of money on bottomry, or at respondentia, shall alone have a right to be insured for the money lent, and the [461] borrower shall (in case of a loss) recover no more upon any insurance than the surplus of his property, above the value of his bottomry or respondentia bond.

§ 614. (c) Annuities.—Thirdly, the practice of purchasing annuities for lives at a certain price or premium, instead of advancing the same sum on an ordinary loan, arises usually from the inability of the borrower to give the lender a permanent security for the return of the money borrowed, at any one period of time. He therefore stipulates to repay annually, during his life, some part of the money borrowed; together with legal interest for so much of the principal as annually remains unpaid, and an additional compensation for the extraordinary hazard run, of losing that principal entirely by the contingency of the borrower's death: all which considerations, being calculated and blended together, will constitute the just proportion or quantum of the annuity granted. The real value of that contingency must depend on the age, constitution, situation, and conduct of the borrower; and therefore the price of such annuities cannot without the utmost difficulty be reduced to any general rules. So that if, by the terms of the contract, the lender's principal is bona fide (and not colorably<sup>1</sup>) put in jeopardy, no inequality of price will make it an usurious bargain; though, under some circumstances of imposition, it may be relieved against in equity. To throw, however, some check upon improvident transactions of this kind, which are usually carried on with great privacy, the statute 17 Geo. III, c. 26 (Grants of Life Annuities, 1776), has directed, that upon the sale of any life annuity of more than the value of ten pounds per annum (unless on a sufficient pledge of lands in fee simple or stock in the public funds) the true consideration, which shall be in money only, shall be set forth and described in the security itself; and a memorial of the date of the security, of the names of the parties, cestuy que trusts, cestuy que vies, and witnesses, and of the consideration money, shall within twenty days after its execution be enrolled in the court of chancery; else the security shall be null and void. And, in case of collusive practices respecting the consideration, the [462] court, in which any action is brought or judgment obtained upon such collusive security, may order the same to be canceled, and the judgment (if any) to be vacated. And all contracts for the purchase of annuities from infants shall remain utterly void, and incapable of confirmation after such infants arrive to the age of maturity. But, to return to the doctrine of common interest on loans:

§ 615. (2) Rates of interest.—Upon the two principles of inconvenience and hazard, compared together, different nations have at different times established different rates of interest. The Romans at one time allowed centesimæ, one per cent monthly or twelve per cent per annum, to be taken for common loans; but Justinian<sup>m</sup> reduced it to trientes, or one-third of the as or centesima, that is, four per cent; but allowed higher interest to be taken of merchants, because there the hazard was greater.<sup>a</sup> So, too, Grotius, informs <sup>a</sup> A short explication of these terms, and of the division of the Roman as, will be useful to the student, not only for understanding the civilians, but also the more classical writers, who perpetually refer to this distribution. Thus Horace, ad Pisones. 325:

Discunt in partes centum diducere. Dicit
Filius Albini, si de quincunce remota est
Uncia, quid superet? poterat dixisse, triens: eu, Rem poteris servare tuam! redit uncia, quid sit?
Semis.——*

("The Roman boys are taught to divide the 'as' by long calculations into a hundred parts. Supposing the son of Albinus says: 'If from five ounces be subtracted one, what is the remainder?' At once you can answer, 'A third of an as.' 'Good, you will be able to keep your property. If an ounce be added, what does it make?' 'The half of an as.'")

—Works of Horace, Trans. by Lonsdale and Lee, 214.)

It is therefore to be observed, that, in calculating the rate of interest the Romans divided the principal sum into an hundred parts; one of which they allowed to be taken monthly: and this, which was the highest rate of interest permitted, they called usuræ centesimæ, amounting yearly to twelve per cent. Now as the as, or Roman pound, was commonly used to express any integral sum, and was divisible into twelve parts or uncia, therefore these twelve monthly payments or uncia were held to amount annually to one pound, or as usurarius; and so the usuræ asses were synonymous to the usuræ centesimæ, and all lower rates of interest were denominated according to the relation they bore to this centesimal usury, or usuræ asses: for the several multiples of the uncia, or duodecimal parts of the as, were known by different names according to their different combinations; sextans, quadrans, triens, quincunx, semis, septunx, bes, dodrans, dextans, deunx, containing respectively 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 uncia or duodecimal parts of an as. (Ff. 28. 5. 50. § 2. Gravin. Orig. Jur. Civ. 1. 2. § 47.) This being premised, the following table will clearly exhibit at once the subdivisions of the as, and the denominations of the rate of interest.

[463] us,<sup>o</sup> that in Holland the rate of interest was then eight per cent in common loans, but twelve to merchants. Our law establishes one standard for all alike, where the pledge or security itself is not put in jeopardy; lest, under the general pretense of vague and indeterminate hazards, a door should be opened to fraud and usury: leaving specific hazards to be provided against by specific insurances, by annuities for lives, or by loans upon responsentia, or bottomry. But as to the rate of legal interest, it has varied and decreased for two hundred years past, according as the quantity of specie in the kingdom has increased by accessions of trade, the introduction of paper credit, and other circumstances. The statute 37 Hen. VIII, c. 9 (Usury, 1545), confined interest to ten per cent and so did the statute 13 Eliz., c. 8 (Usury, 1571). But as, through the encouragements given in her reign to commerce, the nation grew more wealthy, so under her successor the statute 21 Jac. I, c. 17 (Usury, 1623), reduced it to eight per cent; as did the statute 12 Car. II, c. 13 (Usury, 1660), to six; and lastly by the statute 12 Ann., st. 2, c. 16 (Usury, 1713), it was brought down to five per cent yearly, which is now the extremity of legal interest that can be taken. But yet, if a contract which carries interest be made in a foreign country, our courts will direct the payment of interest according to the law of that country in which the contract was made.<sup>p</sup> Thus Irish, American, Turkish, and Indian interest have [464] been allowed in our courts to the amount of even twelve per cent. For the moderation or exorbitance of interest depends upon local circumstances; and the refusal to enforce such contracts would put a stop to all foreign trade. And, by statute 14 Geo. III, c. 79 (Legal Rate of Interest, 1774), all mortgages and other securities upon estates or other property in Ireland or the plantations, bearing interest not exceeding six per cent, shall be legal; though executed in the kingdom of Great Britain: unless the money lent shall be known at the time to exceed the value of the thing in pledge; in which case also, to prevent usurious contracts at home under color of such foreign securities, the borrower shall forfeit treble the sum so borrowed.<sup>15</sup>

§ 616. d. Debt.—The last general species of contracts, which I have to mention, is that of debt; whereby a chose in action, or right to a certain sum of money, is mutually acquired and lost.<sup>a</sup> This may be the counterpart of, and arise from, any of the other species of contracts. As, in case of a sale, where the price is not paid in ready money, the vendee becomes indebted to the vendor for the sum agreed on; and the vendor has a property in this price, as a chose in action, by means of this contract of debt. In bailment, if the bailee loses or detains a sum of money bailed to him for any special purpose, he becomes indebted to the bailor in the same numerical sum, upon his implied contract, that he should execute the trust reposed in him, or repay the money to the bailor. by legislation (Defense of Usury), usury laws were abolished in Great Britain by the Usury Laws Repeal Act of 1854. Since then, subject to the statutory power of the court to set aside or vary a transaction where the interest charged is excessive, there is no restriction on the terms which may be agreed on between a borrower and a lender for the payment of interest, and the ordinary principles of the law of contract govern any such agreement. Where the rate of interest is not fixed by statute, agreement or fixed usage, there is no hard-and-fast rule as to the amount that will be allowed; and the rate may vary according to the practice of the particular court, the value of money for the time being, and the circumstances of the particular case. However, the Money-lenders Acts of 1900 and 1911 are designed to afford relief in certain cases to borrowers. These acts provide that in any transaction, whatever its form may be, which is substantially one of money-lending by a "money-lender," if the interest or charges in respect of the sum actually lent are excessive and the transaction is either harsh and unconscionable, or is otherwise such that a court of equity would give relief, the borrower, or any surety for him, or any other person liable to the money-lender in respect of the loan, will be given relief.—HALSBURY, 21 Laws of England, 42, 53.

In all the states of the American Union there is a legal rate of interest established by statute, which is allowed when no rate is specified in the contract. This legal rate varies from five to twelve per cent. Some of the states have no usury laws, except that interest above the legal rate must be contracted for in writing. But in most states, no person or corporation may take or receive, directly or indirectly, in money, goods, things in action, or in any other way, a greater sum or value than that prescribed by law. The penalties vary in the different states. 1 Stimson, Am. Stat. Law, arts. 481 and 483. Powell v. Jones, 44 Barb. (N. Y.) 521; Carter v. Carusi, 112 U. S. 478, 28 L. Ed. 820, 5 Sup. Ct. hiring or borrowing, the hirer or borrower, at the same time that he acquires a property in the thing lent, may also become indebted to the lender, upon his contract to restore the money borrowed, to pay the price or premium of the loan, the hire of the horse, or the like. Any contract, in short, whereby a determinate sum of money becomes due to any person, and is not paid but remains, in action merely, is a contract of debt. And, taken in this light, it comprehends a great variety of acquisition; [465] being usually divided into debts of record, debts by special, and debts by simple contract.

§ 617. (1) Debts of record.—A debt of record is a sum of money, which appears to be due by the evidence of a court of record. Thus, when any specific sum is adjudged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff, on an action or suit at law; this is a contract of the highest nature, being established by the sentence of a court of judicature. Debts upon recognizance, are also a sum of money, recognized or acknowledged to be due to the crown or a subject, in the presence of some court or magistrate, with a condition that such acknowledgment shall be void upon the appearance of the party, his good behavior, or the like: and these, together with statutes merchant and statutes staple, etc., if forfeited by nonperformance of the condition, are also ranked among this first and principal class of debts, viz., debts of record; since the contract, on which they are founded, is witnessed by the highest kind of evidence, viz., by matter of record.

§ 618. (2) Debts by specialty.—Debts by specialty, or special contract, are such whereby a sum of money becomes, or is acknowledged to be, due by deed or instrument under seal. Such as by deed of covenant, by deed of sale, by lease reserving rent, or by bond or obligation: which last we took occasion to explain in the twentieth chapter of the present book; and then showed that it is an acknowledgment or creation of a debt from the obligor to the obligee, unless the obligor performs a condition thereunto usually annexed, as the payment of rent or money borrowed, the observance of a covenant, and the like; on failure of which the bond becomes forfeited and the debt becomes due in law. These are looked upon as the next class of debts after those of record, being confirmed by special evidence, under seal.

§ 619. (3) Debts by simple contract.—Debts by simple contract are such, where the contract upon which the obligation arises is neither ascertained by matter of record, nor yet by deed or special instrument, but by mere oral evidence, the most simple of any, or by notes [466] unsealed, which are capable of a more easy proof, and (therefore only) better, than a verbal promise. It is easy to see into what a vast variety of obligations this last class may be branched out, through the numerous contracts for money, which are not only expressed by the parties, but virtually implied in law. Some of these we have already occasionally hinted at; and the rest, to avoid repetition, must be referred to those particular heads in the third book of these Commentaries, where the breach of such contracts will be considered. I shall only observe at present, that by the statute 29 Car. II, c. 3 (Statute of Frauds, 1677), no executor or administrator shall be charged upon any special promise to answer damages out of his own estate, and no person shall be charged upon any promise to answer for the debt or default of another, or upon any agreement in consideration of marriage, or upon any contract or sale of any real estate, or upon any agreement that is not to be performed within one year from the making; unless the agreement or some memorandum thereof be in writing, and signed by the party himself or by his authority.

But there is one species of debts upon simple contract, which, being a transaction now introduced into all sorts of civil life, under the name of paper credit, deserves a more particular regard. These are debts by bills of exchange, and promissory notes.

§ 620. (a) Bills of exchange.—A bill of exchange is a security,<sup>16</sup> originally invented among merchants in different countries, for the more easy remittance of money from the one to the other, which has since spread itself into almost all pecuniary transactions. It is an open letter of request from one man to another, desiring him to pay a sum named therein to a third person on his account; by which means a man at the most distant part of the world may have money remitted to him from any trading country. If A lives in Jamaica, and owes B, who lives in England, 1,000*l.*, now if C be going from England to Jamaica, he may pay B this 1,000*l.* and take a bill of exchange drawn by B in England upon A in Jamaica, and receive it when he comes thither. Thus does B receive his debt, at any distance of place, by transferring it to C; who carries over his money [467] in paper credit, without danger of robbery or loss. This method is said to have been brought into general use by the Jews and Lombards, when banished for their usury and other vices; in order the more easily to draw their effects out of France and England, into those countries in which they had chosen to reside. But the invention of it was a little earlier: for the Jews were banished out of Guienne in 1287, and out of England in 1290;<sup>r</sup> and in 1236 the use of paper credit was introduced into the Mogul empire in China.* In common speech such a bill is frequently called a draft, but a bill of exchange is the more legal as well as mercantile expression. The person, however, who writes this letter, is called in law the drawer, and he to whom it is written the drawee; and the third person, or negotiator, to whom it is payable (whether specially named, or the bearer generally) is called the payee.

§ 621. (i) Foreign and inland bills.—These bills are either foreign, or inland; foreign, when drawn by a merchant residing abroad upon his correspondent in England, or vice versa; and inland, when both the drawer and the drawee reside within the kingdom.<sup>17</sup> Formerly foreign bills of exchange were much more

* Mod. Un. Hist. iv. 499.

<sup>17</sup> "Sir William Blackstone, in his Commentaries (vol. II, p. 467), distinguishes foreign from inland bills, by defining the former as bills drawn by a merchant residing abroad, upon his correspondent in England, or vice versa; and the latter, as those drawn by one person on another, when both drawer and drawee reside within the same kingdom. . . . Applying this definition to the political character of the several states of this Union in relation to each other, we are all clearly of opinion, that bills drawn in one of these states, upon persons living in any other of them, partake of the character of foreign bills, and ought so to be treated. For all national purposes, embraced by the federal constitution, the states and the citizens thereof are one, united under the same sovereign authority, and governed by the same laws. In all other re-regarded in the eye of the law than inland ones, as being thought of more public concern in the advancement of trade and commerce. But now by two statutes, the one 9 & 10 W. III, c. 17 (Bill of Exchange, 1697), the other 3 & 4 Ann., c. 9 (Bill of Exchange, 1704), inland bills of exchange are put upon the same footing as foreign ones; what was the law and custom of merchants with regard to the one, and taken notice of merely as such,† being by those statutes expressly enacted with regard to the other. So that there is now in law no manner of difference between them.

§ 622. (b) Promissory notes.—Promissory notes, or notes of hand, are a plain and direct engagement in writing, to pay a sum specified at the time therein limited to a person therein named, or sometimes to his order, or often to the bearer at large. These, also, by the same statute 3 & 4 Ann., c. 9 (Bill of Exchange, 1704), are made assignable and indorseable in like manner as bills of exchange. But, by statute 15 Geo. III., c. 51 (Negotiation of Notes and Bills, 1774), all promissory or other notes, [~~468~~] bills of exchange, drafts, and undertakings in writing, being negotiable or transferable, for the payment of less than twenty shillings, are declared to be null and void: and it is made penal to utter or publish any such; they being deemed prejudicial to trade and public credit. And by 17 Geo. III, c. 30 (Bill of Exchange, 1776), all such notes, bills, drafts, and undertakings, to the amount of twenty shillings and less than five pounds, are subjected to many other spects, the states are necessarily foreign to, and independent of, each other. Their constitutions and forms of government being, although republican, altogether different, as are their laws and institutions. This sentiment was expressed, with great force, by the president of the court of appeals of Virginia, in the case of Warder v. Arell, 2 Wash. (Va.) 282, 298, 1 Am. Dec. 488, where he states, that in cases of contracts, the laws of a foreign country, where the contract was made, must govern; and then adds as follows: "The same principle applies, though with no greater force, to the different states of America; for though they form a confederated government, yet the several states retain their individual sovereignties, and, with respect to their municipal regulations, are to each other foreign." Washington, J., in *Buckner v. regulations and formalities; the omission of any one of which vacades the security, and is penal to him that utters it.

§ 623. (1) Negotiability of bills and notes.—The payee, we may observe, either of a bill of exchange or promissory note, has clearly a property vested in him (not indeed in possession but in action) by the express contract of the drawer in the case of a promissory note, and, in the case of a bill of exchange, by his implied contract, viz., that, provided the drawee does not pay the bill, the drawer will: for which reason it is usual, in bills of exchange, to express that the value thereof hath been received by the drawer; <sup>a</sup> in order to show the consideration, upon which the implied contract of repayment arises. And this property, so vested, may be transferred and assigned from the payee to any other man; contrary to the general rule of the common law, that no chose in action is assignable: which assignment is the life of paper credit.<sup>18</sup> It

<sup>18</sup> English Bills of Exchange Act of 1882.—The whole law regarding bills and notes was codified in the English Bills of Exchange Act of 1882. In its origin this law was a part of that branch of the common law known as the law-merchant, which is thus described: "The law-merchant is sometimes spoken of as a fixed body of law forming part of the common law and coeval with the rest of it. But this view, as a matter of legal history, is altogether incorrect. The law-merchant is neither more nor less than the usages of merchants and traders in the different departments of trade, ratified by the decisions of courts of law, which, upon such usages being proved before them, have adopted them as settled law with a view to the interest of trade and the public convenience. In thus acting the courts have proceeded on the well-known principle of law that with reference to transactions in the different departments of trade, courts of law, in giving effect to the contracts and dealings of the parties, will assume that the latter have dealt with one another on the footing of some custom or usage prevailing generally in that particular department. By this process what before was usage only, unsanctioned by legal decision, has become engrafted upon or incorporated with the common law. (Goodwin v. Robarts (1875), L. R. 10 Exch. 337, per Cockburn, C. J., at p. 346. Compare Brandao v. Barnett (1846), 12 Cl. & Fin. 787, per Lord Campbell, at p. 805)." Halsbury, 2 Laws of England, 459.

"The outstanding characteristics common to bills, cheques and notes which found expression in the cases decided before 1882, and are embodied in the codifying statute, are: (1) that in the case of such instruments a valuable may therefore be of some use to mention a few of the principal incidents attending this transfer or assignment, in order to make it regular, and thereby to charge the drawer with the payment of the debt to other persons than those with whom he originally contracted.

§ 624. (aa) Indorsement.—In the first place, then, the payee, or person to whom or whose order such bill of exchange or promissory note is payable, may by indorsement, or writing his name in dorso or on the back of it, assign over his whole property to the bearer, or else to another person by name, either of whom is then called the indorsee; and he may assign the same to another, and so on in infinitum. And a promissory note, payable to A or bearer, is negotiable without any indorsement, and payment thereof may be demanded by any bearer [469] of it.†

consideration is presumed, so that there is no necessity to state it; (2) that such instruments may be transferred from one person to another by indorsement or by delivery, so as to enable the transferee to sue thereon in his own name; (3) that the transferee who takes such an instrument in good faith and for value obtains a good title in spite of any defect of title in the transferrer." Ibid., p 461.

American Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act.—A uniform law on the subject of negotiable instruments has been adopted in nearly all the states of the American Union. Under this statute an instrument, in order to be negotiable, must be in writing and signed; must contain an unconditional promise or to pay a certain sum of money on demand at a fixed and determinable future time; must be payable to order or bearer, and where it is addressed to the drawee, he must be named or otherwise indicated with reasonable certainty. Its negotiability is not affected by the fact that it is not dated, or that it bears a seal, or that it does not specify the value given or that any value was given. It may be payable to the order of a specified person, or to him or to his order. A note payable to the maker's order is not negotiable until he indorses it. Brannan's Negotiable Instruments Law contains the uniform act annotated with references to the English Bills of Exchange Act and with the decisions under both acts. It also contains a collection of essays on the subject by James Barr Ames, Lyman D. Brewster and Charles L. McKeehan.

or particular indorsement), is to go to the drawee, and offer his bill for acceptance; which acceptance (so as to charge the drawer with costs) must be in writing, under or on the back of the bill. If the drawee accepts the bill, either verbally or in writing,<sup>v</sup> he then makes himself liable to pay it; this being now a contract on his side, grounded on an acknowledgment that the drawer has effects in his hands, or at least credit sufficient to warrant the payment. If the drawee refuses to accept the bill, and it be of the value of 20*l.* or upward, and expressed to be for value received, the payee or indorsee may protest it for nonacceptance: which protest must be made in writing, under a copy of such bill of exchange, by some notary public; or, if no such notary be resident in the place, then by any other substantial inhabitant in the presence of two credible witnesses; and notice of such protest must, within fourteen days after, be given to the drawer.

§ 626. (cc) Protest for nonpayment.—But, in case such bill be accepted by the drawee, and after acceptance he fails or refuses to pay it within three days after it becomes due (which three days are called days of grace), the payee or indorsee is then to get it protested for nonpayment, in the same manner, and by the same persons who are to protest it in case of nonacceptance, and such protest must also be notified, within fourteen days after, to the drawer. And he, on producing such protest, either of nonacceptance or nonpayment, is bound to make good to the payee, or indorsee, not only the amount of the said bills (which he is bound to do within a reasonable time after nonpayment, without any protest, by the rules of the common law<sup>x</sup>), but also interest and all charges, to be computed from the time of making such protest. But if no protest be made or notified to the drawer, and any damage accrues by such neglect, it shall fall on the holder of the bill. The bill, when refused, must be demanded of the drawer as soon as conveniently may be: for though, when one draws a bill of [470] exchange, he subjects himself to the payment, if the person on whom it is drawn refuses either to accept or pay, yet that is with this limitation, that if the bill be not paid, when due, the person to whom it is payable shall in convenient time give the drawer

notice thereof; for otherwise the law will imply it paid: since it would be prejudicial to commerce, if a bill might rise up to charge the drawer at any distance of time; when in the meantime all reckonings and accounts may be adjusted between the drawer and the drawee.†

§ 627. (dd) Liability of indorsers.—If the bill be an indorsed bill, and the indorsee cannot get the drawee to discharge it, he may call upon either the drawer or the indorser, or if the bill has been negotiated through many hands, upon any of the indorsers; for each indorser is a warrantor for the payment of the bill, which is frequently taken in payment as much (or more) upon the credit of the indorser, as of the drawer. And if such indorser, so called upon, has the names of one or more indorsers prior to his own, to each of whom he is properly an indorsee, he is also at liberty to call upon any of them to make him satisfaction; and so upward. But the first indorser has nobody to resort to but the drawer only.

What has been said of bills of exchange is applicable also to promissory notes, that are indorsed over, and negotiated from one hand to another: only that, in this case, as there is no drawee, there can be no protest for nonacceptance; or rather, the law considers a promissory note in the light of a bill drawn by a man upon himself, and accepted at the time of drawing. And, in case of non-payment by the drawer, the several indorsees of a promissory note have the same remedy, as upon bills of exchange, against the prior indorsers.

OF TITLE BY BANKRUPTCY.

The preceding chapter having treated pretty largely of the acquisition of personal property by several commercial methods, we from thence shall be easily led to take into our present consideration a tenth method of transferring property, which is that of § 628. X. Title by bankruptcy.—Bankruptcy; a title which we before lightly touched upon,<sup>a</sup> so far as it related to the transfer of the real estate of the bankrupt. At present we are to treat of it more minutely, as it principally relates to the disposition of chattels, in which the property of persons concerned in trade more usually consists, than in lands or tenements. Let us therefore first of all consider, 1. Who may become a bankrupt: 2. What acts make a bankrupt: 3. The proceedings on a commission of bankrupt: and 4. In what manner an estate in goods and chattels may be transferred by bankruptcy.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Recent English and American bankrupt laws.—The law of bankruptcy at present in force in England is enacted by the Bankruptcy Acts of 1883 and 1890, which form substantially a complete code of the existing law. All preceding bankruptcy acts have been formally repealed by parliament, but the repeals of successive bankruptcy acts have always been subject to an exception in favor of proceedings which were instituted and pending under the act repealed. See 2 Halsbury, Laws of England, 1 ff; 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 257 ff.

In the United States, the federal constitution (art. 1. § 8) authorizes Congress to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies. At any time when there is no law of Congress in force, state insolvent laws are operative. Congress has passed four bankrupt laws, in 1800, 1841, 1867, and 1898. The first three were repealed after short intervals. The bankruptcy act of 1898 extends to corporations of various kinds, and even to limited or other partnership associations whose capital alone is responsible for their debts. It provides that proceedings may be instituted either by the insolvent or by his creditors. In other words, it establishes voluntary as well as involuntary bankruptcy. The purpose of the statute is to provide a system of bankruptcy, the objects thereof being, "first, to ascertain whether the person whose affairs are drawn in question has become a bankrupt; second, if so, to take into legal custody all his property

§ 629. 1. Who may become a bankrupt.—Who may become a bankrupt. A bankrupt was before<sup>b</sup> defined to be “a trader, who secretes himself, or does certain other acts, tending to defraud his creditors.” He was formerly considered merely in the light of a criminal or offender;<sup>c</sup> and in this spirit we are told by Sir Edward Coke,<sup>d</sup> that we have fetched as well the name, as the wickedness, [472] of bankrupts from foreign nations.<sup>e</sup> But at present the laws of bankruptcy are considered as laws calculated for the

In short, the acts seek to enable every honest debtor, irrespective of whether he becomes bankrupt upon his own or the petition of his creditors, to have fair treatment and a speedy consideration of his rights; and that the creditors shall have their claims considered, allowed, and the assets of the debtor ratably divided.” Loveland, 1 Bankruptcy, 14. The administration of the law is confided to particular United States courts, designated courts of bankruptcy. These courts are, under the act of 1898, the district courts of the United States in the several states, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the district courts of the several territories, and the United States courts in the Indian Territory and the District of Alaska. No other courts, federal or state, have any jurisdiction in bankruptcy. The courts of bankruptcy act to a large extent through special officers, called referees and trustees, subject to having their action reviewed by the judge. The decisions of the courts of bankruptcy are subject within limits to review by the appellate courts of the United States.

The bankrupt law, as amended in 1903, enumerates five acts of bankruptcy relating to the disposition of the debtor's property and to his circumstances and benefit of trade, and founded on the principles of humanity as well as justice; and to that end they confer some privileges, not only on the creditors, but also on the bankrupt or debtor himself. On the creditors; by compelling the bankrupt to give up all his effects to their use, without any fraudulent concealment: on the debtor; by exempting him from the rigor of the general law, whereby his person might be confined at the discretion of his creditor, though in reality he has nothing to satisfy the debt: whereas the law of credit. No other acts than those specified will support an adjudication of bankruptcy. In re Empire Metallic Bedstead Co., 98 Fed. 981, 39 C. C. A. 372. The acts of bankruptcy under the statute, which may be committed by a debtor, consist of his having (1) conveyed, transferred, concealed or removed, or permitted to be concealed or removed, any part of his property with intent to hinder, delay or defraud his creditors, or any of them; or (2) transferred, while insolvent, any portion of his property to one or more of his creditors with intent to prefer such creditors over his other creditors; or (3) suffered or permitted, while insolvent, any creditor to obtain a preference through legal proceedings, and not having at least five days before a sale or final disposition of any property affected by such preference vacated or discharged such preference; or (4) made a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors, or, being insolvent, applied for a receiver or trustee for his property or because of insolvency a receiver or trustee has been put in charge of his property under the laws of a state, of a territory, or of the United States; or (5) admitted in writing his inability to pay his debts and his willingness to be adjudged a bankrupt on that ground.

The privileges of voluntary bankruptcy are conferred by the provision of the bankrupt act, as amended in 1910, as follows: "Any person, except a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act as a voluntary bankrupt."

Those who may be adjudged involuntary bankrupts are set forth in the following provision as amended in 1910: "Any natural person, except a wage-earner or a person engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil, any unincorporated company, and any moneyed, business or commercial corporation except a municipal, railroad, insurance or banking corporation, owing debts to the amount of one thousand dollars or over, may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial, and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this act. "The bankruptcy of a corporation shall not release its officers, directors or stockholders, as such, from any liability under the laws of a state or territory or of the United States."

A discharge in bankruptcy releases a bankrupt from all of his provable debts, except such as (1) are due as a tax levied by the United States, the state, county, district or municipality, in which he resides; (2) are liabilities for obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations, or for willful bankrupts: taking into consideration the sudden and unavoidable accidents to which men in trade are liable, has given them the liberty of their persons, and some pecuniary emoluments, upon condition they surrender up their whole estate to be divided among their creditors.

§ 630. a. Roman law.—In this respect our legislature seems to have attended to the example of the Roman law. I mean not the terrible law of the twelve tables; whereby the creditors might cut the debtor's body into pieces, and each of them take his proportionable share: if indeed that law, de debitore in partes secundo (of cutting the debtor into pieces), is to be understood in so very butcherly a light; which many learned men have with reason doubted.<sup>f</sup> Nor do I mean those less inhuman laws (if they may be called so, as their meaning is indisputably certain) of imprisoning the debtor's person in chains; subjecting him to stripes and hard labor, at the mercy of his rigid creditor; and sometimes selling him, his wife, and children, to perpetual foreign slavery trans Tiberim (beyond the Tiber):<sup>g</sup> an oppression, which produced so many [473] popular insurrections, and secessions to the mons sacer (the sacred mount). But I mean the law of cession, introduced by the Christian emperors; whereby, if a debtor ceded, or yielded

<sup>g</sup> In Pegu, and the adjacent countries in East India, the creditor is entitled to dispose of the debtor himself, and likewise of his wife and children; inso-much that he may even violate with impunity the chastity of the debtor's wife: but then, by so doing, the debt is understood to be discharged. (Mod. Un. Hist. vii. 128.)

and malicious injuries to the person or property of another, or for alimony due or to become due, or for maintenance or support of wife or child, or for seduction of an unmarried female, or for criminal conversation; (3) have not been duly scheduled in time for proof and allowance, with the name of the creditor if known to the bankrupt, unless such creditor had notice or actual knowledge of the proceedings in bankruptcy; or (4) were created by his fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity. up all his fortune to his creditors, he was secured from being dragged to a jail, "omni quoque corporali cruciatu semoto (all bodily torture being also removed)." <sup>h</sup> For, as the emperor justly observes, <sup>i</sup> "inhumanum erat spoliatum fortunis suis in solidum damnari (it was inhuman, being deprived of all his fortune, to be utterly ruined)." Thus far was just and reasonable: but, as the departing from one extreme is apt to produce its opposite, we find it afterwards enacted, <sup>k</sup> that if the debtor by any unforeseen accident was reduced to low circumstances, and would swear that he had not sufficient left to pay his debts, he should not be compelled to cede or give up even that which he had in his possession: a law, which under a false notion of humanity, seems to be fertile of perjury, injustice, and absurdity.

§ 631. b. Only traders within the law in England.—The laws of England, more wisely, have steered in the middle between both extremes; providing at once against the inhumanity of the creditor, who is not suffered to confine an honest bankrupt after his effects are delivered up; and at the same time taking care that all his just debts shall be paid, so far as the effects will extend. But still they are cautious of encouraging prodigality and extravagance by this indulgence to debtors; and therefore they allow the benefit of the laws of bankruptcy to none but actual traders; since that set of men are, generally speaking, the only persons liable to accidental losses, and to an inability of paying their debts, without any fault of their own. If persons in other situations of life run in debt without the power of payment, they must take the consequences of their own indiscretion, even though they meet with sudden accidents that may reduce their fortunes: for the law holds it to be an unjustifiable practice, for any person but a trader to encumber himself with debts of any considerable value. If a gentleman, or <sup>[474]</sup> one in a liberal profession, at the time of contracting his debts, has a sufficient fund to pay them, the delay of payment is a species of dishonesty, and a temporary injustice to his creditor: and if, at such time, he has no sufficient fund, the dishonesty and injustice is the greater. He cannot therefore murmur, if he suffers the punishment which he has voluntarily drawn upon himself. But in mercantile transactions the case is far otherwise. Trade cannot be carried on without mutual credit on both sides: the contracting of debts is therefore here not only justifiable, but necessary. And if by accidental calamities, as by the loss of a ship in a tempest, the failure of brother traders, or by the nonpayment of persons out of trade, a merchant or trader becomes incapable of discharging his own debts, it is his misfortune and not his fault. To the misfortunes, therefore, of debtors, the law has given a compassionate remedy, but denied it to their faults: since, at the same time that it provides for the security of commerce, by enacting that every considerable trader may be declared a bankrupt, for the benefit of his creditors as well as himself, it has also to discourage extravagance declared, that no one shall be capable of being made a bankrupt, but only a trader; nor capable of receiving the full benefit of the statutes, but only an industrious trader.

§ 632. c. First bankrupt acts, 1542, 1571, and 1623.—The first statute made concerning any English bankrupts, was 34 Hen. VIII, c. 4 (Bankruptcy, 1542), when trade began first to be properly cultivated in England: which has been almost totally altered by statute 13 Eliz., c. 7 (Bankrupts, 1571), whereby bankruptcy is confined to such persons only as have used the trade of merchandise, in gross or by retail, by way of bargaining, exchange, re-change, bartering, chevisance,<sup>1</sup> or otherwise; or have sought their living by buying and selling. And by statute 21 Jac. I, c. 19 (Bankrupts, 1623), persons using the trade and profession of a scrivener, receiving other men's moneys and estates into their trust and custody, are also made liable to the statutes of bankruptcy: and the benefits, as well as the penal parts of the law, are extended [<sup>475</sup>] as well to aliens and denizens as to natural-born subjects; being intended entirely for the protection of trade, in which aliens are often as deeply concerned as natives.

ers, brokers, and factors, are declared liable to the statutes of bankruptcy; and this upon the same reason that scriveners are included by the statute of James I, viz., for the relief of their creditors; whom they have otherwise more opportunities of defrauding than any other set of dealers: and they are properly to be looked upon as traders, since they maké merchandise of money, in the same manner as other merchants do of goods and other movable chattels. But by the same act,<sup>a</sup> no farmer, grazier, or drover, shall (as such) be liable to be deemed a bankrupt: for though they buy and sell corn, and hay, and beasts, in the course of husbandry, yet trade is not their principal, but only a collateral, object; their chief concern being to manure and till the ground, and make the best advantage of its produce. And, besides, the subjecting them to the laws of bankruptcy might be a means of defeating their landlords of the security which the law has given them above all others, for the payment of their reserved rents: wherefore, also, upon a similar reason, a receiver of the king's taxes is not capable,<sup>o</sup> as such, of being a bankrupt; lest the king should be defeated of those extensive remedies against his debtors, which are put into his hands by the prerogative. By the same statute,<sup>p</sup> no person shall have a commission of bankrupt awarded against him, unless at the petition of some one creditor, to whom he owes 100*l.*; or of two, to whom he is indebted 150*l.*; or of more, to whom all together he is indebted 200*l.* For the law does not look upon persons, whose debts amount to less, to be traders considerable enough, either to enjoy the benefit of the statutes, themselves, or to entitle the creditors, for the benefit of public commerce, to demand the distribution of their effects.

§ 634. e. What constitutes trading.—<sup>[476]</sup> In the interpretation of these several statutes it hath been held, that buying only, or selling only, will not qualify a man to be a bankrupt; but it must be both buying and selling, and also getting a livelihood by it. As, by exercising the calling of a merchant, a grocer, a mercer, or, in one general word, a chapman, who is one that buys and sells anything. But no handicraft occupation (where nothing is bought and sold, and therefore an extensive credit, for the stock in trade, is not necessary to be had) will make a man a regular bankrupt: as that of a husbandman, a gardener, and the like, who are paid for their work and labor.<sup>q</sup> Also an innkeeper cannot, as such, be a bankrupt: for his gain or livelihood does not arise from buying and selling in the way of merchandise, but greatly from the use of his rooms and furniture, his attendance, and the like: and though he may buy corn and victuals, to sell again at a profit, yet that no more makes him a trader, than a schoolmaster or other person is, that keeps a boarding-house, and makes considerable gains by buying and selling what he spends in the house, and such a one is clearly not within the statutes.<sup>r</sup> But where persons buy goods, and make them up into salable commodities, as shoemakers, smiths, and the like; here, though part of the gain is by bodily labor, and not by buying and selling, yet they are within the statutes of bankrupts; for the labor is only in melioration of the commodity, and rendering it more fit for sale.

One single act of buying and selling will not make a man a trader; but a repeated practice, and profit by it. Buying and selling bank stock, or other government securities, will not make a man a bankrupt; they not being goods, wares, or merchandise, within the intent of the statute, by which a profit may be fairly made.<sup>s</sup> Neither will buying and selling under particular restraints, or for particular purposes; as if [477] a commissioner of the navy uses to buy victuals for the fleet, and dispose of the surplus and refuse, he is not thereby made a trader within the statutes.<sup>t</sup> An infant, though a trader, cannot be made a bankrupt: for an infant can owe nothing but for necessaries; and the statutes of bankruptcy create no new debts, but only give a speedier and more effectual remedy for recovering such as were before due: and no person can be made a bankrupt for debts, which he is not liable at law to pay.<sup>u</sup> But a feme covert in London, being a sole trader according to the custom, is liable to a commission of bankrupt.<sup>v</sup>

§ 635. 2. What are acts of bankruptcy.—Having thus considered, who may, and who may not be made a bankrupt, we are to inquire, secondly, by what acts a man may become a bankrupt. A bankrupt is “a trader, who secretes himself, or does certain other acts, tending to defraud his creditors.” We have hitherto been employed in explaining the former part of this description, “a trader”; let us now attend to the latter, “who secretes himself, or does certain other acts, tending to defraud his creditors.” And, in general, whenever such a trader, as is before described, hath endeavored to avoid his creditors, or evade their just demands, this hath been declared by the legislature to be an act of bankruptcy, upon which a commission may be sued out. For in this extrajudicial method of proceeding, which is allowed merely for the benefit of commerce, the law is extremely watchful to detect a man, whose circumstances are declining, in the first instance, or at least as early as possible: that the creditors may receive as large a proportion of their debts as may be; and that a man may not go on wantonly wasting his substance, and then claim the benefit of the statutes, when he has nothing left to distribute.

To learn what the particular acts of bankruptcy are, which render a man a bankrupt, we must consult the several statutes, and the resolutions formed by the courts thereon. [478] Among these may therefore be reckoned, 1. Departing from the realm, whereby a man withdraws himself from the jurisdiction and coercion of the law, with intent to defraud his creditors.<sup>a</sup> 2. Departing from his own house, with intent to secrete himself, and avoid his creditors.<sup>a</sup> 3. Keeping in his own house, privately, so as not to be seen or spoken with by his creditors, except for just and necessary cause; which is likewise construed to be an intention to defraud his creditors, by avoiding the process of the law.<sup>b</sup> 4. Procuring or suffering himself willingly to be arrested, or outlawed, or imprisoned, without just and lawful cause; which is likewise deemed an attempt to defraud his creditors.<sup>c</sup> 5. Procuring his money, goods, chattels, and effects to be attached or sequestered by any legal process; which is another plain and direct endeavor to disappoint his creditors of their security.<sup>d</sup> 6. Making any fraudulent conveyance to a friend, or secret trustee, of his lands, tenements, goods, or chattels; which is an act of the same suspicious nature with the last.<sup>e</sup> 7. Procuring any protection, not being himself privileged by parliament, in order to screen his person from arrests; which also is an endeavor to elude the justice of the law.<sup>f</sup> 8. Endeavoring or desiring, by any petition to the king, or bill exhibited in any of the king's courts against any creditors, to compel them to take less than their just debts; or to procrastinate the time of payment, originally contracted for; which are an acknowledgment of either his poverty or his knavery.<sup>g</sup> 9. Lying in prison for two months, or more, upon arrest or other detention for debt, without finding bail, in order to obtain his liberty.<sup>h</sup> For the inability to procure bail argues a strong deficiency in his credit, owing either to his suspected poverty or ill character; and his neglect to do it, if able, can arise only from a fraudulent intention: in either of which cases it is high time for his creditors to look to themselves, [479] and compel a distribution of his effects. 10. Escaping from prison after an arrest for a just debt of 100*l.* or upwards.<sup>i</sup> For no man would break prison that was able and desirous to procure bail; which brings it within the reason of the last case. 11. Neglecting to make satisfaction for any just debt to the amount of 100*l.* within two months after service of legal process, for such debts, upon any trader having privilege of parliament.<sup>k</sup>

§ 636. a. Construction of statutes.—These are the several acts of bankruptcy, expressly defined by the statutes relating to this title: which being so numerous, and the whole law of bankrupts being an innovation on the common law, our courts of justice have been tender of extending or multiplying acts of bankruptcy by any construction, or implication. And therefore Sir John Holt held,<sup>1</sup> that a man's removing his goods privately to prevent their being seized in execution, was no act of bankruptcy. For the statutes mention only fraudulent gifts to third persons, and procuring them to be seized by sham process, in order to defraud creditors: but this, though a palpable fraud, yet falling within neither of those cases, cannot be adjudged an act of bankruptcy. So, also, it has been determined expressly, that a banker's stopping or refusing payment is no act of bankruptcy; for it is not within the description of any of the statutes, and there may be good reasons for his so doing, as suspicion of forgery, and the like: and if, in consequence of such refusal, he is arrested, and puts in bail, still it is no act of bankruptcy:<sup>m</sup> but if he goes to prison, and lies there two months, then, and not before, is he become a bankrupt.

We have seen who may be a bankrupt, and what acts will make him so: let us next consider, § 637. 3. Proceedings in bankruptcy.—The proceedings on a commission of bankrupt; so far as they affect the bankrupt himself. And these depend entirely [<sup>480</sup>] on the several statutes of bankruptcy;<sup>n</sup> all which I shall endeavor to blend together, and digest into a concise methodical order.

§ 638. a. Petition by creditor.—And, first, there must be a petition to the lord chancellor by one creditor to the amount of 100*l.*, or by two to the amount of 150*l.*, or by three or more to the amount of 200*l.*; upon which he grants a commission to such discreet persons as to him shall seem good, who are then styled commissioners of bankrupt. The petitioners, to prevent malicious applications, must be bound in a security of 200*l.* to make the party amends in case they do not prove him a bankrupt. And if, on the other hand, they receive any money or effects from the bankrupt, as a recompense for suing out the commission, so as to receive more than their ratable dividends of the bankrupt's estate, they forfeit not only what they shall have so received, but their whole debt. These provisions are made, as well to secure persons in good credit from being damnified by malicious petitions, as to prevent knavish combinations between the creditors and bankrupt, in order to obtain the benefit of a commission. When the commission is awarded and issued, the commissioners are to meet, at their own expense, and to take an oath for the due execution of their commission, and to be allowed a sum not exceeding 20s. per diem each, at every sitting. And no commission of bankrupt shall abate, or be void, upon any demise of the crown.

§ 639. b. Proof; finding; notice; surrender.—When the commissioners have received their commission, they are first to receive proof of the person's being a trader, and having committed some act of bankruptcy; and then to declare him a bankrupt, if proved so; and to give notice thereof in the Gazette, and at the same time to appoint three meetings. At one of these meetings an election must be made of assignees, or persons to whom the bankrupt's estate shall be assigned, and in whom it shall be vested for the benefit of the creditors; which assignees are to be chosen by the major <sup>[481]</sup> part, in value, of the creditors who shall then have proved their debts; but may be originally appointed by the commissioners, and afterwards approved or rejected by the creditors: but no creditor shall be admitted to vote in the choice of assignees, whose debt on the balance of accounts does not amount to 10*l*. And at the third meeting, at farthest, which must be on the forty-second day after the advertisement in the Gazette, the bankrupt, upon notice also personally served upon him or left at his usual place of abode, must surrender himself personally to the commissioners, and must thenceforth in all respects conform to the directions of the statutes of bankruptcy; or, in default thereof, shall be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy, and shall suffer death, and his goods and estate shall be distributed among his creditors.

§ 640. c. Arrest of bankrupt.—In case the bankrupt absconds, or is likely to run away, between the time of the commission issued, and the last day of surrender, he may by warrant from any judge or justice of the peace be apprehended and committed to the county jail, in order to be forthcoming to the commissioners; who are also empowered immediately to grant a warrant for seizing his goods and papers.

§ 641. d. Examination of bankrupt.—When the bankrupt appears, the commissioners are to examine him touching all matters relating to his trade and effects. They may also summon before them, and examine, the bankrupt's wife and any other person whatsoever, as to all matters relating to the bankrupt's affairs. And in case any of them shall refuse to answer, or shall not answer fully, to any lawful question, or shall refuse to subscribe such their examination, the commissioners may commit them to prison without bail, till they make and sign a full answer; the commissioners specifying in their warrant of commitment the question so refused to be answered. And any jailer, permitting such person to escape, or go out of prison, shall forfeit 500*l.* to the creditors.

[482] The bankrupt, upon this examination, is bound upon pain of death to make a full discovery of all his estate and effects, as well in expectancy as possession, and how he has disposed of the same; together with all books and writings relating thereto; and is to deliver up all in his own power to the commissioners (except the necessary apparel of himself, his wife, and his children); or, in case he conceals or embezzles any effects to the amount of 20*l.*, or withholds any books or writings with intent to defraud his creditors, he shall be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy.<sup>o</sup>

After the time allowed to the bankrupt for such discovery is expired, any other person voluntarily discovering any part of his estate, before unknown to the assignees, shall be entitled to five per cent out of the effects so discovered, and such further reward as the assignees and commissioners shall think proper. And any trustee willfully concealing the estate of any bankrupt, after the expiration of the two and forty days, shall forfeit 100*l.* and double the value of the estate concealed, to the creditors.*

§ 642. e. Certificate of conformity.—Hitherto everything is in favor of the creditors; and the law seems to be pretty rigid and severe against the bankrupt; but in case he proves honest, it makes him full amends for all this rigor and severity. For if the bankrupt hath made an ingenuous discovery, hath conformed to the directions of the law, and hath acted in all points to the satisfaction of his creditors; and if they or four parts in five of them in number and value (but none of them creditors for less than 20*l.*), will sign a certificate to that purport; the commissioners are then to authenticate such certificate under their hands and seals, and to transmit it to the lord chancellor: and he, or two judges whom he shall appoint, on oath [482] made by the bankrupt that such certificate was obtained without fraud, may allow the same; or disallow it, upon cause shown by any of the creditors of the bankrupt.

§ 643. f. Allowance to bankrupt.—If no cause be shown to the contrary, the certificate is allowed of course; and then the bankrupt is entitled to a decent and reasonable allowance out of his effects, for his future support and maintenance, and to put him in a way of honest industry. This allowance is also in proportion to his former good behavior, in the early discovery of the decline of his affairs, and thereby giving his creditors a larger dividend. For, if his effects will not pay one-half of his debts, or ten shillings in the pound, he is left to the discretion of the commissioners and assignees, to have a competent sum allowed him, not exceeding three per cent; but if they pay ten shillings in the pound, he is to be allowed five per cent; if twelve shillings and six-pence, then seven and a half per cent; and if fifteen shillings in the pound, then the bankrupt shall be allowed ten per cent: provided, that such

§ 644. g. Discharge of debts.—Besides this allowance, he has also an indemnity granted him, of being free and discharged forever from all debts owing by him at the time he became a bankrupt; even though judgment shall have been obtained against him, and he lies in prison upon execution for such debts; and, for that among other purposes, all proceedings on commission of bankrupt are, on petition, to be entered of record, as a perpetual bar against actions to be commenced on this account: though, in general, the production of the certificate properly allowed shall be sufficient evidence of all previous proceedings. Thus [484] the bankrupt becomes a clear man again; and, by the assistance of his allowance and his own industry, may become a useful member of the commonwealth: which is the rather to be expected, as he cannot be entitled to these benefits, but by the testimony of his creditors themselves of his honest and ingenuous disposition; and unless his failures have been owing to misfortunes, rather than to misconduct and extravagance.

§ 645. h. Conditions of allowance and discharge.—For no allowance or indemnity shall be given to a bankrupt, unless his certificate be signed and allowed, as before mentioned; and also, if any creditor produces a fictitious debt, and the bankrupt does not make discovery of it, but suffers the fair creditors to be imposed upon, he loses all title to these advantages. Neither can he claim them, if he has given with any of his children above 100*l.* for a marriage portion, unless he had at that time sufficient left to pay all his debts; or if he has lost at any one time 5*l.*, or in the whole 100*l.*, within a twelvemonth before he became bankrupt, by any manner of gaming or wagering whatsoever; or, within the same time has lost to the value of 100*l.* by stock-jobbing. Also to prevent the too common practice of frequent and fraudulent or careless breaking, a mark is set upon such as have been once cleared by a commission of bankrupt, or have compounded with their creditors, or have been delivered by an act of insolvency: which is an occasional act, frequently passed<sup>a</sup> by the legislature; whereby all persons whatsoever, who are either in too low a way of dealing to become bankrupts, or not being in a mercantile state of life are not included within the laws of bankruptcy, are discharged from all suits and imprisonment, upon delivering up all their estate and effects to their creditors upon oath, at the sessions or assizes; in which case their perjury or fraud is usually, as in case of bankrupts, punished with death. Persons who have been once cleared by this, or either of the other methods (of composition with their creditors, or bankruptcy), and afterwards become bankrupts again, unless they pay full [485] fifteen shillings in the pound, are only thereby indemnified as to the confinement of their bodies; but any future estate they shall acquire remains liable to their creditors, excepting their necessary apparel, household goods, and the tools and implements of their trades.

» By the Roman law of cession, if the debtor acquired any considerable property subsequent to the giving up of his all, it was liable to the demands of his creditors. (Ff. 42. 3. 4.) But this did not extend to such allowance as was left to him on the score of compassion for the maintenance of himself and family. Si quid misericordie causa ei fuerit relictum, puta menstruum vel annuum, alimentorum nomine, non oportet propter hoc bona ejus iterato vendari: nec enim fraudandus est alimentis cottidianis. (If anything shall have been left him through compassion, suppose monthly or yearly, as a maintenance, he is not obliged on this account again to sell his goods; for he is not to be deprived of his daily subsistence.) (Ibid. l. 6.)

Thus much for the proceedings on a commission of bankrupt, so far as they affect the bankrupt himself personally. Let us next consider, § 646. 4. Effect of bankruptcy on property.—How such proceedings affect or transfer the estate and property of the bankrupt. The method whereby a real estate, in lands, tenements, and hereditaments, may be transferred by bankruptcy, was shown under its proper head in a former chapter.<sup>r</sup> At present, therefore, we are only to consider the transfer of things personal by this operation of law.

By virtue of the statutes before mentioned all the personal estate and effects of the bankrupt are considered as vested, by the act of bankruptcy, in the future assignees of his commissioners, whether they be goods in actual possession, or debts, contracts, and other choses in action; and the commissioners by their warrant may cause any house or tenement of the bankrupt to be broken open, in order to enter upon and seize the same. And when the assignees are chosen or approved by the creditors, the commissioners are to assign everything over to them; and the property of every part of the estate is thereby as fully vested in them, as it was in the bankrupt himself, and they have the same remedies to recover it.<sup>a</sup>

§ 647. a. Assignee's title.—The property vested in the assignees is the whole that the bankrupt had in himself, at the time he committed the first act of bankruptcy, or that has been vested in him since, before his debts are satisfied or agreed for. Therefore, it is usually said, that once a bankrupt, and always a bankrupt: by which is meant, that a plain direct act of bankruptcy once [486] committed cannot be purged, or explained away, by any subsequent conduct, as a dubious equivocal act may be;† but that, if a commission is afterwards awarded, the commission and the property of the assignees shall have a relation, or reference, back to the first and original act of bankruptcy.‡ Insomuch that all transactions of the bankrupt are from that time absolutely null and void, either with regard to the alienation of his property, or the receipt of his debts from such as are privy to his bankruptcy; for they are no longer his property, or his debts, but those of the future assignees. And, if an execution be sued out, but not served and executed on the bankrupt's effects till after the act of bankruptcy, it is void as against the assignees. But the king is not bound by this fictitious relation, nor is within the statutes of bankrupts;‡ for if, after the act of bankruptcy committed and before the assignment of his effects, an extent issues for the debt of the crown, the goods are bound thereby.‡ In France this doctrine of relation is carried to a very great length; for there every act of a merchant, for ten days precedent to the act of bankruptcy, is presumed to be fraudulent, and is therefore void.<sup>7</sup> But with us the law stands upon a more reasonable footing: for, as these acts of bankruptcy may sometimes be secret to all but a few, and it would be prejudicial to trade to carry this notion to its utmost length, it is provided by statute 19 Geo. II, c. 32 (Bankrupts, 1745), that no money paid by a bankrupt to a bona fide or real creditor, in a course of trade, even after an act of bankruptcy done, shall be liable to be refunded. Nor, by statute 1 Jac. I, c. 15 (Bankrupts, 1603), shall any debtor of a bankrupt, that pays him his debt, without knowing of his bankruptcy, be liable to account for it again. The intention of this relative power being only to reach fraudulent transactions, and not to distress the fair trader.

The assignees may pursue any legal method of recovering this property so vested in them, by their own authority; but [487] cannot commence a suit in equity, nor compound any debts owing to the bankrupt, nor refer any matters to arbitration, without the consent of the creditors, or the major part of them in value, at a meeting to be held in pursuance of notice in the Gazette.

§ 648. b. Distribution of assets.—When they have got in all the effects they can reasonably hope for, and reduced them to ready money, the assignees must, within twelve months after the commission issued, give one and twenty days' notice to the creditors of a meeting for a dividend or distribution; at which time they must produce their accounts, and verify them upon oath, if required. And then the commissioners shall direct a dividend to be made, at so much in the pound, to all creditors who have before proved, or shall then prove, their debts. This dividend must be made equally, and in a ratable proportion, to all the creditors, according to the quantity of their debts; no regard being had to the quality of them. Mortgages indeed, for which the creditor has a real security in his own hands, are entirely safe; for the commission of bankrupt reaches only the equity of redemption.<sup>a</sup> So are also personal debts, where the creditor has a chattel in his hands, as a pledge or pawn for the payment, or has taken the debtor's lands or goods in execution. And upon the equity of the statute 8 Ann., c. 14 (Distress; Execution; Landlord and Tenant, 1709), (which directs that, upon all executions of goods being on any premises demised to a tenant, one year's rent and no more shall, if due, be paid to the landlord), it hath also been held, that under a commission of bankrupt, which is in the nature of a statute execution, the landlord shall be allowed his arrears of rent to the same amount, in preference to other creditors, even though he hath neglected to distrain, while the goods remained on the premises: which he is otherwise entitled to do for his entire rent, be the quantum what it may.<sup>a</sup> But, otherwise, judgments and recognizances (both which are debts of record, and therefore at other times have a priority) and also bonds and obligations by deed or special instrument (which are called debts by specialty, and are usually the next [488] in order), these are all put on a level with debts by mere simple contract, and all paid pari passu (in an equal degree). Nay, so far is this matter carried, that, by the express provision of the statutes, debts not due at the time of the dividend made, as bonds or notes of hand payable at a future day certain, shall be proved and paid equally with the rest,<sup>b</sup> allowing a discount or drawback in proportion. And insurances, and obligations upon bottomry or respondentia, bona fide made by the bankrupt, though forfeited after the commission is awarded, shall be looked upon in the same light as debts contracted before any act of bankruptcy.*

Within eighteen months after the commission issued, a second and final dividend shall be made, unless all the effects were exhausted by the first.** And if any surplus remains, after paying every creditor his full debt, it shall be restored to the bankrupt.† This is a case which sometimes happens to men in trade, who involuntarily, or at least unwarily, commit acts of bankruptcy, by absconding and the like, while their effects are more than sufficient to pay their creditors. And, if any suspicious or malevolent creditor will take the advantage of such acts, and sue out a commission, the bankrupt has no remedy, but must quietly submit to the effects of his own imprudence; except that, upon satisfaction made to all the creditors, the commission may be superseded.<sup>c</sup> This case may also happen, when a knave is desirous of defrauding his creditors, and is compelled by a commission to do them that justice which otherwise he wanted to evade. And therefore, though the usual rule is, that all interest on debts carrying interest shall cease from the time of issuing the commission, yet, in case of a surplus left after payment of every debt, such interest shall again revive, and be chargeable on the bankrupt,<sup>d</sup> or his representatives.

[489] CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SECOND.

OF TITLE BY TESTAMENT, AND ADMINISTRATION.

§ 649. XI, XII. Wills and administration.—There yet remain to be examined, in the present chapter, two other methods of acquiring personal estates, viz., by testament and administration. And these I propose to consider in one and the same view; they being in their nature so connected and blended together, as makes it impossible to treat of them distinctly, without manifest tautology and repetition.

In the pursuit, then, of this joint subject, I shall, first, inquire into the original and antiquity of testaments and administrations; shall, secondly, show who is capable of making a last will and testament; shall, thirdly, consider the nature of a testament and its incidents: shall, fourthly, show what an executor and administrator are, and how they are to be appointed; and lastly, shall select some few of the general heads of the office and duty of executors and administrators.

§ 650. 1. Origin and history of wills and administrations.—First, as to the original of testaments and administrations. We have more than once observed, that when property came to be vested in individuals by the right of occupancy, it became necessary for the peace of society, that this occupancy should be continued, not only in the present possessor, but in those persons to whom he should think proper to transfer it; which introduced the doctrine and practice of alienations, [490] gifts, and contracts. But these precautions would be very short and imperfect, if they were confined to the life only of the occupier; for then upon his death all his goods would again become common, and create an infinite variety of strife and confusion. The law of very many societies has therefore given to the proprietor a right of continuing his property after his death, in such persons as he shall name; and, in defect of such appointment or nomination, or where no nomination is permitted, the law of every society has directed the goods to be vested in certain particular individuals, exclusive of all other persons.<sup>a</sup> The former method of acquiring personal property, according to the express directions of the deceased, we call a testament: the latter, which is also according to the will of the deceased, not expressed, indeed, but presumed by the law,<sup>b</sup> we call in England an administration; being the same which the civil lawyers term a succession ab intestato (from an intestate), and which answers to the descent or inheritance of real estates.

§ 651. a. Antiquity of wills.—Testaments are of very high antiquity.<sup>1</sup> We find them in use among the ancient Hebrews; though I hardly think the example usually given,<sup>c</sup> of Abraham's complaining<sup>d</sup> that, unless he had some children of his body, his steward Eliezer of Damascus would be his heir, is quite conclusive to show that he had made him so by will. And indeed a learned writer<sup>e</sup> has adduced this very passage to prove, that in the patriarchal age, on failure of children or kindred, the servants born under their master's roof succeeded to the inheritance as heirs at law.<sup>f</sup> But (to omit what Eusebius and others have related of Noah's testament, made in writing and witnessed under his seal, whereby he disposed of the whole world<sup>g</sup>), I apprehend that a much more authentic instance of the early use of testaments may be found in the sacred writings,<sup>h</sup> wherein Jacob bequeaths to his son Joseph a portion of his inheritance [491] double to that of his brethren: which will we find carried into execution many hundred years afterwards, when the posterity of Joseph were divided into two distinct tribes, those of Ephraim and Manasseh, and had two several inheritances assigned them; whereas the descendants of each of the other patriarchs formed only one single tribe, and had only one lot of inheritance. Solon was the first legislator that introduced wills into Athens;<sup>1</sup> but in many other parts of Greece they were totally discountenanced.<sup>k</sup> In Rome they were unknown, till the laws of the twelve tables were compiled, which first gave the right of bequeathing;<sup>l</sup> and, among the northern nations, particularly among the Germans,<sup>m</sup> testaments were not received into use. And this variety may serve to evince, that the right of making wills, and disposing of property after death, is merely a creature of the civil state;<sup>n</sup> which has permitted it in some countries, and denied it in others: and, even where it is permitted by law, it is subjected to different formalities and restrictions in almost every nation under Heaven.<sup>o</sup>

§ 652. b. Testamentary power in England.—With us in England this power of bequeathing is coeval with the first rudiments of the law: for we have no traces or memorials of any time when it did not exist. Mention is made of intestacy, in the old law before the Conquest, as being merely accidental; and the distribution of the intestate's estate, after payment of the lord's heriot, is then directed to go according to the established law. "Sive quis incuria, sive morte repentina, fuerit intestatus mortuus, dominus tamen nullum rerum suarum partem (præter eam quæ jure debetur hereditati nomine) sibi assumito. Verum possessionis uxori, liberis, et cognatione proximis, pro suo cuique jure, distribuuntur (If anyone through negligence or sudden death die intestate, let not the lord take any part of his effects, except what is due to him of right as a heriot. But let his possessions be distributed among his wife, children, and next of kin, to everyone according to their right)."<sup>p</sup> But we are not to imagine that the power of bequeathing extended originally to all a man's personal estate.<sup>2</sup> On the contrary, Glan-

vill will inform us,<sup>c</sup> that by the common law, [492] as it stood in the reign of Henry the Second, a man's goods were to be divided into three equal parts; of which one went to his heirs or lineal descendants, another to his wife, and the third was at his own disposal: or, if he died without a wife, he might then dispose of one moiety, and the other went to his children; and so e converso, if he had no children, the wife was entitled to one moiety, and he might bequeath the other: but, if he died without either wife or issue, the whole was at his own disposal.<sup>r 3</sup> The shares of the wife and children were called their reasonable parts; and the writ de rationabili parte bonorum (of the reasonable part, or share, of the goods) was given to recover it.*

§ 653. c. Development of the law of wills.—This continued to be the law of the land at the time of magna carta, which provides, that the king's debts shall first of all be levied, and then the residue of the goods shall go to the executor to perform the will of the deceased: and, if nothing be owing to the crown, "omnia catalla cedant defuncto; salvis uxori ipsius et pueris suis rationabilibus partibus suis (let them resign all the chattels to the will of the deceased; reserving to his wife and children their reasonable shares)."† In the reign of King Edward the Third this right of the wife and children was still held to be the universal or common law;‡ though frequently pleaded as the local custom of Berks, Devon, and other counties:‣ and Sir Henry Finch lays it down

Some exceptions were taken to the pleadings, and the fact of the husband's dying without issue was denied; but the rule of law, as stated in the writ, seems to have been universally allowed. away or limiting the right of testamentary disposition or imposing such conditions upon its exercise as it may deem conducive to public good."—United States v. Perkins, 163 U. S. 625, 627, 41 L. Ed. 287, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073.

There are many American dicta to the effect that the right to transmit or succeed to property at death is but a statutory right that might be wholly abrogated by the legislature. These are collected in a note in 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 121–123. For a vigorous argument to the contrary, see Nunnemacher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 9 Ann. Cas. 711, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 121, 108 N. W. 627.

expressly,<sup>z</sup> in the reign of Charles the First, to be the general law of the land. But this law is at present altered by imperceptible degrees, and the deceased may now by will bequeath the whole of his goods and chattels; though we cannot trace out when first this alteration began. Indeed, Sir Edward Coke<sup>y</sup> is of opinion, that this never was [<sup>1493</sup>] the general law, but only obtained in particular places by special custom: and to establish that doctrine. he relies on a passage in Bracton, which in truth, when compared with the context, makes directly against his opinion. For Bracton<sup>x</sup> lays down the doctrine of the reasonable part to be the common law; but mentions that as a particular exception, which Sir Edward Coke has hastily cited for the general rule. And Glanvill, magna carta, Fleta, the Year-Books, Fitzherbert, and Finch, do all agree with Bracton, that this right to the pars rationabilis (reasonable part, or share) was by the common law: which also continues to this day to be the general law of our sister kingdom of Scotland.<sup>a</sup> To which we may add, that, whatever may have been the custom of later years in many parts of the kingdom, or however it was introduced in derogation of the old common law, the ancient method continued in use in the province of York, the principality of Wales, and in the city of London, till very modern times: when, in order to favor the power of bequeathing, and to reduce the whole kingdom to the same standard, three statutes have been provided; the one 4 & 5 W. & M., c. 2 (Wills, 1691), explained by 2 and 3 Ann., c. 5 (Wills, 1703), for the province of York; another 7 & 8 W. III, c. 38 (Wills, 1695); for Wales; and a third, 2 Geo. I, c. 18 (1715), for London; whereby it is enacted, that persons within those districts, and liable to those customs, may (if they think proper) dispose of all their personal estates by will; and the claims of the widow, children, and other relations, to the contrary, are totally barred. Thus is the old common law now utterly abolished throughout all the kingdom of England, and a man may devise the whole of his chattels as freely, as he formerly could his third part or moiety. In disposing of which, he was bound by the custom of many places (as was stated in a former chapter)<sup>b</sup> to remember his lord and the church, by leaving them his two best chattels, which was the original of heriots and mortuaries; and afterwards he was left at his own liberty, to bequeath the remainder as he pleased.

§ 654. d. Intestate estates.—<sup>[494]</sup> In case a person made no disposition of such of his goods as were testable, whether that were only part or the whole of them, he was, and is, said to die intestate; and in such cases it is said that by the old law the king was entitled to seize upon his goods, as the parens patriæ (parent of the country), and general trustee of the kingdom.<sup>c 4</sup> This prerogative the king continued to exercise for some time by his own ministers of justice: and probably in the county court, where matters of all kinds were determined: and it was granted as a franchise to many lords of manors, and others, who have to this day a prescriptive right to grant administration to their intestate tenants and suitors, in their own courts-baron and other courts, or to have their wills there proved, in case they made any disposition.<sup>d</sup> Afterwards the crown, in favor of the church, invested the prelates with this branch of the prerogative; which was done, saith Perkins,* because it was intended by the law, that spiritual men are of better conscience than laymen, and that they had more knowledge what things would conduce to the benefit of the soul of the deceased. The goods, therefore, of intestates were given to the ordinary by the crown; and he might seize them, and keep them without wasting, and also might give, alien, or sell them at his will, and dispose of the money in pios usus (to pious uses): and, if he did otherwise, he broke the confidence which the law reposed in him.† So that properly the whole interest and power, which were granted to the ordinary, were only those of being the king's almoner within his diocese; in trust to distribute the intestate's goods in charity to the poor, or in such superstitious uses as the mistaken zeal of the times had denominated pious.‡ And, as he had thus the disposition of intestate's effects, the probate of wills of course followed: for it was thought just and natural that the will of the deceased should be proved to the satisfaction of the prelate, whose right of distributing his chattels for the good of his soul was effectually superseded thereby.

§ 655. e. Origin and history of administrations.—[495] The goods of the intestate being thus vested in the ordinary upon the most solemn and conscientious trust, the reverend prelates were therefore not accountable to any, but to God and themselves, for their conduct.‡ But even in Fleta's time it was complained.† “quod ordinarii, hujusmodi bona nomine ecclesiæ occupantes, nullam vel saltem indebitam faciunt distributionem (that the ordinaries, who take possession of goods of this kind in the name of the church, make no distribution of them, or at least no due distribution).” And to what a length of iniquity this abuse was carried, most evidently appears from a gloss of Pope Innocent IV,‡ written about the year 1250; wherein he lays it down for established canon law, that “in Britannia tertia pars bonorum decedentium ab intestato in opus ecclesiæ et pauperum dispensanda est (in Britain a third part of the goods left by an intestate is to be distributed for the benefit of the church and the poor).” Thus the popish clergy took to themselves<sup>1</sup> (under the name of the church and poor) the whole residue of the deceased’s estate, after the partes rationabiles (reasonable portions), or two-thirds, of the wife and children were deducted; without paying even his lawful debts, or other charges thereon. For which reason it was enacted by the statute of Westm. 2<sup>m</sup> that the ordinary shall be bound to pay the debts of the intestate so far as his goods will extend, in the same manner that executors were bound in case the deceased had left a will: a use more truly pious, than any requiem, or mass for his soul. This was the first check given to that exorbitant power, which the law had entrusted with ordinaries. But though they were now made liable to the creditors of the intestate for their just and lawful demands, yet the residuum, after payment of debts, remained still in their hands, to be applied to whatever purposes the conscience of the ordinary should approve. The flagrant abuses of which power occasioned the legislature again to interpose, in order to prevent the ordinaries from keeping any longer the administration in their own hands, or those of their immediate dependents: [496] and therefore the statute 31 Edw. III, c. 11 (Administration of Estates, 1357), provides, that, in case of intestacy, the ordinary shall depute the nearest and most lawful friends of the deceased to administer his goods; which administrators are put upon the same footing, with regard to suits and to accounting, as executors appointed by will. This is the original of administrators, as they at present stand; who are only the officers of the ordinary, appointed by him in pursuance of this statute, which singles out the next and most lawful friend of the intestate; who is interpreted<sup>2</sup> to be the next of blood that is under no legal disabilities. The statute 21 Hen. VIII, c. 5 (Administration of Estates, 1529), enlarges a little more the power of the ecclesiastical judge; and permits him to grant administration either to the widow, or the next of kin, or to both of them, at his own discretion; and, where two or more persons are in the same degree of kindred, gives the ordinary his election to accept whichever he pleases.

Upon this footing stands the general law of administrations at this day.<sup>5</sup> I shall, in the further progress of this chapter, mention a few more particulars, with regard to who may, and who may not, be administrator; and what he is bound to do when he has taken this charge upon him: what has been hitherto remarked only serving to show the original and gradual progress of testaments and administrations: in what manner the latter was first of all vested in the bishops by the royal indulgence; and how it was afterwards, by authority of parliament, taken from them in effect, by obliging them to commit all their power to particular persons nominated expressly by the law.

§ 656. 2. Capacity to make a will.—I proceed now, secondly, to inquire who may, or may not make a testament; or what persons are absolutely obliged by law to die intestate. And this law<sup>o</sup> is entirely prohibitory; for, regularly, every person hath full power and liberty to make a will, that is not under special prohibition by law or custom: which prohibitions are principally upon three [497] accounts; for want of sufficient discretion; for want of sufficient liberty and free will; and on account of their criminal conduct.

<sup>5</sup> Upon this footing stood the law of wills and of administrations, down to the year 1857; although, in almost all other countries, these matters had come to be under the jurisdiction of the civil magistrates. And, in our own times, the opinion gradually obtained, that the subjects in question were not handled by the ecclesiastical courts as effectively, expeditiously and cheaply as the interests of justice required; which opinion at length led to the introduction, by act of parliament, of a new system, whereby the jurisdiction which these courts had during some centuries enjoyed over wills and intestacies was wholly taken away. We are referring, of course, to the Court of Probate Act, 1857, whereby the jurisdiction in the matter of wills and intestacies, so far as concerned personal estate, was directed to be thenceforth exercised by the court of probate, a new tribunal then created, of a secular character. And this jurisdiction was afterwards assigned to the Probate Division of the High Court of Justice by the Judicature Act, 1873.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 310.

§ 657. a. Infants and non compotes mentis.—In the first species are to be reckoned infants, under the age of fourteen if males, and twelve if females; which is the rule of the civil law.¶ For, though some of our common lawyers have held that an infant of any age (even four years old)¶ might make a testament,¶ and others have denied that under eighteen he is capable,¶ yet as the ecclesiastical court is the judge of every testator's capacity, this case must be governed by the rules of the ecclesiastical law. So that no objection can be admitted to the will of an infant of fourteen, merely for want of age: but, if the testator was not of sufficient discretion, whether at the age of fourteen or four and twenty, that will overthrow his testament. Madmen, or otherwise non compotes (not in their right senses), idiots or natural fools, persons grown childish by reason of old age or distemper, such as have their senses besotted with drunkenness,—all these are incapable, by reason of mental disability, to make any will so long as such disability lasts. To this class also may be referred such persons as are born deaf, blind, and dumb; who, as they have always wanted the common inlets of understanding, are incapable of having animum testandi (testamentary discretion), and their testaments are therefore void.

§ 658. b. Persons under duress.—Such persons, as are intestable for want of liberty or freedom of will, are by the civil law of various kinds; as prisoners, captives, and the like.¶ But the law of England does not make such persons absolutely intestable; but only leaves it to the discretion of the court to judge, upon the consideration of their particular circumstances of duress, whether or no such persons could be supposed to have liberum animum testandi (free testamentary discretion).

§ 660. (2) Queen consort.—The queen consort is an exception to this general rule, for she may dispose of her chattels by will, without the consent of her lord:<sup>b</sup> and any feme covert may make her will of goods, which are in her possession in auter droit (in the right of another), as executrix or administratrix; for these can never be the property of the husband:<sup>c</sup> and, if she has any pin-money or separate maintenance, it is said she may dispose of her savings thereout by [499] testament, without the control of her husband.<sup>d</sup> But, if a feme sole makes her will, and afterwards marries, such subsequent marriage is esteemed a revocation in law, and entirely vacates the will.<sup>e</sup> 7

7 Will revoked by marriage.—That the will of a woman should be revoked by her marriage, after which the common law left her no freedom to change it or make any disposition of her property whatever, is based on a solid reason: which reason ceases, when she is allowed to give, devise or dispose of her property in any way during coverture, as she now is in nearly all the states, by the married women's acts. But whether the rule ceases with the reason of it is a question upon which American courts have formed contrary opinions. Some hold the common-law rule still in force, and the will revoked by her marriage. (Swan v. Hammond, 135 Mass. 45, 52 Am. Rep. 255; Blodgett v. Moore, 141 Mass. 75, 5 N. E. 470; Brown v. Clark, 77 N. Y. 369.)

Yet even in such states that rule is held not applicable to a case where an antenuptial agreement preserved to her the ability to make a will during coverture (Osgood v. Bliss, 141 Mass. 474, 55 Am. Rep. 488, 6 N. E. 527), while other courts hold that no such distinction is of any weight. (Young's Appeal, 39 Pa. St. 115, 80 Am. Dec. 513.)

In others the common-law rule is regarded as no longer in force, since the reason of it has ceased. (Will of Ward, 70 Wis. 251, 5 Am. St. Rep. 174, 35 N. W. 731; In re Tuller's Will, 79 Ill. 99, 22 Am. Rep. 164; Noyes v. Southworth, 55 Mich. 174, 54 Am. Rep. 359, 20 N. W. 891; Webb v. Jones, 36 N. J. Eq. 163; Fellows v. Allen, 60 N. H. 439, 49 Am. Rep. 328.) See cases cited in note to Young's Appeal, 39 Pa. St. 115, 80 Am. Dec. 513, where the statutory provisions of various states on this point are given. They may be found also in Stimson's Ann. Stat. Law, §§ 2676, 6460, and in Boone on Wills, §§ 64, 94.—HAMMOND.

These exceptional provisions are, however, now chiefly of historical interest only; for at the present day a married woman has practically the same power of making a will as a man or a single woman. For the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has made the whole of a married woman's property her

§ 661. c. Traitors and felons.—Persons incapable of making testaments, on account of their criminal conduct, are in the first place all traitors and felons, from the time of conviction; for then their goods and chattels are no longer at their own disposal, but forfeited to the king. Neither can a felo de se (suicide) make a will of goods and chattels, for they are forfeited by the act and manner of his death; but he may make a devise of his lands, for they are not subjected to any forfeiture.<sup>f</sup> Outlaws also, though it be but for debt, are incapable of making a will, so long as the outlawry subsists, for their goods and chattels are forfeited during that time.<sup>g</sup> As for persons guilty of other crimes, short of felony, who are by the civil law precluded from making testaments (as usurers, libelers, and others of a worse stamp), by the common law their testaments may be good.<sup>h</sup> And in general the rule is, and has been so at least ever since Glanvill's time,<sup>i</sup> quod libera sit cujuscunque ultima voluntas (that the last will of everyone be free).

§ 662. 3. Nature and incidents of wills.—Let us next, thirdly, consider what this last will and testament is, which almost everyone is thus at liberty to make; or, what are the nature and incidents of a testament. Testaments both Justinian<sup>j</sup> and Sir Edward Coke<sup>k</sup> agree to be so called, because they are testatio mentis (a testifying of the mind): an etymon, which seems to savor too much of the conceit; it being plainly a substantive derived from the separate property; except only the property acquired before 1883 of a woman married before that year. And the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, has provided, that the will of a married woman dying after the passing of that act shall take effect as if executed immediately before her death, whether she was or was not possessed of separate property at the time of making it; and that such will shall not require to be re-executed or republished after the death of her husband. Her will is therefore now effectual to dispose of all property acquired by her at any time, whether before, or during the continuance of, the marriage, or after its termination; with the sole exception of property acquired by her before 1883, in case she was married before that year.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. verb testari (to testify), in like manner as juramentum (an oath), incrementum (an increase), and others, from other verbs. The definition of the old Roman lawyers is much better than their etymology; "voluntatis nostræ justa sententia de eo, quod quis post mortem suam fieri velit":<sup>1</sup> which may be thus rendered into English, "the legal declaration of a man's intentions, [500] which he wills to be performed after his death." It is called sententiâ to denote the circumspection and prudence with which it is supposed to be made: it is voluntatis nostræ sententia, because its efficacy depends on its declaring the testator's intention, whence in England it is emphatically styled his will: it is justa sententia; that is, drawn, attested, and published with all due solemnities and forms of law: it is de eo, quod quis post mortem suam fieri velit, because a testament is of no force till after the death of the testator.

§ 663. a. Kinds of wills.—These testaments are divided into two sorts; written, and verbal or nuncupative; of which the former is committed to writing, the latter depends merely upon oral evidence, being declared by the testator in extremis (in his last moments) before a sufficient number of witnesses, and afterwards reduced to writing. A codicil, codicillus, a little book or writing is a supplement to a will; or an addition made by the testator, and annexed to, and to be taken as part of, a testament: being for its explanation, or alteration, or to make some addition to, or else some subtraction from, the former dispositions of the testator.<sup>m</sup> This may also be either written or nuncupative.

§ 664. (1) Nuncupative wills.—But, as nuncupative wills and codicils<sup>8</sup> (which were formerly more in use than at present, when

<sup>8</sup> Nuncupative wills.—Oral or nuncupative wills are restricted by statutes in the United States even more narrowly than is here stated. In few states, if in any, will they pass real estate; and the amount of personalty that may be bequeathed is usually limited, except in the case of soldiers or sailors in actual employment. The most important additional requisite not mentioned by Blackstone is that the substance of the nuncupative will shall be reduced to writing, and signed by the witnesses who heard it, within a brief time—three to six days—after the testator's decease. (See the various statutory rules collected in Stimson's Am. Stat. Law, §§ 2702–2705; Boone's Law of Wills, §§ 5–14.)

the art of writing is become more universal), are liable to great impositions and may occasion many perjuries, the statute of frauds, 29 Car. II, c. 3 (1677), enacts: 1. That no written will shall be revoked or altered by a subsequent nuncupative one, except the same be in the lifetime of the testator reduced to writing, and read over to him, and approved; and unless the same be proved to have been so done by the oaths of three witnesses at the least; who, by statute 4 & 5 Ann., c. 16 (Wills, 1705), must be such as are admissible upon trials at common law. 2. That no nuncupative will shall in anywise be good, where the estate bequeathed exceeds 30*l.*; unless proved by three such witnesses, present at the making thereof (the Roman law requiring seven<sup>a</sup>) and unless they or some of them were specially required to bear <sup>[501]</sup> witness thereto by the testator himself; and unless it was made in his last sickness, in his own habitation or dwelling-house, or where he had been previously resident ten days at the least, except he be surprised with sickness on a journey, or from home, and dies without returning to his dwelling. 3. That no nuncupative will shall be proved by the witnesses after six months from the making, unless it were put in writing within six days. Nor shall it be proved till fourteen days after the death of the testator, nor till process hath first issued to call in the widow, or next of kin, to contest it if they think proper. Thus hath the legislature provided against any frauds in setting up nuncupative wills, by so numerous a train of requisites, that the thing itself is fallen into disuse; and hardly ever heard of, but in the only instance where favor ought to be shown to it, when the testator is surprised by sudden and violent sickness. The testamentary words must be spoken with an intent to bequeath, not any loose idle discourse in his illness; for he must require the bystanders to bear witness of such his intention: the will must be made at home, or among his family or friends, unless by unavoidable accident; to prevent impositions from strangers: it must be in his last sickness; for, if he recovers, he may alter his dispositions, and has time to make a written will: it must not be proved at too long a distance from the testator's death, lest the words should escape the memory of the witnesses; nor yet too hastily and without notice, lest the family of the testator should be put to inconvenience, or surprised.

§ 665. (2) Written wills.—As to written wills, they need not any witness of their publication. I speak not here of devises of lands, which are quite of a different nature; being conveyances by statute, unknown to the feudal or common law, and not under the same jurisdiction as personal testaments. But a testament of chattels, written in the testator's own hand, though it has neither his name nor seal to it, nor witnesses present at its publication is good; provided sufficient proof can be had that it is his handwriting.<sup>9</sup> And though written in another <sup>[502]</sup> man's hand, and never signed by the testator, yet if proved to be according to his instructions and approved by him, it hath been held a good testament of the personal estate.<sup>9</sup> Yet it is the safer and more prudent way, and leaves less in the breast of the ecclesiastical judge, if it be signed or sealed by the testator, and published in the presence of witnesses: which last was always required in the time of Bracton;<sup>9</sup> or, rather, he in this respect has implicitly copied the rule of the civil law.<sup>10</sup>

<sup>9</sup> Holographic wills.—Holographic wills, "written by the testator's own hand" and signed by him, are valid by law in a number of states (Stimson's Am. Stat. Law, § 2645; Boone on Wills, § 16), both as to real and personal estate. But the further informalities allowed by the text would not be admitted to probate as to either in the United States.

It seems to be the better opinion, and that of the majority of decisions, that a written paper drawn up by the testator or under his direction, but inadmissible as a holographic will, cannot be proved as a nuncupative will. (Stamper v. Hooks, 22 Ga. 603, 68 Am. Dec. 511; Hebden's Will, 20 N. J. Eq. 473, 478.) As to all wills but holographic, and in states where holographic wills are not allowed, the requirement that a will be duly witnessed is now as applicable to those of personalty as to those devising land.—HAMMOND.

<sup>10</sup> The Wills Act, 1837, requires (1) that every will and codicil shall be a written instrument, signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator (or by some other person in his presence and by his direction), (2) that such signature shall be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time, and (3) that such witnesses shall attest

§ 666. b. Wills inoperative before death.—No testament is of any effect till after the death of the testator. "Nam omne testamentum morte consummatum est: et voluntas testatoris est ambulatoria usque ad mortem (For every testament is established by death, and the will of the testator is revocable until his death.)"<sup>r</sup> And therefore, if there be many testaments, the last overthrows all the former:<sup>s</sup> but the republication of a former will revokes one of a later date, and establishes the first again.<sup>t</sup>

§ 667. c. Wills how avoided.—Hence it follows, that testaments may be avoided three ways: 1. If made by a person laboring under any of the incapacities before mentioned: 2. By making another testament of a later date: and, 3. By canceling or revoking it. For, though I make a last will and testament irrevocable in the strongest words, yet I am at liberty to revoke it: because my own act or words, cannot alter the disposition of law, so as to make that irrevocable which is in its own nature revocable." For this, saith Lord Bacon,<sup>w</sup> would be for a man to deprive himself of that, which of all other things is most incident to human condition; and that is, alteration or repentance. It hath also been held, that, without an express revocation, if a man, who hath made his will, afterwards marries and hath a child, this is a presumptive or implied revocation of his former will, which he made in his state of celibacy.<sup>x</sup> The Romans were also wont to set aside testaments as being inofficiosa, deficient in natural duty, if they disinherited or totally passed by (without assigning a true and <sup>[503]</sup> sufficient reason<sup>y</sup>) any of the children of the testator.<sup>z</sup> But if the child had any legacy, though ever so small, it was a proof that the testator had not lost his memory or his reason, which otherwise the law presumed; but was then supposed to have acted thus for some substantial cause: and in such case no querela inofficiosi testamenti (complaint of an undutiful will) was allowed. Hence probably has arisen that groundless vulgar error, of the necessity of leaving the heir a shilling or some other express legacy, in order to disinherit him effectually: whereas the law of England makes no such constrained suppositions of forgetfulness or insanity; and therefore, though the heir or next of kin be totally omitted, it admits no querela inofficiosi, to set aside such a testament.

§ 668. 4. Executors and administrators.—We are next to consider, fourthly, what is an executor, and what an administrator; and how they are both to be appointed.

§ 669. a. Executors.—An executor is he to whom another man commits by will the execution of that his last will and testament. And all persons are capable of being executors, that are capable of making wills, and many others besides; as feme coverts, and infants: nay, even infants unborn, or in ventre sa mere, may be made executors.<sup>a</sup> But no infant can act as such till the age of seventeen years; till which time administration must be granted to some other, durante minore ætate (during minority).<sup>b</sup> In like manner as it may be granted durante absentia (during absence), or pendente lite (pending a suit); when the executor is out of the realm,<sup>c</sup> or when a suit is commenced in the ecclesiastical court touching the validity of the will.<sup>d</sup> This appointment of an executor is essential to the making of a will: * and it may be performed either by express words, or such as strongly imply the same. But if the testator makes his will, without naming any executors, or if he names incapable persons, or if the executors named refuse to act; in any of these cases, the ordinary must [<sup>504</sup>] grant administration cum testamento annexo (with the will annexed) <sup>e</sup> to some other person; and then the duty of the administrator, as also when he is constituted only durante minore ætate, etc., of another, is very little different from that of an executor. And this was law so early as the reign of Henry II, when Glanvill<sup>8</sup> informs us, that "testamenti executores esse debent ii, quos testator ad hoc elegerit, et quibus curam ipse commiserit: si vero testator nullos ad hoc nominaverit, possunt propinqui et consanguinei ipsius defuncti ad id faciendum se ingerere (those should be executors of a will whom the testator shall have chosen, and to whom he himself shall have committed the trust; but if the testator shall not have named any, the relations of the deceased may take this duty upon themselves)."

§ 670. b. Administrators.—But if the deceased died wholly intestate, without making either will or executors, then general letters of administration must be granted by the ordinary to such administrator as the statutes of Edward the Third, and Henry the Eighth, before mentioned, direct.<sup>11</sup> In consequence of which

<sup>11</sup> Modern English administration of estates.—Letters of administration are now granted in England under the provisions of the Court of Probate Act of 1857, but, as to the person to whom the office of administrator is to be granted, the court follows, except under special circumstances, the rules which used to be obligatory on the ordinary. The modern English law of title by will and by administration is explained briefly but adequately in Stephen, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 305 ff.

Development of probate powers in the United States.—In America circumstances have been peculiarly favorable to the rational development of this principle. Ecclesiastical courts with secular powers did not exist. Prerogatives and prescriptive rights were swept away by the republican spirit of the people. The legislatures were unhampered by the traditions and customs of the mother country, armed with full authority to carry out the views and convictions of the people, who thus exerted a controlling influence in shaping the law and regulating the practice of managing and settling estates of deceased persons and minors; for no branch of the law concerns the general public so universally, and affects their interests so directly, as this. The consequence has been a rapid development of the law of administration, particularly in those states which early cut loose from the common-law doctrines in this respect. The American courts of probate, with their extensive powers, their simple and efficient procedure, their happy adaptation to the wants of the people in the safe, speedy and inexpensive settlement of the estates of deceased persons attest the marvelously clear insight of the people of the colonies and young states into the principles involved, and the genuine instinct which guided them in their realization. Necessarily diverse in their details, as the systems of the several states cannot but be, since each state enacts its own code, there is a we may observe; 1. That the ordinary is compellable to grant administration of the goods and chattels of the wife, to the husband, or his representatives:<sup>a</sup> and of the husband's effects, to the widow, or next of kin; but he may grant it to either, or both, at his discretion.<sup>1</sup> 2. That, among the kindred, those are to be preferred that are the nearest in degree to the intestate; but, of persons in equal degree, the ordinary may take which he pleases.<sup>k</sup> 3. That this nearness or propinquity of degree shall be reckoned according to the computation of the civilians;<sup>l</sup> and not of the canonists, which the law of England adopts in the descent of real estates:<sup>m</sup> because in the civil computation the intestate himself is the terminus, a quo (the limit from which) several degrees are numbered; and not the common ancestor, according to the rule of the canonists. And therefore in the first place the children, or (on failure of children), the parents of the deceased, are entitled to the administration: both which are indeed in the first degree; but with us<sup>n</sup> the children are allowed the preference.<sup>o</sup> Then [505] follow brothers,<sup>p</sup> grand-

<sup>o</sup> In Germany there was long a dispute whether a man's children should inherit his effects during the life of their grandfather; which depends (as we shall see hereafter) on the same principles as the granting of administrations. At last it was agreed at the diet of Arensburg, about the middle of the tenth century, that the point should be decided by combat. Accordingly, an equal number of champions being chosen on both sides, those of the children obtained the victory; and so the law was established in their favor, that the issue of a person deceased shall be entitled to his goods and chattels in preference to his parents. common intendment of them all in the direction of recognizing the law of administration as a distinct, independent branch of jurisdiction, based upon and determined by its own inherent principles. The rich and manifold experiences of a century of unexampled national growth and development have tended to mould these systems in the national spirit common to all the states; as each is the reflex of the nation, so their institutions are rapidly assimilating into a national system, in which the incongruities incidental to the experimental enact-

The half blood is admitted to the administration as well as the whole: for they are of the kindred of the intestate, and only excluded from inheritances of land upon feudal reasons. Therefore the brother of the half blood shall exclude the uncle of the whole blood;<sup>s</sup> and the ordinary may grant administration to the sister of the half, or the brother of the whole blood, at his own discretion.<sup>t</sup> 5. If none of the kindred will take out administration, a creditor may, by custom, do it.<sup>u</sup> 6. If the executor refuses, or dies intestate, the administration may be granted to the residuary legatee, in exclusion of the next of kin.<sup>v</sup> And, lastly, the ordinary may, in defect of all these, commit administration (as he might have done<sup>x</sup> before the statute Edward III) to such discreet person as he approves of: or may grant him letters ad colligendum bona defuncti (for collecting the goods of the deceased), which neither makes him executor nor administrator; his only business being to keep the goods in his safe custody,<sup>y</sup> and to do other acts for the benefit of such as are entitled to the property of the deceased.<sup>z</sup> If a bastard, who has no kindred, being nullius filius, or anyone else that has no kindred, dies intestate and without wife or child, it hath formerly been held<sup>a</sup> that the ordinary might seize his goods, and dispose of them in pios usus (to pious uses). But the usual course now is for someone to procure letters [506] patent, or other authority from the king; and then the ordinary of course grants administration to such appointee of the crown.<sup>b</sup> ments of the several and independent legislatures are gradually disappearing before the light of common experience and intelligent discussion.—WOERNER, 1 Am. Law of Administration (2d ed.), p. 322.

§ 671. c. Respective interests of executors and administrators.—The interest, vested in the executor by the will of the deceased, may be continued and kept alive by the will of the same executor; so that the executor of A's executor is to all intents and purposes the executor and representative of A himself;<sup>c</sup> but the executor of A's administrator, or the administrator of A's executor, is not the representative of A.<sup>d</sup> For the power of an executor is founded upon the special confidence and actual appointment of the deceased; and such executor is therefore allowed to transmit that power to another, in whom he has equal confidence: but the administrator of A is merely the officer of the ordinary, prescribed to him by act of parliament, in whom the deceased has reposed no trust at all; and therefore, on the death of that officer, it results back to the ordinary to appoint another. And, with regard to the administrator of A's executor, he has clearly no privity or relation to A; being only commissioned to administer the effects of the intestate executor, and not of the original testator. Wherefore in both these cases, and whenever the course of representation from executor to executor is interrupted by any one administration, it is necessary for the ordinary to commit administration afresh, of the goods of the deceased not administered by the former executor or administrator. And this administrator, de bonis non (of the goods not administered), is the only legal representative of the deceased in matters of personal property.<sup>e</sup> But he may, as well as an original administrator, have only a limited or special administration committed to his care, viz., of certain specific effects, such as a term of years and the like; the rest being committed to others.<sup>f</sup>

§ 672. 5. Office and duties of executors and administrators.— [507] Having thus shown what is, and who may be, an executor or administrator, I proceed now, fifthly and lastly, to inquire into some few of the principal points of their office and duty. These, in general, are very much the same in both executors and administrators; excepting, first, that the executor is bound to perform a will, which an administrator is not, unless where a testament is annexed to his administration, and then he differs still less from an executor: and, secondly, that an executor may do many acts before he proves the will,<sup>g</sup> but an administrator may do nothing till letters of administration are issued; for the former derives his power from the will and not from the probate,<sup>h</sup> the latter owes his entirely to the appointment of the ordinary.

§ 673. a. Executor de son tort.—If a stranger takes upon him to act as executor, without any just authority (as by intermeddling with the goods of the deceased,<sup>i</sup> and many other transactions<sup>k</sup>) he is called in law an executor of his own wrong, de son tort, and is liable to all the trouble of an executorship, without any of the profits or advantages: but merely doing acts of necessity or humanity, as locking up the goods, or burying the corpse of the deceased, will not amount to such an intermeddling, as will charge a man as executor of his own wrong.<sup>l</sup> Such a one cannot bring an action himself in right of the deceased,<sup>m</sup> but actions may be brought against him. And, in all actions by creditors, against such an officious intruder, he shall be named an executor, generally;<sup>n</sup> for the most obvious conclusion, which strangers can form from his conduct, is that he hath a will of the deceased, wherein he is named executor, but hath not yet taken probate thereof.<sup>o</sup> He is chargeable with the debts of the deceased, so far as assets come to his hands;<sup>p</sup> and, as against creditors in general, shall be allowed all payments made to any other creditor in the same or a superior degree,<sup>q</sup> [508] himself only excepted.<sup>r</sup> And though, as against the

12 Doctrine of executor de son tort in the United States.—Distinguished American writers on this subject have expressed their disapprobation of the doctrine of liability as executor de son tort in strong terms, and intimate that it meets with little favor in American courts. (3 Redf. on Wills, 21, note (6); Schoul. Ex., §§ 184, 187; Horner, Pr. L., § 115.) There can be no doubt that in many of the American states, in which the common-law system of the administration of the estates of deceased persons has been entirely done away with, this doctrine should disappear with the conditions which called it into being. There is neither occasion nor room for it in those states which have vested complete jurisdiction in probate courts to control the settlement of estates of deceased persons: where the title to the personal property remains in abeyance until an executor or administrator is appointed by the court, and any other person undertaking to interfere with it is known to be without lawful authority to do so; where creditors of the deceased cannot be lawfully satisfied out of the property of the estate until they have proved their claims in the manner pointed out by the law; and where an executor or an administrator can neither prefer a creditor nor retain for his own debt. It is quite apparent that in such states it would be irrational to apply the doctrine of executor de son tort to one who unlawfully appropriates the property left by a deceased person, and thereby renders himself liable as a wrongdoer to the one upon whom the law casts the title: which, by relation, attaches to him from the time of the decedent's death. No one's interest would be subserved: neither that of the creditor—for he has a safer, simpler and less expensive remedy against a lawful administrator, and cannot pretend that he looked upon the intermeddler as rightfully in possession; nor that of the heir or distributee—whose safety is better secured by the appointment of a competent officer of the court, whose duty it will be to recover all the property belonging to the estate and dispose of it according to law; nor yet that of the intermeddler himself, whose wrongful act, instead of subjecting him to intricate complications, the result of which it is impossible to foresee, will simply lead to the punishment or reparation demanded by the law.

The office of executor de son tort is accordingly abolished in New York (Rev. Stats., p. 449, § 17. Alluded to in Field v. Gibson, 20 Hun (N. Y.), 274, 276), and declared by the courts of Arkansas (Barasien v. Odum, 17 Ark. 122, 127; Rust v. Witherington, 17 Ark. 129), California (Bowden v. Pierce, 73 Cal. 459,

§ 674. b. Burial of deceased.—He must bury the deceased in a manner suitable to the estate which he leaves behind him. Necessary funeral expenses are allowed, previous to other debts and charges; but if the executor or administrator be extravagant, it is a species of devastation or waste of the substance of the deceased, and shall only be prejudicial to himself, and not to the creditors or legatees of the deceased.<sup>u</sup>

§ 675. c. Probate of will.—The executor, or the administrator durante minore ætate, or durante absentia, or cum testamento annexo, must prove the will of the deceased: which is done either in common form, which is only upon his own oath before the ordinary, or his surrogate; or per testes (by witnesses), in more solemn form of law, in case the validity of the will be disputed.<sup>v</sup> When the will is so proved, the original must be deposited in the registry of the ordinary; and a copy thereof in parchment is made out under the seal of the ordinary, and delivered to the executor or administrator, together with the certificate of its having been proved before him: all which together is usually styled the probate. In defect of any will, the person entitled to be administrator must also at this period take out letters of administration under Rugely*, 23 Tex. 539), to be repugnant to the letter and spirit of the law of these states. In other states, whose administration laws present the same or similar features as those above mentioned, neither the legislature nor courts have abolished the doctrine, at least not in express terms; but it is gradually passing out of notice, for the reason that it meets no practical want. (See remarks of Phillips, J., in Rozelle v. Harmon, 29 Mo. App. 569, 578.)—WOERNER, 1 Am. Law of Administration (2d ed.), § 198.

the seal of the ordinary; whereby an executorial power to collect and administer, that is, dispose of the goods of the deceased, is vested in him: and he must, by statute 22 & 23 Car. II, c. 10 (Statute of Distribution, 1670), enter into a bond with sureties, faithfully to execute his trust. If all the goods of the deceased lie within the same jurisdiction, a probate before the [509] ordinary, or an administration granted by him, are the only proper ones: but if the deceased had bona notabilia (goods of sufficient value to be accounted for); or chattels to the value of a hundred shillings, in two distinct dioceses or jurisdictions, then the will must be proved, or administration taken out, before the metropolitan of the province, by way of special prerogative;<sup>x</sup> whence the court where the validity of such wills is tried, and the office where they are registered, are called the prerogative court, and the prerogative office, of the provinces of Canterbury and York. Lyndewode, who flourished in the beginning of the fifteenth century, and was official to Archbishop Cichele, interprets these hundred shillings to signify solidos legales (lawful shillings); of which he tells us seventy-two amounted to a pound of gold, which in his time was valued at fifty nobles or 16*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* He therefore computes<sup>y</sup> that the hundred shillings, which constituted bona notabilia, were then equal in current money to 23*l.* 3*s.* 0<sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub>d. This will account for what is said in our ancient books, that bona notabilia in the diocese of London,<sup>z</sup> and indeed everywhere else,<sup>a</sup> were of the value of ten pounds by composition: for, if we pursue the calculations of Lyndewode to their full extent, and consider that a pound of gold is now almost equal in value to an hundred and fifty nobles, we shall extend the present amount of bona notabilia to nearly 70*l.* But the makers of the canons of 1603 understood this ancient rule to be meant of the shillings current in the reign of James I, and have therefore directed<sup>b</sup> that five pounds shall for the future be the standard of bona notabilia, so as to make the probate fall within the archiepiscopal prerogative.<sup>13</sup> Which prerogative (properly understood) is grounded upon this reasonable foundation: that, as the bishops were themselves originally the administrators to all intestates in their own diocese, and as the present administrators are in effect no other than their officers or substitutes, it was impossible for the bishops, or those who acted under them, to collect any goods of the deceased, other than such as lay within their <sup>[510]</sup> own dioceses, beyond which their episcopal authority extends not. But it would be extremely troublesome, if as many administrations were to be granted, as there are dioceses within which the deceased had bona notabilia; besides the uncertainty which creditors and legatees would be at, in case different administrators were appointed, to ascertain the fund out of which their demands are to be paid. A prerogative is therefore very prudently vested in the metropolitan of each province, to make in such cases one administration serve for all. This accounts very satis-

<sup>13</sup> Bona notabilia.—Under the present system of the English law, it is said that the law as to bona notabilia is disused; the effect of the Court of Probate Act, 1857 (by which the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts in these matters was taken away), being, that the whole jurisdiction and authority in relation to granting probates and the depositing and preserving wills, is now exercised without reference to the locality in which the property of the deceased may lie. 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 318.

"The common-law term bona notabilia, as meaning the property of a nonresident sufficient to authorize a grant of administration, is not technically applicable in the United States, but writers and judges find it convenient to use it in speaking of the jurisdiction conferred by the several kinds of property for the purposes of administration. 'Personal property,' says Judge Cooper of the supreme court of Mississippi, 'whether of a tangible or an intangible character, is considered as located, for the purposes of administration, in the territory of that state whose laws must furnish the remedies for its reduction to possession.' (Speed v. Kelly, 59 Miss. 47, 51.) At common law, says Phelps, J. (in Vaughn v. Barret, 5 Vt. 333, 337, 26 Am. Dec. 306. To same effect, Bell, J., in Taylor v. Barron, 35 N. H. 484, 494; Thompson v. Wilson, 2 N. H. 291; Emery v. Hildreth, 2 Gray (Mass.), 228, 230), the site of administration in respect of debts due a deceased person never followed the residence of the creditor. 'They are always bona notabilia, unless they happen to fall within the jurisdiction where he resided. Judgments are bona notabilia where the record is; specialties where they are at the time of the creditor's decease; and simple contract debts where the debtor resides.'"—WOERNER, 1 Am. Law of Administration (2d ed.), p. 440.

factorily for the reason of taking out administration to intestates, that have large and diffusive property, in the prerogative court: and the probate of wills naturally follows, as was before observed, the power of granting administrations; in order to satisfy the ordinary that the deceased has, in a legal manner, by appointing his own executor, excluded him and his officers from the privilege of administering the effects.

§ 676. d. Inventory.—The executor or administrator is to make an inventory° of all the goods and chattels, whether in possession or action, of the deceased; which he is to deliver in to the ordinary upon oath, if thereunto lawfully required.

§ 677. e. Collecting assets.—He is to collect all the goods and chattels so inventoried; and to that end he has very large powers and interests conferred on him by law; being the representative of the deceased,<sup>d</sup> and having the same property in his goods as the principal had when living, and the same remedies to recover them. And if there be two or more executors, a sale or release by one of them shall be good against all the rest;° but in case of administrators it is otherwise.<sup>f</sup> Whatever is so recovered, that is of a salable nature and may be converted into ready money, is called assets in the hands of the executor or administrator; <sup>g</sup> that is sufficient or enough (from the French assez) to make him chargeable to a creditor or legatee, so far as such goods and chattels extend. [511] Whatever assets so come to his hands he may convert into ready money, to answer the demands that may be made upon him: which is the next thing to be considered; for,

§ 678. f. Paying debts.—The executor or administrator must pay the debts of the deceased. In payment of debts he must observe the rules of priority; otherwise, on deficiency of assets, if he pays those of a lower degree first, he must answer those of a higher out of his own estate. And, first, he may pay all funeral charges, and the expense of proving the will, and the like. Secondly, debts due to the king on record or specialty.<sup>h</sup> Thirdly, such debts as are by particular statutes to be preferred to all others; as the forfeitures for not burying in woolen,<sup>i</sup> money due upon poor rates,<sup>k</sup> for letters to the postoffice,<sup>l</sup> and some others. Fourthly, debts of record; as judgments (docketed according to the statutes 4 & 5 W. & M., c. 20—1692), statutes, and recognizances.<sup>m</sup> Fifthly, debts due on special contracts; as for rent (for which the lessor has often a better remedy in his own hands, by distraining), or upon bonds, covenants, and the like, under seal.<sup>n</sup> Lastly, debts on simple contracts, viz., upon notes unsealed, and verbal promises. Among these simple contracts, servants' wages are by some<sup>o</sup> with reason preferred to any other: and so stood the ancient law, according to Bracton<sup>p</sup> and Fleta,<sup>q</sup> who reckon, among the first debts to be paid, servitia servientium et stipendia famulorum (the services of attendants and the wages of servants). Among debts of equal degree, the executor or administrator is allowed to pay himself first; by retaining in his hands so much as his debt amounts to.<sup>r</sup> But an executor of his own wrong is not allowed to retain: for that would tend to encourage creditors to strive who should first take possession of the goods of the deceased; and would besides be taking advantage of their own wrong, which is contrary to the rule of law.<sup>s</sup> If a <sup>[512]</sup> creditor constitutes his debtor his executor, this is a release or discharge of the debt, whether the executor acts or no;<sup>t</sup> provided there be assets sufficient to pay the testator's debts: for, though this discharge of the debt shall take place of all legacies, yet it were unfair to defraud the testator's creditors of their just debts by a release which is absolutely voluntary.<sup>u</sup> Also, if no suit is commenced against him, the executor may pay any one creditor in equal degree his whole debt, though he has nothing left for the rest: for, without a suit commenced, the executor has no legal notice of the debt.<sup>v</sup>

§ 679. g. Legacies.—When the debts are all discharged, the legacies claim the next regard; which are to be paid by the executor so far as his assets will extend; but he may not give himself the preference herein, as in the case of debts.<sup>w</sup>

A legacy is a bequest, or gift, of goods and chattels by testament; and the person to whom it was given is styled the legatee: which every person is capable of being, unless particularly disabled by the common law or statutes, as traitors, papists, and some others. This bequest transfers an inchoate property to the legatee: but the legacy is not perfect without the assent of the executor: for if I have a general or pecuniary legacy of 100*l.*, or a specific one of a piece of plate, I cannot in either case take it without the consent of the executor.<sup>x</sup> For in him all the chattels are vested; and it is his business first of all to see whether there is a sufficient fund left to pay the debts of the testator: the rule of equity being, that a man must be just, before he is permitted to be generous; or, as Bracton expresses the sense of our ancient law,<sup>y</sup> “de bonis defuncti primo deducenda sunt ea quæ sunt necessitatis et postea quæ sunt utilitatis, et ultimo quæ sunt voluntatis (from the effects of the deceased are to be answered, first, the demands of necessity; afterwards, what expediency requires; and lastly, the requisitions of bequest).” And in case of a deficiency of assets, all the general legacies must abate proportionably, in order to pay the debts; [513] but a specific legacy (of a piece of plate, a horse, or the like) is not to abate at all, or allow anything by way of abatement, unless there be not sufficient without it.<sup>z</sup> Upon the same principle, if the legatees have been paid their legacies, they are afterwards bound to refund a ratable part, in case debts come in, more than sufficient to exhaust the residuum after the legacies paid.<sup>a</sup> And this law is as old as Bracton and Fleta, who tells us,<sup>c</sup> "si plura sint debita, vel plus legatum fuerit, ad quæ catalla defuncti non sufficiant, fiat ubique defalcatio, excepto regis privilegio (if there should be more due, or more legacies bequeathed, than the chattels of the deceased are sufficient to satisfy, let an equal abatement be made on all the legacies, the privilege of the king being excepted)."

If the legatee dies before the testator, the legacy is a lost or lapsed legacy, and shall sink into the residuum. And if a contingent legacy be left to anyone; as when he attains, or if he attains, the age of twenty-one; and he dies before that time; it is a lapsed legacy.<sup>d</sup> But a legacy to one to be paid when he attains the age of twenty-one years, is a vested legacy; an interest which commences in præsentî (in the present), although it be solvendum in futuro (to be paid at a future period): and, if the legatee dies before that age, his representatives shall receive it out of the testator's personal estate, at the same time that it would have become payable, in case the legatee had lived. This distinction is borrowed from the civil law;<sup>e</sup> and its adoption in our courts is not so much owing to its intrinsic equity, as to its having been before adopted by the ecclesiastical courts. For, since the chancery has a concurrent jurisdiction with them, in regard to the recovery of legacies, it was reasonable that there should be a conformity in their determinations; and that the subject should have the same measure of justice in whatever court he sued.<sup>f</sup> But if such legacies be charged upon a real estate, in both cases they should lapse for the benefit of the heir:<sup>g</sup> for, with regard to devises affecting lands, the ecclesiastical court hath no concurrent jurisdiction. And, in case of a vested legacy, due immediately, and charged on land or money in the funds, which yield an immediate profit, [514] interest shall be payable thereon from the testator's death; but if charged only on the personal estate, which cannot be immediately got in, it shall carry interest only from the end of the year after the death of the testator.<sup>h</sup>

§ 680. (1) Gifts causa mortis.—Besides these formal legacies, contained in a man's will and testament, there is also permitted another death-bed disposition of property; which is called a donation causa mortis. And that is, when a person in his last sickness, apprehending his dissolution near, delivers or causes to be delivered to another the possession of any personal goods (under which have been included bonds, and bills drawn by the deceased upon his banker), to keep in case of his decease. This gift, if the donor dies, needs not the assent of his executor: yet it shall not prevail against creditors; and is accompanied with this implied trust, that, if the donor lives, the property thereof shall revert to himself, being only given in contemplation of death, or mortis causa.<sup>1</sup> This method of donation might have subsisted in a state of nature, being always accompanied with delivery of actual possession;<sup>2</sup> and so far differs from a testamentary disposition: but seems to have been handed to us from the civil lawyers,<sup>3</sup> who themselves borrowed it from the Greeks.<sup>m</sup>

§ 681. h. The surplus or residue.—When all the debts and particular legacies are discharged, the surplus or residuum must be paid to the residuary legatee, if any be appointed by the will; and if there be none, it was long a settled notion that it devolved to the executor's own use, by virtue of his executorship.<sup>n</sup> But whatever ground there might have been formerly for this opinion, it seems now to be understood<sup>o</sup> with this restriction; that, although where the executor has no legacy at all the residuum shall in general be his own, yet wherever there is sufficient [515] on the face of a will (by means of a competent legacy or otherwise), to imply that the testator intended his executor should not have the residue, the undivided surplus of the estate shall go to the next of kin, the executor then standing upon exactly the same footing as an administrator: concerning whom indeed there formerly was much debate,<sup>p</sup> whether or no he could be compelled to make any distribution of the intestate's estate. For, though (after the administration was taken in effect from the ordinary, and transferred to the relations of the deceased) the spiritual court endeavored to compel a distribution, and took bonds of the administrator for that purpose, they were prohibited by the temporal courts, and the bonds declared void at law.<sup>q</sup> And the right of the husband not only to administer, but also to enjoy exclusively, the effects of his deceased wife, depends still on this doctrine of the common law: the statute 29 Car. II (Frauds, 1677), declaring only, that the statute of distributions does not extend to this case.

§ 682. i. Statute of Distributions, 1670.—But now these controversies are quite at an end; for by the statute 22 & 23 Car. II, c. 10 (Statute of Distribution, 1670), it is enacted, that the surplusage of intestates' estates, except of femes covert,<sup>r</sup> shall (after the expiration of one full year from the death of the intestate) be distributed in the following manner. One-third shall go to the widow of the intestate, and the residue in equal proportions to his children, or if dead, to their representatives; that is, their lineal descendants: if there are no children or legal representative subsisting, then a moiety shall go to the widow, and a moiety to the next of kindred in equal degree and their representatives: if no widow, the whole shall go to the children: if neither widow nor children, the whole shall be distributed among the next of kin in equal degree, and their representatives: but no representatives are admitted, among collaterals, further than the children of the intestate's brothers and sisters.<sup>s</sup> The next of kindred, here referred to, are to be investigated by the same rules of consanguinity, as those who are entitled to letters of administration; of whom we have sufficiently spoken.<sup>t</sup> And therefore by this statute the mother, [516] as well as the father, succeeded to all the personal effects of their children, who died intestate and without wife or issue: in exclusion of the other sons and daughters, the brothers and sisters of the deceased. And so the law still remains with respect to the father; but by statute 1 Jac. II, c. 17 (Administration of Estates, 1685), if the father be dead, and any of the children die intestate without wife or issue, in the lifetime of the mother, she and each of the remaining children, or their representatives, shall divide his effects in equal portions.

<sup>x</sup> The general rule of such successions was this: 1. The children or lineal descendants in equal portions. 2. On failure of these, the parents or lineal ascendants, and with them the brethren or sisters of the whole blood; or, if the parents were dead, all the brethren and sisters, together with the representatives of a brother or sister deceased. 3. The next collateral relations in equal degree. 4. The husband or wife of the deceased. (Ff. 38. 15. 1. Nov. 118. c. 1, 2, 3. 127. c. 1.)

any estate in lands, or pecuniary portion, equal to the distributive shares of the other children, shall have any part of the surplusage with their [517] brothers and sisters; but if the estates so given them, by way of advancement, are not quite equivalent to the other shares, the children so advanced shall now have so much as will make them equal. This just and equitable provision hath been also said to be derived from the collatio bonorum (commingling of property for the purpose of equal division) of the imperial law: * which it certainly resembles in some points, though it differs widely in others. But it may not be amiss to observe that, with regard to goods and chattels, this is part of the ancient custom of London, of the province of York, and of our sister kingdom of Scotland: and, with regard to lands descending in coparcenary, that it hath always been, and still is, the common law of England, under the name of hotchpot.<sup>a</sup>

§ 684. (2) Representation by the statute.—Before I quit this subject, I must, however, acknowledge, that the doctrine and limits of representation, laid down in the Statute of Distributions, seem to have been principally borrowed from the civil law: whereby it will sometimes happen, that personal estates are divided per capita (share and share alike), and sometimes per stirpes (by representation); whereas the common law knows no other rule of succession but that per stirpes only.<sup>b</sup> They are divided per capita, to every man an equal share, when all the claimants claim in their own rights, as in equal degree of kindred, and not jure representationis (by right of representation), in the right of another person. As if the next of kin be the intestate's three brothers, A, B, and C; here his effects are divided into three equal portions, and distributed per capita, one to each: but if one of these brothers, A, had been dead leaving three children, and another, B, leaving two; then the distribution must have been per stirpes; viz., one-third to A's three children, another third to B's two children; and the remaining third to C the surviving brother: yet if C had also been dead, without issue, then A's and B's five children, being all in equal degree to the intestate, would take in their own rights per capita; viz., each of them one-fifth part.<sup>c</sup>

§ 685. (3) Local exceptions in the statute.—The Statute of Distributions expressly excepts and reserves the customs of the city of London, of the province of York, <sup>[518]</sup> and of all other places having peculiar customs of distributing intestates' effects. So that, though in those places the restraint of devising is removed by the statutes formerly mentioned,<sup>a</sup> their ancient customs remain in full force, with respect to the estates of intestates. I shall therefore conclude this chapter, and with it the present book, with a few remarks on those customs.

In the first place, we may observe that in the city of London,<sup>o</sup> and province of York,<sup>f</sup> as well as in the kingdom of Scotland,<sup>g</sup> and therefore probably also in Wales (concerning which there is little to be gathered, but from the statute 7 & 8 W. III, c. 38—Wills, 1695), the effects of the intestate, after payment of his debts, are in general divided according to the ancient universal doctrine of the pars rationabilis (a reasonable part). If the deceased leaves a widow and children, his substance (deducting the widow's apparel and furniture of her bedchamber, which in London is called the widow's chamber), is divided into three parts; one of which belongs to the widow, another to the children, and the third to the administrator: if only a widow, or only children, they shall respectively, in either case, take one moiety, and the administrator the other;<sup>h</sup> if neither widow nor child, the administrator shall have the whole.<sup>i</sup> And this portion, or dead man's part, the administrator was wont to apply to his own use,<sup>k</sup> till the statute 1 Jac. II, c. 17 (Administration of Estates, 1685), declared that the same should be subject to the Statute of Distributions. So that if a man dies worth 1800*l.* personal estate, leaving a widow and two children, this estate shall be divided into eighteen parts; whereof the widow shall have eight, six by the custom and two by the statute; and each of the children five, three by the custom and two by the statute: if he leaves a widow and one child, she shall still have eight parts, as before; and the child shall have ten, six by the custom, and four by the statute: if he leaves a widow and no child, the widow shall have three-fourths of the whole, two by the custom and one by <sup>[519]</sup> the statute; and the remaining fourth shall go by the statute to the next of kin. It is also to be observed, that if the wife be provided for by a jointure before marriage, in bar of her customary part, it puts her in a state of nonentity, with regard to the custom only;<sup>1</sup> but she shall be entitled to her share of the dead man's part under the Statute of Distributions, unless barred by special agreement.<sup>m</sup> And if any of the children are advanced by the father in his lifetime with any sum of money (not amounting to their full proportionable part), they shall bring that portion into hotchpot with the rest of the brothers and sisters, but not with the widow, before they are entitled to any benefit under the custom:<sup>n</sup> but if they are fully advanced, the custom entitles them to no further dividend.<sup>o</sup>

Thus far in the main the customs of London and of York agree: but, besides certain other less material variations, there are two principal points in which they considerably differ. One is, that in London the share of the children (or orphanage part) is not fully vested in them till the age of twenty-one, before which they cannot dispose of it by testament:<sup>p</sup> and, if they die under that age, whether sole or married, their share shall survive to the other children; but after the age of twenty-one, it is free from any orphanage custom, and in case of intestacy, shall fall under the Statute of Distributions.<sup>q</sup> The other, that in the province of York, the heir at common law, who inherits any land either in fee or in tail, is excluded from any filial portion or reasonable part.<sup>r</sup> But, notwithstanding these provincial variations, the customs appear to be substantially one and the same. And, as a similar policy formerly prevailed in every part of the island, we may fairly conclude the whole to be of British original; or, if derived from the Roman law of successions, to have been drawn from that fountain much earlier than the time of Justinian, from whose constitutions in many points [520] (particularly in the advantages given to the widow) it very considerably differs: though it is not improbable that the resemblances which yet remain may be owing to the Roman usages; introduced in the time of Claudius Cæsar (who established a colony in Britain to instruct the natives in legal knowledge*), inculcated and diffused by Papinian (who presided at York as præfectus prætorio (judge of the court) under the Emperors Severus and Caracalla†) and continued by his successors till the final departure of the Romans in the beginning of the fifth century after Christ.

§ 2. The license to agree.

Norfolk, } David Edwards, Esquire, gives to the lord to wit. } the king ten marks, for license to agree with Abraham Barker, Esquire, of a plea of covenant of two messuages, two gardens, three hundred acres of land, one hundred acres of meadow, two hundred acres of pasture, and fifty acres of wood, with the appurtenances, in Dale.

§ 3. The concord.

And the agreement is such, to wit, that the aforesaid
Abraham, Cecilia, and John, have acknowledged the aforesaid tenements, <sup>[xv]</sup> with the appurtenances, to be the right of him, the said David, as those which the said David hath of the gift of the aforesaid Abraham, Cecilia, and John; and those they have remised and quitted claim, from them and their heirs, to the aforesaid David and his heirs forever. And further, the same Abraham, Cecilia, and John, have granted, for themselves and their heirs, that they will warrant to the aforesaid David, and his heirs, the aforesaid tenements, with the appurtenances, against all men forever. And for this recognition, re-mise, quitclaim, warranty, fine, and agreement, the said David hath given to the said Abraham, Cecilia, and John, two hundred pounds sterling.

§ 4. The note, or abstract.

Norfolk, } Between David Edwards, Esquire, complain-to wit. } ant, and Abraham Barker, Esquire, and Cecilia, his wife, and John Barker, Esquire, deforciant of two messuages, two gardens, three hundred acres of land, one hundred acres of meadow, two hundred acres of pasture, and fifty acres of wood, with the appurtenances, in Dale, whereupon a plea of covenant was summoned between them; to wit, that the said Abraham, Cecilia, and John, have acknowledged the aforesaid tenements, with the appurtenances, to be the right of him, the said David, as those which the said David hath of the gift of the aforesaid Abraham, Cecilia and John; and those they have remised and quitted claim, from them and their heirs, to the aforesaid David and his heirs forever. And further, the same Abraham, Cecilia, and John, have granted for themselves, and their heirs, that they will warrant to the aforesaid David and his heirs, the aforesaid tenements, with the appurtenances, against all men forever. And for the recognition, remise, quitclaim, warranty, fine, and agreement, the said David hath given to the said Abraham, Cecilia, and John, two hundred pounds sterling.

§ 5. The foot, chirograph, or indentures, of the fine.

Norfolk, } This is the final agreement, made in the court to wit. } of the lord the king at Westminster, from the day of Saint Michael in one month, in the twenty-first year of the reign of the lord, George the Second, by the grace of God of Great Britain, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, and so forth, before John Willes, Thomas Abney, Thomas Burnet, and Thomas Birch, justices, and other faithful subjects of the lord the king then there present, between David Edwards, Esquire, complainant, and Abraham Barker, Esquire, and Cecilia, <sup>[xvi]</sup> his wife, and John Barker, Esquire, deforciant, of two messuages, two gardens, three hundred acres of land, one hundred acres of meadow, two hundred acres of pasture, and fifty acres of wood, with the appurtenances, in Dale, whereupon a plea of covenant was summoned between them in the said court; to wit, that the aforesaid Abraham, Cecilia, and John, have acknowledged the aforesaid tenements, with the appurtenances, to be the right of him, the said David, as those which the said David hath of the gift of the aforesaid Abraham, Cecilia, and John; and those they have remised and quitted claim, from them and their heirs, to the aforesaid David and his heirs forever. And further, the same Abraham, Cecilia, and John, have granted for themselves and their heirs, that they will warrant to the aforesaid David and his heirs, the aforesaid tenements, with the appurtenances, against all men forever. And for this recognition, remise, quitclaim, warranty, fine, and agreement,

A COMMON RECOVERY OF LANDS WITH* DOUBLE VOUCHER.

George the Second, by the grace of God of Great Britain, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, and so forth; to the sheriff of Norfolk, greeting. Command David Edwards, Esquire, that justly and without delay he render to Francis Golding, clerk, two messuages, two gardens, three hundred acres of land, one hundred acres of meadow, two hundred acres of pasture, and fifty acres of wood, with the appurtenances, in Dale, which he claims to be his right and inheritance, and into which the said David hath not entry, unless after the disseisin, which Hugh Hunt thereof unjustly, and without judgment, hath made to the aforesaid Francis, within thirty years now last past, as he saith, and whereupon he complains that the aforesaid David deforceth him. And un-

Francis cometh again here into court in this same term in his proper person, and the aforesaid Jacob, though solemnly called, cometh not again, but hath departed in contempt of the court, and maketh default. Therefore it is considered, that the aforesaid Francis do recover his seisin against the aforesaid David of the tenements aforesaid, with the appurtenances; and that the said David have of the land of the aforesaid "John, to the value [of the tenements aforesaid]; and further, that the said John, have of the land of the said" Jacob to the value [of the tenements aforesaid]. And the said Jacob in mercy. And hereupon the said Francis prays a writ of the lord the king, to be directed to the sheriff of the county aforesaid, to cause him to have full seisin of the tenements aforesaid with the appurtenances; and it is granted unto him, returnable here without delay. Afterwards, that is to say, the twenty-eighth day of November in this same term, here cometh the said Francis in his proper person; and the sheriff, namely Sir Charles Thompson, Knight, now sendeth, that he by virtue of the writ aforesaid to him directed, on the twenty-fourth day of the same month, did cause the said Francis to have full seisin of the tenements aforesaid with the appurtenances, as he was commanded. All and singular which premises, at the request of the said Francis, by the tenor of these presents we have held good to be exemplified. In testimony whereof we have caused our seal, appointed for sealing writs in the bench aforesaid, to be affixed to these presents. Witness Sir John Willes, Knight, at Westminster, the twenty-eighth day of November, in the twenty-first year of our reign.
