

COMMENTARIES
ON THE
LAWS OF ENGLAND

BY

SIR WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, KT.,

EDITED BY

WILLIAM CAREY JONES

DIRECTOR OF THE SCHOOL OF JURISPRUDENCE, UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

VOLUME I

CONTAINING BOOKS I AND II

• • • • •

SAN FRANCISCO
BANCROFT-WHITNEY COMPANY
1915

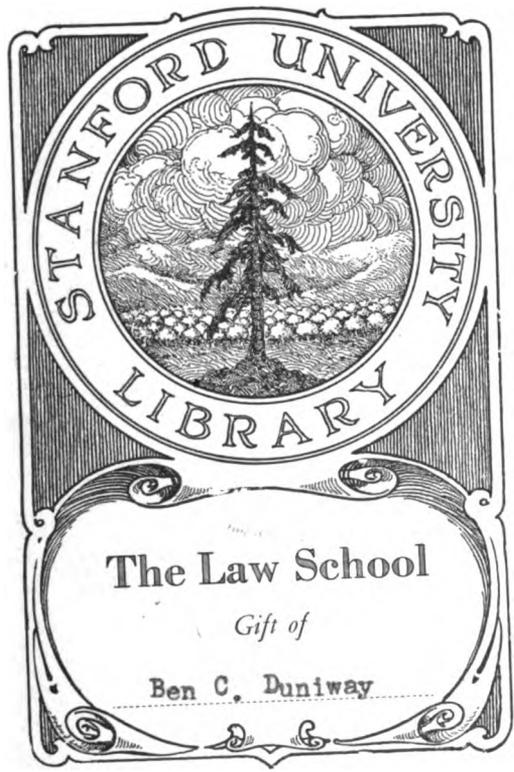

PLUS ULTRA

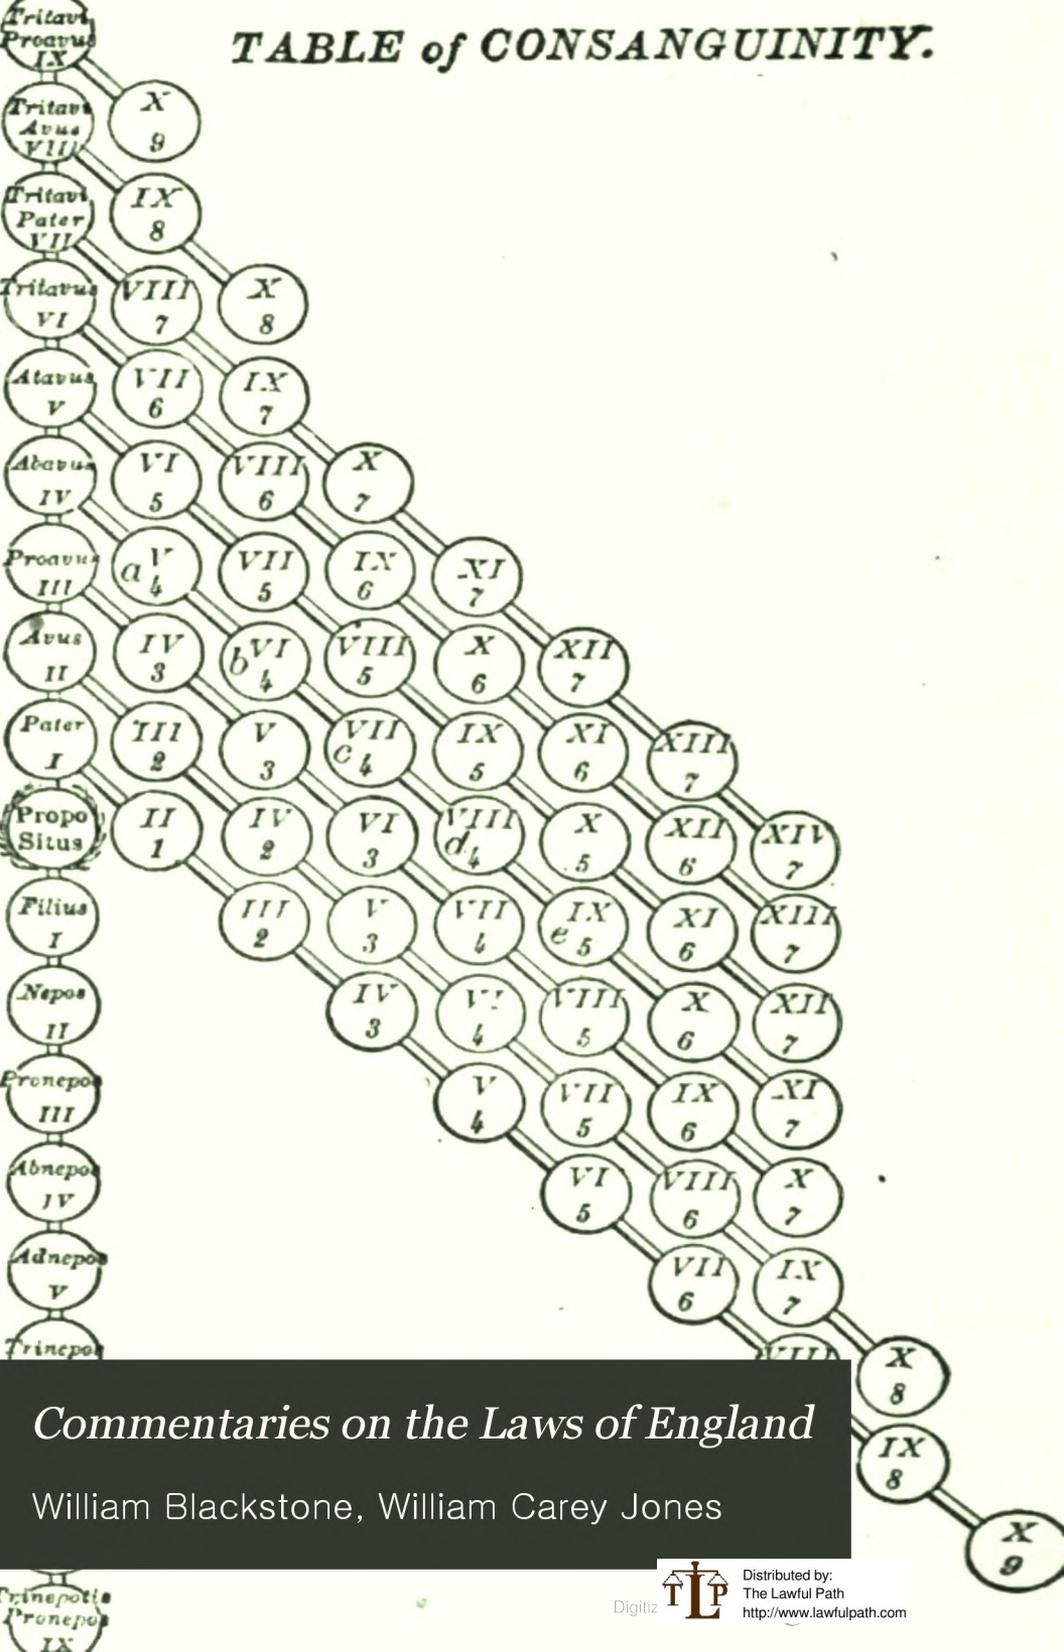

Coke

AB
ABL
YJc
v.1
copy 2

TABLE of CONSANGUINITY.

Commentaries on the Laws of England

William Blackstone, William Carey Jones

Trinepos
Pronepos
IX

X
8
IX
8
X
9

THE HON. MR. JUSTICE BLACKSTONE.

L34618

JUN 26 1950

Gift of Ben C. Sumner

COPYRIGHT, 1915

BY

BANCROFT-WHITNEY COMPANY

YRABOU BROTHAIO

SAN FRANCISCO
THE FILMER BROTHERS ELECTROTYPE COMPANY
TYPOGRAPHERS AND STEREOTYPERS

This we claim for the true and accomplished lawyer, that is, for you if you will truly follow the quest. As a painter rests on the deep and luminous air of Turner, or the perfect detail of a drawing of Lionardo; as ears attuned to music are rapt with the full pulse and motion of the orchestra that a Richter or a Lamoureux commands, or charmed with the modulation of the solitary instrument in the hands of a Joachim; as a swordsman watches the flashing sweep of the sabre, or the nimbler and subtler play of opposing foils; such joy may you find in the lucid exposition of broad legal principles, or in the conduct of a finely reasoned argument on their application to a disputed point. And so shall you enter into the fellowship of the masters and sages of our craft, and be free of that ideal world which our greatest living painter has conceived and realized in his master-work. I speak not of things invisible or in the fashion of a dream; for Mr. Watts, in his fresco that looks down on the Hall of Lincoln's Inn, has both seen them and made them visible to others. In that world Moses and Manu sit enthroned side by side, guiding the dawning sense of judgment and righteousness in the two master races of the earth; Solon and Scaevola and Ulpian walk as familiar friends with Blackstone and Kent, with Holt and Marshall; and the bigotry of a Justinian and the crimes of a Bonaparte are forgotten, because at their bidding the rough places of the ways of justice were made plain. There you shall see in very truth how the spark fostered in our own land by Glanvill and Bracton waxed into a clear flame under the care of Brian and Choke, Littleton and Fortescue, was tended by Coke and Hale, and was made a light to shine round the world by Holt, and Mansfield, and the Scotts, and others whom living men remember. You shall understand how great a heritage is the law of England, whereof we and our brethren across the ocean are partakers, and you shall deem treaties and covenants a feeble bond in comparison of it; and you shall know with certain assurance that, however arduous has been your pilgrimage, the achievement is a full answer. So venerable, so majestic, is this living temple of justice, this immemorial and yet freshly growing fabric of the Common Law, that the least of us is happy who hereafter may point to so much as one stone thereof and say, The work of my hands is there.—
SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK, Oxford Lectures, 110.

(iii)

CONTENTS OF THIS VOLUME.

---

	Page
Encomium on the Common Law.....	iii
Preface to the Present Edition.....	ix
Concerning the Commentaries.....	xv
Bibliography of the Commentaries.....	xxxix
The Author's Preface.....	xxxvii
Postscript by the Author.....	xxxviii
Outline of Book I.....	xli
Outline of Book II.....	lxii
Tabular View of Book I.....	lxxxv
Blackstone's Analysis of Book I.....	lxxxvii
Tabular View of Book II.....	ci
Blackstone's Analysis of Book II.....	ciii
Table of English Regnal Years.....	cxxi

INTRODUCTION.

OF THE STUDY, NATURE, AND EXTENT OF THE LAWS OF ENGLAND.

[References are to star paging.]

SECTION	I. On the Study of Law.....	8
	II. Of the Nature of Laws in General.....	38
	III. Of the Laws of England.....	68
	IV. Of the Countries Subject to the Laws of England.....	88

BOOK I. OF THE RIGHTS OF PERSONS.

CHAPTER	I. Of the Absolute Rights of Individuals.....	121
	II. Of the Parliament.....	146
	III. Of the King and His Title.....	190
	IV. Of the King's Royal Family.....	219
	V. Of the Councils Belonging to the King.....	227
	VI. Of the King's Duties.....	233
	VII. Of the King's Prerogative.....	237
	VIII. Of the King's Revenue.....	281
	IX. Of Subordinate Magistrates.....	338
	X. Of the People, Whether Aliens, Denizens or Natives.....	366
	XI. Of the Clergy.....	376
	XII. Of the Civil State.....	396
	XIII. Of the Military and Maritime States.....	408
	XIV. Of Master and Servant.....	422
	XV. Of Husband and Wife.....	433
	XVI. Of Parent and Child.....	446
	XVII. Of Guardian and Ward.....	460
	XVIII. Of Corporations.....	467

(v)

BOOK II. OF THE RIGHTS OF THINGS.

[References are to star paging.]

CHAPTER I.	Of Property in General .....	1
II.	Of Real Property; and First, of Corporeal Hereditaments.	16
III.	Of Incorporeal Hereditaments .....	20
IV.	Of the Feudal System .....	44
V.	Of the Ancient English Tenures .....	59
VI.	Of Modern English Tenures .....	78
VII.	Of Freehold Estates of Inheritance .....	103
VIII.	Of Freeholds not of Inheritance .....	120
IX.	Of Estates Less Than Freehold .....	140
X.	Of Estates upon Condition .....	152
XI.	Of Estates in Possession, Remainder, and Reversion.....	163
XII.	Of Estates in Severalty, Joint Tenancy, Coparcenary, and Common .....	179
XIII.	Of the Title to Things Real, in General .....	195
XIV.	Of Title by Descent .....	200
XV.	Of Title by Purchase, and First, by Escheat .....	241
XVI.	Of Title by Occupancy .....	258
XVII.	Of Title by Prescription .....	263
XVIII.	Of Title by Forfeiture .....	267
XIX.	Of Title by Alienation .....	287
XX.	Of Alienation by Deed .....	295
XXI.	Of Alienation by Matter of Record .....	344
XXII.	Of Alienation by Special Custom .....	365
XXIII.	Of Alienation by Devise .....	373
XXIV.	Of Things Personal .....	384
XXV.	Of Property in Things Personal .....	389
XXVI.	Of Title to Things Personal by Occupancy .....	400
XXVII.	Of Title by Prerogative, and Forfeiture .....	406
XXVIII.	Of Title by Custom .....	422
XXIX.	Of Title by Succession, Marriage and Judgment .....	430
XXX.	Of Title by Gift, Grant and Contract .....	440
XXXI.	Of Title by Bankruptcy .....	471
XXXII.	Of Title by Testament and Administration .....	482

APPENDIX.

NUMBER I.	Vetus Carta Feoffamenti .....	Page i
II.	A Modern Conveyance by Lease and Release .....	i
	§ 1. Lease, or Bargain and Sale, for a Year .....	ii
	§ 2. Deed of Release .....	iii
III.	An Obligation, or Bond, With Condition for the Payment of Money .....	xiii

CONTENTS OF THIS VOLUME.

vii

	Page
IV. A Fine of Lands, sur Cognissance de droit, come oeo, etc......	xiv
§ 1. Writ of Covenant, or Præcipe .....	xiv
§ 2. The License to Agree .....	xiv
§ 3. The Concord .....	xiv
§ 4. The Note, or Abstract .....	xv
§ 5. The Foot, Chirograph, or Indentures of the Fine.....	xv
§ 6. Proclamations, Indorsed upon the Fine, According to the Statutes .....	xvi
V. A Common Recovery of Lands, With Double Voucher.....	xvii
§ 1. Writ of Entry sur Disseisin in the Post; or Præcipe ..	xvii
§ 2. Exemplification of the Recovery Roll .....	xvii

PREFACE TO THE PRESENT EDITION.

---

The perennial interest in Blackstone's Commentaries affords ample reason for the periodic publication of new editions. In 1890 Messrs. Bancroft-Whitney Company, of San Francisco, published an edition prepared by William G. Hammond, then Dean of the St. Louis Law School, a recognized scholar, an influential teacher of law, and a learned lawyer, now deceased. The Hammond edition won high praise for its careful editing and for its valuable monographic notes. Aside from the fact that the work is now out of print, owing to the destruction of the plates in the San Francisco fire of 1906, the lapse of twenty-five years since its publication seems to call for a new edition.

The present editor has availed himself of Professor Hammond's painstaking and scholarly labors. In the first place, he has accepted the text as prepared by Professor Hammond from the eighth edition of the Commentaries, which was published by the Clarendon Press, Oxford, in 1788, and was the last issued during the author's lifetime. Professor Hammond made an exhaustive collation of texts of all editions from the first to the ninth, and indicated the variations by footnotes. It has seemed unnecessary to repeat all the minute variations assembled by Professor Hammond, and consequently the present edition contains only those that seemed to be the more significant. The Hammond edition will remain an invaluable addition to the library of the special student and the collector of Blackstone literature. Furthermore, Professor Hammond indicated by footnotes all the cases decided by the courts in all the American jurisdictions, in which Blackstone's Commentaries had been cited, quoted, or commented on. Hammond found, up to 1890, 6477 such references. The search of the American state and federal reports has been continued to 1915, with the result that 2412 additional references have been discovered. All these citations have been examined, and a considerable number have been embodied in footnotes to the present edition. But the information seems in general to be more interesting than important. That is to say, while it is a noteworthy fact that Blackstone's Commentaries have been cited, and usually approved and followed, some nine thousand times by the American courts, it may still not serve any useful purpose to annotate the Commentaries with all these citations. The present editor, while grateful to the labors of Professor Hammond, believes that his edition will be more serviceable without such annotations.

In the next place, it has been a question to what extent to retain Professor Hammond's monographic notes. It seems to the present editor, for reasons that are more fully set forth in his introduction, "Concerning the Commentaries," that the Commentaries have long since so thoroughly vindicated themselves and now rest so solidly upon their own merits, that it is useless to perpetuate in notes the controversies aroused by the attacks of Bentham, Austin, and others of the utilitarian school. Some of the criticisms are unquestionably just, and the more important are pointed out, but an elaborate discussion of them or defense of Blackstone is not the purpose of this edition. Notes by Hammond of this character, have, therefore, been discarded, and are left to the perusal of the special student in the Hammond edition.

In place of the omitted Hammond notes, and in addition to those retained, there are, first, notes prepared by the present editor or by other persons for him, intended to show important modern modifications of or innovations on the common law, and, secondly, notes in the form of extracts from the writings of acknowledged authorities on the history and theory, as well as the practice, of the law. In respect to the first style of notes, the editor renders grateful recognition to the able assistance of his colleagues in the School of Jurisprudence of the University of California, namely, Professors Orrin Kip McMurray, Alexander Marsden Kidd, Matthew Christopher Lynch, and Dr. Maurice E. Harrison. Professor Lynch has prepared the notes to Chapter 18 of Book I, on the subject of Corporations. Professor McMurray has written the notes in Book II on the Rule against Perpetuities, Restraints on Alienation, Recording Acts and Registration of Title, and Community Property. Professor McMurray has likewise written the notes to Chapter 27 of Book III, on the subject of Equity, and is the author of the added chapter on Conflict of Laws at the end of Book III. Dr. Harrison has written several notes in Book III bearing on the subject of code procedure. Professor Kidd has written the note in Book IV on the Theories of Crime and of Punishment, as well as several other notes. Credit for their services is given to the respective authors in connection with the notes themselves.

The second class of notes, extracts from published works of authorities in various fields of legal study, constitutes a feature of this edition. These notes will be found, it is thought, to speak for themselves. The source from which the various extracts are derived is always stated. It remains to make here appreciative acknowledgment of the courtesy accorded by the publishers or authors, as the case may be, of the several works so utilized.

First in the obligation owed by the publishers and editor of this edition of Blackstone are Messrs. Butterworth & Co., for the permission they have granted for the very free use made of the sixteenth edition of Serjeant Stephen's New Commentaries on the Laws of England (four volumes, 1914). That edition was prepared by Edward Jenks, Esq., as general editor, with the co-operation of fourteen assistant editors. The work is one of a highly authoritative character. It has supplied the means of checking the statements of Blackstone with the later developments of the law.

Sincere recognition for similar courtesy is likewise gratefully extended to the publishers named below for permission to make extracts from the works mentioned in connection with their names.

In some cases the copyright is owned by the authors or others, who, however, have added their cordial permission for the use of passages from their books.

The Macmillan Company: Holland, Jurisprudence (11th ed.), 1910; Pollock, Essays on Jurisprudence and Ethics, 1882, First Book of Jurisprudence, 1896, Land Laws, 1887; Hannis Taylor, Science of Jurisprudence, 1908; Stephen, History of the Criminal Law of England, 3 vols., 1883, General View of the Criminal Law of England, 1890; Dicey, Law and Public Opinion in England (2d ed.), 1914.

Cambridge University Press, C. F. Clay, Manager: Maitland, Collected Papers, 3 vols., 1911; Pollock & Maitland, History of English Law (2d ed.), 2 vols., 1898.

Clarendon Press, Henry Frowde: Digby, History of the Law of Real Property (5th ed.), 1897; Jenks, Modern Land Law, 1899; Pollock & Wright, Possession in the Common Law, 1888.

Stevens & Haynes: Salmond, Jurisprudence, 1902.

Sweet & Maxwell: Williams, Real Property (21st ed.), 1910.

Methuen & Co.: Holdsworth, History of English Law, 3 vols., 1903.

Little, Brown & Co.: Minor, Conflict of Laws, 1901; Reeves, Real Property, 2 vols., 1909; Woerner, American Law of Administration (2d ed.), 2 vols., 1899; Dillon, Laws and Jurisprudence of England and America, 1894; Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 1898; Wigmore, A Treatise on the System of Evidence in Trials at Common Law, 4 vols., 1904; Perry, Common Law Pleading, 1897; Bigelow, Centralization and the Law, 1906.

Edward Thompson Co.: Street, Foundations of Legal Liability, 3 vols., 1906.

Boston Book Co.: Thayer, Legal Essays, 1908.

Henry Holt & Co.: Vinogradoff, Common Sense in the Law, 1914; Geldart, Elements of English Law, 1911.

Harper & Bros.: Vinogradoff, Roman Law in Mediæval Europe, 1909.

Harvard University Press: Ames, Lectures on Legal History, 1913.

Harvard Law Review Assn.: Harvard Law Review; Langdell's Brief Survey of Equity Jurisdiction, 1904.

Baker, Voorhis & Co.: Williston, Sales, 1909.

Banks & Co.: Burdick, Torts (3d ed.), 1913.

West Publishing Co.: Bouvier's Law Dictionary (Rawle's 3d Rev.), 1914.

Grateful acknowledgment is likewise made to Professor Roscoe Pound for permission to use certain material of his own in his volume entitled, Readings on the History and System of the Common Law, 1913.

In the case of other works from which brief extracts have been made, credit has been given for their source or authorship.

The editor desires to suggest to the student of Blackstone that he make acquaintance with a few auxiliary works. On the general principles of the law he recommends, Markby, Elements of Law (4th ed.), 1889; Pollock, First Book in Jurisprudence, 1896; Holland, Elements of Jurisprudence (11th ed.), 1910; Salmond, Jurisprudence, 1902; Holmes, Common Law, 1881; Geldart, Elements of English Law, 1911; Vinogradoff, Common Sense in the Law, 1914. Professor Pound's Readings on the History and System of the Common Law, 1913, will be found useful. Dillon, Laws and Jurisprudence of England and America, 1894, is a suggestive series of lectures. Leaming, A Philadelphia Lawyer in the London Courts (2d ed.), 1912, gives one a vivid picture of the English courts and bar of to-day.

On the history of the English law, attention is called to Pollock & Maitland, History of English Law (2d ed.), 2 vols., 1898; Holdsworth, History of the English Law, 3 vols., 1903; Jenks, A Short History of the English Law, 1912; Dicey, Law and Public Opinion in England During the Nineteenth Century, 2d ed., with an introduction on the relation between Law and Public Opinion in England in the first thirteen years of the twentieth century, 1914; Digby, History of the Law of Real Property (5th ed.), 1897; Stephen, History of the Criminal Law of England, 3 vols., 1883; Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History, 3 vols., 1907-09.

On the constitutional history of England, books suggested are, Maitland, Constitutional History of England, 1913; Taswell-Langmead, Constitutional History of England, 1911; Stubbs, Constitutional History of England (5th ed.), 3 vols., 1906.

For a relatively brief, reliable, and readable exposition of Roman law, Sohm's Institutes of Roman Law, translated by Ledlie (3d ed.), 1907, is recommended. For a brilliant generalization of leading principles of Roman law and their application to modern history, Sir Henry Sumner Maine's famous work entitled Ancient Law, should be read. Sir Frederick Pollock has contributed valuable notes to an edition published in 1906. Vinogradoff's Roman Law in Mediæval Europe, 1909, from which a long extract has been printed as a note on p. *19, is a highly interesting little volume by a leading member of the contemporary school of English jurists.

Attention is also called to three important series of books now in course of publication, namely, The Continental Legal History Series, The Modern Legal Philosophy Series, and the Criminal Science Series. The volumes already published, or announced for publication, in these series are as follows:

Continental Legal History Series: A General Survey of Events, Sources, Persons, and Movements in Continental Legal History; Great Jurists of the World, from Papinian to Von Ihering; History of French Private Law; History of Continental Criminal Procedure; History of Continental Law; History of Continental Civil Procedure; History of Italian Law; History of French Public Law; History of Continental Commercial Law; the Evolution of Law in Europe.

Modern Legal Philosophy Series: The Science of Law; The World's Legal Philosophies; Comparative Legal Philosophy; General Theory of Law; Law as a Means to an End; The Positive Philosophy of Law; Modern French Legal Philosophy; Theory of Justice; Select Essays in Modern Legal Philosophy; The Formal Basis of Law; the Scientific Basis of Legal Justice; The Philosophy of Law; Philosophy in the Development of Law.

Criminal Science Series: Modern Theories of Criminality; Criminal Psychology; Crime, Its Causes and Remedies; The Individualization of Punishment; Criminal Sociology; Penal Philosophy; Criminality and Economic Conditions; Criminology; Crime and Its Repression.

The editor has divided the text of the Commentaries into sections, usually following Blackstone's paragraphing, numbering the sections consecutively throughout each book. He has given careful attention to the section heads, printed in black-face type. It is hoped that this arrangement of the matter may be of real service to the reader and in no wise interfere with the easy following of the text. The editor has also prepared an outline, which may serve as a full table of contents of both text and notes, and as a basis for review by the student. Blackstone's own analysis, or syllabus, of his lectures, which he printed for the use of his own students, is also included for the benefit of the student preparing for examination.

Another feature of this edition is the insertion in parentheses of the dates of all statutes mentioned in the text and notes. As a rule, the title of statutes is also given. All Latin maxims and foreign terms and phrases have been translated. The index has been thoroughly revised, and made complete for the present edition.

WILLIAM CAREY JONES.

Berkeley, California, June 25, 1915.

CONCERNING THE COMMENTARIES.

---

The announcement of the course of lectures which gave to the world the Commentaries on the Laws of England was posted at the University of Oxford in the following form:

"Oxford, 23 June, 1753.

In Michaelmas Term next will begin a Course of Lectures

on the

Laws of England

By Dr. Blackstone, of All-Souls College.

This Course is calculated not only for the Use of such Gentlemen of the University, as are more immediately designed for the Profession of the Common Law; but of such others also, as are desirous to be in some Degree acquainted with the Constitution and Polity of their own Country.

To this end it is proposed to lay down a general and comprehensive Plan of the Laws of England; to deduce their History; to enforce and illustrate their leading Rules and fundamental Principles; and to compare them with the Laws of Nature and of other Nations; without entering into practical Niceties, or the minute Distinctions of particular Cases.

The Course will be completed in one Year; and, for greater Convenience, will be divided into four Parts; of which the first will begin to be read on Tuesday the 6th of November, and be continued Three times a Week throughout the Remainder of the Term; And the following Parts will be read in Order, one in each of the three succeeding Terms.

Such Gentlemen as propose to attend this Course (the Expense of which will be six Guineas) are desired to give in their Names to the Reader some Time in the Month of October."

William Blackstone was born July 10, 1723, in Cheapside. His father, Charles Blackstone, a silkman and bowyer of London, died some months before William's birth. His mother died when he was about the age of twelve. He and his two brothers then fell under the kind and wise charge of their maternal uncle, Dr. Thomas Bigg, who was an eminent surgeon residing in London. In 1730, at the age of seven, William was put to school at the Charterhouse, and in 1735, by the nomination of Sir Robert Walpole, he was admitted upon the foundation of that institution. This meant that he was taken in as a poor boy to be maintained and educated at this famous school, which had already numbered among its scholars such names as those of Addison, Steele, and John Wesley. Blackstone achieved a distinct success in the classics and manifested at least a poetic instinct in some Latin stanzas which he composed on Milton. At the age of fifteen, being qualified for the University, he was matriculated at Pembroke College, Oxford.

(xv)

Besides pursuing the traditional curriculum with zeal, he displayed varied interest in other subjects, particularly poetry and architecture. His verse has no merit that can hold the attention of a later day, but it exhibits an imagination and a taste for form and expression which found better scope in other kinds of writing and served to give to the Commentaries their imperishable character. His study of architecture resulted in his writing a treatise on that subject, which, though never published, had for its author great value in training his mind in exact statement. He showed, too, his practical ability in architecture by work in restoring some of the buildings in Oxford, as well as the old Gothic church in his home town of Wallingford.

In 1741 Blackstone was entered as a student of law in the Inns of Court at the Middle Temple. He was at this period dividing his time between the University and the Inns of Court. In 1743 he was elected into the Society of All Souls College, and the next year admitted actual fellow in that college, and took chambers in the Temple, in order to attend the courts at Westminster. In 1745 he received his degree of Bachelor of Civil Law, and in 1746 he was called to the bar.

The Inns of Court were originally real inns, or hostels, for housing students, or apprentices, of the law. The earliest mention of an inn for this purpose occurs in 1344, when a demise was made from Lady Clifford of a house in Fleet street, called Clifford's Inn, to the apprenticis de banco, that is, to the lawyers belonging to the Court of Common Pleas. Other hostels were leased to voluntary associations, or guilds, of teachers and learners, who gradually developed their own regulations, customs, and traditions. The Inns that came to have a permanent interest were the Middle Temple, the Inner Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn.

These historic inns did not—or rather do not—occupy single houses or buildings, but extensive districts. They were established just outside the old wall of the city of London, on the west, where they might have at once the charm of the open field, and access to, and protection from, the city, and yet be within convenient distance of the law courts at Westminster. The group of buildings, halls, courts, and gardens that make up the Middle Temple and the Inner Temple stretch from south of the Strand and Fleet street to the Thames. Lincoln's Inn occupies a wide district beginning a little south of Holborn thoroughfare along Chancery Lane to Carey street. The Royal Courts of Justice now occupy the great square of land lying between Carey street and the Strand, that is to say, between Lincoln's Inn and the group constituting the Middle Temple and Inner Temple. Gray's Inn lies a little north of Holborn, along the west side of Gray's Inn Road.

Before the seventeenth century there were "readings" and "mootings" in the Inns of Court, or, in other words, more or less of instruction and discipline. This system fell into disuse during the seventeenth century, and was not revived until the middle of the nineteenth. But the decline in professional training was made up by a gain in other directions, for the Inns housed during two centuries or more not only lawyers but writers and statesmen. They were the resort and home of the culture of the day, the great men of letters,—Addison, Steele, Dr. Johnson, Goldsmith, Charles Lamb, Thackeray, Dickens,—bringing to the men of the law an atmosphere of sweetness and light.

Thackeray, in "Pendennis," gives us a picture of the literary traditions of the Middle Temple, which is true in general in its application to the other inns.

"Nevertheless, those venerable Inns which have the 'Lamb and Flag' and the 'Winged Horse' for their ensigns have attractions for persons who inhabit them, and a share of rough comforts and freedom, which men always remember with pleasure. I don't know whether the student of law permits himself the refreshment of enthusiasm, or indulges in poetical reminiscences as he passes by historical chambers, and says, 'Yonder Eldon lived; upon this site Coke mused upon Lyttelton; here Chitty toiled; here Barnwell and Alderson joined in their famous labors; here Byles composed his great work upon bills, and Smith compiled his immortal leading cases; here Gustavus still toils with Solomon to aid him.' But the man of letters can't but love the place which has been inhabited by so many of his brethren or peopled by their creations, as real to us at this day as the authors whose children they were; and Sir Roger de Coverley walking in the Temple Gardens, and discoursing with Mr. Spectator about the beauties in hoops and patches who are sauntering over the grass, is just as lively a figure to me as old Samuel Johnson rolling through the fog with the Scotch Gentleman at his heels, on their way to Dr. Goldsmith's chambers in Brick Court, or Harry Fielding, with inked ruffles and a wet towel round his head, dashing off articles at midnight for the Covent Garden Journal, while the printer's boy is asleep in the passage."

Nathaniel Hawthorne, speaking of Gray's Inn, says: "Nothing else in London is so like the effect of a spell as to pass under one of these archways and find yourself transported from the jumble, rush, tumult, uproar, as of an age of weekdays condensed into the present hour, into what seems an eternal Sabbath. It is very strange to find so much of ancient quietude right in the monster city's very jaws—which yet the monster shall not eat up—right in its very belly indeed, which yet in all these ages it shall not digest and convert into the same substance as the rest of its bustling streets."

The savor of romance that hangs about the Inns may be caught by many a touch in Lamb and Dickens. We may, for instance, see the delicate figure of Ruth Pinch amid the shrubbery about Fountain Court, of the Temple Inns. For it was there she had her secret meetings with Tom, who was always to come out of the Temple past the Fountain and look for her "down the steps leading into Garden Court," to be greeted "with the best little laugh upon her face that ever played in opposition to the Fountain, and beat it all to nothing. The Temple Fountain might have leaped twenty feet to greet the spring of hopeful maidenhood that in her person stole on, sparkling, through the dry and dusty channels of the Law; the chirping sparrows, bred in Temple chinks and crannies, might have held their peace to listen to imaginary skylarks, as so fresh a little creature passed; the dingy boughs, unused to droop, otherwise than in their puny growth, might have bent down in a kindred gracefulness, to shed their benedictions on her graceful head; old love letters, shut up in iron boxes in the neighboring offices, and made of no account among the heaps of family papers into which they had strayed, and of which, in their degeneracy, they formed a part, might have stirred and fluttered with a moment's recollection of their ancient tenderness, as she went lightly by."*

The Halls of the Inns were formerly the scenes of masques and revels, in which the benchers, barristers and students took part. "The last occasion of a revel taking place in the Halls of the Inns of Court was upon the elevation of Mr. Talbot to the woolsack (1734). Then, after dinner, the Benchers all assembled in the Great Hall of the Inner Temple, and a large ring having been formed round the fireplace, the Master of the Revels took the Lord Chancellor by the hand, who with his left took Mr. Justice Page, and the other serjeants and benchers being joined together, all danced about the fireplace three times, while the ancient song, 'Round about our Coal Fire,' accompanied by music, was sung by the Comedian, Tony Aston, dressed as a barrister."†

In the beautiful Hall of the Middle Temple, where Blackstone "ate dinners" and was called to the bar, Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night" was first presented.

The Inns of Court possess by immemorial custom the exclusive privilege of calling candidates to the bar, of disciplining, and even of disbarring barristers. The governing body is composed of the benchers, who are either judges or king's counsel and prominent junior barristers. The members of the Inn are the barristers and students. The executive officer is the treasurer, who is selected annually.

Every young man desiring to become a barrister must identify himself with one of the Inns of Court. The chief gain which, in Blackstone's day, the law student drew therefrom was in traditions and associations, and in the stimulus to generous culture and high ambition, although he might also acquire the professional knowledge necessary to success at the bar. Formally, he had only to attend the function of "eating dinner," once each term. When he had "eaten twelve dinners" in his Inn, he was entitled to be called to the bar. Nowadays, he is subjected to rigid examinations. "Having passed the necessary examinations, the young barrister is finally 'called to the Bar,' a ceremony which takes place in the Hall of his Inn, at the close of dinner on 'Grand Day,' which is the day appointed for a banquet, to which a score or more of distinguished guests are invited by the 'Treasurer and the Masters of the Bench.' The Students, wearing gowns over evening dress, are grouped together, below the dais on which the benchers' table stands. The Steward of the Inn calls out the names in order of seniority. Each Student, as his name is called, advances to the high table and halts there, facing the Treasurer, who, standing up, says to him: 'Mr. —, by the authority and on behalf of the Masters of the Bench, I publish you a barrister of this Honorable Society.' Then the Treasurer shakes hands with the new barrister and the latter walks away to join his comrades."‡

* Dickens, "Martin Chuzzlewit."

† Home & Headlam, The Inns of Court, 98n.

‡ Leaming, A Philadelphia Lawyer in the London Courts, 2d ed., 26.

In closing his account of the history of the Inns of Court, Mr. Cecil Headlam says: "Such is the story of the Inns of Court, which have gone on from strength to strength, and of the Inns of Chancery and the Serjeants' Inns, which have almost vanished, together with the Societies which made them famous, from off the changing face of London. . . . It brings before us, not only the vision of the great Justiciars who transacted the business of the King's Courts, of the great Lawyers who built up the mighty fabric of English Law, and the great Judges who defended the rights and liberties and progress of the people, but also many of the greatest names in literature and architecture. The precincts of the Temple remind us of the Order of the Red-Cross Knights, and near at hand are the vacated Inns of that other Order which has been likewise dissolved. For we see no more, save in the light of imagination, either the mail-clad figures of the Templars in their white cloaks stamped with the red cross, or the Serjeants in their white lawn coifs and parti-colored gowns, wending their way from the Temple Hall to the shrine of St. Thomas.

"The silver tongue of Harcourt is mute as the impassioned eloquence of Burke and Sheridan, yet these buildings seem to echo with their voices, with the sonorous declamation of Dr. Johnson, or the witty stammer of Charles Lamb. There, in Gray's Inn, we still seem to see the figure of Francis Bacon, pacing the walks with Raleigh, talking of trees and politics and high adventure; from the Gateway of Lincoln's Inn, and past the red bricks laid by Ben Jonson, when Wolsey was Cardinal, the form of Sir Thomas More emerges; and across the way the thin, alert figure of Sir Edward Coke steps briskly from his tiny garden into old Serjeants' Inn.

"Here Dickens talks with Thackeray, and Blackstone scowls at Goldsmith; there, in the Middle Temple Hall, Queen Elizabeth leads the dance with Sir Christopher Hatton, and the rafters ring with the music of Shakespeare's voice and Shakespeare's poetry. And the buildings themselves are the works of a noble army of English architects, admirable creations and memorials of the genius of Sir Christopher Wren, Inigo Jones, Adam, Hardwick, Street, and of the unknown builders of Norman, Gothic, and Elizabethan things. These facts once known, not all the dirt and fog of London air, not all the noise and distraction of city business and legal affairs, can ever again wholly obscure the charm, the romance, the historical and literary associations, which haunt these homes of so many great English lawyers, writers, and administrators."*

During the seven years Blackstone attended the courts at Westminster, after his call to the bar, the profits accruing from his practice were unsatisfactory and disappointing. His disposition was doubtless rather academical than contentious. He had acted as bursar of Oxford soon after he took his bachelor's degree, and did efficient service in straightening out confused accounts. His habit of mind is shown in the fact that he prepared a treatise on the subject of keeping college accounts for the benefit of other bursars. In 1750 he published An Essay on Collateral Consanguinity. This was called out by the question arising as to the persons who were entitled to election into the society of All Souls College because of kinship to the founder. The claims had in the course of centuries become so numerous that the college complained that it was thereby hampered in the selection of the most desirable candidates. The aim of this treatise was to prove that all the kindred of the founder were by this time collateral, and that the length of time since the founder's death must, according to the rules of both the civil and canon law, have extinguished consanguinity; or, in other words, that the whole race of mankind were equally his kinsmen.

---

* Inns of Court, painted by Gordon Home, described by Cecil Headlam.

In 1750 Blackstone received the degree of Doctor of Civil Law, and in 1753 he determined to give up his disappointing metropolitan practice, and to retire to an academical life, continuing the practice of his profession as a provincial counsel. In so deciding he was undoubtedly following out the course of his own best self-development. In the early part of his professional life, a vacancy had occurred in the Professorship of Civil Law at Oxford. Mr. Murray, afterward Lord Mansfield, took occasion to expostulate with the Duke of Newcastle on the appointment of an incumbent to the vacant professorship, expressing his regret that the civil law was not receiving the attention at Oxford which it was receiving at Cambridge. Later, upon a request for recommendation of a candidate, Murray introduced Blackstone to the Duke of Newcastle. The latter in order to ascertain the political bias of the candidate said to him: "Sir, I can rely upon the judgment of your friend, Mr. Murray, as to your giving law lectures in a style most beneficial to the students; and I dare say, I may safely rely on you, whenever anything in the political hemisphere is agitated in the University, that you will exert yourself in our behalf." The answer was, "Your grace may be assured that I will discharge my duty in giving law lectures to the best of my poor ability." "Ay, ay," replied the Duke, "and your duty in the other branch too?" Declining to commit himself on this point, the appointment went to another person.

Before returning to Oxford, he had already planned his lectures on the laws of England, and was ready to announce their public delivery. These lectures were repeated year after year to large and interested classes of students. In 1758 the Vinerian Professorship of Law became effective through the bequest of the author of Viner's Abridgment, and Blackstone was elected as its first occupant. On October 25th of that year he read his introductory lecture, later prefixed to the first book of the Commentaries. As regards Blackstone's great achievement in the delivery of his lectures, we may listen to his twentieth century successors. The present Vinerian Professor, W. M. Geldart, in his inaugural lecture at All Souls College, on November 5, 1910, says:

"He would be a bold man who, for the first time publicly addressing this University from a chair of which the first and last traditions are so splendid, should not feel some trepidation lest he should show himself too ignominiously unworthy of them; and he would show himself doubly unworthy if he passed to the subject of his discourse without saying something of the predecessors who established those traditions. . . . Blackstone was happy in his opportunity and great in his use of it. Our law, coherent in its principles, elaborated by nearly five centuries of judicial interpretation, modified by some few great statutes which it had been able to assimilate and incorporate in its structure, had successfully survived royal tyranny and two revolutions, and looked like a stable and final system to those who knew it. But that system could only be known to those whom love of recondite study or the hope of professional success could induce to search for its elements in statutes and reports and abridgments and crabbed commentaries. Then Blackstone gathered together these scattered elements, displayed the system as a whole, expounded it in diction dignified, luminous and copious; made English law, in a way in which it had never been before, a part of English literature and English thought. In an age when the teaching of law had sunk to its lowest ebb, Blackstone raised law to the level of a subject of academic study."

The immediately preceding incumbent of the Vinerian Professorship, A. V. Dicey, in an address at the time he surrendered his chair, on June 12, 1909, said:

"Literary power then of the rarest quality enabled Blackstone to grasp with masterly ability the happy opportunity for achieving the task which he had set before himself of reviving professorial instruction and of exhibiting the whole law of England in an adequate literary form. He assuredly wrote under a happy star. The success of his work was favored by several circumstances which no longer exist. The intellectual apathy or somnolence of Oxford during the eighteenth century has been the subject of exaggeration. Still the amount of good teaching provided by the University in 1753, when he began to deliver public lectures, was admittedly small. The sudden appearance of a capable teacher who gave attractive lectures was a startling phenomenon. Blackstone had the advantage of drawing to his classes all the youthful intelligence of Oxford. The pupils who gathered round him probably included every man who had any taste or desire whatever for study. The law of England, further, was in 1765, when the first volume of the Commentaries was published, complete and symmetrical. The foundations of the common law and of Equity were firmly established. Our legal system, looked at from a practical point of view, was far indeed from being the voice of absolute reason, but it was coherent. Fifty years at least were to elapse between the publication of the Commentaries and the beginning of that constant improvement or alteration of the law by parliamentary legislation which began about 1830, and has continued to the present day. Blackstone, therefore, could contemplate the law which he described as a possibly strange, but assuredly coherent and immutable body of doctrine. Utilitarian reform, carried out through the instrumentality of parliament, may have promoted human happiness; it has without doubt delayed the growth of legal literature. The law has year by year increased in bulk and has lost its symmetry. No man of letters, however skillful—not even the great commentator himself—could, from a literary point of view, make anything of a modern statute. An act of parliament produced by the skill or cunning of parliamentary draftsmanship, and modified to meet the exigencies of party warfare, is, to put the truth plainly, a document written in the very worst English known to the civilized world. Even in his own time, Blackstone had perceived the wisdom of avoiding acts of parliament; he glides with deftness over the statute of frauds. Blackstone, in the last place, lived at a time when the learned world was still a reality, when there was an established standard of style and when men of letters could address themselves, even when writing on such a subject as law, neither to experts, nor to practitioners, nor to that unsatisfactory class now known as general readers. The audience of whom Johnson, Goldsmith, Hume, Adam Smith, Gibbon, Burke and Blackstone courted and received the approbation, was made up of the educated gentlemen of England. It is no accident that these authors and others belonging to the same period, greatly as they differed from one another, were all of them masters of style. It was, in short, the commentator's happy fortune to have lived at a date when the learned world supplied him with the right method of expression, and when—the two things are only different sides of one phenomenon—he could address the definite class of educated English gentlemen in the language accepted by all men of liberal education. Of this advantage he availed himself to the utmost."

The success of his lectures brought Blackstone into renown, and he was not only hailed as the Great Commentator, but the way was opened to him for success in the practice of his profession. For a while he gave up his residence at Oxford, although going there each year to read his lectures, and bought chambers in the Temple. He resigned the office of assessor of the vice-chancellor's court, which he had held for six years, and soon afterwards the stewardship of All Souls College. In 1763, the Queen, upon the establishment of her household, made him her Solicitor-General. About the same time he was chosen a bencher of the Middle Temple. In 1770 he was tendered the office of Solicitor-General to the King, which he declined from distaste for public life. He had already been in parliament, and had held his seat through two elections. Parliament in practice was a disillusionment to him. He did not have the qualities that make for success in public debate and controversy.

He was thereafter, in the same year, 1770, appointed to the office of Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. Mr. Justice Yates, then one of the judges of the King's Bench, after Blackstone had received the announcement of the appointment, but before his patent had passed, expressed to Blackstone a great desire, because of physical infirmity, to have a seat in the Common Pleas. Blackstone yielded the position in the Common Pleas to Yates, himself taking the seat on the King's Bench. At the same time Blackstone received the honor of knighthood. Formerly he had declined the order of the Coif; but in 1761 he was made King's Counsel, and in 1770, Serjeant at Law.

Within a few months after his appointment to the Common Pleas, Mr. Justice Yates died, and Blackstone was given the position which he had desired. The circumstance of these changes is set forth in the following letter from Blackstone to Lord Chief Justice Wilmot:

"Wallingford, 8 June, 1770.

MY LORD:

I have received by today's post the melancholy News of the Death of my Brother Yates, which happened Yesterday afternoon, after an Illness of four Days. Probably Your Lordship's Letters may have brought you the same Account: But I thought it proper to acquaint You with it as early as possible; because the Loss which we have all sustained is more peculiarly interesting to your Lordship, as the Head of the Court in which he sate. I have also a farther Reason for communicating to You this Intelligence immediately, because Your Lordship well remembers that in February Last when I relinquished His Majesty's Nomination of myself to the Common-Pleas, in favor of my poor Brother Yates (in which I was principally determined by Your Lordship's Advice) I did it with a Reservation of my Claim to a Seat upon that Bench at the next Vacancy; which, God knows, I little expected would have happened in so sudden and disastrous a Manner. I hope, however, that Your Lordship will have no objection to the Renewal of my Claim to a Seat in Your Court, which was my original Option when I accepted the King's Nomination & from which I receded only on account of poor Yates Representation of his infirm State of Health; which this Event has, alas, too fully confirmed. I have the Honor to be, My Lord,

Your most obliged humble Servt.,

W. BLACKSTONE.*

In addition to the Essay on Collateral Consanguinity, Blackstone published, in 1758, Considerations on Copyholders; in 1759, an edition of the Great Charter, and the Charter of the Forest; in 1762, A Treatise on the Law of Descents in Fee Simple, and in the same year, two volumes octavo, entitled "Law Tracts," in which several of his essays were collected and published. After his death, in 1780, his brother-in-law, James Clitherow, published the two volumes known as "W. Blackstone's Reports," being reports of cases decided in the courts of Westminster Hall from 1746 to 1779, as taken and compiled by Blackstone.

No great distinction over and above many another attaches to Blackstone from his professional and judicial positions, from his law tracts, or from his reports of cases. They were all worthy and honorable, and served to round out his career, and may perhaps have contributed their share, so far as they preceded, or accompanied, the preparation of his lectures, to the successful writing of the Commentaries. It was unquestionably as a professorial lawyer that Blackstone performed his signal services, and his fame rests on the celebrated Commentaries.

In 1765 Blackstone published the first volume of the Commentaries; in 1769 the fourth volume issued from the press. During his lifetime seven editions followed. After his death such able editors as Burn, Christian, Coleridge, and Chitty, annotated and brought forth new editions. Down to 1840, edition after edition followed one another in England. Since 1841, however, no reprint of Blackstone's text has been made in England. The work of Serjeant Stephen's New Commentaries, based on Blackstone, and incorporating large portions of Blackstone's own treatise, has taken the place of the original work for the law student. This has been deplored by later English lawyers. Sir Frederick Pollock, for example, has said:

"Our young men hear systematic lectures on jurisprudence and legal method in general, and have meanwhile to pick up their first notions of the law of their own country from mauled and tinkered editions or imitations of Blackstone put together in defiance of all rational arrangement. Blackstone's work was an excellent one in his time and according to his lights; we might honour him better at this day than by a blundering lip-service which, as a rule, effectually excludes the knowledge of what Blackstone really wrote. The modern editions utterly spoil Blackstone as literature, without producing a good account of the modern law. One consequence of this is that the historical value of Blackstone in his genuine form is apt to be sadly underrated."

---

* Permission to use this letter is accorded by its present owner, Charles Stetson Wheeler, Esq., of the San Francisco bar. It was read in an address on Blackstone which Mr. Wheeler delivered before the Law Association of the University of California, November 30, 1909, and is contained in "Select Addresses of Charles S. Wheeler," privately printed in 1911.

Professor Dicey (who confesses never to have read Blackstone thoroughly and completely until he occupied the Vinerian Professorship as Blackstone's successor), says: "To any critic of Blackstone, as to any student of English law, I unhesitatingly give this advice: Begin your study by reading Blackstone's Commentaries. Keep in mind that the book describes English law as it stood toward the end of the eighteenth century, and then read the Commentaries without the use of note or comment."

Amid the admiration and eulogy which greeted the delivery of Blackstone's lectures and the publication of his Commentaries, there was sounded a note of hostility and criticism, which gathered strength and volume during many succeeding years. Among Blackstone's auditors was a boy of some fourteen or fifteen years old, Jeremy Bentham. He detected a fallacy in the lecturer's exposition of natural rights, and he began a systematic course of disparagement and ridicule. But to Bentham, Blackstone's chief offense did not lie here, although this and like characteristics of the Commentaries were especially taken up and criticised by some of Bentham's successors. Bentham, man of genius, was first of all a reformer. Blackstone was an optimistic upholder of the old order. In his generation general criticism of the existing state of things had not been aroused. He was "a typical Old Whig." He died in 1780, and not even the first rumors of the French revolution, with its excitements, its enthusiasms, its stirring of new impulses had reached him. Such ferment, however, was in the very soul of the younger Bentham. Whether Blackstone would have moved with the progressive current had he been born later or had he lived longer, it is useless to speculate. His temperament, his studies, his position as a professor of law, and the atmosphere of the times, made of him a satisfied conservative. But to Bentham, Blackstone's Commentaries constituted a mighty fortress which had been erected to protect the existing order against the inroads of advancing reform. It was, consequently, to break down the opposing bulwarks that, at the age of twenty-five, he wrote his Fragment on Government. "It is the most trenchant critique ever penned by a youthful pupil on the doctrines of a celebrated teacher whose dogmas were accepted by the learned world as profound truths. The Fragment, which was merely a small part of an intended Comment on the Commentaries, is open to criticism, but it was an attack which achieved complete success. It proved once and for all that Blackstone had met with a controversialist of immense dialectical power, and that the Commentator, though a distinguished lawyer and a great man of letters, was a lax thinker. The Fragment, published anonymously, startled the learned world."*

* Dicey, The National Review, Dec., 1909, p. 653.

The real animus of the Fragment against the Commentaries was that the Commentaries seemed invented for the very purpose of resisting attempts to improve the law. Bentham says:

"If to this endeavor [to improve the law] we should fancy any author, especially any author of great name, to be, and as far as could in such case be expected, to avow himself, a determined and persevering enemy, what should we say of him? We should say that the interests of reformation, and through them the welfare of mankind, were inseparably connected with the downfall of his works: of a great part, at least, of the esteem and influence, which these works might under whatever title have acquired.

"Such an enemy it has been my misfortune (and not mine only) to see, or fancy at least I saw, in the author of the celebrated Commentaries on the Laws of England; an author whose works have had, beyond comparison, a more extensive circulation, have obtained a greater share of esteem, of applause, and consequently of influence (and that by a title on many grounds so indisputable), than any other writer who on that subject has ever yet appeared."

Now, to us in calm retrospect, no sinister motives can be imputed to Blackstone. No man more than he ever thought to serve his country well.

Love of English freedom, detestation of foreign despotism were his basic motives. He had with him Montesquieu, Voltaire, Chatham, Burke. His was the most kindly, charitable disposition. He studied and strove for, in his own way, the amelioration of the laws. He was a philanthropist. In the contemporary review of Blackstone and his Commentaries, in the Annual Register, it is said that "his unbounded philanthropy, and the eloquence and tenderness with which he pleads the cause of humanity, must always procure him the most favorable reception." We remember how he refused to surrender his political independence to the Duke of Newcastle. "He was neither a Tory nor a bigot. He believed in civil and religious freedom as understood in England and as interpreted by Locke."*

We can, however, readily understand how, if not Blackstone himself, at least the Commentaries, might appear to Bentham as the "enemy." Complacent reliance upon what they taught had to be beaten down before the great reforms contemplated by Bentham could make much headway. It was an inevitable struggle. We can pardon, too, Bentham's increasing tone of asperity and virulence. But when the attack is taken up by the new English analytical jurists, in the person mainly of John Austin, and by the utilitarian school of economic thinkers, the ground of attack is lost and criticism descends into mere abuse and vituperation. The result, nevertheless, was that Blackstone's treatise suffered for many years an undeserved neglect and disparagement. The later school of historical jurists that has arisen in England has within recent years been viewing the Commentaries with a juster vision. It is to such Englishmen as Sir Kenelm Digby, Mr. Justice Stephen, Professor Maitland, Professor Dicey, and Professor Geldart, that we should look for a just appreciation of the value of the Commentaries. Throughout Digby's History of the Law of Real Property, the Commentaries are referred to "as at once the most available and the most trustworthy authority on the law of the eighteenth century." Sir James Stephen, in his History of the Criminal Law of England, says: "Blackstone first rescued the law of England from chaos. He did, and did exceedingly well, for the end of the eighteenth century, what Coke tried to do, and did exceedingly ill, about 150 years before; that is to say, he gave an account of the law as a whole, capable of being studied, not only without disgust, but with interest and profit. If we except the Commentaries of Chancellor Kent, which were suggested by Blackstone, I should doubt whether any work intended to describe the whole of the law of any country possessed anything like the same merits. His arrangement of the subject is, I think, defective, for reasons which have often been given, but a better work of the kind has not yet been written, and, with all its defects, the literary skill with which a problem of extraordinary difficulty has been dealt is astonishing. The dryness of the subject is continually relieved by appropriate digressions. The book is full of knowledge of many kinds, though no special attempt is made to exhibit it. It is also full of judicious if somewhat timid criticism, and, so far as I am qualified to judge, I should say, that though Blackstone did not encumber himself with useless learning, he knew nearly everything relating to the subject on which he wrote which was at all worth knowing."

* Dicey, The National Review, Dec., 1909, p. 653.

The late Professor Maitland (of whom Professor Dicey, expressing the consensus of opinion of many learned persons, says, "No Englishman has arisen capable of repeating the feat performed both by Bracton and by Blackstone unless it be Maitland himself"), has said: "Bracton was rivaled by no English juridical writer till Blackstone arose five centuries afterwards. Twice in the history of England has an Englishman had the motive, the courage, the power to write a great readable, reasonable book about English law as a whole."

"It required, perhaps," says Coleridge, in the preface to his edition of the Commentaries, "the study necessarily imposed upon an editor to understand fully the whole extent of praise to which the author is entitled; his materials should be seen in their crude and scattered state; the controversies examined, of which the sum only is shortly given; what he has rejected, what he has forborne to say should be known; before his learning, judgment, taste, and, above all, his total want of self-display can be justly appreciated." The writer in the Dictionary of National Biography, in remarking upon this passage, says: "To this just eulogy one need only add that Blackstone had formed the true conception of an institutional work, which not merely should state the principles of existing law, but by means of 'the learning out of use' should explain their growth. And so well did he carry out his plan that in the Commentaries there is still to be found the best general history of English law, needing comparatively little correction, and told with admirable clearness and spirit."

These are judicious statements of discriminating lawyers and historical scholars. The words of the one-sided panegyrist are not appealed to. Lawyers in the United States have not been, as a rule, either so discriminatingly just, or so severely harsh, as the critics in England. Blackstone has been, on the one hand, too slavishly followed, or, on the other, neglected and disparaged with too much prejudice. Of course the more eminent judges and the more learned scholars have assessed his values at their true worth. Professor Hammond, in his edition of the Commentaries, does Blackstone full justice on all occasions; he may even seem to have expended too much space in defending him from the attacks and aspersions of Bentham and Austin. His notes, however, constitute a valuable contribution to the Blackstone literature. Judge Dillon reminds us of Maine's judgment of certain of Hammond's discussions of the subject, where he tells us:

"Professor Hammond's learned exposition, in his introduction to Sandars' Justinian, of the classical distribution of the law and of Blackstone's classification and arrangement based thereon attracted the attention and called forth the commendation of Sir Henry Maine, who declared it to be 'the best defense he had seen.' 'Early Law and Custom,' chap. xi, p. 365 (American reprint). Hammond's Sandars' Justinian, Introduction, p. xlii, et seq. See, also, the notes of the same learned scholar to his edition of Blackstone, vol. 1, p. 316, note 1; Ib., p. 330, note 2."

Judge Dillon, likewise, in his Laws and Jurisprudence of England and America, has discussed fully Blackstone's work and services, from which we quote:

"By Blackstone's time the English law was sufficiently matured (as his Commentaries show) to admit of being put into methodical form; and the need for it arising from the mass of statutes and adjudged cases, and the insufficiency of existing text-books and treatises, pressed with increasing urgency. This great work could not have fallen into the hands of anyone better able than Blackstone to perform it. He was by no means unfamiliar with the practical work of the profession. He gave many studious years to the task of preparation. He was, moreover, a consummate literary artist. In this respect he has never been excelled,—and I must say that in my judgment he has never, among legal elementary authors, been quite equaled. Even Bentham was forced to admit that Blackstone was the 'first of all institutional writers who taught jurisprudence to speak the language of the scholar and the gentleman.' His generalizations are clear and concise; his historical researches minute and in general remarkably accurate, and his book is not, like so many modern works, a mere digest and arrangement of cases, but a systematic treatise. He had, therefore, all the qualifications—learning, general and legal, professional experience, literary gifts, and an exquisite artistic sense—necessary for the work on which he entered when he took his seat in 1758 as Vinerian Professor of Law at Oxford.

"In judging of his Commentaries, we must not fall into the mistake that some of Blackstone's critics make, and look at them from a wrong point of view. He was a teacher whose purpose was to set forth the English law as it then existed, and not a reformer whose purpose was to point out its defects with a view to its improvement. The two functions are, of course, not incompatible. But it is obviously not necessary in an institutional work whose design is to state the law as it is, that the author should expose and dwell upon the defects and imperfections of the system which he is expounding."

The examination of nearly ten thousand citations of Blackstone's Commentaries in the reports of American courts from 1789 to 1915 leads inevitably to the conclusion that Blackstone is accepted in the United States as an authoritative expositor of the common law. Many courts do go further in their explorations of the sources of the common law, but they nearly always end in conceding that Blackstone had correctly interpreted it. In England there have been judicial protests against his being taken as an "authority," without necessarily questioning the general correctness of his statements, but, nevertheless, it is said in the Dictionary of National Biography: "The Commentaries have had a yet higher legal fame, having almost, but not quite, reached the distinction accorded to those treatises which as Blackstone himself says, 'are cited as authority . . . and do not entirely depend on the strength of their quotations from older authors.' His name is constantly heard in our courts, and to this day judges fortify their decisions by quoting his statement of the law." And even of his exposition of the English constitution, it is said in the Encyclopædia Britannica (11th ed.): "It is certain that a vast amount of constitutional sentiment of the country has been inspired by its pages. To this day Blackstone's criticism of the English constitution would probably express the most profound political convictions of the majority of the English people. Long after it has ceased to be of much practical value as an authority in the courts, it remains an arbiter of all public discussions on the law or the constitution. On such occasions the Commentaries are apt to be construed as strictly as if they were a code."

The completest and most satisfactory discussion of the merits and influence of the Commentaries is contained in an article by Professor A. V. Dicey, in The National Review for December, 1909, p. 653. The substance of the article, which is entitled "Blackstone's Commentaries," was delivered on June 12, 1909, at All Souls College, Oxford. Professor Dicey says that the permanent merits of the work may be summed up in a few words. "The book is the work of an eminent lawyer who was also a consummate man of letters; by virtue both of his knowledge of law and of his literary genius he produced the one treatise on the laws of England which must for all time remain a part of English literature. The Commentaries live by their style." He then explains that "the command of style implies the possession by an author of at least three rare qualities: power of expression, clearness of aim, literary judgment or tact."

Even Bentham admitted Blackstone's mastery of expression, saying that Blackstone "first of all institutional writers, has taught jurisprudence to speak the language of the scholar and gentleman," and that his style is "correct, elegant, unembarrassed, ornamented." In respect to his clearness of aim, he intended to treat English law as a whole, and indubitably succeeded in his purpose, he and Bracton alone, according to the testimony of Maitland, the greatest of English legal historical scholars, achieving such a result. In respect to his literary judgment or tact, Professor Dicey says: "Of his supreme skill in the use of literary judgment no better example can be given than his unrivaled success in blending the history with the exposition of English law. How to achieve this combination is the problem which drives to despair any teacher who undertakes to explain adequately and intelligibly the existing law of England." "As illustrations of his skill," says Professor Dicey further on, "let me refer to his account of the rise, the progress, and the gradual improvement of the laws of England; to his sketch of the feudal system; to his tale of the doctrine of the benefit of clergy; to his explanation of the action of ejection, where the solemn description of a portentous series of legal fictions excites, and was intended to excite, not only interest, but amusement; to his explanation of the growth and nature of equity, which, at any rate till quite recently, remained the best, as it was certainly the most readable, exposition of a matter as to which the ideas even of trained lawyers exhibit no small perplexity."

Blackstone had hoped when he accepted the Vinerian Professorship to found a school of law at Oxford. He was disappointed in this. Compensation has come, however, even in England. For there grew up, whether by repulsion or otherwise, the analytical jurists of which Austin was the leader and Holland a later builder; and then the historical jurists, of which Maine was the leader, and Maitland the master. The schools of jurisprudence at the English universities, too, while not what Blackstone dreamed of, are perhaps, coupled with the work of the revised system of the Inns of Court, doing a higher and more needed work for legal scholarship. And again, Blackstone is the spirit, at least, to which the American law schools owe their life. "We transplanted," says the late Professor James Bradley Thayer, "an English root, and nurtured and developed it, while at home it was suffered to languish and die down. It was the great experiment in the university teaching of our law at Oxford, in the third quarter of the eighteenth century, and the publication, a little before the American Revolution, of the results of that experiment, which furnished the stimulus and the exemplar for our own early attempts at systematic legal education."*

"To the example of the Vinerian Professorship," says Professor Dicey, "is distinctly due the foundation in Massachusetts of the professorial Chair where Story expounded every portion of the law of England and continued his professorial labors even when raised to the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States. Kent, Story, and Marshall are merely a few among the many distinguished American lawyers who in spirit were the disciples of Blackstone. The famous American law schools, such as those of Harvard, Yale, Columbia, California, and Michigan, are in a real sense the fruit of his work and of his ideas. It is idle to apply in any serious sense the term failure to the career of a teacher the force of whose genius is felt and acknowledged in the universities where the most eminent professors of English law teach the principles of the law of England to the citizens of that Republican Commonwealth, which is as much the work of the English people as is the constitutional monarchy of England."

In the words of this same distinguished Vinerian Professor, who recently retired from his chair, and who cheerfully acknowledges the full debt that he, and all the scholars and lawyers of the English-speaking world, owe to the author of the Commentaries, Blackstone "will remain forever the eminent lawyer, the perfect professor, the consummate man of letters, whose genius claimed and vindicated for English law its high and rightful place in the noble literature of England."

WILLIAM CAREY JONES.

---

* The Teaching of English Law at Universities, Legal Essays, by James Bradley Thayer.

BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE COMMENTARIES.

---

To give an accurate account of the editions prior to the fifth, it is necessary to distinguish the volumes.

Vol. I was first published in 1765 in a large broad-margined quarto, bearing the title and imprint: Commentaries on the Laws of England. By William Blackstone, Esq., Vinerian Professor of Law and Solicitor-General to her Majesty. Oxford, printed at the Clarendon Press, MDCCLXV, pp. (xi) 473. In this edition the preface is not dated, but in the second edition it bears the date November 2, 1765, with a postscript dated November 2, 1766. The Second Edition of this volume, pp. (vii) 485, bears date, MDCCLXVI. The Third, pp. (x) 485, MDCCLXVIII. The Fourth, pp. (x) 485, MDCCLXX.

Vol. II. First Edition, pp. (viii) 520, App. xix, MDCCLXVI. (See note a.) Second Edition, pp. (viii) 520, App. xix, MDCCLXVII. Third Edition, pp. (viii) 520, App. xix, MDCCLXVIII. Fourth Edition, pp. (viii) 520, App. xix, MDCCLXX.

Vol. III. First Edition, pp. (8) 455, App. xxvii, MDCCLXVIII. Fourth Edition, pp. (viii) 455, App. xxvii, MDCCLXX.

Vol. IV. First Edition, pp. (viii) 436, App. vii, Index 39. MDCCLXIX.

All the foregoing are in quarto. I suppose, from all the copies I have been able to see, that when the first two volumes had reached the fourth edition, the same numbering was given to the third and

---

(a) Volume II has the same number of pages in all the early quarto editions, and it may be worth while to give a few of the distinguishing marks by which each edition may be known. The first and second have a list of the errata facing page 1, the first contains 12 lines, the second 7, while the third and fourth have none.

Page 13, line 6, first edition reads never can be heir: second and following, never can be their immediate heir. Page 21, line 4, first reads, collateral to and issuing: second and following, collateral to or issuing. Page 52, line 8, first and second read broke: third and fourth, broken. First, second, and third begin this page a high hand and end of our; the fourth begins as the basis, ends arms. This is the best distinction between the third and fourth editions.

Volume III, 1768, with second edition of I and II, has pages vi, xxvii, 455. Appendix in front. 1770, marked fourth edition. 1769 with fourth edition but not marked.

(xxxi)

fourth volumes, though they had not passed through any editions between the first and fourth.

The first edition I have found in octavo is a Dublin reprint, printed for John Exshaw, Henry Saunders, Boulter Grierson, and James Williams (their names vary in the different volumes), MDCCLXXI. It is curious that in this edition the author is termed "Sir William Blackstone, one of his Majesty's Justices of the Honorable Court of Common Pleas," though in the English editions this is not done until after his death. (See ninth edition, post.) This edition is called on the title page the fourth. So far as I have collated it, it is based on the text of the third English edition.

The title "Vinerian Professor of Law" appears in the first, second, and third editions of volume I, but not in the first, second, or third editions of volume II, or in any edition of volumes III and IV. With the fourth edition it disappears entirely. The title of Solicitor-General to the Queen remains in all title pages to the eighth inclusive, though Blackstone had resigned the office and been succeeded by Mr. Ambler, when he took his seat on the K. B., vice Mr. Justice Yates in 1770. (See 5 Burr. 2585; 3 Wils. 50.)

The Fifth Edition, Oxford, at the Clarendon Press, MDCCLXXIII, printed for William Strahan, Thomas Cadell, and Daniel Prince. 8vo., 4 vols. The pages of volumes I, II, and III same with those of the first four editions; vol. IV, pages (viii) 443, vii, Index 51. This was the first (Eng.) octavo edition. (Hist. of Bl. p. 46, n.)

The Sixth Edition, London, printed for W. Strahan, T. Cadell in the Strand, and D. Prince at Oxford, MDCCLXXIV, quarto edition, title page otherwise same as above (5th). The pages of volumes I, II, and III same with those of first five editions; volume IV, pages (viii) 443, vii, Index 40.

The Seventh Edition, Oxford, at the Clarendon Press, MDCCLXXV, printed for William Strahan, Thomas Cadell, and Daniel Prince, octavo, 4 volumes, substantially same with the fifth edition.

The Eighth Edition, title page same as above (5th and 7th eds.), MDCCLXXVIII; 8vo., 4 vols. By W. B., Esq., Solicitor-General.

The Ninth Edition, title page same except that the author's name now appears as "Sir W. B. Knt., one of the Justices of his Majesty's Court of Common Pleas." "The Ninth Edition, with the Last Corrections of the Author and continued to the Present Time. By Ri. Burn, LL.D., London, printed for W. Strahan, T. Cadell in the Strand, and D. Prince, Oxford, MDCCLXXXIII." 4 vols., 8vo. The Editor's Advertisement is dated July 20, 1783.

The Tenth Edition was published in 1787 by John Williams, Esq. (with slight additions, see Clarke's Bibl. Legum, p. 103; Bridgman's Legal Bibl. p. 19), London, 4 vols., 6vo.

The Eleventh Edition, London, 1791, also by Williams. Advertisement bears date January 12, 1791.

The Twelfth Edition (with portraits of the judges), with the last corrections of the author and with notes and additions by Edward Christian, Esq., Barrister at Law and Professor of the Laws of England in the University of Cambridge, London, 1793-1795. 4 vols., 8vo.

This edition is said to have been originally published in numbers, each number containing the portrait of a judge. This was done by the publishers and disclaimed by the editor in his preface. The portraits in Book III, the only volume of this edition I have had a chance to examine, are these: William Earl of Mansfield, opposite title page; Lord Ch. Baron Gilbert, opposite page 167; Sir John Comyns, Kt., opposite page 325; Philip Earl of Hardwicke, opposite page 426.

The Thirteenth Edition, by Christian, London, 1800. 4 vols., 8vo. (That of Dublin, 1796, 4 vols., 12mo., though called the thirteenth edition and having Christian's notes, is doubtless fraudulent. In the Dublin reprint, and the American, the notes are in an appendix to each book; but mentioned on the title page thus: "and continued to the present time by Edward Christian, Esq., Barrister at Law and Professor of the Laws of England in the University of Cambridge.")

The Fourteenth Edition, in 1803, with notes and additions, was published by Edward Christian, Esq. Bridgman's L. B., p. 20. (Dr. Hoffman in his course of Legal Study, p. 159, mentions this as Christian's first edition, but this is evidently a mistake.)

The Fifteenth Edition, with notes by E. Christian, London, 1809.

The Sixteenth Edition, with notes by J. F. Archbold (added to Christian's), London, 1811. 4 vols., royal 8vo. (See Camus, No.

2081; Hoffman, p. 159.) I have never been able to find a copy of the three last mentioned.

The Seventeenth Edition, with notes by J. T. Coleridge, London, 1825.

The Eighteenth Edition, with notes by J. Chitty, London, 1826 (often reprinted in America).

The Nineteenth Edition, by Hovenden and Ryland, London, 1836, is described in a Philadelphia reprint as "with a life of the author and notes by Christian, Chitty, Lee, Hovenden, and Ryland," adding references to the American cases by a member of the New York Bar.

The Twentieth Edition (with additions to the text) was by James Stewart, London, 1841-1844.

The Twenty-first Edition, London, 1844, 4 vols., was edited by four members of the English Bar, viz.: Vol. I by J. F. Hargrave, Vol. II by G. Sweet, Vol. III by R. Couch, Vol. IV by W. N. Welsby.

The text of this edition was reprinted from the ninth edition, published by Dr. Burn after Blackstone's death, and is therefore more correct than that of the later editions generally.

This edition was reprinted in New York, 4 vols., 8vo., with notes by Wendell.

It seems to have been the last English edition of the original work which received any careful editorial supervision. Serjeant Stephen's New Commentaries founded on Blackstone, 4 vols., 8vo., appeared in 1841. "The Commentaries on the Laws of England," by H. Broom and E. A. Hadley, 4 vols., 8vo., were first published in 1869. In the preface to this work the writers say that the twenty-first edition of the Commentaries of Blackstone, containing many valuable notes, had been placed at their entire disposal.

EARLY AMERICAN EDITIONS OF BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES.

There was an American edition in four volumes octavo published 1771-72, an account of which will be found in the preface. It was by Robert Bell of Philadelphia, who in 1773 issued proposals for "reprinting a second American edition in four volumes quarto, at three dollars each volume. Those gentlemen who were subscribers to the first edition in octavo, and now choose to possess the quarto edition, shall have their octavo (if not abused) exchanged for the quarto on paying the difference between the prices."

I have never seen a copy of this quarto edition, and doubt whether it was published, especially as the edition of 1799 (see below) was called the second American edition. Of the great number of copies printed of the first, the only one I have ever seen is in the Library of the Supreme Court of Washington. It was "reprinted from the British copy, page for page with the last edition," viz., the fourth, as may be seen by comparing page 109 of volume I, containing the stat. 7 Geo. III, c. 59, not in the third edition or the so-called fourth Dublin edition. The following curious note is appended to the Table of Contents of the first volume:—

If any reader of this Edition meets with some words uncommonly spelled, he is requested not hastily to blame the American editor because Report saith that the last British edition was corrected under the immediate inspection of the learned author, and it has of late been the practice of several great men to spell many words in their own peculiar manner. Therefore the American editor, to make this American edition a perfect transcript of the last British edition, hath adhered to it as literally as possible.

This first edition was followed by the same publisher with an interesting appendix to Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, containing: I. Priestley's Remarks relating to the Dissenters. II. Blackstone's Reply. III. Priestley's Answer. IV. The case of the late election of Middlesex [by Blackstone]. V. Furneaux's Letters to Blackstone concerning Toleration and Religious Liberty. VI. Argument of Mr. J. Foster and speech of Lord Mansfield in the cause between the City of London and the Dissenters. America. Printed for the subscribers by Robert Bell, at the late Union Library in Third Street, Philadelphia, MDCCLXXIII. Parts I to IV contain pages iv, 119. Parts V and VI contain pages xii, 155. This volume is occasionally quoted in the earlier American reports as App. Bl.

The Boston edition of 1799 has the following title page, which from the notes prefixed appears to have been taken from the eleventh English edition of 1791: Commentaries on the Laws of England. In Four Books. By Sir William Blackstone, Knt. One of the Late Justices of His Majesty's Court of Common Pleas. In Four Volumes. Second American Edition, carefully reprinted from the last London Edition. Containing the Last Corrections of the Author, the Additions by Richard Burn, LL.D., and Continued to the Present Time, by John Williams, Esq. Vol. I. Book I. Printed at Boston, by I. Thomas and E. T. Andrews. Sold by them at Faust's Statue, No. 45, Newbury Street; by I. Thomas, Worcester; by Thomas, Andrews, and Penniman, Albany; by Thomas, Andrews, and Butler, Baltimore; and by E. S. Thomas, Charleston, S. C. 1799.

Bound up with each volume but separately paged are Mr. Christian's notes. The title page of those in Book I is this: Notes to Blackstone's Commentaries which are calculated to Answer all the Editions. By Edward Christian, Esq., Barrister at Law and Professor of the Laws of England in the University of Cambridge. Vol. V. Printed at Boston by I. Thomas and E. T. Andrews. Sold by them at their Bookstore, Faust's Statue, No. 45, Newbury Street; by said Thomas at Worcester; by Thomas, Andrews, and Penniman at Albany; and by Thomas, Andrews, and Butler at Baltimore. Jan., 1801. (The Dublin edition in 12mo. of 1796 has them printed in the same form, but paged continuously with the text. It also mentions them in the title page, and in a note by the printer dated Dec., 1796.)

Judge Wilson, whose lectures were prepared and delivered in 1790-91, though not published until 1804, evidently used a text of Blackstone identical with that of the fourth English edition, as may be seen by comparing his extract on pages 83, 84, and 180 of volume I. of his works with the text and notes of this edition, Book I.; pages 43, 49, etc.

Tucker's edition, first published in 1803, of course follows the latest text of the author's own work (9th ed. 1783), though I have noticed in some few places unimportant departure from it and return to the text of the earlier editions.

[WILLIAM G. HAMMOND.]

THE AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

---

THE following sheets contain the substance of a course of lectures on the laws of England, which were read by the author in the university of Oxford. His original plan took its rise in the year 1753: and, notwithstanding the novelty of such an attempt in this age and country, and the prejudices usually conceived against any innovations in the established mode of education, he had the satisfaction to find (and he acknowledges it with a mixture of pride and gratitude) that his endeavors were encouraged and patronized by those, both in the university and out of it, whose good opinion and esteem he was principally desirous to obtain.

The death of Mr. Viner in 1756, and his ample benefaction to the university for promoting the study of the law, produced about two years afterwards a regular and public establishment of what the author had privately undertaken. The knowledge of our laws and constitution was adopted as a liberal science by general academical authority; competent endowments were decreed for the support of a lecturer, and the perpetual encouragement of students; and the compiler of the ensuing commentaries had the honor to be elected the first Vinerian professor.

In this situation he was led, both by duty and inclination, to investigate the elements of the law, and the grounds of our civil polity, with greater assiduity and attention than many have thought it necessary to do. And yet all, who of late years have attended the public administration of justice, must be sensible that a masterly acquaintance with the general spirit of laws and the principles of universal jurisprudence, combined with an accurate knowledge of our own municipal constitutions, their original, reason, and history, hath given a beauty and energy to many modern judicial decisions, with which our ancestors were wholly unacquainted. If, in the pursuit of these inquiries, the author hath been able to rectify any errors which either himself or others may have heretofore imbibed, his pains will be sufficiently answered: and, if in some points he is still mistaken, the candid and judicious reader will make due allowances for the difficulties of a search so new, so extensive, and so laborious.

(xxxvii)

The labor indeed of these researches, and of a regular attention to his duty, for a series of so many years, he hath found inconsistent with his health, as well as his other avocations: and hath therefore desired the university's permission to retire from his office, after the conclusion of the annual course in which he is at present engaged. But the hints, which he had collected for the use of his pupils, having been thought by some of his more experienced friends not wholly unworthy of the public eye, it is therefore with the less reluctance that he now commits them to the press: though probably the little degree of reputation, which their author may have acquired by the candor of an audience (a test widely different from that of a deliberate perusal) would have been better consulted by a total suppression of his lectures;—had that been a matter entirely within his power.

For the truth is, that the present publication is as much the effect of necessity, as it is of choice. The notes which were taken by his hearers, have by some of them (too partial in his favor) been thought worth revising and transcribing; and these transcripts have been frequently lent to others. Hence copies have been multiplied, in their nature imperfect, if not erroneous; some of which have fallen into mercenary hands, and become the object of clandestine sale. Having therefore so much reason to apprehend a surreptitious impression, he chose rather to submit his own errors to the world, than to seem answerable for those of other men. And, with this apology, he commits himself to the indulgence of the public.

2 Nov. 1765.

---

POSTSCRIPT BY THE AUTHOR.

Notwithstanding the diffidence expressed in the foregoing Preface, no sooner was the work completed, but many of its positions were vehemently attacked by zealots of all, even opposite, denominations, religious as well as civil; by some with a greater, by others with a less degree of acrimony. To such of these animadvertisers as have fallen within the author's notice, for he doubts not but some have escaped it, he owes at least this obligation, that they have occasioned him from time to time to revise his work, in respect to the particulars objected to; to retract or expunge from it what appeared to be really erroneous; to amend or supply it when inaccurate or defective; to illustrate and explain it when obscure. But where he thought the objections ill-founded, he hath left, and shall leave, the book to defend itself; being fully of opinion, that if his principles be false and his doctrines unwarrantable, no apology from himself can make them right; if founded in truth and rectitude, no censure from others can make them wrong.

[2 Nov. 1766.]

OUTLINE.

BOOK I.

INTRODUCTION.

SECTION I.

ON THE STUDY OF THE LAW.

[References are to star paging.]

§ 1.	Introductory .....	3
§ 2.	Study of law on the Continent and in Scotland.....	4
§ 3.	Study of law abroad by Englishmen.....	5
§ 4.	The common law as an element of culture.....	5
§ 5.	Aim of this lecture.....	6
§ 6.	Importance of the study of law.....	6
	Note: Definition of liberty.....	6n
	Note: General interest in the study of law.....	7n
§ 7.	1. To landed proprietors.....	7
§ 8.	2. To testators .....	7
§ 9.	3. To jurors .....	8
§ 10.	4. To magistrates .....	8
§ 11.	5. To legislators .....	9
§ 12.	6. To the nobility .....	11
§ 13.	a. As judges .....	11
§ 14.	(1) An instance from Roman history.....	12
§ 15.	7. To the clergy .....	13
§ 16.	8. To physicians .....	14
§ 17.	Study of the civil and canon law.....	14
§ 18.	Academic neglect of the common law.....	16
§ 19.	1. Fortescue's explanation .....	16
§ 20.	2. Mediæval teaching of common law.....	17
§ 21.	3. Vogue of the civil law.....	17
	Note: Revival of study of Roman law.....	18n
§ 22.	4. The civil law in England.....	18
	Note: Vacarius .....	18n
	Note: Roman law in England.....	19n
§ 23.	5. Conflict between the civil and common law.....	19
	Note: Role of the clergy in mediæval law.....	20n
§ 24.	6. Other causes of neglect.....	21
	Note: Abbot of Torum's case.....	22n
	Note: Roman law in mediæval England.....	22n
§ 25.	Restoration of the common law.....	22

[References are to star paging.]

§ 26.	1. Inns of Chancery and Inns of Court.....	23
	Note: Inns of Court.....	23n
§ 27.	a. Decline of the inns.....	25
§ 28.	University instruction in law.....	26
§ 29.	1. The Vinerian professorship of law.....	27
§ 30.	2. Advantages of university teaching of law.....	30
	Note: Function of university schools of law.....	31n
§ 31.	Importance of a university education for lawyers.....	31
	Note: Roman law in legal education.....	32n
§ 32.	Groundwork of a lawyer's education.....	33
	Note: Legal education in England.....	34n
§ 33.	Method of these Commentaries.....	34
§ 34.	1. General map of the law.....	35
	Note: General map of the law.....	35n
§ 35.	Hints to the law student.....	36

SECTION II.

OF THE NATURE OF LAWS IN GENERAL.

§ 36.	Meaning of law.....	38
	Note: Definition of law by Austin and Holland.....	38n
§ 37.	1. Law as order of the universe.....	38
§ 38.	2. Law as a rule of human action.....	39
	Note: Laws of nature and laws of man.....	39n
§ 39.	3. Law of nature.....	39
	Note: The law of nature.....	39n
	Note: Ulpian's juris præcepta .....	40n
	Note: May judges disregard acts of parliament.....	41n
§ 40.	4. Revealed law.....	41
	Note: Religion and law.....	42n
§ 41.	5. Law of nations.....	43
	Note: Jus gentium .....	44n
§ 42.	6. Municipal law.....	44
§ 43.	a. Definition of municipal law.....	44
	Note: Definition of law: Bigelow.....	44n
§ 44.	(1) It is a "rule".....	44
§ 45.	(2) It is "a rule of civil conduct".....	45
§ 46.	(3) It is "a rule prescribed".....	45
	Note: Ex post facto laws.....	46n
	Note: Retrospective legislation.....	46n
§ 47.	(4) It is "a rule prescribed by the supreme power in a state".....	46
§ 48.	(a) Nature of civil government.....	47
§ 49.	(b) Foundations of society.....	47
	Note: Social contract.....	47n
§ 50.	(c) Establishment of government.....	48

[References are to star paging.]

§ 51.	(d) Sovereignty .....	48
§ 52.	(e) Forms of government.....	49
§ 53.	(f) Laws made by sovereign .....	49
§ 54.	(g) Merits and demerits of different forms of government .....	49
§ 55.	(h) The British constitution .....	50
§ 56.	(i) Merits of the British constitution .....	51
§ 57.	(j) Legislative power supreme.....	52
	Note: Constitutions .....	52n
§ 58.	(5) Definition of law continued .....	53
§ 59.	(6) "Commanding what is right, prohibiting what is wrong" .....	53
§ 60.	(7) Seven parts of a law.....	53
	Note: The parts of a law .....	53n
§ 61.	(a) Declaratory part .....	54
	Note: Malum in se and malum prohibitum . .....	54n
§ 62.	(b) Directory part .....	55
§ 63.	(c) Remedial part .....	55
§ 64.	(d) Vindictory part, or sanction .....	56
§ 65.	Mala in se and mala prohibita .....	57
§ 66.	Interpretation of laws.....	58
§ 67.	(Roman method of interpretation).....	59
	Note: Authentic interpretation and declaratory laws.....	59n
§ 68.	1. Interpretation by the usual meaning of words.....	59
§ 69.	2. According to context .....	60
§ 70.	3. According to subject matter .....	60
§ 71.	4. According to the effect .....	61
§ 72.	5. According to the reason of the law.....	61
§ 73.	a. Equity .....	62
	Note: Equitable interpretation .....	62n

SECTION III.

OF THE LAWS OF ENGLAND.

§ 74.	Divisions of the law of England.....	63
	Note: Written law and unwritten law.....	63n
§ 75.	1. The unwritten, or common, law .....	63
§ 76.	a. Ancient customs .....	64
§ 77.	b. Alfred's laws .....	64
	Note: Origin of the common law.....	65n
§ 78.	c. Danish and Saxon laws .....	65
§ 79.	d. Laws of Edward the Confessor .....	66
§ 80.	e. Source of validity of a custom.....	67
	Note: Antiquity of the common law .....	67n
§ 81.	f. Divisions of the common law .....	67

[References are to star paging.]

§ 82.	(1) General customs .....	68
	Note: Customary law .....	68n
§ 83.	(a) Precedents .....	69
	Note: Doctrine of precedents.....	70n
	Note: Ratio decidendi and obiter dictum .....	70n
§ 84.	(b) Judicial decisions evidence of the common law .....	70
§ 85.	(c) Reports .....	71
	Note: Law reporters .....	72n
§ 86.	(d) Writings of the sages of the law.....	72
	Note: Legal treatises .....	72n
§ 87.	(e) Regard of the Roman law for custom.....	73
§ 88.	(2) Particular customs .....	74
	Note: Particular customs and usage.....	74n
§ 89.	(a) Lex mercatoria .....	75
	Note: Law-merchant .....	75n
§ 90.	(b) Rules relating to particular customs.....	75
§ 91.	(i) Proof of their existence .....	76
§ 92.	(ii) Their legality: Requisites therefor....	76
	Note: Malus usus est abolendus ....	76n
§ 93.	(aa) That they be immemorial .....	76
§ 94.	(bb) That they be continued .....	77
§ 95.	(cc) That they be peaceable .....	77
§ 96.	(dd) That they be reasonable .....	77
§ 97.	(ee) That they be certain .....	78
§ 98.	(ff) That they be compulsive .....	78
§ 99.	(gg) That they be consistent .....	78
§ 100.	(iii) Method of allowance .....	78
§ 101.	(3) Special kinds of law .....	79
	Note: The canon and civil law in England ....	80n
	Note: English statutes in America .....	80n
§ 102.	(a) Civil, or Roman, law .....	80
§ 103.	(i) History of the Roman law.....	80
§ 104.	(ii) Divisions of Justinian's corpus juris civilis .....	81
§ 105.	(b) Canon, or ecclesiastical, law .....	82
	(i) Pontifical collections .....	82
§ 106.	(ii) Legatine and provincial constitutions. ....	82
§ 107.	(iii) Canons enacted under James I.....	83
§ 108.	(iv) Courts in which the civil and canon laws are administered .....	83
§ 109.	(v) Subordination of civil and canon law courts to.....	84
	(aa) Courts of common law.....	84
§ 110.	(bb) To acts of parliament.....	84
§ 111.	(cc) To an appeal to the king.....	84

[References are to star paging.]

§ 112.	2. The written law, or statutes .....	85
§ 113.	a. Different kinds of statutes .....	85
§ 114.	(1) Public acts .....	85
	(2) Special or private acts .....	85
	Note: Distinction between public and private laws .....	85n
§ 115.	b. Classes of statutes: (1) Declaratory .....	86
§ 116.	(2) Remedial: (a) enlarging; (b) restraining.....	86
§ 117.	c. Construction of statutes .....	87
§ 118.	(1) Construction of remedial statutes .....	87
§ 119.	(2) Statutes treating of inferior persons or things not to be extended to superior .....	88
§ 120.	(3) Construction of penal statutes .....	88
§ 121.	(4) Construction of statutes against frauds .....	88
§ 122.	(5) Construction by context .....	89
§ 123.	(6) Repugnant clauses .....	89
§ 124.	(7) A statute supersedes the common law .....	89
§ 125.	(8) Effect of repeal of a repealing act .....	90
§ 126.	(9) Irrepealable legislation .....	90
	Note: Parliament cannot bind its successors....	90n
§ 127.	(10) Impossible and unreasonable acts .....	91
§ 128.	d. Courts of equity .....	91
	Note: Origin and history of equity jurisdiction .....	92n

SECTION IV.

OF THE COUNTRIES SUBJECT TO THE LAWS OF ENGLAND.

§ 129.	The king's dominions, outside England.....	93
§ 130.	1. Wales .....	93
§ 131.	a. Legislation under Henry VIII.....	94
§ 132.	2. Scotland .....	95
§ 133.	a. The Act of Union of 1707.....	96
§ 134.	b. Essentials of the Act of Union.....	97
§ 135.	c. The town of Berwick.....	98
§ 136.	3. Ireland .....	99
§ 137.	a. Brehon law .....	100
§ 138.	b. Irish parliament .....	101
§ 139.	c. Power of the Irish parliament: Poyning's laws.....	102
§ 140.	d. Dependence of Ireland .....	104
	Note: Union of Ireland and question of home rule....	104n
§ 141.	4. Adjacent islands subject to the crown.....	104
§ 142.	a. Isle of Man .....	105
§ 143.	b. Jersey, Guernsey, Sark, and Alderney.....	106
§ 144.	c. English colonies in America .....	106
	Note: Rights of European governments on American Continent .....	108n
	Note: Authority of the common law in America.....	108n

[References are to star paging.]

§ 145.	(1) Forms of government: (a) Provincial .....	108
§ 146.	(b) Proprietary governments.....	108
§ 147.	(c) Charter governments .....	108
	Note: Appeals to the king in council.....	108n
§ 148.	(d) Colonies and parliament.....	109
	Note: Relation of American colonies to parliament .....	109n
§ 149.	Foreign possessions of the crown.....	109
§ 150.	The high sea.....	110
	Note: Jurisdiction over the high seas.....	110n
§ 151.	Divisions of England.....	111
§ 152.	1. The ecclesiastical division: a. Provinces of Canterbury and York; subdivisions .....	111
§ 153.	b. Parishes .....	111
§ 154.	2. The civil division .....	113
§ 155.	a. Tithings, towns or vills.....	114
	Note: Modern legislation on local government.....	115n
§ 156.	b. Hundreds .....	115
§ 157.	c. Counties or shires.....	116
	Note: Importance of the division into counties.....	116n
§ 158.	(1) Counties palatine .....	116
§ 159.	d. Counties corporate .....	120

BOOK I.

OF THE RIGHTS OF PERSONS.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE ABSOLUTE RIGHTS OF INDIVIDUALS.

§ 160.	Objects of the law: rights and wrongs.....	121
	Note: Meaning of "a right"; rights; legal rights; legal duties..	122n
	Note: Rights in rem and rights in personam.....	122n
	Note: Scheme of rights in Anglo-American law.....	122n
§ 161.	Division of rights and of wrongs.....	122
	Note: "Jura rerum" .....	122n
	Note: Stephen's classification of rights.....	122n
	Note: Civil injuries and crimes.....	122n
§ 162.	Division of these Commentaries .....	122
§ 163.	1. Rights of persons .....	122
§ 164.	a. Division of persons .....	123
§ 165.	b. Division of rights of persons; absolute and relative....	123
	Note: Langdell's classification of rights into absolute and relative .....	123n
§ 166.	(1) Absolute rights .....	123
§ 167.	(a) Protection of absolute rights .....	124
§ 168.	(b) Natural liberty .....	125

[References are to star paging.]

§ 169.	(c) Civil liberty .....	125
	Note: The nature of legal rights and duties .....	126n
§ 170.	(d) Civil liberty in England.....	126
§ 171.	(e) Vicissitudes of English liberties.....	127
§ 172.	(i) Charters of liberty.....	127
§ 173.	(f) Classification of personal rights.....	129
	Note: Liberty of conscience .....	129n
	Note: Right of privacy.....	129n
§ 174.	(i) Personal security .....	129
§ 175.	(aa) Life .....	129
	Note: Child in ventre sa mere ..	130n
§ 176.	(bb) Limbs .....	130
§ 177.	(cc) Self-defense .....	130
§ 178.	(dd) Duress .....	130
	Note: Defense of duress.....	131n
	Note: Duress of goods.....	131n
§ 179.	(ee) Civil death .....	132
	Note: Civil death in the United States .....	132n
§ 180.	(ff) Forfeiture of life.....	133
§ 181.	(gg) Due process of law .....	133
§ 182.	(hh) Bodily immunity .....	134
§ 183.	(ii) Preservation of health .....	134
§ 184.	(jj) Security of reputation .....	134
§ 185.	(ii) Personal liberty .....	134
	Note: Definition of civil liberty.....	134n
§ 186.	(aa) Law of the land.....	134
§ 187.	(bb) Habeas corpus .....	135
§ 188.	(cc) Suspension of writ of habeas cor- pus .....	135
§ 189.	(dd) False imprisonment .....	136
§ 190.	(ee) Banishment .....	137
	Note: Transportation, extradi- tion, deportation, exile.....	137n
§ 191.	(iii) Right of private property; law of the land .....	138
§ 192.	(aa) Right of eminent domain.....	139
	Note: Right of eminent domain	139n
	(bb) Taxation and representation.....	140
§ 193.	(iv) Bulwarks of personal rights.....	140
§ 194.	(aa) Parliament .....	141
§ 196.	(bb) Limitation of king's prerogative	141
§ 197.	(cc) The courts; due process of law..	141
§ 198.	(dd) Right of petition .....	143
§ 199.	(ee) Right to bear arms.....	143
§ 200.	Summary of chapter. ....	144

[References are to star paging.]

CHAPTER II.

OF THE PARLIAMENT.

§ 201.	Relations of persons: public and private.....	146
	Note: Division of persons, of rights, and of law.....	146n
§ 202.	Government .....	146
§ 203.	1. Departments of government.....	146
§ 204.	Parliament: 1. Beginnings in Europe.....	147
§ 205.	2. Saxon wittenagemote .....	147
§ 206.	3. Norman great council.....	148
§ 207.	4. The modern parliament: magna carta .....	149
	Note: Origin of parliament.....	149n
§ 208.	5. Constitution of parliament.....	150
	a. Meeting .....	150
§ 209.	(1) The convention parliament of 1660.....	151
§ 210.	(2) The convention of 1688 .....	152
§ 211.	(3) Parliament convoked by the crown.....	153
§ 212.	b. Constituent parts of parliament.....	153
	Note: The estates of the realm.....	153n
§ 213.	(1) The crown .....	154
§ 214.	(2) House of lords. (a) Lords spiritual.....	155
§ 215.	(b) Lords temporal .....	157
§ 216.	(c) Rank and honors in a state.....	157
§ 217.	(d) Nobility in a state.....	158
§ 218.	(3) The house of commons.....	158
§ 219.	(a) Principle of representation.....	158
	Note: Representation in the house of commons .....	159n
§ 220.	(4) Consent of all parts of parliament.....	160
	Note: Changes introduced by the Parliament Act of 1911 .....	160n
	Note: Penalties of præmunire .....	160n
§ 221.	c. Laws and customs of parliament.....	160
§ 222.	(1) Supreme power of parliament.....	160
	Note: Democratization of parliament.....	161n
§ 223.	(2) Qualification of members.....	162
§ 224.	(3) Jurisdiction of each house over its own affairs... ..	163
§ 225.	(4) Privileges of parliament.....	164
§ 226.	(a) Privileges of members.....	164
§ 227.	(b) Writ of privilege.....	166
§ 228.	(c) No privilege in crimes.....	166
	Note: Parliamentary privilege.....	167n
§ 229.	d. Privileges of the lords.....	167
	Note: Proxies in the house of lords.....	168n
§ 230.	e. Privileges of the commons.....	169
§ 231.	(1) In respect to money bills.....	169
	Note: The Parliament Act of 1911.....	170n
§ 232.	(2) In election of members.....	170

[References are to star paging.]

§ 233.	(a) Qualifications of electors.....	171
§ 234.	(i) Electors of knights of the shire.....	172
	Note: The franchise under modern English legislation .....	174n
§ 235.	(ii) Electors of burgesses.....	174
§ 236.	(iii) Representation of universities.....	174
§ 237.	(b) Qualifications of members of house of com- mons .....	175
§ 238.	(c) Regulation of elections.....	177
	Note: Secret ballot.....	177n
§ 239.	(i) Purity of elections.....	179
§ 240.	(ii) The poll .....	180
§ 241.	(iii) Return and canvass of vote.....	180
§ 242.	f. Method of making laws. (1) Speakers. (2) Majority rule.....	181
	Note: Speakers of the two houses.....	181n
§ 243.	(3) Introduction of bills.....	181
§ 244.	(4) Reading of bills.....	182
§ 245.	(5) Debate and passage of bills.....	182
§ 246.	(6) Consideration of bills in second house.....	183
§ 247.	(7) The royal assent.....	184
§ 248.	(8) Publication of a statute.....	185
§ 249.	(9) Effect of acts of parliament.....	185
§ 250.	g. Adjournment, prorogation, dissolution .....	186
§ 251.	(1) Adjournment of parliament.....	186
§ 252.	(2) Prorogation of parliament.....	186
§ 253.	(3) Dissolution of parliament. (a) By the king's will.	187
§ 254.	(b) By demise of the crown.....	188
§ 255.	(c) By lapse of time.....	189

CHAPTER III.

OF THE KING, AND HIS TITLE.

§ 256.	The king: the supreme executive.....	190
§ 257.	Importance of a rule of succession.....	190
§ 258.	Succession to the throne.....	191
§ 259.	1. The royal succession is hereditary.....	191
§ 260.	a. Elective and hereditary monarchies.....	192
§ 261.	2. The royal succession is feudal in character.....	193
§ 262.	3. The royal succession is not indefeasible.....	195
§ 263.	4. The royal succession is perpetual.....	196
§ 264.	Historical review of the rulers of England.....	196
§ 265.	1. King Egbert (802-839).....	197
§ 266.	2. From Egbert to Edmund Ironside (802-1016).....	198
§ 267.	3. The Danish kings (1014-1042).....	198
§ 268.	4. Edward the Confessor (1042-1066); Harold (1066).....	198
§ 269.	5. William I (1066-1087).....	199

[References are to star paging.]

§ 270.	a. The Norman Conquest.....	199
§ 271.	6. William II (1087-1100); Henry I (1100-1135).....	200
§ 272.	7. Stephen (1135-1154).....	200
§ 273.	8. House of Plantagenet (1154-1399).....	200
	a. Henry II (1154-1189).....	201
§ 274.	b. Richard I (1189-1199).....	201
	c. John (1199-1216).....	201
	d. Henry III (1216-1272).....	202
	e. Edward I (1272-1307).....	202
	f. Edward II (1307-1327).....	202
	g. Edward III (1327-1377).....	202
	h. Richard II (1377-1399).....	202
§ 275.	9. House of Lancaster (1399-1461).....	202
	a. Henry IV (1399-1413).....	202
§ 276.	(1) Act of Succession to the Crown, 1405.....	203
§ 277.	b. Henry V (1413-1422).....	204
	c. Henry VI (1422-1461).....	204
§ 278.	10. House of York (1461-1485).....	204
	a. Edward IV (1461-1483).....	204
§ 279.	b. Edward V (1483).....	204
	c. Richard III (1483-1485).....	204
§ 280.	11. House of Tudor (1485-1603).....	204
§ 281.	a. Henry VII (1485-1509).....	205
	Note: Title of Henry VII.....	205n
§ 282.	b. Henry VIII (1509-1547).....	205
	(1) Act of Succession to the Crown, 1534.....	206
§ 283.	(2) Acts of Succession to the Crown, 1536, 1543.....	206
	c. Edward VI (1547-1553).....	206
	d. Mary (1553-1558).....	206
§ 284.	(1) Act of Succession to the Crown, 1554.....	206
§ 285.	e. Elizabeth (1558-1603).....	207
	(1) Acts of Succession to the Crown, 1558, 1571.....	207
§ 286.	12. House of Stuart (1603-1714).....	208
	a. James I (1603-1625).....	208
§ 287.	(1) Act of Succession to the Crown, 1603.....	208
§ 288.	b. Charles I (1625-1649).....	209
	(1) The Commonwealth (1649-1660).....	209
	(2) Proclamation of restoration.....	209
	c. Charles II (1660-1685).....	210
§ 289.	(1) The crown hereditary subject to parliament.....	210
§ 290.	(a) The bill of exclusion, 1679-1681.....	210
§ 291.	d. James II (1685-1689).....	210
§ 292.	(1) The revolution of 1688.....	211
§ 293.	(a) Character of the revolution.....	212
§ 294.	e. William and Mary (1689-1702).....	213
	(1) Regulation of the succession (Bill of Rights, 1689)	214
§ 295.	f. Anne (1702-1714).....	214
§ 296.	(1) Title of William, Mary, and Anne.....	214

[References are to star paging.]

§ 297.	(2) Act of Settlement, 1700.....	215
§ 298.	(3) Act of Succession to the Crown, 1707.....	216
§ 299.	13. House of Hanover (1714——).....	216
	a. George I (1714–1727).....	216
	b. George II (1727–1760).....	216
	c. George III (1760–1820).....	216
	d. George IV (1820–1830).....	216n
	e. William IV (1830–1837).....	216n
	f. Victoria (1837–1901).....	216n
	g. Edward VII (1901–1910).....	216n
	h. George V (1910——).....	216n
§ 300.	Succession to the crown, conditionally hereditary.....	217
§ 301.	Constitutional basis of succession to the crown.....	217

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE KING'S ROYAL FAMILY.

§ 302.	The Queen.....	218
§ 303.	1. Queen, regent, regnant, or sovereign.....	218
§ 304.	2. Queen consort.....	218
§ 305.	a. Queen consort's exemptions and prerogatives.....	219
§ 306.	(1) Queen consort's revenue: queen-gold.....	219
§ 307.	(a) Origin and history of the queen-gold.....	220
§ 308.	(2) Other prerequisites of the queen consort.....	222
§ 309.	(3) Queen consort's personal security and liability....	222
§ 310.	(4) The prince consort.....	222
§ 311.	3. Queen dowager.....	223
§ 312.	The heir apparent.....	223
§ 313.	Meaning of royal family.....	224
§ 314.	1. Younger sons and daughters.....	224
§ 315.	2. Other members of the royal family.....	225

CHAPTER V.

OF THE COUNCILS BELONGING TO THE KING.

§ 316.	Various councils of the king.....	227
§ 317.	1. Parliament.....	227
§ 318.	2. Peers of the realm.....	227
§ 319.	a. Older conventions of the peers.....	228
§ 320.	b. A peer's right of audience.....	228
§ 321.	3. Judges of the courts of justice.....	229
§ 322.	4. Privy council.....	229
	Note: The Cabinet.....	230n
§ 323.	a. Appointment of privy counselors.....	230
§ 324.	b. Qualifications of privy counselors.....	230
§ 325.	c. Duties of privy counselors.....	230
§ 326.	d. Jurisdiction of the privy council.....	231
	Note: Jurisdiction of the privy council.....	232n

[References are to star paging.]

§ 327.	e. Privileges of privy counselors.....	232
§ 328.	f. Dissolution of the privy council.....	232

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE KING'S DUTIES.

§ 329.	Constitutional duties of the king.....	233
§ 330.	King's duty to govern according to the law.....	233
§ 331.	The coronation oath.....	234

CHAPTER VII.

OF THE KING'S PREROGATIVE.

§ 332.	Constitutional limitations on the royal prerogative.....	237
§ 333.	1. Former pretensions .....	237
§ 334.	2. The king subject to the law.....	238
§ 335.	Meaning of prerogative .....	239
	Note: Historical view of the king's prerogative.....	239n
§ 336.	Classes of prerogative .....	239
§ 337.	1. Direct prerogatives .....	240
§ 338.	a. The royal dignity .....	241
§ 339.	(1) Sovereignty .....	241
	Note: No action lies against the state.....	242n
§ 340.	(a) Protection of the subject.....	243
§ 341.	(i) In cases of private injuries.....	243
§ 342.	(ii) In cases of public oppression.....	244
	(aa) Responsibility of king's advisers.....	244
§ 343.	(bb) Remedies for oppression.....	244
§ 344.	(cc) Theory of the king's abdication..	245
§ 345.	(2) The royal perfection: "The king can do no wrong"	246
§ 346.	(a) Corrective for royal mistakes.....	246
§ 347.	(b) Parliamentary right of remonstrance.....	247
§ 348.	(c) "Time runs not against the king".....	247
	Note: Lapse of time does not bar the sovereign .....	247n
§ 349.	(3) The royal immortality.....	249
§ 350.	Executive department of government.....	250
	Note: Real character of the royal authority.....	250n
§ 351.	1. Absolute character of king's power.....	250
§ 352.	a. Responsibility of king's advisers.....	251
§ 353.	2. King's prerogative in (1) foreign relations; (2) domestic affairs .....	252
§ 354.	a. The king, the national representative in foreign relations	252
§ 355.	(1) Ambassadors .....	253
§ 356.	(a) Privileges of ambassadors.....	253
§ 357.	(i) In criminal prosecutions .....	253

[References are to star paging.]

§ 358.	(ii) In civil suits .....	254
	Note: Jurisdiction over diplomatic agents .....	254n
§ 359.	(iii) Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708.....	256
§ 360.	(2) Treaties .....	257
	Note: Treaty-making and war-making authority.....	257n
§ 361.	(3) Power to make war.....	257
§ 362.	(4) Letters of marque and reprisal.....	258
	Note: Letters of marque.....	259n
§ 363.	(5) Passports and safe-conducts.....	259
	Note: Safe-conducts .....	259n
§ 364.	(a) Protection of foreign merchants.....	260
	Note: Roman view of commerce.....	261n
§ 365.	d. King's prerogative in domestic affairs.....	261
§ 366.	(1) King as part of legislature.....	261
§ 367.	(2) King as generalissimo .....	262
§ 368.	(a) The Militia Act, 1661.....	262
§ 369.	(b) Trinoda necessitas .....	263
§ 370.	(c) Regulation of commerce and navigation....	263
§ 371.	(i) Limitation of ports .....	264
§ 372.	(ii) Lighthouses and buoys .....	264
§ 373.	(iii) Writ of ne exeat regno .....	265
§ 374.	(3) The king as fountain of justice.....	266
	(a) King erects courts of justice.....	267
§ 375.	(b) Tenure of judges .....	267
§ 376.	(c) Criminal jurisdiction .....	268
§ 377.	(d) Pardoning power .....	268
§ 378.	(e) Theory of separate departments.....	269
§ 379.	(f) Legal ubiquity of the king .....	270
	Note: Bentham's criticism on the king's "ubiquity" .....	270n
§ 380.	(g) The king's proclamations .....	270
§ 381.	(4) The king as fountain of honor, office, and privilege	271
	(a) Power to create honors and titles of nobility	271
	Note: The appointing power .....	271n
§ 382.	(b) Appointing power .....	272
§ 383.	(c) Special privileges, franchises, naturalization	272
§ 384.	(5) The king as arbiter of commerce.....	273
§ 385.	(a) Markets and fairs.....	274
§ 386.	(b) Weights and measures .....	274
§ 387.	(c) Coining money .....	276
§ 388.	(i) Essentials of coinage .....	277
§ 389.	(aa) Coin must be metal.....	277
§ 390.	(bb) Coin must be stamped.....	277
§ 391.	(cc) Value of coin must be fixed.....	278
§ 392.	(6) The king as head of the church.....	279
§ 393.	(a) The convocation .....	279

[References are to star paging.]

§ 394.	(b) Nomination of bishops .....	280
§ 395.	(c) Appeals in ecclesiastical causes.....	280

CHAPTER VIII.

OF THE KING'S REVENUE.

§ 396.	The king's fiscal prerogatives .....	281
§ 397.	1. The king's ordinary revenue .....	281
§ 398.	a. Ecclesiastical revenues .....	282
	(1) Temporalities of bishops .....	282
§ 399.	(2) Corodies .....	283
§ 400.	(3) Tithes .....	284
§ 401.	(4) First-fruits and tenths .....	284
§ 402.	(a) Queen Anne's bounty .....	285
§ 403.	b. Rents from the crown lands .....	286
§ 404.	c. Prerogative of purveyance .....	287
§ 405.	d. Wine licenses .....	288
§ 406.	e. Profits from the forests .....	289
§ 407.	f. Judicial fines and fees .....	289
§ 408.	g. Royal fish .....	290
§ 409.	h. Wrecks .....	290
§ 410.	(1) Jetsam, flotsam, and ligan .....	292
§ 411.	(2) Statutes protecting wrecks; salvage .....	293
§ 412.	i. Royal mines .....	294
§ 413.	j. Treasure-trove .....	295
§ 414.	k. Waifs .....	296
§ 415.	l. Estrays .....	297
§ 416.	(1) Bona vacantia .....	298
§ 417.	m. Forfeitures .....	299
	Note: Theory of the deodand .....	300n
§ 418.	(1) Deodands .....	300
§ 419.	n. Escheats .....	302
§ 420.	o. Custody of idiots and lunatics .....	302
	Note: The king's wardship of an idiot's lands.....	302n
§ 421.	(1) Idiots .....	302
§ 422.	(a) Inquest of idiocy .....	303
§ 423.	(2) Lunatics, or persons non compos mentis .....	304
§ 424.	(a) Inquest of lunacy .....	305
§ 425.	(3) Spendthrifts .....	305
§ 426.	p. Decline of the king's ordinary revenue .....	306
§ 427.	2. The king's extraordinary revenue: taxes .....	306
§ 428.	a. Taxes granted by parliament .....	307
§ 429.	b. Kinds of taxes .....	308
	(1) Annual taxes .....	308
§ 430.	(a) Land tax .....	308
§ 431.	(b) Ancient levies .....	308
	(i) Tenths and fifteenths .....	308

[References are to star paging.]

§ 432.	(ii) Scutages .....	309
§ 433.	(iii) Hydage and talliage; subsidies .....	310
§ 434.	(iv) Ecclesiastical subsidies .....	311
§ 435.	(v) Lay subsidies equivalent to a land tax....	311
§ 436.	(c) Malt tax .....	313
§ 437.	(2) Perpetual taxes .....	313
	(a) Customs .....	313
§ 438.	(i) Prisage of wines .....	314
§ 439.	(ii) Subsidies, tonnage, poundage, and other imposts .....	315
§ 440.	(iii) Theory and evils of a customs tariff ....	316
§ 441.	(b) Internal revenue or excise .....	318
§ 442.	(c) Salt tax .....	321
§ 443.	(d) The postoffice .....	321
§ 444.	(e) Stamp duties .....	323
§ 445.	(f) Duty on houses and windows.....	324
§ 446.	(g) Duty on servants .....	325
§ 447.	(h) Licenses to hackney-coaches .....	325
§ 448.	(i) Duty on offices and pensions .....	326
§ 449.	3. How the revenue is appropriated .....	326
§ 450.	a. The national debt .....	326
§ 451.	(1) Relation of national debt and property .....	327
§ 452.	(2) Relation of national debt and currency .....	328
§ 453.	(3) The principal funds .....	329
§ 454.	(4) The sinking fund .....	330
§ 455.	(5) King's household and civil list .....	330
§ 456.	(a) Expenses of the civil list .....	332
§ 457.	(b) History of the civil list .....	332
	Note: The modern civil list .....	333n
§ 458.	Restrictions on the king's prerogative .....	334
§ 459.	The king's sources of power .....	335
§ 460.	The existing situation as to the king's prerogative .....	337

CHAPTER IX.

OF SUBORDINATE MAGISTRATES.

§ 461.	Principal subordinate magistrates .....	338
	Note: Relation of king and officers of state.....	338n
§ 462.	1. The sheriff .....	339
§ 463.	a. Election of sheriff .....	339
§ 464.	b. Sheriff's term of office .....	342
§ 465.	a. Powers and duties of the sheriff .....	343
§ 466.	(1) Judicial capacity of the sheriff .....	343
§ 467.	(2) Sheriff as keeper of the king's peace .....	343
§ 468.	(3) Sheriff executes judicial process .....	344
§ 469.	(4) Sheriff as the king's bailiff .....	344
§ 470.	(5) Officers subordinate to the sheriff .....	345
§ 471.	(a) Deputy sheriffs .....	345

[References are to star paging.]

§ 472.	(b) Bailiffs .....	345
§ 473.	(c) Jailers .....	346
§ 474.	(6) Sheriff's personal expenses .....	346
§ 475.	2. The coroner .....	346
§ 476.	a. Election of coroner .....	347
§ 477.	b. Coroner's term of office .....	348
§ 478.	c. Powers and duties of the coroner .....	348
	(1) Coroner's judicial functions .....	348
§ 479.	(2) Coroner's municipal functions .....	349
§ 480.	3. Justices of the peace .....	349
§ 481.	a. Conservators of the peace .....	349
§ 482.	b. Appointment of justices .....	351
§ 483.	c. Number and qualifications of justices .....	352
§ 484.	d. Term of office of justices .....	353
§ 485.	e. Jurisdiction of justices .....	353
§ 486.	4. The constable .....	355
§ 487.	a. Kinds of constables: (1) high constables; (2) petty constables .....	355
§ 488.	b. Duties of constables .....	356
§ 489.	5. Surveyors of highways .....	357
§ 490.	a. Appointment of highway surveyors .....	358
§ 491.	b. Powers and duties of highway surveyors .....	358
§ 492.	6. Overseers of the poor .....	359
§ 493.	a. Appointment of overseers of the poor .....	360
§ 494.	b. Powers and duties of overseers of the poor .....	360
§ 495.	(1) Poor Relief Act, 1601 .....	361
§ 496.	(2) Poor Relief Act, 1662 .....	362
§ 497.	(3) The law of settlements .....	362

CHAPTER X.

OF THE PEOPLE, WHETHER ALIENS, DENIZENS, OR NATIVES.

§ 498.	The people .....	366
§ 499.	Division of the people .....	366
	1. Natural-born subjects .....	366
	Note: Citizens .....	366n
	2. Aliens .....	366
§ 500.	3. Allegiance and fealty .....	366
§ 501.	a. Natural, or perpetual, allegiance .....	369
§ 502.	b. Local, or temporary, allegiance .....	370
	Note: Change of domicile .....	370n
§ 503.	c. Allegiance is personal .....	371
§ 504.	4. Rights of aliens .....	371
	Note: Property rights of aliens in United States .....	371n
	Note: An alien's inability to hold land .....	372n
	Note: Droit d'aubaine .....	372n
	Note: Right to exclude aliens.....	373n

[References are to star paging.]

§ 505.	5. British subjects born abroad .....	372
§ 506.	6. Children of aliens .....	373
	Note: Citizens born abroad .....	373n
	Note: Elective citizenship .....	374n
§ 507.	7. Denizens .....	373
§ 508.	8. Naturalization .....	374
	Note: Alienage and naturalization.....	375n

CHAPTER XI.

OF THE CLERGY.

§ 509.	The clergy .....	376
§ 510.	Privileges and disabilities of the clergy .....	376
§ 511.	Ecclesiastical orders .....	377
§ 512.	1. Archbishops and bishops: appointment .....	377
§ 513.	a. Rights and duties of archbishops .....	380
§ 514.	b. Rights and duties of bishops .....	382
§ 515.	c. Expiration of office of archbishops and bishops.....	382
§ 516.	2. Dean and chapter .....	382
§ 517.	3. Archdeacons .....	383
§ 518.	4. Rural deans .....	383
§ 519.	5. Parsons and vicars .....	384
§ 520.	a. Holy orders .....	388
§ 521.	b. Presentation .....	388
§ 522.	c. Institution .....	390
§ 523.	d. Induction .....	391
§ 524.	e. Rights of parsons and vicars .....	391
§ 525.	f. Expiration of office .....	392
§ 526.	6. Curates .....	393
§ 527.	Inferior ecclesiastical officers .....	394
§ 528.	1. Churchwardens .....	394
§ 529.	2. Parish clerks and sextons .....	395

CHAPTER XII.

OF THE CIVIL STATE.

§ 530.	The civil, military, and maritime states .....	396
§ 531.	The civil state .....	396
§ 532.	1. The nobility and commonalty .....	396
§ 533.	2. The nobility .....	396
§ 534.	a. Dukes .....	397
§ 535.	b. Marquises .....	397
§ 536.	c. Earls .....	398
	Note: Title of earl .....	398n
§ 537.	d. Viscounts .....	398
§ 538.	e. Barons .....	398
	Note: The baronage .....	399n

[References are to star paging.]

§ 539.	f. Creation of peers .....	399
	Note: Privileges of peerage.....	401n
§ 540.	g. Incidents of nobility .....	401
§ 541.	h. Loss of nobility .....	402
	Note: Different varieties of peerage.....	402n
§ 542.	3. Orders of the commonalty .....	403
§ 543.	a. Vidames .....	403
§ 544.	b. Knights .....	403
	(Table of precedence) .....	404n
§ 545.	c. Esquires, gentlemen and yeomen .....	406
§ 546.	d. Rest of the commonalty .....	407

CHAPTER XIII.

OF THE MILITARY AND MARITIME STATES.

§ 547.	The military state .....	408
§ 548.	1. Military system of the Saxons .....	408
§ 549.	2. King Alfred's militia .....	409
§ 550.	3. Military part of the feudal system .....	410
§ 551.	4. The militia from reign of Henry II.....	410
§ 552.	5. Reorganization of the militia .....	412
§ 553.	6. Martial law .....	412
§ 554.	7. Quartering troops .....	413
§ 555.	8. A standing army .....	413
§ 556.	9. The annual mutiny act .....	414
§ 557.	10. Military offenses .....	415
§ 558.	11. Danger of slavery .....	416
§ 559.	12. Privileges of soldiers .....	417
§ 560.	The maritime state .....	417
§ 561.	1. Navigation acts .....	418
§ 562.	2. The royal navy .....	419
§ 563.	a. Recruiting the navy .....	419
§ 564.	b. Discipline in the navy .....	420
§ 565.	c. Privileges of sailors .....	421

CHAPTER XIV.

OF MASTER AND SERVANT.

§ 566.	The domestic relations .....	422
	Note: Service and agency discriminated.....	422n
§ 567.	Master and servant .....	423
§ 568.	1. Classes of servants .....	423
§ 569.	a. Slavery .....	423
§ 570.	(1) No slavery in England .....	424
	Note: Is perpetual service legal.....	424n
§ 571.	b. Menial servants .....	425
§ 572.	c. Apprentices .....	426

[References are to star paging.]

§ 573.	d. Laborers .....	426
§ 574.	e. Stewards, factors and bailiffs .....	427
§ 575.	2. Relation of service .....	427
§ 576.	a. Master's right of correction .....	428
	Note: Assault on master .....	428n
§ 577.	b. Servant's wages .....	428
§ 578.	c. Relation of service as to third persons .....	428
§ 579.	(1) Responsibility of master .....	429
	Note: The law of fellow-servant .....	429n
	Note: Employers' liability acts .....	430n
	Note: Workmen's compensation acts .....	430n
	Note: Workmen's industrial insurance acts .....	430n
§ 580.	(2) Scope of employment .....	430
§ 581.	(3) Negligence of servant .....	431
	Note: Primitive notion of legal liability .....	431n

CHAPTER XV.

OF HUSBAND AND WIFE.

§ 582.	Marriage .....	433
	Note: The domestic relations in law and ethics .....	433n
§ 583.	1. Marriage, a civil contract .....	433
	a. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction over marriage .....	433
	Note: Marriage in the ecclesiastical law .....	433n
§ 584.	b. Consent of the parties .....	434
	Note: Consensus non concubitas facit nuptias .....	434n
	Note: Marriage as a contract .....	434n
§ 585.	c. Capacity of the parties .....	434
§ 586.	(1) Disabilities .....	434
	(a) Canonical disabilities .....	434
	Note: Deceased wife's sister .....	434n
§ 587.	(b) Civil disabilities .....	435
	Note: Civil and canonical disabilities .....	435n
§ 588.	(i) Existing prior marriage .....	436
	Note: Disappearance of spouse .....	436n
§ 589.	(ii) Want of age .....	436
	Note: Disagreement to marriage of infant .....	437n
§ 590.	(iii) Nonconsent of parents .....	437
§ 591.	(iv) Mental incapacity .....	438
	Note: Insanity as avoiding marriage .....	438n
§ 592.	d. Celebration of marriage .....	439
	Note: Marriage formal or by reputation .....	439n
	Note: Absence of ceremony in canonical marriage .....	440n
§ 593.	e. Dissolution of marriage .....	440
§ 594.	(1) Divorce .....	440

[References are to star paging.]

	(a) Divorce a vinculo .....	440
	Note: The law of divorce .....	440n
§ 595.	(b) Divorce a mensa et thoro .....	440
	Note: Legislative divorces .....	441n
§ 596.	(i) Alimony .....	441
§ 597.	f. Legal consequences of marriage .....	442
§ 598.	(1) Coverture of wife .....	442
	Note: Wife's separate domicile .....	442n
§ 599.	(2) Transactions between husband and wife .....	442
§ 600.	(3) Liabilities of husband .....	442
	Note: Liabilities of husband .....	443n
§ 601.	(4) Suits by and against wife .....	443
§ 602.	(5) Incapacity as witnesses .....	443
§ 603.	(6) In ecclesiastical courts .....	444
§ 604.	(7) Separate acts of wife .....	444
§ 605.	(8) Husband's right of correction .....	444

CHAPTER XVI.

OF PARENT AND CHILD.

§ 606.	Parent and child .....	446
§ 607.	Children .....	446
	Note: Adoption .....	446n
§ 608.	1. Legitimate children .....	446
	Note: Legitimation by subsequent marriage .....	446n
§ 609.	a. Duties of parents .....	446
§ 610.	(1) Duty to support children .....	447
	Note: Rights and liabilities of father .....	447n
§ 611.	(a) Duty of support under the civil law .....	447
§ 612.	(b) Duty of support under English law .....	448
	Note: Duty to support children .....	449n
	Note: Religious instruction in American public schools .....	449n
§ 613.	(c) Disinheriting of children .....	450
§ 614.	(2) Duty to protect children .....	450
	Note: Battery in defense of kin .....	450n
§ 615.	(3) Duty to educate children .....	450
§ 616.	b. Parental authority .....	452
	(1) Parental authority under Roman law .....	452
§ 617.	(2) Parental authority under English law .....	452
	Note: Rights of mother .....	453n
§ 618.	c. Duties of children .....	453
§ 619.	2. Illegitimate children, or bastards .....	454
§ 620.	a. Who are bastards: legitimation .....	454
§ 621.	(1) Children of dubious parentage .....	456
§ 622.	(2) Bastards born during wedlock .....	457
	Note: Effect of divorce on legitimacy .....	457n

[References are to star paging.]

§ 623.	b. Support of bastards.....	458
§ 624.	c. Rights and incapacities of bastards.....	459

CHAPTER XVII.

OF GUARDIAN AND WARD.

§ 625.	Guardian and ward.....	460
	Note: The law of guardianship.....	460n
§ 626.	1. Guardians.....	460
§ 627.	a. Kinds of guardians.....	461
	(1) Guardians by nature.....	461
	(2) Guardians for nurture.....	461
	(3) Guardians in socage.....	461
	(4) Guardians by statute or by testament.....	462
	(5) Guardians by custom.....	462
§ 628.	b. Reciprocal rights and duties.....	462
§ 629.	2. Wards: infancy.....	463
§ 630.	a. Privileges and disabilities of infants.....	464
	Note: Privileges and disabilities of infants.....	464n
§ 631.	(1) Contracts and conveyances of infants.....	465

CHAPTER XVIII.

OF CORPORATIONS.

§ 632.	Corporations: artificial persons.....	467
	Note: Are corporations real or fictitious persons?.....	467n
§ 633.	1. History of corporations: Roman law.....	468
§ 634.	2. Classes of corporations.....	469
	Note: Public and municipal corporations.....	469n
§ 635.	a. Corporations aggregate.....	469
	b. Corporations sole.....	469
	Note: Corporations sole.....	470n
§ 636.	c. Ecclesiastical corporations.....	470
§ 637.	d. Lay corporations.....	470
	(1) Civil corporations.....	470
	(2) Eleemosynary corporations.....	470
§ 638.	3. Creation of corporations.....	472
	a. Civil law.....	472
§ 639.	b. English law.....	472
	(1) Corporations by common law.....	472
	(2) Corporations by prescription.....	473
§ 640.	(3) Consent of king, how given.....	473
	(a) By parliament.....	473
§ 641.	(b) By charter.....	473
§ 642.	(4) Power of parliament to create corporations.....	474
§ 643.	(5) Creation of corporations by patent.....	474
§ 644.	(6) Corporate name.....	474
	Note: Authority to create corporations.....	475n
	Note: De facto corporations.....	475n

[References are to star paging.]

§ 645.	4. Powers of a corporation.....	475
	a. To have perpetual succession.....	475
	b. To sue and be sued.....	475
	c. To purchase and hold lands.....	475
	d. To have a common seal.....	475
	Note: Use of seal by corporations.....	475n
	e. To make by-laws.....	475
§ 646.	5. Privileges and disabilities.....	476
	Note: Characteristics of corporations.....	476n
	Note: Tort liability of corporations.....	476n
	Note: Criminal liability of corporations.....	477n
§ 647.	6. Corporations act by majority.....	478
§ 648.	7. Power to purchase lands.....	478
	a. Statutes of mortmain.....	479
	Note: Implied powers of corporations.....	480n
§ 649.	8. Duties of corporations.....	479
§ 650.	9. Visitation of corporations.....	480
	Note: Right of visitation.....	480n
	a. Ecclesiastical corporations.....	480
§ 651.	b. Civil corporations.....	480
	(1) Lay corporations.....	480
§ 652.	(2) Eleemosynary corporations.....	482
§ 653.	(3) Colleges.....	482
§ 654.	10. Dissolution of corporations.....	484
§ 655.	a. Methods of dissolution.....	485
	(1) By act of parliament.....	485
	(2) By death of all members.....	485
	(3) By surrender of franchise.....	485
	(4) By forfeiture of charter.....	485

---

BOOK II.

OF THE RIGHTS OF THINGS.

CHAPTER I.

OF PROPERTY, IN GENERAL.

§ 1.	Right of property.....	1
	Note: Of the form in which rights and duties appear in the law.....	1n
§ 2.	1. Origin of property.....	2
	Note: Origin of property in land.....	2n
§ 3.	a. Ownership in common.....	3
§ 4.	b. Individual ownership.....	4
§ 5.	(1) Ownership of animals and wells.....	5
§ 6.	(2) Ownership of land.....	6

[References are to star paging.]

§ 7.	2. Occupancy, original title to property.....	8
§ 8.	a. Dereliction .....	9
§ 9.	3. Transfer of ownership.....	9
§ 10.	a. Succession to property on death.....	10
	Note: Escheat .....	11n
§ 11.	(1) Intestate succession .....	11
§ 12.	(2) Testamentary succession .....	12
§ 13.	4. Things in common.....	14
§ 14.	5. Ownerless things.....	14

CHAPTER II.

OF REAL PROPERTY; AND, FIRST, OF CORPOREAL HEREDITAMENTS.

§ 15.	Classification of things.....	16
	Note: Real and personal property distinguished. .....	16n
§ 16.	1. Things real .....	16
§ 17.	a. Land .....	16
§ 18.	b. Tenements .....	16
§ 19.	c. Hereditaments: corporeal and incorporeal.....	17
	Note: Corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments. .....	17n
§ 20.	(1) Corporeal hereditaments .....	17
	(a) Land .....	17
	Note: Ice as realty. .....	18n
§ 21.	(i) Superjacent and subjacent space.....	18
	Note: Rights in superjacent space. ...	19n

CHAPTER III.

OF INCORPOREAL HEREDITAMENTS.

§ 22.	Character of an incorporeal hereditament.....	20
	Note: Incorporeal hereditaments. .....	20n
§ 23.	Kinds of incorporeal hereditaments.....	21
§ 24.	1. Advowsons .....	21
§ 25.	a. Advowsons appendant or in gross.....	22
§ 26.	b. Advowsons presentative, collative, or donative.....	22
§ 27.	2. Tithes.....	24
§ 28.	a. Origin of tithes.....	25
§ 29.	b. Tithes, to whom due.....	26
§ 30.	c. Exemption from tithes.....	28
§ 31.	(1) By a real composition.....	28
§ 32.	(2) By discharge by custom or prescription.....	29
§ 33.	(a) De modo decimandi .....	29
§ 34.	(b) De non decimando .....	31
§ 35.	3. Commons.....	32
§ 36.	a. Common of pasture.....	32
§ 37.	(1) Common appendant .....	33
§ 38.	(2) Common appurtenant .....	33
	Note: Use of the word "appurtenant". .....	33n

[References are to star paging.]

§ 39.	(3) Common because of vicinage.....	83
	Note: Common of vicinage.....	34n
§ 40.	(4) Common in gross.....	34
§ 41.	(5) Restrictions on commons of pasture.....	34
	Note: Commons without stint.....	34n
	Note: Meaning of the word "approve".....	34n
	Note: English inclosure and commons acts.....	34n
§ 42.	b. Common of piscary.....	34
§ 43.	c. Common of turbary.....	34
	Note: Commons of piscary and turbary.....	35n
§ 44.	d. Common of estovers.....	35
§ 45.	4. Ways.....	85
	Note: No easements "in gross".....	36n
	Note: Ways of necessity.....	36n
	Note: Way out of repair.....	37n
§ 46.	5. Offices.....	36
	Note: Whether right to an office is property.....	37n
§ 47.	6. Dignities.....	37
§ 48.	7. Franchises.....	37
	Note: Meaning of franchise.....	37n
§ 49.	a. Various franchises.....	37
§ 50.	b. Franchise of forest.....	38
§ 51.	c. Franchise of freewarren.....	38
§ 52.	d. Franchise of free fishery.....	39
	Note: Free fishery.....	39n
§ 53.	8. Corodies.....	40
§ 54.	9. Annuities.....	40
	Note: Annuities and corodies.....	40n
§ 55.	10. Rents.....	41
§ 56.	a. Kinds of rents.....	41
§ 57.	(1) Rent-service.....	41
§ 58.	(2) Rent-charge.....	42
	Note: Rent-charge.....	42n
§ 59.	(3) Rent-seek.....	42
§ 60.	(4) Other varieties of rents.....	42
	(a) Quit-rents.....	42
	(b) Rack-rent.....	42
	Note: Rack-rent.....	43n
	(c) Fee-farm rents.....	43
§ 61.	b. General rules as to rents.....	43

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE FEUDAL SYSTEM.

§ 62.	History of the feudal system.....	44
	Note: The feudal system.....	44n
§ 63.	1. Origin of feuds.....	45
	Note: Meaning of feudum .....	45n

[References are to star paging.]

§ 64.	2. The feudal relation . . . . .	45
§ 65.	3. The feudal system on the Continent. . . . .	46
§ 66.	a. Feudal tenure supplants allodial ownership. . . . .	47
§ 67.	4. The feudal system in England. . . . .	48
§ 68.	a. The Norman Conquest. . . . .	48
	Note: Origin of the feudal system. . . . .	48n
§ 69.	b. Domesday Book. . . . .	49
§ 70.	c. Feudal tenures in England. . . . .	51
§ 71.	d. Modifications in the feudal system. . . . .	51
§ 72.	Theory of the feudal system. . . . .	53
§ 73.	1. Lord and vassal. . . . .	53
§ 74.	2. Oath of fealty; homage. . . . .	53
	Note: Fealty and homage; livery of seisin. . . . .	53n
§ 75.	3. Feudal service . . . . .	54
§ 76.	4. Duration of feuds. . . . .	55
	Note: Origin of "estates" in land. . . . .	55n
§ 77.	a. Feuds become hereditary. . . . .	56
§ 78.	5. Feuds inalienable . . . . .	57
	Note: Freedom of alienation. . . . .	57n
§ 79.	6. Subinfeudation . . . . .	57
§ 80.	7. Proper and improper feuds. . . . .	58
§ 81.	8. Corruption of the feudal system. . . . .	58

CHAPTER V.

OF THE ANCIENT ENGLISH TENURES.

§ 82.	English tenures, feudal. . . . .	59
§ 83.	1. Nature of feudal tenure. . . . .	59
	Note: Tenure . . . . .	59n
	Note: Meaning of allodium . . . . .	60n
§ 84.	a. Tenants in capite . . . . .	60
§ 85.	2. Kinds of feudal services. . . . .	60
	a. Free and base services; certain and uncertain services. . . . .	60
§ 86.	3. Species of feudal tenures. . . . .	61
	a. Frank-tenements . . . . .	61
	(1) Knight service. . . . .	61
	(2) Free socage. . . . .	61
	b. Villeinage . . . . .	61
	(1) Pure villeinage. . . . .	61
	(2) Villein socage. . . . .	61
§ 87.	3. a. (1) Knight service. . . . .	62
	Note: Greater and lesser tenants in chief. . . . .	63n
§ 88.	(a) Incidents of knight service. . . . .	63
§ 89.	(i) Aids . . . . .	63
§ 90.	(ii) Beliefs . . . . .	65
	Note: Heriot and relief. . . . .	65n
§ 91.	(iii) Primer seisin . . . . .	66

[References are to star paging.]

§ 92.	(iv) Wardship .....	67
§ 93.	(aa) Wardship of the lands.....	67
§ 94.	(bb) Wardship of the body .....	68
§ 95.	(cc) Delivery from wardship.....	68
§ 96.	(dd) Knighthood .....	69
	Note: Tenants of the king.....	69n
§ 97.	(v) Marriage .....	70
§ 98.	(vi) Fines .....	71
§ 99.	(vii) Escheat .....	72
§ 100.	(b) Other species of knight service; grand ser- jeanty .....	73
§ 101.	(c) Escuage or scutage.....	74
§ 102.	(d) Corruption of knight service.....	75
§ 103.	(e) Abolition of military tenures.....	76

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE MODERN ENGLISH TENURES.

§ 104.	Tenures surviving act of 12 Charles II (1660).....	78
§ 105.	Meaning and character of socage.....	79
§ 106.	Free and common socage.....	79
	Note: Meaning of socage.....	81n
§ 107.	1. Kinds of free and common socage.....	81
§ 108.	a. Petit serjeanty .....	81
§ 109.	b. Burgage tenure .....	82
§ 110.	(1) Borough English .....	83
	Note: Origin of name "borough English".....	83n
§ 111.	c. Gavelkind .....	84
§ 112.	2. Free socage of feudal character.....	85
§ 113.	a. Tokens of feudal character of free socage.....	86
	Note: Socage tenure not of feudal origin.....	86n
§ 114.	(1) Held of a superior lord.....	86
§ 115.	(2) Services .....	86
§ 116.	(3) Fealty .....	86
§ 117.	(4) Aids .....	86
§ 118.	(5) Reliefs .....	87
§ 119.	(6) Primer seisin .....	87
§ 120.	(7) Wardship .....	87
§ 121.	(8) Marriage .....	88
§ 122.	(9) Fines .....	89
§ 123.	(10) Escheat .....	89
	Note: Disappearance of escheats.....	89n
§ 124.	Villeinage tenure .....	89
§ 125.	1. Pure villeinage: copyhold.....	90
§ 126.	a. Manors .....	90
	Note: Origin and definition of manors.....	90n

[References are to star paging.]

§ 127.	b. Subinfeudation .....	91
§ 128.	c. Folkland .....	92
§ 129.	d. Villeins .....	93
§ 130.	(1) Enfranchisement of villeins.....	94
§ 131.	(2) Emergence of copyhold tenure.....	95
§ 132.	(3) Disappearance of villeins.....	95
	Note: History of copyholds.....	95n
§ 133.	e. Incidents of copyhold.....	97
	Note: Copyhold Act of 1894.....	97n
§ 134.	2. Privileged villeinage, or villeinage socage.....	98
§ 135.	a. Ancient demesne .....	99
	Note: Ancient demesne.....	99n
§ 136.	b. Services of the tenants.....	100
§ 137.	c. Character of the tenure.....	100
§ 138.	Tenure in frankalmoine.....	101

CHAPTER VII.

OF FREEHOLD ESTATES OF INHERITANCE.

§ 139.	Estates .....	103
	Note: Conception of "estate".....	103n
	Note: Meaning and kinds of estates.....	103n
§ 140.	1. Estates of freehold.....	104
	Note: Livery of seisin and grant.....	104n
§ 141.	a. Estates of inheritance.....	104
§ 142.	(1) Fee simple estates.....	104
	Note: Tenant in fee simple.....	104n
	Note: Demesne and dominion.....	106n
§ 143.	(a) Different interests in the same land.....	107
§ 144.	(b) The word "heirs" necessary in feoffments..	107
§ 145.	(c) When word "heirs" not necessary.....	108
§ 146.	(2) Limited fees .....	109
§ 147.	(a) Base or qualified fees.....	109
	Note: Base fees.....	109n
§ 148.	(b) Conditional fees: estates-tail.....	110
	Note: Fees conditional.....	110n
§ 149.	(i) The old law of conditional fees.....	110
§ 150.	(ii) The statute de donis .....	112
§ 151.	(iii) Fee tail and reversion.....	112
§ 152.	(iv) What may be entailed.....	112
§ 153.	(v) Species of estates-tail.....	113
§ 154.	(aa) Tail-general .....	113
§ 155.	(bb) Tail-special .....	113
§ 156.	(cc) Tail male and tail female.....	114
§ 157.	(vi) Words necessary to make an entail.....	114
§ 158.	(vii) Frank marriage.....	115
§ 159.	(viii) Incidents of tenancy in tail.....	115
§ 160.	(ix) Evils of estates-tail.....	116

[References are to star paging.]

§ 161.	(x) Common recoveries .....	116
§ 162.	(xi) Statute of treason (1534).....	117
§ 163.	(xii) Statutes of leases (1540) and fines (1540) .....	118
§ 164.	(xiii) Exceptions in favor of the crown.....	118
§ 165.	(xiv) Resulting condition of estates-tail....	119
	Note: Distinction between conditional estates and estates upon condition... 119n

CHAPTER VIII.

OF FREEHOLDS, NOT OF INHERITANCE.

§ 166.	Two kinds of estates for life.....	120
§ 167.	1. Conventional estates for life.....	120
§ 168.	a. Estates for life created by general grant.....	121
§ 169.	b. Conditional life estates.....	121
§ 170.	c. Incidents of estates for life.....	122
§ 171.	(1) Estovers or botes.....	122
	Note: Liability for waste.....	122n
§ 172.	(2) Emblements .....	122
§ 173.	(3) Rights of subtenants.....	123
§ 174.	2. Legal estates for life.....	124
	a. Estate in tail after possibility of issue extinct.....	124
§ 175.	b. Tenancy by the curtesy.....	126
	Note: Origin of curtesy.....	126n
§ 176.	(1) Requisites to make a tenancy by the curtesy.....	127
	Note: Idiocy of wife.....	127n
	Note: Seisin requisite to dower or curtesy.....	127n
	Note: Tenancy by curtesy.....	128n
§ 177.	c. Tenancy in dower.....	129
	Note: Dower in the United States.....	129n
§ 178.	(1) Who may be endowed.....	130
§ 179.	(2) Of what endowed.....	131
§ 180.	(3) How dower attaches.....	132
	Note: Dower de la plus belle .....	132n
§ 181.	(4) History of dower.....	133
§ 182.	(5) Assignment of dower.....	135
§ 183.	(6) Barring dower .....	136
§ 184.	(a) Jointures .....	137
§ 185.	(i) Requisites of a jointure.....	138
	Note: Modern law of jointures.....	138n
§ 186.	(b) Relative advantages of dower and jointure..	138

CHAPTER IX.

OF ESTATES LESS THAN FREEHOLD.

§ 187.	Kinds of estates less than freehold.....	140
	Note: Leasehold interests as chattels real.....	140n
§ 188.	1. Estates for years.....	140

[References are to star paging.]

§ 189.	(Computation of time).....	140
	Note: Year, month, day.....	141n
§ 190.	a. Estates for years originally precarious.....	141
	Notes: Seisin of termor.....	142n
§ 191.	b. Duration of estates for years.....	142
§ 192.	c. Definition of estate for years.....	143
§ 193.	d. Beginning of the term.....	143
§ 194.	e. Incidents of an estate for years.....	144
§ 195.	(1) Emblements .....	145
§ 196.	2. Estates at will.....	145
§ 197.	a. Termination of estate at will.....	146
§ 198.	b. Rights after termination of estate at will.....	146
§ 199.	c. Copyholds .....	147
§ 200.	(1) Forms of copyhold.....	148
§ 201.	(2) Evolution of copyhold.....	148
§ 202.	3. Estates at sufferance.....	150

CHAPTER X.

ESTATES UPON CONDITION.

§ 203.	Definition and classification of estates upon condition.....	152
§ 204.	1. Estates upon condition, implied.....	152
§ 205.	a. Grounds of forfeiture.....	153
§ 206.	2. Estates upon condition expressed.....	154
§ 207.	a. Conditions precedent .....	154
§ 208.	b. Conditions subsequent.....	154
§ 209.	(1) Distinction between conditions and limitations....	155
§ 210.	c. Impossible and illegal conditions.....	156
§ 211.	3. Estates in gage or pledge.....	157
	Note: Mortgage .....	157n
	Note: Clogging the equity.....	158n
	Note: Tacking .....	158n
§ 212.	a. Vivum vadium .....	157
§ 213.	b. Mortgage .....	157
§ 214.	(1) Mortgagee's right of possession.....	158
§ 215.	(2) Equity of redemption.....	158
§ 216.	4. Estates by statute merchant and statute staple.....	160
§ 217.	5. Estate by elegit .....	160
	Note: Writ of elegit .....	161n
§ 218.	a. Chattels real.....	161

CHAPTER XI.

OF ESTATES IN POSSESSION, REMAINDER AND REVERSION.

§ 219.	Estates in respect to the time of enjoyment.....	163
§ 220.	1. Estates in possession.....	163
§ 221.	2. Estates in remainder.....	164
§ 222.	(No remainder on a fee simple).....	164

[References are to star paging.]

§ 223.....	a. Rules on the creation of remainders.....	165
§ 224.....	(1) The particular estate.....	165
§ 225.....	(Estates in futuro ).....	165
	Note : Seisin of remainderman.....	166n
§ 226.....	(Estates at will).....	166
§ 227.....	(2) Remainder and particular estate commence at same time.....	167
§ 228.....	(3) Vesting of remainder.....	168
§ 229.....	b. Division of remainders.....	168
§ 230.....	(1) Vested remainders.....	168
	Note : Vested and contingent remainders.....	169n
§ 231.....	(2) Contingent remainders.....	169
§ 232.....	(a) Limited to uncertain person.....	169
§ 233.....	(i) Common possibility.....	169
§ 234.....	(b) Limited on uncertain event.....	170
§ 235.....	(c) Freeholds limited only on freeholds.....	171
§ 236.....	(d) Contingent remainders how defeated.....	171
	Note : Contingent remainders, how defeated.....	171n
§ 237.....	(i) How preserved from defeat.....	171
§ 238.....	c. Executory devises.....	172
	Note : Executory estates.....	172n
§ 239.....	(1) Differences between remainders and executory de- vises.....	172
	Note : Rule in Shelley's Case.....	172n
§ 240.....	(a) Particular estate not necessary in executory devise.....	173
§ 241.....	(b) Fee, or less estate, limited on executory devise.....	173
§ 242.....	(i) Rule against perpetuities.....	173
	Note : Rule against perpetuities.....	174n
§ 243.....	(c) Remainder limited on a chattel interest....	174
§ 244.....	3. Estates in reversion.....	175
§ 245.....	a. Incidents of reversions.....	175
§ 246.....	b. Distinctions between remainders and reversions.....	176
§ 247.....	4. Statute of Fraudulent Concealment of Deaths, 1707.....	177
§ 248.....	5. Doctrine of merger.....	177

CHAPTER XII.

OF ESTATES IN SEVERALTY, JOINT TENANCY, COPARCENARY, AND COMMON.

§ 249.....	Estates in respect to the number of their tenants.....	179
	Note : Correction of a criticism on Blackstone.....	179n
§ 250.....	1. Estates in severalty.....	179
§ 251.....	2. Estates in joint tenancy.....	180
§ 252.....	a. Creation of joint estate.....	180
§ 253.....	b. Properties of joint estate.....	180
§ 254.....	(1) Unity of interest.....	181
§ 255.....	(2) Unity of title.....	181

[References are to star paging.]

§ 256.	(3) Unity of time.....	181
§ 257.	(4) Unity of possession.....	182
	Note: Seisin per my et per tout.....	182n
§ 258.	(5) Other incidents of joint estates.....	182
§ 259.	(6) Doctrine of survivorship.....	183
	Note: Joint tenancies.....	183n
§ 260.	c. Joint tenancy, how severed and destroyed.....	185
§ 261.	(1) Destruction of unity of time.....	185
§ 262.	(2) Partition .....	185
§ 263.	(3) Alienation .....	185
§ 264.	(4) Merger .....	186
§ 265.	(5) Utility of severance of joint estates.....	187
§ 266.	3. Estates in coparcenary.....	187
§ 267.	a. Properties of parceners.....	188
§ 268.	b. Partition .....	189
§ 269.	c. Hotchpot .....	190
§ 270.	d. Dissolution of estate in coparcenary.....	191
§ 271.	4. Tenancy in common.....	191
§ 272.	a. Creation of tenancies in common.....	192
§ 273.	b. Joint tenancies preferred to tenancies in common.....	193
§ 274.	c. Incidents of tenancies in common.....	194
§ 275.	d. Dissolution of tenancies in common.....	194

CHAPTER XIII.

OF THE TITLE TO THINGS REAL, IN GENERAL.

§ 276.	Title to things real.....	195
§ 277.	Definition of title.....	195
§ 278.	Steps requisite to complete title.....	195
§ 279.	1. Mere possession .....	195
	Note: Nature of possession .....	195n
	Note: Ownership .....	196n
	Note: Distinction between possession and ownership.....	196n
	Note: Title by prescription.....	196n
§ 280.	2. Right of possession.....	196
§ 281.	3. Mere right of property.....	197
§ 282.	(Title by limitation) .....	198
	Note: Statutes of limitation.....	199n
§ 283.	4. Complete title .....	199
	Note: Nature of ownership.....	199n

CHAPTER XIV.

OF TITLE BY DESCENT.

§ 284.	Modes of acquiring and losing title.....	200
§ 285.	1. Descent and purchase .....	201
§ 286.	a. Descent, or hereditary succession.....	201
§ 287.	(1) Importance of doctrine of descent.....	201
§ 288.	(2) Descent at common law.....	202

[References are to star paging.]

§ 289.	(a) Consanguinity .....	202
§ 290.	(i) Lineal consanguinity.....	203
§ 291.	(ii) Collateral consanguinity.....	204
§ 292.	(iii) Computation of degrees.....	206
	Note: Computation of degrees.....	206n
§ 293.	(3) Rules of descent.....	208
	Note: Modern English rules of inheritance.....	208n
§ 294.	(a) First rule: inheritances lineally to issue of person last seised.....	208
§ 295.	(i) Heirs apparent and presumptive.....	208
§ 296.	(ii) Seisin necessary in ancestor.....	209
§ 297.	(iii) Descent from father to son.....	210
§ 298.	(aa) Exclusion of lineal ascent.....	210
§ 299.	(b) Second rule: males preferred to females... ..	212
§ 300.	(c) Third rule: primogeniture.....	214
§ 301.	(i) Origin of primogeniture.....	214
§ 302.	(ii) Primogeniture in socage estates.....	215
§ 303.	(iii) Descent as among females.....	216
§ 304.	(d) Fourth rule: lineal descendants take by rep- resentation .....	216
§ 305.	(i) Called succession in stirpes .....	217
§ 306.	(ii) Reason for rule of succession in stirpes ..	218
§ 307.	(iii) History of rule of succession in stirpes ..	219
§ 308.	(e) Fifth rule: collateral descent to blood of first purchaser .....	220
§ 309.	(i) Rule peculiar to English law.....	220
§ 310.	(ii) Origin of the rule.....	220
§ 311.	(iii) Feudum novum to be held ut feudum antiquum .....	221
§ 312.	(iv) The principle of collateral inheritance..	223
§ 313.	(f) Sixth rule: next collateral kinsman of the whole blood .....	224
§ 314.	(i) Who is next collateral kinsman.....	224
§ 315.	(ii) Lineal ancestors are the common stocks..	226
§ 316.	(iii) Exclusion of the half blood.....	227
§ 317.	(aa) Reason for excluding half blood..	228
	Note: Exclusion of the half blood .....	228n
§ 318.	(bb) Unjust extension of rule exclud- ing half blood.....	231
§ 319.	(cc) Summary of reasons for rule... ..	233
§ 320.	(g) Seventh rule: preference of male stocks in collateral descent .....	234
§ 321.	(i) Reasons for rule preferring male stocks..	235
§ 322.	(4) Tracing a pedigree .....	237

[References are to star paging.]

CHAPTER XV.

OF TITLE BY PURCHASE.

I. By Escheat.

§ 323.	Definition of purchase.....	241
§ 324.	Legal conception of purchase.....	241
§ 325.	1. "Conquest" of the feudists.....	242
§ 326.	Differences between descent and purchase.....	243
§ 327.	Five modes of acquiring title by purchase.....	244
§ 328.	I. Escheat .....	244
§ 329.	1. Requisites of escheat.....	244
	Note: Escheat, feudal and modern.....	245n
§ 330.	2. Principle of escheat.....	245
§ 331.	3. Failure of hereditary blood.....	245
§ 332.	a. Cases of failure of hereditary blood.....	246
§ 333.	(1) Tenant dying without any relations at all....	246
	(2) Tenant dying without relations representing ancestor from whom estate descended.....	246
	(3) Tenant dying without relations of whole blood	246
§ 334.	(4) Monsters .....	246
§ 335.	(5) Bastards .....	247
	Note: Inheritance of a legitimated child... ..	247n
	(a) Case of bastard eigne and mulier puisne	248
	(b) Bastards have no collateral kindred... ..	249
§ 336.
§ 337.
§ 338.	(6) Aliens .....	249
§ 339.	(a) Denizens .....	249
§ 340.	(b) Direct descent between brothers.....	250
§ 341.	(c) Descent through an alien.....	251
§ 342.	(7) Attainder .....	251
§ 343.	(a) Doctrine of escheat upon attainder....	252
§ 344.	(b) Corruption of blood.....	253
	Note: Corruption of blood abolished.....	256n
§ 345.	4. Exception to rule of escheat: corporations.....	256
	Note: Estate of a corporation.....	257n
§ 346.	5. Question of nonjuring papists.....	257

CHAPTER XVI.

OF TITLE BY OCCUPANCY.

§ 347.	II. Occupancy .....	258
	Note: Original occupation obsolete in England.....	258n
	Note: Title by occupancy in the United States.....	258n
	Note: Pre-emption and homestead rights.....	258n
§ 348.	1. Occupancy of estate pur auter vie .....	258
§ 349.	a. Common and special occupant.....	259
§ 350.	b. Common occupancy abolished; special occupancy de- visable .....	259
	Note: Special occupancy.....	260n

[References are to star paging.]

§ 351.	2. Islands; alluvion; dereliction.....	261
	Note: Islands; alluvion; avulsion.....	261n

CHAPTER XVII.

OF TITLE BY PRESCRIPTION.

§ 352.	III. Prescription .....	263
	Note: Prescription and limitation; occupying claimants...	263n
§ 353.	1. Distinction between custom and prescription.....	263
	Note: The Prescription Act of 1832.....	264n
	Note: Prescription in the United States.....	265n
§ 354.	2. Rules governing prescription.....	264
	a. Incorporeal hereditaments.....	264
§ 355.	b. In tenant of the fee.....	264
§ 356.	c. Prescription presupposes a grant.....	265
§ 357.	d. No prescription in matter of record.....	265
§ 358.	e. Prescription in a que estate .....	265
§ 359.	f. Descent of estates prescribed.....	266

CHAPTER XVIII.

OF TITLE BY FORFEITURE.

§ 360.	IV. Forfeiture .....	267
	Note: Forfeiture in America; military occupation.....	267n
§ 361.	1. Causes of forfeiture.....	267
§ 362.	a. Forfeitures for crimes and misdemeanors.....	267
§ 363.	b. Forfeitures for alienation contrary to law.....	268
§ 364.	(1) Alienation in mortmain.....	268
	Note: The saint as owner of church property..	268n
§ 365.	(a) Licenses in mortmain.....	268
§ 366.	(b) Evasions of rule by clergy.....	269
§ 367.	(c) Prohibition in Magna Carta.....	269
§ 368.	(d) Statute De Religiosis , 1279.....	270
§ 369.	(e) Common recoveries.....	270
§ 370.	(f) Invention of uses.....	271
§ 371.	(g) Power of crown to remit forfeitures.....	272
§ 372.	(h) Suspension of statutes of mortmain.....	273
§ 373.	(i) Charitable uses.....	273
	Note: Mortmain Act of 1888.....	274n
	Note: Charitable uses: Acts of 1888 and 1891 .....	274n
§ 374.	(2) Alienation to an alien.....	274
§ 375.	(3) Tortious alienation by particular tenants.....	274
§ 376.	(4) Disclaimer of tenure.....	275
	Note: Disclaimer of title in United States....	276n
§ 377.	c. Right of lapse.....	276
§ 378.	d. Simony.....	278
§ 379.	(1) Statutes, 1588, 1688, 1713.....	279

[References are to star paging.]

§ 380.	(2) What constitutes simony.....	279
§ 381.	e. Breach of condition.....	281
§ 382.	f. Waste.....	281
	Note: Law of waste in the United States.....	281n
§ 383.	(1) Acts constituting waste.....	281
§ 384.	(2) Who liable for waste.....	282
§ 385.	(3) Punishment for waste.....	283
§ 386.	g. Forfeiture of copyholds by breach of custom.....	284
	Note: Modern forfeitures of copyholds.....	284n
§ 387.	h. Bankruptcy.....	285
	Note: English Bankrupt Act of 1883.....	285n

CHAPTER XIX.

OF TITLE BY ALIENATION.

§ 388.	Acquisition of title by conveyance or alienation.....	287
	Note: Modes of alienation.....	287n
§ 389.	1. Former restriction on alienation.....	287
§ 390.	2. Freedom of alienation: history.....	288
	Note: Restraints on alienation.....	290n
§ 391.	3. Who may alien; who may purchase.....	290
§ 392.	a. Persons attainted.....	290
§ 393.	b. Idiots; insane; infants; persons under duress.....	291
	Note: Stultifying one's self.....	292n
§ 394.	c. Feme covert .....	292
§ 395.	d. Aliens.....	293
	Note: Capacity to purchase or convey as affected by age, status, or mental condition.....	293n
§ 396.	e. Papists.....	293
§ 397.	4. Modes of conveying.....	293
§ 398.	a. Common assurances.....	294

CHAPTER XX.

OF ALIENATION BY DEED.

§ 399.	Deeds.....	295
§ 400.	1. General nature of deeds.....	295
	Note: Indentures and deeds poll.....	296n
§ 401.	2. Requisites of a deed.....	296
§ 402.	a. Parties and subject matter.....	296
§ 403.	b. Consideration.....	296
	Note: Consideration.....	297n
§ 404.	c. Writing.....	297
§ 405.	d. Formal and orderly parts.....	297
§ 406.	(1) Premises.....	298
§ 407.	(2) Habendum .....	298
§ 408.	(3) Tenedum .....	298
§ 409.	(4) Reddendum .....	299

[References are to star paging.]

§ 410.	(5) Conditions .....	299
§ 411.	(6) Warranties: implied and express.....	300
	Note: Warranty of title.....	300n
§ 412.	(a) Origin of express warranties.....	301
§ 413.	(i) Lineal and collateral warranties.....	301
§ 414.	(ii) Effect of warranties.....	302
§ 415.	(iii) Restrained by statutes.....	302
§ 416.	(7) Covenants .....	304
	Note: Covenants in United States.....	304n
§ 417.	(8) Conclusion of the deed.....	304
§ 418.	e. Reading of the deed.....	304
§ 419.	f. Signing and sealing.....	305
§ 420.	g. Delivery of the deed.....	306
	Note: Delivery .....	307n
§ 421.	h. Attestation or execution.....	307
§ 422.	3. Deeds how avoided.....	308
	Note: Effect of alteration of deed.....	308n
§ 423.	4. The several species of deeds.....	309
§ 424.	a. Conveyances at common law.....	309
§ 425.	(1) Original conveyances.....	310
§ 426.	(a) Feoffment or grant.....	310
	Note: History of feoffment.....	310n
	Note: Freehold by wrong.....	311n
§ 427.	(i) Feudal investiture .....	311
§ 428.	(ii) Symbolical delivery of possession.....	312
§ 429.	(iii) Conveyances in writing .....	313
§ 430.	(iv) Livery of seisin .....	314
§ 431.	(aa) Livery in deed .....	315
§ 432.	(bb) Livery in law .....	316
§ 433.	(b) Gifts .....	316
§ 434.	(c) Grants .....	317
§ 435.	(d) Leases .....	317
§ 436.	(i) Right to make leases .....	318
§ 437.	(aa) Enabling statute of 32 Henry VIII .....	319
	Note: Church leases .....	319n
§ 438.	(bb) Disabling statutes .....	320
§ 439.	(aaa) Effect of disabling statutes .....	321
§ 440.	(bbb) College leases .....	322
§ 441.	(ccc) Leases of nonresident clergy .....	322
§ 442.	(e) Exchange .....	323
§ 443.	(f) Partition .....	323
	Note: Partition in United States.....	324n
§ 444.	(2) Secondary or derivative conveyances.....	324

[References are to star paging.]

§ 445.	(a) Releases .....	324
	Note: Release and quitclaim .....	324n
	Note: Quitclaim deeds .....	325n
§ 446.	(b) Confirmation .....	325
	Note: Confirmation .....	326n
§ 447.	(c) Surrender .....	326
	Note: Surrender: express and implied....	326n
§ 448.	(d) Assignment .....	326
	Note: Assignment .....	327n
§ 449.	(e) Defeasance .....	327
	Note: Revocation and resulting uses....	327n
	Note: Defeasance .....	327n
§ 450.	(8) Conveyances under the statute of uses.....	327
§ 451.	(a) Uses and trusts .....	327
	Note: Meaning of cestui que use and cestui que trust .....	328n
§ 452.	(i) Doctrine of uses .....	329
§ 453.	(ii) Statute of Uses, 1535.....	332
§ 454.	(aa) Decisions of common-law courts...	333
§ 455.	(bb) Decisions of the court of chancery.	335
	Note: Tyrrel's case and the origin of trusts .....	335n
§ 456.	(cc) Modern law of trusts.....	336
	Note: Resulting uses and trusts.	337n
§ 457.	(b) Covenant to stand seised to uses.....	338
	Note: Covenant to stand seised in United States .....	338n
§ 458.	(c) Bargain and sale .....	338
	Note: Modern bargain and sale deed....	338n
§ 459.	(d) Lease and release .....	339
	Note: History of the lease and release....	339n
§ 460.	(e) Deeds to lead or declare uses.....	339
§ 461.	(f) Deeds of revocation of uses.....	339
§ 462.	5. Deeds to charge and discharge lands.....	340
§ 463.	a. Obligation or bond .....	340
§ 464.	b. Recognizance .....	341
§ 465.	c. Defeasance .....	342
§ 466.	6. Question of registering deeds .....	342
	Note: Recording acts and registration of title.....	342n

CHAPTER XXI.

OF ALIENATION BY MATTER OF RECORD.

§ 467.	Assurances by matter of record.....	344
§ 468.	1. Private acts of parliament.....	344
	Note: Private acts as conveyances.....	344n
	Note: Legislative power to transfer private title.....	346n

[References are to star paging.]

§ 469.	2. The king's grants.....	346
§ 470.	a. The practice in royal grants.....	346
§ 471.	b. Construction of royal grants.....	347
	Note: Interpretation of public grants.....	347n
	Note: Public grants .....	347n
§ 472.	3. Fines.....	348
	Note: Abolition of fines and recoveries.....	348n
§ 473.	a. Nature of a fine.....	348
§ 474.	b. Mode of levying fines.....	349
	(1) Writ of præcipe .....	349
§ 475.	(2) Licentia concordandi .....	350
§ 476.	(3) Concord or agreement.....	350
§ 477.	(4) The note of the fine.....	351
§ 478.	(5) The foot of the fine.....	351
§ 479.	(6) Other solemnities.....	351
§ 480.	c. Kinds of fines.....	352
§ 481.	d. Force and effect of a fine.....	353
§ 482.	(1) Parties to a fine.....	355
§ 483.	(2) Privies to a fine.....	355
§ 484.	(3) Strangers to a fine.....	356
§ 485.	(4) Freehold interest essential to a fine.....	356
§ 486.	4. Common recovery.....	357
	Note: Procedure in common recoveries.....	357n
§ 487.	a. Nature of a common recovery.....	357
§ 488.	(1) Single voucher.....	358
§ 489.	(2) Double voucher.....	359
§ 490.	(3) Supposed recompense from the common vouchee..	360
§ 491.	(4) Improvements desirable.....	360
§ 492.	b. Force and effect of common recoveries.....	361
§ 493.	(1) Recoveree must be seised of the freehold.....	362
§ 494.	c. Deeds to lead or declare uses.....	363

CHAPTER XXII.

OF ALIENATION BY SPECIAL CUSTOM.

§ 495.	Alienation of copyhold and customary estates.....	365
	Note: Special customs in United States.....	365n
§ 496.	Surrender.....	365
§ 497.	1. Feudal origin of surrender.....	366
§ 498.	2. Surrender only conveyance of copyholds.....	367
§ 499.	3. The several parts of conveyance by surrender.....	368
§ 500.	a. Surrender.....	368
§ 501.	b. Presentment.....	369
§ 502.	c. Admittance.....	370
§ 503.	(1) Admittance upon a voluntary grant.....	370
§ 504.	(2) Admittance upon a surrender.....	370
§ 505.	(3) Admittance upon a descent .....	370

[References are to star paging.]

CHAPTER XXIII.

OF ALIENATION BY DEVISE.

§ 506.	Conveyance by devise.....	373
	Note: Power to devise.....	373n
§ 507.	1. Feudal restraints on power to devise.....	373
§ 508.	2. Devise of the use; Statute of Wills, 1540.....	375
§ 509.	3. Devises to corporations for charitable uses.....	375
	Note: Statutes of mortmain.....	375n
§ 510.	4. Statute of Frauds, 1677.....	376
§ 511.	a. Signing; witnesses.....	376
§ 512.	b. Specialty creditors.....	378
§ 513.	5. Distinction between wills of land and of chattels.....	378
	Note: Devise as conveyance.....	378n
	Note: Operation of devise.....	379n
§ 514.	Rules and maxims for construing conveyances.....	379
	Note: Principles of construction.....	379n
§ 515.	1. Favorable to apparent intent.....	379
§ 516.	2. Words taken in ordinary sense.....	379
§ 517.	3. Effect to every part.....	379
§ 518.	4. Taken most strongly against maker.....	380
§ 519.	5. Validity preferred.....	380
§ 520.	6. Where clauses repugnant.....	381
§ 521.	7. The devisor's intention to be attained.....	381
	Note: Cross-remainders.....	381n
§ 522.	Recapitulation of subject of common assurances.....	382

CHAPTER XXIV.

OF THINGS PERSONAL.

§ 523.	1. Former inferiority of things personal.....	384
	Note: Definition of things personal: choses in action.....	384n
§ 524.	2. Modern importance of things personal.....	385
§ 525.	3. Meaning of things personal, or chattels.....	385
§ 526.	4. Division of chattels.....	386
§ 527.	5. 1. Chattels real.....	386
§ 528.	6. 2. Chattels personal.....	387

CHAPTER XXV.

OF PROPERTY IN THINGS PERSONAL.

§ 529.	Property in possession.....	389
§ 530.	1. Absolute property.....	389
§ 531.	a. Property in animals.....	389
§ 532.	(1) Tame animals.....	390
§ 533.	2. Qualified property.....	391
§ 534.	a. Property in wild animals.....	391

[References are to star paging.]

§ 535.	(1) Property in wild animals per industriam .....	391
§ 536.	(2) Property in wild animals propter impotentiam ....	394
§ 537.	(3) Property in wild animals propter privilegium ....	394
§ 538.	b. Property in air, light, and water.....	395
§ 539.	c. Qualified property arising from circumstances.....	395
§ 540.	Property in action: choses in action.....	396
	Note: Meaning of chose in action.....	397n
	Note: Chose in action and debt.....	398n
§ 541.	Time of enjoyment of personal property.....	398
§ 542.	Number of owners of personal property.....	399

CHAPTER XXVI.

OF TITLE TO THINGS PERSONAL BY OCCUPANCY.

§ 543.	The modes of acquiring things personal.....	400
§ 544.	I. Title by occupancy.....	400
§ 545.	1. Goods of alien enemy.....	401
§ 546.	2. Treasure-trove.....	402
§ 547.	3. Light, air, and water.....	402
	Note: Coming to a nuisance.....	403n
§ 548.	4. Wild animals.....	403
§ 549.	5. Emblements.....	403
§ 550.	6. Accession.....	404
	Note: Accession and confusion.....	404n
§ 551.	7. Confusion.....	405
§ 552.	8. Copyright.....	405
	Note: Trademarks.....	405n
	Note: Copyright.....	405n
	Note: Patent rights.....	407n

CHAPTER XXVII.

OF TITLE BY PREROGATIVE AND FORFEITURE.

§ 553.	II. Title by prerogative.....	408
§ 554.	1. Taxes and customs.....	408
§ 555.	2. King cannot be joint owner.....	409
§ 556.	3. King's special property.....	409
§ 557.	4. Prerogative copyright.....	410
§ 558.	5. Property in game.....	410
	Note: Game laws.....	411n
§ 559.	a. Forest and game laws.....	413
§ 560.	(1) Saxon customs as to game.....	414
§ 561.	(2) Norman customs as to game.....	415
§ 562.	(3) Free fishery and freewarren.....	417
§ 563.	(4) Sole right of taking originally in king.....	417
§ 564.	(5) Privilege of hunting.....	419

[References are to star paging.]

§ 565.	III. Title by forfeiture.....	420
§ 566.	1. Forfeiture for offenses.....	420
§ 567.	a. Forfeiture for treason and felony.....	420
	Note: Forfeitures abolished.....	421n
§ 568.	b. When forfeiture begins.....	421

CHAPTER XXVIII.

OF TITLE BY CUSTOM.

§ 569.	IV. Title by custom.....	422
§ 570.	1. Heriots.....	422
	Note: A modern instance of heriot service.....	422n
§ 571.	a. Heriots of Danish origin.....	423
§ 572.	b. Heriots always personal chattels.....	424
§ 573.	2. Mortuaries.....	425
§ 574.	3. Heirlooms.....	427
	Note: Heirlooms in United States.....	428n
	Note: Pew rights.....	429n
	Note: Property in dead bodies.....	429n

CHAPTER XXIX.

OF TITLE BY SUCCESSION, MARRIAGE, AND JUDGMENT.

§ 575.	V. Title by succession.....	430
§ 576.	1. Distinction as to sole corporations.....	431
§ 577.	VI. Title by marriage.....	433
	Note: Law of property of married women.....	433n
§ 578.	1. Difference between chattels real and personal.....	433
§ 579.	2. Paraphernalia.....	435
	Note: Paraphernalia.....	435n
	Note: "Community property".....	436n
§ 580.	VII. Title by judgment.....	436
§ 581.	1. Penalties.....	437
§ 582.	2. Damages.....	438
§ 583.	3. Costs.....	439

CHAPTER XXX.

OF TITLE BY GIFT, GRANT, AND CONTRACT.

§ 584.	VIII. Title by gift or grant.....	440
	1. Chattels real.....	440
§ 585.	2. Chattels personal.....	441
	Note: Gifts.....	441n
§ 586.	3. Delivery of possession.....	441
§ 587.	IX. Title by contract.....	442
	Note: Definition of contract.....	442n

[References are to star paging.]

§ 588.	1. Agreement.....	442
	Note: Assignability of choses in action.....	442n
§ 589.	a. Express and implied contracts.....	443
	Note: Quasi contracts.....	443n
§ 590.	b. Executed and executory contracts.....	443
§ 591.	2. Consideration....	443
	Note: Consideration.....	444n
§ 592.	a. Consideration in the civil law.....	444
	Note: Roman law of contracts.....	444n
§ 593.	b. Nude pacts.....	445
	Note: Nude pacts.....	445n
§ 594.	3. The several species of contract .....	446
§ 595.	a. Sale or exchange .....	446
	Note: English Sale of Goods Act of 1893.....	446n
§ 596.	(1) Sale after execution .....	447
§ 597.	(2) Contract of sale when complete .....	447
§ 598.	(3) Statute of Frauds, 1677 .....	448
	Note: Shaking hands over a bargain....	448n
§ 599.	(4) When title passes .....	448
§ 600.	(5) Sale by one not owner .....	449
§ 601.	(a) Market overt .....	449
	Note: Sales in fairs or markets overt....	449n
§ 602.	(b) Stolen goods .....	449
§ 603.	(c) Knowledge of defective title .....	450
§ 604.	(d) Sale of horses .....	450
§ 605.	(6) Warranty .....	450
§ 606.	b. Bailment .....	451
	Note: Carriers .....	451n
	Note: The law of public calling .....	452n
§ 607.	(1) Bailee's qualified property .....	452
	Note: Interest of the bailee .....	452n
§ 608.	c. Hiring and borrowing .....	453
§ 609.	(1) Interest .....	454
§ 610.	(a) Bottomry or respondentia .....	457
§ 611.	(b) Insurance .....	458
§ 612.	(i) Life insurance .....	459
§ 613.	(ii) Marine insurance .....	460
§ 614.	(c) Annuities .....	461
§ 615.	(2) Rates of interest .....	462
	Note: Usury laws .....	461n
§ 616.	d. Debt .....	464
§ 617.	(1) Debts of record .....	465
§ 618.	(2) Debts by specialty .....	465
§ 619.	(3) Debts by simple contract .....	465
§ 620.	(a) Bills of exchange .....	466
§ 621.	(i) Foreign and inland bills .....	467

[References are to star paging.]

§ 622.	(b) Promissory notes .....	467
§ 623.	(i) Negotiability of bills and notes..	468
	Note: English Bills of Exchange Act of 1882 .....	468n
§ 624.	(aa) Indorsement .....	468
§ 625.	(bb) Presentation and acceptance .....	469
§ 626.	(cc) Protest for nonpayment..	469
§ 627.	(dd) Liability of indorsers ...	470

CHAPTER XXXI.

OF TITLE BY BANKRUPTCY.

§ 628.	X. Title by bankruptcy.....	471
	Note: Recent English and American bankrupt laws.....	471n
§ 629.	1. Who may become a bankrupt.....	471
§ 630.	a. Roman law.....	472
§ 631.	b. Only traders within the law in England.....	473
§ 632.	c. First bankrupt acts, 1542, 1571, and 1623.....	474
§ 633.	d. Bankrupt act of 1731.....	475
§ 634.	a. What constitutes trading.....	476
§ 635.	2. What are acts of bankruptcy.....	477
§ 636.	a. Construction of statutes.....	479
§ 637.	3. Proceedings in bankruptcy.....	479
§ 638.	a. Petition by creditor.....	480
§ 639.	b. Proof; finding; notice; surrender.....	480
§ 640.	c. Arrest of bankrupt.....	481
§ 641.	d. Examination of bankrupt.....	481
§ 642.	e. Certificate of conformity.....	482
§ 643.	f. Allowance to bankrupt.....	483
§ 644.	g. Discharge of debts.....	483
§ 645.	h. Conditions of allowance and discharge.....	484
§ 646.	4. Effect of bankruptcy on property.....	485
§ 647.	a. Assignee's title.....	485
§ 648.	b. Distribution of assets.....	487

CHAPTER XXXII.

OF TITLE BY TESTAMENT AND ADMINISTRATION.

§ 649.	XI, XII. Wills and administration.....	489
§ 650.	1. Origin and history of wills and administrations.....	489
§ 651.	a. Antiquity of wills.....	490
§ 652.	b. Testamentary power in England.....	491
§ 653.	c. Development of the law of wills.....	492
§ 654.	d. Intestate estates.....	494
§ 655.	e. Origin and history of administrations.....	495

[References are to star paging.]

§ 656.	2. Capacity to make a will.....	496
§ 657.	a. Infants and non compotes mentis .....	497
§ 658.	b. Persons under duress.....	497
§ 659.	(1) Married women.....	497
§ 660.	(2) Queen consort.....	498
	Note: Will revoked by marriage.....	499n
§ 661.	c. Traitors and felons.....	499
§ 662.	3. Nature and incidents of wills.....	499
§ 663.	a. Kinds of wills.....	500
§ 664.	(1) Nuncupative wills.....	500
	Note: Nuncupative wills .....	500n
§ 665.	(2) Written wills.....	501
	Note: Holographic wills.....	502n
§ 666.	b. Wills inoperative before death.....	502
§ 667.	c. Wills how avoided.....	502
§ 668.	4. Executors and administrators.....	503
§ 669.	a. Executors.....	503
§ 670.	b. Administrators.....	504
	Note: Modern English administration of estates..	504n
§ 671.	c. Respective interests of executors and administrators.	506
§ 672.	5. Office and duties of executors and administrators.....	507
§ 673.	a. Executor de son tort .....	507
	Note: Doctrine of executor de son tort in the United
	States .....	508n
§ 674.	b. Burial of deceased.....	508
§ 675.	c. Probate of will.....	508
	Note: Bona notabilia.....	510n
§ 676.	d. Inventory .....	510
§ 677.	e. Collecting assets.....	510
§ 678.	f. Paying debts.....	511
§ 679.	g. Legacies.....	512
§ 680.	(1) Gifts causa mortis .....	514
§ 681.	h. The surplus or residue.....	514
§ 682.	i. Statute of Distributions, 1670.....	515
§ 683.	(1) Analogies of the statute.....	516
§ 684.	(2) Representation by the statute.....	517
§ 685.	(3) Local exceptions in the statute.....	517

TABULAR VIEW OF BOOK I.

	Section
Introduction.....	1
Of the study of the law.....	2
The nature of laws in general.....	3
The grounds and foundation of the laws of England.....	4
The objects of the laws of England, viz.....	4
		Book
I. THE RIGHTS OF PERSONS.....		I which are those of,
1. Natural persons; whose rights are,
{ 1. Absolute; viz., the enjoyment of,
{ 1. Personal security		Chapter
{ 2. Personal liberty
{ 3. Private property.....	1
2. Relative, as they stand in relations
1. Public, as,
1. Magistrates, who are,
1. Supreme:
{ 1. Legislative, viz., the parliament.....	2
{ 2. Executive, viz., the king, wherein of his
{ 1. Title.....	3
{ 2. Royal family .....	4
{ 3. Councils.....	5
{ 4. Duties .....	6
{ 5. Prerogative .....	7
{ 6. Revenue: .....
{ 1. Ordinary, viz.,
{ 1. Ecclesiastical
{ 2. Temporal
2. Extraordinary .....	8
2. Subordinate.....	9
2. People, who are,
{ 1. Aliens .....	10
{ 2. Natives, who are,
{ 1. Clergy.....	11
{ 2. Laity, who are in a state,
{ 1. Civil .....	12
{ 2. Military
{ 3. Maritime.....	13
2. Private, as
1. Master and servant.....	14
2. Husband and wife.....	15
3. Parent and child.....	16
4. Guardian and ward.....	17
2. Bodies politic, or corporations.....	18

(LXXXV)

[Faint, illegible text, possibly bleed-through from the reverse side of the page]

BLACKSTONE'S ANALYSIS OF THE COMMENTARIES.*

INTRODUCTION.

OF THE STUDY, NATURE, AND EXTENT OF THE LAWS OF ENGLAND.

SECTION I.

OF THE STUDY OF THE LAW.

[References are to star paging.]

1. The general utility of the study of the English common law will principally appear from considering the peculiar situations of, 1. Gentlemen of fortune. 2. The nobility. 3. Persons in liberal professions. 6-16
2. The causes of its neglect were, chiefly, the revival of the study of the Roman laws in the twelfth century, their adoption by the clergy and universities, and the illiberal jealousy that subsisted between the patrons and students of each. . . . . 16-22
3. The establishment of the court of common pleas at Westminster preserved the common law, and promoted its study in that neighborhood, exclusive of the two universities. . . . . 22-26
4. But the universities are now the most eligible places for laying the foundations of this, as of every other liberal accomplishment; by tracing out the principles and grounds of the law, even to their original elements . . . . . 26-37

SECTION II.

OF THE NATURE OF LAWS IN GENERAL.

1. Law is a rule of action, prescribed by a superior power. . . . . 38
2. Natural law is the rule of human action, prescribed by the Creator, and discoverable by the light of reason. . . . . 39-41
3. The divine or revealed law (considered as a rule of action) is also the law of nature, imparted by God himself. . . . . 41-43
4. The law of nations is that which regulates the conduct and mutual intercourse of independent states with each other, by reason and natural justice . . . . . 43
5. Municipal or civil law is the rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in a state, commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong . . . . . 44-47

* This Analysis was printed by Blackstone for the use of his students as a syllabus of his lectures.

[References are to star paging.]

- 6. Society is formed for the protection of individuals; and states or government for the preservation of society..... 47
- 7. In all states there is an absolute supreme power, to which the right of legislation belongs; and which, by the singular constitution of these kingdoms, is vested in the king, lords, and commons..... 48-53
- 8. The parts of a law are, 1. The declaratory, which defines what is right and wrong. 2. The directory, which consists in commanding the observation of right, or prohibiting the commission of wrong. 3. The remedial, or method of recovering private rights and redressing private wrongs. 4. The vindicatory sanction of punishments for public wrongs; wherein consists the most forcible obligation of human laws ..... 53-59
- 9. To interpret a law, we must inquire after the will of the maker, which may be collected either from the words, the context, the subject matter, the effects and consequence, or the spirit and reason of the law. . 59-61
- 10. From the latter method of interpretation arises equity, or the correction of that wherein the law (by reason of its universality) is deficient. . 61-62

SECTION III

OF THE LAWS OF ENGLAND.

- 1. The laws of England are of two kinds: the unwritten or common law, and the written or statute law..... 63
- 2. The unwritten law includes, 1. General customs. 2. Particular customs. 3. Particular laws..... 64-67
- 3. General customs, or the common law properly so called, are founded upon immemorial universal usage, whereof judicial decisions are the evidence; which decisions are preserved in the public records, explained in the year-books and reports, and digested by writers of approved authority ..... 68-74
- 4. Particular customs are those which are only in use within some peculiar districts; as gavelkind, the customs of London, etc..... 74-76
- 5. These, 1. Must be proved to exist; 2. Must appear to be legal; that is, immemorial, continued, peaceable, reasonable, certain, compulsory, and consistent; 3. Must, when allowed, receive a strict construction. . 76-79
- 6. Particular laws are such as, by special custom, are adopted and used only in certain peculiar courts, under the superintendance and control of the common and statute law; namely, the Roman, civil, and canon laws ..... 79-84
- 7. The written or statute laws are the acts which are made by the king, lords, and commons in parliament, to supply the defects, or amend what is amiss, of the unwritten law..... 85-91
- 8. In order to give a more specific relief than can sometimes be had, through the generality of both the unwritten and written law, in matters of private right, it is the office of equity to interpose..... 91-92

SECTION IV.

OF THE COUNTRIES SUBJECT TO THE LAWS OF ENGLAND.

[References are to star paging.]

1. The laws of England are not received in their full extent in any other territories besides the kingdom of England and the dominion of Wales, which have, in most respects, an entire communion of laws. .93-95
2. Scotland, notwithstanding the union, retains its own municipal laws, though subject to regulation by the British parliament. . . . .95-98
3. Berwick is governed by its own local usages, derived from the Scots law, but bound by all acts of parliament. . . . . 99
4. Ireland is a distinct subordinate kingdom, governed by the common law of England, but not bound by modern acts of the British parliament, unless particularly named. . . . .99-104
5. The Isle of Man, the Norman Isles (as Guernsey, etc.) and our plantations abroad, are governed by their own laws, but are bound by acts of the British parliament, if specially named therein. . . . .104-111
6. The territory of England is divided, ecclesiastically, into provinces, dioceses, archdeaconries, rural deaneries, and parishes. . . . .111-114
7. The civil division is, first, into counties, of which some are palatine; then, sometimes, into rapes, lathes, or trithings; next into hundreds, or wapentakes; and, lastly, into towns, vills, or tithings. . . . .114-120

BOOK I.

OF THE RIGHTS OF PERSONS.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE ABSOLUTE RIGHTS OF INDIVIDUALS.

1. The objects of the laws of England are, 1. Rights. 2. Wrongs. . . .121-122
2. Rights are, the rights of persons, or the rights of things. . . . . 122
3. The rights of persons are such as concern, and are annexed to, the persons of men, and, when the person to whom they are due is regarded, they are called (simply) rights; but, when we consider the person from whom they are due, they are then denominated duties. . . . 123
4. Persons are either natural, that is, such as they are formed by nature; or artificial, that is, created by human policy, as bodies politic or corporations . . . . . 123
5. The rights of natural persons are, 1. Absolute, or such as belong to individuals. 2. Relative, or such as regard members of society. . . . 123
6. The absolute rights of individuals, regarded by the municipal laws (which pay no attention to duties of the absolute kind), compose what is called political or civil liberty. . . . . 123
7. Political or civil liberty is the natural liberty of mankind, so far restrained by human laws as is necessary for the good of society. . . . 125

[References are to star paging.]

8. The absolute rights, or civil liberties, of Englishmen, as frequently declared in parliament, are principally three: the right of personal security, of personal liberty, and of private property.....125-129
9. The right of personal security consists in the legal enjoyment of life, limb, body, health, and reputation.....129-134
10. The right of personal liberty consists in the free power of locomotion, without illegal restraint or banishment.....134-138
11. The right of private property consists in every man's free use and disposal of his own lawful acquisitions, without injury or illegal diminution.....138-140
12. Besides these three primary rights, there are others which are secondary and subordinate; viz. (to preserve the former from unlawful attacks), 1. The constitution and power of parliaments. 2. The limitation of the king's prerogative; and (to vindicate them when actually violated). 3. The regular administration of public justice. 4. The right of petitioning for redress of grievances. 5. The right of having and using arms for self-defense.....140-145

CHAPTER II.

OF THE PARLIAMENT.

1. The relations of persons are, 1. Public. 2. Private. The public relations are those of magistrates and people. Magistrates are supreme, or subordinate. And of supreme magistrates, in England, the parliament is the supreme legislative, the king the supreme executive... 146
2. Parliaments, in some shape, are of as high antiquity as the Saxon government in this island; and have subsisted, in their present form, at least five hundred years.....147-150
3. The parliament is assembled by the king's writs, and its sitting must not be intermitted above three years.....150-153
4. Its constituent parts are the king's majesty, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons represented by their members: each of which parts has a negative, or necessary, voice in making laws. .153-160
5. With regard to the general law of parliament, its power is absolute; each house is the judge of its own privileges; and all the members of either house are entitled to the privilege of speech, of person, of their domestics, and of their lands and goods.....160-167
6. The peculiar privileges of the lords (besides their judicial capacity) are to hunt in the king's forests; to be attended by the sages of the law; to make proxies; to enter protests; and to regulate the election of the sixteen peers of North Britain.....167-169
7. The peculiar privileges of the commons are to frame taxes for the subject, and to determine the merits of their own elections, with regard to the qualifications of the electors and elected, and the proceedings at elections themselves.....169-181

[References are to star paging.]

8. Bills are usually twice read in each house, committed, engrossed, and then read a third time; and when they have obtained the concurrence of both houses, and received the royal assent, they become acts of parliament ..... 181-186
9. The houses may adjourn themselves; but the king only can prorogue the parliament ..... 186-187
10. Parliaments are dissolved, 1. At the king's will. 2. By the demise of the crown; that is, within six months after. 3. By length of time, or having sat for the space of seven years..... 188-189

CHAPTER III.

OF THE KING AND HIS TITLE.

1. The supreme executive power of this kingdom is lodged in a single person, the king or queen..... 190
2. This royal person may be considered with regard to, 1. His title. 2. His royal family. 3. His councils. 4. His duties. 5. His prerogative. 6 His revenue..... 190
3. With regard to his title: the crown of England, by the positive constitution of the kingdom, hath ever been descendible, and so continues ..... 190-193
4. The crown is descendible in a course peculiar to itself..... 193-195
5. This course of descent is subject to limitation by parliament..... 195-196
6. Notwithstanding such limitations, the crown retains its descendible quality, and becomes hereditary in the prince to whom it is limited ..... 196-197
7. King Egbert, King Canute, and King William I, have been successively constituted the common stocks, or ancestors, of this descent..... 197-210
8. At the revolution the convention of estates, or representative body of the nation, declared that the misconduct of King James II amounted to an abdication of the government, and that the throne was thereby vacant..... 211-213
9. In consequence of this vacancy, and from a regard to the ancient line, the convention appointed the next Protestant heirs of the blood royal of King Charles I to fill the vacant throne, in the old order of succession; with a temporary exception, or preference, to the person of King William III..... 214-216
10. On the impending failure of the Protestant line of King Charles I (whereby the throne might again have become vacant), the parliament extended the settlement of the crown to the Protestant line of King James I, viz., to the Princess Sophia of Hanover, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants; and she is now the common stock, from whom the heirs of the crown must descend..... 216-218

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE KING'S ROYAL FAMILY.

[References are to star paging.]

1. The king's royal family consists, first, of the queen, who is either regnant, consort, or dowager..... 219
2. The queen consort is a public person, and hath many personal prerogatives and distinct revenues..... 219-224
3. The Prince and Princess of Wales, and the princess-royal, are peculiarly regarded by the law..... 225
4. The other princes of the blood-royal are only entitled to precedences... 225

CHAPTER V.

OF THE COUNCILS BELONGING TO THE KING.

1. The king's councils are, 1. The parliament. 2. The great council of peers. 3. The judges, for matters of law. 4. The privy council... 227-230
2. In privy-counselors may be considered, 1. Their creation. 2. Their qualifications. 3. Their duties. 4. Their powers. 5. Their privileges. 6. Their dissolution ..... 230-232

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE KING'S DUTIES.

1. The king's duties are to govern his people according to law, to execute judgment in mercy, and to maintain the established religion... 233-234
2. These are his part of the original contract between himself and the people, founded in the nature of society, and expressed in his oath at the coronation ..... 234-235

CHAPTER VII.

OF THE KING'S PREROGATIVE.

1. Prerogative is that special power and pre-eminence, which the king hath above other persons, and out of the ordinary course of law, in right of his regal dignity..... 237-239
2. Such prerogatives are either direct, or incidental. The incidental, arising out of other matters, are considered as they arise; we now treat only of the direct..... 239-240
3. The direct prerogatives regard, 1. The king's dignity, or royal character; 2. His authority, or regal power; 3. His revenue, or royal income ..... 240-241
4. The king's dignity consists in the legal attributes of, 1. Personal sovereignty. 2. Absolute perfection. 3. Political perpetuity..... 241-249
5. In the king's authority, or regal power, consists the executive part of government ..... 250-252

[References are to star paging.]

6. In foreign concerns; the king, as the representative of the nation, has the right or prerogative. 1. Of sending and receiving ambassadors. 2. Of making treaties. 3. Of proclaiming war or peace. 4. Of issuing reprisals. 5. Of granting safe-conducts.....252-261
7. In domestic affairs; the king is, first, a constituent part of the supreme legislative power; hath a negative upon all new laws; and is bound by no statute, unless specially named therein.....261-262
8. He is also considered as the general of the kingdom, and may raise fleets and armies, build forts, appoint havens, erect beacons, prohibit the exportation of arms and ammunition, and confine his subjects within the realm, or recall them from foreign parts.....262-266
9. The king is also the fountain of justice, and general conservator of the peace; and, therefore, may erect courts (wherein he hath a legal ubiquity), prosecute offenders, pardon crimes, and issue proclamations .....266-271
10. He is likewise the fountain of honor, of office, and of privilege... 271-273
11. He is also the arbiter of domestic commerce (not of foreign, which is regulated by the law of merchants); and is, therefore, entitled to the erection of public marts, the regulation of weights and measures, and the coinage or legitimation of money.....273-279
12. The king is, lastly, the supreme head of the church, and, as such, convenes, regulates, and dissolves synods, nominates bishops, and receives appeals in all ecclesiastical causes.....279-280

CHAPTER VIII.

OF THE KING'S REVENUE.

1. The king's revenue is either ordinary or extraordinary. And the ordinary is, 1. Ecclesiastical. 2. Temporal.....281-282
2. The king's ecclesiastical revenue consists in, 1. The custody of the temporalities of vacant bishoprics. 2. Corodies and pensions. 3. Extra-parochial tithes. 4. The first fruits and tenths of benefices.....282-286
3. The king's ordinary temporal revenue consists in, 1. The demesne lands of the crown. 2. The hereditary excise, being part of the consideration for the purchase of his feudal profits, and the prerogatives of purveyance and pre-emption. 3. An annual sum issuing from the duty on wine licenses, being the residue of the same consideration. 4. His forests. 5. His courts of justice. 6. Royal fish. 7. Wrecks, and things jetsam, flotsam, and ligan. 8. Royal mines. 9. Treasury-trove. 10. Waifs. 11. Estrays. 12. Forfeitures for offenses, and deodands. 13. Escheats of lands. 14. The custody of idiots and lunatics.....286-307
4. The king's extraordinary revenue consists in aids, subsidies, and supplies, granted to him by the commons in parliament.....307-308
5. Heretofore these were usually raised by grants of the (nominal) tenth or fifteenth part of the movables in every township; or by

[References are to star paging.]

- scutages, hydages, and talliages; which were succeeded by subsidies assessed upon individuals, with respect to their lands and goods..... 309
6. A new system of taxation took place about the time of the revolution; our modern taxes are, therefore, 1. Annual. 2. Perpetual.... 309
7. The annual taxes are, 1. The land tax, or the ancient subsidy raised upon a new assessment. 2. The malt tax, being an annual excise on malt, rum, cider, and perry.....309-314
8. The perpetual taxes are, 1. The customs, or tonnage and poundage of all merchandise exported or imported. 2. The excise duty, or inland imposition, on a great variety of commodities. 3. The salt duty, or excise on salt. 4. The postoffice, or duty for the carriage of letters. 5. The stamp duty on paper, parchment, etc. 6. The duty on houses and windows. 7. The duty on licenses for hackney-coaches and chairs. 8. The duty on offices and pensions.....314-328
9. Part of this revenue is applied to pay the interest of the national debt, till the principal is discharged by parliament.....328-329
10. The produce of these several taxes were originally separate and specific funds, to answer specific loans upon their respective credits; but are now consolidated by parliament into three principal funds, the aggregate, general, and south-sea funds, to answer all the debts of the nation, the public faith being also superadded, to supply deficiencies, and strengthen the security of the whole.....329-331
11. The surpluses of these funds, after paying the interest of the national debt, are carried together, and denominated the sinking fund, which, unless otherwise appropriated by parliament, is annually to be applied towards paying off some part of the principal.....331-332
12. But, previous to this, the aggregate fund is now charged with an annual sum for the civil list, which is the immediate proper revenue of the crown, settled by parliament on the king at his accession, for defraying the charges of civil government.....332-335

CHAPTER IX.

OF SUBORDINATE MAGISTRATES.

1. Subordinate magistrates, of the most general use and authority, are, 1. Sheriffs. 2. Coroners. 3. Justices of the peace. 4. Constables. 5. Surveyors of the highways. 6. Overseers of the poor.....338-339
2. The sheriff is the keeper of each county, annually nominated in due form by the king, and is (within his county) a judge, a conservator of the peace, a ministerial officer, and the king's bailiff .....339-346
3. Coroners are permanent officers of the crown in each county, elected by the freeholders, whose office it is to make inquiry concerning the death of the king's subjects, and certain revenues of the

[References are to star paging.]

- crown; and also, in particular cases, to supply the office of sheriff
 .....346-349
4. Justices of the peace are magistrates in each county, statutablely qualified, and commissioned by the king's majesty; with authority to conserve the peace; to hear and determine felonies, and other misdemeanors; and to do many other acts committed to their charge by particular statutes.....349-355
  5. Constables are officers of hundreds and townships, appointed at the leet, and empowered to preserve the peace, to keep watch and ward, and to apprehend offenders.....355-357
  6. Surveyors of the highways are officers appointed annually in every parish, to remove annoyances in, and to direct the reparation of, the public roads.....357-359
  7. Overseers of the poor are officers appointed annually in every parish to relieve such impotent, and employ such sturdy poor, as are settled in each parish, by birth, by parentage, by marriage, or by forty days' residence, accompanied with, 1. Notice. 2. Renting a tenement of ten pounds annual value. 3. Paying their assessed taxations. 4. Serving an annual office. 5. Hiring and service for a year. 6. Apprenticeship for seven years. 7. Having a sufficient estate in the parish.....359-365

CHAPTER X.

OF THE PEOPLE, WHETHER ALIENS, DENIZENS, OR NATIVES.

1. The people are either aliens, that is, born out of the dominions or allegiance of the crown of Great Britain, or natives, that is, born within it ..... 366
2. Allegiance is the duty of all subjects, being the reciprocal tie of the people to the prince, in return for the protection he affords them; and, in natives, this duty of allegiance is natural and perpetual; in aliens, is local and temporary only .....366-371
3. The rights of natives are also natural and perpetual; those of aliens local and temporary only; unless they be made denizens by the king, or naturalized by parliament.....371-375

CHAPTER XI.

OF THE CLERGY.

1. The people, whether aliens, denizens, or natives, are also either clergy, that is, all persons in holy orders, or in ecclesiastical offices; or laity, which comprehends the rest of the nation..... 376
2. The clerical part of the nation, thus defined, are, 1. Archbishops and bishops, who are elected by their several chapters, at the nomination of the crown; and afterwards confirmed and consecrated by each other. 2. Deans and chapters. 3. Archdeacons. 4. Rural deans. 5. Parsons (under whom are included appropriators) and vicars, to whom there are generally requisite holy orders, presentation, institution, and induction. 6. Curates, to which may be added, 7. Churchwardens. 8. Parish clerks and sextons.....377-395

[References are to star paging.]

CHAPTER XII.

OF THE CIVIL STATE.

1. The laity are divisible into three states: civil, military, and maritime..... 396
2. The civil state (which includes all the nation, except the clergy, the army, and the navy, and many individuals among them also) may be divided into the nobility, and the commonalty..... 396
3. The nobility are dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts, and barons. These had anciently duties annexed to their respective honors; they are created either by writ, that is, by summons to parliament, or by the king's letters patent, that is, by royal grant; and they enjoy many privileges, exclusive of their senatorial capacity ..... 396-402
4. The commonalty consist of knights of the garter, knights bannerets, baronets, knights of the bath, knights bachelors, esquires, gentlemen, yeomen, tradesmen, artificers, and laborers.....403-407

CHAPTER XIII.

OF THE MILITARY AND MARITIME STATES.

1. The military state, by the standing constitutional law, consists of the militia of each county, raised from among the people by lot, officered by the principal landholders, and commanded by the lord lieutenant..... 408-413
2. The more disciplined occasional troops of the kingdom are kept on foot only from year to year, by parliament; and, during that period, are governed by martial law, or arbitrary articles of war, formed at the pleasure of the crown.....413-418
3. The maritime state consists of the officers and mariners of the British navy, who are governed by express and permanent laws, or the articles of the navy, established by act of parliament... 419-421

CHAPTER XIV.

OF MASTER AND SERVANT.

1. The private, economical relations of persons are those of, 1. Master and servant. 2. Husband and wife. 3. Parent and child. 4. Guardian and ward..... 422

[References are to star paging.]

2. The first relation may subsist between a master and four species of servants (for slavery is unknown to our laws): viz., 1. Menial servants, who are hired. 2. Apprentices, who are bound by indentures. 3. Laborers, who are casually employed. 4. Stewards, bailiffs, and factors, who are rather in a ministerial state... 423-427
3. From this relation result divers powers to the master and emoluments to the servant..... 427-428
4. The master hath a property in the service of his servant, and must be answerable for such acts as the servant does by his express or implied command ..... 429-432

CHAPTER XV.

OF HUSBAND AND WIFE.

1. The second private relation is that of marriage, which includes the reciprocal rights and duties of husband and wife..... 433
2. Marriage is duly contracted between persons, 1. Consenting. 2. Free from canonical impediments, which make it voidable. 3. Free also from the civil impediments, of prior marriage, of want of age, of nonconsent of parents or guardians, where requisite, and of want of reason, either of which make it totally void. And it must be celebrated by a clergyman, in due form and place... 433-440
3. Marriage is dissolved, 1. By death. 2. By divorce in the spiritual court, not a mensa et thoro only, but a vinculo matrimonii, for canonical cause existing previous to the contract. 3. By act of parliament, as, for adultery..... 440-442
4. By marriage the husband and wife become one person in law, which unity is the principal foundation of their respective rights, duties, and disabilities ..... 442-445

CHAPTER XVI.

OF PARENT AND CHILD.

1. The third and most universal private relation is that of parent and child..... 446
2. Children are, 1. Legitimate, being those who are born in lawful wedlock, or within a competent time after. 2. Bastards, being those who are not so..... 446
3. The duties of parents to legitimate children are, 1. Maintenance. 2. Protection. 3. Education..... 447-452
4. The power of parents consists principally in correction, and consent to marriage. Both may after death be delegated by will to a guardian; and the former also, living the parent, to a tutor or master..... 452-453
5. The duties of legitimate children to parents are obedience, protection, and maintenance ..... 453-454

[References are to star paging.]

- 6. The duty of parents to bastards is only that of maintenance.....457-458
- 7. The rights of a bastard are such only as he can acquire, for he is incapable of inheriting anything..... 459

CHAPTER XVII.

OF GUARDIAN AND WARD.

- 1. The fourth private relation is that of guardian and ward, which is plainly derived from the preceding, these being, during the continuance of their relation, reciprocally subject to the same rights and duties..... 460
- 2. Guardians are of divers sorts: 1. Guardians by nature, or the parents. 2. Guardians for nurture, assigned by the ordinary. 3. Guardians in socage, assigned by the common law. 4. Guardians by statute, assigned by the father's will, all subject to the superintendence of the court of chancery.....461-463
- 3. Full age in male or female for all purposes is the age of twenty-one years (different ages being allowed for different purposes); till which age the person is an infant.....463-464
- 4. An infant, in respect of his tender years, hath various privileges, and various disabilities in law, chiefly with regard to suits, crimes, estates, and contracts.....464-466

CHAPTER XVIII.

OF CORPORATIONS.

- 1. Bodies politic, or corporations, which are artificial persons, are established for preserving in perpetual succession certain rights, which, being conferred on natural persons only, would fail in process of time..... 467
- 2. Corporations are, 1. Aggregate, consisting of many members. 2. Sole, consisting of one person only..... 469
- 3. Corporations are also either spiritual, erected to perpetuate the rights of the church, or lay. And the lay are, 1. Civil, erected for many temporal purposes. 2. Eleemosynary, erected to perpetuate the charity of the founder.....470-471
- 4. Corporations are usually erected, and named, by virtue of the king's royal charter, but may be created by act of parliament..... 472-475
- 5. The powers incident to all corporations are, 1. To maintain perpetual succession. 2. To act in their corporate capacity like an individual. 3. To hold lands, subject to the statutes of mortmain. 4. To have a common seal. 5. To make by-laws, which last power, in spiritual or eleemosynary corporations, may be executed by the king or the founder.....475-479
- 6. The duty of corporations is to answer the ends of their institution.... 479

[References are to star paging.]

7. To enforce this duty, all corporations may be visited: spiritual corporations by the ordinary; lay corporations by the founder, or his representatives; viz., the civil by the king (who is the fundator incipiens of all) represented in his court of king's bench; the eleemosynary by the endower (who is the fundator perficiens of such) or by his heirs or assigns.....480-484
8. Corporations may be dissolved, 1. By act of parliament. 2. By the natural death of all their members. 3. By surrender of their franchises. 4. By forfeiture of their charter.....484-485

TABULAR VIEW OF BOOK II.

THE RIGHTS OF THINGS.

	Chapter
Which consist in dominion over.....	1
1. Things real, in which are considered,
1. Their several kinds, viz.,
{ 1. Corporeal.....	2
{ 2. Incorporeal.....	3
2. The tenures by which they may be holden, viz.....	4
{ 1. Ancient.....	5
{ 2. Modern.....	6
3. Estates therein, with respect to,
1. Quantity of interest, viz.,
1. Freehold
{ 1. Of inheritance.....	7
{ 2. Not of inheritance.....	8
2. Less than freehold.....	9
3. On condition.....	10
2. Time of enjoyment, in
{ 1. Possession
{ 2. Remainder
{ 3. Reversion.....	11
3. Number and connections of the tenants who may hold in
1. Severalty
2. Joint tenancy
3. Coparcenary
4. Common.....	12
4. Title to them, which may be gained or lost by.....	13
{ 1. Descent.....	14
{ 2. Purchase, which includes
1. Escheat.....	15
2. Occupancy.....	16
3. Prescription.....	17
4. Forfeiture.....	18
5. Alienation, by common assurances, which are.....	19
{ 1. Deed, or matter in pais , wherein of its { 1. General nature
{ 2. Several species.....	20
{ 2. Matter of record.....	21
{ 3. Special custom.....	22
{ 4. Devise.....	23
2. Things personal, or chattels, in which are considered
{ 1. Their distribution.....	24
{ 2. Property therein.....	25
{ 3. Title to them, which may be gained or lost by
1. Occupancy.....	26
2. Prerogative
3. Forfeiture.....	27
4. Custom.....	28
5. Succession
6. Marriage
7. Judgment.....	29
8. Grant
9. Contract.....	30
10. Bankruptcy.....	31
11. Testament
12. Administration.....	32

(ci)

BOOK II.

OF THE RIGHTS OF THINGS.

CHAPTER I.

OF PROPERTY, IN GENERAL.

[References are to star paging.]

1. All dominion over external objects has its original from the gift of the Creator to man in general..... 2
2. The substance of things was, at first, common to all mankind; yet a temporary property in the use of them might even then be acquired and continued by occupancy..... 3
3. In process of time a permanent property was established in the substance, as well as the use of things, which was also originally acquired by occupancy only..... 4-5
4. Lest this property should determine by the owner's dereliction or death, whereby the thing would again become common, societies have established conveyances, wills, and heirships, in order to continue the property of the first occupant; and where by accident such property becomes discontinued or unknown, the thing usually results to the sovereign of the state, by virtue of the municipal law..... 9-11
5. But of some things, which are incapable of permanent substantial dominion, there still subsists only the same transient usufructuary property, which originally subsisted in all things..... 14

CHAPTER II.

OF REAL PROPERTY, AND FIRST, OF CORPOREAL HEREDITAMENTS.

1. In this property, or exclusive dominion, consist the rights of things, which are, 1. Things real. 2. Things personal..... 16
2. In things real may be considered, 1. Their several kinds. 2. The tenures by which they may be holden. 3. The estates, which may be acquired therein. 4. Their title, or the means of acquiring and losing them..... 16
3. All the several kinds of things real are reducible to one of these three, viz., lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereof the second includes the first, and the third includes the first and second..... 16
4. Hereditaments therefore, or whatever may come to be inherited (being the most comprehensive denomination of things real), are either corporeal or incorporeal..... 17
5. Corporeal hereditaments consist wholly of lands, in their largest legal sense, wherein they include not only the face of the earth, but every other object of sense adjoining thereto, and subsisting either above or beneath it..... 17-18

(ciii)

CHAPTER III.

OF INCORPOREAL HEREDITAMENTS.

[References are to star paging.]

1. Incorporeal hereditaments are rights issuing out of things corporeal, or concerning, or annexed to, or exercisable within the same. . . . . 20
2. Incorporeal hereditaments are, 1. Advowsons. 2. Tithes. 3. Commons. 4. Ways. 5. Offices. 6. Dignities. 7. Franchises. 8. Corodies or pensions. 9. Annuities. 10. Rents. . . . . 21-41
3. An advowson is a right of presentation to an ecclesiastical benefice, either appendant or in gross. This may be, 1. Presentative. 2. Collative. 3. Donative . . . . . 21-23
4. Tithes are the tenth part of the increase yearly arising from the profits and stock of lands, and the personal industry of mankind. These, by the ancient and positive law of the land, are due of common right to the parson, or (by endowment) to the vicar, unless specially discharged, 1. By real composition. 2. By prescription, either de modo decimandi, or de non decimando. . . . . 24-31
5. Common is a profit which a man hath in the lands of another, being, 1. Common of pasture, which is either appendant, appurtenant, because of vicinage, or in gross. 2. Common of piscary. 3. Common of turbary. 4. Common of estovers, or botes. . . . . 32-35
6. Ways are a right of passing over another man's ground. . . . . 35
7. Offices are the right to exercise a public or private employment. . . . . 36
8. For dignities, which are titles of honor, see Book I, c: 12.
9. Franchises are a royal privilege, or branch of the king's prerogative, subsisting in the hands of a subject. . . . . 37
10. Corodies are allotments for one's sustenance, which may be converted into pensions. (See Book I, c. 8.) . . . . . 40
11. An annuity is a yearly sum of money, charged upon the person, and not upon the lands, of the grantor. . . . . 40
12. Rents are a certain profit issuing yearly out of lands and tenements, and are reducible to, 1. Rent-service. 2. Rent-charge. 3. Rent-seck . . . . . 41-42

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE FEUDAL SYSTEM.

1. The doctrine of tenures is derived from the feudal law, which was planted in Europe by its northern conquerors, at the dissolution of the Roman empire. . . . . 44-45
2. Pure and proper feuds were parcels of land, allotted by a chief to his followers, to be held on the condition of personally rendering due military service to their lord. . . . . 45
3. These were granted by investiture; were held under the bond of fealty; were inheritable only by descendants; and could not be transferred without the mutual consent of the lord and vassal. . . . . 53-57

[References are to star paging.]

4. Improper feuds were derived from the other, but differed from them in their original, their services and renders, their descent, and other circumstances..... 58
5. The lands of England were converted into feuds, of the improper kind, soon after the Norman Conquest, which gave rise to the grand maxim of tenure, viz., that all lands in the kingdom are holden, mediately or immediately, of the king.....48-53

CHAPTER V.

OF THE ANCIENT ENGLISH TENURES.

1. The distinction of tenures consisted in the nature of their services, as,
1. Chivalry, or knight service, where the service was free, but uncertain. 2. Free socage, where the service was free, and certain. 3. Pure villeinage, where the service was base, and uncertain. 4. Privileged villeinage, or villein socage, where the service was base, but certain.....61-78
2. The most universal ancient tenure was that in chivalry, or by knight service, in which the tenant of every knight's fee was bound, if called upon, to attend his lord to the wars. This was granted by livery, and perfected by homage and fealty, which usually drew after them suit of court..... 62
3. The other fruits and consequences of the tenure by knight service were,
1. Aid. 2. Relief. 3. Primer seisin. 4. Wardship. 5. Marriage.
6. Fines upon alienation. 7. Escheat.....63-72
4. Grand serjeanty differed from chivalry principally in its render or service, and not in its fruits and consequences..... 73
5. The personal service in chivalry was at length gradually changed into pecuniary assessments, which were called scutage or escuage..... 74
6. These military tenures (except the services of grand serjeanty) were, at the restoration of King Charles, totally abolished, and reduced to free socage, by act of parliament..... 77

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE MODERN ENGLISH TENURES.

1. Free socage is a tenure by any free, certain, and determinate service.. 78
2. This tenure, the relic of Saxon liberty, includes petit serjeanty, tenure in burgage, and gavelkind..... 81
3. Free socage lands partake strongly of the feudal nature, as well as those in chivalry, being holden, subject to some service, at the least, to fealty and suit of court; subject to relief, to wardship, and to escheat, but not to marriage; subject also formerly to aids, primer seisin, and fines for alienation..... 86-89
4. Pure villeinage was a precarious and slavish tenure, at the absolute will of the lord, upon uncertain services of the basest nature..... 93

[References are to star paging.]

5. From hence, by tacit consent or encroachment, have arisen the modern copyholds, or tenure by copy of court roll, in which lands may be still held at the (nominal) will of the lord (but regulated) according to the custom of the manor. . . . . 95
6. These are subject, like socage lands, to services, relief, and escheat, and also to heriots, wardship, and fines upon descent and alienation. . . . . 97
7. Privileged villeinage, or villein socage, is an exalted species of copyhold tenure, upon base, but certain, services, subsisting only in the ancient demesnes of the crown, whence the tenure is denominated the tenure in ancient demesne. . . . . 99
8. These copyholds of ancient demesne have divers immunities annexed to their tenure, but are still held by copy of court roll, according to the custom of the manor, though not at the will of the lord. . . . . 100
9. Frankalmoigne is a tenure by spiritual services at large, whereby many ecclesiastical and eleemosynary corporations now hold their lands and tenements, being of a nature distinct from tenure by divine service in certain . . . . . 101

CHAPTER VII.

OF FREEHOLD ESTATES OF INHERITANCE.

1. Estates in lands, tenements, and hereditaments are such interest as the tenant hath therein, to ascertain which, may be considered, 1. The quantity of interest. 2. The time of enjoyment. 3. The number and connections of the tenants. . . . . 103-179
2. Estates, with respect to their quantity of interest, or duration, are either freehold, or less than freehold. . . . . 104
3. A freehold estate in lands, is such as is created by livery of seisin at common law, or, in tenements of an incorporeal nature, by what is equivalent thereto . . . . . 104
4. Freehold estates are either estates of inheritance, or not of inheritance, viz., for life only; and inheritances are, 1. Absolute, or fee simple. 2. Limited fees . . . . . 104
5. Tenant in fee simple is he that hath lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to hold to him and his heirs forever. . . . . 104
6. Limited fees are, 1. Qualified, or base, fees. 2. Fees conditional at the common law. . . . . 109
7. Qualified, or base, fees are those which, having a qualification subjoined thereto, are liable to be defeated when that qualification is at an end. 109
8. Conditional fees, at the common law, were such as were granted to the donee, and the heirs of his body, in exclusion of collateral heirs. . . . 110
9. These were held to be fees, granted on condition that the donee had issue of his body, which condition being once performed by the birth of issue, the donee might immediately alien the land; but, the statute de donis being made to prevent such alienation, thereupon from the division of the fee (by construction of this statute) into a particular estate and a reversion, the conditional fees began to be called fees-tail .....	111-112

[References are to star paging.]

10. All tenements real, or savoring of the realty, are subject to entails....	113
11. Estates-tail may be, 1. General, or special. 2. Male, or female. 3. Given in frank-marriage.....	113-115
12. Incident to estates-tail are, 1. Waste. 2. Dower. 3. Curtesy. 4. Bar, by fine, recovery, or lineal warranty with assets.....	115
13. Estates-tail are now, by many statutes and resolutions of the courts, almost brought back to the state of conditional fees at the common law .....	117

CHAPTER VIII.

OF FREEHOLDS, NOT OF INHERITANCE.

1. Freeholds, not of inheritance, or for life only, are, 1. Conventional, or created by the act of the parties. 2. Legal, or created by operation of law.....	120
2. Conventional estates for life are created by an express grant for term of one's own life, or pur autre vie ; or by a general grant, without expressing any term at all.....	120
3. Incident to this, and all other estates for life, are estovers, and emblements; and to estates pur autre vie general occupancy was also incident, as special occupancy still is, if cestuy que vie survives the tenant	122
4. Legal estates for life are, 1. Tenancy in tail, after possibility of issue extinct. 2. Tenancy by the curtesy of England. 3. Tenancy in dower .....	124-128
5. Tenancy in tail, after possibility of issue extinct, is where an estate is given in special tail, and, before issue had, a person dies from whose body the issue was to spring; whereupon the tenant (if surviving) becomes tenant in tail, after possibility of issue extinct.....	124
6. This estate partakes both of the incidents to an estate-tail, and those of an estate for life.....	125
7. Tenancy by the curtesy of England is where a man's wife is seised of an estate of inheritance, and he by her has issue, born alive, which was capable of inheriting her estate, in which case he shall, upon her death, hold the tenements for his own life, as tenant by the curtesy..	126
8. Tenancy in dower is where a woman's husband is seised of an estate of inheritance, of which her issue might by any possibility have been heir, and the husband dies; the woman is hereupon entitled to dower, or one third part of the lands and tenements, to hold for her natural life .....	128
9. Dower is either by the common law; by special custom; ad ostium ecclesiæ ; or, ex assensu patris .....	132-133
10. Dower may be forfeited, or barred, particularly by an estate in jointure	136

CHAPTER IX.

OF ESTATES, LESS THAN FREEHOLD.

[References are to star paging.]

1. Estates less than freehold are, 1. Estates for years. 2. Estates at will. 3. Estates at sufferance.....140-150
2. An estate for years is where a man, seised of lands and tenements, letteth them to another for a certain period of time, which transfers the interest of the term, and the lessee enters thereon, which gives him possession of the term, but not legal seisin of the land..... 140
3. Incident to this estate are estovers, and also emblements, if it determines before the full end of the term.....144-145
4. An estate at will is where lands are let by one man to another to hold at the will of both parties, and the lessee enters thereon..... 145
5. Copyholds are estates held at the will of the lord (regulated) according to the custom of the manor..... 147
6. An estate at sufferance is where one comes into possession of land by lawful title, but keeps it afterwards without any title at all..... 150

CHAPTER X.

OF ESTATES UPON CONDITION.

1. Estates (whether freehold or otherwise) may also be held upon condition, in which case their existence depends on the happening, or not happening, of some uncertain event..... 152
2. These estates are, 1. On condition implied. 2. On condition expressed. 3. Estates in gage. 4. Estates by statute, merchant or staple. 5. Estates by elegit..... 152
3. Estates on condition implied are where a grant of an estate has, from its essence and constitution, a condition inseparably annexed to it, though none be expressed in words..... 152
4. Estates on condition expressed are where an express qualification or provision is annexed to the grant of an estate..... 154
5. On the performance of these conditions either expressed or implied (if precedent) the estate may be vested or enlarged; or, on the breach of them (if subsequent) an estate already vested may be defeated .....154-155
6. Estates in gage, in vadio, or in pledge, are estates granted as a security for money lent, being, 1. In vivo vadio, or living gage, where the profits of land are granted till a debt be paid, upon which payment the grantor's estate will revive. 2. In mortuo vadio, in dead, or mort gage, where an estate is granted, on condition to be void at a day certain, if the grantor then repays the money borrowed, on failure of which, the estate becomes absolutely dead to the grantor.... 157
7. Estates by statute merchant, or statute staple, are also estates conveyed to creditors, in pursuance of certain statutes, till their profits shall discharge the debt..... 160

[References are to star paging.]

8. Estates by elegit are where, in consequence of a judicial writ so called, lands are delivered by the sheriff to a plaintiff, till their profits shall satisfy a debt adjudged to be due by law..... 161

CHAPTER XI.

OF ESTATES IN POSSESSION, REMAINDER, AND REVERSION.

1. Estates, with respect to their time of enjoyment, are either in immediate possession or in expectancy, which estates in expectancy are created at the same time, and are parcel of the same estates as those upon which they are expectant. These are, 1. Remainders. 2. Reversions ..... 163
2. A remainder is an estate limited to take effect, and be enjoyed, after another particular estate is determined..... 164
3. Therefore, 1. There must be a precedent particular estate, in order to support a remainder. 2. The remainder must pass out of the grantor at the creation of the particular estate. 3. The remainder must vest in the grantee during the continuance, or at the determination, of the particular estate .....165-168
4. Remainders are, 1. Vested, where the estate is fixed to remain to a certain person after the particular estate is spent. 2. Contingent, where the estate is limited to take effect, either to an uncertain person or upon an uncertain event.....168-169
5. An executory devise is such a disposition of lands, by will, that an estate shall not vest thereby at the death of the devisor, but only upon some future contingency, and without any precedent particular estate to support it..... 172
6. A reversion is the residue of an estate left in the grantor, to commence in possession after the determination of some particular estate granted, to which are incident fealty, and rent..... 176
7. Where two estates, the one less, the other greater, the one in possession, the other in expectancy, meet together in one and the same person, and in one and the same right, the less is merged in the greater.... 177

CHAPTER XII.

OF ESTATES IN SEVERALTY, JOINT TENANCY, COPARCENARY, AND COMMON.

1. Estate, with respect to the number and connections of their tenants, may be held, 1. In severalty. 2. In joint tenancy. 3. In coparcenary. 4. In common..... 179
2. An estate in severalty is where one tenant holds it in his own sole right, without any other person being joined with him..... 179
3. An estate in joint tenancy is where an estate is granted to two or more persons; in which case the law construes them to be joint tenants, unless the words of the grant expressly exclude such construction ..... 180

[References are to star paging.]

4. Joint tenants have a unity of interest, of title, of time, and of possession; they are seised per my et per tout , and therefore upon the decease of one joint-tenant, the whole interest remains to the survivor	182
5. Joint tenancy may be dissolved by destroying one of its four constituent unities	185
6. An estate in coparcenary is where an estate of inheritance descends from the ancestor to two or more persons, who are called parceners, and all together make but one heir	187
7. Parceners have a unity of interest, title, and possession, but are only seised per my , and not per tout , wherefore there is no survivorship among parceners	188
8. Incident to this estate is the law of hotchpot	190
9. Coparcenary may also be dissolved, by destroying any of its three constituent unities	191
10. An estate in common is where two or more persons hold lands, possibly by distinct titles, and for distinct interests, but by unity of possession, because none knoweth his own severalty	191
11. Tenants in common have therefore a unity of possession (without survivorship, being seised per my , and not per tout ); but no necessary unity of title, time or interest	191
12. This estate may be created, 1. By dissolving the constituent unities of the two former. 2. By express limitation in a grant, and may be destroyed, 1. By uniting the several titles in one tenant. 2. By partition of the land	195

CHAPTER XIII.

OF THE TITLE TO THINGS REAL, IN GENERAL.

1. A title to things real is the means whereby a man cometh to the just possession of his property	195
2. Herein may be considered, 1. A mere or naked possession. 2. The right of possession, which is, 1st, an apparent, 2d, an actual, right. 3. The mere right of property. 4. The conjunction of actual possession with both these rights, which constitutes a perfect title	195-199

CHAPTER XIV.

OF TITLE BY DESCENT.

1. The title to things real may be reciprocally acquired or lost, 1. By descent. 2. By purchase	200
2. Descent is the means whereby a man, on the death of his ancestor, acquires a title to his estate, in right of representation, as his heir at law	201
3. To understand the doctrine of descents, we must form a clear notion of consanguinity, which is the connection or relation of persons descended from the same stock or common ancestor, and it is, 1. Lineal,

[References are to star paging.]

- where one of the kinsmen is lineally descended from the other. 2. Collateral, where they are lineally descended, not one from the other, but both from the same common ancestor.....203-204
4. The rules of descent, or canons of inheritance, observed by the laws of England, are these:
- I. Inheritances shall lineally descend to the issue of the person last actually seised, in infinitum, but shall never lineally ascend ..... 208
  - II. The male issue shall be admitted before the female..... 212
  - III. Where there are two or more males in equal degree, the eldest only shall inherit, but the females all together..... 214
  - IV. The lineal descendants, in infinitum, of any person deceased shall represent their ancestor, that is, shall stand in the same place as the person himself would have done, had he been living ..... 216
  - V. On failure of lineal descendants, or issue, of the person last seised, the inheritance shall descend to the blood of the first purchaser; subject to the three preceding rules, to evidence which blood, the two following rules are established..... 220
  - VI. The collateral heir of the person last seised must be his next collateral kinsman, of the whole blood..... 224
  - VII. In collateral inheritances, the male stocks shall be preferred to the female, that is, kindred derived from the blood of the male ancestors shall be admitted before those from the blood of the female, unless where the lands have, in fact, descended from a female..... 224

CHAPTER XV.

OF TITLE BY PURCHASE, AND FIRST, BY ESCHEAT.

- 1. Purchase, or perquisition, is the possession of an estate which a man hath by his own act or agreement, and not by the mere act of law, or descent from any of his ancestors. This includes, 1. Escheat. 2. Occupancy. 3. Prescription. 4. Forfeiture. 5. Alienation...241-244
- 2. Escheat is where, upon deficiency of the tenant's inheritable blood, the estate falls to the lord of the fee..... 244
- 3. Inheritable blood is wanting to, 1. Such as are not related to the person last seised. 2. His maternal relations in paternal inheritances, and vice versa. 3. His kindred of the half blood. 4. Monsters. 5. Bastards. 6. Aliens, and their issue. 7. Persons attainted of treason or felony. 8. Papists, in respect of themselves only, by the statute law .....246-257

CHAPTER XVI.

OF TITLE BY OCCUPANCY.

[References are to star paging.]

- 1. Occupancy is the taking possession of those things, which before had no owner ..... 253
- 2. Thus, at the common law, where tenant pur auter vie died during the life of cestuy que vie, he who could first enter might lawfully retain the possession, unless by the original grant the heir was made a special occupant ..... 259
- 3. The law of derelictions and alluvions has narrowed the title by occupancy ..... 261

CHAPTER XVII.

OF TITLE BY PRESCRIPTION.

- 1. Prescription (as distinguished from custom) is a personal immemorial usage of enjoying a right in some incorporeal hereditament by a man, and either his ancestors or those whose estate of inheritance he hath, of which the first is called prescribing in his ancestors, the latter in a que estate. ..... 263

CHAPTER XVIII.

OF TITLE BY FORFEITURE.

- 1. Forfeiture is a punishment annexed by law to some illegal act, or negligence, in the owner of things real, whereby the estate is transferred to another, who is usually the party injured. .... 267
- 2. Forfeitures are occasioned, 1. By crimes. 2. By alienation, contrary to law. 3. By lapse. 4. By simony. 5. By nonperformance of conditions. 6. By waste. 7. By breach of copyhold customs. 8. By bankruptcy ..... 267
- 3. Forfeitures for crimes, or misdemeanors, are for, 1. Treason. 2. Felony. 3. Misprision of treason. 4. Præmunire. 5. Assaults on a judge, and batteries, sitting the courts. 6. Popish recusancy, etc. .... 267
- 4. Alienations, or conveyances, which induce a forfeiture, are, 1. Those in mortmain, made to corporations contrary to the statute law. 2. Those made to aliens. 3. Those made by particular tenants, when larger than their estates will warrant. .... 269-274
- 5. Lapse is a forfeiture of the right of presentation to a vacant church, by neglect of the patron to present within six calendar months. .... 276
- 6. Simony is the corrupt presentation of anyone to an ecclesiastical benefice, whereby that turn becomes forfeited to the crown. .... 278
- 7. For forfeiture by nonperformance of conditions, see c. 10.
- 8. Waste is a spoil, or destruction, in any corporeal hereditaments, to the prejudice of him that hath the inheritance. .... 281
- 9. Copyhold estates may have also other peculiar causes of forfeiture, according to the custom of the manor. .... 284

[References are to star paging.]

10. Bankruptcy is the act of becoming a bankrupt, that is, a trader who secretes himself, or does certain other acts, tending to defraud his creditors. (See c. 22)..... 285
11. By bankruptcy all the estates of the bankrupt are transferred to the assignees of his commissioners, to be sold for the benefit of his creditors ..... 286

CHAPTER XIX.

OF TITLE BY ALIENATION.

1. Alienation, conveyance, or purchase in its more limited sense, is a means of transferring real estates, wherein they are voluntarily resigned by one man, and accepted by another..... 287
2. This formerly could not be done by a tenant, without license from his lord, nor by a lord, without attornment of his tenant..... 287
3. All persons are capable of purchasing, and all that are in possession of any estates are capable of conveying them, unless under peculiar disabilities by law, as being attainted, non compotes, infants, under duress, feme covert, aliens, or papists..... 288-293
4. Alienations are made by common assurances, which are, 1. By deed, or matter in pais. 2. By matter of record. 3. By special custom. 4. By devise ..... 293-294

CHAPTER XX.

OF ALIENATION BY DEED.

1. In assurances by deed may be considered, 1. Its general nature. 2. Its several species ..... 295
2. A deed, in general, is the solemn act of the parties, being, usually, a writing sealed and delivered, and it may be, 1. A deed indented, or indenture. 2. A deed poll..... 295-296
3. The requisites of a deed are, 1. Sufficient parties, and proper subject matter. 2. A good and sufficient consideration. 3. Writing on paper, or parchment, duly stamped. 4. Legal and orderly parts which are usually, 1st, the premises; 2d, the habendum; 3d, the tenendum; 4th, the reddendum; 5th, the conditions; 6th, the warranty (which is either lineal or collateral); 7th, the covenants; 8th, the conclusion (which includes the date). 5. Reading it, if desired. 6. Sealing, and, in many cases, signing it also. 7. Delivery. 8. Attestation ..... 296-307
4. A deed may be avoided, 1. By the want of any of the requisites before mentioned. 2. By subsequent matter, as, 1st, rasure, or alteration; 2d, defacing its seal; 3d, canceling it; 4th, disagreement of those whose consent is necessary; 5th, judgment of a court of justice..... 308
5. Of the several species of deeds, some serve to convey real property, some only to charge and discharge it..... 309

[References are to star paging.]

6. Deeds which serve to convey real property, or conveyances, are either by common law or by statute. And, of conveyances by common law, some are original or primary, others derivative or secondary. . . . . 309
7. Original conveyances, are, 1. Feoffments. 2. Gifts. 3. Grants. 4. Leases. 5. Exchanges. 6. Partitions. Derivative are, 7. Releases. 8. Confirmations. 9. Surrenders. 10. Assignments. 11. Defeasances 310
8. A feoffment is the transfer of any corporeal hereditament to another, perfected by livery of seisin, or delivery of bodily possession from the feoffor to the feoffee; without which no freehold estate therein can be created at common law. . . . . 310
9. A gift is properly the conveyance of lands in tail. . . . . 316
10. A grant is the regular method, by common law, of conveying incorporeal hereditaments . . . . . 317
11. A lease is the demise, granting, or letting to farm of any tenement, usually for a less term than the lessor hath therein; yet sometimes possibly for a greater, according to the regulations of the restraining and enabling statutes . . . . . 317
12. An exchange is the mutual conveyance of equal interests, the one in consideration of the other. . . . . 323
13. A partition is the division of an estate held in joint tenancy, in coparcenary, or in common, between the respective tenants, so that each may hold his distinct part in severalty. . . . . 323
14. A release is the discharge or conveyance of a man's right, in lands and tenements, to another that hath some former estate in possession therein . . . . . 324
15. A confirmation is the conveyance of an estate or right in esse, whereby a voidable estate is made sure, or a particular estate is increased . . . 325
16. A surrender is the yielding up of an estate for life, or years, to him that hath the immediate remainder or reversion, wherein the particular estate may merge. . . . . 326
17. An assignment is the transfer, or making over to another, of the whole right one has in any estate, but usually in a lease for life or years. . 326
18. A defeasance is a collateral deed, made at the same time with the original conveyance, containing some condition upon which the estate may be defeated. . . . . 327
19. Conveyances by statute depend much on the doctrine of uses and trusts, which are a confidence reposed in the terre tenant, or tenant of the land, that he shall permit the profits to be enjoyed, according to the directions of cestuy que use, or cestuy que trust. . . . . 327
20. The statute of uses, having transferred all uses into actual possession (or, rather, having drawn the possession to the use), has given birth to divers other species of conveyance: 1. A covenant to stand seised to use. 2. A bargain and sale, enrolled. 3. A lease and release. 4. A deed to lead or declare the use of other more direct conveyances. 5. A revocation of uses, being the execution of a power, reserved at the creation of the use, of recalling at a future time the use or

[References are to star paging.]

- estate so creating. All which owe their present operation principally to the statute of uses.....337-339
21. Deeds which do not convey, but only charge real property, and discharge it, are, 1. Obligations. 2. Recognizances. 3. Defeasances upon both .....340-342

CHAPTER XXI.

OF ALIENATION BY MATTER OF RECORD.

1. Assurances by matter of record are where the sanction of some court of record is called in to substantiate and witness the transfer of real property. These are, 1. Private acts of parliament. 2. The king's grants. 3. Fines. 4. Common recoveries ..... 344
2. Private acts of parliament are a species of assurances, calculated to give (by the transcendent authority of parliament) such reasonable powers or relief, as are beyond the reach of the ordinary course of law ..... 344
3. The king's grants, contained in charters or letters patent, are all entered on record, for the dignity of the royal person, and security of the royal revenue ..... 346
4. A fine (sometimes said to be a feoffment of record) is an amicable composition and agreement of an actual or fictitious suit, whereby the estate in question is acknowledged to be the right of one of the parties ..... 348
5. The parts of a fine are, 1. The writ of covenant. 2. The license to agree. 3. The concord. 4. The note. 5. The foot. To which the statute hath added, 6. Proclamations.....350-352
6. Fines are of four kinds: 1. Sur cognizance de droit, come ceo que il ad de son done. 2. Sur cognizance de droit tantum. 3. Sur concessit. 4. Sur done, grant, et render; which is a double fine..... 353
7. The force and effect of fines (when levied by such as have themselves any interest in the estate) are to assure the lands in question to the cognizee, by barring the respective rights of parties, privies, and strangers ..... 354
8. A common recovery is by an actual or fictitious suit or action for land, brought against the tenant of the freehold, who thereupon vouches another, who undertakes to warrant the tenant's title, but, upon such vouchee's making default, the land is recovered by judgment at law against the tenant, who, in return, obtains judgment against the vouchee to recover lands of equal value in recompense.....357-359
9. The force and effect of a recovery are to assure lands to the recoverer, by barring estates-tail, and all remainders and reversions expectant thereon, provided the tenant in tail either suffers, or is vouched in, such recovery ..... 361
10. The uses of a fine or recovery may be directed by, 1. Deeds to lead such uses, which are made previous to the levying or suffering them. 2. Deeds to declare the uses, which are made subsequent..... 363

CHAPTER XXII.

OF ALIENATION BY SPECIAL CUSTOM.

[References are to star paging.]

1. Assurances by special custom are confined to the transfer of copyhold estates ..... 365
2. This is effected by, 1. Surrender by the tenant into the hands of the lord to the use of another, according to the custom of the manor. 2. Presentment, by the tenants or homage, of such surrender. 3. Admittance of the surrenderee by the lord, according to the uses expressed in such surrender ..... 368-370
3. Admittance may also be had upon original grants to the tenant from the lord, and upon descents to the heir from the ancestor..... 371

CHAPTER XXIII.

OF ALIENATION BY DEVISE.

1. Devise is a disposition of lands and tenements, contained in the last will and testament of the owner..... 373
2. This was not permitted by the common law, as it stood since the Conquest, but was introduced by the statute law, under Henry VIII, since made more universal by the statute of tenures under Charles II, with the introduction of additional solemnities by the statute of frauds and perjuries in the same reign..... 375-376
3. The construction of all common assurances should be, 1. Agreeable to the intention. 2. To the words, of the parties. 3. Made upon the entire deed. 4. Bearing strongest against the contractor. 5. Conformable to law. 6. Rejecting the latter of two totally repugnant clauses in a deed, and the former in a will. 7. Most favorable in case of a devise..... 379-381

CHAPTER XXIV.

OF THINGS PERSONAL.

1. Things personal are comprehended under the general name of chattels, which include whatever wants either the duration or the immobility attending things real..... 384
2. In these are to be considered, 1. Their distribution. 2. The property of them. 3. The title to that property..... 384-387
3. As to the distribution of chattels, they are, 1. Chattels real. 2. Chattels personal..... 386
4. Chattels real are such quantities of interest in things immovable as are short of the duration of freeholds, being limited to a time certain, beyond which they cannot subsist. (See c. 9.)..... 386
5. Chattels personal are things movable, which may be transferred from place to place, together with the person of the owner..... 387

CHAPTER XXV.

OF PROPERTY IN THINGS PERSONAL.

[References are to star paging.]

1. Property in chattels personal is either in possession, or in action..... 389
2. Property in possession, where a man has the actual enjoyment of the thing, is, 1. Absolute. 2. Qualified..... 389
3. Absolute property is where a man has such an exclusive right in the thing that it cannot cease to be his without his own act or default... 389
4. Qualified property is such as is not, in its nature, permanent, but may sometimes subsist, and at other times not subsist..... 391
5. This may arise, 1. Where the subject is incapable of absolute ownership. 2. From the peculiar circumstances of the owners.....391-396
6. Property in action is where a man hath not the actual occupation of the thing, but only a right to it, arising upon some contract, and recoverable by an action at law..... 396
7. The property of chattels personal is liable to remainders, expectant on estates for life, to joint tenancy, and to tenancy in common.... 398

CHAPTER XXVI.

OF TITLE TO THINGS PERSONAL BY OCCUPANCY.

1. The title to things personal may be acquired or lost by, 1. Occupancy. 2. Prerogative. 3. Forfeiture. 4. Custom. 5. Succession. 6. Marriage. 7. Judgment. 8. Gift, or grant. 9. Contract. 10. Bankruptcy. 11. Testament. 12. Administration..... 400
2. Occupancy still gives the first occupant a right to those few things, which have no legal owner, or which are incapable of permanent ownership. Such as, 1. Goods of alien enemies. 2. Things found. 3. The benefit of the elements. 4. Animals feræ naturæ. 5. Emblements. 6. Things gained by accession; or, 7. By confusion. 8. Literary property.....400-407

CHAPTER XXVII.

OF TITLE BY PREROGATIVE, AND FORFEITURE.

1. By prerogative is vested in the crown, or its grantees, the property of the royal revenue (see Book I, c. 8); and also the property of all game in the kingdom, with the right of pursuing and taking it....408-419
2. By forfeiture, for crimes and misdemeanors, the right of goods and chattels may be transferred from one man to another, either in part or totally ..... 420
3. Total forfeitures of goods arise from conviction of, 1. Treason, and misprision thereof. 2. Felony. 3. Excusable homicide. 4. Outlawry for treason or felony. 5. Flight. 6. Standing mute. 7. Assaults on a judge, and batteries, sitting the courts. 8. Præmunire. 9. Pretended prophecies. 10. Owling. 11. Residing abroad of artificers. 12. Challenges to fight for debts at play..... 421

CHAPTER XXVIII.

OF TITLE BY CUSTOM.

[References are to star paging.]

1. By custom, obtaining in particular places, a right may be acquired in chattels; the most usual of which customs are those relating to,
  1. Heriots. 2. Mortuaries. 3. Heirlooms ..... 422
2. Heriots are either heriot service, which differs little from a rent; or heriot custom, which is a customary tribute of goods and chattels, payable to the lord of the fee on the decease of the owner of lands.. 422
3. Mortuaries are a customary gift, due to the minister in many parishes, on the death of his parishioners..... 425
4. Heirlooms are such personal chattels as descend by special custom to the heir, along with the inheritance of his ancestor..... 427

CHAPTER XXIX.

OF TITLE BY SUCCESSION, MARRIAGE, AND JUDGMENT.

1. By succession the right of chattels is vested in corporations aggregate; and likewise in such corporations sole as are the heads and representatives of bodies aggregate..... 430
2. By marriage the chattels real and personal of the wife are vested in the husband, in the same degree of property, and with the same powers, as the wife when sole had over them, provided he reduces them to possession..... 433
3. The wife also acquires, by marriage, a property in her paraphernalia.. 435
4. By judgment, consequent on a suit at law, a man may, in some cases, not only recover, but originally acquire, a right to personal property, as,
  1. To penalties recoverable by action popular. 2. To damages.
  3. To costs of suit..... 436-439

CHAPTER XXX.

OF TITLE BY GIFT, GRANT, AND CONTRACT.

1. A gift, or grant, is a voluntary conveyance of a chattel personal in possession, without any consideration or equivalent..... 440
2. A contract is an agreement, upon sufficient consideration, to do or not to do a particular thing; and, by such contract, any personal property (either in possession or in action) may be transferred.... 442
3. Contracts may be either express or implied, either executed or executory 448
4. The consideration of contracts is,
  1. A good consideration. 2. A valuable consideration, which is,
    1. Do, ut des. 2. Facio, ut facias. 3. Facio ut des. 4. Do, ut facias..... 444-445
5. The most usual species of personal contracts, are,
  1. Sale or exchange.
  2. Bailment. 3. Hiring or borrowing. 4. Debt..... 446
6. Sale or exchange is a transmutation of property from one man to another, in consideration of some recompense in value..... 446

[References are to star paging.]

7. Bailment is the delivery of goods in trust, upon a contract, express or implied, that the trust shall be faithfully performed by the bailee... 451
8. Hiring or borrowing is a contract, whereby the possession of chattels is transferred for a particular time, on condition that the identical goods (or, sometimes, their value) be restored at the time appointed, together with (in case of hiring) a stipend or price for the use..... 453
9. This price, being calculated to answer the hazard, as well as inconvenience of lending, gives birth to the doctrine of interest or usury upon loans; and, consequently, to the doctrine of bottomry or respondentia, and insurance..... 453-464
10. Debt is any contract whereby a certain sum of money becomes due to the creditor. This is, 1. A debt of record. 2. A debt upon special contract. 3. A debt upon simple contract, which last includes paper credit, or bills of exchange, and promissory notes..... 464-470

CHAPTER XXXI.

OF TITLE BY BANKRUPTCY.

1. Bankruptcy (as defined in c. 18) is the act of becoming a bankrupt... 471
2. Herein may be considered, 1. Who may become a bankrupt. 2. The acts whereby he may become a bankrupt. 3. The proceedings on a commission of bankrupt. 4. How his property is transferred thereby 471
3. Persons of full age using the trade of merchandise, by buying and selling, and seeking their livelihood thereby, are liable to become bankrupts, for debts of a sufficient amount..... 473
4. A trader who endeavors to avoid his creditors, or evade their just demands, by any of the ways specified in the several statutes of bankruptcy, doth thereby commit an act of bankruptcy..... 478
5. The proceedings on a commission of bankrupt, so far as they affect the bankrupt himself, are principally by, 1. Petition. 2. Commission. 3. Declaration of bankruptcy. 4. Choice of assignees. 5. The bankrupt's surrender. 6. His examination. 7. His discovery. 8. His certificate. 9. His allowance. 10. His indemnity..... 479-485
6. The property of a bankrupt's personal estate is, immediately upon the act of bankruptcy, vested by construction of law in the assignees; and they, when they have collected, distribute the whole by equal dividends among all the creditors..... 485-488

CHAPTER XXXII.

OF TITLE BY TESTAMENT, AND ADMINISTRATION.

1. Concerning testaments and administrations, considered jointly, are to be observed, 1. Their original and antiquity. 2. Who may make a testament. 3. Its nature and incidents. 4. What are executors and administrators. 5. Their office and duty..... 489

[References are to star paging.]

2. Testaments have subsisted in England immemorially, whereby the deceased was at liberty to dispose of his personal estate, reserving anciently to his wife and children their reasonable part of his effects. 491
3. The goods of intestates belonged anciently to the king, who granted them to the prelates to be disposed in pious uses, but, on their abuse of this trust, in times of popery, the legislature compelled them to delegate their power to administrators expressly provided by law. . . . 493
4. All persons may make a testament unless disabled by, 1. Want of discretion. 2. Want of free will. 3. Criminal conduct. . . . 496-497
5. Testaments are the legal declaration of a man's intentions, which he wills to be performed after his death. These are, 1. Written. 2. Nuncupative . . . . . 499-500
6. An executor is he to whom a man by his will commits the execution thereof . . . . . 502
7. Administrators are, 1. Durante minore etate of an infant executor or administrator, or durante absentia, or pendente lite. 2. Cum testamento annexo, when no executor is named, or the executor refuses to act. 3. General administrators, in pursuance of the statutes of Edward III and Henry VIII. 4. Administrators de bonis non, when a former executor or administrator dies without completing his trust . . . . . 503-507
8. The office and duty of executors (and, in many points, of administrators also), are, 1. To bury the deceased. 2. To prove the will, or take out administration. 3. To make an inventory. 4. To collect the goods and chattels. 5. To pay debts, observing the rules of priority. 6. To pay legacies, either general or specific, if they be vested, and not lapsed. 7. To distribute the undivided surplus, according to the statute of distributions. . . . . 508-520

TABLE OF ENGLISH REGNAL YEARS.

Sovereigns.	Commencement of Reign.	Length of Reign.
William I.....	October 14, 1066.....	21
William II.....	September 26, 1087.....	13
Henry I.....	August 5, 1100.....	36
Stephen.....	December 26, 1135.....	19
Henry II.....	December 19, 1154.....	35
Richard I.....	September 3, 1189.....	10
John.....	May 27, 1199.....	18
Henry III.....	October 28, 1216.....	57
Edward I.....	November 20, 1272.....	35
Edward II.....	July 8, 1307.....	20
Edward III.....	January 25, 1327.....	51
Richard II.....	June 22, 1377.....	23
Henry IV.....	September 30, 1399.....	14
Henry V.....	March 21, 1413.....	10
Henry VI*.....	September 1, 1422.....	39
Edward IV.....	March 4, 1461.....	23
Edward V.....	April 9, 1483.....	—
Richard III.....	June 26, 1483.....	8
Henry VII.....	August 22, 1485.....	24
Henry VIII.....	April 22, 1509.....	38
Edward VI.....	January 28, 1547.....	7
Mary.....	July 6, 1553.....	2
Philip and Mary.....	July 25, 1554.....	5
Elizabeth.....	November 17, 1558.....	45
James I.....	March 24, 1603.....	23
Charles I.....	March 27, 1625.....	24
The Commonwealth.....	January 30, 1649.....	12
Charles II†.....	May 29, 1660.....	37
James II.....	February 6, 1685.....	4
William and Mary.....	February 13, 1689.....	8 } 14
William III‡.....	December 28, 1694.....	6 }
Anne.....	March 8, 1702.....	13
George I.....	August 1, 1714.....	13
George II.....	June 11, 1727.....	34
George III.....	October 25, 1760.....	60
George IV.....	January 29, 1820.....	11
William IV.....	June 26, 1830.....	7
Victoria.....	June 20, 1837.....	64
Edward VII.....	January 23, 1901.....	9
George V.....	May 6, 1910.....	—

* On March 4, 1461, Henry was deposed by Edward IV, but in October, 1470, he recovered possession of the throne, resumed the regal title, and reigned six months, this period being called the 49th year of his reign.

† Charles II did not ascend the throne until May 29, 1660, but his regnal years are computed from the death of Charles I, January 30, 1649, so that the year of his restoration is styled the twelfth of his reign.

‡ The reign of William and Mary and the reign of William are considered as one continuous reign, so that 6 & 7 Wm. & Mary is designated as 7 & 8 Wm. III, instead of 1 Wm. III.

The names of James and Charles have their Latin form of Jacobus and Carolus and are abbreviated into Jac. and Car. Hence, for example, the celebrated Statute of Frauds of 1677 is cited as "29 Car. 2, c. 3."

(cxxi)

INTRODUCTION.

THE STUDY, NATURE, AND EXTENT OF THE LAW.

BOOK I.

OF THE RIGHTS OF PERSONS.

(cxiii)

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

PHILOSOPHY DEPARTMENT

1998

PHILOSOPHY DEPARTMENT

INTRODUCTION.

---

[3] SECTION THE FIRST.

ON THE STUDY OF THE LAW.*

Mr. Vice-Chancellor, and Gentlemen of the University.

§ 1. Introductory.—The general<sup>1</sup> expectation of so numerous and respectable an audience, the novelty, and (I may add) the importance of the duty required from this chair, must unavoidably be productive of great diffidence and apprehensions in him who has the honor to be placed in it. He must be sensible how much will depend upon his conduct in the infancy of a study, which is now first adopted by public academical authority; which has generally been reputed (however unjustly) of a dry and unfruitful nature; and of which the theoretical, elementary parts have hitherto received a very moderate share of cultivation. He cannot but reflect that, if either his plan of instruction be crude and injudicious, or the execution of it lame and superficial, it will cast a damp upon the further progress of this most useful and most rational branch of learning; and may defeat for a time the [4] public-spirited design of our wise and munificent benefactor. And this he must more especially dread, when he feels by experience how unequal his abilities are (unassisted by preceding examples) to complete, in the manner he could wish, so extensive and arduous a task; since he freely confesses, that his former more private attempts have fallen very short of his own ideas of perfection. And yet the candor he has already experienced, and this last transcendent mark of regard, his present nomination by the free and unanimous suffrage of a great and learned university (an honor to be ever remembered with the deepest and most affectionate gratitude), these testimonies of your public judgment must entirely supersede his own, and forbid him to believe himself totally insufficient for the labor at least of this employment. One thing he will venture to hope for, and it certainly shall be his constant aim, by diligence and attention to atone for his other defects; esteeming, that the best return, which he can possibly make for your favorable opinion of his capacity, will be his unwearied endeavors in some little degree to deserve it.

*Read in Oxford at the opening of the Vinerian lectures, 25 Oct. 1758. (The attention of the twentieth century student of law is directed to a lecture by Brooks Adams, entitled "Nature of Law: Methods and Aim of Legal Education," to be found in a volume called "Centralization and the Law: Scientific Legal Education," with an introduction by Melville M. Bigelow, Boston, 1906. This lecture is in two parts. The first part, dealing with the nature of law, traces briefly but clearly the process by which the principles of Modern English law have been evolved. The second part of the lecture discusses, with a sure hand, the problem, and the method of its solution, of the professional preparation of the modern lawyer.)

---

<sup>1</sup> In Jones v. Perry, 10 Yerg. 59, 30 Am. Dec. 432, Green, J., quotes Blackstone, vol. 1, p. 1, but the citation is an error. The passage quoted is on page 44. This is noted here for the purpose of explaining that where references to the Commentaries found in American Reports are not given at the page referred to, the reader may understand that the reference is erroneous. Such mistakes of volume and page are numerous, and it would be a useless expenditure of space to note them. They have been silently corrected wherever the true reference could be identified.—HAMMOND.

§ 2. Study of law on the Continent and in Scotland.—The science thus committed to his charge, to be cultivated, methodized, and explained in a course of academical lectures, is that of the laws and constitution of our own country; a species of knowledge, in which the gentlemen of England have been more remarkably deficient than those of all Europe besides. In most of the nations on the continent, where the civil or imperial law under different modifications is closely interwoven with the municipal laws of the land, no gentleman, or at least no scholar, thinks his education is completed, till he has attended a course or two of lectures, both upon the institutes of Justinian and the local constitutions of his native soil, under the very eminent professors that abound in their several universities. And in the northern parts of our own island, where also the municipal laws are frequently connected with the civil, it is difficult to meet with a person of liberal education, who is destitute of a competent knowledge in that science, which is to be the guardian of his natural rights and the rule of his civil conduct.

§ 3. Study of law abroad by Englishmen.—<sup>[5]</sup> Nor have the imperial laws been totally neglected even in the English nation. A general acquaintance with their decisions has ever been deservedly considered as no small accomplishment of a gentleman; and a fashion has prevailed, especially of late, to transport the growing hopes of this island to foreign universities, in Switzerland, Germany, and Holland; which, though infinitely inferior to our own in every other consideration, have been looked upon as better nurseries of the civil, or (which is nearly the same) of their own municipal law. In the meantime it has been the peculiar lot of our admirable system of laws, to be neglected, and even unknown, by all but one practical profession; though built upon the soundest foundations, and approved by the experience of ages.

§ 4. The common law as an element of culture.—Far be it from me to derogate from the study of the civil law, considered (apart from any binding authority) as a collection of written reason. No man is more thoroughly persuaded of the general excellence of its rules, and the usual equity of its decisions, nor is better convinced of its use as well as ornament to the scholar, the divine, the statesman, and even the common lawyer. But we must not carry our veneration so far as to sacrifice our Alfred and Edward to the manes<sup>2</sup> of Theodosius and Justinian; we must not prefer the edict of the prætor, or the rescript of the Roman emperor, to our own immemorial customs, or the sanctions of an English parliament; unless we can also prefer the despotic monarchy of Rome and Byzantium, for whose meridians the former were calculated, to the free constitution of Britain, which the latter are adapted to perpetuate.

<sup>2</sup> Manes. This word was misprinted "names" in the Dublin duodecimo edition of 1796, and the mistake was copied in the Second American Edition printed at Boston, 1799, in the same form; from which it has probably been perpetuated in most of our American editions, even down to the last [fourth] edition of Judge Cooley. From some other examples of the same kind to be noted in their place, I am inclined to think that the text of most of our American editions may be traced, with all its errors and false readings, to this pirated Dublin edition. It was apparently from this also that Professor Christian's notes were first printed in this country, as an appendix to each volume of the Commentaries.—HAMMOND.

Without detracting, therefore, from the real merit which abounds in the imperial law, I hope I may have leave to assert, that if an Englishman must be ignorant of either the one or the other, he had better be a stranger to the Roman than the English institutions. For I think it an undeniable position, that a competent knowledge of the laws of that society, <sup>[6]</sup> in which we live, is the proper accomplishment of every gentleman and scholar; an highly useful, I had almost said essential, part of liberal and polite education. And in this I am warranted by the example of ancient Rome; where, as Cicero informs us,<sup>a</sup> the very boys were obliged to learn the twelve tables by heart, as a carmen necessarium or indispensable lesson, to imprint on their tender minds an early knowledge of the laws and constitution of their country.

§ 5. Aim of this lecture.—But as the long and universal neglect of this study, with us in England, seems in some degree to call in question the truth of this evident position, it shall therefore be the business of this introductory discourse, in the first place to demonstrate the utility of some general acquaintance with the municipal law of the land, by pointing out its particular uses in all considerable situations of life. Some conjectures will then be offered with regard to the causes of neglecting this useful study; to which will be subjoined a few reflections on the peculiar propriety of reviving it in our own universities.

§ 6. Importance of the study of law.—And, first, to demonstrate the utility of some acquaintance with the laws of the land, let us only reflect a moment on the singular frame and polity of that land, which is governed by this system of laws—a land, perhaps the only one in the universe, in which political or civil liberty is the very end and scope of the constitution.<sup>b3</sup> This liberty rightly understood, consists in the power of doing whatever

<sup>a</sup> De Legg. 2. 23.

<sup>b</sup> Montesq. Esp. L. 1. 11. c. 5.

---

<sup>3</sup> Definition of liberty.—Blackstone refers here to Montesquieu's famous eulogy upon the English constitution, which begins: "There is one nation in the world which makes political liberty the direct object of its constitution.

the laws permit;<sup>3</sup> which is only to be effected by a general conformity of all orders and degrees to those equitable rules of action, by which the meanest individual is protected from the insults and oppression of the greatest. As, therefore, every subject is interested in the preservation of the laws, it is incumbent upon every man to be acquainted with those at least, with which he is immediately concerned; lest he incur the censure, as well as inconvenience, of living in society without knowing the obligations which it lays him under. And thus much may suffice for per- [7] sons of inferior condition, who have neither time nor capacity to enlarge their views beyond that contracted sphere in which they are appointed to move. But those on whom nature and fortune have bestowed more abilities and greater leisure cannot be so easily excused. These advantages are given them, not for the benefit of themselves only, but also of the public; and yet they cannot, in any scene of life, discharge properly their duty either to the public or themselves, without some degree of knowledge in the laws.<sup>4</sup> To evince this the more clearly, it may not be amiss to descend to a few particulars.

<sup>3</sup> Facultas ejus, quod cuique facere libet, nisi quid vi, aut jure prohibetur. (Its essence is the power of doing whatsoever we please, except what authority or law forbids.) Inst. 1. 3. 1.

---

We are about to examine the principles on which it is founded. If these are correct, liberty will be seen there as in a mirror."

But the definition of liberty which immediately follows in our text, though taken from the Institutes of Justinian, is hardly of such liberty as Montesquieu had in mind. Even Bracton, six centuries ago, could see its defects. He says that by this definition even slaves are free, since they have the power of doing whatever the laws permit; and he intimates that the true meaning of the definition can be understood only by disregarding all human laws, and confining our attention to the law of nature. (Lib. 2, c. 6, par. 2, fol. 4 b.) That is, if I understand him correctly, that liberty consists in being limited only by that supreme law which is the expression of abstract right.

As to Blackstone's definition of civil liberty, see post, Chapter 1, note 14.—HAMMOND.

<sup>4</sup> General interest in the study of law.—When Blackstone began his Oxford lectures on English law (1753), he felt himself under the obligation of justifying a new academic venture. "Advantages and leisure," he said, "are given to gentlemen not for the benefit of themselves only, but also of the public, and yet they cannot, in any scene of life, discharge properly their

§ 7. 1. To landed proprietors.—Let us therefore begin with our gentlemen of independent estates and fortune, the most useful as well as considerable body of men in the nation; whom even to suppose ignorant in this branch of learning is treated by Mr. Locke<sup>d</sup> as a strange absurdity. It is their landed property, with its long and voluminous train of descents and conveyances, settlements, entails, and encumbrances, that forms the most intricate and most extensive object of legal knowledge. The thorough comprehension of these, in all their minute distinctions, is perhaps too laborious a task for any but a lawyer by profession; yet still the understanding of a few leading principles, relating to estates and conveyancing, may form some check and guard upon a gentleman's inferior agents, and preserve him at least from very gross and notorious imposition.

§ 8. 2. To testators.—Again, the policy of all laws has made some forms necessary in the wording of last wills and testaments, and more with regard to their attestation. An ignorance in these must always be of dangerous consequence, to such as by choice or necessity compile their own testaments without any technical assistance. Those who have attended the courts of justice are the best witnesses of the confusion and distresses that are hereby occasioned in families; and of the difficulties that arise in dis-duty either to the public or to themselves, without some degree of knowledge in the laws.”

<sup>d</sup> Education, § 187.

---

Things have moved fast since Blackstone's day, and significant changes have certainly occurred in the educational aspects of law. To begin with, the circle of “gentlemen” who ought to give some thought to laws has been greatly widened: it comprises now all educated persons called upon to exercise the privileges and to perform the duties of citizenship. One need not be a barrister or a solicitor, a member of parliament, a justice of the peace, or even an elector, to take an interest in and feel responsibilities towards laws: all those who pay taxes and own property of any kind, who hire and supply labor, who stand on their rights and encounter the rights of others, are directly concerned with laws, whether they realize it or not. Sometimes a knowledge of law may help directly in the matter of claiming and defending what belongs to one; on other occasions it may enlighten a juror or an elector in the exercise of his important functions; in any case, every member of the community takes his share in the formation of public opinion, which is one of the most potent factors in producing and modifying law.—VINOGRADOFF, Common-Sense in Law, 7.

cerning the true meaning of the testator, or sometimes in discovering any meaning at all; so that in the end his estate [8] may often be vested quite contrary to these his enigmatical intentions, because perhaps he has omitted one or two formal words, which are necessary to ascertain the sense with indisputable legal precision, or has executed his will in the presence of fewer witnesses than the law requires.

§ 9. 3. To jurors.—But to proceed from private concerns to those of a more public consideration. All gentlemen of fortune are, in consequence of their property, liable to be called upon to establish the rights, to estimate the injuries, to weigh the accusations, and sometimes to dispose of the lives of their fellow-subjects, by serving upon juries. In this situation they have frequently a right to decide, and that upon their oaths, questions of nice importance, in the solution of which some legal skill is requisite; especially where the law and the fact, as it often happens, are intimately blended together. And the general incapacity, even of our best juries, to do this with any tolerable propriety, has greatly debased their authority, and has unavoidably thrown more power into the hands of the judges, to direct, control, and even reverse their verdicts, than perhaps the constitution intended.

§ 10. 4. To magistrates.—But it is not as a juror only that the English gentleman is called upon to determine questions of right, and distribute justice to his fellow-subjects: it is principally with this order of men that the commission of the peace is filled. And here a very ample field is opened for a gentleman to exert his talents, by maintaining good order in his neighborhood; by punishing the dissolute and idle; by protecting the peaceable and industrious; and, above all, by healing petty differences and preventing vexatious prosecutions. But, in order to attain these desirable ends, it is necessary that the magistrate should understand his business; and have not only the will, but the power also (under which must be included the knowledge), of administering legal and effectual justice. Else, when he has mistaken his authority, through passion, through ignorance, or absurdity, he will be the object of [9]. contempt from his inferiors, and of censure from those to whom he is accountable for his conduct.

§ 11. 5. To legislators.—Yet further; most gentlemen of considerable property, at some period or other in their lives, are ambitious of representing their country in parliament: and those, who are ambitious of receiving so high a trust, would also do well to remember its nature and importance. They are not thus honorably distinguished from the rest of their fellow-subjects, merely that they may privilege their persons, their estates, or their domestics; that they may list under party banners; may grant or withhold supplies; may vote with or vote against a popular or unpopular administration; but upon considerations far more interesting and important. They are the guardians of the English constitution; the makers, repealers, and interpreters of the English laws; delegated to watch, to check, and to avert every dangerous innovation, to propose, to adopt, and to cherish any solid and well-weighed improvement; bound by every tie of nature, of honor, and of religion, to transmit that constitution and those laws to their posterity, amended if possible, at least without any derogation. And how unbecoming must it appear in a member of the legislature to vote for a new law, who is utterly ignorant of the old! What kind of interpretation can he be enabled to give, who is a stranger to the text upon which he comments!

Indeed, it is perfectly amazing that there should be no other state of life, no other occupation, art, or science, in which some method of instruction is not looked upon as requisite, except only the science of legislation, the noblest and most difficult of any. Apprenticeships are held necessary to almost every art, commercial or mechanical: a long course of reading and study must form the divine, the physician, and the practical professor of the laws: but every man of superior fortune thinks himself born a legislator. Yet Tully was of a different opinion; "it is necessary," says he,* "for a senator to be thoroughly acquainted with the constitution; and this, he declares, is a knowledge of the most extensive nature; a matter of science, of diligence, of reflection; without which no senator can possibly be fit for his office."

* De Legg. 3. 18. Est senatori necessarium, nosse rempublicam; idque late patet:—genus hoc omne scientiæ, diligentia, memoriæ est; sine quo paratus esse senator nullo pacto potest.

The mischiefs that have arisen to the public from inconsiderate alterations in our laws, are too obvious to be called in question; and how far they have been owing to the defective education of our senators, is a point well worthy the public attention. The common law of England has fared like other venerable edifices of antiquity; which rash and unexperienced workmen have ventured to new-dress and refine, with all the rage of modern improvement. Hence frequently its symmetry has been destroyed, its proportions distorted, and its majestic simplicity exchanged for specious embellishments and fantastic novelties. For, to say the truth, almost all the perplexed questions, almost all the niceties, intricacies, and delays (which have sometimes disgraced the English, as well as other courts of justice) owe their original not to the common law itself, but to innovations that have been made in it by acts of parliament; "overladen (as Sir Edward Coke expresses it) with provisos and additions, and many times on a sudden penned or corrected by men of none or very little judgment in law." This great and well-experienced judge declares, that in all his time he never knew two questions made upon rights merely depending upon the common law; and warmly laments the confusion introduced by ill-judging and unlearned legislators. "But if," he subjoins, "acts of parliament were after the old fashion penned, by such only as perfectly knew what the common law was before the making of any act of parliament concerning that matter, as also how far forth former statutes had provided remedy for former mischiefs, and defects discovered by experience; then should very few questions in law arise, [11] and the learned should not so often and so much perplex their heads to make atonement and peace, by construction of law, between insensible and disagreeing words, sentences, and provisos, as they now do." And if this inconvenience was so heavily felt in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, you may judge how the evil is increased in later times, when the statute book is swelled to ten times a larger bulk; unless it should be found that the penners of our modern statutes have proportionably better informed themselves in the knowledge of the common law.

† 2 Rep. pref.

§ 12. 6. To the nobility.—What is said of our gentlemen in general, and the propriety of their application to the study of the laws of their country, will hold equally strong or still stronger with regard to the nobility of this realm, except only in the article of serving upon juries. But, instead of this, they have several peculiar provinces of far greater consequence and concern; being not only by birth hereditary counselors of the crown, and judges upon their honor of the lives of their brother-peers, but also arbiters of the property of all their fellow-subjects, and that in the last resort. In this their judicial capacity they are bound to decide the nicest and most critical points of the law: to examine and correct such errors as have escaped the most experienced sages of the profession, the lord keeper and the judges of the courts at Westminster. Their sentence is final, decisive, irrevocable; no appeal, no correction, not even a review can be had:<sup>5</sup> and to their determination, whatever it be, the inferior courts of justice must conform; otherwise the rule of property would no longer be uniform and steady.

§ 13. a. As judges.—Should a judge in the most subordinate jurisdiction be deficient in the knowledge of the law, it would reflect infinite contempt upon himself, and disgrace upon those who employ him. And yet the consequence of his ignorance is comparatively very trifling and small; his judgment may be examined, and his errors rectified, by other courts. But how much more serious and affecting is the case of a superior judge [12] if without any skill in the laws he will boldly venture to decide a question, upon which the welfare and subsistence of whole families may depend! Where the chance of his judging right, or wrong, is barely equal; and where, if he chances to judge wrong, he does an injury of the most alarming nature, an injury without possibility of redress!

<sup>5</sup> Upon this rule, still recognized, by which the decisions of the house of lords in their judicial capacity become irrevocable, and cannot be overruled by themselves, but only by a statute of parliament changing the law, see an article by Emory Washburn, Limitations of Judicial Power (proposing the same rule as applicable to the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, at least upon constitutional question), published in 1 Southern Law Review, N. S., 354, and also in 8 Journal of Social Science, 140.—HAMMOND.

Yet, vast as this trust is, it can nowhere be so properly reposed as in the noble hands where our excellent constitution has placed it: and therefore placed it, because, from the independence of their fortune and the dignity of their station, they are presumed to employ that leisure which is the consequence of both, in attaining a more extensive knowledge of the laws than persons of inferior rank: and because the founders of our polity relied upon that delicacy of sentiment, so peculiar to noble birth; which, as on the one hand it will prevent either interest or affection from interfering in questions of right, so on the other it will bind a peer in honor, an obligation which the law esteems equal to another's oath, to be master of those points upon which it is his birthright to decide.

§ 14. (1) An instance from Roman history.—The Roman pandects will furnish us with a piece of history not unapplicable to our present purpose. Servius Sulpicius, a gentleman of the patrician order, and a celebrated orator, had occasion to take the opinion of Quintus Mutius Scaevola, the then oracle of the Roman law; but, for want of some knowledge in that science, could not so much as understand even the technical terms, which his friend was obliged to make use of. Upon which Mutius Scaevola could not forbear to upbraid him with this memorable reproof,<sup>a</sup> “that it was a shame for a patrician, a nobleman, and an orator of causes, to be ignorant of that law in which he was so peculiarly concerned.” This reproach made so deep an impression on Sulpicius, that he immediately applied himself to the study of the law; wherein he arrived to that <sup>[13]</sup> proficiency, that he left behind him about an hundred and fourscore volumes of his own compiling upon the subject; and became, in the opinion of Cicero,<sup>b</sup> a much more complete lawyer than even Mutius Scaevola himself.

I would not be thought to recommend to our English nobility and gentry, to become as great lawyers as Sulpicius; though he, together with this character, sustained likewise that of an excellent orator, a firm patriot, and a wise, indefatigable senator; but the inference which arises from the story is this, that ignorance of the laws of the land hath ever been esteemed dishonorable in those who are entrusted by their country to maintain, to administer, and to amend them.

<sup>a</sup> Ff. 1. 2. 2. § 43. Turpe esse patricio, et nobili, et causas oranti, jus in quo versaretur ignorare.

<sup>b</sup> Brut. 41.

But surely there is little occasion to enforce this argument any further to persons of rank and distinction, if we of this place may be allowed to form a general judgment from those who are under our inspection; happy, that while we lay down the rule, we can also produce the example. You will therefore permit your professor to indulge both a public and private satisfaction, by bearing this open testimony; that, in the infancy of these studies among us, they were favored with the most diligent attendance, and pursued with the most unwearied application, by those of the noblest birth and most ample patrimony: some of whom are still the ornaments of this seat of learning; and others at a greater distance continue doing honor to its institutions, by comparing our polity and laws with those of other kingdoms abroad, or exerting their senatorial abilities in the councils of the nation at home.

§ 15. 7. To the clergy.—Nor will some degree of legal knowledge be found in the least superfluous to persons of inferior rank; especially those of the learned professions. The clergy in particular, besides the common obligations they are under in proportion to their rank and fortune, have also abundant reason, considered [<sup>14</sup>] merely as clergymen, to be acquainted with many branches of the law, which are almost peculiar and appropriated to themselves alone. Such are the laws relating to advowsons, institutions, and inductions; to simony, and simoniacal contracts; to uniformity, residence, and pluralities; to tithes and other ecclesiastical dues; to marriages (more especially of late) and to a variety of other subjects, which are consigned to the care of their order by the provisions of particular statutes. To understand these aright, to discern what is warranted or enjoined, and what is forbidden by law, demands a sort of legal apprehension; which is no otherwise to be acquired, than by use and a familiar acquaintance with legal writers.

§ 16. 8. To physicians.—For the gentlemen of the faculty of physic, I must frankly own that I see no special reason, why they in particular should apply themselves to the study of the law; unless in common with other gentlemen, and to complete the character of general and extensive knowledge; a character which their profession, beyond others, has remarkably deserved. They will give me leave, however, to suggest, and that not ludicrously, that it might frequently be of use to families upon sudden emergencies, if the physician were acquainted with the doctrine of last wills and testaments, at least so far as relates to the formal part of their execution.

§ 17. Study of the civil and canon law.—But those gentlemen who intend to profess the civil and ecclesiastical laws, in the spiritual and maritime courts of this kingdom, are of all men (next to common lawyers) the most indispensably obliged to apply themselves seriously to the study of our municipal laws. For the civil and canon laws, considered with respect to any intrinsic obligation, have no force or authority in this kingdom; they are no more binding in England than our laws are binding at Rome. But as far as these foreign laws, on account of some peculiar propriety, have in some particular cases, and in some particular courts, been introduced and allowed by our laws, so far they oblige, and no further; their authority being wholly founded upon that permission and adoption. In which we are not singular in our [15] notions; for even in Holland, where the imperial law is much cultivated and its decisions pretty generally followed, we are informed by Van Leeuwen,<sup>1</sup> that it receives its force from custom and the consent of the people, either tacitly or expressly given: “for otherwise,” he adds, “we should no more be bound by this law, than by that of the Almain, the Franks, the Saxons, the Goths, the Vandals, and other of the ancient nations.” Wherefore, in all points in which the different systems depart from each other, the law of the land takes place of the law of Rome, whether ancient or modern, imperial or pontifical. And in those of our English courts wherein a reception has been allowed to the civil and canon laws, if either they exceed the bounds of that reception, by extending themselves to other matters, than are permitted to them; or if such courts proceed according to the decisions of those laws, in cases wherein it is controlled by the law of the land, the common law in either instance both may, and frequently does, prohibit and annul their proceedings;<sup>k</sup> and it will not be a sufficient excuse for them to tell the king's courts at Westminster, that their practice is warranted by the laws of Justinian or Gregory, or is conformable to the decrees of the Rota or imperial chamber. For which reason it becomes highly necessary for every civilian and canonist, that would act with safety as a judge, or with prudence and reputation as an advocate, to know in what cases and how far the English laws have given sanction to the Roman; in what points the latter are rejected; and where they are both so intermixed and blended together as to form certain supplemental parts of the common law of England, distinguished by the titles of the king's maritime, the king's military, and the king's ecclesiastical law. The propriety of which inquiry the University of Oxford has for more than a century so thoroughly seen, that in her statutes<sup>l</sup> she appoints, that one of the three questions to be annually discussed at the act by the jurist-inceptors shall relate to the common law; subjoining this reason, "quia juris civilis studiosos decet haud imperitos esse [<sup>16</sup>] juris municipalis, et differentias exteri patrique juris notas habere" (for students of civil law should not be ignorant of the municipal law nor of the remarkable differences between their own laws and those of foreign nations). And the statutes<sup>m</sup> of the University of Cambridge speak expressly to the same effect.

<sup>1</sup> Dedicatio corporis juris civilis. Edit. 1663.

§ 18. Academic neglect of the common law.—From the general use and necessity of some acquaintance with the common law, the inference were extremely easy with regard to the propriety of the present institution, in a place to which gentlemen of all ranks and degrees resort, as the fountain of all useful knowledge. But how it has come to pass that a design of this sort has never before taken place in the university, and the reason why the study of our laws has in general fallen into disuse, I shall previously proceed to inquire.

<sup>k</sup> Hale Hist. C. L. c. 2. Selden in Fletam. 5 Rep. Caudrey's Case, 2 Inst. 599.

<sup>l</sup> Tit. VII. sect. 2, § 2.

<sup>m</sup> Doctor legum mox a doctoratu dabit operam legibus Angliæ, ut non sit imperitus earum legum quas habet sua patria, et differentias exteri patrique juris noscat. (A doctor of laws, having taken his degree, should study the laws of England, that he be not unskilled in those of his own country, nor be ignorant of the essential differences between them and foreign laws.) Stat. Eliz. B. c. 14. Cowell, Institut. in Præmio.

§ 19. 1. Fortescue's explanation.—Sir John Fortescue, in his panegyric on the laws of England (which was written in the reign of Henry the Sixth), puts<sup>a</sup> a very obvious question in the mouth of the young prince, whom he is exhorting to apply himself to that branch of learning; “why the laws of England, being so good, so fruitful, and so commodious, are not taught in the universities, as the civil and canon laws are?” In answer to which he gives<sup>o</sup> what seems, with due deference be it spoken, a very jejune and unsatisfactory reason; being in short, that “as the proceedings at common law were in his time carried on in three different tongues, the English, the Latin, and the French, that science must be necessarily taught in those three several languages; but that in the universities all sciences were taught in the Latin tongue only”; and therefore he concludes, “that they could not be conveniently taught or studied in our universities.” But without attempting to examine seriously the validity of this reason (the very shadow of which by the wisdom of your late constitutions is entirely taken away),<sup>6</sup> we perhaps may find out a better, or at least a more plausible account, why the study of the municipal laws has been banished from these seats of science, than what the learned chancellor thought it prudent to give to his royal pupil.

§ 20. 2. Mediæval teaching of common law.—<sup>[17]</sup> That ancient collection of unwritten maxims and customs, which is called the common law, however compounded or from whatever fountains derived, had subsisted immemorially in this kingdom; and, though

<sup>a</sup> C. 47.

<sup>o</sup> C. 48.

---

<sup>6</sup> This refers, no doubt, to stat. 4 Geo. II, c. 26, A. D. 1730 (Proceedings in Courts of Justice), by which all proceedings in law were ordered to be recorded as well as carried on in English (see 3 Comm. 322); and likewise to the university statutes establishing the Vinerian professorship, which required a complete course of lectures on the laws of England and in the English language, consisting of sixty lectures at the least yearly.—HAMMOND.

somewhat altered and impaired by the violence of the times, had in great measure weathered the rude shock of the Norman Conquest. This had endeared it to the people in general, as well because its decisions were universally known, as because it was found to be excellently adapted to the genius of the English nation. In the knowledge of this law consisted great part of the learning of those dark ages; it was then taught, says Mr. Selden,<sup>p</sup> in the monasteries, in the universities and in the families of the principal nobility. The clergy in particular, as they then engrossed almost every other branch of learning, so (like their predecessors, the British Druids<sup>q</sup>) they were peculiarly remarkable for their proficiency in the study of the law. Nullus clericus nisi causidicus (no clergyman who is not a lawyer also, or, every clergyman a lawyer), is the character given of them soon after the conquest by William of Malmsbury.<sup>r</sup> The judges, therefore, were usually created out of the sacred order,<sup>s</sup> as was likewise the case among the Normans;<sup>t</sup> and all the inferior offices were supplied by the lower clergy, which has occasioned their successors to be denominated clerks to this day.

§ 21. 3. Vogue of the civil law.—But the common law of England, being not committed to writing, but only handed down by tradition, use, and experience, was not so heartily relished by the foreign clergy; who came over hither in shoals during the reign of the Conqueror and his two sons, and were utter strangers to our constitution as well as our language. And an accident, which soon after happened, had nearly completed its ruin. A copy of Justinian's pandects, being newly<sup>u</sup> discovered at Amalfi, [18] soon brought the civil law into vogue all over the west of Europe, where

<sup>p</sup> In Fletam. 7. 7.

<sup>q</sup> Cæsar de Bello Gal. 6. 12.

<sup>r</sup> De gest. reg. l. 4.

<sup>s</sup> Dugdale Orig. Jurid. c. 8.

<sup>t</sup> Les juges sont sages personnes et autentiques,—sicome les archevesques, cvesques, les chanoines des eglises cathedraulx, et les autres personnes qui ont dignitez in sainte eglise; les abbez, les prieurs conventaulx, et les gouverneurs des eglises, etc. Grand Coustumier, c. 9. (The judges are persons of wisdom and authority—such as archbishops, bishops, canons of cathedral churches, and other dignitaries of holy church, the abbots, priors of convents and church governors, etc.)

<sup>u</sup> Circ. A. D. 1130.

before it was quite laid aside<sup>v</sup> and in a manner forgotten; though some traces of its authority remained in Italy<sup>x</sup> and the eastern provinces of the empire.<sup>y</sup> This now became in a particular manner the favorite of the popish clergy, who borrowed the method and many of the maxims of their canon law from this original.

v LL. Wisigoth. 2. 1. 9.

x Capitular. Hludov. Pii. 4. 102.

y Selden in Fletam. 5. 5.

---

<sup>7</sup> Revival of study of Roman law.—The revival of the study of Roman law and the rise of the Bologna school were long erroneously attributed to the alleged discovery of a manuscript copy of the pandects at the sack of Amalfi by the Pisans in 1137. The study of Roman law, however, was pursued with ardent enthusiasm long before 1137, and the sack of Amalfi in that year by the Pisans is not an absolutely certain historical event. The manuscript in question was well known to the glossators of the middle ages and was referred to as the Littera Pisana. It was afterwards, in 1406, carried to Florence on the conquest of Pisa, and is now known as the Pandectæ Florentinæ. It is a very ancient and valuable copy of the entire Pandects, and the only one now extant that dates before the age of the glossators.—HUNTER, Roman Law, 101.

The scholarly and interesting little book by Professor Paul Vinogradoff, Corpus Professor of Jurisprudence in the University of Oxford, entitled "Roman Law in Mediæval Europe," will give the student, in brief compass, an illuminating account of this subject. On the rise of the school at Bologna, he says (p. 44): "The immediate occasion for the creation of the great Bolognese school was provided by the endeavors of the famous Marchioness Matilda. As a staunch supporter of Gregory VII, she wanted to counterbalance the influence of the Imperialistic school in Ravenna by establishing a center of studies in Roman law that would act on the papal side. The first exponent of laws in Bologna had been a certain Pepo, who taught in the last quarter of the eleventh century. He is mentioned as a doctor of laws in a notable judgment delivered in the court of Beatrice, Duchess of Tuscany, in 1076, in which the digest was referred to and utilized for the decision. But the man with whose literary activities the rise of the Bologna law school has been traditionally connected, is, of course, Irnerius or Guarnerius. Originally a teacher of arts, he went to Rome at the instigation of the Marchioness Matilda, and, after having studied there for some time, began to lecture on law in Bologna. This happened towards the end of the eleventh century, perhaps about 1088.

"I need not dwell on the brilliant success of this teaching, and on the external circumstances attending the development of the Bologna school. It is well known that it soon became the leading university of the middle ages

The study of it was introduced into several universities abroad, particularly that of Bologna; where exercises were performed, lectures read, and degrees conferred in this faculty, as in other branches of science: and many nations on the continent, just then beginning to recover from the convulsions consequent upon the overthrow of the Roman empire, and settling by degrees into peaceable forms of government, adopted the civil law (being the best written system then extant), as the basis of their several constitutions; blending and interweaving it among their own feudal customs, in some places with a more extensive, in others a more confined authority.*

§ 22. 4. The civil law in England.—Nor was it long before the prevailing mode of the times reached England. For Theobald, * Domat's Treatise of Law. c. 13. § 9. Epistol. Innocent. IV. in M. Paris ad A. D. 1254.

---

for the study of law, and that it attracted thousands of undergraduates from all countries of Europe.

"I should like to characterize briefly the spirit of this revival of legal studies. It presents at bottom an application to law of the method which was employed by the new scholarship of Western Europe for the treatment of all problems of theology and science—the so-called scholastic method. The dark centuries preceding the year 1000 A. D., when learning meant merely the salvage of fragments of ancient knowledge, were followed by a period when organization again appeared. The great instrument for the advancement of learning at that time was the dialectical process by which formal and universal logic analyzes conceptions and constructs syllogisms. The permeation of the insufficient, fragmentary, classical texts by overwhelming logic was, in a sense, a masterly achievement, and the lawyers had more than their fair share in this work. While their fellows in the school of Divinity operated on Scripture and Canonic tradition, and the masters of arts struggled, by the help of distorted versions of Aristotle, with the rudiments of metaphysics, politics, and natural science, the lawyers exercised their dialectical acumen on a material really worthy of the name, namely, on the contents of the Corpus Juris. And as legal reasoning largely consists of dialectical analysis and co-ordination, they were able to produce remarkable results even at this early stage."

Of this event in human history Professor Maitland (English Law and the Renaissance, 24) has said: "A history of civilization would be miserably imperfect if it took no account of the first new birth of Roman law in the Bologna of Irnerius. Indeed, there are who think that no later movement—not the Renaissance, not the Reformation—draws a stronger line across the annals of mankind than that which is drawn about the year 1100 when a human science won a place beside theology."

a Norman abbot, being elected to the See of Canterbury,<sup>a</sup> and extremely addicted to this new study, brought over with him in his retinue many learned proficients therein; and among the rest Roger, surnamed Vacarius,<sup>b</sup> whom he placed in the University of Oxford,<sup>c</sup> to teach it to the people of this country. But it did not meet with the same easy reception in England, where a mild and rational system of laws had been long established, as it did upon the Continent; and, though the monkish clergy (devoted to the will of a foreign primate) received it with eagerness and zeal, yet the laity who were more interested to preserve the old constitution, and had already severely felt the effect of many Norman innovations, continued wedded to the use of the common law. King Stephen immediately pub-<sup>[19]</sup>lished a proclamation,<sup>c</sup> forbidding the study of

<sup>a</sup> A. D. 1138.

<sup>b</sup> Gervas. Dorobern, Act. Pontif. Cantuar. col. 1665.

<sup>c</sup> Rog. Bacon. citat. per Selden in Fletam. 7. 6. in Fortesc. c. 33, and 8 Rep. Pref.

---

* Vacarius.—Vacarius has of late years received considerable attention from scholars. There are studies of his work by Liebermann, 11 English Historical Review, 305; 2 Rashdall, Universities of Europe, 335; 1 Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, 97; Maitland, Law Quart. Rev., April, 1897, and 3 Collected Essays, 87; Holland, Vacarius, in the Dictionary of National Biography. Professor Vinogradoff (Roman Law in Mediæval Europe, 51) says: "The best way to obtain some insight into the intellectual work of the glossators is, I think, to examine the teaching of one of them in some concrete cases. I should like from this point of view to dwell somewhat on the doctrine of Vacarius, who, although by no means the most brilliant or influential representative of the school, deserves our special attention as a pioneer of the new learning in England. The external facts of his career are sufficiently known. He studied Lombard and canon as well as civil law, and has written on all three branches of contemporary jurisprudence, but he was principally concerned with the teaching of Roman law, and may be considered a fair representative of the earlier Bolognese jurists. He was attracted to England by Archbishop Theobald, taught in Canterbury and, according to Gervase's testimony, in Oxford. He was silenced for some time by Stephen, either because his teaching was considered dangerous to the authority of native legal custom, or because Stephen was jealous of the success obtained by a clerk of Archbishop Theobald, who maintained a hostile attitude towards him. Vacarius must have resumed his professional activity after an interruption of some years, and, in any case, his doctrinal influence left a deep trace in Oxford, where the students of law came to be styled pauperistæ, because their principal text-book was Vacarius' Book of Poor Scholars (Liber pauperum)."

the laws, then newly imported from Italy; which was treated by the monks<sup>d</sup> as a piece of impiety, and, though it might prevent the introduction of the civil law process into our courts of justice, yet did not hinder the clergy from reading and teaching it in their own schools and monasteries.<sup>e</sup>

<sup>d</sup> Joan. Sarisburiens. Polycrat. 8. 22.

<sup>e</sup> Roman law in England.—1. Civil law did not become a constituent element of English common law acknowledged and enforced by the courts, but it exercised a potent influence on the formation of legal doctrines during the critical twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when the foundations of common law were laid. Indeed, the teaching of Roman law inaugurated by Vacarius seemed for some time to carry everything before it. No school was more popular in Oxford at the close of the twelfth century than the school of legists. The tide was stemmed to some extent by powerful agencies acting in other directions. The church realized that its predominance was threatened by the spread of secular learning in the field of law; canon law was more sharply differentiated from civil jurisprudence, and it began to oppose the latter in its striving towards juridical supremacy. A bull of Honorius III (Super Speculam, A. D. 1217), and another of Innocent IV (Dolentes, A. D. 1259) were directed against the teaching of Roman law in Paris and in "neighboring countries." On the other hand, there grew up a national opposition against cosmopolitan doctrines which finds a definite expression in many facts. In 1234 Henry III forbade the teaching of civil law in London, while in 1236 the great men of England, assembled at Merton, declared against any modification of English custom by foreign views in the treatment of bastardy (Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari).

Nevertheless, the teaching of Roman law was never discontinued at the principal seats of learning in England. The canonists themselves frequently referred to its sources, as is shown, for instance, by the Golden Text-book (Summa aurea) of the Oxford professor, William of Drogheda (thirteenth century). The study of Roman law in Cambridge can be traced from this very thirteenth century, which witnessed so many declarations of the powers that be against its introduction. It was used at both universities and in other minor centers of learning as a kind of "general jurisprudence," and, as such, it exerted considerable, though indirect, influence on the practice of common law.

Turning to the results of this study in England, we have to notice, firstly, its bearing on the principal juridical doctrine evolved during the twelfth century, namely, on the doctrine of seizin, and the means of protecting it. The age of Henry II has left a profound mark in this respect by formulating the point of view of possession, and providing adequate remedies for its protection in the king's courts. As we have seen, the French lawyers were much concerned with this aspect of jurisprudence in the thirteenth century, and so were the English in the twelfth. A point in which the influence of Roman law is clearly traceable concerns the action itself by which possession was protected. The famous writ of Novel Disseisin—introduced by Henry II's lawyers—appears as a secular variation of the canonistic action of spoliation (actio spoliū), and this again has evidently sprung from the Roman interdict "unde vi."

§ 23. 5. Conflict between the civil and common law.—From this time the nation seems to have been divided into two parties;

To what extent the English view of seizin was colored by Roman teaching on possession may also be gathered among other things from Glanvill's treatment of the gage of land. He admits of the transfer of land from the debtor to the creditor with the object of providing a security for debt and interest, but he fails to recognize any distinct "estate" of the creditor in land transferred in such a way. The possession of the debtor remains legally intact, and the relation of the creditor is considered as a mere matter of fact devoid of juridical essence; it may be interrupted by the legal tenant, should the latter not be afraid of exposing himself to reprisals in the shape of a personal action.

Probably at the same time with Glanvill's treatise, William Longchamp, a Norman peasant who was to become Bishop of Durham and Regent of England in the reign of Richard Cœur-de-Lion, composes his Practice of Laws and Decrees (Practica legum et decretorum). It is a short manual of procedure based on civil as well as on canon law, and intended for use primarily in the French possessions of the English crown. As the career of the writer demonstrates, however, there was no sharp cleavage between the English and the French parts of the Plantagenets' dominions. At the fair of Lagny in Bresse, which is casually mentioned in the tract, English merchants were so numerous that one of the streets got its name from them (vicus Anglicus).

The teaching of the practica may well have influenced contemporary English lawyers on one or two important occasions. There was, for instance, a great controversy among the jurists of the time about the framing of an action. An authoritative glossator, Placentinus, held that it was not necessary to formulate an action in accordance with strict terms; the plaintiff might be allowed to state his claim in general expressions. Other doctors, such as Johannes Bassianus and Azo, disputed this and required the presentation of claims according to technical forms. William Longchamp's "practice" urges the necessity of definite formulæ of actions, and it may be considered in this respect as introducing the theory of strict writs adhered to by common law.

2. The most important English contribution to Romanesque jurisprudence, however, is contained in Bracton's work on the Laws and Customs of England. Although this famous book was primarily written for the instruction of practical lawyers, and its most valuable chapters are based on the case law of Henry III's age, it opens with a comprehensive introduction chiefly drawn from Azo's manuals of the Institutes and of the Code, a general analysis of actions. The very fact that an English justice should have felt the necessity of such a general introduction is extremely noteworthy.

Nor is his work in this line by any means a contemptible one. I do not propose to determine by exact marks what the school value of such work may the bishops and clergy, many of them foreigners, who applied them-

be nowadays. But what we can do is to notice that Bracton's aim was as different from that of his model, the Bolognese doctor, as the means at his disposal were peculiar. He lived in a country which could not be compared with Italy in its standard of general culture, and especially in the wealth of classical tradition and scholarship. The Bolognese glossator provided a remarkable exegesis of the Institutes and of Justinian's Code; he comments on his texts, illustrates and explains them, but does not remodel their doctrine—he speaks of patria potestas, of slavery, of the Lex Aquilia, of the interdicts, as if they were institutions which still obtained in the Italian practice of his time; in doing this he does not consider modern practice, and he stands very near our own expositors of Roman law: we might almost be induced to treat him as one of ourselves, as a citizen of our present republic of letters. Now such a standard would be entirely out of place in regard to Bracton. He does not want to state Justinian's teaching more or less exactly, but compiles Institutes for the English law of his time, and he attempts to build up these English Institutes with the help of Roman materials. There were no better materials at his disposal; there was no body of doctrine which could show better the general notions with which legal thought must deal, and when we think of the place still occupied by the teaching of Roman law in European schools, we shall not wonder at the course followed by Bracton. In fact, he attempted to do in a very systematic manner what his French contemporaries were doing in a much more casual fashion.

Some of the general principles expounded in the Institutes and in the commentaries to them might serve as an illuminating guide for English legal thought, while features entirely foreign to English life had to be removed. Thus the Introduction was undoubtedly intended to strengthen native legal doctrine by the infusion of legal conceptions of a high order drawn from the fountain-head of civilized and scientific law. But there might also be a second aim, namely, to influence the material development of English legal doctrine, to provide it with clues for the solution of difficult problems, and to improve on the existing practice of the courts. Bracton aimed chiefly at the first of these results, although in some cases we may notice that he had in view to influence substantive law itself.

Let us turn, however, to Bracton's own work and take as examples some of its initial speculations.

3. On the very threshold he encounters an inevitable difficulty of his undertaking, and striking contrasts between English law and Roman law cause him to reflect on the great question as to the modes by which a legal rule is sanctioned and stated. Civil law as collected by Justinian and expounded by Azo was a definite body of doctrine sanctioned by Imperial authority, and consigned to an authorized written version. Now, does English law afford a parallel in this respect? Where is the sanction of English law to be found? How is one to recognize its rules? Both Glanvill and Bracton have been reflecting on these questions. It is not absurd to give English unwritten rules the designation of law, because they proceed from a command of the sovereign, selves wholly to the study of the civil and canon laws, which now the king, are established by the consent of the great men, and imply a promise of obedience (sponsio) on the part of the commonwealth. Thus far Bracton, while Glanvill is not only shorter but one-sided—he deduces the authority of English law from the famous saying: quod principi placuit legis habet vigorem—a saying which was not in keeping with the political tendencies of Simon de Montfort's time, and therefore put aside by Bracton. In what sense can it be said, however, that the consent of great men is an element of English law? At first sight this may be true of Statutes and Assizes, but hardly of the decisions of judges on which the greater part of common law rests. But, as Statutes and Assizes are written law, they do not come within the scope of the argument at all. It seems that the body of magnates, of great men whose consent appears necessary for the making of the law in England, is assumed to be identical with the body of the Curia Regis, from which all jurisdiction proceeds. To its authority the sanction of English legal rules is thus ultimately referred, although it remains always expressed in vague Romanesque terms. We can see that a difficulty is felt as to the power of single judges to lay down the law, and it is settled in a way which reminds us of Beaumanoir. The common-law rules established by general custom ought to proceed from the whole court of the king, and their repeal and alteration is the affair of the whole court. In case of doubt recourse should be had to this court, which represents the majores, the magnates of the kingdom. Undoubtedly some of the great men, the judges and justiciars, one might be inclined to say, do not act up to this general doctrine, but lay down decisions as if their opinions were sufficient to constitute law. This is altogether reprehensible. The single judge is in the position of interpreter of the law, however, and though he is precluded from altering it at his wish, he may not only follow it when it is clear, but also improve upon it, an improvement not being an alteration. This reasoning is partly suggested by Azo's teaching as to the interpretation of law, and as to legal fictions by which the meaning of rules is widened, but it goes further both in wording and spirit, and though strained from a purely logical point of view, it very aptly opens a work which has to combine and contrast civil law and English common law.

If the difficulty as to the authority and sanction of common law may be easily overcome, the second objection to the common form of English doctrine is recognized to be grounded on serious considerations. There is no authorized version of English legal rules. This is felt both by Glanvill and by Bracton. Very material drawbacks follow from the absence of such a version; law is perverted by the ignorance of beginners who ascend the bench before they have mastered the elements of legal lore; it is also perverted by the overbearing conceit of people in authority, who treat it according to their personal views and inclinations. It is to remedy these very drawbacks that both Glanvill and Bracton set out to perform their task, the first in a perfunctory and thoroughly practical manner, the other with a great store of authorities at his disposal. Bracton's work may be called a private treatise on the common came to be inseparably interwoven with each other; and the nobility law in its relation to general jurisprudence, and this literary departure remains significant for the further course of English legal studies.

4. There follow generalities about justitia and jus. The Bolognese doctor starts from the definition of justice as given in the Digest: "justice is a constant and permanent will to allow everyone his right" (justitia est constans et perpetua voluntas jus suum cuique tribuendi). According to scholastic method he takes up every word in the sentence and expands it by interpretation so as to define the different attributes and conditions of justice. In this way he draws attention to the fact that justice may be considered as a divine institution, deciding once for all what is right and what is wrong. Or else it may be considered from the point of view of humanity. In this case the stress would lie on the will of man to do right, and not on external facts. Immutability and permanency are necessary attributes of justice. Variations or changes would destroy its very essence. If a legal privilege is first conceded and afterwards denied, this is in no way a change of justice, but a consequence of a change of acts. Bracton's summary of this section cuts short many of the philological distinctions. He finds himself confronted with a peculiarity of English phraseology, namely, with the absence of an equivalent in English to the word jus. Though writing in Latin, he does not want to make his teaching dependent on a foreign use of terms, and therefore he introduces, though very shortly, the terms lex and consuetudo—law and custom—explaining that they correspond to jus, which in this case would be rendered by the English word "law." But, we may add, the proper rendering of jus would not always be "law," the objective order of things and duties, as one might say, but sometimes "right," the subjective sphere, what I claim as my own against my neighbors. If Bracton had been making a translation, he would have found himself obliged to observe this variation of meaning. As it is, he uses Latin, although a Latin addressed to English readers, and this gives rise to what seems at first sight a gross blunder. Azo, talking of jus as "law," ridicules the idea that there could be the law of Peter or John, of a lion or of a donkey. Bracton, evidently speaking of jus as "right," turns the same sentence to positive account, and admits the right (jus) of Peter and of Paul. "The right of a lion or of a donkey" would, however, sound quaint enough, and it would have been better if Bracton had not gone so far on the subjective track. His meaning seems to have been, that we have to consider varieties of right derived from claims of divers beings and of claims in respect of divers things.

He differs from Azo yet another time when the contrast between proprietas (ownership) and bonorum possessio (possession) makes it necessary for him to notice a material difference in the use of these fundamental conceptions in Rome and in England. While the Roman lawyer draws a sharp distinction between ownership as the genuine and complete right to a thing, and possession as the protected enjoyment of it, the English lawyer merges both ideas in the intermediate and relative conception of seizin. A man is seized of a thing, more frequently of land, and his seizin must be protected by the courts until and laity, who adhered with equal pertinacity to the old common

a better ground of seizin has been found. B, the eldest son of A, may be his right heir, but if he did not obtain seizin on A's death, and C, the second son, has done so, C must be prima facie protected because he is already in seizin. He may be ousted only if B challenges his title and proves the truth of his contention. Bracton quite appropriately called attention to this fundamental difference of legal principle in a marginal note which eventually crept into the text itself, and destroyed the smooth course of Roman doctrine as set forth in Azo's manual.

There follows a section on the law of nature, the jus civile and the jus gentium. Azo, concerned with the interpretation of Roman texts as they stand, treats of the general philosophical problem of the law of nature as opposed to the positive law of states. But he also explains the purely Roman distinction between jus civile—the law of the Roman people—and the jus gentium—private law based on the legal customs of different nations. Bracton gives the substance of Azo's teaching on the law of nature, noticing the two possible meanings of the expression—as derived from the nature of live creatures, of animals as well as men, and as representing the rational concepts of man's nature. But he combines this second idea with that of the jus gentium, not taking much care to discover the historical differences between such reasonable rules and those imposed by the jus civile. In this respect he is undoubtedly inaccurate, but we can hardly reproach him, when we remember that even Roman jurists did not always distinguish clearly between the bidding of the jus naturale and the ratio naturalis, on which the rules of the jus gentium were supposed to be based. As for the jus civile, Bracton seeks to appropriate the expression in a way characteristic of mediæval usage. He has no interest in the original law of the Roman state, the jus of the Quirites, but there is one kind of law existing in England which might be designated by a reference to jus civile. This is the customary law of boroughs—jus civitatum.

5. The contrast between the professor expounding antiquarian doctrines, and the judge fitting English facts into a Roman frame, is especially striking in the treatment of the law of persons. Bracton follows Azo as to the principal and very important generalization, "all men are either free or slaves." But such a generalization had to be modified both in ancient Rome and in mediæval Italy or England. Azo proceeds to give the necessary commentary from the point of view of ancient Rome. He treats of statu liberi and of adscripticii to show that it is possible to arrange these subordinate groups under the chief headings of free and unfree. He does not deal with the Italian world in which he lives, nor is he troubled by the fact that neither the statu liberi nor the adscripticii are known to his Bolognese or Florentine contemporaries. The English lawyer proceeds on an entirely different course. The statu liberi and adscripticii are used by him to illustrate actual English conditions, although they lose much of their antiquarian genuineness, thanks to this process of adaptation. Of the free (liberi) it is needless to speak at length, for they appear in England under the same name. Villeins are equated with slaves—law: both of them reciprocally jealous of what they were una far-reaching assumption. As the adscripticii represent a kind of intermediate stage between free and serf, their counterpart would be the villein socmen of ancient demesne, and, to some extent, the freemen holding in villeinage. As for the statu liberi, Bracton employs this term to denote serfs enjoying a state of liberty, as for example, serfs dwelling as freemen on free soil. In this case they are prima facie protected by law, and any person claiming them as villeins must bring an action (de nativo habendo), and assume the burden of proof in court. This is, of course, no Roman doctrine; it is the adaptation of a Roman term to English distinctions.

At the end of the sections treating of the law of persons Bracton returns to the problem of slavery, and lays stress on the fact that slaves are not completely in the power of their lords. He finds support for this contention in the later Roman doctrine which, through the influence of Stoicism and Christianity, granted some protection to the slave against exceptional cruelty on the part of the master. From the time of the Antonines, a master treating his slave in an intolerable manner could be constrained by the magistrates to sell him. It was declared that the homicide of a slave by his master was a criminal offense. Azo took particular notice of these limitations of the power of masters over slaves, and adduced as a reason for the interference with the right of property in slaves, the importance for the commonwealth of preventing owners from misusing their property (expedit reipublicæ ne quis re sua male utatur). Bracton not only indorses the doctrine, but adds an important concrete feature which shows that in this case he did not merely copy foreign learning, but was pleading for a certain point of view before English jurists. He defines the "intolerable injury" as a destruction by the master of the serf's waynage, that is, of his plow team which, as we know, was safe from royal amercement. There are precedents for this view in Norman legal usage, forbidding the taking away of the rustic's waynage by the lord; and, of course, in the fact that in Anglo-Saxon times the predecessor of the villein, the ceorl, was not a slave at all, but had a standing against his lord in the courts of law. But at the time when Bracton wrote, the defense of waynage did not tally with the surrender of the old rights of free cultivators in other respects. Bracton himself, representing the general drift of the jurisprudence of his time, had maintained that there was no difference between a serf and a villein. The reservations, he wished to draw in regard to the right of waynage, are akin to the vacillations of his brother judges in cases where there was at stake the right of men holding in villeinage to appeal to the king's courts for remedies against their lords. After some contradictory decisions, the courts ended by applying strictly the rule that villeins have no civil claims against their lords, and that, in law, what is held by the villein, is owned by the lord. At the same time the reservation as to waynage disappears. Bracton's teaching on villeinage is thus very instructive, not merely from the point of view of the evolution of villein tenure, but also for estimating the practical influence of Romanesque learning on him and other English lawyers. Though the status of villeins was undoubt-acquainted with, and neither of them perhaps allowing the oppositely developed chiefly by the pressure of economic and political forces, it is clear that the study of Roman precedents played an important part in the shaping of its legal rules. To put it in another way, the historical growth of English villeinage did not necessarily involve its treatment on the basis of serfdom or slavery. But the infusion of Roman doctrine made the legal treatment of villeinage harder than might have been the case otherwise, while the partial reservations introduced by the emperors and admitted by Bracton did not carry much weight in practice.

Another case, where the study of Roman doctrine has left a distinct trace on English legal thought, is the well-known distinction between real and personal property. We may observe the actual origin of this famous distinction which still holds good at the present day. The root of it lies in the teaching of Roman lawyers on actions. There are real actions—actiones in rem—which aim at obtaining the property of a certain thing, and personal actions, urging certain claims against persons, requiring them to do something, to give something, or to forbear from something. The question of obtaining a specific object does not arise in the latter case. It is the value claimed that is of importance. So far, the teaching is common to both Roman and English lawyers. But Bracton and his fellow-judges, working on this basis, went a step beyond their Roman guides. They used the distinction between actions to differentiate between different kinds of property. Land and interests connected with it appeared to them to be naturally the object of real actions, because here the claim was directed to a definite thing and to nothing else. On the other hand, chattels were, as a rule, claimed in the same way as rights; for example, as the performance of some labor or office. The aim of the action was to obtain either the thing or service, or its equivalent from the person under obligation. The distinction became fundamental in the English legal system. Again, a striking example of the influence of Roman distinctions is afforded by the treatment of leases for terms of years. Bracton and thirteenth century judges consider the lessees not as tenants having an estate of freehold, but as mere usufructuarii. This is altered to a great extent by later doctrine, but the initial classification has left its traces on the law of the subject.

Bracton and his compeers had especially much to learn from the Romans, and the glossators who expounded their doctrines, on the subject of obligations generated by contracts and torts. The exceedingly active economic intercourse of the Roman state in its most prosperous days had been utilized by keen jurists to frame a doctrine conspicuous, even in the domain of classical law, for its subtlety and dialectical resourcefulness. Part of this vast material had to be left on one side by Bracton, while other parts were adopted more for the sake of possible eventualities than for the immediate requirements of practice. Bracton appropriates the fundamental idea that a nude pact, a convention bereft of particular form, does not constitute an obligation enforceable at law. He cites a couple of doggerel lines intended as an assistance site system that real merit which is abundantly to be found in to the beginner in remembering what could serve as vestments to pacts. "Et, verbis, scripto, consensu, traditione, junctura vestes sumere pacta solent."

The first three species apply to real contracts—such as, e. g., deposit; to verbal contracts—the Roman solemn promise (stipulatio), or an equivalent of it in writing, the deed under seal, which came to be the principal mode of contracting in English law; the fourth relates to consensual contracts—sale and hire by mutual consent, although in this respect English law could not be made to fit exactly the Roman view. Besides these Azo mentions two modes of clothing a bargain which he describes in quaint language. Whereas in the first four cases the contract is born vested, there are two occasions when it is bare at the moment of birth; but once having seen the light, it begins to look about for suitable clothing, and, eventually, it may find furs which will protect it from frost and decay; this happens should delivery (traditio) supervene, or a condition which did not exist at the moment when the convention was made, but which, if it appears later on, renders it perfect and provides it with a vesture. All this is appropriated by Bracton in a slightly modified form, and this "reception" of the Roman doctrine provides a starting-point for subsequent development. First, the ecclesiastical courts and the chancery, later on common-law courts, took part in the development of a doctrine concerning obligations which took account of informal agreements, and laid down rules as to their validity and enforcement.

On the whole it is clear that it is impossible to estimate the influence of Roman law in England by references to paragraphs of the Digest or of the Codex. If we want to find definite traces of it we have to look out not for references but for maxims, some of which, besides, had passed through the medium of canon law. The only real test of its character and extent is afforded by the development of juridical ideas, and in this respect the initial influence of Roman teaching on English doctrines will be found to be considerable. On many subjects the judges and legal writers of England were, as it were, prompted by their Roman predecessors, and this intercourse of ideas is nowhere as conspicuous as in the frequent cases when English lawyers did not simply copy their Roman models, but borrowed suggestions from them in order to develop them in their own way.

Authorities: Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, I, II; W. S. Holdsworth, History of English Law, II, III, 1909; Stubbs, Lectures on Mediæval and Modern History; Selden, Dissertatio ad Fletam; Maitland, Bracton's Notebook, 1888; Marcel Fournier, L'Eglise et le Droit Romain au XIII Siècle, in the Nouvelle Revue Historique de Droit Français et Etranger, 1890; E. Caillemer, Le Droit Civil dans les Provinces Anglo-Normandes au XII Siècle, 1883; Glanvill, De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ; Bracton, De Legibus Angliæ; Güterbogh, Henricus de Bracton und Sein Verhältniss zum Römischen Recht; F. W. Maitland, Bracton and Azo; Selden Society, VIII, 1894; P. Vinogradoff, Villeinage in England, 1892; James Williams, Latin Maxims in English Law, Law Magazine and Review, 1895, August.—VINOGRADOFF, Roman Law in Mediæval Europe, 84.

each.<sup>10</sup> This appears, on the one hand, from the spleen with which the monastic writers speak of our municipal laws upon all occasions; and, on the other, from the firm temper which the nobility showed at the famous parliament of Merton: when the prelates endeavored to procure an act, to declare all bastards legitimate in case the parents intermarried at any time afterwards; alleging this only reason, because holy church (that is, the canon law) declared such children legitimate: but "all the earls and barons (says the parliament roll<sup>1</sup>) with one voice answered, that they would not change the laws of England, which had hitherto been used and approved." And we find the same jealousy prevailing above a century afterwards,<sup>2</sup> when the nobility declared with a kind of prophetic spirit, "that the realm of England hath never been unto this hour, neither by the consent of our lord the king and the lords of parliament shall it ever be, [20] ruled or governed by the civil law."<sup>3</sup> And of this temper between the clergy and laity many more instances might be given.

While things were in this situation, the clergy, finding it impossible to root out the municipal law,<sup>11</sup> began to withdraw themselves

<sup>1</sup> Idem, Ibid. 5. 16. Polydor, Vergil. Hist. l. 9.

<sup>2</sup> Stat. Merton. 20 Hen. III. c. 9 (Bastardy, 1235). Et omnes comites et barones una voce responderunt, quod nolunt leges Angliæ mutare, quæ hucusque usitate sunt et approbatæ.

<sup>3</sup> 11 Ric. II. (1388).

<sup>11</sup> Selden, Jan. Anglor. l. 2. § 43, in Fortesc. c. 33.

---

<sup>10</sup> Role of the clergy in mediæval law.—Blackstone's picture of a nation divided into two parties, "the bishops and clergy" on the one side contending for their foreign jurisprudence, "the nobility and the laity" on the other side adhering "with equal pertinacity to the old common law," is not true. It is by "popish clergymen" that our English common law is converted from a rude mass of customs into an articulate system, and when the "popish clergymen," yielding at length to the pope's commands, no longer sit as the principal justices of the king's court, the creative age of our mediæval law is over. Very characteristic of our thirteenth century is it that when there is talk of legitimation per subsequens matrimonium, the champion of the common law is a canon of St. Paul's, William Raleigh, who is going to be a bishop and somewhat of a martyr, whose name is to be joined with the names of Anselm and Becket. These royal clerks have two sides; they are clerks, but they are royal. POLLOCK & MAITLAND, 1 Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 133.

<sup>11</sup> Blackstone uses the term "municipal law" in this place as equivalent to "common law," which is "the orthodox name for that uniform system of national customary law which was the result of the centralizing process of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries."—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 5 n.

by degrees from the temporal courts; and to that end, very early in the reign of King Henry the Third, episcopal constitutions were published,<sup>l</sup> forbidding all ecclesiastics to appear as advocates in foro sæculari (in the secular court); nor did they long continue to act as judges there, not caring to take the oath of office which was then found necessary to be administered, that they should in all things determine according to the law and custom of this realm;<sup>k</sup> though they still kept possession of the high office of chancellor, an office then of little juridical power; and afterwards, as its business increased by degrees, they modeled the process of the court at their own discretion.

But wherever they retired, and wherever their authority extended, they carried with them the same zeal to introduce the rules of the civil, in exclusion of the municipal law. This appears in a particular manner from the spiritual courts of all denominations, from the chancellor's courts in both our universities, and from the high court of chancery before mentioned; in all of which the proceedings are to this day in a course much conformed to the civil law: for which no tolerable reason can be assigned, unless that these courts were all under the immediate direction of the popish ecclesiastics, among whom it was a point of religion to exclude the municipal law; Pope Innocent the Fourth having forbidden<sup>l</sup> the very reading of it by the clergy, because its decisions were not founded on the imperial constitutions, but merely on the customs of the laity. And if it be considered, that our universities began about that period to receive their present form of scholastic discipline; that they were then, and continued to [<sup>21</sup>] be till the time of the Reformation, entirely under the influence of the popish clergy (Sir John Mason, the first Protestant, being also the first lay, chancellor of Oxford); this will lead us to perceive the reason why the study of the Roman laws was in those days of bigotry<sup>m</sup> pursued

<sup>l</sup> Spelman. Concil. A. D. 1217. Wilkins, vol. 1. p. 574. 599.

<sup>k</sup> Selden. in Fletam. 9. 3.

<sup>l</sup> M. Paris ad A. D. 1254.

<sup>m</sup> There cannot be a stronger instance of the absurd and superstitious veneration that was paid to these laws, than that the most learned writers of the times thought they could not form a perfect character, even of the blessed Virgin, without making her a civilian and a canonist. Which Albertus Magnus, the renowned dominican doctor of the thirteenth century, thus proves in his Summa de laudibus christiferæ virginis (divinum magis quam humanum opus) with such alacrity in these seats of learning; and why the common law was entirely despised, and esteemed little better than heretical.

§ 24. 6. Other causes of neglect.—And, since the Reformation, many causes have conspired to prevent its becoming a part of academical education. As, first, long usage and established custom; which, as in everything else, so especially in the forms of scholastic exercise, have justly great weight and authority. Secondly, the real intrinsic merit of the civil law, considered upon the footing of reason and not of obligation, which was well known to the instructors of our youth; and their total ignorance of the merit of the common law, though its equal at least, and perhaps an improvement on the other. But the principal reason of all that has hindered the introduction of this branch of learning is, that the study of the common law, being banished from hence in the times of popery, has fallen into a quite different channel, and has hitherto been wholly cultivated in another place. But as the long usage and established custom of ignorance of the laws of the land begin now to be thought unreasonable, and as by these means the merit of those [22] laws will probably be more generally known, we may hope that the method of studying them will soon revert to its ancient

qu. 23. § 5. “Item quod jura civilia, et leges, et decreta scivit in summo, probatur hoc modo: sapientia advocati manifestatur in tribus; unum, quod obtineat omnia contra judicem justum et sapientem; secundo, quod contra adversarium astutum et sagacem; tertio, quod in causa desperata: sed beatissima virgo, contra judicem sapientissimum, Dominum; contra adversarium callidissimum, dyabolum; in causa nostra desperata; sententiam optatam obtinuit.” (Perfections of the Christ-bearing Virgin (a work more divine than human). “Likewise that she had a perfect knowledge of civil rights, laws, and decrees is thus proved:—the wisdom of an advocate is manifested in three things—first, that he have a prevailing influence before a wise and just judge; secondly, against a subtle and sagacious adversary; and thirdly, in a desperate cause: The most blessed Virgin obtained the desired judgment from the most wise judge, the Lord—against our most cunning enemy, the devil—in our desperate cause.”) To which an eminent franciscan, two centuries afterwards, Bernardinus de Busti (Mariale, part. 4. ferm. 9), very gravely subjoins this note. “Nec videtur incongruum mulieres habere peritiam juris. Legitur enim de uxore Joannis Andree glossatoris, quod tantam peritiam in utroque jure habuit, ut publice in scholis legere ausa sit.” (Nor does a knowledge of the law seem inconsistent with the female character. For we read that the wife of John Andrew the lexicographer, was so skilled both in the civil and canon law, that she ventured to deliver lectures on both publicly in the schools.)

course, and the foundations at least of that science will be laid in the two universities; without being exclusively confined to the channel which it fell into at the times I have just been describing.

For, being then entirely abandoned by the clergy, a few stragglers excepted, the study and practice of it devolved, of course, into the hands of laymen; who entertained upon their parts a most hearty aversion to the civil law,<sup>n</sup> and made no scruple to profess their contempt, nay even their ignorance<sup>o</sup> of it, in the most public manner.

<sup>n</sup> Fortesc. de Laud. LL. c. 25.

<sup>o</sup> Abbot of Torun's Case.—The following is Blackstone's note: This remarkably appeared in the case of the Abbot of Torun, M. 22 Edw. III. 24 (1348), who had caused a certain prior to be summoned to answer at Avignon for erecting an oratory contra inhibitionem novi operis (contrary to the prohibition of a new work); by which words Mr. Selden (in Flet. 8. 5) very justly understands to be meant the title de novi operis nuntiatione (concerning the denunciation of a new work) both in the civil and canon laws (Ff. 39. 1. C. 8. 11. and Decretal. not Extrav. 5. 32), whereby the erection of any new buildings in prejudice of more ancient ones was prohibited. But Skipwith the king's serjeant, and afterwards chief baron of the exchequer, declares them to be flat nonsense; "in ceuz parolz, contra inhibitionem novi operis, ny ad pas entendement" (in these words, "contrary to the prohibition of a new work," there is no meaning); and Justice Shardelowe mends the matter but little by informing him, that they signify a restitution in their law; for which reason he very sagely resolves to pay no sort of regard to them. "Ceo n'est que un restitution en lour ley, pur que a ceo n'avomus regard," etc. (This is but a restitution in their law; therefore we shall pay no regard to it.)

Roman law in mediæval England.—In the place of Hammond's note (1 Hammond's Black. 55) to this subject, the following passage by Sir Frederick Pollock is quoted: "It is at least misleading to say that 'the systematic study of the Roman law was formerly proscribed' (as Maine said) in England. . . . Roman law was not only taught at Oxford and Cambridge without interruption, but sometimes, though not often, cited, at least in a general way, in the king's courts (Selden ad Fletam, pp. 528-530). There is no reason whatever to suppose that anyone thought it needful or expedient to protect the common law against a Roman invasion. Blackstone (Comm. i. 20-22) contrived, by accumulating mistakes, to draw an imaginary picture of English aversion and contempt for the civil law. In the case cited by him, Y. B. 22 Edw. III. 14 (not 24), [The Abbot of Torun's Case], what really happened was this. Counsel said, by way of preliminary objection, that the court had no judicial knowledge of what the civilian—or rather, in the case in hand, canonist—process of inhibitio novi operis was: to which Justice Shardelowe replied in effect: 'That is only what they call restitution in their law, so we think nothing of your point; you must answer to the merits'; and the argument proceeded accordingly. Nothing here shows very gross ignorance, although the language might not satisfy a learned civilian; the court, so far from treating Roman words of art

But still, as the balance of learning was greatly on the side of the clergy, and as the common law was no longer taught, as formerly, in any part of the kingdom, it must have been subjected to many inconveniences, and perhaps would have been gradually lost and overrun by the civil (a suspicion well justified from the frequent transcripts of Justinian to be met with in Bracton and Fleta) had it not been for a peculiar incident, which happened at a very critical time, and contributed greatly to its support.

§ 25. Restoration of the common law.—The incident which I mean was the fixing the court of common pleas, the grand tribunal for disputes of property, to be held in one certain spot; that the seat of ordinary justice might be permanent and notorious to all the nation. Formerly, that, in conjunction with all the other superior [23] courts, was held before the king's capital judiciary of England in the aula regis (king's court), or such of his palaces wherein his royal person resided; and removed with his household from one end of the kingdom to the other. This was found to occasion great inconvenience to the suitors; to remedy which it was made an article of the great charter of liberties, both that of King John and King Henry the Third, that "common as nonsense, professed to understand them quite enough for the purpose in hand; and the only contempt in question was that of an abbot who was charged with having cited a prior to the pope's court at Avignon and persisted in disregard of the king's prohibition. But in the nineteenth century an over-zealous Romanizing lawyer called Shardelowe an old savage on the strength of Blackstone's misunderstanding. What is really curious in the matter is that Blackstone appears to have been misled by Selden (ad Fletam, p. 533), who cites this to prove that Roman law had become unknown in the king's courts in the reign of Edward III, though he does not use anything like Blackstone's rhetorical language about contempt and aversion. With all respect for Selden, I see no room for doubt that he did misunderstand the case; perhaps he was nodding a little, for he calls Shardelowe, J., 'Shardus.' His general thesis that knowledge of Roman law in England, except among professed canonists, declined rapidly after the reign of Edward II, is doubtless correct. But there was no question of hostility. Not the fourteenth or thirteenth, but the sixteenth century, was the time of recrimination between common lawyers and civilians, and perhaps of some real danger to the common law (Maitland, 'English Law and the Renaissance'; Pollock, 'The Expansion of the Common Law,' p. 88).—MAINE, Common Law, with notes by Sir Frederick Pollock, 117.

► C. 11.

pleas should no longer follow the king's court, but be held in some certain place"; in consequence of which they have ever since been held (a few necessary removals in times of the plague excepted) in the palace of Westminster only. This brought together the professors of the municipal law, who before were dispersed about the kingdom, and formed them into an aggregate body; whereby a society was established of persons, who (as Spelman<sup>a</sup> observes), addicting themselves wholly to the study of the laws of the land, and no longer considering it as a mere subordinate science for the amusement of leisure hours, soon raised those laws to that pitch of perfection, which they suddenly attained under the auspices of our English Justinian, King Edward the First.

§ 26. 1. Inns of chancery and inns of court.—In consequence of this lucky assemblage, they naturally fell into a kind of collegiate order, and, being excluded from Oxford and Cambridge, found it necessary to establish a new university of their own. This they did by purchasing at various times certain houses (now called the inns of court and of chancery)<sup>12</sup> between the city of Westminster,

<sup>a</sup> Glossar. 334.

---

<sup>12</sup> Inns of court.—The inns of court are the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn. The inns of chancery were latterly Clifford's Inn, Clement's Inn, New Inn, Staple Inn, and Barnard's Inn. Besides these there were formerly Furnival's Inn, the Strand Inn, Lyon's Inn, and Thavies' Inn. See Rex v. Barnard's Inn, 5 Ad. & E. 17, and Smith v. Kerr, [1900] 2 Ch. 511.

“Throughout the later middle age English law had been academically taught. No English institutions are more distinctively English than the inns of court; of none is the origin more obscure. We are only now coming into possession of the documents whence their history must be gathered, and apparently we shall never know much of their first days. Unchartered, unprivileged, unendowed, without remembered founders, these groups of lawyers formed themselves and in course of time evolved a scheme of legal education: an academic scheme of the mediæval sort, oral and disputatious. For good and ill that was a big achievement: a big achievement in the history of some undiscovered continents. We may well doubt whether aught else could have saved English law in the age of the Renaissance. What is distinctive of mediæval England is not parliament, for we may everywhere see assemblies of estates, nor trial by jury, for this was but slowly suppressed in France. But the inns of court and the year books that were read therein, we shall hardly find their like elsewhere. At all events let us notice that where Littleton and Fortescue lectured, there Robert Rede lectures, Thomas More lectures, Edward Coke lectures, Francis the place of holding the king's courts, and the city of London; for advantage of ready access to the one, and plenty of provisions in the other.' Here exercises were performed, lectures read, and degrees were at length conferred in the common law, as at other universities in the canon and civil. The degrees were those of barristers (first styled apprentices* from apprendre, to [24] learn) who answered to our bachelors; as the state and degree of a sergent,† servientis ad legem (of a sergent at law), did to that of doctor.

The crown seems to have soon taken under its protection this infant seminary of common law; and, the more effectually to foster * Fortesc. c. 48.

† Apprentices or barristers seem to have been first appointed by an ordinance of King Edward the First in parliament, in the twentieth year (1291) of his reign. (Spelm. Gloss. 37. Dugdale, Orig. Jurid. 55.)

‡ The first mention which I have met with in our law books of sergeants or countors, is in the Statute of Westm. 1, 3 Edw. I, c. 29 (Fraud, 1275), and in Horn's Mirror, c. 1. § 10. c. 2. § 5. c. 3. § 1, in the same reign. But M. Paris in his life of John II, abbot of St. Alban's, which he wrote in 1255, 39 Hen. III, speaks of advocates at the common law, or countors (quos banci narratores vulgariter appellamus (whom we commonly call bench reporters), as of an order of men well known. And we have an example of the antiquity of the coif in the same author's history of England, A. D. 1259, in the case of one William de Bussy, who, being called to account for his great knavery and malpractices, claimed the benefit of his orders or clergy, which till then remained an entire secret; and to that end voluit ligamenta coifæ suæ solvere, ut palam monstraret se tonsuram habere clericalem; sed non est permissus.—Satelles vero eum arripiens, non per coifæ ligamina sed per guttur eum apprehendens, traxit ad carcerem. (He wished to untie the strings of his coif that he might prove to all his having the clerical tonsure; but this was not allowed. Then an officer seizing him, not by the strings of his coif but by his throat, dragged him to prison.) And hence Sir H. Spelman conjectures (Glossar. 335), that coifs were introduced to hide the tonsure of such renegade clerks, as were still tempted to remain in the secular courts in the quality of advocates or judges, notwithstanding their prohibition by canon.

---

Bacon lectures, and highly technical were the lectures that Francis Bacon gave. Now it would, so I think, be difficult to conceive any scheme better suited to harden and toughen a traditional body of law than one which, while books were still uncommon, compelled every lawyer to take part in legal education and every distinguished lawyer to read public lectures."—MAITLAND, Eng. Law and the Renaissance, 26.

Among the literature on the inns of court may be mentioned the following: Fortescue, De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, by Amos (1825); Herbert, Antiquities and cherish it, King Henry the Third in the nineteenth year of his reign issued out an order directed to the mayor and sheriffs of London, commanding that no regent of any law schools within that city should for the future teach law therein.<sup>u</sup> The word "law," or leges, being a general term, may create some doubt at this distance of time whether the teaching of the civil law, or the common, or both, is hereby restrained. But in either case it tends to the same end. If the civil law only is prohibited (which is Mr. Selden's<sup>w</sup> opinion), it is then a retaliation upon the clergy, who had excluded the common law from their seats of learning. If the municipal law be also included in the restriction (as Sir Edward Coke<sup>x</sup> understands it, and which the words seem to import), then the intention is evidently this; by preventing private teachers within the walls of the city, to collect all the common lawyers into the one public university, which was newly instituted in the suburbs.

[25] In this juridical university (for such it is insisted to have been by Fortescue<sup>y</sup> and Sir Edward Coke<sup>z</sup>) there are two sorts of collegiate houses: one called inns of chancery, in which the younger students of the law were usually placed, "learning and studying," says Fortescue,<sup>a</sup> "the originals and as it were the elements of the law; who, profiting therein, as they grew to ripeness so were they admitted into the greater inns of the same study, called the inns of court." And in these inns of both kinds, he goes on to tell us, the knights and barons, with other grandees and noblemen of the realm, did use to place their children, though they did not desire to have them thoroughly learned in the law, or to get their living by its practice; and that in his time were about two

<sup>u</sup> Ne aliquis scholas regens de legibus in eadem civitate de cætero ibidem leges doceat.

<sup>w</sup> In Flet. 8. 2.

<sup>x</sup> 2 Inst. Præm.

<sup>y</sup> C. 49.

<sup>z</sup> 3 Rep. pref.

<sup>a</sup> C. 49.

---

of the Inns of Court (1804); Pearce, History of the Inns of Court (1848); Bellot, The Inner and Middle Temple (1902); Loftie, The Inns of Court (1895); Ringrose, The Inns of Court (1909); Dillon, Laws and Jurisprudence of England and America, Lect. III; Odgers, A Sketch of the Four Inns of Court, in Essays in Legal History, ed. by Vinogradoff, 233 ff. (1913).

thousand students at these several inns, all of whom he informs us were fili nobilium, or gentlemen born.

§ 27. a. Decline of the inns.—Hence it is evident, that (though under the influence of the monks our universities neglected this study, yet) in the time of Henry the Sixth it was thought highly necessary, and was the universal practice, for the young nobility and gentry to be instructed in the originals and elements of the laws. But by degrees this custom has fallen into disuse; so that in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, Sir Edward Coke <sup>b</sup> does not reckon above a thousand students, and the number at present is very considerably less. Which seems principally owing to these reasons: first, because the inns of chancery, being now almost totally filled by the inferior branch of the profession, are neither commodious nor proper for the resort of gentlemen of any rank or figure; so that there are very rarely any young students entered at the inns of chancery; secondly, because in the inns of court all sorts of regimen and academical superintendence, either with regard to morals or studies, are found impracticable and therefore entirely neglected: lastly, because persons of birth and fortune, after having finished their usual courses at the universities, have [26] seldom leisure or resolution sufficient to enter upon a new scheme of study at a new place of instruction. Wherefore few gentlemen now resort to the inns of court, but such for whom the knowledge of practice is absolutely necessary; such, I mean, as are intended for the profession: the rest of our gentry (not to say our nobility also), having usually retired to their estates, or visited foreign kingdoms, or entered upon public life, without any instruction in the laws of the land, and indeed with hardly any opportunity of gaining instruction, unless it can be afforded them in these seats of learning.

§ 28. University instruction in law.—And that these are the proper places, for affording assistances of this kind to gentlemen of all stations and degrees, cannot (I think) with any color of reason be denied. For not one of the objections, which are made to the inns of court and chancery, and which I have just now enumerated, will hold with regard to the universities. Gentlemen may here associate with gentlemen of their own rank and degree.

<sup>b</sup> 3 Rep. pref.

Nor are their conduct and studies left entirely to their own discretion; but regulated by a discipline so wise and exact, yet so liberal, so sensible and manly, that their conformity to its rules (which does at present so much honor to our youth) is not more the effect of constraint than of their own inclinations and choice. Neither need they apprehend too long an avocation hereby from their private concerns and amusements, or (what is a more noble object) the service of their friends and their country. This study will go hand in hand with their other pursuits; it will obstruct none of them; it will ornament and assist them all.

But if, upon the whole, there are any, still wedded to monastic prejudice, that can entertain a doubt how far this study is properly and regularly academical, such persons, I am afraid, either have not considered the constitution and design of an university, or else think very meanly of it. It must be a deplorable narrowness of mind that would confine these seats of instruction to the limited views of one or two learned professions. To the praise of this age be it spoken, a more open <sup>[27]</sup> and generous way of thinking begins now universally to prevail. The attainment of liberal and genteel accomplishments, though not of the intellectual sort, has been thought by our wisest and most affectionate patrons,<sup>c</sup> and very lately by the whole university,<sup>d</sup> no small improvement of our ancient plan of education: and therefore I may safely affirm that nothing (how unusual soever) is, under due regulations, improper to be taught in this place, which is proper for a gentleman to learn. But that a science, which distinguishes the criterions of right and wrong; which teaches to establish the one, and prevent, punish, or redress the other; which employs in its theory the noblest faculties of the soul, and exerts in its practice the cardinal virtues of the heart: a science, which is universal in its use and extent, accommodated to each individual, yet comprehending the whole community; that a science like this should ever have been deemed unnecessary to be studied in an university, is matter of astonishment and concern. Surely, if it were not before an object of academical knowledge, it was high time to make it one: and to those who can doubt the propriety of its reception among us (if any such there be) we may return an answer in their own way; that ethics are confessedly a branch of academical learning, and Aristotle himself has said, speaking of the laws of his own country, that jurisprudence or the knowledge of those laws is the principal and most perfect branch of ethics.*

<sup>c</sup> Lord Chancellor Clarendon, in his dialogue of education, among his tracts, p. 325, appears to have been very solicitous, that it might be made "a part of the ornament of our learned academies to teach the qualities of riding, dancing, and fencing, at those hours when more serious exercises should be intermitted."

<sup>d</sup> By accepting in full convocation the remainder of Lord Clarendon's history from his noble descendants, on condition to apply the profits arising from its publication to the establishment of a manage in the university.

§ 29. 1. The Vinerian professorship of law.—From a thorough conviction of this truth, our munificent benefactor, Mr. Viner, having employed above half a century in amassing materials for new-modeling and rendering more commodious the rude study of the laws of the land, consigned [28] both the plan and execution of these his public-spirited designs to the wisdom of his parent university. Resolving to dedicate his learned labors “to the benefit of posterity and the perpetual service of his country,”† he was sensible he could not perform his resolution in a better and more effectual manner, than by extending to the youth of this place those assistances, of which he so well remembered and so heartily regretted the want. And the sense, which the university has entertained of this ample and most useful benefaction, must appear beyond a doubt, from their gratitude in receiving it with all possible marks of esteem;‡ from their alacrity and unexampled dispatch in carrying it into execution;‡ and, above all, from the laws and constitutions by which they have effectually guarded it from the neglect and abuse to which such institutions are liable.‡ We

* Τελευτα μαλιστα αρετη, οτι της τελειας αρετης χρησις εστιν. Ethic. ad Nicomach. l. 5. c. 3.

† See the preface to the eighteenth volume of his Abridgment.

‡ Mr. Viner is enrolled among the public benefactors of the university by decree of convocation.

‡ Mr. Viner died June 5, 1756. His effects were collected and settled, near a volume of his work printed, almost the whole disposed of, and the accounts made up, in a year and a half from his decease, by the very diligent and worthy administrators with the will annexed (Dr. West and Dr. Good of Magdalene, Dr. Whalley of Oriel, Mr. Buckler of All Souls, and Mr. Betts of University have seen an universal emulation, who best should understand, or most [29] faithfully pursue, the designs of our generous patron: and with pleasure we recollect, that those who are most distinguished [30] by their quality, their fortune, their station, their learning, or their experience, have appeared the most zealous to promote the success of Mr. Viner's establishment.

---

‡ The statutes of the Vinerian foundation, given in Blackstone's note i, are omitted here as of no present interest comparable to the space they occupy.

§ 30. 2. Advantages of university teaching of law.—The advantages that might result to the science of the law itself, when a little more attended to in these seats of knowledge, perhaps, would be very considerable. The leisure and abilities of the learned in these retirements might either suggest expedients, or execute those dictated by wiser heads,* for improving its method, retrenching its superfluities, and reconciling the little contrarieties which the practice of many centuries will necessarily create in any human system; a task which those who are deeply employed in business and the more active scenes of the profession, can hardly condescend to engage in. And as to the interest, or (which is the same) the reputation of the universities themselves, I may venture to pronounce, that if ever this study should arrive to any tolerable perfection either here or at Cambridge, the nobility and gentry of this kingdom would not shorten their residence upon this account, nor perhaps entertain a worse opinion of the benefits of academical education. Neither should it be considered as a matter of light importance that while we thus extend the pomæria (bounds) of university learning, and adopt a new tribe of citizens within these philosophical walls, we interest a very [31] numerous and very powerful profession in the preservation of our rights and revenues.<sup>14</sup> college), to whom that care was consigned by the university. Another half year was employed in considering and settling a plan of the proposed institution, and in framing the statutes thereupon, which were finally confirmed by convocation on the 3d of July, 1758. The professor was elected on the 20th of October following, and two scholars on the succeeding day. And, lastly, it was agreed at the annual audit in 1761, to establish a fellowship; and a fellow was accordingly elected in January following.—The residue of this fund, arising from the sale of Mr. Viner's Abridgment, will probably be sufficient hereafter to found another fellowship and scholarship, or three more scholarships, as shall be thought most expedient.

* See Lord Bacon's proposals and offer of a digest.

---

<sup>14</sup> Function of university schools of law.—We [university schools of law] must not be wanting to the position in which we find ourselves. Especially we

For I think it past dispute that those gentlemen, who resort to the inns of court with a view to pursue the profession, will find it expedient (whenever it is practicable) to lay the previous foundations of this, as well as every other science, in one of our learned universities. We may appeal to the experience of every sensible lawyer, whether anything can be more hazardous or discouraging than the usual entrance on the study of the law. A raw and unexperienced youth, in the most dangerous season of life, is transplanted on a sudden into the midst of allurements to pleasure, without any restraint or check but what his own prudence can suggest; with no public direction in what course to pursue his inquiries; no private assistance to remove the distresses and difficulties which will always embarrass a beginner. In this situation he is expected to sequester himself from the world, and by a tedious, lonely process to extract the theory of law from a mass of undigested learning; or else by an assiduous attendance on the courts to pick up theory and practice together, sufficient to qualify him for the ordinary run of business. How little, therefore, is it to be wondered at, that we hear of so frequent miscarriages; that so many gentlemen of bright imaginations grow weary of so unpromising a search,<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Sir Henry Spelman, in the preface to his Glossary, has given us a very lively picture of his own distress upon this occasion. "Emisit me mater Londinum, juris nostri capessendi gratia; cujus cum vestibulum salutassem, reperissemque linguam peregrinam, dialectum barbaram, methodum inconcinnam, molem non ingentem solum sed perpetuis humeris sustinendam, excidit mihi (fateor) animus," etc. (My mother sent me to London to commence the study of the law; but when, having paid my respects to the vestibule of this branch of learning I was met by a foreign language, a barbarous dialect, an uncouth style, and a mass not only vast but always pressing upon one's shoulders, I confess my courage failed me.)

---

must not be content with a mere lip service, with merely tagging our law schools with the name of a university, while they lack entirely the university spirit and character. What, then, does our undertaking involve, and that conception of the study of our English system of law, which, in Blackstone's phrase, "extends the pomœria of university learning and adopts this new tribe of citizens within these philosophical walls"? It means this, that our law must be studied and taught as other great sciences are studied and taught at the universities, as deeply, by like methods, and with as thorough a concentration and lifelong devotion of all the powers of a learned and studious faculty. If our law be not a science worthy and requiring to be thus studied and thus taught, then, as a distinguished lawyer has remarked, "A university will best consult its own and addict themselves wholly to amusements, or other less innocent pursuits; and that so many persons of moderate capacity confuse themselves at first setting out, and continue ever dark and puzzled during the remainder of their lives!

§ 31. Importance of a university education for lawyers.—The evident want of some assistance in the rudiments of legal knowledge has given birth to a practice, which if ever it had grown to be general, must have proved of extremely [32] pernicious consequence. I mean the custom by some so very warmly recommended, of dropping all liberal education, as of no use to students in the law and placing them, in its stead, at the desk of some skillful attorney; in order to initiate them early in all the depths of practice, and render them more dextrous in the mechanical part of business. A few instances of particular persons (men of excellent learning and unblemished integrity), who, in spite of this method of education, have shone in the foremost ranks of the bar, have afforded some kind of sanction to this illiberal path to the profession, and biased many parents of shortsighted judgment, in its favor: not considering that there are some geniuses formed to overcome all disadvantages, and that from such particular instances no general rules can be formed; nor observing that those very persons have frequently recommended by the most forcible of all examples, the disposal of their own offspring, a very different foundation of legal studies, a regular academical education. Perhaps too, in return, I could now direct their eyes to our principal seats of justice, and suggest a few hints in favor of university learning;<sup>m</sup> but in these all who hear me, I know have already prevented me.

Making, therefore, due allowance for one or two shining exceptions, experience may teach us to foretell that a lawyer thus edu-

<sup>m</sup> The four highest judicial offices were at that time filled by gentlemen, two of whom had been fellows of All Souls college; another student of Christ Church; and the fourth a fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge.

[Lord Northington, then Lord Keeper, and Willes, C. J. C. P., were of All Souls; Lord Mansfield, C. J. K. B., of Christ Church, and Sir Thomas Sewell, M. B., of Trinity.]

---

dignity in declining to teach it." This is the plow to which our ancestors here in America set their hand and to which we have set ours; and we must see to it that the furrow is handsomely turned.—THAYER, Legal Essays, 372.

cated to the bar, in subservience to attorneys and solicitors," will find he has begun at the wrong end. If practice be the whole he is taught, practice must also be the whole he will ever know: if he be uninstructed in the elements and first principles upon which the rule of practice is founded, the least variation from established precedents will totally distract and bewilder him: ita lex scripta est<sup>o</sup> (so the law is written) is the utmost his knowledge will arrive at; he must never aspire to form, and seldom expect to comprehend, any arguments drawn a priori, from the spirit of the laws and the natural foundations of justice.<sup>15</sup>

[23] Nor is this all; for (as few persons of birth, or fortune, or even of scholastic education, will submit to the drudgery of servitude and the manual labor of copying the trash of an office) should this infatuation prevail to any considerable degree, we must rarely expect to see a gentleman of distinction or learning at the bar. And what the consequence may be, to have the interpretation and enforcement of the laws (which include the entire disposal of our properties, liberties, and lives) fall wholly into the hands of obscure or illiterate men, is matter of very public concern.

§ 32. Groundwork of a lawyer's education.—The inconveniences here pointed out can never be effectually prevented, but by making academical education a previous step to the profession of

<sup>a</sup> See Kennet's Life of Somner, p. 67.

<sup>o</sup> Ff. 40. 9. 12.

---

<sup>15</sup> Roman law in legal education.—Mr. James Bryce (now Viscount Bryce), author of "The American Commonwealth," says with reference to this passage of Blackstone:

"Blackstone is here founding, on the unfortunate results of the usage of his own time, an argument for making the future barrister begin with a systematic theoretical study of English law. His reasoning will be generally felt to be sound, but it does not exclude the further improvement of giving the learner some knowledge of the principles of Roman law before he addresses himself to English. I shall state some grounds for thinking that what might appear the longest way round, through Roman law, may really be the shortest way to the scientific mastery of our own."

These remarks of Lord Bryce occur in his inaugural address as Regius Professor of Civil Law at Oxford in 1871, on the subject "The Academical Study of the Civil Law." The lecture is well worth the perusal of the student or of the lawyer. It may be found at page 860 of his Studies in History and Jurisprudence.

the common law and at the same time making the rudiments of the law a part of academical education. For sciences are of a sociable disposition, and flourish best in the neighborhood of each other: nor is there any branch of learning, but may be helped and improved by assistances drawn from other arts. If, therefore, the student in our laws hath formed both his sentiments and style, by perusal and imitation of the purest classical writers, among whom the historians and orators will best deserve his regard; if he can reason with precision, and separate argument from fallacy, by the clear, simple rules of pure unsophisticated logic; if he can fix his attention, and steadily pursue truth through any, the most intricate, deduction, by the use of mathematical demonstrations; if he has enlarged his conceptions of nature and art, by a view of the several branches of genuine, experimental, philosophy; if he has impressed on his mind the sound maxims of the law of nature, the best and most authentic foundation of human laws; if, lastly, he has contemplated those maxims reduced to a practical system in the laws of imperial Rome; if he has done this or any part of it (though all may be easily done under as able instructors as ever graced any seats of learning), a student thus qualified may enter upon the study of the law with incredible advantage and reputation. And if, at the conclusion, or during <sup>[34]</sup> the acquisition of these accomplishments, he will afford himself here a year or two's further leisure, to lay the foundation of his future labors in a solid scientific method, without thirsting too early to attend that practice which it is impossible he should rightly comprehend, he will afterwards proceed with the greatest ease, and will unfold the most intricate points with an intuitive rapidity and clearness.

I shall not insist upon such motives as might be drawn from principles of economy, and are applicable to particulars only: I reason upon more general topics. And therefore to the qualities of the head, which I have just enumerated, I cannot but add those of the heart; affectionate loyalty to the king, a zeal for liberty and the constitution, a sense of real honor, and well-grounded principles of religion; as necessary to form a truly valuable English lawyer, a Hyde, a Hale, or a Talbot. And, whatever the ignorance of some, or unkindness of others, may have heretofore untruly suggested, experience will warrant us to affirm, that these endowments of loyalty and public spirit, of honor and religion, are nowhere to be found in more high perfection than in the two universities of this kingdom.<sup>16</sup>

§ 33. Method of these Commentaries.—Before I conclude, it may perhaps be expected, that I lay before you a short and general account of the method I propose to follow, in endeavoring to execute the trust you have been pleased to repose in my hands. And in these solemn lectures, which are ordained to be read at the entrance of every term (more perhaps to do public honor to this laudable institution, than for the private instruction of individuals<sup>p</sup>) I presume it will best answer the intent of our benefactor

<sup>p</sup> See Lowth's Oratio Crewiana, p. 365.

<sup>16</sup> Legal education in England.—At the present day, the inns of chancery have completely disappeared as institutions; though some of their buildings remain. But the inns of court still enjoy their ancient reputation with the sons of our nobility and gentry; and they exercise also the exclusive privilege of conferring the degree of barrister at law, the possession of which degree is an indispensable qualification for practicing as advocate in the superior courts. And for the obtaining of this degree, it is necessary to be enrolled as a student in one or other of these inns, and after a certain period to apply to its principal officers (or benchers) for a call to the bar. As a qualification for call, the student must (as the general rule) have kept commons for three years (i. e., twelve terms), by dining at least six times in each term in the hall of the society into which he has obtained admission; excepting that if he is a member of an university in the United Kingdom, dining three times in each term is sufficient. Moreover, no student may be called to the bar, unless he has passed a public examination in law for the purpose of ascertaining his fitness.

Accordingly, a public examination, for all the inns collectively, takes place periodically; and this examination is compulsory in the case of all students, except for certain colonial barristers who desire to be called to the English Bar.

The education and examination of gentlemen desirous of becoming solicitors of the supreme court have now for long (subject to the control of His Majesty's judges) been in the hands of The Law Society, a body which, having been founded in the year 1823, received its first royal charter in the year 1831. By virtue of the provisions of various acts of parliament, an applicant for admission to the solicitors' branch of the legal profession must (unless specially exempted), after having given proof of good general education, serve for a period varying in different cases from three to five years under articles of clerkship to a practicing solicitor, and must also, before being admitted, pass two qualifying examinations known respectively as the Intermediate and Final Examinations, conducted by the society. He is then certified by the society as having complied with the statutory requirements, and, upon presentation of and the expectation of this learned body, if I attempt to illustrate at times such detached titles of the law, as are the most easy to be understood, and most capable of historical or critical ornament. But in reading the complete course, which is annually consigned to my care, a more regular method will be necessary; and, till a better is proposed, I <sup>[35]</sup> shall take the liberty to follow the same that I have already submitted to the public.<sup>9</sup> To fill up and finish that outline with propriety and correctness, and to render the whole intelligible to the uninformed minds of beginners (whom we are too apt to suppose acquainted with terms and ideas, which they never had opportunity to learn), this must be my ardent endeavor, though by no means my promise, to accomplish. You will permit me, however, very briefly to describe, rather what I conceive an academical expounder of the laws should do, than what I have ever known to be done.

§ 34. 1. General map of the law.—He should consider his course as a general map of the law,<sup>17</sup> marking out the shape of

<sup>9</sup> The analysis of the laws of England, first published, A. D. 1756, and exhibiting the order and principal divisions of the ensuing Commentaries; which were originally submitted to the university in a private course of lectures, A. D. 1753.

---

his certificate, is admitted as a solicitor by the Master of the Rolls. For the education of persons serving under articles of clerkship to solicitors, the society makes provision by a system of oral lectures and classes and correspondence tuition.

Academical instruction in the law may, however, now be obtained in schools other than those of the inns of court and the Law Society; for though no provision for instruction in the common law was anciently made at either Oxford or Cambridge, that deficiency has been long since redressed by the munificence of private donors, who at each of these universities have founded professorships, with appropriate endowments for that purpose. And in the various colleges of the University of London, and the Universities of Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Sheffield, Bristol, Wales, and elsewhere in England, there are now also very effective schools of the common law.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 8.

<sup>17</sup> General map of the law.—This brief but admirable sketch of the elements of preparatory education for the bar, and the methods of that education, is as appropriate to-day as when it was written. No doubt it marks out a longer and more thorough course than most law students will ever give before entering upon practice. Even the select and wealthy body of students to whom Blackstone spoke did not enter upon it with zeal and perseverance sufficient to insure success. But it was the experience of that age, as it is of our own, the country, its connections and boundaries, its greater divisions and principal cities: it is not his business to describe minutely the subordinate limits, or to fix the longitude and latitude of every inconsiderable hamlet. His attention should be engaged, like that of the readers in Fortescue's inns of chancery, "in tracing out the originals and as it were the elements of the law." For if, as that no advantage is gained in education by haste or by the omission of any topic which is really useful in full practice. If the lawyer meets with success enough to require a full and complete knowledge of his profession, he will be obliged at some time to recur to these subjects, and make up in mature life imperfectly, and yet with great toil, the omissions of his earlier course. There is no subject mentioned by Blackstone that a successful lawyer need not know, and will not regret it if he does not know.

It is worth notice, too, how fully in this projected course Blackstone has anticipated almost every topic to which the attention of scientific jurists and writers has since been led. Even the doctrines of the historical school of jurists, as presented by Sir Henry Maine and others, were anticipated by him in 1758 more clearly than any English jurist* has stated them since.

In the passage (on page 35) beginning with, "These originals should be traced to their foundations," Blackstone has enumerated with remarkable fullness every source of our law which has been investigated by later students; "the customs of the Britons and Germans" are included by Dr. Stubbs in his admirable little Compend of Select Documents. The "Codes of the Northern Nations" included the Leges Barbarorum, which have recently had their full share of attention, if not in some cases, and especially that of the Salic law, more than that share. Blackstone no doubt included with these a group of laws closely related, Danish, Swedish, Norwegian, and Icelandic, which he set us the example of employing in the illustration of English law, though it has been little followed since, except by a few foreign students of that law, such as Jacob Grimm, Konrad Maurer, and Michelsen. The "laws of our own Saxon Princes" are now accessible among the publications of the Rolls' series, Ancient Laws and Institutes of England, edited by Benjamin Thorpe, London, 2 vols., 8vo., 1840. Of the Roman and feudal laws it is needless to say more here. English lawyers have just passed through one of their periodical fits of indiscriminate admiration for the former, and are beginning to study the facts of * Let me say here once for all that by English jurists I mean any on either side of the Atlantic who write in the English language and study the common law of England. It would be a needless waste of words to repeat "English and American" where a single word will suffice. Indeed one could hardly be safe against criticism of that kind, except by such an awkward list of geographical terms as "English and American (both in the United States and Canada) and Australian," for there is hardly an autonomous colony of our race in any part of the world that has not already made some contributions of value to the study of English law.

---

Justinian<sup>r</sup> has observed, the tender understanding of the student be loaded at the first with a multitude and variety of matter, it will either occasion him to desert his studies, or will carry him heavily through them, with much labor, delay and despondence. These originals should be traced to their fountains, as well as our distance will permit; to the customs of the Britons and Germans, as recorded by Cæsar and Tacitus; to the codes of the northern nations on the Continent, and more especially to those of our own Saxon princes; to the rules of the Roman law either left here in the days of Papinian, or imported by Vacarius and his fol-<sup>[36]</sup> lowers; but, above all, to that inexhaustible reservoir of legal antiquities and learning, the feudal law, or, as Spelman<sup>a</sup> has entitled it, the law of nations in our western orb. These primary rules and fundamental principles should be weighed and compared with the precepts of the law of nature, and the practice of other countries; should be explained by reasons, illustrated by examples, and confirmed by undoubted authorities; their history should be deduced, their changes and revolutions observed, and it should be shown how

r Incipientibus nobis exponere jura populi Romani, ita videntur tradi posse commodissime, si primo levi ac simplici via singula tradantur: alioqui, si statim ab initio rudem adhuc et infirmum animum studiosi multitudine ac varietate rerum oneravimus, duorum alterum, aut desertorem studiorum efficiemus, aut cum magno labore, sæpe etiam cum diffidentia (quæ plerumque juvenes avertit) serius ad id perducemus, ad quod, leviori via ductus, sine magno labore, et sine ulla diffidentia maturius perducipotuisset. Inst. I. 1. 2. (Our object being the exposition of the law of the Roman people, we think that the most advantageous plan will be to commence with an easy and simple path, and then to proceed to details with a most careful and scrupulous exactness of interpretation. Otherwise, if we begin by burdening the student's memory, as yet weak and untrained, with a multitude and variety of matters, one of two things will happen: either we shall cause him wholly to desert the study of law, or else we shall bring him at last, after great labor, and often, too, distrustful of his own powers (the commonest cause, among the young, of ill-success), to a point which he might have reached earlier, without such labor and confident in himself, had he been led along a smoother path.—MOYLE'S Trans. Justinian's Inst.)

<sup>a</sup> Of Parliaments. 57.

---

its historical connection with our own. That is to say, they are beginning to take Blackstone's advice, given a hundred and thirty years ago, as to both of these systems, that "their history should be deduced, their changes and revolutions observed, and it should be shown how far they are connected with, or have at any time been affected by the civil transactions of the kingdom" (p. 36).—HAMMOND.

far they are connected with, or have at any time been affected by, the civil transactions of the kingdom.

§ 35. Hints to the law student.—A plan of this nature, if executed with care and ability, cannot fail of administering a most useful and rational entertainment to students of all ranks and professions; and yet it must be confessed that the study of the laws is not merely a matter of amusement; for, as a very judicious writer<sup>1</sup> has observed upon a similar occasion, the learner “will be considerably disappointed, if he looks for entertainment without the expense of attention.” An attention, however, not greater than is usually bestowed in mastering the rudiments of other sciences, or sometimes in pursuing a favorite recreation or exercise. And this attention is not equally necessary to be exerted by every student upon every occasion. Some branches of the law, as the formal process of civil suits, and the subtle distinctions incident to landed property, which are the most difficult to be thoroughly understood, are the least worth the pains of understanding, except to such gentlemen as intend to pursue the profession. To others I may venture to apply, with a slight alteration, the words of Sir John Fortescue,<sup>2</sup> when first his royal pupil determines to engage in this study. “It will not be necessary for a gentleman, as such, to examine with a close application the critical niceties of the law. It will fully be sufficient, and he may well enough be denominated a lawyer, if under the instruction of a master he traces up the principles and grounds of the [37] law, even to their original elements. Therefore, in a very short period, and with very little labor, he may be sufficiently informed in the laws of his country, if he will but apply his mind in good earnest to receive and apprehend them. For, though such knowledge as is necessary for a judge is hardly to be acquired by the lucubrations of twenty years, yet, with a genius of tolerable perspicacity, that knowledge which is fit for a person of birth or condition may be learned in a single year, without neglecting his other improvements.”<sup>3</sup>

* In the first and second editions the Latin text of Fortescue, from which the quotation above is freely translated, is given: first omitted in the third edition, and this reference substituted for it.

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Taylor's Pref. to Elem. of Civil Law.

<sup>2</sup> De Laud. Leg. c. 8.

To the few, therefore (the very few I am persuaded), that entertain such unworthy notions of an university, as to suppose it intended for mere dissipation of thought; to such as mean only to while away the awkward interval from childhood to twenty-one, between the restraints of the school and the licentiousness of politer life, in a calm middle state of mental and of moral inactivity; to these Mr. Viner gives no invitation to an entertainment which they never can relish. But to the long and illustrious train of noble and ingenuous youth, who are not more distinguished among us by their birth and possessions, than by the regularity of their conduct and their thirst after useful knowledge, to these our benefactor has consecrated the fruits of a long and laborious life, worn out in the duties of his calling; and will joyfully reflect (if such reflections can be now the employment of his thoughts) that he could not more effectually have benefited posterity, or contributed to the service of the public, than by founding an institution which may instruct the rising generation in the wisdom of our civil polity, and inform them with a desire to be still better acquainted with the laws and constitution of their country.

OF THE NATURE OF LAWS IN GENERAL.

§ 36. Meaning of law.—Law, in its most general and comprehensive sense, signifies a rule of action; and is applied indiscriminately to all kinds of action, whether animate or inanimate, rational or irrational. Thus we say, the laws of motion, of gravitation, of optics, or mechanics, as well as the laws of nature and of nations. And it is that rule of action, which is prescribed by some superior, and which the inferior is bound to obey.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Definition of law by Austin and by Holland.—Austin's great task was therefore to distinguish between laws properly so called and laws improperly so called. The word "command" is the key to his analysis of law. A law properly so called is a command, an order issued by a superior to an inferior, and "the party to whom it is directed is liable to evil from the other in case he comply not with the desire." The evil is called a sanction, and the command or duty is said to be sanctioned by the chance of incurring the evil. Thus are inseparably connected the terms "command," "duty," and "sanction." To employ his own language, "each of the three terms signifies the same notion, but each denotes a different part of that notion, and connotes the residue." All commands, however, are not laws, that term being limited to those commands which oblige generally to the performance of acts of a class. Having thus arrived at a definition of laws properly so called, it was necessary in the next place, in order to prevent confusion, to differentiate them from the mass of things to which common speech gives the name of law. Such, for instance, to use Blackstone's classification, as (1) the laws of inanimate matter; (2) the laws of animal nutrition; (3) the laws of nature which are rules imposed by God on men and discoverable by reason alone; and (4) the revealed or divine law, which is part of the law of nature directly expounded by God. While all such laws may be said to embody "a rule of action dictated by some superior being," they are not commands in the only proper sense of that term, they are not commands addressed by a human superior to a human inferior. Austin therefore rejects them as metaphorical or figurative laws, laws improperly so called. Thus the conclusion was reached that of true laws those only are the subjects of jurisprudence which are laws strictly so called, or positive laws. Not, however, until Austin's conclusions—weakened and disfigured as they are by a lack of accurate knowledge of what the law then was, by an absolute ignoring of history, by entanglement with irrelevant and to some extent bad moral philosophy, and by a pedantic and repellent style—had passed through a mental crucible of the highest order, could it be said that the work which Hobbes so greatly advanced was finally systematized and completed on a strictly

§ 37. 1. Law as order of the universe.—Thus when the Supreme Being formed the universe, and created matter out of nothing, He impressed certain principles upon that matter, from which it can never depart, and without which it would cease to be. When He put the matter into motion, He established certain laws of motion, to which all movable bodies must conform. And, to descend from the greatest operations to the smallest, when a workman forms a clock, or other piece of mechanism, he establishes at his own pleasure certain arbitrary laws for its direction; as that the hand shall describe a given space in a given time; to which law as long as the work conforms, so long it continues in perfection, and answers the end of its formation.

If we further advance, from mere inactive matter to vegetable and animal life, we shall find them still governed by laws; more scientific basis. In 1880 Thomas Erskine Holland published his Elements of Jurisprudence, characterized by an eminent critic as “the first work of pure scientific jurisprudence which has appeared in England; that is, of the general science of law distinctly separated from the ethical part of politics.” In Holland’s great work, now in the tenth edition, the principles of the Analytical School, after critical re-examination, have been restated under the three heads into which the subject logically divides itself: (1) the nature of sovereign political authority; (2) the nature of positive laws enforced by a sovereign political authority; (3) the rules of human actions, called laws merely by analogy, not so enforced. Every state is divisible into two parts, one of which is sovereign, the other subject. The sovereignty of the ruling part has two aspects. It is “external,” as independent of all control from without; “internal,” as paramount over all action within. Without external sovereignty no state is qualified for membership in the family of nations. The questions which arise with reference to internal sovereignty relate to the proportion borne by the sovereign part of the state to the subject part. “The primary function of constitutional law is to ascertain the political center of gravity of any given state. . . . The sovereign part of the state, as thus ascertained, is omnipotent. Since it is the source of all law, its acts can never be illegal.” Having thus described the nature of sovereignty, he defines a law properly so called to be “a general rule of external human action enforced by a sovereign political authority. All other rules for the guidance of human action are called laws merely by analogy; and any propositions which are not rules for human action are called laws by metaphor only.” The rules for the guidance of human action which are within the domain of the moral sciences and outside of the province of jurisprudence, because not enforceable by a sovereign political authority, he groups under the heads “Ethic and Nomology.” Ethic is the science of those rules which when known are themselves adopted by the will as its objects or numerous indeed, but equally fixed and invariable. The whole progress of plants, from the seed to the root, and from thence to the seed again;—the method of animal nu-<sup>[30]</sup>trition, digestion, secretion and all other branches of vital economy;—are not left to chance, or the will of the creature itself, but are performed in a wondrous involuntary manner, and guided by unerring rules laid down by the great Creator.

§ 38. 2. Law as a rule of human action.—This, then, is the general signification of law, a rule of action dictated by some superior being: and, in those creatures that have neither the power to think, nor to will, such laws must be invariably obeyed, so long as the creature itself subsists, for its existence depends on that obedience.<sup>2</sup> But laws, in their more confined sense, and in which it is our present business to consider them, denote the rules, not of aims. This rightness of will can never be enforced by external legislation. All that external legislation can do is to affect the external expression of the will in act. The science of this office of external regulation is called "nomology," and is defined, in the words of Kant, to be "science of the totality of the laws for which an external legislation is possible." This science of external action is divided, according to the authority by which the rules of which it treats are enforced, into (1) a science of rules enforced by an indeterminate authority; (2) a science of rules enforced by determinate authority. Under the first head are grouped the so-called laws of fashion, of honor, of morality, and of nature; under the second, rules imposed, or supposed to be imposed, upon mankind by God or gods, and generally known as divine laws.—HANNIS TAYLOR, the Science of Jurisprudence, 9.

<sup>2</sup> Laws of nature and laws of man.—The nature and extent of the analogy between laws in the strict or political sense, and the uniformities in the course of physical events which we call laws of nature, have often been discussed. Blackstone and earlier writers pressed the comparison with rhetorical inexactness, which has been rebuked by the later analytical school with some excess of severity, as if the likeness were merely verbal and misleading. Early in this century the correction was more modestly but not less effectually made by Blackstone's editor, Christian. "In all cases," he says, "where it" (the word "law") "is not applied to human conduct, it may be considered as a metaphor; and in every instance a more appropriate term may be found. . . . When we apply the word law to motion, matter, or the works of nature or of art, we shall find in every case that, with equal or greater propriety and perspicuity, we might have used the words quality, property, or peculiarity." Still the resemblance, notwithstanding all criticism, is a real one. The laws made by princes and rulers aim with more or less success, though never with perfect success, at producing uniformity of conduct within the field of action to which action in general, but of human action or conduct: that is, the precepts by which man, the noblest of all sublunary beings, a creature endowed with both reason and free will, is commanded to make use of those faculties in the general regulation of his behavior.

Man, considered as a creature, must necessarily be subject to the laws of his Creator, for he is entirely a dependent being. A being, they apply. We observe in the course of nature uniformities which are constant. This constancy, compared with the partial and uncertain obedience given to human ordinances, has in all times presented itself to men as the perfect fulfillment in another region of that which the lawgiver can only strive to attain. By laws we can, more or less, make men behave in particular ways; the constraints of express enactment or customary rules are sufficient to some extent, but not altogether, to determine their acts and forbearances. But the powers of nature always behave in the same ways, and this readily suggests to our mind a constraint which is always present and always efficient. Seed-time and harvest, the changes of the moon, the courses of the stars, come round without fail. Thus it would be with men's actions if the law were always obeyed, and therefore we seem to see in nature a law more perfect than man's because never broken. In some such way as this the phrase "laws of nature" has come into common use, and in the practice of modern writers almost any general proposition in any branch of science may be called a law. That this manner of speaking should come to be regarded as containing an explanation of the facts is but one of innumerable instances of the tyranny constantly usurped over man by his own creatures—words. But in following this track of resemblance we have introduced unawares an important difference. At first sight the laws of nature seem to differ from those of man only in being inviolate; and their excellence in this respect is indeed a not uncommon topic of natural theology. But, when we consider it more curiously, the distinction is one of kind. The laws of nature are not more excellent than acts of parliament, but belong to another category. Christian has expressed the point as well as anybody: "When law is applied to any other object than man, it ceases to contain two of its essential ingredient ideas—namely, disobedience and punishment." A law of nature is obeyed, as we say, because there is no room for disobedience. In the case of laws in the proper sense, the law is one thing and the obedience—or, as it may be, disobedience—of any man subject to it is another thing: in the case of a law of nature there is no such difference. Human statutes, and even divine ones according to the majority of theologians, are commands addressed to agents who may or may not follow them. Their object is a certain uniformity, but the uniformity does not necessarily ensue. Nay, the law would still be a law if no single person obeyed it on any one occasion. But a law of nature is inseparable from uniformity; or rather it is the uniformity itself.

These considerations are such as by this time are pretty familiar to students of jurisprudence. Men of science have hitherto not troubled themselves much independent of any other, has no rule to pursue, but such as he prescribes to himself; but a state of dependence will inevitably oblige the inferior to take the will of him, on whom he depends, as the rule of his conduct: not indeed in every particular, but in all with the question, or at any rate have not added anything to the legal view of it. As to the attempts of philosophers who were neither men of science nor lawyers to clear up the general notion of law, they are best left in charitable silence. But lately Professor Huxley, in his admirable introduction to Messrs. Macmillan and Co.'s series of Science Primers, has brought a fresh and powerful scientific mind to bear upon this ancient comparison or metaphor, and shown once more that no subject is too worn to be put in some new light. His paragraph on "Laws of Nature" is quite short, and a considerable part of it may be given in his own words:

"When we have made out by careful and repeated observation that something is always the cause of a certain effect, or that certain events always take place in the same order, we speak of the truth thus discovered as a law of nature. Thus it is a law of nature that anything heavy falls to the ground if it is unsupported. . . . But it is desirable to remember that which is very often forgotten, that the laws of nature are not the causes of the order of nature, but only our way of stating as much as we have made out of that order. Stones do not fall to the ground in consequence of the law just stated, as people sometimes carelessly say; but the law is a way of asserting that which invariably happens when heavy bodies at the surface of the earth, stones among the rest, are free to move.

"The laws of nature are, in fact, in this respect similar to the laws which men make for the guidance of their conduct towards one another. There are laws about the payment of taxes, and there are laws against stealing or murder. But the law is not the cause of a man's paying his taxes, nor is it the cause of his abstaining from theft or murder. The law is simply a statement of what will happen to a man if he does not pay his taxes, and if he commits theft or murder; and the cause of his paying his taxes or abstaining from crime (in the absence of any better motive) is the fear of consequences which is the effect of his belief in that statement. A law of man tells [us] what we may expect society will do under certain circumstances; and a law of nature tells us what we may expect natural objects will do under certain circumstances. Each contains information addressed to our intelligence, and, except so far as it influences our intelligence, it is merely so much sound or writing.

"While there is this much analogy between human and natural laws, however, certain essential differences between the two must not be overlooked. Human law consists of commands addressed to voluntary agents, which they may obey or disobey; and the law is not rendered null and void by being broken. Natural laws, on the other hand, are not commands, but assertions respecting the invariable order of nature; and they remain laws only so long as they can be shown to express that order. To speak of the violation or the suspension of a law of nature is an absurdity. All that the phrase can really mean is that, those points wherein his dependence consists. This principle, therefore, has more or less extent and effect, in proportion as the superiority of the one and the dependence of the other is greater or less, absolute or limited. And consequently, as man depends absolutely upon his Maker for everything, it is necessary that he should in all points conform to his Maker's will.

§ 39. 3. Law of nature.—This will of his Maker is called the law of nature.<sup>3</sup> For as God, when He created matter, and endued under certain circumstances, the assertion contained in the law is not true; and the just conclusion is, not that the order of nature is interrupted, but that we have made a mistake in stating that order. A true natural law is an universal rule, and, as such, admits of no exceptions."

Professor Huxley, it will be seen, fully recognizes the difference insisted upon by Bentham and his followers in this country; and on that point we do not see how his exposition can be bettered. We can only rejoice that truths which down to our own time were ignored or imperfectly apprehended by the majority of learned men are now presented in clear, simple, and forcible language to everyone who sets about acquiring even the rudiments of scientific training.—POLLOCK, Essays in Jurisprudence and Ethics, 42.

3 The law of nature.—All legal rules are supposed to be reasonable and natural; even the worst have probably some considerations of reason to support them, and the more important doctrines of a legal system generally correspond to some deeply-rooted requirements of society. Even slavery was justified by the Greeks on grounds of the natural inferiority of barbarians and of vanquished nations. In this way it may be rightly said that important rules have a twofold justification, as legal commands and as reasonable propositions. But by saying so much we do not mean that there can be a proper system of law constructed on the basis of pure reason or of "human nature," as opposed to law produced by legislation, judicial decisions or custom. Yet this view has been put forward again and again in the course of history, and it has had a great influence in shaping the development of law. It has been said rather contemptuously that the law of nature is "jurisprudence in the air": and the definition need not be repudiated by supporters of this kind of law, for after all the air constitutes one of the most important elements of life, both for good and for evil.

The Greeks were struck by the great variety of positive laws, and asked themselves whether justice and right were only casual arrangements changing with circumstances and times, or whether behind this confusing variety there existed perennial notions of right and wrong, justice and injustice. While sophists and sceptics held the first view, idealistic philosophers from the time of Socrates, Plato and Aristotle, maintained the second. In contrast with shifting positive rules, they spoke of unwritten law ingrained in the heart of man, of a common law recurring among different tribes, of a law of nature which it with a principle of mobility, established certain rules for the perpetual direction of that motion; so, when He created man, and endued him with free will to conduct himself in all parts of life, He reasonable creatures were everywhere bound to recognize; and in Xenophon's reminiscences of Socrates we read that the family relations between man and wife, parents and children, were cited as concrete examples of these ever-recurring rules of the law of nature.

These were speculations of philosophers, but the great practitioners of law in Rome indorsed them with their authority. They had to deal with numberless legal enactments and customs over which their tribunals exercised sovereign authority. It was not a speculative, but an actual, problem for their prætors and proconsuls to reduce this heterogeneous mass to unity and reasonable order. In this way the question of the moral background to changing laws arose in full force, and the Romans eagerly took up the threads of Greek doctrine about a law of nature, as the reasonable basis of all particular laws and more especially of the common law of the empire. Ulpian was inclined to widen the boundaries of this law of nature so as to include even animals: perhaps he took his clue in this respect from the teaching of the Pythagoreans, for whom there was no gulf between animals and man. Others contented themselves with building on the foundations of the rational nature of man, and from this point of view treated a number of legal rules as necessary deductions from reason.

The jurist Paul remarks: "As leases are suggested by nature itself and are to be found in the law of all nations, a particular form of words is not necessary for their validity, but only consent. The same holds good in regard to sale." Wardship, again, is characterized by Gaius (Circ. A. D. 150) as an institution founded on natural reason, while the compilers of the Institutes under Justinian also speak of natural law in this case. (Gaius, I, 189; Inst. I, 20, 6.)

The tendency of the doctrine was, however, not suggested merely by practical considerations: its strongest elements were derived from philosophical ethics. Men like Papinian and Paul, Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius, were under the sway of stoicism: they saw and worshipped the rule of nature in the world at large. Little wonder that they were convinced that reason and right were also the voice of nature, the clearest manifestation of divine power in the world!

In another setting, the same idealistic construction is observed in mediæval jurisprudence where it arose under the influence of Christianity and of the church. Though, according to the teaching of St. Augustine, the City of God is in Heaven and the city of the world is a creation of robbers, yet the road to the City of God lay through this world, and mankind had to prepare itself for future life by making the best of the time of trial on earth. God has not forsaken mankind in this trial: He has revealed His law to them and implanted it in their hearts as conscience and reason. The commonwealths of the earth build up laws of their own which partly serve the purpose of the moral education of men and partly reflect the selfish and sinful purposes of rulers, but in laid down certain immutable laws of human nature, [40] whereby that free will is in some degree regulated and restrained, and gave him also the faculty of reason to discover the purport of those laws.

case of conflict men ought to conform to the eternal law of nature, of which the church is the principal interpreter.

Again, after the revival of learning and of secular culture, in the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, philosophers deduced a theory of law from a few principles of reason, in the same way as they constructed systems of metaphysics and ethics, of politics and of natural philosophy. With Kant the theory of the law of reason reached its highest point.

Sometimes attempts have been made to recognize reason as a source of positive law both in ancient and modern times. The Austrian Code (1811), for example, contains the following clause: "When a case cannot be decided in accordance either with the words or the spirit of a law, the court shall take into consideration similar cases decided by law, as well as the motives which suggested other laws of the same kind. Should the case still remain doubtful, it shall be decided in accordance with the law of nature, and with due regard to the circumstances of the case diligently collected and thoroughly considered."

Attempts of this kind to give the theory of the law of nature a direct bearing on the practice of courts have not been successful, while, on the other hand, the indirect influence of such theories in affecting the opinions of judges and legislators has been very great. The mitigation of slavery in the Roman empire, e. g., may be traced to a change of views expressed, among other things, in the proposition that men are free by nature and that slavery was introduced by the jus gentium, the positive law common to most nations (as distinct from the jus naturale, or natural law).

In the same way doctrines based on the law of nature have had a powerful influence on the formation of international law, on the reforms of public law in a democratic direction effected by means of the notion of contract, and on the radical alteration of the law of status by the doctrine of equality before the law.

There can be no doubt, for instance, that doctrines about the "rights of man," whatever may be thought of their concrete formulation, have exerted a potent influence on contemporary legal conceptions, and have themselves been derived from speculative doctrines of natural jurisprudence.

In English courts, references to the law of nature have never been favorably considered: but the indirect influence of doctrines based on it has been felt. In the famous case of the negro slave Somerset, which was decided in 1771 (shortly before the secession of the colonies), the slave was claimed by his master, a Virginian planter, while in England. Hargrave, counsel for Somerset, directed part of his argument against the assumption that slavery could be justified by the law of nature. He adopted Locke's reasoning that contract could not be the origin of slavery, because a man cannot divest himself of his right to life or to personal freedom. In regard to conquest and punishment as possible origins of slavery, Hargrave maintained that at the utmost they

Considering the Creator only as a Being of infinite power, He was able unquestionably to have prescribed whatever laws He pleased to His creature, man, however unjust or severe. But as He is also might justify the enslaving of criminals and of vanquished enemies. But on no account were they sufficient to explain slavery inherited by birth. In giving the judgment which debarred the planter from asserting a right of mastery over the slave, Lord Mansfield declared that "slavery . . . is so odious, that nothing can be suffered to support it, but positive law. Whatever inconveniences," he continued, "may follow from the decision, I cannot say this case is allowed or approved by the law of England; and therefore the black must be discharged."

Another case in which the atmosphere of enlightened rationalism characteristic of the eighteenth century is strongly felt is Omychund v. Barker (1744), in which Lord Hardwicke laid it down that heathens might take a legally valid oath according to the ceremonies of their religion, because the essence of an oath is the belief in a Supreme Being capable of rewarding and punishing, and not the particular forms prescribed by Christian confessions.

Thus the law of nature or reason has operated as a literary, but not as a direct, source of law. It is a creation of jurisprudence and philosophy. It is no more a source of law in the technical sense of the term than the teaching of pandectists or of modern exponents of legal rules. The fact that it has been a most powerful ferment in the evolution of legal ideas does not make it a code to the clauses of which judges can turn in the administration of justice.

It cannot be treated as a code for this simple reason, amongst others, that it is not constant. In reviewing the course of its history, we can easily perceive that in all matters bearing on concrete problems of law it is subject to changes quite as important, if not so frequent and casual, as the changes of positive law. Can one speak, for instance, of a family law based on nature or reason? Would it be based on polygamy, or on strict monogamy as in the canon law, or on contractual monogamy, as at present, or on free selection of mates, as may conceivably be the case two or three centuries hence, or on eugenic selection by public authority, as some very advanced sociologists are urging? And is the relation between parents and children clearly prescribed by the law of nature? Children have been in charge of their mothers and under the absolute sway of their fathers, and at the educational disposal of the city state, and in the temporary care of both parents. Who knows whether the social element may not again prevail over the private organization of education? Is property likely to prove an institution of a perennial law of nature? The origins of property have been communistic; in its further history it has been treated more and more from the private, the individualistic point of view; it cannot be disputed that socialistic ideas are rapidly gaining ground in regard to it, that organized society claims a larger and increasing share in its distribution and use; can it be maintained that, say, the nationalization of the land or the monopoly of means of production by the state would be against the law of nature? People may consider such measures wrong, dangerous or mischieva Being of infinite wisdom, He has laid down only such laws as were founded in those relations of justice, that existed in the nature of things antecedent to any positive precept. These are the eternal, immutable laws of good and evil, to which the Creator Himself in all His dispensations conforms; and which He has enabled human ous, but they cannot be rejected by a simple appeal to eternal tenets of the law of reason. Again, punishment has certainly been regarded as a natural sequel to crime by all commonwealths, although most exalted moralists would have preferred to reserve punishment to God and to treat crime as a sin. But even in the actual practice of the law, are people agreed about the aim and scope of punishment? Is it a means of repression and amputation (Plato)? Is it a measure of educational discipline (Aristotle)? Is it principally a deterrent (Bentham)? Is it a necessary moral atonement (Kant)? Is it a measure of medical treatment (Lombroso)? In a word, one has not to go far to perceive that the contents of the law of nature are shifting, and that it would be impossible to reduce it to a unified and permanent code.

Does this mean that the law of nature or reason is a fanciful and absurd misconception? I am afraid the absurdity lies in supposing that a doctrine which has played such a part in the history of the world, which has appealed to minds of men of widely contrasting dispositions in entirely different circumstances, does not rest on solid foundations. Nor is it difficult to see what these foundations are. The law of nature is an appeal from Cæsar to a better informed Cæsar. It is an appeal by society at large, or by the best spirits of a given society, not against single decisions or rules, but against entire systems of positive law. Legislators are called in to amend law by separate statutes; judges may do a great deal in amending the law by decisions in individual cases, but the wisdom of legislators and the equity of judges are by themselves powerless against systems, because they start from a recognition of the authority of positive law in general. And yet law, being a human institution, ages not only in its single rules and doctrines, but in its national and historical setting, and the call for purification and reform may become more and more pressing with every generation. Public opinion, then, turns from reality to ideals. Speculation arises as to the essentials of law as conceived in the light of justice. Of course these conceptions of justice are themselves historical, but they are drawn not from the complicated compromises of positive law but from the simpler and more scientific teaching of philosophical doctrine. Thus the contents of the law of nature vary with the ages, but their aim is constant, it is justice; and though this species of law operates not in positive enactments, but in the minds of men, it is needless to urge that he who obtains command over minds will in the end master their institutions.

Reform and revolution cannot be produced by mere doctrines: material forces and circumstances have to be taken into account as well: moral lethargy may prove too great, the body politic too decrepit or too corrupt for sweeping changes. But the spread of doctrine claiming to pronounce judgment on posi-reason to discover, so far as they are necessary for the conduct of human actions. Such, among others, are these principles: that we should live honestly, should hurt nobody, and should render to tive law for the sake of justice is surely a force not to be disregarded or slighted by practical men.

It is significant that we are witnessing a revival of appeals to the law of nature in our own time. It comes from two sides. On the one hand there is a widely spreading conviction that existing systems of law are getting out of touch with fundamental requirements of modern society. It is not necessary nowadays to be a socialist in order to feel that the existing systems of positive law, which have sprung into being under the influence of feudal conceptions and of theories of free contract, will have to be largely transformed in order to meet the requirements of rising democracy. Schemes of reform and attempts at remedial legislation are being initiated everywhere; and though it would be out of the question for us to review such schemes and attempts in detail, we may notice that their growth undoubtedly testifies to a change in the leading conceptions of law.

There is another more modest contention, the admission of which, however, would undoubtedly strengthen the hands of partisans of reform. It is represented conspicuously by certain modern followers of Kant, headed by Stammler. Though granting that a law of nature as a set of perennial rules does not exist, they contend that every age ought to have its own law of nature, or rather its own "right-law" by the side of its positive law. That is, they maintain that rules of positive law have to justify their existence by reference to standards set up by the philosophical doctrine of the age. If laws are found wanting from this point of view, they ought to be corrected either by legislation or by judicial practice. Stammler's own attempt to formulate four standards by which "right-law" ought to be estimated cannot be said to be successful. It is heavily dogmatic, and leads to mere scholasticism. But the main view that in an enlightened age positive law has to be estimated by the standard of moral ideals seems to be incontestable.

I may add that in thus pleading for wider equity and greater latitude in interpreting and applying law, Stammler does not stand by any means alone. His view is substantiated by the spirit and acceptance of modern codes. The precise codification of laws might be expected to repress the growth of equity: but as a matter of fact, the promulgation of codes seems to have given a new impetus to the development of a critical and reforming spirit among Continental jurists.

We tread here on ground which does not belong properly to the law of nature in the original meaning of the term. But the less ostentatious teaching as to "right-law" and "equitable" law goes much further than the discretion of judges recognized at present by English courts would warrant. Appeals to reason and to the essence or nature of legal relations aim at systematic reforms of the law which may help to avoid social revolution.—VINOGRADOFF, Common-Sense in Law, 234.

everyone his due; to which three general precepts Justinian* has reduced the whole doctrine of law.<sup>4</sup>

But if the discovery of these first principles of the law of nature depended only upon the due exertion of right reason, and could not otherwise be obtained than by a chain of metaphysical disquisitions, mankind would have wanted some inducement to have quickened their inquiries, and the greater part of the world would have rested content in mental indolence, and ignorance its inseparable companion. As, therefore, the Creator is a Being, not only of infinite power, and wisdom, but also of infinite goodness, He has been pleased so to contrive the constitution and frame of humanity, that we should want no other prompter to inquire after and pursue the rule of right, but only our own self-love, that universal principle of action. For He has so intimately connected, so inseparably interwoven the laws of eternal justice with the happiness of each individual, that the latter cannot be attained but by observing the former; and, if the former be punctually obeyed, it cannot but induce the latter. In consequence of which mutual connection of justice and human felicity, He [41] has not perplexed the law of nature with a multitude of abstracted rules and precepts, referring merely to the fitness or unfitness of things, as some have vainly surmised; but has graciously reduced the rule of obedience to this one paternal precept, "that man should pursue his own true and substantial happiness." This is the foundation of what we call ethics, or natural law. For the several articles into which it is branched in our systems, amount to no more than demonstrating, that this or that action tends to man's real happiness, and therefore very justly concluding that the performance of it is a part of the law of nature; or, on the other hand, that this or that action is destructive of man's real happiness, and therefore that the law of nature forbids it.

* Juris præcepta sunt hæc, honeste vivere, alterum non lædere, suum cuique tribuere. Inst. I. 1. 3. (The precepts of the law are these, to live honorably, not to injure another, and to give to everyone his due.)

4 Ulpian's juris præcepta.—All members of a civilized commonwealth are under a general duty towards their neighbors to do them no hurt without lawful cause or excuse. The precise extent of the duty, as well as the nature and extent of the recognized exceptions, varies according to the nature of the case. But this does not affect the generality of the principle, any more than the infinite variety of matters about which contracts may be made, and the considerable though finite number of different known kinds of contracts, with special rules as to the effect and fulfillment of each of them, affect the truth of the general proposition that we must perform our contracts. In fact, the principle was enunciated long ago by Ulpian in his familiar statement of the commandments of the law, preserved in the introductory chapter of Justinian's Institutes: "Juris præcepta sunt hæc: honeste vivere, alterum non lædere, suum cuique tribuere." Without endeavoring to force on Ulpian or his Stoic masters a more exact meaning than they had, we may find in his words a broad summary of a lawful man's duties which is founded on the permanent elements in human affairs, and is therefore still true and useful. Honeste vivere is to lead a life free from crime and scandal. Suum cuique tribuere is, literally, to give every man his due; that is, in fact, not to encroach or make unfounded claims on what belongs to others, and to perform whatever one has legally bound oneself to perform. Alterum non lædere is to forbear from inflicting unlawful harm in general. As the English church catechism has adapted Ulpian's words, it belongs to my duty towards my neighbor "To hurt nobody by word nor deed: To be true and just in all my dealing."—POLLOCK, Torts (9th ed.), 1.

This law of nature, being coeval with mankind and dictated by God Himself, is of course superior in obligation to any other. It is binding over all the globe in all countries, and at all times: no human laws are of any validity, if contrary to this; and such of them as are valid derive all their force, and all their authority, mediately or immediately, from this original.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>5</sup> May judges disregard acts of parliament?—Besides this statement by Blackstone there are "expressions sometimes used by modern judges which imply that the courts might refuse to enforce statutes going beyond the proper limits (internationally speaking) of parliamentary authority. But to words such as those of Blackstone, and to the obiter dicta of the bench, we must give a very qualified interpretation. There is no legal basis for the theory that judges, as exponents of morality, may overrule acts of parliament. Language which might seem to imply this amounts in reality to nothing more than the assertion that the judges when attempting to ascertain what is the meaning to be affixed to an act of parliament, will presume that parliament did not intend to violate the ordinary rules of morality, or the principles of international law, and will therefore, whenever possible, give such an interpretation to a statutory enactment as may be consistent with the doctrines both of private and of international morality. A modern judge would never listen to a barrister who argued that an act of parliament was invalid because it was immoral, or because it went beyond the limits of parliamentary authority. The plain truth is that our tribunals uniformly act on the principle that a law alleged to be a bad law is ex hypothesi a law, and therefore entitled to obedience by the courts."—DICEY, Law of the Constitution (3d ed.), 59.

But in order to apply this to the particular exigencies of each individual, it is still necessary to have recourse to reason: whose office it is to discover, as was before observed, what the law of nature directs in every circumstance of life; by considering, what method will tend the most effectually to our own substantial happiness. And if our reason were always, as in our first ancestor before his transgression, clear and perfect, unruffled by passions, unclouded by prejudice, unimpaired by disease or intemperance, the task would be pleasant and easy; we should need no other guide but this. But every man now finds the contrary in his own experience; that his reason is corrupt, and his understanding full of ignorance and error.

§ 40. 4. Revealed law.—This has given manifold occasion for the benign interposition of divine providence; which, in compassion to the frailty, the imperfection, and the blindness of human reason hath been pleased, at sundry times and in divers manners, to discover and enforce its laws by an immediate and direct revelation. The doctrines thus delivered we call the revealed or divine law, and they are to be found only in the Holy Scriptures. These precepts, when revealed, are found upon comparison to be really a part of the original law of nature, as they tend in all their consequences to man's felicity. But we are not from thence to conclude that the knowledge of these truths was attainable by reason, in its present corrupted state; since we find that, until they were revealed, they were hid from the wisdom of ages. As then the moral precepts of this law are indeed of the same original with those of the law of nature, so their intrinsic obligation is of equal strength and perpetuity. Yet undoubtedly the revealed law is *of infinitely more authenticity than that moral system, which is framed by ethical writers, and denominated* the natural law. Because one is the law of nature, expressly declared so to be by God Himself; the other is only what, by the assistance of human reason, we imagine to be that law. If we could be as certain of the latter

* In the first edition "(primarily speaking) of infinitely more authority than what we generally call."

as we are of the former, both would have an equal authority; but, till then, they can never be put in any competition together.<sup>6</sup>

Upon these two foundations, the law of nature and the law of revelation, depend all human laws; that is to say, no human laws should be suffered to contradict these. There are, it is true, a great number of indifferent points, in which both the divine law and the natural leave a man at his own liberty; but which are found necessary for the benefit of society to be restrained within certain limits. And herein it is that human laws have their greatest force and efficacy: for, with regard to such points as are not indifferent, <sup>6</sup> Religion and law.—An interesting account of the identification in former ages of religion and law, and the gradual secularization of law, may be found in W. G. Miller's Data of Jurisprudence, pages 416 ff. He concludes the discussion as follows (p. 426):

"The chief rules in our law, borrowed directly from the Bible, are the list of degrees within which marriage is forbidden. Many accept the rules who would dispute the doctrine that they were binding solely because they were a divine revelation. Another rule, which is traced to the Hebrew Code in Exodus, is as to the liability for an animal which has been in the habit of doing damage. But this rule is adopted not because it was revealed, but because it is rational, and therefore natural and customary. Authority is found in revelation for many diverse laws of marriage and divorce. Mohammedans find authority for having four wives in the example of Jacob, and for a very simple form of divorce. Christians are monogamous as a general rule; some Christians hold marriage to be indissoluble and refuse divorce. Scots law quotes Scripture for divorce on the ground of desertion (Confession of Faith, xxiv, 6).

"The logical outcome of Blackstone's doctrine may be seen in the caricature of it by the early settlers in the New England states. They carried the laws of England with them, and Blackstone's doctrine in so crude a form that they incorporated chapters of the Jewish Scriptures in their published statutes, as being the law of God. De Tocqueville has pointed out the grossly iniquitous results—intolerance, persecution, and tyranny. (Democracy in America, Reeve's Trans. (1889), 1, 34; 2 Kent, Comm. 34. Cf. Bryce, American Commonwealth, c. 107.)

"This wholesale verbal adoption of the divine law might do little harm in the time of Alfred the Great (Thorpe, 20 et seq.), because the machinery of enforcement was different, the civil courts more lax and inefficient, the church more powerful than in modern times, and above all, the state of society and public opinion more uniform. It was sheer force of circumstances—the fact that society was more than religion—that religion was made for man, and not man for religion—which has produced toleration, freedom, and religious liberty both in Britain and America.

"The change of view sketched above as to the relation of religion to law has affected the relations of church and state, and the conduct of the individual human laws are only declaratory of, and act in subordination to, the former. To instance in the case of murder: this is expressly forbidden by the divine, and demonstrably by the natural law; and from these prohibitions arises the true unlawfulness of this crime. Those human laws that annex a punishment to it do not at all increase its moral guilt, or <sup>[43]</sup> superadd any fresh obligation in foro conscientiæ (in the court of conscience) to abstain from its perpetration. Nay, if any human law should allow or enjoin us to commit it, we are bound to transgress that human law, or else members of these bodies. When congresses of clergy and presbyteries press legal reforms on the government, it is only as citizens. They more often appeal to utilitarian reasons than to the revealed law of God. Even members of the Catholic church are compelled to adopt a similar attitude. When they demand what they think justice, they do not plead the law of God or of the church as a title so often as the fact that they are citizens, taxpayers, and ratepayers.

"We see, then, what is said to be revealed:—

- "(1) In the earliest stage the Deity deals with details of procedure, and reveals separate judgments on every case. This is still the Chinese view.
- "(2) As states become organized, and as the judicial function of administering law in accordance with custom, good faith and the observance of contracts becomes separated, the revelation takes the form of legislation—as with the Hebrews and the Hindus, who received codes in this way.
- "(3) As the conception of the relation of the Deity to the universe changes so does His relation to law. The legislation becomes more and more general. As the legislator lays down a general rule for the judge, so does God lay down a general rule for legislators. 'Divine' law becomes 'Eternal' law, which cannot change, as God is justice Himself.
- "(4) But laws regulate rights. If God reveals rules to settle collisions of rights, how were rights created? The Book of Genesis, and the theories of Grotius and others founded thereon, show that God gave man dominion over things and living creatures. He instituted the legal relations of property and marriage, parent and child, and inferentially all others, and the rights flowing therefrom. If we know the rights which are divine, the divine reason in us may find the laws.
- "(5) In like manner many moralists hold that what is revealed is duties—to God, to men, and to one's self.
- "(6) The doctrine then dwindles down to that of Erskine, that God created the world and human beings. Rights are involved in human nature and laws are involved in rights; and thus they are all ultimately divine."

we must offend both the natural and the divine.<sup>7</sup> But with regard to matters that are in themselves indifferent, and are not commanded or forbidden by those superior laws; such, for instance, as exporting of wool into foreign countries; here the inferior legislature has scope and opportunity to interpose, and to make that action unlawful which before was not so.

§ 41. 5. Law of nations.—If man were to live in a state of nature, unconnected with other individuals, there would be no occasion for any other laws, than the law of nature, and the law of God. Neither could any other law possibly exist: for a law always supposes some superior who is to make it; and in a state of nature we are all equal, without any other superior but him who is the author of our being. But man was formed for society; and, as is demonstrated by the writers on this subject,<sup>b</sup> is neither capable of living alone, nor indeed has the courage to do it. However, as it is impossible for the whole race of mankind to be united in one great society, they must necessarily divide into many; and form separate states, commonwealths, and nations, entirely independent of each other, and yet liable to a mutual intercourse. Hence arises a third kind of law to regulate this mutual intercourse called “the law of nations”; which, as none of these states will acknowledge a superiority in the other, cannot be dictated by any; but depends entirely upon the rules of natural law, or upon mutual compacts, treaties, leagues, and agreements between these several communities: in the construction also of which compacts we have no other rule to resort to, but the law of nature; being the only one to which both communities are equally subject: and therefore the civil law<sup>c</sup> very justly observes, that quod naturalis ratio inter omnes homines con-

<sup>b</sup> Puffendorf, l. 7. c. 1. compared with Barbeyrac's Commentary.

<sup>c</sup> Ff. 1. 1. 9.

---

<sup>7</sup> “Such statements are not to be regarded as legal propositions. In deciding doubtful points of law our courts can give due weight to moral considerations; but where our law, whether by statute or otherwise, is clear, they are bound to administer the law as they find it, irrespective of opinions upon its morality. (If it were mischievous in its operation and necessarily mischievous, it would, to my mind, be no argument, if the statute expressly authorized the thing”; per Ld. Halsbury, [1896] App. Cas. 467. “Our duty upon this occasion is to administer and not to make the law”; per Ld. Herschell, [1897] App. Cas. 460).”—BROOM, Legal Maxims (8th ed.), 13.

stituit, vocatur jus gentium (that rule which natural reason has dictated to all men, is called the law of nations).<sup>8</sup>

§ 42. 6. Municipal law.—[44] Thus much I thought it necessary to premise concerning the law of nature, the revealed law, <sup>8</sup> Jus gentium.—Two distinct uses of the expression jus gentium are to be discriminated: First, the Roman jurists define jus gentium as comprising the principles of right and wrong recognized in the laws of all peoples or bodies of men politically organized. Justinian, having separated public from private law, reproduces from Ulpian a threefold division of Roman private law into precepts of natural law (jus naturale), of the law common to all nations or gentile law (jus gentium), and of the civil law or law peculiar to the citizens of Rome (jus civile). Gaius makes a twofold division, in which natural law and gentile law are regarded as synonymous and opposed to civil law. Such a division, however, has but little foundation in the facts of Roman law, and possesses no scientific value; and its philosophical air and emptiness constitute its sole interest. It probably owes its start to the ethical maxim of the Stoics inculcating the duty of conforming to nature; and this insignificant and purely theoretical matter appears to be the only trace of Stoical influence (it cannot be called impression) on Roman law. This fanciful jus gentium, corresponding so closely to natural law, is a late generalization on the basis of the real and most important jus gentium now to be mentioned.

Second, the original jus gentium was the practical outcome of the necessity that pressed upon the Romans to provide rules of law for the settlement of disputes between Roman citizens and aliens, and between aliens and aliens. It was that portion of the Roman law that grew up, typically and chiefly, in the edict of the alien prætor. The civil law being applicable to citizens alone, the prætor and the arbitrators must necessarily decide causes between aliens and between citizens and aliens, in accordance with their notions of what was equitable and just (æquum et bonum), influenced, of course, by such usages and notions as commonly prevailed in dealings between aliens and between citizens and aliens. This body of equitable principles constituted the jus gentium as opposed generally to jus civium. While the edict of the alien prætor constituted it law for aliens, the edict of the city prætor imposed it as law upon Roman citizens. Jus gentium, accordingly, is not a collection of rules common to the law of all political societies of men, but a collection of rules governing the intercourse of Roman citizens, with the members of all foreign nations reduced to subjection to Rome. Gradually precepts of the jus gentium were transferred to regulate the mutual intercourse of citizens, by two main agencies—the edict of the city prætor and the writings of the jurists.—HUNTER, Roman Law, 35.

The student is advised to read the third chapter of Maine's Ancient Law and Sir Frederick Pollock's note thereon. And in Sohm's Institutes of Roman Law (translated by Ledlie, 3d ed., pp. 70–131), he may find how the jus civile in the narrower sense as the law of a city, the law, that is, which obtained and the law of nations, before I proceeded to treat more fully of the principal subject of this section, municipal or civil law; that is, the rule by which particular districts, communities, or nations are governed; being thus defined by Justinian,<sup>d</sup> “jus civile est quod quisque sibi populus constituit” (the civil law is that which each nation has established for itself). I call it municipal law, in compliance with common speech; for, though strictly that expression denotes the particular customs of one single municipium or free town, yet it may with sufficient propriety be applied to any one state or nation, which is governed by the same laws and customs.

§ 43. a. Definition of municipal law.—Municipal law, thus understood, is properly defined to be “a rule of civil conduct, prescribed by the supreme power in a state, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong.”<sup>e</sup> Let us endeavor to explain its several properties, as they arise out of this definition.

<sup>d</sup> Inst. 1. 2. 1.

---

only among cives, or citizens of the Roman community, came to be transformed, through the influence of the jus gentium, into a new “civil law,” or general law for all mankind.

<sup>e</sup> Definition of law.—In the preceding lectures, law has been seen in the process of forming, and in operation, under past and present conditions of society; the question now is, What is this phenomenon itself which we call law? What is it that is the resultant of conflicting social forces? The current English and American definition, given a hundred and forty years ago by Blackstone, runs thus: “Law is a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in a state, commanding what is right and forbidding what is wrong.” That this is unsatisfactory has often been declared, but the definition is still accepted in law schools and in text-books around the world, and we cannot ignore it. That it is dangerous as well as unsound under modern conditions, whether of equality or of inequality, is worth pointing out at some length. We, at any rate, must get rid of it.

The chief objection is, that the definition as a whole naturally suggests, and in connection with Blackstone’s context and the practice of the time clearly teaches, that the sovereign of a people may be external, and by implication that the law begins with, and is founded upon, abstract principles. Its language indeed suggests a theocratic original; the definition, especially in connection with the discussion accompanying it, reads like an attempt to generalize the decalogue, with the substitution of the words “prescribed by the supreme power in a state” for, “And God spake all these words”; the analogy being plain, that the supreme power in a state is external to the people, as God is external to His people, and so declares the law forever. And now observe the § 44. (1) It is a "rule."—And, first, it is a rule: not a transient, sudden order from a superior to or concerning a particular person; but something permanent, uniform, and universal. Therefore, a particular act of the legislature to confiscate the goods of Titius, or to attain him of high treason, does not enter into the idea of a municipal law: for the operation of this act is spent upon Titius only, and has no relation to the community in general; it is rather a sentence than a law. But an act to declare that the actual language of the context. "The general signification of law," the author of the Commentaries says, is that of a "rule of action dictated by some superior being." It is true Blackstone says this in his preliminary discussion concerning law in general, before he has reached the subject of municipal law; but he finds the very type of all law in the words just quoted. The only difference he makes—and this in the very next sentence—between the "general signification of law" and law "in the more confined sense," is that law in this latter sense consists of "rules of human action or conduct." There is no suggestion of any difference in regard to the sovereign, on the point of externality. Indeed, a little further on, where Blackstone is considering the "law of nature," he speaks in the same terms of all law. In a state of nature "there would be no occasion for any other laws than the law of nature and the law of God. Neither could any other law possibly exist; for a law always supposes some superior who is to make it." Blackstone's law was an echo of theology—theology too of the eighteenth century.

It is true that in the course of his remarks Blackstone finds occasion to quote Justinian's precept, "Jus civile est quod quisque sibi populus constituit", but he is making the quotation, not to show that the sovereign must not be external, but to justify his own use of the term "municipal or civil law," as the law governing "districts, communities, or nations." The whole preliminary discussion is based on the proposition that human laws all depend upon the divine; and the conclusion is plain, in the absence, in a discussion of distinctions, of any suggestion to the contrary, that as the Author of the divine laws is external to those upon whom such laws are to operate, so the supreme power in a state, from which proceed the laws which are to operate in civil affairs, is external to the people. It is a fact to be noticed that the rule of conduct is prescribed by supreme power, not in the state, but "in a state"; any state satisfies the definition. Plainly, if Blackstone's definition was to make any distinction at all, the point that there could be no external sovereign in his conception of law was important enough to require him to make it clear beyond a doubt.

What the face of the definition and the context tell us, the practice of the time so fully exemplifies that one cannot be permitted to doubt that the definition was to be taken as consistent with the practice, or, more likely, as based upon it. Blackstone of course knew what was going on, at the very time of his definition, between Great Britain and her American colonies; could there crime of which Titius is accused shall be deemed high treason; this has permanency, uniformity, and universality, and therefore is properly a rule. It also is called a rule, to distinguish it from advice or counsel, which we are at liberty to follow or not, as we see proper, and to judge upon the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the thing advised: whereas our obedience to the law depends have been a better time to repudiate external sovereignty! Blackstone gave no sign—his definition was given, it remained unchanged. The Commentaries were already famous at the time of the American revolution; at home they were held an authority as the work of one who had been appointed a justice of the common pleas in the year 1770, just after the Commentaries were completed. The dispute with America was a plain one. Parliament claimed the right to make laws for the colonies “in all cases whatsoever”; America held that parliament was an external power touching matters of domestic concern in this country, and severed her connection with the mother state.

The idea and the practice prevailed throughout Europe; everywhere on that side of the Atlantic the conception of law, in conformity with theology, included external sovereignty. The “social contract” itself had been taken, even in England, to support absolute monarchy. Hobbes had held that, in virtue of that contract, interpreted by his idea of the state as the end and aim of all things social, the people had contracted away their rights in favor of the king. All this was object lesson for Blackstone, and Blackstone was faithful to it. His definition can have but one meaning: it could be accepted by the autocrat of all the Russias. A remark is proper here. The reason why a sovereign who is external is such, is not because the head of the state has his home beyond the sea; it is because he has no authority. “Lynch law,” or the “law” of a vigilance committee, proceeds from an external sovereign. The moment your external sovereign receives rightful authority, that moment he ceases to be external. The supreme power of the state is not, under American law, an external sovereign, if that power is justly exercised over a people. It certainly is not external in any objectionable sense as it ordinarily exists in a state. Supreme power is but a necessary phase of organized society, of which every member is a part. In the nature of things the state is only (for the present purpose) what the word etymologically declares, a standing—a standing or holding together of the people; and that imports supreme power. It is external in reference only to individuals, as power always must be. Blackstone’s definition would permit the power to be external to the whole body of citizens, whereas supreme power should be one with them, and nothing more.

It must further be particularly observed that the objection to the external sovereign is, not that he cannot lay down law—whatever the courts will enforce is law, because it binds—the objection is that his control is dangerous, that the law he lays down is a bad kind of law, likely to result in disorder and revolt.

The definition is also unsound in detail. “Law is a rule of civil conduct.” This statement, taken as a whole, is indefinite where one is entitled to call not upon our approbation, but upon the Maker's will. Counsel is only matter of persuasion, law is matter of injunction; counsel acts only upon the willing, law upon the unwilling also.

[45] It is also called a rule to distinguish it from a compact or agreement; for a compact is a promise proceeding from us, law is a command directed to us. The language of a compact is, "I will, or will not, do this"; that of a law is, "thou shalt, or shalt not, do it." It is true there is an obligation which a compact carries with for definite information. One may well expect the definition to tell us on what ground the rule of civil conduct is based. Is it based upon some eternal principle, or on convenience, or on power? No answer on the face of the definition is given. The word "rule" too, well enough if understood as probably it was intended, needs explanation beyond any it receives. Besides meaning regulation, rule naturally suggests requirement; and the words "commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong" show that that is the intended meaning. Now much of the law, taken in a straightforward way of stating it—in the only language, it may be, in which it is expressed, especially in the case of a statute—may not be requirement at all. So taken it may simply be a grant of authority for acquiring rights which before had no existence except in the state. The legislature passes a statute authorizing a town to borrow money, to vote on giving bonds for a certain purpose, to become incorporated, authorizing the formation of trading corporations, or the doing any of a score of things, where no right whatever existed before. The word "rule," in the sense of requirement, is inapplicable to such law taken only as it is stated, that is, in its own direct terms. A distinction should have been made, if not for the expert at least for the inexpert; and Blackstone was writing for the latter. He ought, it may fairly be urged, to have told those whom he was teaching that, in regard to laws granting authority, the word "rule" was applicable only in a collateral way, to the course, to wit, to be pursued in regard to the authority—that in its proper sense of requirement it meant nothing more than that the authority is usually subject to conditions to be complied with, and that as an incident third persons must respect it.

One may not unreasonably object, in the next place, to the word "prescribed"—"a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power." By making that word part of his definition, Blackstone makes it necessary to the same; if there could be any doubt, the fact is made clear by what follows. Blackstone says that in using this term he means that the rule must be "notified." "A bare resolution," he declares, will not be enough. "It is requisite that this resolution be notified to the people who are to obey it."

Is it necessary to the existence of a law that it be "notified to the people"? If it is, then the American colonies had very little law. At that time legislation was printed but fitfully, and then only in part; and the decisions of the courts were never published at all, or published only of some case calculated to create public excitement—an unusual thing. Are the people of our territories, where it, equal in point of conscience to that of a law; but then the original of the obligation is different. In compacts, we ourselves determine and promise what shall be done, before we are obliged to do it; in laws, we are obliged to act without ourselves determining or promising anything at all. Upon these accounts law is defined to be "a rule."

§ 45. (2) It is "a rule of civil conduct."—Municipal law is also "a rule of civil conduct." This distinguishes municipal law

the law, at any rate the judicial law, is seldom published—are they without law? And what is to be said of the people of our smaller states, like Rhode Island and Delaware, where the decisions are published only at intervals of several years—only when the accumulation is enough to make a respectable volume? Are these decisions meantime of no general force? Even in the large and populous states, where statutes and decisions are published at very short intervals, there is much law that is not prescribed.

What statute or decision ever prescribed that no one may take another's property without permission? The fact that there is a law covering the case is indeed plain; but that is not because it has been prescribed in any law book or other publication. To prescribe indeed means more than to give requisite notice; even of that meaning it is barely patient. More properly it signifies to set down in direct terms, with fixed bounds. To leave a matter to inference is not to prescribe it. And then if it be said, as Blackstone seems to say, that much of the law not prescribed in law books is divine law, "prescribed in revelation," it must be replied that even in regard to that part the law has not been "prescribed by the supreme power in a state"; though it must be admitted that where the sovereign is external to the people, the rule must be prescribed, for it is not that people's own "rule of conduct."

But in a larger and more important sense the word creates a false impression, especially of the making of what is known as common law. Common law is not laid down with fixed bounds; it is peculiarly a reflection of times and conditions of society, usually tardy, but following on and changing more or less accordingly. The times may, it is true, be a long dead level, untouched by serious social change; they may be as they were in Blackstone's day and for generations before. On the other hand, they may be as they were in the first half of the nineteenth century; they may be as they have been since our Civil War; they may be as they are to-day, fairly revolutionary. With social, economic, or political change the law may change in substance; but even in a stationary condition of society, the common law will seldom have sharply drawn lines. Even its most definite rules are almost certain to have a penumbra—a penumbra which may spread back towards the rule itself until the whole field becomes indistinct; to be lighted up again perhaps by a new rule, with a new penumbra, subject to the same process. Examples come ready to hand even from comparatively stagnant times. There is Chief Justice Shaw's fellow-from the natural or revealed; the former of which is the rule of moral conduct, and the latter not only the rule of moral conduct, but also the rule of faith. These regard man as a creature, and point out his duty to God, to himself, and to his neighbor, considered in the light of an individual. But municipal or civil law regards him also as a citizen, and bound to other duties towards his neighbor, than those of mere nature and religion: duties which he has engaged in by enjoying the benefits of the common union; and servant rule. (Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 4 Met. (Mass.), 49, 38 Am. Dec. 339.) The penumbra was there; and now, what with statute and judge-made law, in the social changes which have taken place, the whole sky is darkened. There was again the older rule that false representation, even scienter, could not be a defense to contract. That seemed to be as hard and fast a rule as could be laid down; but even that rule, or perhaps I ought to say, that rule especially, had its penumbra, a veil spreading over from equity; and then finally common-law judges replaced the rule with a better, the one they had refused to admit. Conversely, even the age-long darkness of savage rules in the criminal law has a lighter edge; there is mocking of Tyburn (Tyburn gallows) in wager of battle (the last case was Ashford v. Thornton, 1 Barn. & Ad. 405, 1818), and the sky was clear.

Blackstone's word "prescribed," taken as words of definition should be taken, in its natural sense, would deny this common quality of judicial law. A definition of law need not declare that laws have a fading border-land, but definition should not contradict the fact. You may define the sun without saying that that fiery planet is apt to make it hot for men in midsummer, but you must not use a word which would seem to say that it cools the air.

"Commanding" and "prohibiting" are words out of place. There are few such words in our law; the most that can be said is that constitutions and statutes make use of them more or less; judicial law seldom if ever does. Certain legal precepts, such as mandamus and injunction, run indeed in words of command or prohibition; but a precept or a writ is not a law—it is only a direction made according to law. The law is general, the precept particular. Even if such instruments were laws, the fact would not justify the use of the words in question, for precepts of the kind are applicable to but few cases; they would make only a small part of the law. So in general of the decisions of the courts; taken singly, these are not, properly speaking, law, they are merely according to law. They are particular, applicable to A and B, parties to a suit, while the law is general. The law may, of course, be seen in a decision; it may be stated in terms in it; but the decision, whatever its form, whether of command, prohibition, or anything else, simply falls within the law.

If it be said that the criticism is only one of words—that the law must be obeyed or unpleasant things may follow, and that therefore, in effect, the law does command and prohibit—the answer in the first place is, that for beginners the words are misleading, and in the second place that the statement which amount to no more than that he do contribute on his part to the subsistence and peace of the society.

§ 46. (3) It is "a rule prescribed."—It is likewise "a rule prescribed." Because a bare resolution, confined in the breast of the legislator, without manifesting itself by some external sign, can never be properly a law. It is requisite that this resolution be notified to the people who are to obey it. But the manner in which this notification is to be made, is matter of very great indifference.

at best is true only of portions of the law. In the case of laws conferring authority, as we have already seen, it is only in the course to be pursued in regard to the exercise of the authority that any command or prohibition can be said to be made. Surely the authority itself is given by law, though where it is confined to particular persons others may be said in some remote sense to be prohibited from interfering. The point is, that the law says that the town or the railway or other body may do the thing authorized; enough for the criticism that the town or other person has an authority, without being "commanded" to do what otherwise would be unlawful.

As a matter of fact, Blackstone's definition makes the word "command" suitable even to permission and so compels it to commit suicide; for he says that law "commands what is right," and according to his own explanation of the word, as will presently appear, whatever the sovereign declares is "right"—not morally but legally—and the declaration may be only a grant of authority. A man is commanded to do what he may do or not, as the pleases! Plainly Blackstone overlooked one part of the law.

The words "right" and "wrong" required Blackstone himself to justify them. In their natural sense, when taken together as in the definition, and in connection with the words "command" and "prohibit," they import things right or wrong in themselves, right or wrong in plain morals. But that is the very sense in which, as Blackstone explains, they are not to be taken. In that sense the words fall, not under municipal but under divine law; rights "which God and nature have established . . . need not the aid of human laws to be more effectively invested in every man than they are." "So that, upon the whole," he goes on to say, "the declaratory part," by which he means the determining part, "of the municipal law has no force or operation at all with regard to actions that are naturally and intrinsically right or wrong."

And now, having emptied the words of their natural meaning, Blackstone finds himself compelled to empty them of all meaning, or at least of all value for the purpose of a definition; for he says that as the words are not to be understood as referring to what is intrinsically right or wrong, their meaning must be found in the declarations of the sovereign. Things are, within the purport of the definition, "right or wrong, just or unjust, duties or misdemeanors, according as the municipal legislator sees proper for promoting the welfare of society," etc. This "municipal legislator" is the external sovereign,

It may be notified by universal tradition and long practice, which supposes a previous publication, and is the case of the common law of England. It may be notified vivæ voce (by word of mouth), by officers appointed for that purpose, as is done with regard to proclamations, and such acts of parliament as are appointed, [46] to be publicly read in churches and other assemblies. It may lastly be notified by writing, printing, or the like, which is the general course and he acts as he thinks fit. There is no hint that changes in society affect the question of legal rights.

Whatever social order prevails in the state, Blackstone's definition must be set aside.

Is it possible in the teaching of the law school to find a trustworthy, working definition of law, as the term is understood in America? The examination of Blackstone's definition may have helped the way. We have seen that certain things should be rejected, and we have seen some things which should replace what is to be rejected. This cannot be reckoned as anything short of gain. The facts may be recounted:

1. A definition of a modern system of law should not suggest that the sovereign may be external.
2. The expression "rule of civil conduct" is indefinite, and "rule" should be explained.
3. The word "prescribed" is unsatisfactory, whether in the sense that law must be "notified to the people," or that it is to be set down in fixed terms; it is enough, so far as any requirement of notice is concerned, that the law proceeds from the people; instead of being set down in fixed terms, it is a product of times and conditions, changing in light and shade and in substance accordingly.
4. The definition should not declare that law consists in commands and prohibitions.
5. It should not tell us that law is predicated of right and wrong as shown in the declarations of the sovereign, without regard to changes in society.

It is proper, however, to state, that definition of a comprehensive term like law need not exclude things not intended to be covered by it; enough that it does not suggest them as within it. Such a definition is to be taken as including only what it affirms or fairly implies, taken in connection with any remarks accompanying it and relevant external facts. It is still more important to observe that no definition of the term "municipal law" can be trustworthy and useful which puts the term in a strait-jacket of hard-and-fast lines and specific dimensions. It would be "perilous" indeed to put any such definition to use in the administration of justice. There are great indeterminate forces in relation to law, and it should be part of a trustworthy and useful definition of the term to find the place for the play of them and make allowance accordingly; and that, too, in some larger sense than the play of mere light and shade. A correct analysis of the typical phenomena of law—a grip on things as they are—should lead to the desired result.

The first thing to be said is, that one must be careful not to be misled by figures of speech. We constantly use the term "law" figuratively, and prop-taken with all our acts of parliament. Yet, whatever way is made use of, it is incumbent on the promulgators to do it in the most public and perspicuous manner; not like Caligula, who (according to Dio Cassius) wrote his laws in a very small character, and hung them upon high pillars, the more effectually to ensnare the people.

erly enough; but in the present inquiry we must be on our guard against taking figure for fact. We say that the law authorizes or does not authorize one to do so-and-so, as though the law had personality; what we mean is that it is lawful or unlawful to do the thing. We say that the law deals with a question in such-and-such a way; what we mean is that the courts deal with it in that way. We speak of setting the law in motion; what in reality we set in motion is the machinery of justice, the courts. We may speak of law as the "life" or the "life-blood" of the state; the figure carries a certain true idea. But while language of the kind is inevitable with men of imagination, it must not be taken to imply that law is a distinct cause of things. Law is not life; life is behind the law—law is a reflection of social forces, and that through a refracting medium; it is the servant of the dominant power in society. Law is only another word for the very things, it may be, which in figurative language it is put as creating. Law does not, for instance, create relations of right and duty; law does not even make the relations binding, in any sense of a force distinct from those relations. The relations are necessarily binding in any organized political society; and that, so far, is municipal law. Relations of right and duty—a subject to be dwelt upon later—find their binding energy in the existence of the state; such binding energy is part and parcel of the same—the most essential part of it, not a product but a part of it. So it is that these relations go to make municipal law. What then is meant by municipal law must be found, not by supposing that law is something standing apart, but by considering the elements which go to make it.

In the examination of Blackstone's definition we noticed two phases of law, in the first of which the law appears in the form of requirement, in the second, of grant of authority. Now, requirement imports right and duty in corresponding relation; duty being the term evolved in recent times from the idea of requirement or Blackstone's "command" and "prohibition." A has a right of possession in land; B and all others are required to respect that right, that is, they are under a duty to A to respect it; and so there exists a relation of right and duty between A and other persons. A, again, has a right of contract against B; B must perform his contract, that is, he is under a duty to A to respect A's right; and so there exists a relation of right and duty between the two. Or we may equally well say, as before, of both cases, that a corresponding relation exists between the right of A and the duty of B, or of B and all others.

This is the great field of law; it is evidently what was in Blackstone's mind in framing his definition; it is what usually is in the mind of a lawyer in our day when he thinks of law.—M. M. BIGELOW, in Centralization and the Law, pp. 135-152.

There is still a more unreasonable method than this, which is called making of laws ex post facto (after the fact), when after an action, indifferent in itself, is committed, the legislator then for the first time declares it to have been a crime, and inflicts a punishment upon the person who has committed it.<sup>10</sup> Here it is impossible <sup>10</sup> Ex post facto laws.—The original meaning of ex post facto applies to civil and criminal law alike. (Co. Litt. 241; Fearn's Con. Rem. 175, 203; Powell on Devises, 113, 133, 134; 2 Ld. Raym. 1352.) There are even some early American cases in which the same has been held. (Denn v. Goldtrap (1795), 1 N. J. L. 272; State v. Parkhurst (1802), 9 N. J. L. 427, 444.) No clearer example can be given of Blackstone's controlling influence over the early law of the United States, than the fact that this passage, which (as Judge Dixon has correctly said, Moore v. State, 43 N. J. L. 203, 39 Am. Rep. 558) does not define the term, but merely illustrates it from the criminal law, should have settled the American sense of the term as relating only to penal or criminal law. It was from him, no doubt, that the limitation passed into the original constitution of Massachusetts (part 1, § 24); while in other states, still following him, the term "retrospective laws" was used, but with limitations that confined it to criminal law, e. g., Maryland, art. 15; North Carolina, art. 24; Delaware, art. 11. But the application of the term was fully settled by the case of Calder v. Bull (1798), 3 Dall. (U. S.) 386, 1 L. Ed. 648, in which it was held that a retrospective act, granting a new trial in a civil case, was not ex post facto within the meaning of the United States constitution. Patterson, J., quotes the above passage of the Commentaries, and adds: "Here the meaning annexed to the term ex post facto laws unquestionably refers to crimes, and nothing else." (3 Dall. 396, 1 L. Ed. 653.) The four classes of ex post facto laws given by Chase, J., in the same case (3 Dall. 390, 1 L. Ed. 650), though purely a dictum, have been accepted by the courts ever since as correct.

"1st. Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal; and punishes such action. 2d. Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was when committed. 3d. Every law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime when committed. 4th. Every law that changes the legal rules of evidence, and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offense, in order to convict the offender." It is not, however, exhaustive, and was not intended by the author to be, since he winds up with a reference to "all these and similar laws" as unjust. A fifth class may be added by the great weight of recent authority, viz., acts which make an offense punishable after it has once been fully barred by a statute of limitations. (Moore v. State, 43 N. J. L. 203, 39 Am. Rep. 558.)

Sixthly, it has been held not necessary that the law should belong to the class known as criminal statutes, or provide for criminal procedure and punishment, to bring it within the constitutional prohibition of ex post facto laws.

that the party could foresee that an action, innocent when it was done, should be afterwards converted to guilt by a subsequent law; he had therefore no cause to abstain from it; and all punishment for not abstaining must of consequence be cruel and unjust.* All laws should be therefore made to commence in futuro (at a future period), and be notified before their commencement; which is implied in the term "prescribed." But when this rule is in the usual manner notified or prescribed, it is then the subject's business to be thoroughly acquainted therewith; for if ignorance of what he might know, were admitted as a legitimate excuse, the laws would be of no effect, but might always be eluded with impunity.<sup>11</sup>

* Such laws among the Romans were denominated privilegia, or private laws, of which Cicero (De Leg. 3. 19. and in his oration pro domo, 17) thus speaks: "Vetant leges sacratæ, vetant duodecim tabulæ, leges, privatis hominibus irrogari; id enim est privilegium. Nemo unquam tulit, nihil est crudelius, nihil perniciosius, nihil quod minus hæc civitas ferre possit!" (The sacred laws forbid, the twelve tables forbid, that the interests of private individuals should be affected by special laws; for that is privilege. There has never been an instance of it: nothing could be more cruel, nothing more injurious, nothing which to this nation could be less tolerable).

The deprivation or suspension of any rights, civil or political, previously enjoyed, may be punishment, the circumstances attending and the causes of the deprivation determining this fact. Disqualification from office may be punishment, as in cases of conviction upon impeachment. Disqualification from the pursuit of a lawful vocation, or from positions of trust, or from the privileges of appearing in the courts, or acting as an executor, etc., may also be and has often been imposed as punishment. (Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277, 18 L. Ed. 356; Ex parte Garland (1866), 4 Wall. 333, 18 L. Ed. 366; Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 137, 3 L. Ed. 178.)

Finally, laws of all those classes operating in favor of the individual, as by remitting penalties, making convictions more difficult, etc., are not ex post facto laws within the meaning of the prohibition.—HAMMOND.

<sup>11</sup> Retrospective legislation.—Every ex post facto law is retrospective, but every retrospective law is not ex post facto. The latter class only is prohibited by the federal constitution (3 Dall. 390, 1 L. Ed. 650); so, also, in most of the states. Some few, as New Hampshire, Texas, Tennessee, prohibit all retrospective legislation, civil as well as criminal. But it will be found on examining the decisions that the express prohibition of retrospective laws has very little effect, and that the decisions as to retrospective legislation are substantially the same in both classes of states. The explanation of this is worth considering. It will furnish the student with a valuable illustration of the controlling influence exercised by legal principles, and the subject matter of law over positive rules, even when enacted by the highest authority, as by the

§ 47. (4) It is "a rule prescribed by the supreme power in a state."—But further: municipal law is "a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in a state." For legislature, as people of a state in their written constitutions. It is evident, upon a moment's reflection, that no new law can be retroactive in the literal sense of the term. The acts and events of past time are unchangeable by any human power, even if we may not say with the heathen poet, that even the Deity—

non tamen irritum
Quodcunque retro est, efficiet, neque
Diffinget, infectumque reddet
Quod fugiens semel hora vexit.

—Horatii Carm. III, 29, 45.

(but what is gone,
He will not, cannot turn to nought;
Nor cancel, as a thing undone,
What once the flying hour has brought.

Conington's Translation.)

This is so clear that it may seem hardly worth stating, much less proving; but the example of Savigny, System, book 8, 382, section 385, may be authority for the formal statement of so plain a truth. But the more thoroughly one studies the common law, the more deeply he will be impressed with the fact that no line of exact demarcation can be drawn between its rules and those of logic or philosophy; and that often the surest way to avoid doubts and difficulties is to trace them into the philosophical or metaphysical questions out of which they spring. Again, it is equally evident, that when the law has been changed by the introduction of a new statute, there is, prima facie, no reason why the discarded rule should be applied to any act or event subsequent to the change. These two considerations would seem to make retrospective legislation in the strict sense of the term impossible. In order to ascertain what the term really does mean, we must look beyond the definition of a law and examine what is meant by a right. Retrospective legislation is that which changes a right or a duty in the interval between its origin and its final effect or completion. Wherever no lasting right can exist, the term becomes meaningless; wherever a lasting right vested in any private person exists, retrospective legislation affecting it becomes contrary to the common principles of justice. This is really the definition given of the terms by Lord Mansfield in Couch v. Jeffries, 4 Burr. 2460, who says in substance that retrospective legislation is that which takes away vested rights; to the same effect, 1 Kent, Comm. 455, and Story, J., in Society v. Wheeler, 2 Gall. 105, Fed. Cas. No. 13,156. Consequently, the provision found in most of our constitutions prohibiting the impairment of the obligation of contracts, and that forbidding private property to be taken for public use, operate substantially as rules to determine in what cases legislation may be retrospective. (Satterlee was before observed, is the greatest act of superiority that can be exercised by one being over another. Wherefore it is requisite

v. Matthewson (1829), 2 Pet. 407, 7 L. Ed. 467; Ogden v. Saunders (1827), 12 Wheat. 262, 6 L. Ed. 623; and the able discussion of vested rights in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 358, and following.) The rights of parties cannot be changed by legislation, but no party has a vested right in any particular remedy. The organization of courts, the forms and processes of action, the rules of evidence and procedure, and even the rules which determine the parties to actions may be changed, and a new rule made applicable to causes of action already existing, providing a substantial right is not thereby affected. (Willard v. Harvey (1856), 24 N. H. 351.) Hence, too, it will be seen that much of the fluctuation in cases upon the retrospective effect of laws grows out of the difficulty of distinguishing between remedies that do and remedies that do not impair the obligation of a contract.

That these principles apply alike in states where retrospective legislation is prohibited, and in those in which it is allowed, compare Rich v. Flanders (1859), 39 N. H. 304; Webb v. Den (1854), 17 How. 576, 15 L. Ed. 35; Briggs v. Hubbard (1846), 19 Vt. 91; Ross' Case (1824), 2 Pick. (Mass.) 169 (in which, by the way, the same thing was said of ex post facto laws, and it was held that they would be invalid on general principles, even without any constitutional prohibition). (Officer v. Young (1833), 5 Yerg. (Tenn.) 320, 26 Am. Dec. 268; De Cordova v. Galveston (1849), 4 Tex. 470; Dash v. Van Kleeck (1811), 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 477, 5 Am. Dec. 291.

I think, then, the whole matter may be briefly summed up thus:

1. Laws of procedure and evidence and the adjective law generally operate from the date of their passage (or other date when they take effect), and therefore govern the remedy of wrongs and enforcement of rights alike in all cases, whether the cause of action arose before the law took effect or afterwards. The presumption is that they do not affect the rights and duties so enforced: the principle—nova constitutio futuris dat formam non præteritis (Bracton, fol. 228, 2 Inst. 202)—applies to them simply, and there is no question of retroaction.

2. But if it can be shown that the application of a new rule of adjective law operates to take away or diminish a substantive right or render more burdensome a substantive duty, existing at the time when the new law came into effect, the question of retroaction arises, and the new law will not be applied unless its terms require it.

3. If the terms do require it, and of course if the new law is one expressly intended to operate upon such rights and duties, then the precedents will sustain its retrospective application when the new rule confirms or enforces the equitable rights of the parties interested, though vested legal rights inconsistent with the former may be taken away, e. g.:

(a) By the confirmation of title to land under irregular sales or other proceedings lacking some technical requirement, but substantially just. (Wilkin-to the very essence of a law, that it be made by the supreme power. Sovereignty and legislature are indeed convertible terms; one cannot subsist without the other.<sup>12</sup>

§ 48. (a) Nature of civil government.—<sup>[47]</sup> This may lead us into a short inquiry concerning the nature of society and civil government; and the natural, inherent right that belongs to the sovereignty of a state, wherever that sovereignty be lodged, of making and enforcing laws.

§ 49. (b) Foundations of society.—The only true and natural foundations of society are the wants and the fears of individuals. Not that we can believe, with some theoretical writers, that there ever was a time when there was no such thing as society either natural or civil; but that, from the impulse of reason, and through a sense of their wants and weaknesses, individuals met together in a large plain, entered into an original contract, and chose the tallest man present to be their governor.<sup>13</sup> This notion, of an actu-son v. Leland, 2 Pet. 627, 7 L. Ed. 542; Kearney v. Taylor, 15 How. 494, 14 L. Ed. 787; Hussey v. Smith, 99 U. S. 20, 25 L. Ed. 314; Randals v. Kreiger, 23 Wall. 137, 23 L. Ed. 124.)

(b) By validating the proceedings of courts, magistrates, or administrative officers, so as to take away vested rights which owe their continued existence only to some defect or irregularity of proceeding. (Thompson v. Lee County, 3 Wall. 327, 18 L. Ed. 177; Beloit v. Morgan, 7 Wall. 619, 19 L. Ed. 205; New Orleans v. Clark, 95 U. S. 644, 24 L. Ed. 521.) With respect to this latter class, the condition that the defect overruled must be one that the legislature could have prevented in advance, has often been expressed as an essential one to the exercise of the power. (Cooley's Const. Lim. 371, 382, and cases cited.) The same condition seems also to apply to the former class. If the case is one where the legislature could not have said in advance that the irregular sale or other proceeding should be legal and sufficient, without impairing the obligation of a contract, or taking private property, or destroying rights without due process of law, then the objection to the retrospective character of such laws is fatal.

4. Acts impairing the obligation of contracts, or taking private property without compensation, must in their very nature be retrospective, and are unconstitutional in both aspects.—HAMMOND.

<sup>12</sup> Professor Hammond has a learned note on the meaning of sovereignty. (1 Hammond's Black. 137.) A valuable discussion of the same subject may be found in Crane and Moses, Politics, 33 ff.

<sup>13</sup> Social contract, in political philosophy, a term applied to the theory of the origin of society associated chiefly with the names of Hobbes, Locke, ally existing unconnected state of nature, is too wild to be seriously admitted: and besides it is plainly contradictory to the revealed accounts of the primitive origin of mankind, and their preservation two thousand years afterwards; both which were effected by the means of single families. These formed the first natural society, among themselves; which, every day extending its limits, laid the first though imperfect rudiments of civil or political society: and when it grew too large to subsist with convenience in that pastoral state, wherein the patriarchs appear to have lived, it necessarily subdivided itself by various migrations into more. Afterwards, as agriculture increased, which employs and can maintain a much greater number of hands, migrations became less frequent: and various tribes, which had formerly separated, reunited again; sometimes by compulsion and conquest, sometimes by accident, and sometimes perhaps by compact. But though society had not its formal beginning from any convention of individuals, actuated by their

and Rousseau, though it can be traced back to the Greek Sophists. According to Hobbes (Leviathan), men lived originally in a state of nature in which there were no recognized criteria of right and wrong, no distinction of meum and tuum. Each person took for himself all that he could; man's life was "solitary, poor, nasty, brutish and short." The state of nature was therefore a state of war, which was ended by men agreeing to give their liberty into the hands of a sovereign, who thenceforward was absolute. Locke (Treatise on Government) differed from Hobbes in so far as he described the pre-social state as one of freedom, and held that private property must have been recognized, though there was no security. Rousseau (Contrat social) held that in the pre-social state man was unwarlike and even timid. Laws resulted from the combination of men who agreed for mutual protection to surrender individual freedom of action. Government must therefore rest on the consent of the governed, the volonté générale. Though it is quite obvious that the theory of a social contract (or compact, as it is also called) contains a considerable element of truth—that loose associations for mutual protection preceded any elaborate idea or structure of law, and that government cannot be based exclusively on force—yet it is open to the equally obvious objection that the very idea of contract belongs to a more advanced stage in human development than the hypothesis itself demands. Thus the doctrine, yielding as a definite theory of the origin of society to the evidence of history and anthropology, becomes interesting primarily as revolt against mediæval and theocratic theories of the state.—Encyc. Brit. (11th ed.).

Professor Hammond has discussed very fully the theory of the social contract. 1 Hammond's Black. 144.

wants and their fears; yet it is the sense of their weakness and imperfection that keeps mankind together; that demonstrates the necessity of this union; and that therefore is the solid and natural foundation, as well as the cement of civil society. And this is what we mean by the original contract of society; which, though perhaps in no instance it has ever been formally expressed at the first institution of a state, yet in nature and reason must always be understood and implied, [48] in the very act of associating together: namely, that the whole should protect all its parts, and that every part should pay obedience to the will of the whole; or, in other words, that the community should guard the rights of each individual member, and that (in return for this protection) each individual should submit to the laws of the community; without which submission of all it was impossible that protection could be certainly extended to any.

§ 50. (c) Establishment of government.—For when civil society is once formed, government at the same time results of course, as necessary to preserve and to keep that society in order. Unless some superior be constituted, whose commands and decisions all the members are bound to obey, they would still remain as in a state of nature, without any judge upon earth to define their several rights, and redress their several wrongs. But, as all the members which compose this society were naturally equal, it may be asked, in whose hands are the reins of government to be entrusted? To this the general answer is easy; but the application of it to particular cases has occasioned one-half of those mischiefs, which are apt to proceed from misguided political zeal. In general, all mankind will agree that government should be reposed in such persons, in whom those qualities are most likely to be found, the perfection of which is among the attributes of Him who is emphatically styled the Supreme Being; the three grand requisites, I mean, of wisdom, of goodness, and of power: wisdom, to discern the real interest of the community; goodness, to endeavor always to pursue that real interest; and strength, or power, to carry this knowledge and intention into action. These are the natural foundations of sovereignty, and these are the requisites that ought to be found in every well-constituted frame of government.

§ 51. (d) Sovereignty.—How the several forms of government we now see in the world at first actually began, is a matter of great uncertainty, and has occasioned infinite disputes. It is not my business or intention to enter into any of them. However they began, or by [49] what right soever they subsist, there is and must be in all of them a supreme, irresistible, absolute, uncontrolled authority, in which the jura summi imperii, or the rights of sovereignty, reside. And this authority is placed in those hands, wherein (according to the opinion of the founders of such respective states, either expressly given, or collected from their tacit approbation) the qualities requisite for supremacy, wisdom, goodness, and power, are the most likely to be found.

§ 52. (e) Forms of government.—The political writers of antiquity<sup>14</sup> will not allow more than three regular forms of government; the first, when the sovereign power is lodged in an aggregate assembly consisting of all the free members of a community, which is called a democracy; the second, when it is lodged in a council, composed of select members, and then it is styled an aristocracy; the last, when it is entrusted in the hands of a single person, and then it takes the name of a monarchy. All other species of government, they say, are either corruptions of, or reducible to, these three.

§ 53. (f) Laws made by sovereign.—By the sovereign power, as was before observed, is meant the making of laws; for wherever that power resides, all others must conform to, and be directed by it, whatever appearance the outward form and administration of the government may put on. For it is at any time in the option of the legislature to alter that form and administration by a new edict or rule, and to put the execution of the laws into whatever hands it pleases; by constituting one, or a few, or many executive magistrates, and all the other powers of the state must obey the legislative power in the execution of their several functions, or else the constitution is at an end.

<sup>14</sup> A learned and judicious account of these ancient views of forms of government will be found in President Theodore D. Woolsey's Political Science, part 3, c. 2, vol. 1, pp. 466-486.—HAMMOND.

§ 54. (g) Merits and demerits of different forms of government.—In a democracy, where the right of making laws resides in the people at large, public virtue, or goodness of intention, is more likely to be found, than either of the other qualities of government. Popular assemblies are frequently foolish in their contrivance, and weak in their execution; but generally mean to do the thing that is right and just, and have always a degree of patriotism or public spirit. In <sup>[50]</sup> aristocracies there is more wisdom to be found, than in the other frames of government; being composed, or intended to be composed, of the most experienced citizens; but there is less honesty than in a republic, and less strength than in a monarchy. A monarchy is indeed the most powerful of any; for by the entire conjunction of the legislative and executive powers all the sinews of government are knit together, and united in the hand of the prince; but then there is imminent danger of his employing that strength to improvident or oppressive purposes.<sup>15</sup>

Thus these three species of government have, all of them, their several perfections and imperfections. Democracies are usually the best calculated to direct the end of a law; aristocracies to invent the means by which that end shall be obtained; and monarchies to carry those means into execution. And the ancients, as was observed, had in general no idea of any other permanent form of government but these three: for though Cicero<sup>t</sup> declares himself of opinion, "esse optime constitutam rempublican, quæ ex tribus generibus illis, regali, optimo, et populari, sit modice confusa" (that the best constituted republic, is that which is duly compounded of these three forms, the monarchical, aristocratic, and democratic); yet Tacitus treats this notion of a mixed government, formed out of them all, and partaking of the advantages of each, as a visionary whim, and one that, if effected, could never be lasting or secure.*

<sup>t</sup> In his fragments, de rep. l. 2.

---

<sup>15</sup> This paragraph is a brief imitation of Montesquieu's famous third book of the Esprit des Loix, in which he treats "of the principles of the three forms of government." B. was not disposed, however, to translate the passage in which M. attributes the failure of republican government in England in the time of the great rebellion to the lack of virtue. As those who took part in public affairs had no virtue, as their ambition was piqued by the success of the boldest adventurer (Cromwell), as each faction was uncontrolled except by the other faction, the government was constantly changing. The baffled people sought for democracy, but found it nowhere, and at last had to find rest under the power it had once driven out. (Esprit des Loix, Liv. III. c. 3.)—HAMMOND.

§ 55. (h) The British constitution.—But, happily for us of this island, the British constitution has long remained, and I trust will long continue, a standing exception to the truth of this observation. For, as with us the executive power of the laws is lodged in a single person, they have all the advantages of strength and dispatch, that are to be found in the most absolute monarchy: and as the legislature of the kingdom is entrusted to three distinct powers, entirely independent of each other; first, the king; secondly, the lords, spiritual and temporal, which is an aristocratical assembly of persons selected for their piety, <sup>[51]</sup> their birth, their wisdom, their valor, or their property; and, thirdly, the house of commons, freely chosen by the people from among themselves, which makes it a kind of democracy; as this aggregate body, actuated by different springs, and attentive to different interests, composes the British parliament, and has the supreme disposal of everything; there can no inconvenience be attempted by either of the three branches, but will be withstood by one of the other two; each branch being armed with a negative power, sufficient to repel any innovation which it shall think inexpedient or dangerous.<sup>16</sup>

* “Cunctas nationes et urbes populus aut primores, aut singuli regunt: delecta ex his et constituta reipublicæ forma laudari facilius quam evenire, vel, si evenit, haud diuturna esse potest.” Ann. l. 4. (The government of all cities or countries is either democratic, aristocratic, or monarchical. It is more easy to approve of a government composed of these three in the form of a republic than to bring it into being; and if effected, it cannot be lasting.)

<sup>16</sup> The change wrought by the lapse of a century in the British constitution is strikingly shown by the following passage from an English writer: “We would like to ask constitutionalists whether the consequences of either the sovereign or the peers acting in their undoubted theoretical rights, and vetoing or rejecting bills passed by large majorities in the commons, would not reveal the rottenness of the theory, and the sentiment by which it is surrounded. The golden mean is preserved, the ark of freedom is kept untouched, because the supreme power in the state is now vested in actual fact, beyond revocation or limitation by sovereign or peers, in the popular branch of the legislature.”

§ 56. (i) Merits of the British constitution.—Here, then, is lodged the sovereignty of the British constitution; and lodged as beneficially as is possible for society. For in no other shape could we be so certain of finding the three great qualities of government so well and so happily united. If the supreme power were lodged in any one of the three branches separately, we must be exposed to the inconveniences of either absolute monarchy, aristocracy, or democracy; and so want two of the three principal ingredients of good polity, either virtue, wisdom, or power. If it were lodged in any two of the branches; for instance, in the king and house of lords, our laws might be providently made, and well executed, but they might not always have the good of the people in view; if lodged in the king and commons, we should want that circumspection and mediatory caution, which the wisdom of the peers is to afford: if the supreme rights of legislature were lodged in the two houses only, and the king had no negative upon their proceedings, they might be tempted to encroach upon the royal prerogative, or perhaps to abolish the kingly office, and thereby weaken (if not totally destroy) the strength of the executive power. But the constitutional government of this island is so admirably tempered and compounded, that nothing can endanger or hurt it, but destroying the equilibrium of power between one branch of the legislature and the rest. For if ever it should happen that the independence of any one of the three should be lost, or that it should become subservient to the views of either of the other two, there would [52] soon be an end of our constitution. The legislature would be changed from that, which (upon the supposition of an original contract, either actual or implied) is presumed to have been originally set up by the general consent and fundamental act of the society:

(Westminster Review, April, 1860, p. 171, of Am. reprint.) Certainly there has been no retrograde movement in the twenty years since this was published. Perhaps the most useful lesson that the student of constitutional law can draw from English history is the futility of looking to any form of organization for permanent strength. The most stable government since the fall of Rome has owed its stability to the constant advance it has made in the direction of popular government, wholesomely checked by the tenacity with which the crown and the peers have held their power until it could be held in each case no longer.—HAMMOND.

and such a change, however effected, is according to Mr. Locke<sup>b</sup> (who perhaps carries his theory too far) at once an entire dissolution of the bands of government; and the people are thereby reduced to a state of anarchy, with liberty to constitute to themselves a new legislative power.

§ 57. (j) Legislative power supreme.—Having thus cursorily considered the three usual species of government, and our own singular constitution, selected and compounded from them all, I proceed to observe, that, as the power of making laws constitutes the supreme authority, so wherever the supreme authority in any state resides, it is the right of that authority to make laws; that is, in the words of our definition, to prescribe the rule of civil action. And this may be discovered from the very end and institution of civil states. For a state is a collective body, composed of a multitude of individuals, united for their safety and convenience, and intending to act together as one man. If it therefore is to act as one man, it ought to act by one uniform will. But, inasmuch as political communities are made up of many natural persons, each of whom has his particular will and inclination, these several wills cannot by any natural union be joined together, or tempered and disposed into a lasting harmony, so as to constitute and produce that one uniform will of the whole. It can therefore be no otherwise produced than by a political union; by the consent of all persons to submit their own private wills to the will of one man, or of one or more assemblies of men, to whom the supreme authority is entrusted: and this will of that one man, or assemblage of men, is in different states, according to their different constitutions, understood to be law.<sup>17</sup>

Thus far as to the right of the supreme power to make laws; but further, it is its duty likewise. For since the re- [53] spective members are bound to conform themselves to the will of the state, it is expedient that they receive directions from the state declaratory of that its will. But, as it is impossible, in so great a multitude, to give injunctions to every particular man, relative to each particular action, it is therefore incumbent on the state to establish general rules, for the perpetual information and direction of all persons in all points, whether of positive or negative duty. And this, in order, that every man may know what to look upon as his own, what as another's; what absolute and what relative duties are required at his hands; what is to be esteemed honest, dishonest, or indifferent; what degree every man retains of his natural liberty; what he has given up as the price of the benefits of society; and after what manner each person is to moderate the use and exercise of those rights which the state assigns him, in order to promote and secure the public tranquillity.

<sup>b</sup> On government, part. 2. § 212.

---

<sup>17</sup> Constitutions.—Blackstone uses the word “constitution” in two quite distinct meanings: sometimes in the older sense of a mere law, usually a law of positive enactment, in which sense it was employed by the civilians and canonists; sometimes, as here, in the modern sense for the entire structure and organization of the state, the sense in which it is most familiar to American lawyers, although, of course, without any reference to written constitutions,

§ 58. (5) Definition of law continued.—From what has been advanced, the truth of the former branch of our definition, is (I trust) sufficiently evident; that "municipal law is a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in a state." I proceed now to the latter branch of it; that it is a rule so prescribed, "commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong."

§ 59. (6) "Commanding what is right, prohibiting what is wrong."—Now, in order to do this completely, it is first of all necessary that the boundaries of right and wrong be established which were unknown, at least by that name, when he wrote. For examples of the former meaning see "the wisdom of our late constitutions," page *16; "the imperial decrees or constitutions of successive emperors," page *81; "the legatine constitutions were ecclesiastical laws," page *83; "the provincial constitutions," page *83. The two senses of the word are quite distinct, and probably have been so from the beginning. It may be inferred that the modern sense is really the older, not only from its derivation but from such expressions as that of Cicero, "Nec unius temporis nec hominis esse constitutionem rei publicæ": but in the long interval between the classic period of Latin and the seventeenth century it had quite passed out of use and given way to the other. In Blackstone the two may usually be easily distinguished by the context; but it will be noticed, also, that when he uses the word for mere laws it is commonly in the plural, while in the other sense it is in the singular, unless the plural is required, as here, by a reference to more than one state.—HAMMOND.

and ascertained by law. And when this is once done, it will follow, of course, that it is likewise the business of the law, considered as a rule of civil conduct, to enforce these rights and to restrain or redress these wrongs. It remains, therefore, only to consider in what manner the law is said to ascertain the boundaries of right and wrong; and the methods which it takes to command the one and prohibit the other.

§ 60. (7) Several parts of a law.—For this purpose every law may be said to consist of several parts:<sup>18</sup> one, declaratory; whereby the rights to be observed, and the wrongs to be eschewed, are clearly defined and [54] laid down: another, directory; whereby

<sup>18</sup> The parts of a law.—This must not be understood to mean that we find, as a rule, in each law the four distinct parts here mentioned by Blackstone, but that these are four distinct modes in which any law may operate, so implying one another that from a law stated in either mode the others may generally be inferred. Thus, for example, the declaratory part is, as B. says, that by which the rights to be observed and the wrongs to be eschewed are clearly defined and laid down: and when the existence of a right or a wrong is thus declared, the courts will infer from it the direction to respect the one or avoid the other, and the existence of a remedy whenever that direction is not followed. The vindicatory part, when properly distinguished from the remedial, has limitations indeed of its own. The commission of an unlawful act is not necessarily punishable. Many of our states, as has been shown elsewhere, deny to the courts the power of punishing such an act as a crime or a misdemeanor, unless an express statute to that effect has been enacted. (See Lieber's Hermeneutics, 3d ed. by Hammond, note J, p. 293.) And this is no modern rule. The maxim, nulla pœna sine lege, has long been familiar in European law. For its history, see Hermeneutics, pp. 294–296; and for its American application, United States v. Morris, 14 Pet. 464, 10 L. Ed. 543; Ferrett v. Atwill, 1 Blatchf. 151, Fed. Cas. No. 4747; United States v. Clayton, 2 Dill. 219, Fed. Cas. No. 14,814; 1 Green's Crim. Rep. 439; 1 Bishop on Crim. Law, §§ 36, 134, 135. But this exception has no bearing upon private law, in which the existence of a right, the direction to respect it, and the remedy for its violation, so generally imply each other that they are almost convertible terms.

The declaration of a right rarely is found in formal language; and a right itself in legal language is less often designated by that name than by the common terms for the different kinds of rights. When a constitution or a statute defines the age and other conditions upon which suffrage is to be exercised, the law at once converts that exercise into a right, and gives a remedy for any unlawful interference with it. The question whether the plaintiff in the subject is instructed and enjoined to observe those rights, and to abstain from the commission of those wrongs: a third, remedial; whereby a method is pointed out to recover a man's private rights, or redress his private wrongs: to which may be added a fourth, usually termed the sanction, or vindictory branch of the law; whereby it is signified what evil or penalty shall be incurred by such as commit any public wrongs, and transgress or neglect their duty.

§ 61. (a) Declaratory part.—With regard to the first of these, the declaratory part of the municipal law, this depends not so much such a case must also show some actual damage proceeding from the infringement of his right is one upon which the courts have differed.

If a statute gives to a person or to a corporation the power of flooding land, or of constructing a railroad or other easement, the exercise of such power at once becomes a right, and every interference with it a wrong, to which the law annexes the common remedies. Even when a court recognizes a new kind of property, as in the case of ice, the law at once annexes all the directions and remedies which belong to property in general to the right thus declared. One important limitation must be made here. If the legislature has not only declared a new right, but has expressly given a remedy for its enforcement, that remedy alone can be pursued; on the principle, expressum facit cessare tacitum. It will be presumed that the legislature did not intend to add the usual common-law remedies by implication, since they have given a special one. (Cole v. City of Muscatine, 14 Iowa, 296.) Here, again, the courts have introduced a distinction not always easy to apply. If the act thus forbidden would constitute a common-law wrong, independent of the statute, the addition of a special remedy will not prevent the use of that given by the common law, e. g., a statute regulates the taking of land under the power of eminent domain for a railroad, and prescribes how it may be condemned. A railroad corporation enters upon land without taking the necessary steps for condemnation; must the owner pursue the statutory remedy, or may he treat the entry as a common-law trespass and recover damages on that ground? Upon this point decisions are conflicting, but the latter is the more correct doctrine.

Some courts distinguish the cases where the owner has the right to set in motion the process of condemnation from those where the railroad company alone can do it, giving the common-law action to the owner in the latter case but not in the former.

Still more frequently the law gives the remedy for acts not previously characterized either as rights or as wrongs, which are at once enrolled under those categories as a consequence. If a statute gives an action where none existed at common law, the necessary inference at once is that the case of such action includes both a right and a wrong: a wrong by the defendant for which a upon the law of revelation or of nature, as upon the wisdom and will of the legislator. This doctrine, which before was slightly touched, deserves a more particular explication. Those rights, then, which God and nature have established, and are therefore called natural rights, such as are life and liberty, need not the aid of human laws to be more effectually invested in every man than they are; neither do they receive any additional strength when declared by the municipal laws to be inviolable. On the contrary, no human legislature has power to abridge or destroy them, unless the owner shall himself commit some act that amounts to a forfeiture. Neither do divine or natural duties (such as, for instance, the worship of God, the maintenance of children, and the like) receive any stronger sanction from being also declared to be duties by the law of the land. The case is the same as to crimes and misdemeanors, that are forbidden by the superior laws, and therefore styled mala in se (crimes in themselves), such as murder, theft, recovery is sought; a right in the plaintiff of which that act is an infringement. And this is a logical and necessary conclusion to which there can hardly be an exception; for right and wrong are the parents of all actions, as the old books say.

Finally, when an act previously innocent is made penal, this vindictory law implies a declaration that it is wrong, a direction not to do it, including the important corollaries that it is legally void when done, and that no contract or agreement to do it can be binding, and a remedy for all damage resulting from it. It makes no difference in this respect whether the act is malum in se or malum prohibitum, since the addition of the legal penalty would now be regarded as adding new force and effect in such cases, contrary to Blackstone's doctrine. (1 Comm. 53.)

And although the act be merely prohibited by positive law, that prohibition is evidence of the will of the state that it should not be done, and is held to impose a conscientious duty of obedience on all citizens: "Where a statute inflicts a penalty for doing an act, though the act be not prohibited, yet the thing is unlawful: for it cannot be intended that a statute would inflict a penalty for a lawful act." (Bartlett v. Viner, Skin. 322; Griffith v. Wells, 3 Denio (N. Y.), 226.) An exception is sometimes made in the case of penalties imposed merely for revenue purposes or to insure uniformity in a course of conduct otherwise indifferent; and generally the ordinances of municipal corporations and the penalties they impose do not come within the rule. Finally, an important distinction is made in the remedial effect of all such actions. The plaintiff must show not only that the defendant has committed the wrong thus established, but also that such wrong has produced a special and perjury; which contract no additional turpitude from being declared unlawful by the inferior legislature. For that legislature in all these cases acts only, as was before observed, in subordination to the great lawgiver, transcribing and publishing His precepts. So that, upon the whole, the declaratory part of the municipal law has no force or operation at all, with regard to actions that are naturally and intrinsically right or wrong.<sup>19</sup>

[55] But, with regard to things in themselves indifferent, the case is entirely altered. These become either right or wrong, just or unjust, duties or misdemeanors, according as the municipal legislator sees proper, for promoting the welfare of the society, and

and substantial harm to himself, independently of its harmful effects as a breach of the general law or a wrong to the community. It is only when the wrong thus committed is a breach of some common-law right of security, liberty, or property for which a direct action would lie at common law, that its commission is sufficient to sustain the action without proof of damnum.

<sup>19</sup> Malum in se and malum prohibitum.—The distinction of malum in se and malum prohibitum as originally recognized in the common law, answers to the distinction between the natural and positive law, or in Coke's language, the former is an offense against the common law and the latter against some statute. (Coke, 4 Inst., c. 5, p. 63, and c. 20, p. 153.) Coke gives as instances of both examples which would hardly be recognized to-day, such as the offense of forestalling and engrossing as mala in se; but the difference in his view is substantially the same with that of Blackstone. It is still recognized by judges and courts, although it has frequently been repudiated: but it loses all its force and meaning when ethics and law are properly discriminated, and the latter term is limited to such rights and wrongs as affect the state or private individuals. In that case, the moral character of an act has no bearing upon its legal quality. There may be a conflict between the requirements of law and those of conscience, but neither can properly overrule or avoid the other. All wrongs are prohibited, and prohibited only, so far as the state is concerned. With their quality as wicked or unconscientious, the judge has nothing to do, as even "murder, and theft, and perjury, which contract no additional turpitude from being declared unlawful by the human legislature," in Blackstone's words, are held to be punishable only so far as the state has made them so, and not by virtue of any moral prohibition. Some states require a positive legal prohibition, in all cases; others still recognize, as England does, common-law offenses, which may be punished although no legislative act has forbidden them or attached a penalty to them; but even in the latter case they are punished, not because they are immoral, but because the law of the state has forbidden them, as shown by judicial precedents, or by such other authorities as the courts deem themselves bound by. The distinction may be still useful so far as to express the greater or less turpitude of a crime, but not more effectually carrying on the purposes of civil life. Thus our own common law has declared, that the goods of the wife do instantly upon marriage become the property and right of the husband; and our statute law has declared all monopolies a public offense: yet that right, and this offense, have no foundation in nature; but are merely created by the law, for the purposes of civil society. And sometimes, where the thing itself has its rise from the law of nature, the particular circumstances and mode of doing it becomes right or wrong, as the laws of the land shall direct. Thus, for instance, in civil duties; obedience to superiors is the doctrine of revealed as well as natural religion: but who those superiors shall be, and in what circumstances, or to what degrees they shall be obeyed, it is the province of human laws to determine. And so, as to injuries or crimes, it must be left to our own legislature to decide, in what cases the seizing another's cattle shall amount to *a trespass or a theft;* and where it shall be a justifiable action, as when a landlord takes them by way of distress for rent.

§ 62. (b) Directory part.—Thus much for the declaratory part of the municipal law: and the directory stands much upon the same footing; for this virtually includes the former, the declaration as forming two classes of crimes, the punishment of which rests upon different bases.

* Previous to ninth edition, "the crime of robbery."

---

If the distinction is to be maintained, it is not easy to determine where the line shall be drawn. Blackstone evidently draws it between ethics on the one side, and matters indifferent on the other, without reference to the question whether there has been positive legislation or not; since, as he says distinctly, a statute forbidding a thing wrong in itself has no force or operation at all. Coke, on the other hand, makes the distinction substantially the same with that of common law and statute; mala in se being common-law crimes, as distinct from those created by positive legislation. (4th Inst., pp. 63, 153.) But many acts which could not be punished criminally without an express statute for that purpose, because they were unknown to our fathers, involve much more moral turpitude than many of the common-law crimes mentioned by Coke, such as forestalling and engrossing. For example, a considerable number of the most heartless and atrocious frauds are of so recent introduction that no court would feel authorized to punish them in any state without an express statute. This vagueness of distinction is another strong reason for allowing the terms to fall into disuse.—HAMMOND.

being usually collected from the direction. The law that says, "thou shalt not steal," implies a declaration that stealing is a crime. And we have seen<sup>1</sup> that, in things naturally indifferent, the very essence of right and wrong depends upon the direction of the laws to do or to omit them.

§ 63. (c) Remedial part.—The remedial part of a law is so necessary a consequence of the former two, that laws must be very vague and imper-<sup>[56]</sup>fect without it. For in vain would rights be declared, in-vain directed to be observed, if there were no method of recovering and asserting those rights, when wrongfully withheld or invaded. This is what we mean properly, when we speak of the protection of the law. When, for instance, the declaratory part of the law has said, "that the field or inheritance, which belonged to Titius' father, is vested by his death in Titius"; and the directory part has "forbidden anyone to enter on another's property, without the leave of the owner": if Gaius after this will presume to take possession of the land, the remedial part of the law will then interpose its office: will make Gaius restore the possession to Titius, and also pay him damages for the invasion.

§ 64. (d) Vindictory part, or sanction.—With regard to the sanction of laws, or the evil that may attend the breach of public duties; it is observed, that human legislators have for the most part chosen to make the sanction of their laws rather vindictory than remuneratory, or to consist rather in punishments, than in actual particular rewards. Because, in the first place, the quiet enjoyment and protection of all our civil rights and liberties, which are the sure and general consequence of obedience to the municipal law, are in themselves the best and most valuable of all rewards. Because also, were the exercise of every virtue to be enforced by the proposal of particular rewards, it were impossible for any state to furnish stock enough for so profuse a bounty. And further, because the dread of evil is a much more forcible principle of human actions than the prospect of good.<sup>k</sup> For which reasons, though a prudent bestowing of rewards is sometimes of exquisite use, yet we find that those civil laws, which enforce and enjoin our duty, do seldom, if ever, propose any privilege or gift to such as obey the law; but do constantly come armed with a penalty denounced against transgressors, either expressly defining the nature and quantity of the punishment, or else leaving it to the discretion of the judges, and those who are entrusted with the care of putting the laws in execution.

<sup>1</sup> See page *43.

<sup>k</sup> Locke, Hum. Und. b. 2. c. 21.

[57] Of all the parts of a law the most effectual is the vindictory. For it is but lost labor to say, "do this, or avoid that," unless we also declare, "this shall be the consequence of your noncompliance." We must therefore observe, that the main strength and force of a law consists in the penalty annexed to it.<sup>20</sup> Herein is to be found the principal obligation of human laws.

Legislators and their laws are said to compel and oblige; not that by any natural violence they so constrain a man, as to render it impossible for him to act otherwise than as they direct, which is the strict sense of obligation: but because, by declaring and exhibiting a penalty against offenders, they bring it to pass that no man can easily choose to transgress the law; since by reason of the impending correction, compliance is in a high degree preferable to disobedience. And even where rewards are proposed as well as punishments threatened, the obligation of the law seems chiefly to consist in the penalty: for rewards, in their nature can only persuade and allure; nothing is compulsory but punishment.

§ 65. Mala in se and mala prohibita.—It is true, it hath been holden, and very justly, by the principal of our ethical writers, that human laws are binding upon men's consciences. But if that were the only, or most forcible obligation, the good only would regard the laws, and the bad would set them at defiance. And true as this principle is, it must still be understood with some restriction. It holds, I apprehend, as to rights; and that, when the law has determined the field to belong to Titius, it is matter of conscience no longer to withhold or to invade it. So also in regard to natural duties, and such offenses as are mala in se: here we are bound in conscience, because we are bound by superior laws, before those human laws were in being, to perform the one and abstain from the other. But in relation to those laws which enjoin only positive duties, and forbid only such things as are not mala in se but mala prohibita merely, [58] without any intermixture of moral guilt, annexing a penalty to noncompliance,<sup>1</sup> here I apprehend conscience is no further concerned, than by directing a submission to the penalty, in case of our breach of those laws: for otherwise the multitude of penal laws in a state would not only be looked upon as an impolitic, but would also be a very wicked thing; if every such law were a snare for the conscience of the subject. But in these cases the alternative is offered to every man; "either abstain from this, or submit to such a penalty": and his conscience will be clear, whichever side of the alternative he thinks proper to embrace. Thus, by the statutes for preserving the game, a penalty is denounced against every unqualified person that kills a hare, and against every person who possesses a partridge in August. And so, too, by other statutes, pecuniary penalties are inflicted for exercising trades without serving an apprenticeship thereto, for not burying the dead in woolen, for not performing the statute work on the public roads, and for innumerable other positive misdemeanors. Now these prohibitory laws do not make the transgression a moral offense, or sin: the only obligation in conscience is to submit to the penalty, if levied. It must, however, be observed, that we are here speaking of laws that are simply and purely penal, where the thing forbidden or enjoined is wholly a matter of indifference, and where the penalty inflicted is an adequate compensation for the civil inconvenience supposed to arise from the offense. But where disobedience to the law involves in it also any degree of public mischief or private injury, there it falls within our former distinction, and is also an offense against conscience.<sup>m</sup>

<sup>20</sup> In a case in which the penal clause was held unconstitutional, the court said: "It is not to be supposed that the legislature would have enacted this statute without such clause; and hence, the whole act fails." (State v. Hipp, 38 Ohio St. 199, 230.)

§ 66. Interpretation of laws.—I have now gone through the definition laid down of a municipal law; and have shown that it is "a rule—of civil conduct—prescribed—by the supreme power in a state— [59] commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong": in the explication of which I have endeavored to interweave a few useful principles, concerning the nature of civil government, and the obligation of human laws. Before I conclude this section, it may not be amiss to add a few observations concerning the interpretation of laws.

<sup>1</sup> See Book II, page *420.

<sup>m</sup> Lex pure pœnalis obligat tantum ad pœnam, non item ad culpam: lex pœnalis mixta et ad culpam obligat, et ad pœnam. (The object of a law purely penal regards the punishment solely, not the crime also: a mixed penal law involves both the crime and punishment.) (Sanderson de conscient. obligat. præl. viii. § 17. 24.)

§ 67. Roman method of interpretation.—When any doubt arose upon the construction of the Roman laws, the usage was to state the case to the emperor in writing, and take his opinion upon it. This was certainly a bad method of interpretation. To interrogate the legislature to decide particular disputes, is not only endless, but affords great room for partiality and oppression. The answers of the emperor were called his rescripts, and these had in succeeding cases the force of perpetual laws; though they ought to be carefully distinguished, by every rational civilian, from those general constitutions, which had only the nature of things for their guide. The Emperor Macrinus, as his historian, Capitolinus, informs us, had once resolved to abolish these rescripts, and retain only the general edicts: he could not bear that the hasty and crude answers of such princes as Commodus and Caracalla should be revered as laws. But Justinian thought otherwise,<sup>a</sup> and he has preserved them all. In like manner the canon laws, or decretal epistles of the popes, are all of them rescripts in the strictest sense. Contrary to all true forms of reasoning, they argue from particulars to generals.<sup>21</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Inst. 1. 2. 6.

---

<sup>21</sup> Authentic interpretation and declaratory laws.—This judgment passed upon authentic interpretation is now a just one; and, as Judge Cooley has well remarked, such interpretation is inadmissible where the legislative and judicial powers are distinctly separate. But it certainly is no more so than to assign to the judiciary the work of legislation. It would be better to allow the judges to refer the solution of doubtful questions to the legislature, as is not only permitted but required by several of the European codes, where their interpretation must in effect constitute new law, than to allow the judge to make such new law in deciding the case already before him, the facts of which have occurred before the change. If the interpretation is meant only to explain what is ambiguous in the existing law, it would seem that the author of that § 68. 1. Interpretation by the usual meaning of words.—The fairest and most rational method to interpret the will of the legislator is by exploring his intentions at the time when the law was made, by signs the most natural and probable. And these signs are either the words, the context, the subject matter, the effects and consequence, or the spirit and reason of the law. Let us take a short view of them all.

Words are generally to be understood in their usual and most known signification; not so much regarding the <sup>[60]</sup> propriety of grammar, as their general and popular use. Thus the law mentioned by Puffendorf,<sup>o</sup> which forbade a layman to lay hands on a priest, was adjudged to extend to him, who had hurt a priest with law should be the one best qualified to give it. This was the mediæval doctrine, following Justinian (Code, 1, 14, 12), who had decided the doubts earlier existing in favor of the power. It is remarkable, however, that he puts the emperor's power to interpret the laws upon the same base with his power to form law by judicial decision. The entire constitution is translated and commented on by Savigny, System, vol. 1, § 47, pp. 301-304. The glossators adopted the doctrine and greatly enlarged it. The maxim, ejus est interpretari legem cujus est condere (Code, 1, 14, 9; Novel 143, pr.; Digest, 28, 6, 43, pr.) was regarded as fundamental, and based in the very nature of the case. The interpretation of the sovereign became law as fully as the text that called for it, and was therefore binding on all inferior tribunals and persons not only in its direct terms, but also in all the consequences and analogies that could be derived from it. The interpretation of the courts, on the other hand, was held to have no authority beyond the particular case to which it was applied. To this extent interpretation was unavoidable; for without it there could be no comprehension of the law and therefore no application of it. But its extension to other cases was strictly forbidden, except where the delegated authority from the sovereign to make law could be implied. If we are to hold still to their theory that all law was of necessity created by the sovereign, it is difficult to see why this doctrine was not logical, or to show any right of the inferior magistratè to make law by interpretation, or in any other method. The only just ground upon which the formation of new law by the judge can be put, is to regard it as strictly a scientific process, by which law already existing in principle, although not distinctly stated in terms, is deduced in the form of new rules or expressions of the same substance, applicable to novel conjunctions of fact; and this unquestionably is the doctrine of the common law.

• L. of N. and N. 5. 12. 3.

---

The power of the English parliament to declare the meaning of their statutes or law of the kingdom in any form has never been disputed; nor could a weapon. Again: terms of art, or technical terms, must be taken according to the acceptance of the learned in each art, trade, and science. So in the act of settlement, where the crown of England is limited "to the Princess Sophia, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants," it becomes necessary to call in the assistance of lawyers, to ascertain the precise idea of the words "heirs of her body"; which in a legal sense comprise only certain of her lineal descendants. *Lastly, where words are clearly repugnant in two laws, the later law takes place of the elder: leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant (later laws repeal prior ones in conflict therewith) is a maxim of universal law, as well as of our own constitutions. And accordingly it was laid down by a law of the twelve tables at Rome, quod populus postremum jussit, id jus ratum esto (let that which the people have last decreed be considered law).*

* This passage, appearing in all editions from the first to the eighth, has been in the ninth and all subsequent editions transferred to page *89, post.

---

it well be, whether such declaratory statutes were intended to operate only for the future, or to act retrospectively by changing the law applicable to previous cases. But in this country the constitutional distinction between legislative and judicial power was alone sufficient, even without express restrictions, to prevent the exercise of authentic interpretation in any form. The power of the legislature is purely anticipatory; its rules can operate only after their enactment, or after the period when by the constitution of the state they take effect. The meaning of such laws in their application to individual cases, and consequently all questions as to what the law is or has been in the past, belong to the judiciary. (Dash v. Van Kleeck, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 494, 5 Am. Dec. 291.) The legislature cannot say what the meaning of a law is, after it is once enacted; any such infringement upon the functions of the courts is unconstitutional and void. But as they have the right of making law for the future, alike by altering former expressions of it and by adopting new ones a declaratory act may be held valid in its future effect, provided that was included in the legislative intention, even though it may have intended also to change a former statute from the date of its original enactment; such an act will be void only so far as retrospective.

Another distinction must be made in cases where a legislative act is intended to cure omissions and informalities and errors in the acts of other departments of the state or of inferior bodies, or to give legal force and effect to private acts, such as conveyances, etc., previously ineffectual. Such statutes may assume the form of declaratory acts interpreting the previous law; and even though they do not, it is evident that the same principles govern the legislator's power to change the effect of contemporaneous law, whether by the method § 69. 2. According to context.—If words happen to be still dubious, we may establish their meaning from the context; with which it may be of singular use to compare a word, or a sentence, whenever they are ambiguous, equivocal, or intricate. Thus the præm, or preamble, is often called in to help the construction of an act of parliament. Of the same nature and use is the comparison of a law with other laws, that are made by the same legislator, that have some affinity with the subject, or that expressly relate to the same point. Thus, when the law of England declares murder to be felony without benefit of clergy, we must resort to the same law of England to learn what the benefit of clergy is: and when the common law censures simoniacal contracts, it affords great light to the subject to consider what the canon law has adjudged to be simony.

§ 70. 3. According to subject matter.—As to the subject matter, words are always to be understood as having a regard thereto; for that is always supposed to be in the eye of the legislator, and all his expressions [<sup>61</sup>] directed to that end. Thus, when a law of our Edward III forbids all ecclesiastical persons to purchase provisions at Rome, it might seem to prohibit the buying of grain and other victual; but when we consider that the statute was made to repress the usurpations of the papal see, and that the nominations to benefices by the pope were called provisions, we shall see that the restraint is intended to be laid upon such provisions only.

of formal interpretation or otherwise. The rule generally laid down in such cases, whereby the legislature may validate such acts whenever they could constitutionally have dispensed with them in advance, is certainly open to the same objection with retrospective interpretation. To say what the effect of a law shall be at a certain time is the same thing in substance as saying what the language of that law should be. But the courts have uniformly sustained such corrective statutes whenever substantial justice has been done by them, even at the expense of technical legality.

There must be in every civilized state some power to save men from the effects of their own errors, mistakes, and accidents, wherever it can be done without injury to others: and that power is perhaps more safely lodged in the legislative body than in any other; at all events it is least likely to harm or be improvidently used when it comes in the form of a general rule.—HAMMOND.

§ 71. 4. According to the effect.—As to the effects and consequence, the rule is, that where words bear either none, or a very absurd signification, if literally understood, we must a little deviate from the received sense of them. Therefore the Bolognian law, mentioned by Puffendorf,<sup>p</sup> which enacted “that whoever drew blood in the streets should be punished with the utmost severity,” was held after long debate not to extend to the surgeon, who opened the vein of a person that fell down in the street with a fit.

§ 72. 5. According to the reason of the law.—But, lastly, the most universal and effectual way of discovering the true meaning of a law, when the words are dubious, is by considering the reason and spirit of it; or the cause which moved the legislator to enact it. For when this reason ceases, the law itself ought likewise to cease with it. An instance of this is given in a case put by Cicero, or whoever was the author of the rhetorical treatise inscribed to Herennius.<sup>q</sup> There was a law, that those who in a storm forsook the ship should forfeit all property therein; and the ship and lading should belong entirely to those who stayed in it. In a dangerous tempest all the mariners forsook the ship, except only one sick passenger, who by reason of his disease was unable to get out and escape. By chance the ship came safe to port. The sick man kept possession, and claimed the benefit of the law. Now here all the learned agree, that the sick man is not within the reason of the law; for the reason of making it was, to give encouragement to such as should venture their lives to save the vessel; but this is a merit [92] which he could never pretend to, who neither stayed in the ship upon that account, nor contributed anything to its preservation.

: § 73. a. Equity.—From this method of interpreting laws, by the reason of them, arises what we call equity; which is thus defined by Grotius,<sup>r</sup> “the correction of that, wherein the law (by reason of its universality) is deficient.” For since in laws all cases cannot be foreseen or expressed, it is necessary, that when the general decrees of the law come to be applied to particular cases, there should be somewhere a power vested of defining those circumstances, which (had they been foreseen) the legislator himself would have expressed. And these are the cases, which according to Grotius, "lex non exacte definit, sed arbitrio boni viri permittit" (the law does not define exactly, but leaves something to the discretion of a just and wise judge).<sup>22</sup>

<sup>p</sup> L. 5. c. 12. § 8.

<sup>q</sup> L. 1. c. 11. [This case is also discussed by Puffendorf, lib. 5, c. 12, § 10, and by Wolf, Jus Naturæ, pars. 6, § 489. It has been a favorite illustration with all recent writers.—HAMMOND.]

<sup>r</sup> De æquitate. § 3.

<sup>22</sup> Equitable interpretation.—Equity in this sense is not to be confused with that equitable or extraordinary jurisdiction of the court of chancery, now exercised also by other courts in connection with jurisdiction at law, which is frequently designated by the same name. There is, indeed, a historical connection between the two meanings. The chancellor's extraordinary jurisdiction had existed for at least two centuries before the term "equity" was applied to it: but in the sixteenth century the analogy between that and the equitable or honorary jurisdiction of the Roman prætor attracted so much attention, that equity came to be regarded as the ground upon which the chancellor exercised his extraordinary power. Lord Bacon is largely responsible, if not for the first introduction, yet at least for the acceptance of this term; and his Orders in Chancery furnish a good illustration of its original use, and the connection between its two meanings. The chancellor is to act "upon the particular circumstances of each individual case" (p. 61); and Chief Justice Vaughan used to express his astonishment to hear precedents quoted in chancery. But soon after, this became an established habit; chancery had its own course of procedure and its own rules based upon the decisions of prior chancellors, which gradually became elaborated into one of the most exact and technical systems of judge-made law that has ever existed. This only illustrates Blackstone's remark that "there can be no established rule and fixed precepts of equity laid down without destroying its very essence and reducing it to positive law" (p. 62). Equity in this sense thus became a collateral system of positive law and rights, for the most part covering subjects and relations unknown to the earlier law, but in many instances modifying legal rights and duties by disregarding technicalities and by the use of more flexible and effective remedies; in particular by its power to act directly upon the conscience of the defendant, and to direct his actions under penalty of imprisonment: a power unknown to the common law, the remedies of which could be given only through the action of its officers. Of equity in this sense more will be said in the notes to Book III, chapter 27, where it is discussed by the commentator.

Equity in the sense here used of a method of interpretation was familiar to the civilians, alike of the classic period and of the middle ages; and is recognized by English law as early as the coronation oath of Ethelred the Second in 975, and in the preface to Glanvill; but it was a part of the law

Equity thus depending, essentially, upon the particular circumstances of each individual case, there can be no established rules and fixed precepts of equity laid down, without destroying its very essence, and reducing it to a positive law. And, on the other hand, the liberty of considering all cases in an equitable light must not be indulged too far, lest thereby we destroy all law, and leave the decision of every question entirely in the breast of the judge. And administered by the ordinary courts of justice, which have always to the present day interpreted statutes as well as other writings equitably, without in any manner trenching upon the chancellor's jurisdiction. This is accurately described by Blackstone as depending upon the particular circumstances of each individual case: for law, by reason of its generality, must always be expressed in abstractions; the terms it employs do not describe precisely any act or event as it actually takes place. They disregard all the circumstances which give individuality and specific character to human affairs, as they disregard the name and personal identity of men and women, by framing their rules for classes of persons of greater or less extent. As a rule, the circumstances so disregarded are of no legal importance; but it is impossible to make such abstractions so perfectly that they will not in some cases leave out features that justly bear upon the results of the action and in other cases include in the general term features or marks that are not invariably found in the conception which the lawgiver had in mind. Thus, in the example given by Blackstone himself of a Bolognian law, drawing blood is used as the general mark of a class of assaults always violent and usually dangerous, which the law forbids: but when circumstances of a particular case are put in evidence, it may be found that such an assault has been committed, although no blood has been drawn; or, on the other hand, that blood is drawn for an entirely different purpose and without any assault. Such discrepancies are perhaps inevitable in the process of generalization by a finite mind: but they are made much more frequent and dangerous through the carelessness of legislators and the changes of meaning in human language.

Equity in this sense was correctly described long before Grotius by Aristotle, and substantially in the same way, as the correction of the deficiencies of the law by reason of its generality. It being the object of justice to reward every man according to his works, there must be in every system and form of law some method of noticing the individual peculiarities of a case, of recurring from the ultimate or legal facts to the evidential, in order to give these latter their due effect upon the judgment pronounced. In systems where the judge has to deal alike with fact and law, the rules of equitable interpretation form a system of great extent and complexity, as may be seen by looking into the civilians' books, especially such as Menochius de Presumptionibus and Mascardus, where the connection between this subject and the law of evidence is very fully illustrated. In the common law, its importance and field of action law, without equity, though hard and disagreeable, is much more desirable for the public good, than equity without law: which would make every judge a legislator, and introduce most infinite confusion; as there would then be almost as many different rules of action laid down in our courts, as there are differences of capacity and sentiment in the human mind.

are much diminished by the institution of the jury, who act upon equitable grounds very largely in finding their verdict, that is, in reducing the facts given them in evidence, which actually took place, to the general categories or ultimate facts in which the issue is expressed. Hence it has been said that the jury do always act equitably and play the chancellor's part.—HAMMOND.

SECTION THE THIRD.
OF THE LAWS OF ENGLAND.

§ 74. Divisions of the law of England.—<sup>[63]</sup> The municipal law of England, or the rule of civil conduct prescribed to the inhabitants of this kingdom, may with sufficient propriety be divided into two kinds; the lex non scripta, the unwritten or common law; and the lex scripta, the written or statute law.<sup>1</sup>

§ 75. 1. The unwritten, or common, law.—The lex non scripta, or unwritten law, includes not only general customs, or the common law properly so called; but also the particular customs of certain parts of the kingdom; and likewise those particular laws, that are by custom observed only in certain courts and jurisdictions.

When I call these parts of our law leges non scriptæ, I would not be understood as if all those laws were at present merely oral, or communicated from the former ages to the present solely by word of mouth. It is true, indeed, that, in the profound ignorance of letters which formerly overspread the whole western world, all laws were entirely traditional, for this plain reason, that the nations among which they prevailed had but little idea of writing. Thus the British as well as the Gallic druids committed all their laws as well as learning to memory;<sup>a</sup> and it is said of the primitive Saxons here, as well as their brethren on the Continent, that leges sola memoria et usu retinebant (they retained their laws solely by memory and custom).<sup>b</sup> But with us at present, the monuments

<sup>a</sup> Caes. de b. G. lib. 6. c. 13.

<sup>b</sup> Spelm. Gl. 362.

---

<sup>1</sup> Written law and unwritten law.—Law that has its source in legislation may be most accurately termed enacted law, all other forms being distinguished as unenacted. The more familiar term, however, is statute law as opposed to the common law; but this, though sufficiently correct for most purposes, is defective inasmuch as the word statute does not extend to all modes of legislation, but is limited to acts of parliament. Blackstone and other writers use the expressions written and unwritten law to indicate the distinction in question. Much law, however, is reduced to writing, even in its inception, besides that which originates in legislation. The terms are derived from the Romans, who meant by jus non scriptum customary law, all other, whether and evidences of our legal customs are contained in the records of the several courts of justice, in books of [64] reports and judicial decisions, and in the treatises of learned sages of the profession, preserved and handed down to us from the times of highest antiquity. However, I therefore style these parts of our law leges non scriptæ, because their original institution and authority are not set down in writing, as acts of parliament are, but they receive their binding power, and the force of laws, by long and immemorial usage, and by their universal reception throughout the kingdom. In like manner as Aulus Gellius defines the jus non scriptum (unwritten law) to be that, which is "tacito et illiterato hominum consensu et moribus expressum" (expressed or sanctioned by the tacit and unwritten customs and consent of men).

§ 76. a. Ancient customs.—Our ancient lawyers, and particularly Fortescue,<sup>o</sup> insist with abundance of warmth, that these customs are as old as the primitive Britons, and continued down, through the several mutations of government and inhabitants, to the present time, unchanged and unadulterated. This may be the case as to some: but in general, as Mr. Selden in his notes observes, this assertion must be understood with many grains of allowance; and ought only to signify, as the truth seems to be, that there never was any formal exchange of one system of laws for another: though doubtless by the intermixture of adventitious nations, the Romans, the Picts, the Saxons, the Danes, and the Normans, they must have insensibly introduced and incorporated many of their own customs with those that were before established: thereby in all probability improving the texture and wisdom of the whole, by the accumulated wisdom of divers particular countries. Our laws, saith Lord Bacon,<sup>d</sup> are mixed as our language: and as our language is so much the richer, the laws are the more complete.

<sup>o</sup> C. 17.

<sup>d</sup> See his proposals for a digest.

---

enacted or unenacted, being jus scriptum. We shall see later, that according to the older theory, as we find it in Blackstone and his predecessors, all English law proceeds either from legislation or from custom. The common law was customary, and therefore, adopting the Roman usage, unwritten law. All the residue was enacted, and therefore written law.—SALMOND, Jurisprudence, 115.

§ 77. b. Alfred's laws.—And indeed our antiquaries and first historians do all positively assure us that our body of laws is of this compounded nature. For they tell us that in the time of Alfred the local customs of the several provinces of the kingdom were grown so various, that he found it expedient to compile his dome-book or liber judicialis, for the general use of the whole king-<sup>[95]</sup> dom.<sup>2</sup> This book is said to have been extant so late as the reign of King Edward the Fourth, but is now unfortunately lost. It contained, we may probably suppose, the principal maxims of the common law, the penalties for misdemeanors, and the forms of judicial proceedings. Thus much may at least be collected from

<sup>2</sup> Origin of the common law.—These assertions of Blackstone as to the Dome-book of Alfred, in their literal meaning, can no longer be accepted, yet the fragments of the early English customs which still survive, among them being several attributed to the reign of Alfred, are sufficient to substantiate the general truth of the view, that the old English customary law was derived from very various sources.

Under the first princes of the Norman line, our ancestors were engaged in a frequent struggle to maintain certain institutions known by the appellation of the "Laws of Edward the Confessor"; and, inasmuch as the document which for long passed by that name has been decisively shown to be spurious, it seems probable that the phrase simply stood for those ancient English customs to which we have just referred, and with which, as representing the national aspirations of the conquered English, the name of the last legitimate English monarch was naturally connected. The Norman princes made frequent engagements to restore and maintain these laws, as the most popular act they could do, when pressed by foreign emergencies or domestic discontents. And it is not unreasonable to believe that these, or some other remains of the law established in this country before the Conquest, gave rise (in part at least) to that collection of maxims and customs which is now known by the name of the common law, a name either given to it in contradistinction to other laws—as the statute law, the civil law, the law-merchant, and the like—or, more probably, as the law common to all the realm.

To assign, however, to the common law no other original than this, would be to take an imperfect and erroneous view of the subject. For our system of tenures was chiefly constructed, if not first founded, by the Norman conqueror and his followers; and our ancient judicial forms and pleadings have little in common with the Anglo-Saxon style, and are in striking conformity with the Norman. Moreover, the general language of our law, and the terms of art familiarly used therein, are exclusively of French extraction. So that we are bound to recognize in the ancient law of Normandy another parent of the common law, and one from which it has inherited some of its most remarkable features.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 19.

that injunction to observe it, which we find in the laws of King Edward the Elder, the son of Alfred.* “Omnibus qui reipublicæ præsumt etiam atque etiam mando, ut omnibus æquos se præbeant iudices, perinde ac in judiciali libro (Saxonice, dom-bee) scriptum habetur: nec quicquam formident quin jus commune (Saxonice, folerihthe) audacter libereque dicant” (to all who preside over the republic, my positive and repeated injunction is, that they conduct themselves toward all as just judges, as it is written in the dome-book, and without fear boldly and freely declare the common law).

§ 78. c. Danish and Saxon laws.—But the irruption and establishment of the Danes in England, which followed soon after, introduced new customs, and caused this Code of Alfred in many provinces to fall into disuse: or at least to be mixed and debased with other laws of a coarser alloy. So that about the beginning of the eleventh century there were three principal systems of laws prevailing in different districts. 1. The Mercen-Lage, or Mercian laws, which were observed in many of the midland counties, and those bordering on the principality of Wales, the retreat of the ancient Britons: and therefore very probably intermixed with the British or Druidical customs. 2. The West-Saxon Lage, or laws of the West Saxons, which obtained in the counties to the south and west of the island, from Kent to Devonshire. These were probably much the same with the laws of Alfred above mentioned, being the municipal law of the far most considerable part of his dominions, and particularly including Berkshire, the seat of his peculiar residence. 3. The Dane-Lage, or Danish law, the very name of which speaks its original and composition. This was principally maintained in the rest of the midland counties, and also on the eastern coast, the part most exposed to the visits of that piratical people. As for the very northern provinces, they were at that time under a distinct government.†

§ 79. d. Laws of Edward the Confessor.—[66] Out of these three laws, Roger Hoveden ‡ and Ranulphus Cestrensis § inform us,

* C. 1.

‡ In Hen. II. (1154–1189).

† Hal. Hist. 55.

§ In Edw. Confessor (1042–1066).

King Edward the Confessor extracted one uniform law or digest of laws, to be observed throughout the whole kingdom; though Hoveden and the author of an old manuscript chronicle<sup>1</sup> assure us likewise, that this work was projected and begun by his grandfather, King Edgar. And indeed a general digest of the same nature has been constantly found expedient, and therefore put in practice by other great nations, which were formed from an assemblage of little provinces, governed by peculiar customs, as in Portugal, under King Edward, about the beginning of the fifteenth century.<sup>2</sup> In Spain under Alonzo X, who about the year 1250 executed the plan of his father, St. Ferdinand, and collected all the provincial customs into one uniform law, in the celebrated code entitled las partidas.<sup>3</sup> And in Sweden, about the same era, a universal body of common law was compiled out of the particular customs established by the laghman of every province, and entitled the land's lagh, being analogous to the common law of England.<sup>4</sup>

Both these undertakings, of King Edgar and Edward the Confessor, seem to have been no more than a new edition, or fresh promulgation, of Alfred's code or dome-book, with such additions and improvements as the experience of a century and an half had suggested. For Alfred is generally styled by the same historians the legum Anglicanarum conditor (the founder of the English laws), as Edward the Confessor is the restitutor (restorer). These, however, are the laws which our histories so often mention under the name of the laws of Edward the Confessor; which our ancestors struggled so hardly to maintain, under the first princes of the Norman line; and which subsequent princes so frequently promised to keep and restore, as the most popular act they could do, when pressed by foreign emergencies or domestic discontents. These are the laws, that so vigorously with- [67] stood the repeated attacks of the civil law; which established in the twelfth century a new Roman empire over most of the states of the Continent: states that have lost, and perhaps upon that account, their political liberties; while the free constitution of England, perhaps upon the same

<sup>1</sup> In Seld. ad Eadmer. 6.

<sup>2</sup> Mod. Un. Hist. xxii. 135.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid. xx. 211. [Las siete partidas, the seven parts, from the number of its principal divisions.]

<sup>4</sup> Ibid. xxxiii. 21. 58.

account, has been rather improved than debased.<sup>3</sup> These, in short, are the laws which gave rise and original to that collection of maxims and customs, which is now known by the name of the common law. A name either given to it, in contradistinction to other laws, as the statute law, the civil law, the law-merchant, and the like; or, more probably, as a law common to all the realm, the jus commune (common law) or folcright mentioned by King Edward the Elder, after the abolition of the several provincial customs and particular laws before mentioned.

§ 80. e. Source of validity of a custom.—But though this is the most likely foundation of this collection of maxims and customs, yet the maxims and customs, so collected, are of higher antiquity than memory or history can reach:<sup>4</sup> nothing being more

<sup>3</sup> I do not concur in the opinion of Blackstone that our present common law rests entirely upon these ancient customs, but I cite the passages to show that, in the opinion of a profound student of the history of our law, these customs were the only law administered or known by the courts at the time of their establishment.—CARTER, Law: Its Origin, Growth and Function, 62.

<sup>4</sup> Antiquity of the common law.—Much wit and some serious argument have been spent upon this doctrine of the immemorial antiquity of the common law. “Our English lawyers, prone to magnify the antiquity like the other merits of their system, are apt to carry up the date of the common law until, like the pedigree of an illustrious family, it loses itself in the obscurity of ancient times.” (Hallam.) The observation is not intended to be a complimentary one: yet it may be accepted as perfectly just. The common law and the family are alike abstractions, existing apart from the concrete members of which each is composed. The actual rules and customs of the common law may change almost with every generation. We may trace with the greatest ease the dying out of a large part of the institutions and usages and legal conceptions of the Year-Books, or the introduction at a much later period of most of those which fill our reports to-day. We may prove from history that the particular rules of law have their birth and continuance and decay as truly as the generations of men; and yet the system of common law as a whole may as truly be styled of immemorial antiquity as the succession of ancestors to whom the present representatives of a family owe their existence. The common law is common reason, and like that has an existence quite independent of its teachings to each successive generation.

There is, however, a sense in which this immemorial existence may justly be asserted of each common-law doctrine. The particular custom or maxim or rule which we now call a part of the common law cannot show the precise date of its birth, or its individual progenitors as every member of the family difficult than to ascertain the precise beginning and first spring of an ancient and long-established custom. Whence it is that in our law the goodness of a custom depends upon its having been used time out of mind; or, in the solemnity of our legal phrase, time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. This it is that gives it its weight and authority: and of this nature are the maxims and customs which compose the common law, or lex non scripta, of this kingdom.

§ 81. f. Divisions of the common law.—This unwritten, or common, law is properly distinguishable into three kinds: 1. General customs; which are the universal rule of the whole kingdom, and form the common law, in its stricter and more usual signification. 2. Particular customs; which for the most part affect only the inhabitants of particular districts. 3. Certain particular laws; which by custom are adopted and used by some particular courts, of pretty general and extensive jurisdiction.

can do. It has come “without observation” as a mere development or growth from what existed before it. It has not like a statute or a decision its fixed date of beginning, prior to which we can say that it was not. When it makes its first appearance, it is not as something new in principle, but only a new application of familiar and settled principles; and even this new application is to something of the same species or class with those previously governed by it. The common law changes only as the persons and things which are its objects change. It is easy to see that all the rules which govern the vast subject of railway communication—the relations of carriers to their passengers and the owners of their freight—must be very modern: for no such questions could have arisen sixty years ago. Yet by far the largest part of those new rules have been formed of the principles which regulated the stage-coach and the carrier’s wagon, modified only to fit the novel qualities possessed by a powerful, rapid, and dangerous means of communication. Tracing any one rule back from decision to decision, we cannot find at any step a place where the court has consciously made a new law. If each of these steps has differed a little from the one by which it was reached, still each rests upon its predecessor for all the authority which can be said to be purely legal. The mental operation of the judge in taking each step forward is of precisely the same nature with that taken in cases of no apparent novelty, where a law proved by the decision of A’s case against B is extended to the new case of C against D. The judge who finds a decision made in favor of a man against a woman, applies the same principle to the case of a woman against a man; he who reads a decision respecting the liability of a man who has kept a chained tiger § 82. (1) General customs.—<sup>(68)</sup> As to general customs, or the common law, properly so called; this is that law, by which proceedings and determinations in the king's ordinary courts of justice are guided and directed. This, for the most part, settles the course in which lands descend by inheritance; the manner and form of acquiring and transferring property; the solemnities and obligation of contracts; the rules of expounding wills, deeds, and acts of parliament; the respective remedies of civil injuries; the several species of temporal offenses, with the manner and degree of punishment; and an infinite number of minuter particulars, which diffuse themselves as extensively as the ordinary distribution of common justice requires. Thus, for example, that there shall be four superior courts of record, the chancery, the king's bench, the common pleas, and the exchequer;—that the eldest son alone is heir to his ancestor;—that property may be acquired and transferred by writing;—that a deed is of no validity unless sealed and delivered;—that wills shall be construed more favorably, and deeds more strictly;—that money lent upon bond is recoverable by action of debt;—that breaking the public peace is an offense, and punishable by fine and imprisonment;—all these are doctrines that are not set down in any written statute or ordinance, but depend merely upon immemorial usage, that is, upon common law, for their support.

Some have divided the common law into two principal grounds or foundations: 1. Established customs; such as that, where there applies it to the case of one who has built a reservoir stored with water (Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 341), without thinking in either case that the law he applies is affected. So the judge who decides that a clerk employed by the railroad company in Boston is a fellow-servant with the switchman who neglects his duty at Albany, is conscious of making no change in the law, though the decision from which he derives it related to an injury caused by one servant to another working in the same room. The law does not change; but the world it governs does. The immemorial quality of the common law is not affected by any novelty in its applications; and each of its rules is entitled to be considered immemorial also, if it is necessarily implied in the system, and if in tracing it back we can find no definite beginning, no point at which an act of legislation intervened.

It need scarcely be mentioned how intimately this doctrine is connected with that as to the true nature of judicial power. The two are merely different statements of the same truth; and each proves the other. If the judges made law instead of declaring it, every rule of the common law would have its fixed date of origin, and probably, also, its fixed date of repeal.—HAMMOND.

are three brothers, the eldest brother shall be heir to the second, in exclusion of the youngest: and 2. Established rules and maxims; as, "that the king can do no wrong, that no man shall be bound to accuse himself," and the like. But I take these to be one and the same thing. For the authority of these maxims rests entirely upon general reception and usage: and the only method of proving, that this or that maxim is a rule of the common law, is by showing that it hath been always the custom to observe it.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>5</sup> Customary law.—Blackstone has been followed almost or quite uniformly by later writers in rejecting the distinction between customs and maxims as parts of the common law, and reducing that law altogether to customary law, so called. In this he departs from the common usage of our earlier writers, all of whom recognize the distinction, when they discuss the subject at all, and attach more importance to the maxims than to custom itself: for instance, St. Germain, in the Doctor and Student, and Hale, in his History of the Common Law. Nor was it peculiar to English writers. Although the civilians did not in all cases recognize it, yet Ulpian points out very clearly the distinction between custom (consuetudo) and the consensus of opinion (mores) which is inferred from custom and gives it force: mores sunt consensus populi longa consuetudine inveteratus. (Ulpian, Frag. tit. 1, § 4.) So, also, Julian: Ancient custom (consuetudo) is not improperly kept for law; and this is the law which is said to be derived from usage (moribus). Also described by him as unwritten law—ea quæ sine ullo scripto populus probavit. (Dig. lib. 1, tit. 3, 132.)

In saying that the authority of these maxims rests entirely upon general reception and usage, and the only method of proving that this or that maxim is a rule of the common law is by showing that it hath been always the custom to observe it, Blackstone seems not sufficiently to distinguish the particular customs of which he is about to treat in the same connection, and those general customs which constitute the common law. The former must be proved by showing that it has always been the custom to observe them: for it is by their observance that the existence of the exception to the general custom is known. But certainly it is not true that a rule of the common law must or can be shown to exist by evidence of usage under it. On the other hand, as Blackstone himself immediately points out, "the principal and most authoritative evidence that can be given of the existence of such a custom as shall form a part of the common law," is found in judicial decisions: and when these judicial decisions are examined, it is plain that the legal part of them, as distinct from findings of fact, rests not upon proof of general usage, but upon appeals to the common sense and convictions of the community. It is evident that the binding force of a custom is found in the rule or maxim deduced from it rather than the binding force of the maxim found in the usage from which it is deduced. No custom is obligatory in itself, because there is no reason why from the mere repetition of acts there should spring an obligation to continue § 83. (a) Precedents.—<sup>[68]</sup> But here a very natural, and very material, question arises: how are these customs or maxims to be known, and by whom is their validity to be determined? The answer is, by the judges in the several courts of justice. They are the depositaries of the laws; the living oracles, who must decide in all cases of doubt, and who are bound by an oath to decide according to the law of the land. Their knowledge of that law is derived from experience and study; from the "viginti annorum lucubrationes" (the lucubrations of twenty years), which Fortescue<sup>n</sup> mentions; and from being long personally accustomed to the judicial decisions of their predecessors. And indeed these judicial decisions are the principal and most authoritative evidence, that can be given, of the existence of such a custom as shall form a part of the common law. The judgment itself, and all the proceedings previous thereto, are carefully registered and preserved, under the name of records, in public repositories set apart for that particular purpose; and further the acts so repeated. (Hellfeld, Jurispr. Forensis, § 84.) Thomasius appears to be the first who saw the full force of this difficulty. Previous writers had been in the habit of assuming that custom made law directly and without any intermediate step. To avoid the difficulty he proposed the distinction since formulated as that between principium essendi and principium cognoscendi, or the source of the law's existence and the source of our knowledge of the law: and he allowed custom to be a source of law only in the latter sense. He said: "It is not the custom itself that we respect as law, but it is the rule or contract or other obligation, the existence of which is presumed from the usage." Since his time many efforts have been made to explain the origin of law in custom; but no one has been able to show how an obligation to do a thing, still less a command to do it, may be deduced from the habit of doing it. There must be a conviction of right or duty formed from the custom before we can deduce a law. Thus, to take Hale's and Blackstone's illustration. (Hale's History of the Common Law, p. 221.) The custom of primogeniture binds no one to yield to an older brother until it produces a common conviction that the oldest has a right to take all the inheritance. How does it produce this conviction? Not directly in the form of a law: we can trace no necessary connection of thought between the usage and the rule; but there seems to be a natural connection between the usage and the right. What a man has usually received from others or at others' expense, he naturally expects to have continued; and the precedents are, not only to him but to others, strong arguments for his right so to do. What men in certain circumstances have uniformly obtained, a new man in the same circumstances may to them frequent recourse is had, when any critical question arises, in the determination of which former precedents may give light or assistance. And therefore, even so early as the Conquest, we find the "præteritorum memoria eventorum" (the remembrance of past events) reckoned up as one of the chief qualifications of those, who were held to be "legibus patriæ optime instituti" (best instructed in the laws of their country).<sup>o</sup> For it is an established rule to abide by former precedents, where the same points come again in litigation: as well to keep the scale of justice even and steady, and not liable to waver with every new judge's opinion; as also because the law in that case being solemnly declared and determined, what before was uncertain, and perhaps indifferent, is now become a permanent rule, which it is not in the breast of any subsequent judge to alter or vary from, according to his private sentiments: he being sworn to determine not according to his own private judgment, but according to the known laws and customs of the land; not delegated to pronounce a new law, but to reasonably claim on the ground of his equality with the rest. Even a person who has habitually done a thing disadvantageous to himself will recognize the custom as presumptive evidence of a duty to continue it in another's interest, if that other demands it. If he would deny this, he will deny, not that the custom exists, but that it constitutes a duty; and even then he will admit the presumption drawn from the usage as throwing upon himself the burden of showing that the payment or other thing done was not obligatory. The holder of a right will assume that the custom operating for his benefit is an obligatory one, without having any motive to distinguish between the custom and the right founded on it. It is thus by the extension of rights that custom, for the most part, operates: and usage converting even voluntary concessions into enforceable rights, the law, or the rule, only makes its appearance afterwards, when for any purpose it is desirable to state the contents of the right and its corresponding duties in an abstract form.

<sup>n</sup> Cap. 8.

---

<sup>o</sup> Seld. Review of Tith. c. 8.

Again, it is plain that custom alone does not sufficiently account for the existence of law, if we reflect that there are numberless customs in every nation which the state does not enforce. There must, then, be some distinction, some element combined with the custom, which is wanting in the latter cases, and which gives to the enforceable custom the character of law. Mr. Austin has noticed this, and asked why such laws as those of fashion and others not enforceable are to be excluded from the definition of law. He answers in effect by saying that they are excluded because the state does not enforce them. This is consistent with his assumption that the arbitrary will maintain and expound the old one.<sup>6</sup> Yet this rule admits of exception, where the former determination is most evidently contrary to reason; [70] much more if it be clearly contrary to the divine law. But even in such cases the subsequent judges do not pretend to make a new law, but to vindicate the old one from misrepresentation. For if it be found that the former decision is manifestly absurd or unjust, it is declared, not that such a sentence was bad law, but that it was not law; that is, that it is not the established of the state is all that constitutes law; but when we notice the fact, not merely that it does not supply any criterion for determining in advance what laws shall be enforced and what not, but also that it gives no reason upon which the judge himself can determine whether to enforce a law or not, except his own judgment, it will seem that this is hardly more than saying that these laws and others grouped by him under the name of positive morality are not enforceable because they are not enforced. (Austin, Lectures upon Jurisprudence, Lecture 5, vol. 1, pp. 187-189, etc.; E. C. Clark, Practical Jurisprudence, pp. 276-280.)

We must look, then, for some other element than the mere custom to constitute law: it is that common conviction of right, often vaguely termed natural reason, right reason, etc., which converts certain customs into the form of legal rights and duties or of maxims and rules. The connection of this with custom and customary law was long clouded by the belief that all the rules of nature and of reason were innate, immutable, independent of all changing circumstance. Human custom often changing and visibly subject to varying influences could not constitute, it was thought, laws of such dignity as this. But we can now see that this conviction of right may operate upon any facts presented to it and formulate a rule without necessarily making it eternal. If new customs arise under changing circumstances of a community, and are of such a nature that the public weal requires them to be enforced, this conviction operates at once upon them, and converts the mere custom into law. Thus, by a marked example, the common law, which till recently recognized no right of property in running water, and still adheres to that rule in England and most of the older states, has lately in California and elsewhere evolved a law of irrigation, etc., based upon the changed customs of agriculture in those states. (Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674, and cases cited.) Still more frequently a change of customs forms new law by bringing new subjects under rules formerly not applicable to them; as when the same water, forming ice, is brought within the conception of property by the increased use of that substance and its consequent commercial value.—HAMMOND.

<sup>6</sup> Doctrine of precedents.—Ever since the reign of Edward I there have been lawyers who have made it their business to report the discussions in court and the judgments given in cases which seemed of legal interest. Thus we have the Year-Books, which are reports of cases made by anonymous custom of the realm, as has been erroneously determined. And hence it is that our lawyers are with justice so copious in their encomiums on the reason of the common law; that they tell us, that the law is the perfection of reason, that it always intends to conform thereto, and that what is not reason is not law. Not that the particular reason of every rule in the law can at this distance of time be always precisely assigned; but it is sufficient that there be nothing in the rule flatly contradictory to reason, and then the reporters from the time of Edward I to that of Henry VIII. These are followed by reports produced by lawyers reporting under their own names, reaching down to our own time, and receiving fresh additions every year. At the beginning these reports seem to have served mainly the purpose of instruction and information. The fact that a judge had stated that such and such was the law was evidence, but not more than evidence, that such was the law. He might have been mistaken; another judge might perhaps decide differently. But in course of time we find a change in the attitude of judges and lawyers towards reported decisions. The citation of decided cases becomes more frequent; greater and greater weight is attached to them as authorities. From the sixteenth century onwards, if not earlier, we may say that decided cases are regarded as a definite authority, which, at least in the absence of special reasons to the contrary, must be followed for the future. For the last three hundred years, at any rate, the decisions of judges of the higher courts have had a binding force for all similar cases which may arise in the future. This binding force is not, however, in all cases an irresistible one. The highest court of appeal in the country for the overwhelming majority of English cases—the house of lords—has held more than once during the last hundred years that it will not allow a previous decision given by it to be called in question. It seems unlikely that in the future it will depart from this view of the absolutely binding nature of its own decisions. All English courts which rank below the house of lords are absolutely bound by its decisions. So, too, the judgments of the court of appeal, which stands next below the house of lords, are binding declarations of the law for all lower courts, and even for itself. There have, however, been one or two cases in which a decision of the court of appeal, when given in obvious forgetfulness of what had been previously decided, has not been followed, even by a lower court.

A decision given by a court lower than the court of appeal is binding on courts of equal rank, except where it is clearly inconsistent with established principles of law, or where there is no previously settled rule which is clearly more reasonable. On the other hand, a decision of a lower court is not, in the first instance, binding on any court ranking above it. But in the course of time it may acquire an authority which even a higher court will not disregard. It may happen that a question has never been carried up to the court of appeal or to the house of lords, but that the lower courts have repeat-law will presume it to be well founded.<sup>p</sup> And it hath been an ancient observation in the laws of England, that whenever a standing rule of law, of which the reason perhaps could not be remembered or discerned, hath been wantonly broken in upon by statutes or new resolutions, the wisdom of the rule hath in the end appeared from the inconveniences that have followed the innovation.

§ 84. (b) Judicial decisions evidence of the common law.— The doctrine of the law then is this: that precedents and rules must be followed, unless flatly absurd or unjust: for though their <sup>p</sup> Herein agreeing with the civil law, Ff. 1. 3. 20. 21. "Non omnium, quæ a majoribus nostris constituta sunt, ratio reddi potest. Et ideo rationes eorum, quæ constituuntur, inquiri non oportet: alioquin multa ex his, quæ certa sunt, subvertuntur (reasons cannot be given for all the laws which our ancestors have established; therefore we should not seek them; otherwise many of the laws which are established would be subverted).

---

edly decided it in the same way; or it may be that even a single decision of a lower court has remained for a long time unquestioned. In such a case the necessary result will be that lawyers and the public have come to regard such a decision as law, and have acted as if it was law. People will have made contracts, carried on business, disposed of their property, on the faith of such a decision, and the reversal of the rule would involve enormous hardship. It is often more important that the law should be certain, than that it should be perfect. The consequence is that even a higher court, though it may think a decision of a lower court wrong in principle, will refuse to overrule it, holding that the evil of upsetting what everyone has treated as established is greater than the evil of allowing a mistaken rule to stand. The cure in such a case is an alteration of the law by statute, for an alteration by statute does not work the same hardship as a reversal by a higher court of what was supposed to be the law. A statute need not, and as a rule does not, affect anything done before it was passed. Previous transactions remain governed by the law in force at the time they were made. But the theory or fiction of our case law is that the judge does not make new law, but only declares what was already law; so that if a higher court overrules the decision of a lower court, it declares that what was supposed to be law never really was law, and consequently past transactions will be governed by a rule contrary to what the parties believed to be law. A curious case occurred recently with regard to the Earldom of Norfolk, where the house of lords held that the rule that a peerage cannot be surrendered, though it was first established in the seventeenth century, must be treated as having been in force at the beginning of the fourteenth century. "Whenever," said Lord Davey, "a court or this house acting judicially declares the law, it is presumed to lay down what the reason be not obvious at first view, yet we owe such a deference to former times as not to suppose they acted wholly without consideration. To illustrate this doctrine by examples: It has been determined, time out of mind, that a brother of the half blood shall never succeed as heir to the estate of his half-brother, but it shall rather escheat to the king, or other superior lord. Now, this is a positive law, fixed and established by custom, which custom is evidenced by judicial decisions; and therefore can never be departed from by any modern judge without a breach of his oath and law is and was, although it may have been misunderstood in former days."—GELDART, Elements of English Law, 13.

For further references on the law of judicial precedents, see Pollock, First Book of Jurisprudence, pt. II, c. VI; Vinogradoff, Common-Sense in Law, c. VII; Holland, Jurisprudence (11th ed.), 69; Gray, Nature and Sources of Law, c. IX; Dillon, Laws and Jurisprudence, 229 ff; Pound, Readings in the Com. Law, 97 ff.

Ratio decidendi and obiter dictum.—If you open a volume of the Law Reports and read the report of a case, how will you discover the law which the decision lays down? How will you find what is called the ratio decidendi—the principle on which the decision is based? Remember that the judge is not a legislator. It is not his business—in form at any rate—to make rules of law; his first duty is to decide the dispute between the parties. The dispute may be largely a question of fact. In some cases the questions of fact will have been already answered by a jury; in others the judge himself will have to decide questions of fact. At any rate, the judgment will involve the application of principles of law to concrete facts. The reader of a Law Report must therefore first disentangle the law stated in a judgment from the facts to which it is applied. That may be a difficult matter. No form is prescribed in which judgments must be delivered, and it may often be a matter of doubt how far a decision turns on the view which the judge took of the facts, and how far on a rule of law which he considered applicable. The headnote which is put at the beginning of a report of a case generally contains a statement of the rule supposed to be involved. But this headnote is not part of the report; it is merely the reporter's own view of the effect of the judgment. In using a Law Report, therefore, everyone is free, where there is room for doubt, to hold his own view of what was the law laid down in any particular case, unless and until the doubt has been settled by a subsequent decision.

From the ratio decidendi we must carefully distinguish what are called dicta or obiter dicta—"things said by the way." An obiter dictum, strictly speaking, is a statement of the law made in the course of a judgment, not professing to be applicable to the actual question between the parties, but made by way of explanation or illustration or general exposition of the law. Such dicta have no binding force, though they have an authority which is

[71] the law. For herein there is nothing repugnant to natural justice; though the artificial reason of it, drawn from the feudal law, may not be quite obvious to everybody. And therefore, on account of a supposed hardship upon the half-brother, a modern judge might wish it had been otherwise settled, yet it is not in his power to alter it. But if any court were now to determine, that an elder brother of the half blood might enter upon and seize any lands that were purchased by his younger brother, no subsequent judges would scruple to declare that such prior determination was unjust, was unreasonable, and therefore was not law. So that the law, and the opinion of the judge, are not always convertible terms, or one and the same thing; since it sometimes may happen that the judge may mistake the law. Upon the whole, however, we may take it as a general rule, “that the decisions of courts of justice are the evidence of what is common law”; in the same manner as, in the civil law, what the emperor had once determined was to serve for a guide for the future.<sup>a</sup>

§ 85. (c) Reports.—The decisions, therefore, of courts are held in the highest regard, and are not only preserved as authentic <sup>a</sup> “Si imperialis majestas causam cognitionaliter examinaverit, et partibus, cominus constitutis sententiam dixerit, omnes omnino judices, qui sub nostro imperio sunt, sciant hanc esse legem, non solum illi causæ pro qua producta est, sed et in omnibus similibus” (if the emperor shall have examined the cause, and shall immediately declare his opinion, let all the judges of the land know that this is law, not only with respect to that cause which first produced the opinion, but to every other of the like nature). C. 1. 14. 12.

---

entitled to respect and which will vary according to the reputation of the particular judge.

We sometimes find that a judge in deciding a case will profess to decide it on a principle really wider than is necessary for the purpose, when it might have been decided on some already recognized but much narrower ground. In such a case the supposed principle is in effect equivalent to an obiter dictum; it will not be treated as the true ratio decidendi of the case. But of course it may be a difficult problem to determine how far the rule is really wider than necessary.

Another difficulty sometimes occurs where the judges of a court agree in the result, but give different reasons. In such cases the matter is left open for a judge in a subsequent case to decide which reason is the right one.—GELDART, Elements of English Law, 17.

records in the treasuries of the several courts, but are handed out to public view in the numerous volumes of reports which furnish the lawyer's library.<sup>7</sup> These reports are histories of the several cases, with a short summary of the proceedings, which are preserved at large in the record; the arguments on both sides and the reasons the court gave for its judgment; taken down in short notes by persons present at the determination. And these serve as indexes to, and also to explain the records; which always, in matters of consequence and nicety, the judges direct to be searched. The reports are extant in a regular series from the reign of King Edward the Second, inclusive; and from his time to that of Henry the Eighth [72] were taken by the prothonotaries, or chief scribes of the court, at the expense of the crown, and published annually, whence they are known under the denomination of the Year-Books. And it is much to be wished that this beneficial custom had, under proper regulations, been continued to this day: for, <sup>7</sup> Law reporters.—"Till quite recent years it was believed that the Year-Books, at all events the Year-Books from Edward III's reign down to Henry VII's reign, were compiled by official reporters paid by the crown. This belief, which was shared by Coke, Bacon, and Blackstone (Blackstone adds or invents the information that the reports were made by the prothonotaries), ultimately rests upon some words used by Plowden in the preface to his reports. 'As I have been credibly informed,' he says, 'there were anciently four reporters of cases in our law who were chosen and appointed for that purpose, and had a yearly stipend from the king for their trouble therein; which persons used to confer together at the making and collecting of a report, and their report being made and settled by so many, and by men of such approved learning, carried great credit with it.' It is clear that Plowden's statement rested merely upon report; and the statements of later authorities are merely amplifications of his words."—HOLDSWORTH, 2 Hist. Eng. Law, 451.

A view of the origin of the Year-Books, upholding Blackstone in the main, will be found in 27 Law Quart. Rev. 279.

"The Year-Books are not elementary reading, and are not very often referred to in court nowadays, though oftener than they were fifty or sixty years ago. Many lawyers in good business have never read a word of them, and would barely know how to refer to them. Yet some knowledge of them is needful for everyone who wishes to know the law as a scholar and not merely as a practitioner; and those who pay special attention to the law of real property not unfrequently find such knowledge useful in practice. Kent's opinion, expressed less than seventy years ago (his Preface to the first volume of Commentaries on American Law is dated 23d November, 1826), that the Year-Books 'are not worth the labor and expense either of a new edition or a translation,' though King James the First, at the instance of Lord Bacon, appointed two reporters<sup>r</sup> with a handsome stipend for this purpose, yet that wise institution was soon neglected, and from the reign of Henry the Eighth to the present time this task has been executed by many private and contemporary hands; who sometimes through haste and inaccuracy, sometimes through mistake and want of skill, have published very crude and imperfect (perhaps contradictory) accounts of one and the same determination. Some of the most valuable of the ancient reports are those published by Lord Chief Justice Coke, a man of infinite learning in his profession, has been refuted, instead of being confirmed, by subsequent experience on both sides of the Atlantic. . . .

<sup>r</sup> Pat. 15 Jac. I. (1617) p. 18. 17 Raym. 26.

---

“When unofficial reports were first printed, it was with apologies and professed reluctance. The learned reporter assures us that he took notes in court only for his own use, but his friends must needs borrow and copy them; then he was entreated to publish; and while he was hesitating, he learned that some bookseller would bring out a piratical and probably corrupt edition if he did not without more loss of time bring out an authentic one. Such is Plowden’s story in the Preface to his Reports, dated 1578, which served as a model for many others. Doubtless MS. notes of cases were freely handed about among barristers and students, as lecture-notes are to this day in the universities; Coke alludes to this practice when he says in the Preface to the First Part of his own Reports—‘I like not of those that stuff their studies with wandering and masterless reports.’ As late as 1765 Sir James Burrow wrote in the Preface to his Reports, ‘I found myself reduced to the necessity of either destroying or publishing these papers (which were originally intended for my own private uses and not for public inspection).’ Later still, in 1789, Kirby of Connecticut, the father of American reporters, declared that he ‘had entered upon this business in a partial manner, for private use.’ Dyer’s Reports, first published in 1585, fifteen years before the earliest of Coke’s, are the leading example of posthumous collections made up from materials not published by the reporter in his lifetime. Such collections have been of the most various degrees of merit. Wallace on the Reporters is the best guide to a critical appreciation of the earlier books of reports. . . .

“Sir James Burrow’s Reports, dating from 1756 and first published in 1765 (which was also the year of publication of Blackstone’s Commentaries), may be considered the earliest of the modern type. From that time the court of king’s bench and its successors have never wanted a reporter; we can go back year by year without a break from the current queen’s bench division [this was written in 1896] part of the law reports to the first volume of Burrow. In the court of common pleas and in chancery the succession was established though not a little infected with the pedantry and quaintness of the times he lived in, which appear strongly in all his works. However, his writings are so highly esteemed, that they are generally cited without the author's name.*

§ 86. (d) Writings of the sages of the law.—Besides these reporters, there are also other authors, to whom great veneration and respect is paid by the students of the common law.<sup>8</sup> Such are

* His reports, for instance, are styled, κατ' ἐξοχην (by way of pre-eminence), the reports; and in quoting them we usually say, 1 or 2 Rep. not 1 or 2 Coke's Rep. as in citing other authors. The reports of Judge Croke are also cited in a peculiar manner, by the name of those princes, in whose reigns the cases reported in his three volumes were determined; viz., Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King Charles the First; as well as by the number of each volume. For sometimes we call them 1, 2, and 3 Cro. but more commonly Cro. Eliz., Cro. Jac., and Cro. Car.

---

a score of years later, and in the court of exchequer (then much below the others in dignity and repute) only many years later still. . . .

"The reports issued by disconnected private enterprise were, with few exceptions, good enough in substance, and some were very good indeed; but they were costly, bulky, and dilatory, and, as Lord Justice Lindley has said, 'the waste of labor, time, and money was prodigious.' (Law Quart. Rev., i. 138. More detail will be found there, and in the late Mr. Daniel's History and Origin of the Law Reports, London, 1884, of which the Lord Justice's article was a review.) In 1863 the English bar took the matter into their own hands, and the labors of a committee appointed to consider what could be done resulted in the establishment of the Council of Law Reporting, a directing body which represents the inns of court, and now also the General Council of the Bar.

"From 1865 onwards the Law Reports have been carried on by the council in the interest of the profession as a co-operative and self-supporting enterprise. The example set by the English Law Reports was in course of time followed in Ireland, and to a certain extent in British India. Arrangements analogous, in varying degrees, to those of the English 'authorized' reports exist in the federal and state jurisdictions of the United States, and in the larger self-governing British colonies. In America 'the reporters of the supreme court of the United States and of most, perhaps of all, the state courts of last resort, are public officials duly elected or appointed' (Wambaugh, The Study of Cases, 2d ed., 1894, p. 109), and accordingly the reports are constantly described as official, a term which English lawyers have avoided."—POLLOCK, First Book of Jurisprudence, 285 ff.

<sup>8</sup> Legal treatises.—The leading authorities, in the way of legal writers and the treatises they composed, prior to Blackstone, will be briefly discussed

Glanvill and Bracton, Britton and Fleta, Hengham and Littleton, Statham, Brooke, Fitzherbert, and Staundforde,* with some others of ancient date, whose treatises are cited as authority; and are evidence that cases have formerly happened in which such and such points were determined, which are now become settled and first principles. One of the last of these methodical writers in point of time, whose works are of any intrinsic authority in the courts of justice, and do not entirely depend on the strength of their

* The names in italics were first added in the ninth edition.

---

in this note. What is here said is based in considerable part upon Professor Heinrich Brunner's Sources of English Law, 2 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History, 7-52.

Dialogus de Scaccario.—The Dialogus de Scaccario, a treatise in the form of a dialogue on the constitution and administration of the Royal Exchequer. It is also valuable for private law and procedure. "It bears witness to the early maturity of administrative processes in the Norman constitution, a remarkable evidence of the spirit of centralization and the bureaucratic conception of the state, without a parallel in the Middle Ages." 1 Gneist, Verwaltungsrecht, 201. The Dialogus was written in 1178 or 1179 by Richard Fitz Nigel or Neal, Archdeacon of Ely, and later Bishop of London. A reprint with somewhat amended text is found in Stubbs, Select Charters, 199. A later critical edition, by Hughes, Crump and Johnson, with introduction and copious commentary, was published in 1902. A careful study of the author and his work is found in Liebermann, Einleitung in den Dialogus de Scaccario, 1875. See 1 Pollock & Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 161.

Glanvill.—Glanvill's Treatise, the first classical law book of England, and at the same time "the first attempt at a scientific exposition of native law in modern Europe." Gundermann, Englisches Privatrecht, 61. The work was written between 1187 and 1189. The author was Ranulf Glanvill, who "held the helm of justice" from 1180-1189, and was not without some share in the reforms of Henry II. (Doubt is cast upon Glanvill's authorship of this celebrated book in 1 Pollock & Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 163.) The writer knew something of Roman and canon law, and the beginning of the prologue is modeled after that of the Institutes of Justinian. The treatise is an accurate and luminous exposition of the practice of the king's court, as it had been settled on the basis of Henry's reforms. Glanvill's book became popular. Many manuscripts are yet extant. Seventy years after it was written lawyers were still using it and endeavoring to bring it up to date. It was translated into French. A version of it under the name of Regiam Maiestatem (the opening words) became current in Scotland. "It is the earliest text-book of feudal jurisprudence." The modern English translation with notes by J. Beames, and introduction by Professor Joseph H. Beale was quotations from older authors, is the [78] same learned judge we have just mentioned, Sir Edward Coke; who hath written four volumes of Institutes, as he is pleased to call them, though they have little of the institutional method to warrant such a title. The first volume is a very extensive comment upon a little excellent treatise of tenures, compiled by Judge Littleton in the reign of Edward the Fourth. This comment is a rich mine of valuable common-law learning, collected and heaped together from the published in 1900. A new and critical edition is in course of preparation for the publications of the Selden Society. See 1 Pollock & Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 162-166. Chapter VI of Book I of this scholarly work is entitled, "The Age of Glanvill."

Bracton.—"Bracton's book is the crown and flower of English mediæval jurisprudence. What we know of its author has been written elsewhere, and may here be summed up very briefly. His name was Henry Bracton; he was a Devonshire man, and in all likelihood he began his career as William Raleigh's clerk. In 1245 he was already a justice in eyre and was holding a dispensation granted by Raleigh and confirmed by Innocent IV for the tenure of three benefices. From 1248 until his death in 1268 he steadily took assizes in the southwestern counties. From 1248 to 1257 or thereabouts he was among the justices who held pleas coram ipso rege: in other words, he was a justice of the nascent court of king's bench, and the very highest places in church and state must have seemed to be open to him. We may see him witnessing the king's charters along with the great folk of the realm. Shortly after this, however, he appears to have retired or been dismissed from his position in the central court, though to his dying day he acted as a justice of assize. In 1259 he became rector of the Devonshire parish of Combe-in-Teignhead, in 1261 rector of Bideford, in 1264 archdeacon of Barnstaple, and in the same year chancellor of Exeter cathedral. Thus he seems to have left the king's court just at the time when the revolutionary movement that preceded the barons' war came to its first crisis; and just about the same time he was told to restore to the treasury the large store of plea rolls, those of Martin Pateshull and William Raleigh, which had been in his possession. Whether he was disgraced, and, if so, whether he had offended the king or the barons, we cannot as yet decide. In the last year of his life, in 1267, he appeared once more in a prominent place; he was a member of a commission of prelates, magnates and justices appointed to hear the complaints of 'the disinherited': that is, of those who had sided with Simon de Montfort.

"His is an unfinished book; we do not know that it was published in his lifetime. The main part of it seems to have been written between 1250 and 1258, the time when he had to surrender the plea rolls; apparently he was still glossing and annotating it at a later time; but at present we cannot always distinguish his own addiciones from those of later commentators. A 'note-ancient reports and Year-Books, but greatly defective in method.* The second volume is a comment upon many old acts of parliament, without any systematical order; the third a more methodical treatise of the pleas of the crown; and the fourth an account of the several species of courts.†

And thus much for the first ground and chief corner-stone of the laws of England, which is general immemorial custom, or common law, from time to time declared in the decisions of the courts of justice; which decisions are preserved among our public records, explained in our reports, and digested for general use in the authoritative writings of the venerable sages of the law.

* It is usually cited either by the name of Co. Litt. or as 1 Inst.

† These are cited as 2, 3, or 4 Inst. without any author's name. An honorary distinction, which, we observed, is paid to the works of no other writer; the generality of reports and other tracts being quoted in the name of the compiler, as 2 Ventris, 4 Leonard, 1 Siderfin, and the like.

---

book' has come down to us which seems to have been his. It contains some two thousand cases copied from the rolls of Pateshull and Raleigh, over against some of which marginal notes have been written; to all appearance they came from Bracton's hand or from Bracton's head. . . . Bracton's debt—and therefore our debt—to the civilians is inestimably great. But for them, his book would have been impossible; but for them, as the fourteenth century will show us, some beggarly collection of annotated writs would have been the best that we should have had from him; we should have missed not only the splendid plan, the orderly arrangement, the keen dilemmas, but also the sacerdotal spirit of the work.

“On the other hand, the main matter of his treatise is genuine English law laboriously collected out of the plea rolls of the king's court. He expressly cites some five hundred decisions, and whenever we compare his treatise with the records—and this can now be done at innumerable points—he seems to be fairly stating the practice of the king's court.” Pollock & Maitland, 1 Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 206.

An edition of Bracton's Treatise on the Laws and Customs of England was published in 1569 and reprinted in 1640. Sir Travers Twiss issued a new edition with an English translation, in six volumes, in 1878 ff. Shortly after its publication, Professor Vinogradoff discovered in the British Museum a manuscript covering some 2,000 cases of the time of Henry III, which Bracton had used in writing his treatise, and to which he had made marginal annotations. This was edited as Bracton's Note-Book, 1887, by Maitland.

Fleta.—The so-called “Fleta” is the work of an unknown jurist, getting its name from the fact that it was written in the Fleet Prison. It dates from § 87. (e) Regard of the Roman law for custom.—The Roman law, as practiced in the times of its liberty, paid also a great regard to custom; but not so much as our law: it only then adopting it, when the written law was deficient. Though the reasons alleged in the digest<sup>v</sup> will fully justify our practice, in making it of equal v ff. l. 3. 32.

---

about 1290. The book was printed in 1647 and 1685. Both editions have as an appendix the valuable Dissertatio ad Fletam by Selden.

Thornton.—Gilbert Thornton made an epitome of Bracton's treatise about 1292. The work is lost, unless it be represented by some of the manuscripts of Bracton's work. Pollock & Maitland, 1 Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 210.

Britton.—The treatise going by the name of Britton has more claims to originality than the two last. It was probably written shortly after 1290. It is thought by its latest editor to owe its origin to a project of Edward I to cause a compilation of the English law to be made after the manner of Justinian's Institutes. It must have been useful, judging from the number of manuscripts. It is the oldest English law book written in French. The earlier editions have been superseded by the careful edition by Nichols, 1865, 2 vols., with English translation, and references to Bracton, Fleta, and the statutes.

Hengham.—A small treatise, containing little tracts on procedure, is the Summa Magna et Parva of Ralph Hengham, one of Edward I's chief justices. It is reprinted as an appendix to the edition of Fortescue of 1737.

The Mirror.—The Mirror of Justices was probably written between 1285 and 1290. "Once for all we may say that of the Mirror of Justices we shall take no notice. Its account of criminal law is so full of fables and falsehoods that as an authority it is worthless." (Pollock & Maitland, 2 Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 478 n.) "Being taken seriously in its entire content by English jurists from Edward Coke down to the late editor of Reeves' History of the English Law, it has done a good deal of mischief in the study of English legal history." (Brunner, op. cit.) The Mirror was printed in 1642, and an English translation in 1646, reprinted in 1768 and 1840. The latest edition is that by W. I. Whittaker, 1895, in the Publications of the Selden Society, vol. VII, together with a critical introduction by Maitland.

Fortescue.—"After a long pause English legal science received a new lease of life with the work of Fortescue, De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, and with Littleton's Tenures.

"John Fortescue had first been attorney, and in 1442, under Henry VI, had become chief justice of the king's bench. Adhering to the House of Lancaster in the struggle between the Roses, he was convicted of high treason after the victory of Edward IV of York, in 1461, and fled from England. About 1463 he was with the Queen and Prince Edward in Barrois in Lorraine. Probably in this exile, from which he returned to England only in 1471, he wrote for authority with, when it is not contradicted by, the written law. "For since," says Julianus, "the written law binds us for no other reason but because it is approved by the judgment of the people, therefore laws which the people have approved without writing ought also to bind everybody. For where is the difference, whether the people declare their [74] assent to a law by suffrage, or by a the education of the successor to the crown his famous work, 'De Laudibus Legum Angliæ,' to which he gave the form of a dialogue between prince and chancellor. (Fortescue had been nominally appointed chancellor by Henry VI. Edward IV pardoned him in 1473 and made him privy councillor.)

"The book, which is written in popular style, pursues the double purpose of showing the peculiarities and advantages of the English law as compared with the Roman law, and to point out the good features of a constitutionally limited monarchy in contrast to a despotic government. Not a few of the propositions first enunciated by him later on became political axioms. For the Continent Fortescue is important as the precursor of those modern authors who by pointing out the advantages of English law prepared the way for the reception of English institutions by Continental Europe." (Brunner, op. cit.) The most valued edition of Fortescue is that of 1737 in folio. An edition was published in 1825, with notes by Amos, and republished in 1874 with an English translation by Francis Gregor. A careful edition is that by Plummer, 1885. Lord Clermont published all the works of Fortescue, with his biography, in 1869. See further 2 Holdsworth, Eng. Law, 477, and 4 Foss, Judges of England, 308.

Littleton.—"Five books stand out pre-eminently in the history of English law—Glanvill, Bracton, Littleton, Coke and Blackstone, and of these Littleton's book is the first great book upon English law not written in Latin and wholly uninfluenced by Roman law. Coke called it 'the ornament of the common law, and the most perfect and absolute work that was ever written in any humane science'; and he touched upon the real reason for its author's fame when he said that 'his greatest commendation . . . is that by this excellent work which he had studiously learned of others, he faithfully taught all the professors of law in succeeding ages.'" Holdsworth, 2 Hist. Eng. Law, 484. Thomas Littleton, the author, was a contemporary of Fortescue, dying in 1481. The book, of uncertain date, was designed to assist the author's son in his study of law. To an anonymous tract entitled The Old Tenures, Littleton was indebted for the suggestion of the title by which his work was first known—The New Tenures. It was printed in 1481 or 1482. A second edition appeared in 1483, and before 1628 (the year when Coke's edition and commentary was published) it had run to more than seventy editions. It was translated early in the sixteenth century. "These few facts speak more strongly for the intrinsic merits of Littleton's book than pages of elaborate eulogy. Here one would call attention to the characteristic which gives it a unique value from the historical point of view. It describes the land law as it existed at the end of a period uniform course of acting accordingly!" Thus did they reason while Rome had some remains of her freedom; but, when the imperial tyranny came to be fully established, the civil laws speak a very different language. "Quod principi placuit legis habet vigorem, cum populus ei et in eum omne suum imperium et potestatem conferat" (the constitution of the prince has the force of law, of continuous and purely logical development, and just before a period when its doctrines were to be profoundly modified. . . . In fact, the historical interest of Littleton's book is closely parallel to that of Blackstone's Commentaries. It summed up and passed on to future generations the land law as developed by the common lawyers of the middle ages, just as Blackstone's Commentaries summed up and passed on the common law, as developed mainly by the work of the legal profession, before it was remodeled by the direct legislation inspired by the teaching of Bentham." Holdsworth, 2 Hist. Eng. Law, 485.

The oldest edition of Littleton's Tenures dates from 1481, soon after the introduction of printing into England. Coke furnished an English translation of the old French text, and a commentary, and in this form the Tenures dominated down to Blackstone. The old French text with English translation was last edited by Tomlins in 1841. A new edition of the old English translation, with valuable introduction and bibliography, was prepared by Eugene Wambaugh, 1903.

St. Germain.—St. Germain's Dialogus de Fundamentis Legum Angliæ et de Conscientia is a much read treatise, written under Henry VIII. It contains a dialogue between a doctor of divinity and a student of English, aiming at a philosophical justification of English legal institutions. The earliest edition was in 1523. An English translation, under the title Doctor and Student, has gone through many editions. The eighteenth edition, by William Muchall, was issued in 1815.

Abridgments.—"The three abridgments of the Year-Books were written by Statham, Fitzherbert, and Broke. Statham's name does not appear in the Year-Books, but he was reader of Lincoln's Inn in the Lent term of 1471. His abridgment was printed by Pynson somewhere about the year 1495. Under the title, 'Epitome Annalium Librorum Tempore Henrici Sexti.' The title is misleading, seeing that the book includes extracts from the Year-Books of preceding reigns up to and including the reign of Henry VI. Later editions were published in 1585 and 1679. Its popularity doubtless suffered from the more complete work of Fitzherbert. His work—Le Graunde Abridgment—was first printed in 1514. It is remarkable not only for its accuracy but also for its research. It contains extracts from many still unprinted Year-Books, and also, as we have seen, from Bracton's Note-Book. It was a model to future writers of abridgments; and was extensively used by Staundforde for his treatise on the Prerogative, and by Bellew for his collection of reports of the years of since the people place all their power and authority in his hands), says Ulpian,<sup>w</sup> "Imperator solus et conditor et interpres legis existimatur" (the emperor alone is considered both as the maker and interpreter of the law), says the code.<sup>x</sup> And again, "sacrilegii instar est rescripto principis obviari" (it is sacrilege to oppose the rescript of the prince).<sup>y</sup> And indeed it is one of the characteristic

<sup>w</sup> Ff. 1. 4. 1.

<sup>y</sup> C. 1. 23. 5.

<sup>x</sup> C. 1. 14. 12.

Richard II's reign. Its popularity is attested by the fact that it was reprinted in 1516, 1565, 1573, 1577, and 1586. The last of these abridgments of the Year-Books is that of Broke. Broke filled the offices of common serjeant and recorder of London. He was speaker of the house of commons in 1554, and was made chief justice of the common pleas in the same year. He died in 1558, and his work was published posthumously in 1568. It is based on Fitzherbert's abridgment, but it contains much new matter. In particular it abridges fully the Year-Books of Henry VII's and Henry VIII's reigns. 'He observes,' says Reeves, 'one method, which contributes in some degree to draw the cases to a point; he generally begins a title with some modern determination in the reign of Henry VIII, as a kind of rule to guide the reader in his progress through the heap of ancient cases which follow.' The book was republished in 1570, 1573, 1576, and 1586." Holdsworth, 2 Hist. Eng. Law, 458.

Staundeforde.—Sir William Staundeforde (died 1558), England's earliest scientific criminalist, wrote a highly valued work on criminal law and procedure, "The Pleas of the Crown." He was the first to edit Glanvill's treatise, and he wrote a treatise, De Prerogativa Regis, which is usually subjoined to the editions of the Pleas of the Crown.

Coke.—Sir Edward Coke became the most celebrated authority among English jurists. He was born in 1552, became attorney general in 1594, chief justice of the common pleas in 1606, chief justice of the king's bench in 1613, but lost the king's favor and his position in 1616, partly in consequence of the antagonism of his opponent, Sir Francis Bacon. His principal works are his Reports and the Institutes of the Laws of England. The latter appeared in 1628 and consist of four parts. The first contains a Commentary on Littleton's Tenures. Part II contains a copious commentary on Magna Carta and the older statutes. The third part gives an exposition of criminal law (Placita Coronæ). The fourth treats of jurisdictions. The Institutes were published in 1817, in six volumes; Part I (2 Vols.), with the valuable notes of Hargrave and Butler.

Selden.—John Selden (1584–1654) was a public man, jurist, legal antiquary, and oriental scholar. In 1603 he was admitted a member of Clifford's Inn; in 1604 he migrated to the Inner Temple, and in 1612 he was called to the bar.

marks of English liberty, that our common law depends upon custom; which carries this internal evidence of freedom along with it, that it probably was introduced by the voluntary consent of the people.

Later he was nominated reader in Lyon's Inn, an office he declined, was fined £20 by the benchers of Inner Temple, and disqualified from being one of their number. This disqualification was, however, removed and he became a master of the bench. He served in the parliaments of Charles I, and was connected, during the earlier years at least, on the popular side with the great movements of the day, and was twice imprisoned. In 1614 he published his Titles of Honor; in 1616 notes on Fortescue's De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, and Ralph Hengham's Summæ Magna et Parva. In 1618 he published his History of Tithes, which caused him to be summoned before the privy council and compelled to retract his opinions, or at least to disown them as his opinions. In 1635 he published the Mare Clausum, a book written seventeen or eighteen years earlier but prohibited from being published by James I. It appeared, consequently, a quarter of a century after Grotius' Mare Liberum, to which it was intended as a rejoinder. Its especial purpose was to explode the pretensions advanced by Grotius in behalf of the Dutch fishermen to poach in the waters off the British coasts. In 1647 his edition of Fleta appeared. Milton calls Selden "chief of learned men and glory of our nation."

On Selden and his works, see Aikin, Lives of John Selden and Archbishop Usher (London, 1812); Johnson, Memoirs of John Selden, etc. (London, 1835); Singer, Table Talk of John Selden (London, 1847); Wilkins, Johannis Seldeni Opera Omnia, etc. (London, 1725); sketch of John Selden, in Great Jurists of the World, 185 (The Continental Legal History Series, vol. II).

Hale, Hawkins, and Comyns.—Other jurists after Coke and before Blackstone are Matthew Hale, William Hawkins, and John Comyns. Sir Matthew Hale (died 1676), who, although Royalist, became under Cromwell judge in the court of common pleas on account of his eminence as a lawyer, wrote the History of the Common Law, and a work on criminal law: History of the Pleas of the Crown. The former was published from the author's posthumous papers by Runnington, 6th ed., 1820; as an appendix Hale's Analysis of the civil part of the law is published. The Pleas of the Crown was first edited in 1739, then in 1800 with notes by Dogherty, last in 1847 by Stokes and Ingersoll with a biography of the author (2 vols.). Hale's Analysis of the Law became the foundation of Blackstone's Commentaries. Hawkins published a Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown in 1716 (8th edition, 1824, revised by Curwood, with supplements by Leach). Sir John Comyns is noted for his Reports (1744), and still more for the Digest of the Laws of England (1762, 5th edition by Hammond, 8 vols., 1822). This work is said to be distinguished for method, thoroughness, and accuracy.

§ 88. (2) Particular customs.—The second branch of the unwritten law of England are particular customs, or laws which affect only the inhabitants of particular districts.<sup>9</sup>

These particular customs, or some of them, are without doubt the remains of that multitude of local customs before mentioned, out of which the common law, as it now stands, was collected at first by King Alfred, and afterwards by King Edgar and Edward the Confessor: each district mutually sacrificing some of its own special <sup>9</sup> Particular customs and usage. The usages of particular trades, professions, or classes of men, sometimes also called customs, must be carefully distinguished from the particular customs here treated. There is just enough resemblance between the two to produce error if this is not done. The two have been treated together in the latest works on the subject, both English (Browne on Usages and Customs, 1875), and American (Lawson on Usages and Customs, with illustrative cases, 1881), without giving sufficient prominence to the distinction. In not a few American cases also, the rules of particular customs here given have been applied to questions of usage without any hint that the two things are not the same. (Taylor v. Carpenter, 2 Woodb. & M. 7, Fed. Cas. No. 13,785; Rindskoff v. Barrett, 14 Iowa, 101; Strong v. Grand Trunk R. R. Co., 15 Mich. 225, 93 Am. Dec. 184; Pilmer v. Branch of State Bank, 16 Iowa, 321; Hursh v. North, 40 Pa. St. 241; Hopkins v. Grimes, 14 Iowa, 73.) These customs, as the definitions show, are always local, or as Lord Ellenborough expresses it, "a custom in the strict legal signification of the word, must be taken with reference to some defined limit or space, which is essential to every custom so called." (4 East, 159.) Usage, on the other hand, has no local limits; the usage of a particular place or neighborhood may be shown, but these limits have no legal significance; they merely mark the extent of the fact to be proved. Again, a particular custom is always an exception to the common law, or excludes it within its own limits. A usage must be consistent with the common law unless it is supported by some statute. Thirdly, a particular custom is the law of all persons within the assigned limits so far as they or their property may be affected by it: a usage affects only the persons or things among whom it is proved to exist. Fourthly, a particular custom is of the nature of law; it is indeed, as we shall show soon, the law of its own district: a usage is a matter of fact, and the law of the case can only be applied to it as to other facts. When a usage becomes so general that the courts will notice its existence without requiring it to be proved as a fact, it is not a particular custom, but a part of the common law. (Wilmot, J., in 2 Burr. 1228.) Of this B. gives a marked illustration in the present section in the case of the law-merchant.

Mr. Browne has said, and Mr. Lawson quotes with approval: "That customs have developed themselves progressively, and that law has passed from the central unity into a scattered and careless variety of customs, so that every place usages, in order that the whole kingdom might enjoy the benefit of one uniform and universal system of laws. But, for reasons that have been now long forgotten, particular counties, cities, towns, manors, and lordships, were very early indulged with the privilege of abiding by their own customs, in contradistinction to the rest of the nation at large: which privilege is confirmed to them by several acts of parliament.*

Such is the custom of gavelkind in Kent and some other parts of the kingdom (though perhaps it was also general till the Norman Conquest) which ordains, among other things, [75] that not the * Mag. Cart. 9 Hen. III. c. 9. (1225)—1 Edw. III. st. 2. c. 9. (Liberties of Cities, 1326)—14. Edw. III. st. 1. c. 1 (Confirmation of Liberties, 1340) — and 2 Hen. IV. c. 1 (Confirmation of Liberties, 1400).

has its particular law of custom." This is probably true when applied to business and trade usages, which have undoubtedly increased in number with the growing complexity of modern life, but it is clearly not true of local customs, the tendency of which is entirely in the other direction. B. has justly termed them the remains of a multitude of local customs which existed before the common law. The early books of that law show the immense variety of such customs; each county, almost each vill and manor having its own peculiar law upon many subjects now governed by a uniform common law. When Glanvill wrote on the practice of the king's court, he gave as his reason for confining himself to that court, the confused multitude of customs which prevailed in the others, and he more than once repeats the same excuse—as with respect to larceny, de furtis, and other pleas before the sheriff, because they have to be treated and decided according to the diverse customs of different counties. (Prologue, and lib. 14, c. 8.) Staundeforde, in his Pleas of the Crown, frequently refers to the same local diversities. There can be no doubt that the whole history of the common law has been one of unification, and the reduction of local diversities to uniform rules.

Are there any particular customs in the United States? In the strict sense of the word, probably not. The diversities in the common law of the different states cannot be considered as such, since there is no common law of the whole country with which they could be set in contrast. If, in any of our states, particular local customs have been recognized as exceptions to the common law, they have been so few and of such slight consequence as to have entirely escaped notice. We have in fact no time out of mind in which such local customs could originate, and no local divisions which could serve as basis for such particular customs. The subdivisions of our oldest states have very rarely any history which cannot be traced back to the formal action of the state or colonial legislature. If there were particular customs originating in such action they would not comply with the requirements of the customs described here, and eldest son only of the father shall succeed to his inheritance, but all the sons alike: and that, though the ancestor be attainted and hanged, yet the heir shall succeed to his estate, without any escheat to the lord. Such is the custom that prevails in divers ancient boroughs, and therefore called borough-English, that the youngest son shall inherit the estate, in preference to all his elder brothers. Such is the custom in other boroughs that a widow shall be entitled, for her dower, to all her husband's lands; whereas, at the common law she shall be endowed of one-third part only. Such also are the special and particular customs of manors, of which everyone has more or less, and which bind all the copyhold and customary tenants that hold of the said manors. Such likewise is the custom of holding divers inferior courts, with power of trying causes, in cities and trading towns, the right of holding which, when no royal grant can be shown, depends entirely upon immemorial and established usage. Such, lastly, are many particular customs within the city of London, with regard to trade, apprentices, widows, orphans, and a variety of other matters. All these are contrary to the general law of the land, and are good only by special *usage; though the customs* of London are also confirmed by act of parliament.*

* In the first this is quite different. "I have a right of way by custom over another's field, the custom is not destroyed, though I do not pass over,"

• 8 Rep. 126; Cro. Car. 347.

---

usages not so particularly located would, as has been shown above, be of entirely different character. It is doubtful also how the existence of local customs could be proved in an American state, even if they could be supposed to exist there; certainly there are none of which a court could take judicial notice, as is done in England with reference to the customs of Kent and a few others. Such a custom would have to be proved in the first place as a fact. To do this, as has been well pointed out in Bourke v. James, 4 Mich. 338, you will call witnesses to prove what the usage is, and if there be any doubt on the point, it will be for the jury to determine what as a fact is the usage, and after the usage has been proved, it will be for the court to determine whether a custom is made out, i. e., whether the usage thus proved has the qualities of reasonableness, legality, etc., necessary to a custom. With this the jury has nothing to do. Upon what grounds could any American court say, as a matter of law, that a usage thus proved prevailed within the boundary lines of any particular township, county, or other subdivision of the state, in opposition to the common law prevailing on the other side of that boundary?—HAMMOND.

§ 89. (a) Lex mercatoria.—To this head may most properly be referred a particular system of customs used only among one set of the king's subjects, called the custom of merchants or lex mercatoria:<sup>10</sup> which, however different from the general rules of the common law, is yet engrafted into it, and made a part of it;<sup>b</sup>

<sup>b</sup> Winch. 24.

<sup>10</sup> Law-merchant.—"The law-merchant includes many, but not all, of the usages subsisting between merchants. The term 'law-merchant' is an ambiguous one. The relationship which it bears to the common law of this country is particularly difficult to define. It is sometimes spoken of as 'ancient' and there is a tendency to attribute to it, in analogy to an immemorial local custom, the requisite of existence from time immemorial. It is sometimes said to form part of the common law. This statement, however, is somewhat misleading, for it veils the fact that the law-merchant is merely a collection of usages. It may be defined as a number of usages, each of which exist among merchants and persons engaged in mercantile transactions, not only in one particular country, but throughout the civilized world, and each of which has acquired such notoriety, not only amongst those persons, but also in the mercantile world at large, that the courts of this country will take judicial notice of it. A usage of the law-merchant has therefore two characteristics—it must, in the first place, amount to jus gentium, that is to say, it must be in vogue beyond the limits of this country and its notoriety must be cosmopolitan rather than national; and in the second place it must be of such a nature that it will receive judicial notice in our courts. It does not follow, however, that every mercantile usage of which the courts take judicial notice forms part of the law-merchant. It is composed of those usages of merchants and traders in the different departments of trade which have been ratified by the decisions of courts of law and adopted as settled law with a view to the interests of trade and the public convenience. The court proceeds on the well-known principle of law that, with reference to transactions in the different departments of trade, courts of law, in giving effect to the contracts and dealings of the parties, will assume that the latter have dealt with one another on the footing of any custom or usage prevailing generally in the particular department. By this process what before was usage only, unsanctioned by legal decision, has become engrafted upon, or incorporated into, the common law, and may thus be said to form part of it (Goodwin v. Roberts, [1875] L. R. 10 Exch. 337). It is, therefore, wrong to speak of the law-merchant as a fixed body of law, forming part of the common law, and, as it were, coeval with it; for, as a matter of legal history, such a view is altogether incorrect."—HALSBURY, 10 Laws of England, 259.

For further authorities on the law-merchant, see Mitchell, Essay on the Early History of the Law-Merchant; Carter, Early History of the Law-Merchant, 17 Law Quart. Rev. 232; Goodwin v. Roberts, L. R. 10 Exch. 337; Pound, Readings in Com. Law, 181.

being allowed, for the benefit of trade, to be of the utmost validity in all commercial transactions: for it is a maxim of law, that "cuiuslibet in sua arte credendum est" (every man is to be credited in what concerns his own profession).

§ 90. (b) Rules relating to particular customs.—The rules relating to particular customs regard either the proof of their existence; their legality when proved; or their usual method of allowance. And first we will consider the rules of proof.

§ 91. (i) Proof of their existence.—<sup>[76]</sup> As to gavelkind, and borough-English, the law takes particular notice of them,<sup>c</sup> and there is no occasion to prove that such customs actually exist, but only that the lands in question are subject thereto. All other private customs must be particularly pleaded,<sup>d</sup> and as well the existence of such customs must be shown, as that the thing in dispute is within the custom alleged. The trial in both cases (both to show the existence of the custom, as, "that in the manor of Dale lands shall descend only to the heirs male, and never to the heirs female"; and also to show "that the lands in question are within that manor") is by a jury of twelve men, and not by the judges; except the same particular custom has been before tried, determined, and recorded in the same court.<sup>e</sup>

The customs of London differ from all others in point of trial: for, if the existence of the custom be brought in question, it shall not be tried by a jury, but by certificate from the lord mayor and aldermen by the mouth of their recorder;<sup>f</sup> unless it be such a custom as the corporation is itself interested in, as a right of taking toll, etc., for then the law permits them not to certify on their own behalf.<sup>g</sup>

§ 92. (ii) Their legality: Requisites therefor.—When a custom is actually proved to exist, the next inquiry is into the legality of it; for, if it is not a good custom, it ought to be no longer used. "Malus usus abolendus est" (a bad custom should be abolished)

<sup>c</sup> Co. Litt. 175.

<sup>f</sup> Cro. Car. 516.

<sup>d</sup> Litt. § 265.

<sup>g</sup> Hob. 85.

<sup>e</sup> Dr. & St. 1. 10.

is an established maxim of the law.<sup>b 11</sup> To make a particular custom good, the following are necessary requisites.

§ 93. (aa) That they be immemorial.—That it have been used so long, that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. So that, if anyone can show the beginning of it, it is no good custom. For which reason no custom can prevail against an express act of parlia-<sup>[77]</sup>ment; since the statute itself is a proof of a time when such a custom did not exist.<sup>1</sup>

§ 94. (bb) That they be continued.—It must have been continued. Any interruption would cause a temporary ceasing: the revival gives it a new beginning, which will be within time of memory, and thereupon the custom will be void. But this must be understood with regard to an interruption of the right; for an interruption of the possession only, for ten or twenty years, will not destroy the custom.<sup>1</sup> As if *the inhabitants of a parish have a customary right of watering their cattle at a certain pool, the custom is not destroyed, though they do not use* it for ten years; it only becomes more difficult to prove: but if the right be anyhow discontinued for a day, the custom is quite at an end.

§ 95. (cc) That they be peaceable.—It must have been peaceable, and acquiesced in; not subject to contention and dispute.* For as customs owe their original to common consent, their being immemorially disputed, either at law or otherwise, is a proof that such consent was wanting.

* In first edition "custom; though those."

<sup>b</sup> Litt. § 212; 4 Inst. 274.

<sup>1</sup> Co. Litt. 114.

<sup>1</sup> Co. Litt. 113.

<sup>1</sup> Co. Litt. 114.

---

<sup>11</sup> Malus usus est abolendus.—Blackstone's negative statement of the rule is, perhaps, preferable to the positive form. Anyhow, the true rule is that a custom, in order to be disregarded, must be so obviously repugnant to right that to enforce it as law would do more harm than would result by defeating or denying the expectations of those who relied on it as a custom. "The will of the people is the foundation of that custom, which subsequently becomes binding on them; but, if it be grounded, not upon reason, but error, it is not the will of the people, and to such a custom the established maxim of law applies, malus usus est abolendus—an invalid custom ought to be abolished."—Broom, Legal Maxims (8th ed.), 718.

§ 96. (dd) That they be reasonable.—Customs must be reasonable;<sup>1</sup> or rather, taken negatively, they must not be unreasonable. Which is not always, as Sir Edward Coke says,<sup>m</sup> to be understood of every unlearned man's reason, but of artificial and legal reason, warranted by authority of law. Upon which account a custom may be good, though the particular reason of it cannot be assigned; for it sufficeth, if no good legal reason can be assigned against it. Thus a custom in a parish, that no man shall put his beasts into the common till the 3d of October, would be good; and yet it would be hard to show the reason why that day in particular is fixed upon, rather than the day before or after. But a custom, that no cattle shall be put in till the lord of the manor has first put in his, is unreasonable, and therefore bad: for peradventure the lord will never put in his; and then the tenants will lose all their profits.<sup>n</sup>

§ 97. (ee) That they be certain.—[78] Customs ought to be certain. A custom, that lands shall descend to the most worthy of the owner's blood, is void; for how shall this worth be determined? but a custom to descend to the next male of the blood, exclusive of females, is certain and therefore good.<sup>o</sup> A custom to pay two pence an acre in lieu of tithes, is good; but to pay sometimes two pence and sometimes three pence, as the occupier of the land pleases, is bad for its uncertainty. Yet a custom, to pay a year's improved value for a fine on a copyhold estate, is good; though the value is a thing uncertain: for the value may at any time be ascertained; and the maxim of the law is, id certum est, quod certum reddi potest (that is certain which can be made certain).

§ 98. (ff) That they be compulsive.—Customs, though established by consent, must be when established compulsory; and not left to the option of every man, whether he will use them or no. Therefore, a custom, that all the inhabitants shall be rated toward the maintenance of a bridge, will be good; but a custom, that every man is to contribute thereto at his own pleasure, is idle and absurd, and indeed no custom at all.

<sup>1</sup> Litt. § 212.

<sup>m</sup> 1 Inst. 62.

<sup>n</sup> Co. Cop. § 33.

<sup>o</sup> 1 Roll. Abr. 565.

§ 99. (gg) That they be consistent.—Lastly, customs must be consistent with each other: one custom cannot be set up in opposition to another. For if both are really customs, then both are of equal antiquity, and both established by mutual consent: which to say of contradictory customs is absurd. Therefore, if one man prescribes that by custom he has a right to have windows looking into another's garden, the other cannot claim a right by custom to stop up or obstruct those windows: for these two contradictory customs cannot both be good, nor both stand together. He ought rather to deny the existence of the former custom.<sup>p</sup>

§ 100. (iii) Method of allowance.—Next, as to the allowance of special customs. Customs, in derogation of the common law, must be construed strictly. Thus, by the custom of gavelkind, an infant of fifteen years [<sup>79</sup>] may by one species of conveyance (called a deed of feoffment) convey away his lands in fee simple, or forever. Yet this custom does not empower him to use any other conveyance, or even to lease them for seven years: for the custom must be strictly pursued.<sup>q</sup> And, moreover, all special customs must submit to the king's prerogative. Therefore, if the king purchases lands of the nature of gavelkind, where all the sons inherit equally; yet, upon the king's demise, his eldest son shall succeed to those lands alone.<sup>r</sup> And thus much for the second part of the leges non scriptæ (unwritten laws), or those particular customs which affect particular persons or districts only.

§ 101. (3) Special kinds of law.—The third branch of them are those peculiar laws, which by custom are adopted and used only in certain peculiar courts and jurisdictions. And by these I understand the civil and canon law.

It may seem a little improper at first view to rank these laws under the head of leges non scriptæ, or unwritten laws, seeing they are set forth by authority in their pandects, their codes, and their institutions; their councils, decrees, and decretals; and enforced by an immense number of expositions, decisions, and treatises of the learned in both branches of the law. But I do this, after the example of Sir Matthew Hale,* because it is most plain, that it is not on account of their being written laws, that either the canon law, or the civil law, have any obligation within this kingdom: neither do their force and efficacy depend upon their own intrinsic authority; which is the case of our written laws, or acts of parliament. They bind not the subjects of England, because their materials were collected from popes or emperors; were digested by Justinian, or declared to be authentic by Gregory. These considerations give them no authority here: for the legislature of England doth not, nor ever did, recognize any foreign power, as superior or equal to it in this kingdom; or as having the right to give law to any, the meanest of its subjects. But all the <sup>[80]</sup> strength that either the papal or imperial laws have obtained in this realm (or indeed in any other kingdom in Europe) is only because they have been admitted and received by immemorial usage and custom in some particular cases, and some particular courts; and then they form a branch of the leges non scriptæ, or customary law; or else, because they are in some other cases introduced by consent of parliament, and then they owe their validity to the leges scriptæ, or statute law. This is expressly declared in those remarkable words of the Statute 25 Hen. VIII, c. 21 (Peter-pence, 1534), addressed to the king's royal majesty.—“This your grace's realm, recognizing no superior under God but only your grace, hath been and is free from subjection to any man's laws, but only to such as have been devised, made, and ordained within this realm for the wealth of the same; or to such other as, by sufferance of your grace and your progenitors, the people of this your realm have taken at their free liberty, by their own consent, to be used among them; and have bound themselves by long use and custom to the observance of the same: not as to the observance of the laws of any foreign prince, potentate, or prelate; but as to the customed and ancient laws of this realm, originally established as laws of the same, by the said sufferance, consents, and custom; and none otherwise.”<sup>12</sup>

<sup>p</sup> 9 Rep. 58.

<sup>r</sup> Co. Litt. 15.

<sup>q</sup> Co. Cop. § 33.

* Hist. C. L. c. 2.

---

<sup>12</sup> The canon and civil law in England.—It may be doubted whether Blackstone in this long paragraph has improved upon the distinction laid down by Hale as a reason why the canon and civil law should be considered unwritten law in England. It is evident that if the distinguishing mark of the written § 102. (a) Civil, or Roman, law.—By the civil law, absolutely taken, is generally understood the civil or municipal law of the Roman empire, as comprised in the institutes, the code, and the digest of the Emperor Justinian, and the novel constitutions of himself and some of his successors. Of which, as there will frequently be occasion to cite them, by way of illustrating our own laws, it may not be amiss to give a short and general account.

§ 103. (i) History of the Roman law.—The Roman law (founded first upon the regal constitutions of their ancient kings, next upon the twelve tables of the decemviri, then upon the laws law is an authoritative text, conclusive and final in all discussion as to what the law is, because their authoritative and original instructions are set down in writing by the lawgivers (see Hale's Hist. C. L., c. 2), that whenever this text loses its authority, so that the courts may apply it or not, as they think reasonable, or may apply one part of it and reject another, according to the circumstances, written law loses its peculiar character, and is undistinguishable from the unwritten. When the judge interprets a written rule, he cannot neglect any word or phrase of it in determining its meaning, nor can he give to any part preference over another part as having more authority or being more truly the law, except so far as the distinction may be made in the written words themselves. But neither the civil nor the canon law is so interpreted in any English court: the judge rejects large portions of them as entirely inapplicable, and those parts which are applicable are not binding on him in their terms. He may reject a word or phrase, or may give it effect in one sense and not in another, because the immemorial usage and custom which gives it its force has so ordained; in other words, he may treat these laws precisely as he does the written forms of the common law, in treatises or judicial opinions, taking from them whatever he believes truly to represent the law in force, and rejecting the remainder, though grammatically inseparable from it.

English statutes in America.—Another illustration of the same principle, of even more interest to American lawyers, may be found in the treatment of the early English statutes as a part of the common law of America. In England these statutes from 9 Henry III are clearly written law, binding upon the judge in the terms of their enactment, without reference to any opinion that he may entertain as to their reasonableness and policy. But in America this is quite different; it is the common law as modified by statutes that has been adopted here, and the statutes have no distinct authority as such, but only as they change, confirm, or abrogate the doctrines of the common law. It makes no difference in this respect whether the date of adoption is fixed at the first settlement of the country (4 Jac. 1, 1607), according to the Virginia or statutes, enacted by the senate or people, the edicts of the prætor, and the responsa prudentum or opinions of learned lawyers, and lastly upon the <sup>[81]</sup> imperial decrees, or constitutions of successive emperors) had grown to so great a bulk, or as Livy expresses it: "tam immensus aliarum super alias acervatarum legum cumulus" (such a vast pile of laws heaped one upon the other), that they were computed to be many camels' load by an author who preceded Justinian.<sup>u</sup> This was in part remedied by the collections of three private lawyers, Gregorius, Hermogenes, and Papius; and then by the Emperor Theodosius the younger, by whose orders a code was compiled, A. D. 438, being a methodical collection of all the imperial constitutions then in force: which Theodosian code was the only book of civil law received as authentic in the western part of Europe, till many centuries after; and to this it is probable that the Franks and Goths might frequently pay some regard in framing legal constitutions for their newly erected kingdoms. For Justinian commanded only in the eastern remains of the empire; and rule, or at the Declaration of Independence (1776) as in New York. Of course where the legislature of a colony or a state has adopted specific English statutes as a part of their own written law, this general principle may not apply; but otherwise it is so founded in the very nature of the case that it must be regarded as the true doctrine. The statute of Merton, of Westminster, or of uses and trusts may still be read from the English statute-book for the information of an American court; but if they believe, as they frequently do, that many of its provisions are inapplicable in this country, and therefore have never been taken up into common usage, they will reject them and determine by their own judgment to what extent these statutes have become a part of the law in force with us. There are no doubt opinions and even decisions to the contrary, giving the English statutes the force of written law here, but the doctrine as stated is not only that of the majority, but is the only one consistent with any practical use of these statutes.

<sup>u</sup> L. 3. c. 34.

<sup>u</sup> Taylor's Elements of Civil Law, 17.

---

We thus see why written law becomes unwritten or common law, whenever the text loses its peculiar authority as conclusive evidence of the legislative intention; so that whenever the court is at liberty to judge how far it can reasonably and justly give effect to the terms as written, it makes no difference whether these terms were originally employed by the legislature or not. They have ceased to be the source of the existence of the law, and have become merely a source from which, with others, the courts learn what the law really is. Blackstone's statement, that the civil and canon laws are unwritten because it was under his auspices, that the present body of civil law was compiled and finished by Tribonian and other lawyers, about the year 533.

§ 104. (ii) Divisions of Justinian's corpus juris civilis.—This consists of, 1. The institutes; which contain the elements or first principles of the Roman law, in four books. 2. The digest, or pandects, in fifty books; containing the opinions and writings of eminent lawyers, digested in a systematical method. 3. A new code or collection of imperial constitutions in twelve books; the lapse of a whole century having rendered the former code of Theodosius imperfect. 4. The novels, or new constitutions, posterior in time to the other books, and amounting to a supplement to the code; containing new decrees of successive emperors, as new questions happened to arise. These form the body of Roman law, or corpus juris civilis (the body of civil law), as published about the time of Justinian; which, however, fell soon into neglect and oblivion, till about the year 1130, when a copy of the digests was found at not enacted by parliament, but received by immemorial usage and custom, has only this meaning. Mr. Austin indeed has given it a different one. "The division of Blackstone and Hale stands thus: Acts of the supreme legislator are leges scriptæ; whether as made immediately by the supreme legislator or as set down in writing by the authority of the makers, does not distinctly appear." (Nor, it may be added, can a reader guess what difference this would make if it did appear. A writing by the authority of the makers can hardly be anything but an enactment, since no legislator from the time of Moses has ever deemed it necessary to authenticate his work by an autograph. That it does not mean a delegated legislative power is clearly shown by what follows.) "But any law not created immediately by the supreme legislator is non scriptum, provided, that is, that its original instruction be not set down in writing." And after some very far-fetched doubts as to the supposed confusion in these distinctions, he concludes that the true distinction depends, not on a difference in the source from whence the law emanates, but on a difference in the modes in which it originates. "When the law or rule is established directly, the proper purpose of its immediate author or authors is the establishment of a law or rule. When the law or rule is introduced obliquely, the proper purpose of its immediate author or authors is the decision on a specific case or of a specific point or question; or, in other words, that written or unwritten law emanates in the way of direct or judicial legislation from a sovereign or subordinate source." (Lectures, Vol. 2, pp. 546-549, and compare pp. 528-533.) Austin also borrows from German writers a distinction between the grammatical Amalfi,<sup>13</sup> in Italy, which accident, concurring with the policy of the Roman ecclesiastics,<sup>w</sup> suddenly gave new vogue and authority to the civil law, introduced it into several nations, and [§2] occasioned that mighty inundation of voluminous comments, with which this system of law, more than any other, is now loaded.

§ 105. (b) Canon, or ecclesiastical, law—(i) Pontifical collections.—The canon law is a body of Roman ecclesiastical law, relative to such matters as that church either has, or pretends to have, the proper jurisdiction over. This is compiled from the opinions of the ancient Latin fathers, the decrees of general councils, the decretal epistles and bulls of the holy see. All which lay in the same disorder and confusion as the Roman civil law: till about the year 1151, one Gratian, an Italian monk, animated by the discovery of Justinian's pandects, reduced the ecclesiastical constitutions also into some method, in three books; which he entitled concordia discordantium canonum (the arrangement of the confused canons), but which are generally known by the name of decretum and the judicial sense of these distinctions, supposing that the ancients meant by it no more than that the laws were actually written down or preserved in memory. I know of no ancient authority for this; the passage of the Pandects commonly quoted for it (Dig. 1, 1, 6), stating that the Athenians used written law, and the Spartans unwritten, is not conclusive; while the case of the responses of the Roman jurisconsults, properly understood, directly contradicts it. The responsa unquestionably were at one time regarded as unwritten law, and later as written law; but they were among the earliest parts of the Roman law which were collected into books, and therefore should always have been considered a written law in the merely grammatical sense of the term. There is no proof whatever that this determined the usage, but there is strong reason to believe that it was the official character given to these responses by Augustus, when he made the prudentes an official body, as differing from their former private position, and prescribed the form of their responses. The written text then became conclusive evidence of the sense of the responses, and, therefore, jus scriptum. According to Austin's own interpretation of the words, they should have remained non scriptum, even then, since they were written, not by the sovereign, but by a subordinate and delegated power; but the Roman jurists could hardly foresee the sense which Mr. Austin has given to these terms.—HAMMOND.

<sup>w</sup> See § 1. p. *18.

---

<sup>13</sup> See note 7, p. *18, ante, on "Revival of Study of Roman Law."

Gratiani (the decree of Gratian). These reached as low as the time of Pope Alexander III. The subsequent papal decrees, to the pontificate of Gregory IX, were published in much the same method under the auspices of that pope, about the year 1230, in five books; entitled decretalia Gregorii noni (the decretals of Gregory the Ninth). A sixth book was added by Boniface VIII, about the year 1298, which is called sextus decretalium (a sixth decretal). The Clementine constitutions, or decrees of Clement V, were in like manner authenticated in 1317 by his successor, John XXII, who also published twenty constitutions of his own, called the extravagantes Joannis (the extravagants of John): all which in some measure answer to the novels of the civil law. To these have been since added some decrees of later popes in five books, called extravagantes communes (common extravagants). And all these together, Gratian's decree, Gregory's decretals, the sixth decretal, the Clementine constitutions, and the extravagants of John and his successors, form the corpus juris canonici, or body of the Roman canon law.

§ 106. (ii) Legatine and provincial constitutions.—Besides these pontifical collections, which during the times of popery were received as authentic in this island, as well as in other parts of Christendom, there is also a kind of national canon law, composed of legatine and provincial constitutions, and adapted only to the exigencies of this church [83] and kingdom. The legatine constitutions were ecclesiastical laws, enacted in national synods, held under the Cardinals Otho and Othobon, legates from Pope Gregory IX and Pope Clement IV, in the reign of King Henry III, about the years 1220 and 1268. The provincial constitutions are principally the decrees of provincial synods, held under divers archbishops of Canterbury, from Stephen Langton in the reign of Henry III to Henry Chichele in the reign of Henry V, and adopted also by the province of York * in the reign of Henry VI. At the dawn of the Reformation, in the reign of King Henry VIII, it was enacted in parliament † that a review should be had of the canon law; and till such review should be made, all canons, constitutions, * Burn's Eccl. Law, pref. viii.

† Statute 25 Hen. VIII, c. 19 (Submission of the Clergy to the King's Majesty, 1533); revived and confirmed by 1 Eliz. c. 1 (Act of Supremacy, 1558).

ordinances, and synodals provincial, being then already made, and not repugnant to the law of the land or the king's prerogative, should still be used and executed. And, as no such review has yet been perfected, upon this statute now depends the authority of the canon law in England.

§ 107. (iii) Canons enacted under James I.—As for the canons enacted by the clergy under James I, in the year 1603, and never confirmed in parliament, it has been solemnly adjudged upon the principles of law and the constitution, that where they are not merely declaratory of the ancient canon law, but are introductory of new regulations, they do not bind the laity;² whatever regard the clergy may think proper to pay them.

§ 108. (iv) Courts in which the civil and canon laws are administered.—There are four species of courts, in which the civil and canon laws are permitted under different restrictions to be used. 1. The courts of the archbishops and bishops and their derivative officers, usually called in our law courts Christian, curiæ christianitatis, or the ecclesiastical courts. 2. The military courts. 3. The courts of admiralty. 4. The courts of the two universities.³ In all, their reception in general, and the different degrees of that reception, are grounded entirely upon custom; corroborated in the latter instance by act of parlia- [84] ment, ratifying those charters which confirm the customary law of the universities. The more minute consideration of these will fall properly under that part of these Commentaries which treats of the jurisdiction of courts. It will suffice at present to remark a few particulars relative to them all, which may serve to inculcate more strongly the doctrine laid down concerning them.⁴

§ 109. (v) Subordination of civil and canon law courts to (aa) Courts of common law.—And, first, the courts of common law have the superintendency over these courts; to keep them within their jurisdictions, to determine wherein they exceed them, to restrain and prohibit such excess, and (in case of contumacy) to punish the officer who executes, and in some cases the judge who enforces, the sentence so declared to be illegal.

² Stra. 1057.

³ Hale Hist. c. 2.

§ 110. (bb) To acts of parliament.—The common law has reserved to itself the exposition of all such acts of parliament, as concern either the extent of these courts or the matters depending before them. And therefore if these courts either refuse to allow these acts of parliament, or will expound them in any other sense than what the common law puts upon them, the king's courts at Westminster will grant prohibitions to restrain and control them.

§ 111. (cc) To an appeal to the king.—An appeal lies from all these courts to the king, in the last resort; which proves that the jurisdiction exercised in them is derived from the crown of England, and not from any foreign potentate, or intrinsic authority of their own. And, from these three strong marks and ensigns of superiority, it appears beyond a doubt that the civil and canon laws, though admitted in some cases by custom in some courts, are only subordinate and leges sub graviore lege (laws subject to a more weighty law); and that, thus admitted, restrained, altered, new-modeled, and amended, they are by no means with us a distinct independent species of laws, but are inferior branches of the customary or unwritten laws of England, properly called the king's ecclesiastical, the king's military, the king's maritime, or the king's academical, laws.

§ 112. 2. The written law, or statutes.—<sup>[85]</sup> Let us next proceed to the leges scriptæ, the written laws of the kingdom; which are statutes, acts, or edicts, made by the king's majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal and commons in parliament assembled.<sup>b</sup> The oldest of these now extant, and printed in our statute-books, is the famous Magna Carta; as confirmed in parliament 9 Henry III (1225): though doubtless there were many acts before that time, the records of which are now lost, and the determinations of them perhaps at present currently received for the maxims of the old common law.

§ 113. a. Different kinds of statutes.—The manner of making these statutes will be better considered hereafter, when we examine the constitution of parliaments. At present we will only take notice of the different kinds of statutes; and some of general rules with regard to their construction.*

<sup>b</sup> 8 Rep. 26.

§ 114. (1) Public acts—(2) Special or private acts.—First, as to their several kinds. Statutes are either general or special, public or private.<sup>14</sup> A general or public act is an [§6] universal rule, that regards the whole community: and of this the courts of law are bound to take notice judicially and ex officio (by virtue of

* The method of citing these acts of parliament is various. Many of our ancient statutes are called after the name of the place where the parliament was held that made them; as the statutes of Merton and Marleberge ["Marle-bridge," before fourth edition], of Westminster, Gloucester, Winchester. Others are denominated entirely from their subject; as the statutes of Wales and Ireland, the articuli cleri (the articles of the clergy), and the prærogativa regis (the King's prerogative). Some are distinguished by their initial words, a method of citing very ancient: being used by the Jews in denominating the books of the Pentateuch; by the Christian church in distinguishing their hymns and divine offices; by the Romanists in describing their papal bulls; and in short by the whole body of ancient civilians and canonists, among whom this method of citation generally prevailed, not only with regard to chapters, but inferior sections also; in imitation of all which we still call some of our old statutes by their initial words, as the statute of quia emptores (because purchasers), and that of circumspecte agatis (that ye act circumspectly). But the most usual method of citing them, especially since the time of Edward the Second, is by naming the year of the king's reign in which the statute was made, together with the chapter, or particular act, according to its numeral order, as, 9 Geo. II, c. 4. For all the acts of one session of parliament taken together make properly but one statute: and therefore, when two sessions have been held in one year, we usually mention stat. 1. or 2. Thus the Bill of Rights is cited, as 1 W. & M. St. 2. c. 2. signifying that it is the second chapter or act, of the second statute or the laws made in the second session of parliament, held in the first year of King William and Queen Mary.

<sup>14</sup> Distinction between public and private laws.—It is frequently difficult to distinguish between a public and a private law. The definitions given by Blackstone are, that a public act is a universal rule that regards the whole community, and private acts are those that concern only a particular species, thing, or person; as, acts relating to any particular place, or to divers towns or counties, or to a college or university. Applying the above definitions to this charter, it would, no doubt, have to be regarded as a private act. But in this country the disposition has been to enlarge the limits of the class of public acts, and to treat all acts of a general character, or which in any way affect the community at large, although affecting only office); without the statute being particularly pleaded, or formally set forth by the party who claims an advantage under it. Special or private acts are rather exceptions than rules, being those which only operate upon particular persons, and private concerns; such as the Romans entitled senatus-decreta (decrees of the Senate), in contradistinction to the senatus-consulta (acts of the Senate), which regarded the whole community:<sup>4</sup> and of these (which are not promulgated with the same notoriety as the former) the judges are not bound to take notice, unless they be formally shown and pleaded. Thus, to show the distinction, the Statute 13 Eliz., c. 10 (Dilapidations, 1571), to prevent spiritual persons from making leases for longer terms than twenty-one years, or three lives, is a public act; it being a rule prescribed to the whole body of spiritual persons in the nation: but an act to enable the Bishop of Chester to make a lease to A B for sixty years, is an exception to this rule: it concerns only the parties and the bishop's successors; and is therefore a private act.

<sup>4</sup> Gravin, Orig. 1. § 24.

---

a particular locality, if they apply to all persons, as public acts. (Village of Winooski v. Gokey, 49 Vt. 282, 285.)

It is not easy to define with precision the distinction between a general law and one that is special or local. In general language, a local statute may be said to be one that is operative only within a portion of a state, and a special statute is one that is applicable to particular individuals or things. Statutes are sometimes distinguished as general or local, according to whether they are intended to operate throughout the entire jurisdiction, or only within a single county or other division or place. A law which applies only to a limited part of the state, and the inhabitants of that part, is local. At common law, statutes were classified as public or general, and private or special. 1 Bl. Comm. 86. "A general or public act," says Blackstone, "is a universal rule that regards the whole community, and of this the courts of law are bound to take notice judicially and ex officio, without the statutes being particularly pleaded. Special or private acts are rather exceptions than rules, being those which only operate upon particular persons and private concerns." Under this classification, the words "public or general" and "private or special" are used synonymously. The classification of statutes as local is of later origin; for, under the common law, statutes restricted to particular localities were considered as private or special. But the distinction between public and private acts as defined by Blackstone is not quite the distinction recognized in this country, where the disposition has § 115. b. Classes of statutes: (1) Declaratory.—Statutes also are either declaratory of the common law, or remedial of some defects therein. Declaratory, where the old custom of the kingdom is almost fallen into disuse, or become disputable; in which case the parliament has thought proper, in perpetuum rei testimonium (as a lasting testimony of the thing), and for avoiding all doubts and difficulties, to declare what the common law is and ever hath been. Thus the statute of treasons, 25 Edw. III, cap. 2 (1351), doth not make any new species of treasons; but only, for the benefit of the subject, declares and enumerates those several kinds of offense, which before were treason at the common law.

§ 116. (2) Remedial: (a) Enlarging; (b) Restraining.—Remedial statutes are those which are made to supply such defects, and abridge such superfluities, in the common law, as arise either from the general imperfection of all human laws, from change of time and circumstances, from the mistakes and unadvised determinations of unlearned (or even learned) judges, or from any other cause whatsoever. And this being done, either by enlarging the common law where it was too narrow and circumscribed, or by restraining it [87] where it was too lax and luxuriant, hath occasioned another subordinate division of remedial acts of parliament into enlarging and restraining statutes. To instance again in the case of treason. Clipping the current coin of the kingdom was an offense not sufficiently guarded against by the common law: therefore it was thought expedient by Statute 5 Eliz., c. 11 (Clipping of Coins, 1562), to make it high treason, which it was not at the common law: so that this was an enlarging statute. At common law also spiritual corporations might lease out their estates for been, on the whole, to enlarge the limits of the class of public acts which in any way affect the community at large. (Unity v. Burrage, 103 U. S. 455, 26 L. Ed. 408; Suth. St. Const., § 193.) Within this view, local acts may be public or private, and are treated as public when they concern the public generally, though restricted in their operation to a local community. The distinction is important, owing to the various restrictions in the constitutions of the several states, and the division made in some of them between public or general laws, in printing the acts of their legislatures, and to be kept in mind in the examination of the authorities. (Maxwell v. Tillamook County, 20 Or. 495, 26 Pac. 803, 804.)

any term of years, till prevented by the Statute 13 Eliz. before mentioned: this was therefore a restraining statute.

§ 117. c. Construction of statutes.—Secondly, the rules to be observed with regard to the construction of statutes are principally these which follow.

§ 118. (1) Construction of remedial statutes.—There are three points to be considered in the construction of all remedial statutes; the old law, the mischief, and the remedy: that is, how the common law stood at the making of the act; what the mischief was, for which the common law did not provide; and what remedy the parliament hath provided to cure this mischief. And it is the business of the judges so to construe the act, as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy.* Let us instance again in the same restraining statute of 13 Eliz., c. 10 (Dilapidations, 1571). By the common law, ecclesiastical corporations might let as long leases as they thought proper: the mischief was, that they let long and unreasonable leases, to the impoverishment of their successors: the remedy applied by the statute was by making void all leases by ecclesiastical bodies for longer terms than three lives or twenty-one years. Now in the construction of this statute it is held, that leases, though for a longer term, if made by a bishop, are not void during the bishop's continuance in his see, or if made by a dean and chapter, they are not void during the continuance of the dean: for the act was made for the benefit and protection of the successor.† The mischief is therefore sufficiently suppressed by vacating them after the determination of the interest of the grantors; [88] but the leases, during their continuance, being not within the mischief, are not within the remedy.

§ 119. (2) Statutes treating of inferior persons or things not to be extended to superior.—A statute, which treats of things or persons of an inferior rank, cannot by any general words be extended to those of a superior. So a statute treating of “deans, prebendaries, parsons, vicars, and others having spiritual promotion,” is held not to extend to bishops, though they have spiritual promotion; deans being the highest persons named, and bishops being of a still higher order.<sup>a</sup>

* 3 Rep. 7; Co. Litt. 11, 42.

† Co. Litt. 45; 3 Rep. 60; 10 Rep. 58.

§ 120. (3) Construction of penal statutes.—Penal statutes must be construed strictly. Thus the statute 1 Edw. VI, c. 12 (Criminal Law, 1547), having enacted that those who are convicted of stealing horses should not have the benefit of clergy, the judges conceived that this did not extend to him that should steal but one horse, and therefore procured a new act for that purpose in the following year.<sup>b</sup> And, to come nearer our own times, by the statute 14 Geo. II, c. 6 (Cattle-stealing, 1740), stealing sheep, or other cattle, was made felony without benefit of clergy. But these general words, “or other cattle,” being looked upon as much too loose to create a capital offense, the act was held to extend to nothing but mere sheep. And therefore, in the next sessions, it was found necessary to make another statute, 15 Geo. II, c. 34 (Cattle-stealing, 1741), extending the former to bulls, cows, oxen, steers, bullocks, heifers, calves, and lambs by name.

§ 121. (4) Construction of statutes against frauds.—Statutes against frauds are to be liberally and beneficially expounded. This may seem a contradiction to the last rule; most statutes against frauds being in their consequences penal. But this difference is here to be taken: where the statute acts upon the offender, and inflicts a penalty, as the pillory or a fine, it is then to be taken strictly: but when the statute acts upon the offense by setting aside the fraudulent transaction, here it is to be construed liberally. Upon this footing the statute of 13 Eliz., c. 5 (Fraudulent Conveyances, 1571), which avoids all gifts of goods, etc., made to defraud creditors and others, was <sup>[89]</sup> held to extend by the general words to a gift made to defraud the queen of a forfeiture.<sup>1</sup>

§ 122. (5) Construction by context.—One part of a statute must be so construed by another that the whole may (if possible) stand: ut res magis valeat quam pereat (that the whole subject matter may rather operate than be annulled).<sup>15</sup> As if land be vested in the king and his heirs by act of parliament, saving the right of A; and A has at that time a lease of it for three years; here A shall hold it for his term of three years, and afterwards it shall go to the king. For this interpretation furnishes matter for every clause of the statute to work and operate upon. But § 123. (6) Repugnant clauses.—A saving, totally repugnant to the body of the act, is void. If, therefore, an act of parliament vests land in the king and his heirs, saving the right of all persons whatsoever: or vests the land of A in the king, saving the right of A: in either of these cases the saving is totally repugnant to the body of the statute, and (if good) would render the statute of no effect or operation; and therefore the saving is void, and the land vests absolutely in the king.<sup>k</sup>

<sup>a</sup> 2 Rep. 46.

<sup>b</sup> 2 & 3 Edw. VI, c. 33 (Horse-stealing, 1548); Bac. Elem. c. 12.

<sup>1</sup> 3 Rep. 82.

§ 124. (7) A statute supersedes the common law.—Where the common law and a statute differ, the common law gives place to the statute; and an old statute gives place to a new one. And this upon *the general principle laid down in the last section,* that, "leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant (later laws repeal

* The ninth reads, "a general principle of universal law," and adds after the Latin quotation, "consonant to which it was laid down by a law of the twelve tables at Rome that quod populus postremum jussit, id jus ratum esto" (let that which the people have last decreed be considered as law). (This last passage is transferred from p. *60, ante.)

<sup>k</sup> 1 Rep. 47.

---

<sup>15</sup> After quoting from Blackstone (1 Comm. 89) and from Story (Const., § 400), Judge Denio said: "Here is the authority of two of the great commentators upon English and American law that effects and consequences are material elements in determining the sense of written instruments, and, if a particular construction involves a contradiction or an absurdity, it must be rejected. (Pages 567, 572 of 15 N. Y.) Similar judicial utterances come from every section of this country." (People v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 532.) Approved in Young v. Regents of Univ. of Kansas, 87 Kan. 239, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 701, 124 Pac. 150, in which it was held that "it is the duty of the court to interpret a statute designed to ameliorate social conditions and promote the general welfare of the people of the state in such a way that it may be upheld and not nullified, if it be possible to do so, and in such a way that the intention of the legislature may be carried out to the prior ones in conflict therewith).” But this is to be understood, only when the latter statute is couched in negative terms, *or by its matter* necessarily implies a negative. As if a former act says, that a juror upon such a trial shall have twenty pounds a year; and a new statute afterwards enacts, that he shall have twenty marks: here the latter statute, though it does not express, yet necessarily implies a negative, and virtually repeals the former. For if twenty marks be made qualification sufficient, the former statute which requires twenty pounds is at an end.<sup>1</sup> But if both acts be merely affirmative, [90] and the substance such that both may stand together, here the latter does not repeal the former, but they shall both have a concurrent efficacy. If by a former law an offense be indictable at the quarter-sessions, and a latter law makes the same offense indictable at the assizes; here the jurisdiction of the sessions is not taken away, but both have a concurrent jurisdiction, and the offender may be prosecuted at either: unless the new statute subjoins express negative words, as, that the offense shall be indictable at the assizes, and not elsewhere.<sup>m</sup>

§ 125. (8) Effect of repeal of a repealing act.—If a statute, that repeals another, is itself repealed afterwards, the first statute is hereby revived, without any formal words for that purpose. So when the statutes of 26 and 35 Hen. VIII (1534 and 1543), declaring the king to be the supreme head of the church, were repealed by a statute 1 & 2 Philip and Mary (1554), and this latter statute was afterwards repealed by an act of 1 Eliz. (1558), there needed not any express words of revival in Queen Elizabeth’s statute, but these acts of King Henry were impliedly and virtually revived.<sup>n 16</sup>

* The ninth reads, “or where its matter is so clearly repugnant that it.”

<sup>1</sup> Jenk. Cent. 2. 73.

<sup>m</sup> 11 Rep. 63.

<sup>n</sup> 4 Inst. 325.

---

fullest extent. A casus omissus should not be acknowledged if by any reasonable interpretation the statute may be read to avoid it.” (Young v. Regents of Univ. of Kansas, 87 Kan. 239, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 701, 124 Pac. 150, 157.)

<sup>16</sup> The rule that if a repealing statute is afterwards repealed the former statute revives was altered by Lord Brougham’s act of 1850 (13 & 14 Vict.,

§ 126. (9) Irrepealable legislation.—Acts of parliament derogatory from the power of subsequent parliaments bind not.<sup>17</sup> So the statute 11 Hen. VII, c. 1 (Treason, 1495), which directs, that no person for assisting a king de facto (in fact) shall be attainted of treason by act of parliament or otherwise, is held to be good only as to common prosecutions for high treason; but will not restrain or clog any parliamentary attainder.<sup>o</sup> Because the legislature, being in truth the sovereign power, is always of equal, always of absolute authority: it acknowledges no superior upon earth, which the prior legislature must have been, if its ordinances could bind a subsequent parliament. And upon the same principle Cicero, in his letters to Atticus, treats with a proper contempt these restraining clauses, which endeavor to tie up the hands of succeeding legislatures. “When you repeal the [91]

o 4 Inst. 43.

---

c. 21). This act provided where any act repealing in whole or in part any former statute was itself repealed, such last repeal should not revive the act or provisions before repealed unless words were added for that purpose.

<sup>17</sup> Parliament cannot bind its successors.—This general principle of legislative power, recognized by Lord Bacon in a remarkable passage of the history of King Henry VII, p. 241, vol. xi, Sped. E. & H., and often since, as limiting even the “omnipotent” parliament of England, is not affected by the constitutional limitations of that power in American states. The constitution rather confirms than modifies it. Each successive legislature, deriving its authority directly from the constitution, cannot recognize limits imposed upon it by a previous body of equally limited power. (Thorpe v. Rutland etc. R. R. Co., 27 Vt. 149, 62 Am. Dec. 625.) But it is now the established doctrine of American courts that an act of the legislature, being itself within their constitutional power, may form a contract between the state and the persons for whose benefit it is passed, provided they accept that and do some act which may be regarded as a consideration for such a contract. Thus the grant of a charter to a private corporation (though not to a municipal corporation) when accepted and acted on, becomes a contract between the state and the corporation, that the franchise so granted shall not be arbitrarily revoked or diminished. This was settled in the Dartmouth College Case. (Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. Ed. 629, and followed by many others; Chenango Bridge Co. v. Binghamton Bridge Co., 3 Wall. 51, 18 L. Ed. 137.) But a grant of power or franchise to a corporation already existing must have some distinct consideration to form such a contract, beside its mere acceptance.—HAMMOND.

law itself. says he, you at the same time repeal the prohibitory clause, which guards against such repeal.”<sup>p</sup>

§ 127. (10) Impossible and unreasonable acts.—Lastly, acts of parliament that are impossible to be performed are of no validity:<sup>18</sup> and if there arise out of them collaterally any absurd consequences, manifestly contradictory to common reason, they are, with regard to those collateral consequences, void.<sup>19</sup> I lay down the rule with these restrictions; though I know it is generally laid down more largely, that acts of parliament contrary to reason are void. But if the parliament will positively enact a thing to be done which is unreasonable, I know of no power* that can control it: and the examples usually alleged in support of this sense of the rule do none of them prove, that, where the

* The ninth edition adds here, “in the ordinary forms of the constitution, that is vested with authority to,” in place of “that can.”

<sup>p</sup> Cum lex abrogatur, illud ipsam abrogatur, quo non eam abrogari oporteat.
l. 3. ep. 23.

---

<sup>18</sup> Quoted and criticised, 5 Ga. 194; 48 Am. Dec. 253, by Lumpkin, J.; 3 Dall. 266, 399, by Iredell, J.; 1 Cold. 347; 4 Conn. 209, 223, 10 Am. Dec. 128; 4 Conn. 479; 13 N. Y. 431. Professor Hammond has a learned note on this subject. (1 Hammond’s Black. 91.)

<sup>19</sup> We are told commonly that three classes of statutes are to be construed strictly: penal statutes; statutes in derogation of common right; and statutes in derogation of the common law. An eminent authority has objected to all of these categories and has pointed out that all classes of statutes ought to be construed with a sole view of ascertaining and giving effect to the will of the lawmaker. (Sedgwick, Construction of Const. and Stat. Law, c. viii, fn.) But there is more justification for some of these categories than for others. For the rule that penal statutes are to be construed strictly something may be said. When acts are to be made penal and are to be visited with loss or impairment of life, liberty, or property, it may well be argued that political liberty requires clear and exact definition of the offense. So also the rule that statutes in derogation of common right are to be construed strictly has some excuse in England, where there are no constitutional restrictions. There it is really another form of stating Blackstone’s tenth rule, that interpretations which produce collaterally absurd or mischievous consequences, are to be avoided. In the United States it means that interpretations which would make an act unconstitutional are to be avoided, or else it is equivalent to Blackstone’s tenth rule. Whenever it is applied beyond these limits, it is without excuse, and is merely an incident of the general attitude of courts toward legislation.—POUND, Common Law and Legislation, 21 Harv. Law Rev. 383, 386.

main object of a statute is unreasonable, the judges are at liberty to reject it; for that were to set the judicial power above that of the legislature, which would be subversive of all government.<sup>20</sup> But where some collateral matter arises out of the general words, and happens to be unreasonable, there the judges are in decency to conclude that this consequence was not foreseen by the parliament, and therefore they are at liberty to expound the statute by equity, and only quoad hoc (as to this) disregard it. Thus if an act of parliament gives a man power to try all causes, that arise within his manor of Dale; yet, if a cause should arise in which he himself is party, the act is construed not to extend to that, because it is unreasonable that any man should determine his own quarrel.<sup>a</sup> But, if we could conceive it possible for the parliament to enact, that he should try as well his own causes as those of other persons, there is no court that has power to defeat the intent of the legislature, when couched in such evident and express words, as leave no doubt whether it was the intent of the legislature or no.

§ 128. d. Courts of equity.—These are the several grounds of the laws of England: over and above which, equity is also frequently called in to <sup>[92]</sup> assist, to moderate, and to explain them. What equity is, and how impossible in its very essence to be reduced to stated rules, hath been shown in the preceding section. I shall therefore only add, that (besides the liberality of sentiment with which our common-law judges interpret acts of parliament, and such rules of the unwritten law as are not of a positive kind) there are also peculiar courts of equity established for the benefit of the subject, to detect latent frauds and concealments, which the process of the courts of law is not adapted to reach; to enforce the execution of such matters of trust and confidence, as are binding in conscience, though not cognizable in a court of law; to deliver from such dangers as are owing to misfortune or oversight; and to give a more specific relief, and more adapted to the circumstances of the case, than can always be obtained by the generality of the rules of the positive or common law.<sup>21</sup> This is the business of our courts of equity, which, however, are only conversant in matters of property. For the freedom of our constitution will not permit, that in criminal cases a power should be lodged in any judge, to construe the law otherwise than according to the letter. This caution, while it admirably protects the public liberty, can never bear hard upon individuals. A man cannot suffer more punishment than the law assigns, but he may suffer less. The laws cannot be strained by partiality to inflict a penalty beyond what the letter will warrant; but, in cases where the letter induces any apparent hardship, the crown has the power to pardon.<sup>22</sup>

<sup>a</sup> 8 Rep. 118.

---

<sup>20</sup> Lord Holt (1701) in City of London v. Wood approves the dicta in Bonham's Case and puts as an illustration that “an act of parliament may not make adultery lawful.” Finally, Blackstone (1765) begins by laying down the theory of natural law emphatically. He says: “This law of nature, being coeval with mankind, and dictated by God Himself, is of course superior in obligation to any other. . . . No human laws are of any validity if contrary to this.” But when he comes to apply it to legislation, he retracts. He cannot accept the dicta of Bonham's Case nor Lord Holt's approval thereof, but admits that “if the parliament will positively enact a thing to be done which is unreasonable, I know of no power in the ordinary forms of the constitution to control it.” It has been shown that this change of view was a result of the revolution of 1688. (Coxe, Judicial Power and Unconst. Legislation, 179.) Since that event, courts “have no authority to act as regents over parliament or to refuse to obey a statute because of its rigor. (Willes, J., in Lee v. Bude & T. J. R. Co., L. R. 6 C. P. 576, 582).”—POUND, Common Law and Legislation, 21 Harv. Law Rev. 392.

<sup>21</sup> In the first three editions, this passage read as follows: "That there are courts of this kind established for the benefit of the subject, to correct and soften the rigor of the law, when through its generality it bears too hard in particular cases; to detect and punish latent frauds, which the law is not minute enough to reach; to enforce the execution of such matters of trust and confidence as are binding in conscience, though perhaps not strictly legal; to deliver from such dangers as are owing to misfortune or oversight; and in short to relieve in all such cases as are bona fide objects of relief." (The change made here by the commentator is significant. He had at first treated the chancellor's jurisdiction as identical with the equitable interpretation explained in the second section, page *62.) He now shows that the peculiar courts of equity have a jurisdiction quite beside that interpretation and distinct from it: and thus anticipates in part the change made in Serj't Stephen's New Commentaries, page 84, as a substitute for this account of equity.—HAMMOND.

<sup>22</sup> Origin and history of equity jurisdiction.—The origin of the body of maxims and rules of procedure known as "Equity" may be stated as follows:

The ancient structure of our law (whatever might be its merits in other particulars) was singularly defective in compass, and, for a long time, too rigid in its character to satisfy the wants of a rapidly developing community. It took no account of divers subjects for which it is the duty of the law to provide; and to others it applied maxims too strict and unbending to satisfy the notions of justice in an advanced state of society. Its remedies also were in some cases inconvenient or limited. For these evils, a successive or progressive amendment of the law by statute would seem to have been the natural remedy. But that was not the course in fact adopted; the law administered between subject and subject, in the ancient courts of the realm, being allowed to remain for a long period of our history with very little alteration of a fundamental kind. But new courts were gradually established, with a collateral, and, in some sense, an usurped jurisdiction, in which cognizance was taken of those subjects which the common law of England had overlooked or insufficiently regulated. Relief was given, in some cases, from the consequences of the harsher doctrines of that law; and the defects of its judicial methods were in some respects supplied. Thus it happened that the chief of these younger tribunals, the high court of chancery, or court of the chancellor, gradually acquired a large proportion of the judicial business of the country. Into its jurisdiction fell, among other subjects, the rapidly growing matters of mortgages, trusts, and partnerships. That court became also the proper and regular tribunal to which recourse was had, when the object was either to compel a man to perform specifically a contract into which he had entered, or to cause him to abstain from the commission of some apprehended injury; the common-law courts interfering in general only so far as to award damages where the breach of contract or the wrong had been already committed. Thus, for some four centuries, there existed in the country, not without occasional friction, two perfectly independent systems of unwritten law, neither owning submission to the other, and administered by distinct tribunals, yet frequently dealing with the same persons and the same subject matter. In spite of various minor attempts of the legislature to mitigate the inconveniences of this anomaly, it remained in force until the year 1875, when, by the Judicature Acts, 1873 and 1875, the two systems came to be administered in the appropriate divisions of a single tribunal, constituted out of the superior courts of justice existing at the date of these acts, and styled the supreme court of judicature. By the former of these acts, which came into force on the 1st November, 1875, it was provided, that in all matters in which there was any conflict or variance between the rules of equity and the rules of the common law, with reference to the same matter, the rules of equity should prevail; and thus, though the distinctive features of the two systems are still clearly traceable, and survive in the popular classifications of the judicial bench and the legal profession, possibilities of conflict are now at an end.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 45.

OF THE COUNTRIES SUBJECT TO THE LAWS OF ENGLAND.

§ 129. The king's dominions, outside England.—The kingdom of England, over which our municipal laws have jurisdiction, includes not, by the common law, either Wales, Scotland, or Ireland, or any other part of the king's dominions, except the territory of England only. And yet the civil laws and local customs of this territory do now obtain, in part or in all, with more or less restrictions, in these and many other adjacent countries; of which it will be proper first to take a review, before we consider the kingdom of England itself, the original and proper subject of these laws.

§ 130. 1. Wales.—Wales had continued independent of England, unconquered and uncultivated, in the primitive pastoral state which Cæsar and Tacitus ascribe to Britain in general, for many centuries; even from the time of the hostile invasions of the Saxons, when the ancient and Christian inhabitants of the island retired to those natural entrenchments, for protection from their pagan visitants. But when these invaders themselves were converted to Christianity, and settled into regular and potent governments, this retreat of the ancient Britons grew every day narrower; they were overrun by little and little, gradually driven from one fastness to another, and by repeated losses abridged of their wild independence. Very early in our history we find their princes doing homage to the crown of England; till at length in the reign of Edward the First, who may justly be styled the conqueror of [94] Wales, the line of their ancient princes was abolished, and the king of England's eldest son became, as a matter of course, their titular prince; the territory of Wales being then entirely reannexed (by a kind of feudal resumption) to the dominion of the crown of England;<sup>a</sup> or, as the statute of *Rhudhlan*<sup>b</sup> expresses it, "terra Walliæ cum incolis suis, prius regi jure feodali subjecta

<sup>a</sup> Previous to fourth edition, "Batland."

<sup>a</sup> Vaugh. 400.

<sup>b</sup> 10 Edw. I. (1282).

(of which homage was the sign), jam in proprietatis dominium totaliter et cum integritate conversa est, et coronæ regni Angliæ tanquam pars corporis ejusdem annexa et unita" (the country of Wales, together with its inhabitants, was formerly held under the king by the feudal law; it is now completely converted into a principality, and annexed to, and united with, the crown of England, as forming a part of the same kingdom).<sup>1</sup> By the statute also of Wales<sup>c</sup> very material alterations were made in divers parts of their laws, so as to reduce them nearer to the English standard, especially in the forms of their judicial proceedings: but they still retained very much of their original polity, particularly their rule of inheritance, viz., that their lands were divided equally among all the issue male, and did not descend to the eldest son alone. By other subsequent statutes their provincial immunities were still further abridged: but the finishing stroke to their independency was given by the statute 27 Hen. VIII, c. 26 (Justice in Wales, 1536), which at the same time gave the utmost advancement to their civil prosperity, by admitting them to a thorough communication of laws with the subjects of England. Thus were this brave people gradually conquered into the enjoyment of true liberty; being insensibly put upon the same footing, and made fellow-citizens with their conquerors. A generous method of triumph, which the republic of Rome practiced with great success; till she reduced all Italy to her obedience, by admitting the vanquished states to partake of the Roman privileges.

§ 131. a. Legislation under Henry VIII.—It is enacted by this statute, 27 Hen. VIII (Justice in Wales, 1536): 1. That the dominion of Wales shall be forever united to the kingdom of England. 2. That all Welshmen born shall have the same liberties as other the king's subjects. 3. That lands in Wales shall be inheritable according to the English tenures and rules of descent. 4. That the laws of England and no other, shall <sup>(95)</sup> be used in Wales: besides many other regulations of the police of this principality. And the statute 34 & 35 Hen. VIII, c. 26 (Wales (Government), 1543), confirms the same, adds further regulations, divides it into twelve shires, and, in short, reduces it into the same order in which it stands at this day; differing from the kingdom of England in only a few particulars, and those too of the nature of privileges (such as having courts within itself, independent of the process of Westminster Hall), and some other immaterial peculiarities, hardly more than are to be found in many counties of England itself.

<sup>c</sup> 12 Edw. I. (Statute of Wales, 1284).

<sup>1</sup> There is a curious oversight here. The statute of Rhudhlan and the statute of Wales are the same, and the true date is that given in note c, viz., 12 Edw. I. The mistake seems to have originated in Ruffhead's edition of the statutes, which gives 10 Edw. I as the date of the statute of Rothlan (as to provisions for the exchequer), also passed in 12 Edw. I, and the title of this last led to a confusion with the statute of Rhudhlan. (See Barrington's Observations on Anc. Statutes, pp. 120–126, and Reeves' Hist. of Eng. Law, II. 95, or Finlason's edition, II, 13.) No statutes were passed in 10 Edw. I. (1282).—HAMMOND.

§ 132. 2. Scotland.—The kingdom of Scotland, notwithstanding the union of the crowns on the accession of their King James VI, to that of England, continued an entirely separate and distinct kingdom for above a century more, though an union had been long projected: which was judged to be the more easy to be done, as both kingdoms were anciently under the same government, and still retained a very great resemblance, though far from an identity in their laws. By an act of parliament, 1 Jac. I, c. 1 (Succession to the Crown, 1603), it is declared, that these two mighty, famous, and ancient kingdoms were formerly one. And Sir Edward Coke observes,<sup>d</sup> how marvelous a conformity there was, not only in the religion and language of the two nations, but also in their ancient laws, the descent of the crown, their parliaments, their titles of nobility, their officers of state and of justice, their writs, their customs, and even the language of their laws. Upon which account he supposes the common law of each to have been originally the same; especially as their most ancient and authentic book, called regiam majestatem, and containing the rules of their ancient common law, is extremely similar to that of Glanvill, which contains the principles of ours, as it stood in the reign of Henry II.<sup>2</sup> And the many diversities, subsisting between the two laws at present, may be well enough accounted for, from a diversity of practice in two large and uncommunicating jurisdictions, and from the acts of two distinct and independent parliaments, which have in many points altered and abrogated the old common law of both kingdoms.

<sup>d</sup> 4 Inst. 345.

§ 133. a. The Act of Union of 1707.—[**] However, Sir Edward Coke, and the politicians of that time, conceived great difficulties in carrying on the projected union: but these were at length overcome, and the great work was happily effected in 1707, *6 Anne;* when twenty-five articles of union were agreed to by the parliaments of both nations: the purport of the most considerable being as follows:—

1. That on the first of May, 1707, and forever after, the kingdoms of England and Scotland shall be united into one kingdom, by the name of Great Britain.

2. The succession to the monarchy of Great Britain shall be the same as was before settled with regard to that of England.<sup>3</sup>

3. The united kingdom shall be represented by one parliament

4. There shall be a communication of all rights and privileges between the subjects of both kingdoms, except where it is otherwise agreed.

9. When England raises 2,000,000*l.* by a land tax, Scotland shall raise 48,000*l.*

* Previous to fifth edition, "5 Anne." [The act of Union: 5 & 6 Anne, c. 8 (1706).]

<sup>2</sup> Local pride has led some Scotch writers to claim that the Reg. Maj. is the original work, and Glanvill a copy. But apart from historical evidence pointing the other way, a comparison of the two texts shows that the Scotch work must be the later. Questions which G. leaves undetermined are decided in it; process and pleading are more elaborate; and there are even passages which seem to show that the writer was acquainted with the text of Bracton. Of the "diversities subsisting between the two laws" in B.'s time, a more evident cause than any he has mentioned may be found in the continued use of the Roman law, and its technical language in the northern kingdom.—HAMMOND.

<sup>3</sup> The succession to the crown of England was arranged by the Act of Settlement of 1700.

16, 17. The standards of the coin, of weights, and of measures, shall be reduced to those of England, throughout the united kingdoms.<sup>4</sup>

18. The laws relating to trade, customs, and the excise, shall be the same in Scotland as in England. But all the other laws of Scotland shall remain in force; but alterable by the parliament of Great Britain.<sup>5</sup> Yet with this caution: that laws relating to public policy are alterable at the discretion of the parliament; laws relating to private right are not to be altered but for the evident utility of the people of Scotland.

[197] 22. Sixteen peers are to be chosen to represent the peerage of Scotland in parliament, and forty-five members to sit in the house of commons.<sup>6</sup>

23. The sixteen peers of Scotland shall have all privileges of parliament: and all peers of Scotland shall be peers of Great Britain, and rank next after those of the same degree at the time of the union, and shall have all privileges of peers, except sitting in the house of lords and voting on the trial of a peer.

These are the principal of the twenty-five articles of union, which are ratified and confirmed by statute 5 Anne, c. 8 (1706), in which statute there are also two acts of parliament recited; the one of Scotland, whereby the church of Scotland, and also the four universities of that kingdom, are established forever, and all succeeding sovereigns are to take an oath inviolably to maintain the same; the other of England, 5 Anne, c. 6 (Navy, 1705), whereby the acts of uniformity of 13 Eliz. (1571) and 13 Car. II. (1661) (except as the same had been altered by parliament at the time), and all other acts then in force for the preservation of the church of England, are declared perpetual; and it is stipulated, that every subsequent king and queen shall take an oath inviolably to maintain the same within England, Ireland, Wales, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed. And it is enacted, that these two acts "shall forever be observed as fundamental and essential conditions of the union."

<sup>4</sup> Article 17 of the Act of Union was repealed by the Weights and Measures Act, 1878.

<sup>5</sup> There is an appellate jurisdiction in the house of lords over the Scotch courts in civil cases, as to which see the Exchequer Court (Scotland) Act, 1707; the Court of Session Act, 1808; the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, s. 3. But there is no appeal from the Scottish court of justiciary (the criminal tribunal). See Mackintosh v. The Lord Advocate, [1876] L. R. 2 App. Cas. 41.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 51 n.

<sup>6</sup> The number of the Scotch members of the house of commons by the Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885, was increased to 72.

§ 134. b. Essentials of the Act of Union.—Upon these articles and act of union, it is to be observed: 1. That the two kingdoms are now so inseparably united, that nothing can ever disunite them again; except the mutual consent of both or the successful resistance of either, upon apprehending an infringement of those points which, when they were separate and independent nations, it was mutually stipulated should be "fundamental and essential conditions of the union."* 2. That whatever else may be deemed "fundamental and essential conditions," the preservation of the two churches, of England and Scotland, in the same state that they were in at the time of the union, and the maintenance of the acts of uniformity which establish our common prayer, are expressly declared so to be. 3. That therefore any alteration in the constitution of either of those churches, or in the liturgy of the church of England (unless with the consent of the respective churches, collectively or representatively given) would be any infringement of these "fundamental and essential conditions," and greatly endanger the union. 4. That the municipal laws of Scotland are ordained to be still observed in that part of the island, unless altered by parliament; and, as the parliament has not yet thought proper, except in a few instances, to alter them, they still (with regard to the particular unaltered) continue in full force. Wherefore the municipal or common laws of England are, generally speaking, of no force or validity in Scotland; and of consequence, in the ensuing Commentaries, we shall have very little occasion to mention, any further than sometimes by way of illustration, the municipal laws of that part of the united kingdoms.<sup>7</sup>

* It may justly be doubted, whether even such an infringement (though a manifest breach of good faith, unless done upon the most pressing necessity) would of itself dissolve the union: for the bare idea of a state, without a power somewhere vested to alter every part of its laws, is the height of political absurdity. The truth seems to be, that in such an incorporate union (which is well distinguished by a very learned prelate from a fœderate alliance, where such an infringement would certainly rescind the compact) the two contracting states are totally annihilated, without any power of revival; and a third arises from their conjunction, in which all the rights of sovereignty, and particularly that of legislation, must of necessity reside. (See Warburton's Alliance, 195.) But the wanton or imprudent exertion of this right would probably raise a very alarming ferment in the minds of individuals; and therefore it is hinted above that such an attempt might endanger (though by no means destroy) the union. To illustrate this matter a little further: an act of parliament to repeal or alter the act of uniformity in England, or to establish episcopacy in Scotland, would doubtless in point of authority be sufficiently valid and binding; and, notwithstanding such an act, the union would continue unbroken. Nay, each of these measures might be safely and honorably pursued, if respectively agreeable to the sentiments of the English church, or the kirk in Scotland. But it should seem neither prudent, nor perhaps consistent with good faith, to venture upon either of those steps, by a spontaneous exertion of the inherent power of parliament, or at the instance of mere individuals. [The ninth edition adds: "So sacred indeed are the laws above mentioned (for protecting each church and the English liturgy) esteemed, that in the regency acts both of 1751 and 1765, the regents are expressly disabled from assenting to the repeal or alteration of either these or the act of settlement."]

Note * was first added in the second addition to the word "union," at end of first paragraph.

§ 135. c. The town of Berwick.—The town of Berwick-upon-Tweed* was originally part of the kingdom of Scotland; and, as such, was for a time reduced [99] by King Edward I into the possession of the crown of England: and, during such its subjection, it received from that prince a charter, which (after its subsequent cession by Edward Balliol, to be forever united to the crown and realm of England) was confirmed by King Edward III with some additions; particularly that it should be governed by the laws and usages which it enjoyed during the time of King Alexander, that is, before its reduction by Edward I. Its constitution was new-modeled, and put upon an English footing by a charter of King

* This account of Berwick-upon-Tweed appeared first in the second edition. In the first it was much briefer, and varied in some respects.

---

<sup>7</sup> It is, however, to be observed, that acts of parliament, passed since the union, extend in general to Scotland, though that country be not expressly mentioned; and if it is intended to except Scotland, there must be an express proviso to that effect, or the intention of the legislature to except it must be otherwise sufficiently indicated. (Rex v. Cowie (1759), 2 Burr. 853).—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 53.

James I: and all its liberties, franchises, and customs, were confirmed in parliament by the statutes 22 Edw. IV, c. 8 (1482), and 2 Jac. I, c. 28 (Berwick-upon-Tweed, 1605). Though, therefore, it hath some local peculiarities, derived from the ancient laws of Scotland,† yet it is clearly part of the realm of England, being represented by burgesses in the house of commons, and bound by all acts of the British parliament, whether specially named or otherwise. And therefore it was (perhaps superfluously) declared by statute 20 Geo. II, c. 42 (Taxation, 1746), that, where England only is mentioned in any act of parliament, the same notwithstanding hath and shall be deemed to comprehend the dominion of Wales and town of Berwick-upon-Tweed. And though certain of the king's writs or processes of the courts of Westminster do not usually run into Berwick, any more than the principality of Wales, yet it hath been solemnly adjudged‡ that all prerogative writs (as those of mandamus (we command), prohibition, habeas corpus (that you have the body), certiorari (to have notice given him), etc.) may issue to Berwick as well as to every other of the dominions of the crown of England, and that indictments and other local matters arising in the town of Berwick may be tried by a jury of the county of Northumberland.

§ 136. 3. Ireland.—As to Ireland, that is still a distinct kingdom; though a dependent subordinate kingdom. It was only entitled the dominion or lordship of Ireland,<sup>h</sup> and the king's style was no other than Dominus Hiberniæ, Lord of Ireland, till the thirty-third year of King Henry the Eighth; when he assumed the [100] title of king, which is recognized by act of parliament 35 Hen. VIII, c. 3 (Style of the King, 1543). But, as Scotland and England are now one and the same kingdom, and yet differ in their municipal laws; so England and Ireland are, on the other hand, distinct kingdoms and yet in general agree in their laws. The inhabitants of Ireland are, for the most part, descended from the English, who planted it as a kind of colony, after the conquest of it by King Henry the Second; and the laws of England were then received and sworn to by the Irish nation, assembled at the council of Lismore.<sup>1</sup> And as Ireland, thus conquered, planted, and governed, still continues in a state of dependence, it must necessarily conform to, and be obliged by, such laws as the superior state thinks proper to prescribe.

† Hale Hist. C. L. 183; 1 Sid. 382, 462; 2 Show. 365.

‡ Cro. Jac. 543; 2 Roll. Abr. 292; Stat. 11 Geo. I. c. 4 (Municipal Elections, 1724); 4 Burr. 834.

<sup>h</sup> Stat. Hiberniæ, 14 Hen. III. (1229).

§ 137. a. Brehon law.—At the time of this conquest the Irish were governed by what they called the Brehon law, so styled from the Irish name of judges, who were denominated Brehons.<sup>k</sup> But King John in the twelfth year of his reign (1210) went into Ireland, and carried over with him many able sages of the law; and there by his letters patent, in right of the dominion of conquest, is said to have ordained and established that Ireland should be governed by the laws of England:<sup>l</sup> which letters patent Sir Edward Coke<sup>m</sup> apprehends to have been there confirmed in parliament. But to this ordinance many of the Irish were averse to conform, and still stuck to their Brehon law: so that both Henry the Third<sup>n</sup> and Edward the First<sup>o</sup> were obliged to renew the injunction; and at length in a parliament holden at Kilkenny, 40 Edw. III (1365), under Lionel Duke of Clarence, the then lieutenant of Ireland, the Brehon law was formally abolished, it being unanimously declared to be indeed no law, but a lewd custom crept in of later times. And yet, even in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the [101] wild natives still kept and preserved their Brehon law; which is described<sup>p</sup> to have been “a rule of right unwritten, but delivered by tradition from one to another, in which oftentimes there appeared great show

<sup>1</sup> Pryn. on 4 Inst. 249.

<sup>k</sup> 4 Inst. 358; Edm. Spenser's State of Ireland, p. 1513, edit. Hughes.

<sup>l</sup> Vaugh. 294; 2 Pryn. Rec. 85; 7 Rep. 23.

<sup>m</sup> 1 Inst. 141.

<sup>n</sup> A. R. 30; 1 Rym. Feod. 442.

<sup>o</sup> A. R. 5.—pro eo quod leges quibus utuntur Hybernici Deo detestabiles existunt, et omni juri dissonant, adeo quod leges censi non debeant;—nobis et consilio nostro satis videtur expediens, eisdem utendas concedere leges Anglicanas, 3 Pryn. Rec. 1218. (Inasmuch as the laws by which the Irish are governed are hateful to God and incompatible with justice, and therefore ought not to be considered as laws—it seems highly expedient to us and to our council, to give them the laws of England for their government.)

<sup>p</sup> Edm. Spenser. Ibid.

of equity in determining the right between party and party, but in many things repugnant quite both to God's law and man's." The latter part of this character is alone ascribed to it, by the laws before cited of Edward the First and his grandson.

§ 138. b. Irish parliament.—But as Ireland was a distinct dominion, and had parliaments of its own, it is to be observed, that though the immemorial customs, or common law, of England were made the rule of justice in Ireland also, yet no acts of the English parliament, since the twelfth of King John (1210), extended into that kingdom; unless it were specially named, or included under general words, such as, "within any of the king's dominions." And this is particularly expressed, and the reason given in the Year-Books: "a tax granted by the parliament of England shall not bind those of Ireland, because they are not summoned to our parliament"; and again, "Ireland hath a parliament of its own, and maketh and altereth laws; and our statutes do not bind them, because they do not send *knights* to our parliament; but their persons are the king's subjects, like as the inhabitants of Calais, Gascoigny and Guienne, while they continued under the king's subjection." The general run of laws enacted by the superior state are supposed to be calculated for its own internal government, and do not extend to its distant dependent countries; which, bearing no part in the legislature, are not therefore in its ordinary and daily contemplation. But, when the sovereign legislative power sees it necessary to extend its care to any of its subordinate dominions, and mentions them expressly by name or includes them under general words, there can be no doubt but then they are bound by its laws.<sup>r</sup>

§ 139. c. Power of the Irish parliament: Poynings' laws.—<sup>[102]</sup> †The original method of passing statutes in Ireland was

* In first edition "representatives."

† This page is first found in the second edition, and differs considerably from the treatment of the same matter in the first edition (p. 100), which gives a brief account of Poynings' law and the process of legislature under it, from Coke, 4 Inst. 353.

‡ 20 Hen. VI. 8 (1442); 2 Rich. III. 12 (1484).

‣ Year-Book 1 Hen. VII. 3 (1485); 7 Rep. 22; Calvin's Case.

nearly the same as in England, the chief governor holding parliaments at his pleasure, which enacted such laws as they thought proper.* But an ill use being made of this liberty, particularly by Lord Gormanstown, deputy lieutenant in the reign of Edward IV,† a set of statutes were there enacted in the 10 Hen. VII (1494) (Sir Edward Poynings being then lord deputy, whence they are called Poynings' laws), one of which,‡ in order to restrain the power as well of the deputy as the Irish parliament, provides, 1. That, before any parliament be summoned or holden, the chief governor and council of Ireland shall certify to the king under the great seal of Ireland the considerations and causes thereof, and the articles of the acts proposed to be passed therein. 2. That after the king, in his council of England, shall have considered, approved, or altered the said acts or any of them, and certified them back under the great seal of England, and shall have given license to summon and hold a parliament, then the same shall be summoned and held; and therein the said acts so certified, and no other, shall be proposed, received, or rejected.¶ But as this precluded any law from being proposed, but such as were preconceived before the parliament was in being, which occasioned many inconveniences and made frequent dissolutions necessary, it was provided by the statute of Philip and Mary before cited, that any new propositions might be certified to England in the usual forms, even after the summons and during the session of parliament. By this means, however, there was nothing left to the parliament in Ireland, but a bare negative or power of rejecting, not of proposing or altering, any law. But the usage now is, that bills are often framed in either house, under the denomination "of heads for a bill or bills"; and in that shape they are offered to the consideration of the lord lieutenant and privy council who, upon such parliamentary intimation, or otherwise upon the application of private persons, receive and transmit such [103] heads, or reject them without any transmission to England. And, with regard to Poynings' law in particular, it cannot be repealed or suspended, unless the bill for that * Irish Stat. 11 Eliz. st. 3. c. 8 (1569).

† Ibid. 10 Hen. VII. c. 23 (Irish Parliament, 1494).

‡ Cap. 4. expounded by 3 & 4 Ph. & M. c. 4 (Graces, 1556).

¶ 4 Inst. 353.

purpose, before it be certified to England, be approved by both the houses.<sup>x</sup>

But the Irish nation, being excluded from the benefit of the English statutes, were deprived of many good and profitable laws, made for the improvement of the common law: and the measure of justice in both kingdoms becoming thereby no longer uniform, therefore it was enacted by another of Poyning's laws,<sup>y</sup> that all acts of parliament, before made in England, should be of force within the realm of Ireland.<sup>z</sup> But, by the same rule, that no laws made in England, between King John's time and Poyning's law, were then binding in Ireland, it follows that no acts of the English parliament made since the 10 Hen. VII (1494) do now bind the people of Ireland, unless specially named or included under general words.<sup>a</sup> And, on the other hand, it is equally clear, that where Ireland is particularly named, or is included under general words, they are bound by such acts of parliament. For this follows from the very nature and constitution of a dependent state: dependence being very little else, but an obligation to conform to the will or law of that superior person or state, upon which the inferior depends. The original and true ground of this superiority, in the present case, is what we usually call, though somewhat improperly, the right of conquest: a right allowed by the law of nations, if not by that of nature; but which in reason and civil policy can mean nothing more, than that, in order to put an end to hostilities, a compact is either expressly or tacitly made between the conqueror and the conquered, that if they will acknowledge the victor for their master, he will treat them for the future as subjects, and not as enemies.<sup>b</sup>

§ 140. d. Dependence of Ireland.—<sup>[104]</sup> But this state of dependence being almost forgotten, and ready to be disputed by the Irish nation, it became necessary some years ago to declare how that matter really stood: and therefore by statute 6 Geo. I, c. 5 (Ireland, 1719), it is declared, that the kingdom of Ireland ought to be subordinate to, and dependent upon, the imperial crown of

<sup>x</sup> Irish Stat. 11 Eliz. st. 3. c. 38 (1569).

<sup>y</sup> Cap. 22.

<sup>z</sup> 4 Inst. 351.

<sup>a</sup> 12 Rep. 112.

<sup>b</sup> Puff. L. of N. viii. 6. 24.

Great Britain, as being inseparably united thereto; and that the king's majesty, with the consent of the lords and commons of Great Britain in parliament, hath power to make laws to bind the people of Ireland.<sup>8</sup>

Thus we see how extensively the laws of Ireland communicate with those of England: and indeed such communication is highly necessary, as the ultimate resort from the courts of justice in Ireland is, as in Wales, to those in England; a writ of error (in the nature of an appeal) lying from the king's bench in Ireland to the king's bench in England,<sup>c</sup> as the appeal from the chancery in <sup>c</sup> This was law in the time of Henry VIII; as appears by the ancient book, entitled, Diversity of Courts, c. bank le roy.

---

8 Union of Ireland and question of home rule.—"In 1782 the act of 1719 was repealed, and in 1783 the English parliament passed a statute declaring that the right of the people of Ireland to be bound only by laws enacted by the king and the Irish parliament is established, and shall at no time hereafter be questioned or questionable. No appeals were to be brought from the Irish to any English courts. Poynings' law also was repealed by the Irish parliament. For eighteen years Ireland was no more subject to England than was England to Ireland. . . . The union took effect on 1 Jan. 1801. There was no longer a kingdom of Great Britain and a kingdom of Ireland; there was a United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. So again there was a parliament for the United Kingdom, in which the Irish peers were represented by twenty-eight of their number chosen by them for life, and by four bishops sitting according to a scheme of rotation, and the Irish commons by a hundred members. Every statute of this parliament applies to the whole of the United Kingdom unless some part of it is specially excepted. As on the occasion of the union with Scotland, articles were agreed on by the two parliaments; but these articles possess no particularly essential or irrevocable nature. This we may see from the fate of what was probably regarded as the most important of them—the churches of England and Ireland were united in one church, 'The United Church of England and Ireland,' and the continuance of this United Church was declared to be an essential and fundamental part of the union. In 1869 the union of the two churches was dissolved, and the Irish church was declared to be no longer an established church."—MAITLAND, Const. Hist. England, 335.

The question of home rule in Ireland has been agitating Great Britain from the last quarter of the nineteenth century. In 1886 Gladstone introduced the first home rule bill, which was rejected by the house of commons. In 1893 Gladstone presented the second bill, which was passed by the commons and rejected by the house of lords. The agitation was revived in the first decade

Ireland lies immediately to the house of lords here: it being expressly declared, by the same statute 6 Geo. I, c. 5 (1719), that the peers of Ireland have no jurisdiction to affirm or reverse any judgments or decrees whatsoever. The propriety, and even necessity, in all inferior dominions, of this constitution, "that though justice be in general administered by courts of their own, yet that the appeal in the last resort ought to be to the courts of the superior state," is founded upon these two reasons. 1. Because otherwise the law, appointed or permitted to such inferior dominion, might be insensibly changed within itself, without the assent of the superior. 2. Because otherwise judgments might be given to the disadvantage or diminution of the superiority; or to make the dependence to be only of the person of the king, and not of the crown of England.<sup>4</sup> of the twentieth century. A third bill was introduced in parliament. The danger of opposition by the house of lords was obviated by the passage of the Parliament Act of 1911. (See note 20, p. *170, post.) That act provides that, if a measure shall in its original form have passed the house of commons three times in three successive sessions, it shall automatically go to the monarch for royal assent, the house of lords notwithstanding. On May 25, 1914, the third home rule bill had passed its final stage in the house of commons according to the Parliament Act of 1911, and was thus fully matured.

<sup>4</sup> Vaugh. 402.

---

This Home Rule Act of 1914 provides that there shall be an Irish parliament, which shall be composed of a senate and a house of commons. The senate shall consist of forty members, at first appointed, but their successors elected, and the house of commons shall consist of one hundred and sixty-four elected members. The Irish parliament is to be subordinate to the British house of commons, and is to have local powers only. Its acts may be vetoed by the crown. No act can be passed favoring or penalizing any religion. The Irish representation in the British parliament is to be reduced.

A most serious opposition to home rule arose in Protestant Ireland, particularly in Ulster. Civil war seemed imminent. Various projects for a compromise were discussed. But at the moment when the situation had become most alarming, at the end of July and first of August, 1914, the great European war burst forth. In this crisis, a truce was declared on the home rule question. It was decided on September 15th that the operation of the Home Rule Act should be suspended until after the end of the European war, the act receiving the royal assent on September 19th.

§ 141. 4. Adjacent islands subject to the crown.—With regard to the other adjacent islands which are subject to the crown of Great Britain, some of them (as the Isle of <sup>[105]</sup>Wight, of Portland, of Thanet, etc.) are comprised within some neighboring county, and are therefore to be looked upon as annexed to the mother island, and part of the kingdom of England. But there are others, which require a more particular consideration.

§ 142. a. Isle of Man.—And, first, the Isle of Man is a distinct territory from England, and is not governed by our laws:<sup>9</sup> neither doth any act of parliament extend to it, unless it be particularly named therein; and then an act of parliament is binding there.* It was formerly a subordinate feudatory kingdom, subject to the kings of Norway; then to King John and Henry III of England; afterwards to the kings of Scotland; and then again to the crown of England: and at length we find King Henry IV claiming the island by right of conquest, and disposing of it to the Earl of Northumberland; upon whose attainder it was granted (by the name of the lordship of Man) to Sir John de Stanley by letters patent 7 Hen. IV (1405).† In his lineal descendants it continued for eight generations, till the death of Ferdinando, Earl of Derby, A. D. 1594: when a controversy arose concerning the inheritance thereof, between his daughters and William, his surviving brother: upon which, and a doubt that was started concerning the validity of the original patent,‡ the island was seized into the queen's hands, and afterwards various grants were made of it by King James the First; all which being expired or surrendered, it was granted afresh in 7 Jac. I (1609) to William, Earl of Derby, and the heirs male of his body, with remainder to his heirs general; which grant was the next year confirmed by act of parliament, with a restraint of the power of alienation by the said earl and his issue male. On * 4 Inst. 284; 2 And. 116.

‡ Camden. Eliz. A. D. 1594.

† Selden, Tit. Hon. 1. 3.

---

<sup>9</sup> The Isle of Man is governed in general not by the laws of England but by acts of its own local legislature, called the Court of Tynwald, which consists of two houses, governor and council, and the elected House of Keys. It has a separate system of courts of justice, from which, however, there lies an ultimate appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

the death of James, Earl of Derby, A. D. 1735, the male line of Earl William failing, the Duke of Atholl succeeded to the island as heir general by a female branch. In the meantime, though the title of king had long been disused, the earls of Derby, as lords of Man, had maintained a sort of royal authority therein; by assenting or [106] dissenting to laws, and exercising an appellate jurisdiction. Yet, though no English writ or process from the courts of Westminster was of any authority in Man, an appeal lay from a decree of the lord of the island to the king of Great Britain in council.<sup>b</sup> But the distinct jurisdiction of this little subordinate royalty being found inconvenient for the purposes of public justice, and for the revenue (it affording a commodious asylum for debtors, outlaws, and smugglers), authority was given to the treasury by statute 12 Geo. I, c. 28 (Revenue, 1725), to purchase the interest of the then proprietors for the use of the crown: which purchase was at length completed in the year 1765, and confirmed by statutes 5 Geo. III, c. 26 and 39 (Isle of Man, 1765), whereby the whole island and all its dependencies, so granted as aforesaid (except the landed property of the Atholl family, their manorial rights and emoluments, and the patronage of the bishopric<sup>c</sup> and other ecclesiastical benefices), are unalienably vested in the crown, and subjected to the regulations of the British excise and customs.

§ 143. b. Jersey, Guernsey, Sark, and Alderney.—The islands of Jersey, Guernsey, Sark, Alderney, and their appendages were parcel of the duchy of Normandy, and were united to the crown of England by the first princes of the Norman line. They are governed by their own laws, which are for the most part the ducal customs of Normandy, being collected in an ancient book of very great authority, entitled, Le grand coutumier. The king's writ, or process from the courts of Westminster, is there of no force; but his commission is. They are not bound by common acts of our parliaments, unless particularly named.<sup>d</sup> All causes are originally determined by their own officers, the bailiffs and jurats of the islands; but an appeal lies from them to the king in council, in the last resort.<sup>10</sup>

<sup>b</sup> 1 P. Wms. 329.

<sup>c</sup> The bishopric of Man, or Sodor, or Sodor and Man was formerly within the province of Canterbury, but annexed to that of York by statute 33 Hen. VIII. c. 31 (1542).

<sup>d</sup> 4 Inst. 286.

§ 144. c. English colonies in America.—Besides these adjacent islands, our more distant plantations in America, and elsewhere, are also in some respect subject to the English laws. Plantations or colonies in distant [<sup>107</sup>] countries are either such where the lands are claimed by right of occupancy only, by finding them desert and uncultivated, and peopling them from the mother country; or where, when already cultivated, they have been either gained by conquest or ceded to us by treaties. And both these rights are founded upon the law of nature, or at least upon that of nations. But there is a difference between these two species of colonies, with respect to the laws by which they are bound. For it hath been held,<sup>1</sup> that if an uninhabited country be discovered and planted by English subjects, all the English laws then in being, which are the birthright of every subject,<sup>m</sup> are immediately there in force. But this must be understood with very many and very great restrictions. Such colonists carry with them only so much of the English law as is applicable to their own situation and the condition of an infant colony; such, for instance, as the general rules of inheritance, and of protection from personal injuries. The artificial refinements and distinctions incident to the property of a great and commercial people, the laws of police and revenue (such especially as are enforced by penalties), the mode of maintenance for the established clergy, the jurisdiction of spiritual courts, and a multitude of other provisions, are neither necessary nor convenient for them, and therefore are not in force. What shall be admitted and what rejected, at what times, and under what restrictions, must, in case of dispute, be decided in the first instance by their own provincial judicature, subject to the revision and

<sup>1</sup> Salk. 411. 666.

<sup>m</sup> 2 P. Wms. 75.

---

<sup>10</sup> The Isle of Man and the Channel Islands, though not included in the United Kingdom, are yet, by the provisions of the Interpretation Act, 1889, comprised in the expression "the British Islands," when it occurs in an act of parliament.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 60.

control of the king in council: the whole of their constitution being also liable to be new-modeled and reformed by the general superintending power of the legislature in the mother country. But in conquered or ceded countries, that have already laws of their own, the king may indeed alter and change those laws; but, till he does actually change them, the ancient laws of the country remain, unless such as are against the law of God, as in the case of an infidel country.<sup>a</sup> Our American plantations are principally of this latter [108] sort, being obtained in the last century either by right of conquest and driving out the natives (with what natural justice I shall not at present inquire) or by treaties.<sup>11</sup> And therefore the

<sup>a</sup> 7 Rep. 17; Calvin's Case. Show. Parl. C. 31.

---

<sup>11</sup> Rights of European governments on American Continent.—The rights acquired by European governments on the American Continent are correctly stated in the following quotation from C. J. Marshall in the case of Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. 543, 572, 5 L. Ed. 681, 688:

“On the discovery of this immense Continent, the great nations of Europe were eager to appropriate to themselves so much of it as they could respectively acquire. Its vast extent offered an ample field to the ambition and enterprise of all; and the character and religion of its inhabitants afforded an apology for considering them as a people over whom the superior genius of Europe might claim an ascendancy. The potentates of the old world found no difficulty in convincing themselves, that they made ample compensation to the inhabitants of the new, by bestowing on them civilization and Christianity, in exchange for unlimited independence. But as they were all in pursuit of nearly the same object, it was necessary, in order to avoid conflicting settlements, and consequent war with each other, to establish a principle, which all should acknowledge as the law by which the right of acquisition, which they all asserted, should be regulated, as between themselves. This principle was, that discovery gave title to the government by whose subjects, or by whose authority, it was made, against all other European governments, which title might be consummated by possession. The exclusion of all other Europeans necessarily gave to the nation making the discovery the sole right of acquiring the soil from the natives, and establishing settlements upon it. It was a right with which no Europeans could interfere. It was a right which all asserted for themselves, and to the assertion of which, by others, all assented. Those relations which were to exist between the discoverer and the natives, were to be regulated by themselves. The rights thus acquired being exclusive, no other power could interpose between them.

“In the establishment of these relations, the rights of the original inhabitants were, in no instance, entirely disregarded; but were, necessarily, to common law of England as such has no allowance or authority there; they being no part of the mother country, but distinct (though dependent) dominions. They are subject, however, to the control of the parliament; though (like Ireland, Man, and the rest) not bound by any acts of parliament, unless particularly named.<sup>12</sup> § 145. (1) Forms of government: (a) Provincial.—With respect to their interior polity, our colonies are properly of three sorts. 1. Provincial establishments, the constitutions of which depend on the respective commissions issued by the crown to the governors, and the instructions which usually accompany those commissions; under the authority of which, provincial assemblies are constituted, with the power of making local ordinances, not repugnant to the laws of England.

a considerable extent, impaired. They were admitted to be the rightful occupants of the soil, with a legal as well as just claim to retain possession of it, and to use it according to their own discretion; but their rights to complete sovereignty, as independent nations, were necessarily diminished, and their power to dispose of the soil, at their own will, to whomsoever they pleased, was denied by the original fundamental principle, that discovery gave exclusive title to those who made it. While the different nations of Europe respected the right of the natives, as occupants, they asserted the ultimate dominion to be in themselves; and claimed and exercised, as a consequence of this ultimate dominion, a power to grant the soil, while yet in possession of the natives. These grants have been understood by all, to convey a title to the grantees, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy.”

<sup>12</sup> Authority of the common law in America.—From a learned note by Professor Hammond on the “Authority of the Common Law in America” (1 Hammond’s Black, 275), the following passages are here quoted:

“The colonists brought with them the common law of England, as it had existed at the time of their colonization, and as it had down to that time been modified by parliament. It was their birthright, in so far as that law was applicable to their circumstances here, and so far was it presumed to be in force here; and for the same reason were those recent English statutes presumed to be in force. (Per Brayton, J., Potter v. Thornton, 7 R. I. 252, 261, 1862.) This case contains a good account of the reception of English statutes in the colonies. In 1700 an act was passed in Rhode Island that the laws of England should be put in force ‘where no colony statute applied.’ The statutes prior to colonization were held to be in force till 1749, when the supreme court decided that no English statutes were in force. Hereupon in 1756, the legislature adopted a large number of them, including many passed after the colonization. (Potter v. Thornton, 7 R. I. 260.)

§ 146. (b) Proprietary governments.—2. Proprietary governments, granted out by the crown to individuals, in the nature of feudatory principalities, with all the inferior regalities, and subordinate powers of legislation, which formerly belonged to the owners of counties palatine: yet still with these express conditions, that the ends for which the grant was made be substantially pursued, and that nothing be attempted which may derogate from the sovereignty of the mother country.

“There is no doubt that the common law is the basis of the law of those states which were originally colonies of England, or carved out of such colonies. It was imported by the colonists and established so far as it was applicable to their institutions and circumstances, and was claimed by the Congress of the United States in 1774 as a branch of those “indubitable rights and liberties to which the respective colonies” were entitled. In all the states thus having a common origin, formed from colonies which constituted a part of the same empire, and which recognized the common law as the source of their jurisprudence, it must be presumed that such common law exists, and it rests upon parties who assert a different rule to show that matter by proof. A similar presumption must prevail as to the existence of the common law in those states which have been established in territory acquired since the Revolution, when such territory was not at the time of its acquisition occupied by an organized and civilized community: where in fact the population of the new state upon the establishment of government was formed by emigration from the original states. As in British colonies, established in uncultivated regions by emigration from the parent country, the subjects are considered as carrying with them the common law, so far as it is applicable to their new situation; so when American citizens migrate into territory which is not occupied by civilized man, and commence the formation of a new government, they are equally considered as carrying with them so much of the same common law, in its modified and improved condition under the influence of modern civilization and republican principles, as is suited to their new condition and wants. But no such presumption can apply to states in which a government already existed at the time of their accession to this country, as Florida, Louisiana, and Texas.” (Field, C. J., in Norris v. Harris, 15 Cal. 252.)”

The reader is referred to the two papers in Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History, vol. I, one on “The English Common Law in the Early American Colonies,” by Paul Samuel Reinsch (pp. 367–415), and the other on “The Theory of the Extension of English Statutes to the Plantations” by St. George Leakin Sioussat (pp. 416–430).

§ 147. (c) Charter governments.—3. Charter governments, in the nature of civil corporations, with the power of making by-laws for their own interior regulation, not contrary to the laws of England; and with such rights and authorities as are specially given them in their several charters of incorporation.<sup>13</sup> The form of government in most of them is borrowed from that of England. They have a governor named by the king (or in some proprietary colonies by the proprietor), who is his representative or deputy. They have courts of justice of their own, from whose decisions an appeal lies to the king in council here in England.<sup>14</sup> Their general assemblies which are their house of commons, together with their council of state being their upper house, with the concurrence of the king or his representative, the [109] governor, make laws suited to their own emergencies.

<sup>13</sup> Of the thirteen English colonies in America, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia were provincial establishments at the time of the Revolution; Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Delaware were proprietary governments; and Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut were charter governments.

<sup>14</sup> Appeals to the king in council.—In Chalmers' Opinions, a well-known work of great authority upon points of colonial and foreign law (p. 687 of 1st Am. ed., Burlington, 1858), is a severe remark on this passage of Blackstone, who is quoted as saying that "an appeal lies from the colonies to the king and council." Mr. Chalmers then adds: "The commentator seems to have borrowed this form of words from Sir Matthew Hale's History of the Common Law; but great names and high authority cannot justify such inaccuracy of language and of law. The appeal is to the king in his council." The reader will see by reference to the text above that Blackstone did not commit the inaccuracy he is charged with. Every one of the editions collated for this text, from the first to the ninth, reads "to the king in council." The mistake crept into the work long after his death. Chalmers cites the twelfth edition for it. The thirteenth has the same reading, at least if we may judge from the Dublin reprint, dated 1796, while the second American edition of 1799 reads correctly "to the king in council here in England." But singularly enough, the error which Chalmers criticises is found in every later American edition that I have examined. (In Tucker's edition; in the New York editions of 1822, 1827; in Wendell's edition, N. Y. 1852; Judge Sharswood's Phila. 1866; and in the four of Judge Cooley, Chicago, 1870, 1872, 1883, 1899.) [It is corrected in Lewis' edition, Phila., 1902.] It is now a matter of merely historical importance, but justice to Blackstone demands that he should not be made responsible for "such inaccuracy" as he never committed.—HAMMOND.

§ 148. (d) Colonies and parliament.—But it is particularly declared by statute 7 & 8 Wm. III, c. 22 (Regulating Abuses in the Plantation Trade, 1696), that all laws, by-laws, usages, and customs, which shall be in practice in any of the plantations, repugnant to any law, made or to be made in this kingdom relative to the said plantations, shall be utterly void and of none effect. And, because several of the colonies had claimed the sole and exclusive right of imposing taxes upon themselves, the statute 6 Geo. III, c. 12 (America, 1765), expressly declares, that all his majesty's colonies and plantations in America have been, are, and of right ought to be, subordinate to and dependent upon the imperial crown and parliament of Great Britain; who have full power and authority to make laws and statutes of sufficient validity to bind the colonies and people of America, subjects of the crown of Great Britain, in all cases whatsoever.* And, this authority has been since very forcibly exemplified and carried into act, by the statute 7 Geo. III, c. 59 (Rebellion in America, 1766), for suspending the legislation of New York; and by several subsequent statutes.<sup>15</sup> * Added in second edition. In the fourth, fifth, and sixth, it was followed by this passage: "And the province of New York having refused to comply with the directions of an act of parliament for supplying the king's troops with necessaries, the subordinate legislative authority of the council and assembly of the province was suspended by statute 7 Geo. III, c. 59 (1766), till the directions of the act were complied with." In the seventh and eighth, this was omitted, and the concluding period, "And . . . statutes" substituted for it, as it now stands. The seventh had a more specific reference to the acts for suspending the harbor of Boston, etc. (14 Geo. III, c. 19, 39, 45, 54, 83, 88, passed in 1774, but omitted in the eighth edition 1778). In the very year in which this edition appeared, when, in the midst of the Revolutionary War efforts at conciliation were making, it was declared by 18 Geo. III, c. 12 (Taxation of Colonies, 1778), that no power of taxation as regarded America would for the future be exercised for the benefit of the mother country. And the course of legislation on this subject terminated with 22 Geo. III, c. 46 (Peace with America, 1782), empowering the king to conclude a truce or peace with these colonies, in pursuance of which the treaty of Paris, signed September 3, 1783, recognized the United States of America as free, sovereign, and independent.

---

<sup>15</sup> Relation of American colonies to parliament.—In regard to the authority of parliament to enact laws which should be binding upon them, there was quite as much obscurity and still more jealousy spreading over the

These are the several parts of the dominions of the crown of Great Britain, in which the municipal laws of England are not of force or authority, merely as the municipal laws of England. Most of them have probably copied the spirit of their own law from this original; but then it receives its obligation, and authoritative force, from being the law of the country.

§ 149. Foreign possessions of the crown.—As to any foreign dominions which may belong to the person of the king by hereditary descent, by purchase, or other acquisition, as the territory of whole subject. The government of Great Britain always maintained the doctrine that the parliament had authority to bind the colonies in all cases whatsoever. No acts of parliament, however, were understood to bind the colonies, unless expressly named therein. But in America, at different times and in different colonies, different opinions were entertained on the subject. In fact, it seemed to be the policy of the colonies as much as possible to withdraw themselves from any acknowledgment of such authority, except so far as their necessities, from time to time, compelled them to acquiesce in the parliamentary measures expressly extending to them. We have already seen that they resisted the imposition of taxes upon them without the consent of their local legislatures, from a very early period.

But it was by no means an uncommon opinion in some of the colonies, especially in the proprietary and charter governments, that no act of parliament whatsoever could bind them without their own consent. An extreme reluctance was shown by Massachusetts to any parliamentary interference as early as 1640; and the famous Navigation Acts of 1651 and 1660 were perpetually evaded, even when their authority was no longer denied, throughout the whole of New England. Massachusetts, in 1679, in an address to the crown, declared that she “apprehended them to be an invasion of the rights, liberties, and properties of the subjects of his majesty in the colony, they not being represented in parliament; and, according to the usual sayings of the learned in the law, the laws of England were bounded within the four seas, and did not reach America.” However, Massachusetts, as well as the other New England colonies, finally acquiesced in the authority of parliament to regulate trade and commerce, but denied it in regard to taxation and internal regulation of the colonies. As late as 1757 the general court of Massachusetts admitted the constitutional authority of parliament in the following words: “The authority of all acts of parliament, which concern the colonies and extend to them, is ever acknowledged in all the courts of law, and made the rule of all judicial proceedings in the province. There is not a member of the general court, and we know no inhabitant within the bounds of the government, that ever questioned this authority.” And in another address in 1761, they declared that “every act

Hanover, and his majesty's other property in Germany; as these do not in any wise appertain to the crown of these kingdoms, they are entirely unconnected with the laws of England, and do not communicate with this nation in any respect whatsoever. The English legislature had wisely remarked the inconveniences that had formerly resulted from dominions on the continent of Europe; from the Norman territory which William the Con-<sup>[110]</sup>queror brought with him, and held in conjunction with the English throne; and from Anjou, and its appendages, which fell to Henry the Second by hereditary descent. They had seen the nation engaged for near four hundred years together in ruinous wars for defense of these foreign dominions; till, happily for this country, they we make, repugnant to an act of parliament extending to the plantations, is ipso facto null and void." And at a later period, in 1768, in a circular address to the other colonies, they admitted "that his majesty's high court of parliament is the supreme legislative power over the whole empire"; contending, however, that as British subjects they could not be taxed without their own consent.

"In the middle and southern provinces" (we are informed by a most respectable historian) [Marshall's Colonies, c. 13, p. 354], "no question respecting the supremacy of parliament in matters of general legislation existed. The authority of such acts of internal regulation as were made for America, as well as those for the regulation of commerce, even by the imposition of duties, provided these duties were imposed for the purpose of regulation, had been at all times admitted. But these colonies, however they might acknowledge the supremacy of parliament in other respects, denied the right of that body to tax them internally." If there were any exceptions to the general accuracy of this statement, they seem to have been too few and fugitive to impair the general result. In the charter of Pennsylvania, an express reservation was made of the power of taxation by an act of parliament, though this was argued not to be a sufficient foundation for the exercise of it.—STORY, 1 Comm. on Const. (4th ed.), 131.

By 22 Geo. III, c. 46 (1782), his majesty was empowered to conclude a truce or peace with the colonies or plantations in America; and, by his letters patent, to suspend or repeal any acts of parliament which related to those colonies. And by the first article of the definitive treaty of peace and friendship between his Britannic majesty and the United States of America, signed at Paris, the 3d day of September, 1783, his Britannic majesty acknowledges the United States of America to be free, sovereign, and independent states. And 23 Geo. III, c. 39 (1783), gives his majesty certain powers for the better carrying on trade and commerce between England and the United States.—CHRISTIAN.

were lost under the reign of Henry the Sixth. They observed that, from that time, the maritime interests of England were better understood and more closely pursued: that, in consequence of this attention, the nation, as soon as she had rested from her civil wars, began at this period to flourish all at once; and became much more considerable in Europe than when her princes were possessed of a larger territory and her councils distracted by foreign interests. This experience and these considerations gave birth to a conditional clause in the act<sup>o</sup> of settlement, which vested the crown in his present majesty's illustrious house, "that in case the crown and imperial dignity of this realm shall hereafter come to any person not being a native of this kingdom of England, this nation shall not be obliged to engage in any war for the defense of any dominions or territories which do not belong to the crown of England, without consent of parliament."

§ 150. The high sea.—We come now to consider the kingdom of England in particular, the direct and immediate subject of those laws concerning which we are to treat in the ensuing Commentaries. And this comprehends not only Wales and Berwick, of which enough has been already said, but also part of the sea. The main or high seas are part of the realm of England, for thereon our courts of admiralty have jurisdiction, as will be shown hereafter; but they are not subject to the common law.<sup>p 16</sup> This main sea

<sup>o</sup> Stat. 12 & 13 Will. III, c. 3 (Privilege of Parliament, 1700). Act of Settlement is really c. 2, c. 3 being as above.

<sup>p</sup> Co. Litt. 260.

---

<sup>16</sup> Jurisdiction over the high seas.—Both the public and private vessels of every nation, on the high seas, and out of the territorial limits of any other state, are subject to the jurisdiction of the state to which they belong. Vattel says that the domain of a nation extends to all its just possessions; and by its possessions we are not to understand its territory only, but all the rights (droits) it enjoys. And he also considers the vessels of a nation on the high seas as portions of its territory. Grotius holds that sovereignty may be acquired over a portion of the sea. . . . But, as one of his commentators, Rutherford, has observed, though there can be no doubt about the jurisdiction of a nation over the persons who compose its fleets when they are out at sea, it does not follow that the nation has jurisdiction over any portion of the ocean itself. It is not a permanent prop-begins at the low-water mark. But between the high-water mark and the low-water mark, where the sea ebbs and flows, the common law and the admiralty have divisum imperium (a divided authority), an alternate jurisdiction; one upon the water, when it is full sea; the other upon the land, when it is an ebb.<sup>q</sup>

§ 151. Divisions of England.—<sup>[111]</sup> The territory of England is liable to two divisions; the one ecclesiastical, the other civil.

§ 152. 1. The ecclesiastical division: a. Provinces of Canterbury and York; subdivisions.—The ecclesiastical division is primarily, into two provinces, those of Canterbury and York. A province is the circuit of an archbishop's jurisdiction. Each province contains divers dioceses, or sees of suffragan bishops; whereof Canterbury includes twenty-one, and York three: besides the bishopric of the Isle of Man, which was annexed to the province of York by King Henry VIII. Every diocese is divided into archdeaconries, whereof there are sixty in all; each archdeaconry into rural deaneries, which are the circuit of the archdeacon's and rural dean's jurisdiction, of whom hereafter; and every deanery is divided into parishes.<sup>r</sup>

§ 153. b. Parishes.—A parish is that circuit of ground which is committed to the charge of one parson, or vicar, or other minister, having cure of souls therein. These districts are computed to be near ten thousand in number.<sup>s</sup> How ancient the division of parishes is, may at present be difficult to ascertain; for it seems to

<sup>q</sup> Finch. L. 78.
<sup>r</sup> Co. Litt. 94.

<sup>s</sup> Gibson's Britan.

---

erty which it acquires, but a mere temporary right of occupancy in a place which is common to all mankind, to be successively used by all as they have occasion. This jurisdiction which the nation has over its public and private vessels on the high seas is exclusive only so far as respects offenses against its own municipal laws. Piracy and other offenses against the law of nations, being crimes not against any particular state, but against all mankind, may be punished in the competent tribunal of any country where the offender may be found, or into which he may be carried, although committed on board a foreign vessel on the high seas.—WHEATON, International Law (Boyd's ed.), 166.

be agreed on all hands that in the early ages of Christianity in this island, parishes were unknown, or at least signified the same that a diocese does now. There was then no appropriation of ecclesiastical dues to any particular church: but every man was at liberty to contribute his tithes to whatever priest or church he pleased, provided only that he did it to some: or, if he made no special appointment or appropriation thereof, they were paid into the hands of the bishop, whose duty it was to distribute them among the clergy, and for other pious purposes, according to his own discretion.†

Mr. Camden‡ says, England was divided into parishes by Archbishop Honorius about the year 630. Sir Henry Hobart¶ lays it down, that parishes were first erected by the council of Lateran, which was held A. D. 1179. Each widely differing<sup>[112]</sup> from the other, and both of them perhaps from the truth; which will probably be found in the medium between the two extremes. For Mr. Selden has clearly shown,‡ that the clergy lived in common without any division of parishes, long after the time mentioned by Camden. And it appears from the Saxon laws that parishes were in being long before the date of that council of Lateran to which they are ascribed by Hobart.<sup>17</sup>

We find the distinction of parishes, nay even of mother churches, so early as in the laws of King Edgar, about the year 970. Before that time the consecration of tithes was in general arbitrary; that is, every man paid his own (as was before observed) to what church or parish he pleased. But this being liable to be attended with either fraud, or at least caprice, in the persons paying; and with either jealousies or mean compliances in such as were competitors for receiving them, it was now ordered by the law of King Edgar,¶ that “dentur omnes decimæ primariae ecclesiæ ad quam parochia

† Seld. of Tith. 9. 4; 2 Inst. 646; Hob. 296.

‡ In his Britannia.

¶ Hob. 29.

‡ Of Tithes. c. 9.

¶ C. 1.

---

<sup>17</sup> According to Stubbs' Constitutional History, I, 227, the division of the land into parishes was due to Theodore of Tarsus, who was Archbishop of Canterbury from 668 to 693, A. D.

pertinet"<sup>18</sup> (that all tithes be given to the mother church to which the parish belongs). However, if any thane, or great lord, had a church within his own demesnes, distinct from the mother church, in the nature of a private chapel; then, provided such church had a cemetery or consecrated place of burial belonging to it, he might allot one-third of his tithes for the maintenance of the officiating minister: but, if it had no cemetery, the thane must himself have maintained his chaplain by some other means; for in such case all his tithes were ordained to be paid to the primariæ ecclesiæ or mother church.<sup>a</sup>

This proves that the kingdom was then universally divided into parishes; which division happened probably not all at once, but by degrees. For it seems pretty clear and certain, that the boundaries of parishes were originally ascertained by those of a manor or manors: since it very seldom happens that a manor extends itself over more parishes than one, though there are often many manors in one parish. [113] The lords, as Christianity spread itself, began to build churches upon their own demesnes or wastes, to accommodate their tenants in one or two adjoining lordships; and, in order to have divine service regularly performed therein, obliged all their tenants to appropriate their tithes to the maintenance of the one officiating minister, instead of leaving them at liberty to distribute them among the clergy of the diocese in general: and this tract of land, the tithes whereof were so appropriated, formed a distinct parish. Which will well enough account for the frequent intermixture of parishes one with another. For if a lord had a parcel of land detached from the main of his estate, but not sufficient to form a parish of itself, it was natural for him to endow his newly erected church with the tithes of those disjointed lands; especially if no church was then built in any lordship adjoining to those outlying parcels.

Thus parishes were gradually formed, and parish churches endowed with the tithes that arose within the circuit assigned. But some lands, either because they were in the hands of irreligious and careless owners, or were situated in forests and desert places, or for other now unsearchable reasons, were never united to any parish, and therefore continue to this day extraparochial; and there tithes are now by immemorial custom payable to the king instead of the bishop, in trust and confidence that he will distribute them for the general good of the church; * yet extraparochial wastes and marsh-lands, when improved and drained, are by the statute 17 Geo. II, c. 37 (1743), to be assessed to all parochial rates in the parish next adjoining. And thus much for the ecclesiastical division of this kingdom.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. c. 2. See also the laws of King Canute, c. 11, about the year 1030.

<sup>18</sup> Laws of Edgar II, 1 (1), in Liebermann, Gesetze der Angelsachsen, p. 197. It is, however, very doubtful whether the term "parish" is here anything more than a late version of an old Saxon word, meaning simply "district."—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 71 n.

§ 154. 2. The civil division.—The civil division of the territory of England is into counties, of those counties into hundreds, of those hundreds into tithings or towns. Which division, as it now stands, seems to owe its original to King Alfred: who, to prevent [114] the rapines and disorders which formerly prevailed in the realm, instituted tithings; so called, from the Saxon, because ten freeholders with their families composed one. These all dwelt together, and were sureties or free pledges to the king for the good behavior of each other; and, if any offense was committed in their district, they were bound to have the offender forthcoming.<sup>b</sup> And therefore anciently no man was suffered to abide in England above forty days, unless he were enrolled in some tithing or decennary.<sup>c</sup> One of the principal inhabitants of the tithing is annually appointed to preside over the rest, being called the tithing man, the headborough (words which speak their own etymology), and in some countries the borsholder, or borough's-ealder, being supposed the discreetest man in the borough, town, or tithing.<sup>d</sup>

<sup>a</sup> 2 Inst. 647; 2 Rep. 44; Cro. Eliz. 512.

<sup>b</sup> Flet. 1. 47. This the laws of King Edward the Confessor, c. 20, very justly entitle "summa et maxima securitas, per quam omnes statu firmissimo sustinentur; quæ hoc modo fiebat, quod sub decennali fidejussione debebant esse universi, etc." (the best and greatest security by which all persons are kept in the safest state; which was effected in this manner, that every ten should be sureties for each other).

<sup>c</sup> Mirr. c. 1. § 3.

<sup>d</sup> Finch. L. 8.

§ 155. a. Tithings, towns or vills.—Tithings, towns, or vills are of the same signification in law; and are said to have had, each of them, originally a church and celebration of divine service, sacraments, and burials;° though that seems to be rather an ecclesiastical, than a civil distinction. The word “town” or “vill” is indeed, by the alteration of times and language, now become a generical term, comprehending under it the several species of cities, boroughs, and common towns.<sup>19</sup> A city is a town incorporated, which is or hath beer the see of a bishop: and though the bishopric be dissolved, as at Westminster, yet still it remaineth a city.† A borough is now understood to be a town, either corporate or not, that sendeth burgesses to parliament.‡<sup>20</sup> Other towns there are to the number, Sir Edward Coke says,§ of 8,803, which are neither cities nor boroughs; some of which have the privileges of markets, and others not; but both are equally towns in law. To several of these towns there are small appendages belonging, called [<sup>115</sup>] hamlets; which are taken notice of in the statute of Exeter,¶ which makes frequent mention of entire vills, demi-vills, and hamlets. Entire vills Sir Henry Spelman* conjectures to have consisted of ten freemen, or frank-pledges, demi-vills of five, and hamlets of less than five. These little collections of houses are sometimes under the same administration as the town itself, sometimes governed by separate officers; in which last case they are, to some purposes in law, looked upon as distinct townships. These towns, as was before hinted, contained each originally but one parish and one tithing; though many of them now, by the increase of inhabitants, are divided into several parishes and tithings; and

• 1 Inst. 115.

† Co. Litt. 109.

§ Litt. § 164.

¶ 1 Inst. 116.

‡ 14 Edw. I (1286).

* Gloss. 274.

<sup>19</sup> Taken in this wide sense, towns are distinguished from each other as being either corporate or not corporate. In the former, the rate-paying inhabitants are created by royal charter a legal personality commonly designated a municipal corporation.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 74.

<sup>20</sup> A borough was anciently a fortified place, then a town which exercised certain privileges or franchises, e. g., the right to manage its own affairs, or to send members to parliament. At the present day, a true borough is a town which is incorporated by charter for purposes of self-government. But an urban constituency which sends members to parliament is frequently called a “parliamentary borough.”—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 74.

sometimes, where there is but one parish there are two or more villis or tithings.<sup>21</sup>

§ 156. b. Hundreds.—As ten families of freeholders make up a town or tithing, so ten tithings composed a superior division, called a hundred, as consisting of ten times ten families. The hundred is governed by an high constable or bailiff, and formerly there was regularly held in it the hundred court for the trial of causes, though now fallen into disuse. In some of the more northern counties these hundreds are called wapentakes.<sup>1</sup>

The subdivision of hundreds into tithings seems to be most peculiarly the invention of Alfred: the institution of hundreds themselves he rather introduced than invented. For they seem to have obtained in Denmark:<sup>m</sup> and we find that in France a regulation of this sort was made above two hundred years before; set on foot by Clotharius and Childebert, with a view of obliging each district to answer for the robberies committed in its own division. These

<sup>1</sup> Seld. in Fortesc. c. 24.

<sup>m</sup> Seld. Tit. of Honor. 2. 5. 3.

---

<sup>21</sup> Modern legislation on local government.—Apart, however, from these privileged cases, there has existed, from ancient times, the ordinary township or vill, which is, even now, despite recent changes, the basis of the English system of local government. For a long period, during the middle ages, its very existence was obscured by the ecclesiastical organization of the parish, which had obtained such a powerful hold upon it, and absorbed so many of its functions. But, with the growth of the Poor Law system in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the township, with its overseers and relieving officers, began once more to reappear under the names of "Poor Law parish," or "civil parish." And, although the tradition of the middle ages was still strong enough to enable the ecclesiastical officers (the incumbent and churchwardens) and the ecclesiastical assembly (the vestry) to claim much of the control, even in secular affairs; yet the increasing difficulties resulting from the vast growth of population, at the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth centuries, gradually led to a complete severance of the ecclesiastical and secular parishes, which are now, in many cases, totally different in area. The three great steps by which this result was achieved were: (1) the Public Health Act, 1875, which, virtually, constituted each urban civil parish (outside the metropolitan area) a separate "urban district"; (2) the Local Government Act, 1894, which conferred certain powers of self-government upon rural civil parishes; and (3) the London Government Act, 1899, which converted the London civil parishes into municipal boroughs.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 74.

divisions were, in that country, as well military as civil: and each contained a hundred freemen, who were subject to an officer called the centenarius (head of a hundred); a number of which centenarii were themselves subject to a superior officer called the count or comes.<sup>a</sup> And [116] indeed something like this institution of hundreds may be traced back as far as the ancient Germans, from whom were derived both the Franks, who became masters of Gaul, and the Saxons, who settled in England: for both the thing and the name, as a territorial assemblage of persons, from which afterwards the territory itself might probably receive its denomination, were well known to that warlike people. “Centeni ex singulis pagis sunt, idque ipsum inter suos vocantur; et quod primo numerus fuit, jam nomen et honor est” (each village is divided into hundreds, and the designation hundreds is used by the inhabitants; and that which first was a mere number has now become both a name and an honor).<sup>o</sup>

§ 157. c. Counties or shires.—An indefinite number of these hundreds make up a county or shire. Shire is a Saxon word signifying a division; but a county, comitatus, is plainly derived from comes, the count of the Franks; that is, the earl, or alderman (as the Saxons called him) of the shire, to whom the government of it was entrusted. This he usually exercised by his deputy, still called in Latin vice-comes, and in English, the sheriff, shrieve, or shire-reeve, signifying the officer of the shire; upon whom by process of time the civil administration of it is now totally devolved. In some counties there is an intermediate division, between the shire and the hundreds, as lathes in Kent, and rapes in Sussex, each of them containing about three or four hundred apiece. These had formerly their lathe-reeves and rape-reeves, acting in subordination to the shire-reeve. Where a county is divided into three of these intermediate jurisdictions, they are called trithings,<sup>p</sup> which were anciently governed by a trithing-reeve. These trithings still subsist in the large county of York, where by an easy corruption they are denominated ridings; the north, the east, and the west riding. The number of counties in England and Wales have been different at different times: at present there are forty in England and twelve in Wales.<sup>22</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Montesq. Sp. L. 30. 17.

<sup>p</sup> LL. Edw. c. 34.

<sup>o</sup> Tacit, de Morib. German. 6.

§ 158. (1) Counties palatine.—Three of these counties, Chester, Durham, and Lancaster, are called counties palatine. The two former are such by prescription, or immemorial custom; or, at least as old as [117] the Norman Conquest;¶ the latter was created by King Edward III in favor of Henry Plantagenet, first earl and then duke of Lancaster;† whose heiress being married to John of Gant, the king's son, the franchise was greatly enlarged

¶ Seld. Tit. Hon. 2. 5. 8.

† Pat. 25 Edw. III. p. 1. m. 18 (1350); Seld. Ibid.; Sandford's Gen. Hist. 112; 4 Inst. 204.

---

<sup>22</sup> Importance of the division into counties.—It seems probable that the realm was originally divided into counties, with a view to the more convenient administration of justice; for the judicial business of the kingdom was in early times chiefly dispatched in local courts, held in each different county, before the sheriff, as its principal officer. And as regards crime, the trial is, as a general rule, still conducted in the county wherein the offense is alleged to have been committed; the trial taking place either before the judges and commissioners of assize, on their periodical circuits, or else before the justices of the peace for the county at their quarter sessions. But, under the provisions of modern acts of parliament, counties may be united together for the trial of prisoners.

Another important object, connected with the distribution into counties, is that of parliamentary representation. Every county used to send to the house of commons its own members, called knights of the shire, who represented their respective counties, as the borough members their respective towns. Latterly, the larger counties have been subdivided, each portion forming (so far as this purpose is concerned) a separate county, and sending its separate representative. And this subdivision of counties has been recently carried to a great length; while even boroughs also have been subdivided, for parliamentary purposes, by the Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885.

For the object of local taxation, too, the division into counties is of practical effect and importance. For, as each parish is subject to a rate for the relief of the poor, so is every county subject to a county rate, which is directed to be levied on the occupiers of land within the county, and is applicable for many miscellaneous purposes, such as the maintenance of the rural police, lunatic asylums, bridges, and the like. And, finally, new elective county councils have been provided, by the Local Government Act, 1888, for the administration of local affairs.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 77.

and confirmed in parliament,* to honor John of Gant himself, whom on the death of his father-in-law, the king had also created Duke of Lancaster.† Counties palatine are so called a palatio (from a royal court); because the owners thereof, the Earl of Chester, the Bishop of Durham, and the Duke of Lancaster, had in those counties jura regalia (regal rights), as fully as the king hath in his palace; regalem potestatem in omnibus (regal power in all things), as Bracton expresses it.‡ They might pardon treasons, murders, and felonies; they appointed all judges and justices of the peace; all writs and indictments ran in their names, as in other counties in the king's; and all offenses were said to be done against their peace, and not, as in other places, contra pacem domini regis (against the peace of our lord the king).¶ And indeed by the ancient law, in all peculiar jurisdictions, offenses were said to be done against his peace in whose court they were tried; in a court-leet, contra pacem domini (against the peace of the king); in the court of a corporation, contra pacem ballivorum (against the peace of the bailiffs); in the sheriff's court or tourn, contra pacem vicecomitis (against the peace of the sheriff).* These palatine privileges (so similar to the regal independent jurisdictions usurped by the great barons on the continent, during the weak and infant state of the first feudal kingdoms in Europe‡) were in all probability originally granted to the counties of Chester and Durham, because they bordered upon enemies' countries, Wales and Scotland; in order that the owners, being encouraged by so large an authority, might be the more watchful in its defense; and that the inhabitants having justice administered at home, might not be obliged to go out of the county and leave it open to the enemies' incursions. And upon this account also there were formerly two other counties palatine, [118] Pembrokeshire and Hexhamshire, the latter now united with Northumberland: but these were abolished by parliament, the former in 27 Hen. VIII (1536), the latter in 14 Eliz. (1572). And in 27 Hen. VIII likewise, the powers before mentioned of owners * Cart. 36 Edw. III. n. 9 (1362).

† Pat. 51 Edw. III. m. 33 (1377); Plowd. 215; 7 Rym. 138.

‡ L. 3. c. 8. § 4.

¶ 4 Inst. 204.

* Seld. in Heng. Magn. c. 2.

‡ Robertson. Chap. V. i. 60.

of counties palatine were abridged; the reason for their continuance in a manner ceasing; though still all writs are witnessed in their names, and all forfeitures for treason by the common law accrue to them.<sup>23</sup>

Of these three, the county of Durham is now the only one remaining in the hands of a subject.<sup>24</sup> For the earldom of Chester, as Camden testifies, was united to the crown by Henry III and has ever since given title to the king's eldest son. And the county palatine, or duchy, of Lancaster was the property of Henry of Bolingbroke, the son of John of Gant, at the time when he wrested the crown from King Richard II, and assumed the title of Henry IV. But he was too prudent to suffer this to be united to the crown; lest, if he lost one, he should lose the other also. For, as Plowden<sup>a</sup> and Sir Edward Coke<sup>b</sup> observe, "he knew he had the duchy of Lancaster by sure and indefeasible title, but that his title to the crown was not so assured: for that after the decease of Richard II the right of the crown was in the heir of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, second son of Edward III; John of Gant, father to this Henry IV, being but the fourth son." And therefore he procured an act of parliament, in the first year of his reign, ordaining that the duchy of Lancaster, and all other his hereditary estates, with all their royalties and franchises, should remain to him and his heirs forever; and should remain, descend, be administered, and governed, in like manner as if he never had attained the regal dignity: and thus they descended to his son and grandson, Henry V and Henry VI, many new territories and privileges being annexed to the duchy by the former.<sup>c</sup> Henry VI being attainted in 1 Edw. IV (1461), this duchy was declared in parliament [<sup>119</sup>] to have become forfeited to the crown,<sup>d</sup> and at the same time an act was

<sup>a</sup> 4 Inst. 205.

<sup>a</sup> 215.

<sup>b</sup> 4 Inst. 205.

<sup>c</sup> Parl. 2 Hen. V. n. 30 (1414); 3 Hen. V. n. 15 (1415).

<sup>d</sup> 1 Vent. 155.

---

<sup>23</sup> During the nineteenth century the administration of justice in the counties palatine has been brought into harmony with that of the rest of England.

<sup>24</sup> The jurisdiction of the county of Durham was vested by parliamentary acts in 1836 and 1858 in the crown as a separate franchise and royalty.

made to incorporate the duchy of Lancaster, to continue the county palatine (which might otherwise have determined by the attainder*) and to make the same parcel of the duchy: and, further, to vest the whole in King Edward IV and his heirs, kings of England, forever; but under a separate guiding and governance from the other inheritances of the crown. And in 1 Hen. VII (1485) another act was made, *to resume such part of the duchy lands as had been dismembered from it in the reign of Edward IV and to vest the inheritance of the whole in the king and his heirs forever, as amply and largely, and in like manner, form, and condition, separate from the crown of England and possession of the same, as the three Henrys and Edward IV, or any of them, had and held the same.†*

* The editions previous to the fifth read, "to vest the inheritance thereof in Henry VII and his heirs: and in this state, say Sir Edward Coke and Lambard, viz., in the natural heirs or posterity of Henry VII, did the right of the duchy remain to their day; a separate and distinct inheritance from that of the crown of England." Note † also reads differently in the first four editions.

• 1 Vent. 157.

† Some have entertained an opinion (Plowd. 220, 1, 2; Lamb. Archeion. 233; 4 Inst. 206) that by this act the right of the duchy vested only in the natural, and not in the political person of King Henry VII, as formerly in that of Henry IV; and was descendible to his natural heirs, independent of the succession to the crown. And, if this notion were well founded, it might have become a very curious question at the time of the revolution in 1688, in whom the right of the duchy remained after King James' abdication, and previous to the attainder of the pretended Prince of Wales. But it is observable, that in the same act the duchy of Cornwall is also vested in King Henry VII and his heirs; which could never be intended in any event to be separated from the inheritance of the crown. And indeed it seems to have been understood very early after the statute of Henry VII that the duchy of Lancaster was by no means thereby made a separate inheritance from the rest of the royal patrimony; since it descended, with the crown, to the half blood in the instances of Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth: which it could not have done, as the estate of a mere Duke of Lancaster, in the common course of legal descent. The better opinion therefore seems to be that of those judges, who held (Plowd. 221) that notwithstanding the statute of Henry VII (which was only an act of resumption), the duchy still remained as established by the acts of Edward IV; separate from the other possessions of the crown in order and government, but united in point of inheritance.

The Isle of Ely is not a county palatine, though sometimes erroneously called so, but only a royal franchise: the bishop having, by grant of King Henry the First, jura regalia (regal rights), within the Isle of Ely; whereby he exercises a jurisdiction over all causes, as well criminal as civil.<sup>25</sup>

§ 159. d. Counties corporate.—<sup>[120]</sup> There are also counties corporate: which are certain cities and towns, some with more, some with less territory annexed to them; to which out of special grace and favor the kings of England have granted the privilege to be counties of themselves, and not to be comprised in any other county; but to be governed by their own sheriffs and other magistrates, so that no officers of the county at large have any power to intermeddle therein. Such are London, York, Bristol, Norwich, Coventry, and many others. And thus much of the countries subject to the laws of England.

• 4 Inst. 220.

---

<sup>25</sup> The secular authority of the bishop in the Isle of Ely was taken from him by the Liberties Act, 1836, and vested in the crown.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 80.

COMMENTARIES
ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND.

---

BOOK THE FIRST.
OF THE RIGHTS OF PERSONS.

[121] CHAPTER THE FIRST.

OF THE ABSOLUTE RIGHTS OF INDIVIDUALS.

§ 160. Objects of the law: rights and wrongs.—The objects of the laws of England are so very numerous and extensive, that, in order to consider them with any tolerable ease and perspicuity, it will be necessary to distribute them methodically, under proper and distinct heads; avoiding as much as possible divisions too large and comprehensive on the one hand, and too trifling and minute on the other; both of which are equally productive of confusion.

[122] Now, as municipal law is a rule of civil conduct, commanding what is right, and prohibiting what is wrong; or as Cicero,<sup>a</sup> and after him our Bracton,<sup>b</sup> have expressed it, sanctio justa, jubens honesta et prohibens contraria; it follows, that the primary and principal objects of the law are RIGHTS and WRONGS.<sup>1</sup> In the prose-

---

<sup>a</sup> 11 Phillip. 12.

<sup>b</sup> l. 1. c. 3.

<sup>1</sup> Meaning of "a right."—Jurisprudence is specifically concerned only with such rights as are recognized by law and enforced by the power of a state. We may therefore define a "legal right," in what we shall hereafter see is the strictest sense of that term, as a capacity residing in one man of controlling, with the assent and assistance of the state, the actions of others.

That which gives validity to a legal right is, in every case, the force which is lent to it by the state. Anything else may be the occasion, but is not the cause, of its obligatory character.

Sometimes it has reference to a tangible object. Sometimes it has no such reference. Thus, on the one hand, the ownership of land is a power residing in the land owner, as its subject, exercised over the land, as its object, and available against all other men. So a father has a certain power, residing in cution, therefore, of these Commentaries, I shall follow this very simple and obvious division; and shall in the first place consider himself as its subject and exercised over his child as its object, available against all the world besides. On the other hand, a servant has a power residing in himself as its subject, over no tangible object, and available only against his master to compel the payment of such wages as may be due to him.

This simple meaning of the term "a right" is for the purposes of the jurist entirely adequate. It has, however, been covered with endless confusion owing to its similarity to "Right"; an abstract term formed from the adjective "right," in the same way that "Justice" is formed from the adjective "just." Hence it is that Blackstone actually opposes "rights" in the sense of capacities, to "wrongs" in the sense of "unrighteous acts."

We in England are happily spared another ambiguity which in many languages besets the phrase expressing "a right." The Latin "Ius," the German "Recht," the Italian "Diritto," and the French "Droit" express not only "a right" but also "Law" in the abstract. To express the distinction between "Law" and "a right" the Germans are therefore obliged to resort to such phrases as "objectives" and "subjectives Recht," meaning by the former, law in the abstract, and by the latter, a concrete right. And Blackstone, paraphrasing the distinction drawn by Roman law between the "ius quod ad res" and the "ius quod ad personas pertinet," devotes the first and second volumes of his Commentaries to the "Rights of Persons" and the "Rights of Things," respectively.—HOLLAND, Jurisprudence (11th ed.), 82.

Rights.—A right is an interest recognized and protected by a rule of right. It is any interest, respect for which is a duty, and the disregard of which is a wrong. All that is right or wrong, just or unjust, is so by reason of its effects upon the interests of mankind, that is to say, upon the various elements of human well-being, such as life, liberty, health, reputation, and the uses of material objects. If any act is right or just, it is so because and in so far as it promotes some form of human interest. If any act is wrong or unjust, it is because the interests of men are prejudicially affected by it. Conduct which has no influence upon the interests of anyone has no significance either in law or morals. Every wrong, therefore, involves some interest attacked by it, and every duty involves some interest to which it relates, and for whose protection it exists. The converse, however, is not true. Every attack upon an interest is not a wrong, either in fact or in law, nor is respect for every interest a duty, either legal or natural. Many interests exist de facto and not also de jure; they receive no recognition or protection from any rule of right. The violation of them is no wrong, and respect for them is no duty. For the interests of men conflict with each other, and it is impossible for all to receive rightful recognition. The rule of justice selects some for protection, and the others are rejected.

The interests which thus receive recognition and protection from the rules of right are called rights. Every man who has a right to anything has an interest in it also, but he may have an interest without having a right. Whether his interest amounts to a right depends on whether there exists with respect to it a duty imposed upon any other person. In other words, a right is an interest the violation of which is a wrong.

the rights that are commanded, and secondly the wrongs that are forbidden by the laws of England.

Every right corresponds to a rule of right, from which it proceeds, and it is from this source that it derives its name. That I have a right to a thing means that it is right that I should have it. All right is the right of him for whose benefit it exists, just as all wrong is the wrong of him whose interests are affected by it. In the words of Windscheid, "Das Recht ist sein Recht geworden."

Rights, like wrongs and duties, are either moral or legal. A moral or natural right is an interest recognized and protected by the rule of natural justice—an interest the violation of which would be a moral wrong, and respect for which is a moral duty. A legal right, on the other hand, is an interest recognized and protected by the rule of legal justice—an interest the violation of which would be a legal wrong done to him whose interest it is, and respect for which is a legal duty. "Rights," says Ihering, "are legally protected interests." Bentham set the fashion, still followed by many, of denying that there are any such things as natural rights at all. All rights are legal rights and the creation of the law. "Natural law, natural rights," he says, "are two kinds of fictions or metaphors, which play so great a part in books of legislation, that they deserve to be examined by themselves. . . . Rights properly so called are the creatures of law properly so called; real laws give rise to real rights. Natural rights are the creatures of natural law; they are a metaphor which derives its origin from another metaphor." In this matter Bentham is followed by Austin, who says: "Strictly speaking, there are no rights but those which are the creatures of law; and I speak of any other kind of rights only in order that I may conform to the received language." "In many of the cultivated," says Mr. Spencer, criticising this opinion, "there has been produced a confirmed and indeed contemptuous denial of rights. There are no such things, say they, except such as are conferred by law. Following Bentham, they affirm that the state is the originator of rights and that apart from it there are no rights."

A complete examination of this opinion would lead us far into the regions of ethical rather than juridical conceptions, and would here be out of place. It is sufficient to make two observations with respect to the matter. In the first place, he who denies the existence of natural rights must be prepared at the same time to reject natural or moral duties also. Rights and duties are essentially correlative, and if a creditor has no natural right to receive his debt, the debtor is under no moral duty to pay it to him. In the second place, he who rejects natural rights must at the same time be prepared to reject natural right. He must say with the Greek skeptics that the distinction between right and wrong, justice and injustice, is unknown in the nature of things, and a matter of human institution merely. If there are no rights save those which the state creates, it logically follows that nothing is right and nothing wrong save that which the state establishes and declares as such. If natural justice is a truth and not a delusion, the same must be admitted of natural rights.—SALMOND, Jurisprudence, sec. 72.

§ 161. Division of rights and wrongs.—Rights are, however, liable to another subdivision: being either, first, those which concern

Legal rights.—Mr. Justice Holmes explains the nature of a legal right as follows: "A legal right is nothing but a permission to exercise certain natural powers, and upon certain conditions to obtain protection, restitution, or compensation by the aid of the public force. Just so far as the aid of the public force is given a man, he has a legal right, and this right is the same whether his claim is founded in righteousness or iniquity."—HOLMES, Common Law, 214.

Professor Holland gives a fuller conception of the idea of legal right by comparing it with the ideas of might and moral right. He says: "It may be as well to restate in a few words precisely what we mean by saying that any given individual has 'a right.' If a man by his own force or persuasion can carry out his wishes, either by his own acts, or by influencing the acts of others, he has the 'might' so to carry out his wishes. If, irrespectively of having or not having this might, public opinion would view with approval, or at least with acquiescence, his so carrying out his wishes, and with disapproval any resistance made to his so doing; then he has a 'moral right' so to carry out his wishes. If, irrespectively of his having, or not having, either the might, or moral right on his side, the power of the state will protect him in so carrying out his wishes, and will compel such acts or forbearances on the part of other people as may be necessary in order that his wishes may be so carried out, then he has a 'legal right' so to carry out his wishes.

"If it is a question of might, all depends upon a man's own powers of force or persuasion. If it is a question of moral right, all depends on the readiness of public opinion to express itself upon his side. If it is a question of legal right, all depends upon the readiness of the state to exert its force on his behalf. It is hence obvious that a moral and a legal right are so far from being identical that they may easily be opposed to one another. Moral rights have, in general, but a subjective support, legal rights have the objective support of the physical force of the state. The whole purpose of laws is to announce in what cases that objective support will be granted, and the manner in which it may be obtained. In other words, law exists, as was stated previously, for the definition and protection of rights."—HOLLAND, Jurisprudence (11th ed.), 85.

Legal duties.—Every right, whether moral or legal, implies the active or passive furtherance by others of the wishes of the party having the right. Wherever anyone is entitled to such furtherance on the part of others, such furtherance on their part is said to be their "duty." Where such furtherance is and are annexed to the persons of men, and are then called jura personarum or the rights of persons; or they are, secondly, such merely expected by the public opinion of the society in which they live, it is their "moral duty." Where it will be enforced by the power of the state to which they are amenable, it is their "legal duty."

The correlative of might is necessity, or susceptibility to force; of moral right is moral duty; of legal right is legal duty. These pairs of correlative terms express, it will be observed, in each case, the same state of facts viewed from opposite sides. A state of facts in which a man has within himself the physical force to compel another to obey him, may be described either by saying that A has the might to control B, or that B is under a necessity of submitting to A. So when public opinion would approve of A commanding and of B obeying, the position may be described either by saying that A has a moral right to command, or that B is under a moral duty to obey. Similarly, when the state will compel B to carry out, either by act or forbearance, the wishes of A, we may indifferently say that A has a legal right, or that B is under a legal duty.—HOLLAND, Jurisprudence (11th ed.), 86.

Rights in rem and rights in personam.—Sometimes a legal right exists against one or more persons, specifically designated or capable of being ascertained; sometimes a legal right exists against all persons generally, that is to say, against all the members of the particular society or community to which the holder of the right belongs. Thus, in the case of a contract between A and B, the right of A to demand performance of the contract exists against B only; whereas, in the case of the ownership of a piece of land or of the right to personal freedom of motion, the right to hold and enjoy the land, or the right to move about freely, exists against persons generally. This distinction between different classes of legal rights is indicated by the use of technical Latin terms: the former being called rights in personam, the latter rights in rem. These expressions are in common use and must accordingly be understood. It is the part of wisdom not to attempt to translate, as a translation is likely to mislead, especially in case of the expression, right in rem. A right in personam means a right available against a determinate individual or determinate individuals. All contractual rights, as well as some others, fall thereunder. A right in rem means a right available against persons generally, or, as frequently expressed, against the world at large.

Scheme of rights in Anglo-American law.—Bringing under the two main heads of rights in rem and rights in personam the several classes of rights recognized by the law, Professor Roscoe Pound presents the following scheme: (

"I. In rem.

- (1) Personal integrity. The right not to be injured in body or mind by the acts or negligence of others. This extends to (i) life; (ii) body; (iii) health; (a) bodily; (b) mental. Originally the taking of life did not give rise to any civil liability. But modern legislation has given an action to the successors or the estate of the person killed.

as a man may acquire over external objects, or things unconnected with his person, which are styled jura rerum or the rights of things.<sup>2</sup> Wrongs also are divisible into, first, private wrongs, which, being an infringement merely of particular rights, concern individuals only, and are called civil injuries; and secondly, public wrongs, which, being a breach of general and public rights, affect the whole community, and are called crimes and misdemeanors.<sup>3</sup>

- (2) Personal liberty. The right of free motion and locomotion except as restricted by law and restrained lawfully by the proper officers acting in the proper manner.
- (3) Society and control of family and dependents.
- (4) Private property.

II. In personam.

- (1) Contractual. Rights arising independently of pre-existing rights out of the agreement of the parties.
- (2) Quasi-contractual. Rights to have restitution or compensation for a benefit conferred, imposed by law in order to prevent unjust enrichment of one party at the expense of another.
- (3) Fiduciary. Rights to have a trust or confidence executed in specie (specifically). These rights are recognized only in courts of equity or in proceedings in equity.
- (4) Delictual. Rights to compensation arising from violations of pre-existing rights in rem.—POUND, Readings in the Common Law (2d ed.), 420.

<sup>2</sup> "Jura rerum."—It will be observed that though the Roman writers shorten "ius quod ad personas pertinet" into "ius personarum," they never abbreviate the "ius quod ad res pertinet" into "ius rerum." Yet their later followers have talked of "ius rerum," as well as of "ius personarum," thereby causing not a little confusion; and Sir Matthew Hale, adopting these phrases, mistranslates them "Rights of Persons and of Things," and is followed by Blackstone.—HOLLAND, Jurisprudence (11th ed.), 135.

Stephen's classification of rights.—Stephen's Commentaries, which adheres to Blackstone's classification of the field of law into rights and wrongs, analyzes rights as follows (Vol. I, p. 83): "They regard either, first, a man's own person; or, secondly, his dominion over things; or, thirdly, his private relations; or, fourthly, his condition as a member of the community. And of these varieties of rights, the first we may call personal rights; the second, rights of property; the third, rights in private relations; and the fourth, public rights." This classification expresses the meaning of Hale and Blackstone much more clearly than their own distinctions into rights of persons and rights of things.

<sup>3</sup> Civil injuries and crimes.—Likewise the meaning of Blackstone in his division of wrongs is better expressed in 1 Stephen's Commentaries, 84, as follows: "Wrongs also may be subdivided; but the leading distinction here depends not on § 162. Division of these Commentaries.—The objects of the laws of England falling into this fourfold division, the present Commentaries will therefore consist of the four following parts: 1. The rights of persons; with the means whereby such rights may be either acquired or lost. 2. The rights of things; with the means also of acquiring and losing them. 3. Private wrongs, or civil injuries; with the means of redressing them by law. 4. Public wrongs; or crimes and misdemeanors; with the means of prevention and punishment.

§ 163. 1. Rights of persons.—We are now, first, to consider the rights of persons; with the means of acquiring and losing them.

[123] Now the rights of persons that are commanded to be observed by the municipal law are of two sorts: first, such as are due from every citizen, which are usually called civil duties; and secondly, such as belong to him, which is the more popular acceptation of rights or jura. Both may, indeed, be comprised in this latter division; for, as all social duties are of a relative nature, at the same time that they are due from one man, or set of men, they must also be due to another. But I apprehend it will be more clear and easy to consider many of them as duties required from, rather than as rights belonging to particular persons. Thus, for instance, allegiance is usually, and therefore most easily, considered as the duty of the people, and protection as the duty of the magistrate; and yet they are, reciprocally, the rights as well as duties of each other. Allegiance is the right of the magistrate, and protection the right of the people.

§ 164. a. Division of persons.—Persons also are divided by the law into either natural persons, or artificial. Natural persons the character of the right violated, but on the party who is supposed to sustain injury from its violation. That is to say, when the violation is left to be redressed by a particular individual only, it is called a civil injury; but when it may be the subject of a prosecution by the crown in the interests of the public, it is called a crime. (See 4 Bl. Comm., pp. 5, 6.) Thus, the withholding of a debt is a wrong to the individual, and consequently a civil injury; but to deprive a man of his money by theft or robbery, is held to be a wrong also to the public, and therefore a crime. It is, however, necessary to remember, that the same act, e. g., an assault, may be both a civil injury and a crime."

are such as the God of nature formed us; artificial are such as are created and devised by human laws for the purposes of society and government, which are called corporations or bodies politic.

§ 165. b. Division of rights of persons: absolute and relative. The rights of persons considered in their natural capacities are also of two sorts, absolute and relative.<sup>4</sup> Absolute, which are such

<sup>4</sup> Langdell's classification of rights into absolute and relative.—Blackstone's classification of rights into absolute and relative, while severely censured by many writers, has been accepted and utilized by others. One of the most carefully considered discussions of the subject is that by the late Professor C. C. Langdell, whose name carries with it exceptional authority for discriminating scholarship. The substance of Professor Langdell's argument is as follows:

"Legal rights are either absolute or relative. An absolute right is one which does not imply any correlative obligation or duty. A relative right is one which does imply a correlative obligation or duty. (Writers upon jurisprudence generally use the terms in rem and in personam to mark the primary division of legal rights, and it is therefore proper for me to explain why I use the terms 'absolute' and 'relative' instead. It will, however, be more convenient to do this after treating of the different classes of legal rights.)

"Absolute rights are either personal rights or rights of property. A personal right is one which belongs to every natural person as such. A right of property is one which consists of ownership or dominion (dominium).

"Every personal right is born with the person to whom it belongs, and dies with him. Personal rights, therefore, can neither be acquired nor parted with, and hence they are never the subjects of commerce, nor have they any pecuniary value. For the same reasons, courts of justice never have occasion to take cognizance of them except when complaints are made of their infringement; and even then the only question of law that can be raised respecting them is whether or not they have been infringed. It follows, therefore, that all the knowledge that we have of personal rights relates to the one question, what acts will constitute an infringement of them? We can neither number them nor define them, and any attempt to do either will be profitless. There is, however, one personal right which differs so widely from most others that it deserves to be mentioned, namely, the equal right of all persons to use public highways, navigable waters, and the high seas.

"In all the foregoing particulars, rights of property are the very converse of personal rights. All such rights are acquired, and they may all be alienated. They are all, therefore, the subjects of commerce, and they all have, or are supposed to have, a pecuniary value. For the same reasons, courts of justice take cognizance of them for a great variety of purposes, and they are all capable of being enumerated and defined.

"Rights of property are said to be either corporeal or incorporeal. In truth, however, all rights are incorporeal; and what is meant is that the subjects of as appertain and belong to particular men, merely as individuals or single persons: relative, which are incident to them as members of society, and standing in various relations to each other. The first, that is, absolute rights, will be the subject of the present chapter.

§ 166. (1) Absolute rights.—By the absolute rights of individuals we mean those which are so in their primary and strictest sense; such as would belong to their persons merely in a state of nature, and which every man is entitled to enjoy, whether out of society or in it. But with regard to the absolute duties, which man is bound [124] to perform considered as a mere individual, it is not to be expected that any human municipal law should at all explain or enforce them. For the end and intent of such laws being only to regulate the behavior of mankind, as they are members of rights of property (i. e., things owned) are either corporeal or incorporeal. A thing owned is corporeal when it consists of some portion of the material world, and incorporeal when it does not.

“A single material thing may be owned by several persons, and that too without any division of it, either actual or supposed, each person owning an undivided share of it; and in that case each owner has a right of property just as absolute as if he were the sole owner of the thing. In case of land also, the ownership, instead of being divided into shares, may be divided among several persons in respect to the time of their enjoyment, one of them having the right of immediate enjoyment, and the others having respectively successive rights of future enjoyment. This peculiarity in the ownership of land comes from the feudal system. Land itself is also peculiar in this, namely, that a physical division of it among different owners is impossible; and hence the land of A, for example, is separated from the adjoining land only by a mathematical line described upon the surface, A’s ownership extending to the center of the earth, in one direction, and indefinitely in the other direction. By our law, land is also capable of an imaginary division, for the purposes of ownership, laterally as well as vertically; for one person may own the surface of the land, and another may own all the minerals which the land contains. Such a mode of dividing the ownership of land certainly creates many legal difficulties, but it seems to be persisted in notwithstanding, at least in England. (Humphries v. Brogden, 12 Q. B. 739, 755.) In like manner, by our law, a building is capable of an imaginary division, for purposes of ownership, both lateral and vertical. (Ibid. 756, 757.)

“Relative rights are either obligations or duties. Strictly, indeed, ‘obligation’ or ‘duty’ is the name of the thing with which a relative right correlates; society, and stand in various relations to each other, they have consequently no business or concern with any but social or relative duties. Let a man therefore be ever so abandoned in his principles, or vicious in his practice, provided he keeps his wickedness to himself, and does not offend against the rules of public decency, he is out of the reach of human laws. But if he makes his vices public, though they be such as seem principally to affect himself (as drunkenness, or the like), they then become, by the bad example they set, of pernicious effects to society; and therefore it is then the business of human laws to correct them. Here the circumstance of publication is what alters the nature of the case. Public sobriety is a relative duty, and therefore enjoined by our laws; private sobriety is an absolute duty, which, whether it be performed or not, human tribunals can never know; and therefore they can never but such is the poverty of language that we have to use the same word also to express the right itself.

“An obligation is either personal or real, according as the obligor is a person or a thing. An obligation may be imposed upon a person either by his own act, i. e., by contract (obligatio ex contractu), or by act of law (obligatio ex lege, or obligatio quasi ex contractu).

“An obligation may be imposed upon a thing either by the law alone, or by the law acting concurrently with the will of the owner of the thing. In the latter case, the will of the owner must be manifested in such manner as the law requires or sanctions. By our law, it is sometimes sufficient for the owner of a thing to impose an obligation upon himself, the law treating that as sufficient evidence of an intention to impose it upon the thing also—when, for example, the owner of land enters into a covenant respecting it, and the covenant is said to run with the land. The most common way, however, in which an owner of land manifests his will to impose an obligation upon it is by making a grant to the intended obligee of the right against the land which he wishes to confer, i. e., he adopts the same form as when he wishes to transfer the title to the land. If, however, an owner of land, upon transferring the title to it, wishes to impose upon it an obligation in his own favor, he does this by means of a reservation, i. e., by inserting in the instrument of transfer a clause by which he reserves to himself the right which he wishes to retain against the land. An owner of a movable thing imposes an obligation upon it by delivering the possession of it to the intended obligee, declaring the purpose for which he does it, as when a debtor delivers securities to his creditor by way of pledge to secure the payment of the debt.

“A real obligation is undoubtedly a legal fiction, but it is a very useful one. It was invented by the Romans, from whom it has been inherited by the enforce it by any civil sanction. But with respect to rights, the case is different. Human laws define and enforce as well those rights which belong to a man considered as an individual, as those which belong to him considered as related to others.

§ 167. (a) Protection of absolute rights.—For the principal aim of society is to protect individuals in the enjoyment of those absolute rights, which were vested in them by the immutable laws of nature; but which could not be preserved in peace without that mutual assistance and intercourse, which is gained by the institution of friendly and social communities. Hence it follows, that the first and primary end of human laws is to maintain and regulate these absolute rights of individuals. Such rights as are social and relative result from, and are posterior to, the formation of states and nations of modern Europe. That it would ever have been invented by the latter is very unlikely, partly because they have needed it less than did the ancients, and partly because they have not, like the ancients, the habit of personifying inanimate things. The invention was used by the Romans for the accomplishment of several important legal objects, some of which no longer exist, but others still remain in full force. It was by means of this that one person acquired rights in things belonging to others (jura in rebus alienis). Such rights were called servitudes (i. e., states of slavery) in respect to the thing upon which the obligation was imposed, and they included every right which one could have in a thing, short of owning it. These servitudes were divided into real and personal servitudes, being called real when the obligee as well as the obligor, i. e., the master (dominus) as well as the slave (servus), was a thing, and personal when the obligee was a person. The former, which may be termed servitudes proper, have passed into our law under the names of easements and profits a prendre. The latter included the pignus and the hypotheca, i. e., the Roman mortgage—which was called pignus when the thing mortgaged was delivered to the creditor, and hypotheca when it was constituted by a mere agreement, the thing mortgaged remaining in the possession of its owner.” LANGDELL, Brief Survey of Equity Jurisdiction, 219.

And the following is Professor Langdell's explanation of the reasons for using the terms “absolute” and “relative”: “I now proceed to do what, in a previous note, I postponed until now, namely, to explain why I used the terms ‘absolute’ and ‘relative’ to mark the primary division of legal rights, instead of the terms in rem and in personam. 1. If I had used the latter terms, I should have required them both to designate relative rights, and should, therefore, have had nothing left for absolute rights; for rights in personam would clearly have embraced only those rights which are created by personal obligations and duties, and, therefore, I must have used the term in rem to designate those societies; so that to maintain and regulate these is clearly a subsequent consideration. And therefore the principal view of human laws is, or ought always to be, to explain, protect, and enforce such rights as are absolute, which in [125] themselves are few and simple; and, then, such rights as are relative, which arising from a variety of connections, will be far more numerous and more complicated. These will take up a greater space in any code of laws, and hence may appear to be more attended to, though in reality they are not, than the rights of the former kind. Let us therefore proceed to examine how far all laws ought, and how far the laws of England actually do, take notice of these absolute rights, and provide for their lasting security.

§ 168. (b) Natural liberty.—The absolute rights of man, considered as a free agent, endowed with discernment to know good from evil, and with power of choosing those measures which appear to him to be most desirable, are usually summed up in one general appellation, and denominated the natural liberty of mankind. This natural liberty consists properly in a power of acting as one thinks fit, without any restraint or control, unless by the law of nature; being a right inherent in us by birth, and one of the gifts of God to man at his creation, when He endued him with the faculty of created by real obligations. 2. If the phrase 'rights in personam' perfectly describes all those rights which are created by personal obligations or duties, then the phrase 'rights in rem' perfectly describes those rights which are created by real obligations, when considered as obligations; and, if so, it is clearly impossible that it should also correctly describe absolute rights. 3. The phrase 'rights in rem' does not, in fact, describe correctly either class of absolute rights. It might, indeed, be used, without any great impropriety, to describe ownership of corporeal things, but to use it to describe ownership of incorporeal things is certainly taking great liberties with language, and to use it to describe personal rights seems to me to be in the highest degree absurd. 4. The terms in rem and in personam are properly applicable to procedure only, and the use of them was limited to procedure by the Romans. 5. The terms 'absolute' and 'relative,' as used by me, require neither explanation nor justification, while the terms in rem and in personam, if used for the same purpose, would have required both. 6. The terms in rem and in personam, as applied to rights, are wholly foreign, while, in using the terms 'absolute' and 'relative' instead, I follow the example of Blackstone."—LANGDELL, Brief Survey of Equity Jurisdiction, 229 n.

free will. But every man, when he enters into society, gives up a part of his natural liberty, as the price of so valuable a purchase; and, in consideration of receiving the advantages of mutual commerce, obliges himself to conform to those laws, which the community has thought proper to establish. And this species of legal obedience and conformity is infinitely more desirable than that wild and savage liberty which is sacrificed to obtain it.

§ 169. (c) Civil liberty.—For no man, that considers a moment, would wish to retain the absolute and uncontrolled power of doing whatever he pleases: the consequence of which is, that every other man would also have the same power; and then there would be no security to individuals in any of the enjoyments of life. Political, therefore, or civil, liberty, which is that of a member of society, is no other than natural liberty so far restrained by human laws (and no further) as is necessary and expedient for the general advantage of the public.<sup>c</sup> Hence we may collect that the law, which restrains a man from doing mischief [126] to his fellow-citizens, though it diminishes the natural, increases the civil liberty of mankind; but that every wanton and causeless restraint of the will of the subject, whether practiced by a monarch, a nobility, or a popular assembly, is a degree of tyranny: nay, that even laws themselves, whether made with or without our consent, if they regulate and constrain our conduct in matters of mere indifference, without any good end in view, are regulations destructive of liberty: whereas if any public advantage can arise from observing such precepts, the control of our private inclinations, in one or two particular points, will conduce to preserve our general freedom in others of more importance; by supporting that state of society which alone can secure our independence. Thus the statute of King Edward IV,<sup>d</sup> which forbade the fine gentlemen of those times (under the degree of a lord) to wear pikes upon their shoes or boots of more than two inches in length, was a law that savored of oppression; because, however ridiculous the fashion then in use might appear, the restraining it by pecuniary penalties could serve no purpose of common utility. But the statute of King Charles II,* which prescribes a thing seemingly as indifferent; viz., a dress for the dead, who are all ordered to be buried in woolen; is a law consistent with public liberty, for it encourages the staple trade, on which in great measure depends the universal good of the nation. So that laws, when prudently framed, are by no means subversive but rather introductive of liberty; for (as Mr. Locke has well observed<sup>f</sup>) where there is no law there is no freedom. But then, on the other hand, that constitution or frame of government, that system of laws, is alone calculated to maintain civil liberty, which leaves the subject entire master of his own conduct, except in those points wherein the public good requires some direction or restraint.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>c</sup> Facultas ejus, quod cuique facere libet, nisi quid jure prohibetur. (Its essence is the power of doing whatsoever we please, unless where authority or law forbids.) Inst. 1. 3. 1.

<sup>d</sup> 3 Edw. IV. c. 5 (Apparel, 1463).

* 30 Car. II. st. 1. c. 3 (Burying in Woolen, 1678).

<sup>f</sup> On Gov. p. 2. § 57.

---

<sup>5</sup> The nature of legal rights and duties.—The assertion so frequently met, and so much insisted on by Austin, Stephen, and other recent English writers, that all law is the command of the state, and this command is the only criterion of a law, seems to repeat exactly Blackstone's definition; but it has in truth a very different meaning. No modern jurist could rationally believe that the English common law, or statute law, is composed of commands set by the sovereign to all Englishmen for them to obey. And when they claim this definition as a modern discovery, and laud its scientific clearness and superiority over the theories of modern civilians, the claim would be ludicrous if we were not able to ascertain from the history of legal doctrine, just what they meant by it. (See Stephen, Introduction to Criminal Law, p. viii.) When Austin speaks of a command of the state, his meaning is to exclude the laws of morality, of fashion, and all other forms of law which do not come strictly within the scope of jurisprudence, as he understands it. His purpose is to draw a firm and distinct line around the positive law of the state, and to get rid of the confusion which has been produced by mixing up ethics or natural law with it. Having denied to these an enforceable character, he adds nothing to his definition of law when he says that law is prescribed by the state. Professor Holland has expressed his meaning in a single word, and at the same time, corrected both Blackstone and Austin's statements, when he says that law is a rule enforced by the state instead of prescribed by the state. (Jurisprudence, p. 19.) In what sense it may correctly be said that the state is the author of the law it administers must be discussed elsewhere. The object here is only to show that the true meaning of the expression, as now held, is that the law enforced by the state must be law pure and simple, distinct from ethics.

§ 170. (d) Civil liberty in England.—The idea and practice of this political or civil liberty flourish in their highest vigor in these kingdoms, where it falls <sup>[127]</sup> little short of perfection, and can only be lost or destroyed by the folly or demerits of its owner: the legislature, and of course the laws of England, being peculiarly adapted to the preservation of this inestimable blessing even in the meanest subject. Very different from the modern constitutions of other states, on the continent of Europe, and from the genius of the imperial law; which in general are calculated to vest an arbitrary and despotic power, of controlling the actions of the subject, in the prince, or in a few grandees. And this spirit of liberty is so deeply implanted in our constitution, and rooted even in our

It is doubtful whether a clear and simple doctrine of law can ever be stated until we have got rid entirely of the notion that law consists in a command, or proceeds from a superior; it is certain that we cannot discuss the disputed topics which fill recent jurisprudence with reference to law, right, duty, etc., while this ancient error continues to pervade them all as it does. It is not merely the question of the origin of law that is affected by it, though there its effects are seen most clearly. So long as law necessarily implies a superior, we must look for that superior in every organized government, and perplex ourselves with that doctrine of sovereignty which otherwise might be dispensed with. The whole nature of rights and duties, especially in private law, is distorted by the necessity of representing them as the effects of a command, antecedent to the existence of the right or duty. Mr. Austin's account of these terms shows how difficult it is to discriminate between them, when right and duty alike must consist in obedience to a rule, imposed at once and in the same terms upon the party who owns the right and upon the party who owes the duty. There is no escape from this difficulty, except by recognizing the independent origin of these conceptions, or at least the existence in them of certain elements by which right and duty are mutually differentiated, independent of any law or rule.

Every municipal law when first prescribed acts upon men already in existence, and having interests and passions by which their conduct is largely influenced. Whoever lives, lives not only for himself, but affects others by almost every action of his life, and in turn is affected by them. Each man has to deal with imperfect beings who often disobey the laws of God, and his own duty of obedience is affected in its practical consequences by that disobedience of others. If the wrong of one person does not exempt others from doing right themselves, still it often affects the question what is right under the circumstances, and especially their right to insist upon his obedience to moral law, or his duty to them. It has been remarked by philosophers that a single act of disobedience to the law may so complicate the moral problem in relation very soil, that a slave or a negro, the moment he lands in England, falls under the protection of the laws, and so far becomes a free-man; * though the master's right to his service may possibly still continue.*

§ 171. (e) Vicissitudes of English liberties.—The absolute rights of every Englishman (which taken in a political and extensive sense, are usually called their liberties), as they are founded on nature and reason, so they are coeval with our form of government; though subject at times to fluctuate and change: their establishment (excellent as it is) being still human. At some times we have seen them depressed by overbearing and tyrannical princes; at others so luxuriant as even to tend to anarchy, a worse state than tyranny itself, as any government is better than none at all.

* The first edition reads, "and with regard to all natural rights becomes forthwith a freeman." The second reads as now, except that probably stands in that and in the third, while all later read possibly.

‡ Salk. 666. See c. 14.

---

to all acts consequent upon it, whether by the same person or by others, as to make it almost impossible of solution, even as a question of pure ethics. And if such questions cannot be solved in pure ethics, still less would it be possible to give them a practical solution by the cruder methods of practical law. Thus the only hope of a consistent and logical legal system must always be found in excluding carefully the confusion between law and ethics, and treating them as two distinct systems. This the law does by means of legal rights and duties, to be exercised by every free man in his own discretion, and in a strict moral responsibility to his own conscience. These rights and duties are only two distinct aspects of the same phenomena; that being a right to one person which he finds it for his interest to claim against another; a duty to that other which he is bound to exercise when claimed by the former. It is not easy to state any better criterion than this; the same act or series of acts may be a right in one aspect, and a duty in the other—a right against the state or a fellow-citizen, or a duty towards the state or another fellow-citizen. Whenever a person may exercise it or not, upon his own moral responsibility and even against the objection of others, it is clearly a right. Whenever the law will require him to exercise it at the request of the state, or of another citizen, without reference to his own discretion in the matter, it is as clearly a legal duty. Now, whether there are permissive laws in ethics or not, there must be many such in the municipal law. A large proportion of all the actions committed by a citizen from his birth to his death, even including many which seriously affect his neighbor for good or ill, are of

But the vigor of our free constitution has always delivered the nation from these embarrassments: and, as soon as the convulsions consequent on the struggle have been over, the balance of our rights and liberties has settled to its proper level; and their fundamental articles have been from time to time asserted in parliament, as often as they were thought to be in danger.

§ 172. (i) Charters of liberty.—First, by the great charter of liberties, which was obtained, sword in hand, from King John, and afterwards, with some alterations confirmed in parliament by King Henry the Third, his son. Which charter contained very few new grants; but as Sir Edward Coke<sup>a</sup> observes, was for the most part declaratory of the principal grounds of the fundamental [128] laws of England. Afterwards by the statute called confirmatio cartarum (a confirmation of the charters),<sup>1</sup> whereby the great a kind that the law will not interfere with. Upon these neither rights nor duties can be based, except so far as to consider them parts of his personal freedom, and thus impose on everyone else a duty not to interfere with them. A very large part of the law comes under this category. The law does not require such acts to be done. It leaves all ordinary motives of human existence to act unrestrained. There is no legal duty which requires a man to labor if he chooses to be idle, to earn money if he chooses to work for nothing, to accumulate property, to marry and have children, or even to live. The last may perhaps be disputed, since suicide is regarded as a crime in most systems of municipal law; but it is the act of suicide, not the mere termination of life, which is so treated, because it is a positive breach of public order; and at all events it is clear that no citizen has a right in another's life, of which suicide will be a legal violation.

<sup>a</sup> 2 Inst. Præm.

<sup>1</sup> 25 Edw. I. (1297).

As already said, the theory supposes every action to be commanded or forbidden, irrespective of the benefit or harm to the individual subject of the action thus regulated; and of course it follows that every such action must be right or wrong. There is no moral liberty here, no act of which it may be said that the individual can do it or not in his own discretion; neither is there any basis for moral character. The individual, guided at every step by an infallible rule, finds virtue to consist only in blind obedience to that rule. We see at once that this is not a representation of the actual rule, or of human nature. It entirely ignores that freedom of choice, of which every human being is conscious, and offers no opportunity for the virtues of consistency, temperance, resistance of temptation, or even of generosity and self-abnegation; to find a field for the growth of these virtues we must seek a foundation charter is directed to be allowed as the common law; all judgments contrary to it are declared void; copies of it are ordered to be sent to all cathedral churches, and read twice a year to the people; and sentence of excommunication is directed to be as constantly denounced against all those that by word, deed, or counsel, act contrary thereto, or in any degree infringe it. Next by a multitude of subsequent corroborating statutes (Sir Edward Coke, I think, reckons thirty-two<sup>k</sup>), from the first Edward to Henry the Fourth. Then, after a long interval, by the petition of right; which was a parliamentary declaration of the liberties of the people, assented to by King Charles the First in the beginning of his reign. Which for the conception of human rights. The very existence of such a right implies, as I have said already, the power of the individual to exercise it in his own discretion. In many cases he can do this without the interference of ethical law, as when a man determines the amount of money which he shall give in charity, and the selection of the person to whom it shall be given. In other cases it is subject to ethical law, as when a man decides whether he ought to enforce a contract to the very letter of the bond, even though it exact "a pound of flesh nearest the heart," or whether he shall give up a part of his claims or remit them altogether. His conduct in enforcing or in using his legal rights is in such cases a matter of conscience, for which he is responsible only to the monitor within or to his Creator. But the fact that a harsh exercise of the right may be ethically wrong has no bearing whatever upon its existence as a legal right. The landlord may require his rent, or may turn a tenant who cannot pay into the street; the creditor may enforce the last penny of payment by his debtor, equally when these acts are done in the interests of strictest justice, and when the only motive is selfish greed. The law cannot discriminate and refuse the enforcement of a right because it is enforced from wrong motives or for evil purposes, without denying it the character of a legal right. Hence the necessity of discriminating at the outset between ethics and law. If Blackstone were right in saying that ethics or natural law is a part of the municipal law, and that no human laws are of any validity if contrary to this (p. *41), it would follow that no court could properly enforce a legal right demanded unless it were satisfied of the good motives and honest purposes of the persons who made it. Every legal right would then be liable to be thwarted by higher ethical requirements; and the bad man would have no legal rights against the good man. It is needless to remark how impossible it would be to carry a system of this kind into practice, with human instruments and judges. We have had experience enough, in history, of attempts to do this, made with the best intentions but producing intolerable tyranny, to spare more than this passing allusion. Neither is it necessary here to draw was closely followed by the still more ample concessions made by that unhappy prince to his parliament, before the fatal rupture between them; and by the many salutary laws, particularly the habeas corpus act, passed under Charles the Second. To these succeeded the Bill of Rights, or declaration delivered by the lords and commons to the Prince and Princess of Orange, 13 February, 1688; and afterwards enacted in parliament, when they became king and queen: which declaration concludes in these remarkable words: "and they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties. And the act of parliament itself<sup>1</sup> recognizes all and singular the rights and liberties asserted and claimed in the said declaration to be the true, an exact line between ethics and law, so as to show how far moral considerations may and should influence the decisions of the judge. That is a subject of great complexity which must be discussed by itself.

<sup>k</sup> 2 Inst. Præm.

---

<sup>1</sup> 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2 (Bill of Rights, 1689).

---

The present position of the man before the law may be stated thus: so far as its rules are expressly stated to him, and so far as they command or forbid him, he obeys them because he knows that a penalty will follow disobedience; he does not feel that these commands or prohibitions express the will of a divine power, even when they coincide exactly with such will. The divine command to do no murder, and the public law declaring that whoever shall commit murder shall be hung, are precisely of the same character and on the same subject, but they are not one and the same law. The one forbids a sin, the other a crime. Having broken the former his guilt is inexpiable; it cannot be avoided or its consequences prevented by any means except repentance and the forgiveness of the lawgiver. But in other cases the sanction of the state, that is to say, the taking of his life upon the gallows, does not by any means follow inevitably. It has certain appointed conditions, without performing which no court or officer of justice has the right to inflict it. The wrongdoer may lawfully insist that every one of these conditions shall be scrupulously performed before he can be taken to the gallows. His conscience does not require him to submit to the human penalty as it does to the divine.

But by far the largest part of all human laws do not command or forbid, they simply fix the consequences which will follow a given course of action. This they may do expressly, as when the law says that a will made with certain formalities shall be valid, and all others void; or more frequently they may do it by stating the action in the form of a right, or breach of a right, and leaving the consequences to be inferred from other rules of law; for example, water is not property, in the strictest sense of the word, and no man could be convicted of theft for taking a bucket of water from his neighbor's pond. Until recently it made no difference that the water was frozen in the form ancient, and indubitable rights of the people of this kingdom." Lastly, these liberties were again asserted at the commencement of the present century in the act of settlement (1700),<sup>m</sup> whereby the crown was limited to his present majesty's illustrious house; and some new provisions were added, at the same fortunate era, for better securing our religion, laws and liberties; which the statute declares to be "the birthright of the people of England," according to the ancient doctrine of the common law.<sup>n</sup>

§ 173. (f) Classification of personal rights.—<sup>[129]</sup> Thus much for the declaration of our rights and liberties. The rights themselves, thus defined by these several statutes, consist in a number of private immunities; which will appear, from what has been <sup>m</sup> 12 & 13 W. III. c. 2 (Act of Settlement, 1700).

<sup>n</sup> Plowd. 55.

---

of ice; the mere conversion by natural processes into solid form did not change the legal character of the thing. But within a few years the great increase in the use of ice for various purposes, and the large amount of capital and labor employed in collection and storing it, has changed the popular conception of its nature, and rendered needful greater safeguards for it. A court declares that ice cut and stored is property, and the decision is accepted by other courts as an authoritative precedent. The result is not merely that in a precisely similar case the term "property" may be applied to ice; it is that all the manifold consequences which follow from the conception of property shall hereafter be applied to a subject to which they did not formerly belong. A state may tax ice, or in a case of necessity may take it for its own use, but only upon the same conditions with other property, that is, by compensating the owner for it. A private individual may not take it from him without incurring punishment for trespass or theft according to the circumstances of the case. He will also be liable to that owner for the value of the ice he has wrongfully taken. He may indeed buy it, and will be held to pay the price which he has promised for it. In other words, it will be a sufficient consideration for an assumpsit. It is needless to point out the many other rules of law which will follow from the rule making ice property. Now, what is the effect of this rule upon persons subject to the law? Does it command or forbid anything? And can we say that the subject will feel himself bound to do or not to do what he desires by this law? Possibly such an effect may be attributed to it so far as it forbids theft or even trespass. But the subject who is deterred from taking it by this can hardly be said to feel a moral obligation. He is much more likely to weigh the chances of being detected and punished, as he would other events that would make a proposed premised, to be indeed no other than either that residuum (remainder) of natural liberty, which is not required by the laws of society to be sacrificed to public convenience: or else those civil privileges, which society hath engaged to provide, in lieu of the natural liberties so given up by individuals. These, therefore, were formerly, either by inheritance or purchase, the rights of all mankind; but, in most other countries of the world being now more or less debased and destroyed, they at present may be said to remain, in a peculiar and emphatical manner, the rights of the people of England. And these may be reduced to three principal or primary articles; the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty, and the right of private property;<sup>6</sup> because as there is no other known method of compulsion, or of abridging man's natural free will, but by an infringement or diminution of one or transaction profitable or unprofitable; it is the divine law forbidding theft as a sin which binds the conscience in human law. The human law merely points out the results which will follow from any act the party may do in respect to it, leaving him at liberty to do them or not in his own discretion. These results may be very various, some favorable, others unfavorable. They will determine his conduct only as other foreseen consequences of that conduct do determine it. A command or prohibition acts directly upon his will; the human law acts only upon his judgment and reason; or in other words, the command is a direct cause of the action taken under it; the law only supplies a motive by which his conduct may be influenced, provided other and stronger motives do not conflict with it.—HAMMOND.

<sup>6</sup> Liberty of conscience.—To the absolute rights enumerated by Blackstone should be added that of liberty of conscience, secured in all American states by constitutional provisions, although inconsistent with the existence of a church established by law, or claiming its divine right to control the actions of men. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or the freedom of speech. (U. S. Const., First Amendt.; 2 Kent, Comm., 34–37; Story on Constitution, sec. 1879; Cooley's Const. Lim., c. 13, p. 467, etc.; Sedgwick's Const. and Stat. Construction, pp. 512–516.) Similar provisions in most state constitutions are collected by Cooley in note, page 468. New Hampshire seems to be the only state that still allows towns to tax for the support of public Protestant teachers of religion, but even there they cannot tax those of other sects for their support. (Const. of N. H., pt. 1, art. 6.)

Neither this addition, however, nor that of freedom of speech, usually treated in immediate connection with it in American books (Kent and Cooley, supra), make any essential change in Blackstone's enumeration of the absolute rights. Both are subdivisions of the absolute right of liberty, if not under Blackstone's other of these important rights, the preservation of these, inviolate, may justly be said to include the preservation of our civil immunities in their largest and most extensive sense.

§ 174. (1) Personal security.—The right of personal security consists in a person's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health, and his reputation.

§ 175. (aa) Life.—Life is the immediate gift of God, a right inherent by nature in every individual; and it begins in contemplation of law as soon as an infant is able to stir in the mother's womb. For if a woman is quick with child, and by a potion or otherwise killeth it in her womb; or if anyone beat her, whereby the child dieth in her body, and she is delivered of a dead child; this, though not murder, was by the ancient law homicide or man-definition of that word, yet in its true sense as denoting the civil liberty of free and civilized men. (See note 14, post, p. *134.)—HAMMOND.

The remainder of Professor Hammond's note, justifying Blackstone's classification of rights into absolute and relative rights, is omitted. (1 Hammond's Black. 348.)

Right of privacy.—The right of privacy is one of those rights referred to by some law-writers as "absolute"—"such as would belong to their persons merely in a state of nature, and which every man is entitled to enjoy, whether out of society or in it." 1 Bl. Comm. 123. Among the absolute rights referred to by the commentator just cited is the right of personal security and the right of personal liberty. In the first is embraced a person's right to a "legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health, and his reputation"; and in the second is embraced "the power of locomotion, of changing situation, or moving one's person to whatsoever place one's own inclination may direct, without imprisonment or restraint, unless by due course of law." 1 Bl. Comm. 129, 134.

While neither Sir William Blackstone nor any of the other writers on the principles of the common law have referred in terms to the right of privacy, the illustrations given by them as to what would be a violation of the absolute rights of individuals are not to be taken as exhaustive, but the language should be allowed to include any instance of a violation of such rights which is clearly within the true meaning and intent of the words used to declare the principle. When the law guarantees to one the right to the enjoyment of his life, it gives to him something more than the mere right to breathe and exist. While, of course, the most flagrant violation of this right would be deprivation of life, yet life itself may be spared, and the enjoyment of life entirely destroyed. An individual has a right to enjoy life in any way that may be most agreeable slaughter.* But *Sir Edward Coke doth not look [130] upon this offense* in quite so atrocious a light, but merely as a heinous misdemeanor.<sup>p</sup>

An infant in ventre sa mere, or in the mother's womb, is supposed in law to be born for many purposes.<sup>7</sup> It is capable of having a legacy, or a surrender of a copyhold estate made to it. It may have a guardian assigned to it;<sup>q</sup> and it is enabled to have an estate limited to its use, and to take afterwards by such limitation,

* First edition reads, "at present it is not looked upon." The second to eighth inclusive read as in the text. The ninth substitutes for the name of Coke, "the modern law."

o Si aliquis mulierem pregnantem percusserit, vel ei venenum dederit, per quod fecerit abortivam; si puerperium jam formatum fuerit, et maxime si fuerit animatum facit homicidium. (If anyone strike a woman when pregnant, or administer poison to her, by which abortion shall ensue, if the child should be already formed, and especially if it be alive, that person is guilty of manslaughter.) Bracton. l. 3. c. 21.

p 3 Inst. 50.

q Stat. 12 Car. II. c. 24 (Military Tenures, 1660).

---

and pleasant to him, according to his temperament and nature, provided that in such enjoyment he does not invade the rights of his neighbor, or violate public law or policy. (Pavesich v. New England Life Ins. Co., 122 Ga. 190, 106 Am. St. Rep. 104, 2 Ann. Cas. 561, 69 L. R. A. 101, 50 S. E. 68, 70.)

7 Child in ventre sa mere.—"The mother of the deceased slipped upon a defect in a highway of the defendant town, fell, and has had a verdict for her damages. At the time, she was between four and five months advanced in pregnancy, the fall brought on a miscarriage, and the child, although not directly injured, unless by a communication of the shock to the mother, was too little advanced in fetal life to survive its premature birth. There was testimony, however, based upon observing motion in its limbs, that it did live for ten or fifteen minutes. Administration was taken out, and the administrator brought this action upon the Pub. Stats., c. 52, sec. 17, for the further benefit of the mother in part or in whole, as next of kin. The court below ruled that the action could not be maintained; and we are of opinion that the ruling was correct.

"The plaintiff founds his argument mainly on a statement by Lord Coke, which seems to have been accepted as law in England, to the effect that if a woman is quick with child, and takes a potion, or if a man beats her, and the child is born alive and dies of the potion or battery, this is murder. (3 Inst. 50; 1 Hawk. P. C., c. 31, sec. 16; 1 Bl. Comm. 129, 130; 4 Bl. Comm. 198; Beale v. Beale, 1 P. Wms. 244, 246; Burdet v. Hopegood, 1 P. Wms. 486; Rex v. Senior, 1 Moody C. C. 346; Regina v. West, 2 Car. & K. 784; S. C., 2 Cox as if it were then actually born.* And in this point the civil law agrees with ours.*

§ 176. (bb) Limbs.—A man's limbs (by which for the present we only understand those members which may be useful to him in fight, and the loss of which alone amounts to mayhem by the common law) are also the gift of the wise Creator; to enable man to protect himself from external injuries in a state of nature. To these, therefore, he has a natural inherent right; and they cannot be wantonly destroyed or disabled without a manifest breach of civil liberty.

* Stat. 10 & 11 W. III. c. 16 (1698).

* Qui in utero sunt, in jure civili intelliguntur in rerum natura esse, cum de eorum commodo agatur. (Those who are in the womb, are considered by the civil law to exist in the nature of things, as they are capable of being benefited.) Ff. 1. 5. 26.

---

C. C. 500.) We shall not consider how far Lord Coke's authority should be followed in this commonwealth, if the matter were left to the common law, beyond observing that it was opposed to the case in 3 Ass., pl. 2; S. C., Y. B. 1 Edw. III, 23, pl. 18; which seems not to have been doubted by Fitzherbert or Brooke, and which was afterwards cited as law by Lord Hale. (Fitz. Abr., Enditement, pl. 4; Corone, pl. 146; Bro. Abr. Corone, pl. 68; 1 Hale P. C. 433.)

"For, even if Lord Coke's statement were the law of this commonwealth, the question would remain whether the analogy could be relied on for determining the rule of civil liability. Some ancient books seem to have allowed the mother an appeal for the loss of her child by a trespass upon her person. (Abbrev. Plac. 26, col. 2 (2 Joh.) Lincoln, rot. 3; Fleta, I, c. 35, sec. 3, and Sir Samuel Clarke's note, citing 45 H. III, rot. 22.) Which again others denied. (1 Britton (Nichols' ed.), 114. See Abbrev. Plac. 295, col. 2 (29 Edw. I), Norht. rot. 43; Kelham's Britton, 152, n. 14.) But no case, so far as we know, has ever decided that, if the infant survived, it could maintain an action for injuries received by it while in its mother's womb. Yet that is the test of the principle relied on by the plaintiff, who can hardly avoid contending that a pretty large field of litigation has been left unexplored until the present moment.

"If it should be argued that an action could be maintained in the case supposed, and that, on general principles, an injury transmitted from the actor to a person through his own organic substance, or through his mother, before he became a person, stands on the same footing as an injury transmitted to an existing person through other intervening substances outside him, the argument in this general form is not helped, but hindered, by the analogy drawn from Lord Coke's statement of the criminal law. For, apart from the question § 177. (cc) Self-defense.—Both the life and limbs of a man are of such high value, in the estimation of the law of England, that it pardons even homicide if committed se defendendo (in self-defense), or in order to preserve them. For whatever is done by a man, to save either life or member, is looked upon as done upon the highest necessity and compulsion. Therefore, if a man through fear of death or mayhem is prevailed upon to execute a deed, or do any other legal act; these, though accompanied with all other the requisite solemnities, may be afterwards avoided, if forced upon him by a well-grounded apprehension of losing his life, or even his limbs, in case of his noncompliance.† And the same is also a sufficient excuse for the commission of many misdemeanors, as will appear in the fourth book.

† 2 Inst. 483.

---

of remoteness, the argument would not be affected by the degree of maturity reached by the embryo at the moment of the organic lesion or wrongful act. Whereas Lord Coke's rule requires that the woman be quick with child, which, as this court has decided, means more than pregnant, and requires that the child shall have reached some degree of quasi independent life at the moment of the act. (Commonwealth v. Parker, 9 Met. 263, 43 Am. Dec. 396; State v. Cooper, 22 N. J. L. 52, 51 Am. Dec. 248.)

“For the same reason, this limitation of criminal liability is equally inconsistent with any argument drawn from the rule as to devises and vouching to warranty, which is laid down without any such limitation, and which may depend on different considerations. (Co. Litt. 390a, and cases cited; Reeve v. Long, 1 Salk. 227; Scatterwood v. Edge, 1 Salk. 229; Harper v. Archer, 4 Sm. & M. 99, 43 Am. Dec. 472.)

“If these general difficulties could be got over, and if we should assume, irrespective of precedent, that a man might owe a civil duty and incur a conditional prospective liability in tort to one not yet in being, and if we should assume also that causing an infant to be born prematurely stands on the same footing as wounding or poisoning, we should then be confronted by the question raised by the defendant, whether an infant dying before it was able to live separated from its mother could be said to have become a person recognized by the law as capable of having a locus standi in court, or of being represented there by an administrator. (Marsellis v. Thalheimer, 2 Paige (N. Y.), 35, 21 Am. Dec. 66; Harper v. Archer, ubi supra; 4 Kent, Comm., 249 n. (b).) And this question would not be disposed of by citing those cases where equity has recognized the infant provisionally while still alive en ventre. (Lutterel's Case, stated in Hale v. Hale, Prec. Ch. 50; Wallis v. Hodson, 2 Atk. 114, 117. See Musgrave v. Parry, 2 Vern. 710.) And perhaps not by showing that such

§ 178. (dd) Duress.—The constraint a man is under in these circumstances is called in law duress, from the Latin durities, of which there are two <sup>[131]</sup> sorts; duress of imprisonment, where a man actually loses his liberty, of which we shall presently speak; and duress per minas (by threats), where the hardship is only threatened and impending, which is that we are now discoursing of.<sup>8</sup> Duress per minas is either for fear of loss of life, or else for fear of mayhem, or loss of limb. And this fear must be upon sufficient reason;* “non,” as Bracton expresses it, “suspicio cujuslibet vani et meticulosi hominis, sed talis qui possit cadere in virum constantem; talis enim debet esse metus, qui in se contineat vitæ periculum, aut corporis cruciatum (it must not be the apprehension of a foolish and fearful man, but such as a courageous man may be susceptible of; it should be, for instance, such a fear as consists in an apprehension of bodily pain, or danger to life).”<sup>u</sup> A fear * Cited, 10 N. H. 497; 1 Heisk. 103; 46 Miss. 567. These cases criticise B.’s limitation of duress per minas to threats of life or limbs, and hold threat of imprisonment included. See Robinson v. Gould, 1 Cush. 67.

<sup>u</sup> 1. 2. c. 5.

---

an infant was within the protection of the criminal law. (Compare 2 Savigny, System des Heutigen Römischen Rechts, Beylage III.)

“The Pub. Stats., c. 207, sec. 9 (Stats. 1845, c. 27, seemingly suggested by Commonwealth v. Parker, ubi supra), punish unlawful attempts to procure miscarriage, acts which, of course, have the death of the child for their immediate object; and, while they greatly increase the severity of the punishment if the woman dies in consequence of the attempt, they make no corresponding distinction if the child dies, even after leaving the womb. This statute seems to us to shake the foundation of the argument drawn from the criminal law, and no other occurs to us which has not been dealt with.

“Taking all the foregoing considerations into account, and further, that, as the unborn child was a part of the mother at the time of the injury, any damage to it which was not too remote to be recovered for at all was recoverable by her, we think it clear that the statute sued upon does not embrace the plaintiff’s intestate within its meaning.”—HOLMES, J., in Dietrich v. Northampton, 138 Mass. 14, 52 Am. Rep. 242.

<sup>8</sup> Defense of duress.—The general rule, that the misconduct of the obligee in procuring or enforcing a specialty obligation was no bar at common law to an action upon the instrument, was subject to one exception. As far back as Bracton’s time, at least, one who had duly signed and sealed an obligation, and who could not therefore plead non est factum, might still defeat an action by pleading affirmatively that he was induced to execute the specialty by duress of battery, or being beaten, though never so well grounded, is no duress; neither is the fear of having one's house burned, or one's goods taken away and destroyed;<sup>9</sup> because in these cases, should the threat be performed, a man may have satisfaction by recovering equivalent damages;<sup>w</sup> but no suitable atonement can be made for the loss of life, or limb. And the indulgence shown to a man under this, the principal, sort of duress, the fear of losing his life or limbs, agrees also with that maxim of the civil law: ignoscitur ei qui sanguinem suum qualiter qualiter redemptum voluit (he is justified who has acted in pure defense of his own life or limb).<sup>x</sup>

The law not only regards life and member, and protects every man in the enjoyment of them, but also furnishes him with everything necessary for their support. For there is no man so indigent or wretched, but he may demand a supply sufficient for all the necessities of life from the more opulent part of the community, practiced upon him by the plaintiff. The Roman law was more consistent than the English law in this respect. For, by the jus civile, duress, like fraud, was no answer to a claim upon a formal contract. All defenses based upon the conduct of the obligee were later innovations of the prætor, and were known as exceptiones prætorix, or as we should say, equitable defenses.

<sup>w</sup> 2 Inst. 483.

<sup>x</sup> Ff. 48. 21. 1.

---

It is quite possible that the anomalous allowance of the defense of duress at common law may be due to some forgotten statute. But whatever its origin, the defense of duress does not differ in its nature from the defense of fraud. As Mr. Justice Holmes well says: "The ground upon which a contract is voidable for duress is the same as in the case for fraud; and is that, whether it springs from a fear or from a belief, the party has been subjected to an improper motive for action." Duress was, therefore, never regarded as negating the legal execution of the obligation. "The deed took effect, and the duty accrued to the party, although it were by duress and afterwards voidable by plea." The defense is strictly personal, and not real; that is, it is effective, like all equitable defenses, only against the wrongdoer, or one in privity with him. Duress by a stranger cannot, therefore, be successfully pleaded in bar of an action by an innocent obligee; and duress by the payee upon the maker of a negotiable note will not affect the rights of a subsequent bona fide holder for value.—AMES, Lect. on Leg. Hist. 113.

<sup>9</sup> Duress of goods.—This is still true as to duress for the commission of misdemeanors. But the same term is now commonly used, at least in this country, in the form of duress of goods or of property, to avoid the execution of deeds or contracts, or to recover back property or money unjustly obtained. Where a public officer refuses to deliver goods in his custody, or do an official by means of the several statutes enacted for the relief of the poor, of which in their proper places. A humane provision; yet, though dictated by the principles of society, discountenanced by the Roman laws. For the edicts of the Emperor Constantine commanding the public to maintain the children of those who were unable to provide for them, in order to prevent the murder and exposure of infants, an institution founded on the same principle as our founding hospitals, though comprised in the Theodosian code,<sup>7</sup> were rejected in Justinian's collection.

§ 179. (ee) Civil death.—<sup>[132]</sup> These rights, of life and member, can only be determined by the death of the person; which is either a civil or natural death.<sup>10</sup> The civil death commences, if v l. 11. t. 27.

---

act without exacting illegal fees or other charges, and thus secures their payment, such payment will not be regarded as voluntary, but as extorted by duress, and the party may recover the sum back. It has been held that a protest at the time of payment is not absolutely necessary, though it is better to make one. (Meek v. McClure, 49 Cal. 624. And see cases collected in note, 54 Am. Dec. 162.)

The American doctrine that duress of goods will avoid a contract was first stated in Sasportas v. Jennings, 1 Bay, 470, and Collins v. Westbury, 2 Bay, 211, 1 Am. Dec. 643; following Astley v. Reynolds, 2 Strange, 915. Later cases are Miller v. Miller, 68 Pa. St. 486; Spaids v. Barrett, 57 Ill. 289, 11 Am. Rep. 10; McKee v. Campbell, 27 Mich. 497. Mr. Broom thinks that the American cases go further than the English ones. (See Broom's Comm., pp. 614, 615, and cases cited.) For the American rule see 2 Kent, Comm., p. 453, and notes c. and 2. Also Sharswood's note 12 to this passage. In Collins v. Westbury (1799), 2 Bay, 211, 1 Am. Dec. 643, it was held that "duress of goods will avoid a contract, where an unjust and unreasonable advantage is taken of a man's necessities, by getting his goods into his possession, and there is no other speedy means left of getting them back again but by giving a note or bond, or where a man's necessities may be so great as not to admit of the ordinary process of law." (Citing Sasportas v. Jennings, 1 Bay, 470, and Ashley v. Reynolds, 2 Strange, 916.) In Elliott v. Swartwout (1836), 10 Pet. 137, 156, 9 L. Ed. 373, it was settled that a payment, made as the only means of getting possession of the party's goods, illegally detained, e. g., a payment of illegal duties or charges to a collector, is not a voluntary payment, and an action will lie to recover it back.—HAMMOND.

<sup>10</sup> Civil death.—Civil death is unknown in this country. Neither a religious profession of any kind nor conviction of crime can take away the rights, any man be banished the realm<sup>a</sup> by the process of the common law, or enters into religion; that is, goes into a monastery, and becomes there a monk professed: in which cases he is absolutely dead in law, and his next heir shall have his estate. For, such banished man is entirely cut off from society; and such a monk, upon his profession, renounces solemnly all secular concerns: and besides, as the popish clergy claimed an exemption from the duties of civil life and the commands of the temporal magistrate, the genius of the English laws would not suffer those persons to enjoy the benefits of society, who secluded themselves from it, and refused to submit to its regulations.<sup>a</sup> A monk was therefore accounted civilitur mortuus (dead in law), and when he entered into religion might, like other dying men, make his testament and executors; or, if he made none, the ordinary might grant administration to his next of kin,

<sup>a</sup> Co. Litt. 133.

<sup>a</sup> This was also a rule in the feudal law, l. 2. t. 21, desiit esse miles seculi, qui factus est miles Christi; nec beneficium pertinet ad eum qui non debet gerere officium. (He who becomes a soldier of Christ hath ceased to be a soldier of the world, nor is he entitled to any reward who acknowledges no duty.)

---

which are inalienably vested in every human being so long as his natural life continues. Even complete idiocy, though preventing the exercise of many rights, does not prevent their existence. The idiot has the same right of security of person and of liberty, except so far as this may be restrained in his own interest or that of the community by lawful means, and of property. He may inherit land, or take as next of kin under the statute of distributions, and although a guardian or committee may be necessary for the care of his property, the title to it will be vested in himself. The nearest approach to a civil death known to our law is the condition of a criminal sentenced to imprisonment for life, and actually in confinement. In most of the states, it is provided by statute that his estate may be administered on as if he were dead (e. g., Mo. Rev. Stats. sec. 6543), and his wife may marry again. But even in this case these consequences would hardly be considered to result at common law.—HAMMOND.

Civil death may still take effect in England on outlawry, which, in criminal proceedings, is still a possible, though rare event; but outlawry on civil process has also now been abolished by the Civil Procedure Acts Repeal Act, 1879.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 87.

In the United States, life imprisonment is said, in some jurisdictions, not to carry with it civil death. Willingham v. King, 23 Fla. 478, 2 South. 851; Presbury v. Hull, 34 Mo. 29; Frazer v. Fulcher, 17 Ohio, 260; Davis v. Laning, 85 Tex. 39, 84 Am. St. Rep. 784, 18 L. R. A. 82, 19 S. W. 846; while in other as if he were actually dead intestate. And such executors and administrators had the same power, and might bring the same actions for debts due to the religious, and were liable to the same actions for those due from him, as if he were naturally deceased.<sup>b</sup> Nay, so far has this principle been carried, that when one was bound in a bond to an abbot and his successors, and afterwards made his executors and professed himself a monk of the same abbey, and in process of time was himself made abbot thereof; here the law gave him, in the capacity of abbot, an action of debt against his own executors to recover the money due.<sup>c</sup> In short, a monk or religious was so effectually dead in law, that a lease made even to a third person, during the life (generally) of one who afterwards became a monk, determined by such his entry into religion: for which reason leases, and other conveyances for life, are usually made to have and to hold for the term of one's natural life.<sup>d</sup> *But, (133) even in the times of popery, the law of England took no cognizance of profession in any foreign country, because the fact could not be tried in our courts; * and therefore, since the Reformation, the disability is held to be abolished.<sup>e</sup> *

§ 180. (ff) Forfeiture of life.—This natural life being, as was before observed, the immediate donation of the great Creator, cannot legally be disposed of or destroyed by any individual, neither by the person himself nor by any other of his fellow-creatures, * Added in second edition. The ninth reads also, "This disability is held to be abolished, as is also the disability of banishment consequent upon abjuration, by Stat. 21 Jac. I. c. 28 (Continuation of Statutes, 1623)."

<sup>b</sup> Litt. § 200.

<sup>c</sup> Co. Litt. 133.

<sup>d</sup> 2 Rep. 48. Co. Litt. 132.

<sup>e</sup> Co. Litt. 132.

<sup>f</sup> 1 Salk. 162.

---

jurisdictions one sentenced for life is held to be civilly dead. In re Nerac, 35 Cal. 392, 95 Am. Dec. 111; Estate of Donnelly, 125 Cal. 417, 73 Am. St. Rep. 62, 58 Pac. 61; Coffee v. Haynes, 124 Cal. 561, 71 Am. St. Rep. 99, 57 Pac. 482; Jackson v. Catlin, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 248, 3 Am. Dec. 415; Town of Baltimore v. Town of Chester, 53 Vt. 315, 38 Am. Rep. 677. The California Penal Code, section 674, provides: "A person sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for life is thereafter deemed civilly dead."

merely upon their own authority. Yet nevertheless it may, by the Divine permission, be frequently forfeited for the breach of those laws of society, which are enforced by the sanction of capital punishments; of the nature, restrictions, expedience, and legality of which we may hereafter more conveniently inquire in the concluding book of these Commentaries. At present, I shall only observe, that whenever the constitution of a state vests in any man, or body of men, a power of destroying at pleasure, without the direction of laws, the lives or members of the subjects such constitution is in the highest degree tyrannical: and that whenever any laws direct such destruction for light and trivial causes, such laws are likewise tyrannical, though in an inferior degree; because here the subject is aware of the danger he is exposed to, and may by prudent caution provide against it.

§ 181. (gg) Due process of law.—The statute law of England does, therefore, very seldom, and the common law does never inflict any punishment extending to life or limb, unless upon the highest necessity:<sup>11</sup> and the constitution is an utter stranger to any arbitrary power of killing or maiming the subject without the express warrant of law. “Nullus liber homo,” says the great charter,<sup>a</sup> “aliquo modo destruat, nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum aut per legem terræ (no freeman shall be deprived of life but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land).” Which words, “aliquo modo destruat,” according to Sir Edward Coke,<sup>b</sup> include a prohibition not only of killing, and maiming, but also of torturing<sup>12</sup> (to which our laws are strangers), and of every oppression by color of an illegal authority. And it is enacted by

<sup>a</sup> C. 29.

<sup>b</sup> 2 Inst. 48.

<sup>11</sup> Judge Cooley (1 Cooley’s Blackstone (4th ed.), 133 n.) says: “The student who reads this a century after the time when it was written, is not likely to agree with the author respecting the humanity of the law of England, for the criminal code then in force has been wholly remodeled since that time on the express ground that its penalties were so extremely barbarous and cruel as to fail of their intended effect as restraints upon crime.”

<sup>12</sup> Edward Jenks, Esq. (1 Stephen’s Comm. (16th ed.), 88 n.) says: “As a matter of fact Coke does not, in this passage, speak of torture; but Blackstone’s gloss is permissible.”

the statute 5 Edw. III, c. 9 (Confirmation of Great Charter, 1331), that no man shall be forejudged of life or limb, contrary to the great charter and the <sup>[134]</sup> law of the land: and again, by statute 28 Edw. III, c. 3 (Right of Trial, 1354), that no man shall be put to death without being brought to answer by due process of law.

§ 182. (hh) Bodily immunity.—Besides those limbs and members that may be necessary to a man, in order to defend himself or annoy his enemy, the rest of his person or body is also entitled by the same natural right, to security from the corporal insults of menaces, assaults, beating, and wounding; though such insults amount not to destruction of life or member.

§ 183. (ii) Preservation of health.—The preservation of a man's health from such practices as may prejudice or annoy it, and § 184. (jj) Security of reputation.—The security of his reputation or good name from the arts of detraction and slander, are rights to which every man is entitled, by reason and natural justice; since without these it is impossible to have the perfect enjoyment of any other advantage or right. But these three last articles (being of much less importance than those which have gone before, and those which are yet to come), it will suffice to have barely mentioned among the rights of persons: referring the more minute discussion of their several branches to those parts of our Commentaries which treat of the infringement of these rights, under the head of personal wrongs.

§ 185. (ii) Personal liberty.—Next to personal security the law of England regards, asserts, and preserves the personal liberty of individuals.<sup>13</sup> This personal liberty consists in the power of

<sup>13</sup> In construing a statute forbidding, under penalty, any person from associating with persons having the reputation of being thieves, gamblers or other disreputable characters, the court says: "If the legislature may dictate who our associates may be, then what becomes of the constitutional protection to personal liberty, which Blackstone says 'consists in the power of locomotion, of changing situation, or moving one's person to whatsoever place one's inclination may direct, without imprisonment or restraint, unless by due course of law' (1 Bl. Comm. 134.) Obviously, there is no difference in point of locomotion, of changing situation, or removing one's person to whatsoever place one's own inclination may direct; without imprisonment or restraint, unless by due course of law.<sup>14</sup> Concerning which we may make the same observations as upon the preceding article: that it is a right strictly natural; that the laws of England have never abridged it without sufficient cause; and that in this kingdom it cannot ever be abridged at the mere discretion of the magistrate, without the explicit permission of the laws.

legal principle between a legislative or municipal act which forbids certain associations and one which commands certain associations." (Ex parte Smith (1896), 135 Mo. 223, 58 Am. St. Rep. 576, 33 L. R. A. 606, 36 S. W. 628, 629.)

14 Definition of civil liberty.—No one can help feeling that this is a very jejune and imperfect definition of the right of liberty. Blackstone himself in another page (1 Comm. *6) says that, rightly understood, this liberty consists in the power of doing whatever the laws permit, and that political or civil liberty is the very end or scope of the constitution. His distinction of natural and civil liberty is more fully stated on pages *125 and *126, where it appears that "natural liberty is the power of acting as one thinks fit, without any restraint or control, unless by the law of nature, being a right inherent in us by birth; while civil liberty is natural liberty so far restrained by human laws as is necessary and expedient for the general advantage of the public (p. *126). To these definitions there is more than one objection. The notion of natural liberty implies that state of nature in which every individual ran wild, unrestrained by any law, and followed only his own caprice in doing as he pleased. The introduction of law, it is supposed, must limit this; since there are some things in every system of law that are forbidden, and in the theory of law which usually goes with these definitions, the law consists entirely of prohibitions or limits upon natural liberty. This theory, too, is evidently assumed in Blackstone's doctrine of mala in se and mala prohibita, according to which the entire object of the law is to forbid things which are regarded as mala. It follows that civil liberty has no meaning in itself, but only expresses the balance or residue of natural liberty which the laws have left to the individual; and this probably is implied in the definition quoted by Blackstone from the civilians through Bracton, that liberty is the power of doing whatsoever one pleases, unless prohibited by violence or by law. The two conceptions, of law as essentially negative and prohibitory, and of liberty as limited by it, belong together and are both of great antiquity.

But are they true? Is not the conception of a natural liberty to do every conceivable thing which the hand of man findeth to do, or which it entereth into his heart to conceive, as pure a fiction as the state of nature? According to this the freest man in the world is the shipwrecked solitary upon his desert isle, or the digger Indian ruling his own family, with no laws to restrain his own actions. To say that these men are free to do everything that they § 186. (aa) Law of the land.—Here again the language of the great [135] charter<sup>1</sup> is, that no freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, but by the lawful judgment of his equals, or by the law of the land. And many subsequent old statutes<sup>1</sup> expressly direct, that no man shall be taken or imprisoned by suggestion or petition to the king or his council, unless it be by legal indictment, or the

<sup>1</sup> C. 29.

<sup>1</sup> 5 Edw. III. c. 9 (Confirmation of Great Charter, 1331). 25 Edw. III. st. 5. c. 4 (Confirmation of Great Charter, 1351). 28 Edw. III. c. 3 (Right of Trial, 1354).

---

please, or that the citizen of a civilized republic has less freedom than they, is a palpable absurdity, though it results logically from the notion of law as essentially a restraint. Both conceptions belong to the system imagined by the philosophers of the seventeenth and eighteenth century, of a primitive state of nature, in which man lived in a condition lower than domestic animals for the lack of all social life, but at the same time possessed all the moral and intellectual qualities, and all the aspirations and purposes of the highest civilization. But no one who takes any view of humanity possible to an intelligent man to-day can believe this; no one who has risen to the view of all law as a principle of order, rather than a mere collection of arbitrary rules imposed by superiors, can fail to see that it has been a great positive force constantly increasing man's powers rather than limiting them, extending his dominion over nature, and creating the organizations by virtue of which the civilized man possesses rights undreamed of by the savage. Even the ancient Roman jurists, so much less favorably placed than we are to recognize this truth, perceived it when they declared that the lowest and most primitive form of power over one's fellow-men, that is, slavery, was an institution of the jus gentium and not of the jus naturale. However much we may detest slavery, history shows it to have been one of the earliest forms of order, one of the processes by which man has been enabled to conquer the earth. It was the first form in which the distinction of civil liberty from natural made its appearance, so that Bracton's objection to the classic definition (ante, page *40) may after all have been ill-taken. Even the relation of master and slave may have been an advance upon the primitive isolation of each man, and a step toward the civil liberty of to-day: at all events, we can see this advance by the aid of law in its abolition, or rather in the steps by which men have been enabled to dispense with it. A recent writer has shown with great acuteness that money has been the chief means by which labor has been organized and rendered effective for the purposes of society without the rude expedient of reducing the laborer to slavery. But money is the creation of law, even in its most primitive forms, still more so in those great developments which make commerce, finance, taxation, and all that taxation supports, possible. How greatly this has increased the power and therefore the liberty of the individual process of the common law. By the petition of right, 3 Car. I (1627), it is enacted, that no freeman shall be imprisoned or detained without cause shown, to which he may make answer according to law.

§ 187. (bb) Habeas corpus.—By 16 Car. I, c. 10 (Star-Chamber, 1640), if any person be restrained of his liberty by order or decree of any illegal court, or by command of the king's majesty hardly needs to be stated. The liberty of the savage extends, at the furthest, only so far as he can personally go. The liberty of the civilized man extends as far as he can make his personal will felt by the means which the law furnishes. When the American merchant, writing his name upon a slip of paper, can cause the Bank of England to give directions to its correspondents in China and India, the results of which will be to set hundreds of Asiatic laborers at work for a man they never saw or heard of, that the products of the antipodes may be sent him and placed at his disposal, he is exercising powers which are the direct gift of law, and which would be paralyzed in a minute in any portion of the entire circuit of the world, if law were not present to sustain it. But it needs no argument to show that the civilized man's liberty is measured by the power he may exert over his fellow-men and physical nature. To say that the savage may do these things, or that his natural liberty extends to all of them, is as pure a fiction as to make it include all physical impossibilities. Such impossibilities are excluded alike from human liberty and from human law.

There is therefore no inconsistency in defining civil liberty as distinct from natural liberty, and in saying that the former by the aid of law is more extensive than the latter. The law is not merely a restraint or shackle upon man's freedom; the more perfect it becomes, the wider is the liberty of action which it creates for every free man. "It consists not in a right to every man to do just as he pleases, but in equal right to all citizens to have, enjoy, and do in peace, security, and without molestation whatever the laws of the country admit to be consistent with the public good." (Chief Justice Jay in his first charge to the New York grand jury, April 4, 1790, as quoted by Flanders, "Lives of the Chief Justices," 1884.)

Closely connected with this is the question whether law is essentially a system of rights, or of prohibitions and safeguards against wrong. It has frequently been said by Bentham and his followers that the classification of law should be based on wrongs, not on rights, as it usually has been. "The fundamental idea, the idea which serves to explain all the others, is that of an offense. It is only by creating offenses, that is to say, by erecting certain actions into offenses, that the law confers rights. If it confer a right it is by giving the quality of offenses to the different actions by which the enjoyment of this right might be interrupted or opposed. The division of rights in person, or by warrant of the council board, or of any of the privy council; he shall, upon demand of his council, have a writ of habeas corpus, to bring his body before the court of king's bench or common pleas; who shall determine whether the cause of his commitment be just, and thereupon do as to justice shall appertain. And by 31 Car. II, c. 2 (1679), commonly called the habeas corpus act, the methods of obtaining this writ are so plainly pointed out and enforced, that, so long as this statute remains unimpeached no subject of England can be long detained in prison, except in ought therefore to correspond with the division of offenses." (Bentham, View of a Complete Code of Laws, c. 2; Works, vol. 3, p. 159.)

This implies the view of laws common to Bentham and Blackstone, composed entirely of restraints on natural liberty. Freedom consists in the power of doing anything at random without the slightest check or determination of one course rather than another, and law only takes away a certain number of the possible acts that are comprehended in this natural liberty, or as Bentham says, "erects them into offenses." Rights are the residuum of unforbidden acts, with perhaps a connotation of some benefit resulting or expected to result to the actor. "To assure to individuals the possession of a certain good is to confer a right upon them." But "the distinction between rights and offenses is therefore strictly verbal; there is no difference in the ideas. It is not possible to form the idea of a right without forming the idea of an offense."

Now, it is questionable whether the idea of a right is so completely dependent on that of an offense. I am willing to admit that such has been the origin of many of our rights, e. g., such as have grown up in equity from the use of certain remedies for wrongs. But a right is not necessarily a negative idea. Such rights as property, the right of a husband or father, have their basis in certain acts which would take place and be the subject of regulation even though never infringed. This is shown by the fact that the offenses corresponding to them have never been exhaustively defined or imagined. New offenses against property and other rights make their appearance even now, and are instantly recognized as offenses, which they could not be if men had no idea of the right except one formed from the offenses against it. The idea of government is at least as positive and definite as that of rebellion or treason; so of property and larceny, embezzlement, etc. And it may be questioned whether Blackstone has not mistaken the chronological for the logical sequence. Wrongs no doubt first attracted attention; but the very idea of a wrong or offense presupposed that of a right, while the converse can hardly be said. Therefore, it seems to be that right should still be the basis of classification even on Blackstone's own theory. But the argument is much stronger if we form a just conception of law (ius) as a science of right, directive, positive, not negative in its precepts, guiding the will, not merely thwarting and repressing it.—HAMMOND.

those cases in which the law requires and justifies such detainer. And, lest this act should be evaded by demanding unreasonable bail, or sureties for the prisoner's appearance, it is declared by 1 W. & M., st. 2, c. 2 (Bill of Rights, 1689), that excessive bail ought not to be required.<sup>15</sup>

§ 138. (cc) Suspension of writ of habeas corpus.—Of great importance to the public is the preservation of this personal liberty: for if once it were left in the power of any, the highest, magistrate to imprison arbitrarily whomever he or his officers thought proper (as in France it is daily practiced by the crown*), there would soon be an end of all other rights and immunities. Some have thought that unjust attacks, even upon life, or property, at the arbitrary will of the magistrate, [136] are less dangerous to the commonwealth, than such as are made upon the personal liberty of the subject. To bereave a man of life, or by violence to confiscate his estate, without accusation or trial, would be so gross and notorious an act of despotism, as must at once convey the alarm of tyranny throughout the whole kingdom. But confinement of the person, by secretly hurrying him to jail, where his sufferings are unknown or forgotten, is a less public, a less striking, and therefore a more dangerous engine of arbitrary government. And yet sometimes, when the state is in real danger, even this may be a necessary measure. But the happiness of our constitution is, that it is not left to the executive power to determine when the danger of the state is so great, as to render this measure expedient. For the parliament only, or legislative power, whenever it sees proper, can authorize the crown, by suspending the habeas corpus act for a short and limited time, to imprison suspected persons without giving any reason for so doing. As the senate of Rome was wont to have recourse to a dictator, a magistrate of absolute authority, when they judged the republic in any imminent danger. The decree of the senate, which usually preceded the nomination of this magistrate, "dent operam consules, ne quid respublica detrimenti capiat (let the consuls provide that the commonwealth receive no injury)," was called the senatus consultum ultimæ necessitatis (the decree of the senate of extreme emergency). In like manner this experiment ought only to be tried in cases of extreme emergency; and in these the nation parts with its liberty for a while, in order to preserve it forever.

* I have been assured upon good authority, that, during the mild administration of Cardinal Fleury, above 54,000 lettres de cachet were issued, upon the single ground of the famous bull unigenitus (the only-begotten). (This note k was first added in fourth edition.) [Lettre de cachet, in French history, a letter or order under seal; a private letter of state: a name given especially to a written order proceeding from and signed by the king, and countersigned by the secretary of state, and used at first as an occasional means of delaying the course of justice, but later, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, as a warrant for the imprisonment without trial of a person obnoxious for any reason to the government, often for life or for a long period, and on frivolous pretexts. Lettres de cachet were abolished at the Revolution. Century Dict.]

<sup>15</sup> Further provisions for facilitating the procurement of bail have been made by the Indictable Offenses Act, 1848, and the Bail Act, 1898.

§ 189. (dd) False imprisonment.—The confinement of the person, in any wise, is an imprisonment. So that the keeping a man against his will in a private house, putting him in the stocks, arresting or forcibly detaining him in the street, is an imprisonment.<sup>1</sup> And the law so much discourages unlawful confinement, that if a man is under duress of imprisonment, which we before explained to mean a compulsion by an illegal restraint of liberty, until he seals a bond or the like; he may allege this duress, and avoid the extorted bond. But if a man be lawfully imprisoned, [137] and either to procure his discharge, or 'on any other fair account, seals a bond or a deed, this is not by duress of imprisonment, and he is not at liberty to avoid it.<sup>m</sup> To make imprisonment lawful, it must either be by process from the courts of judicature, or by warrant from some legal officer having authority to commit to prison; which warrant must be in writing, under the hand and seal of the magistrate, and express the causes of the commitment, in order to be examined into (if necessary) upon a habeas corpus. If there be no cause expressed, the jailer is not bound to detain the prisoner.<sup>n</sup> For the law judges in this respect, saith Sir Edward Coke, like Festus the Roman governor, that it is unreasonable to send a prisoner, and not to signify withal the crimes alleged against him.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Inst. 589.

<sup>n</sup> Ibid. 52, 53.

<sup>m</sup> 2 Inst. 482.

§ 190. (ee) Banishment.—A natural and regular consequence of this personal liberty is, that every Englishman may claim a right to abide in his own country so long as he pleases; and not to be driven from it unless by the sentence of the law. The king indeed, by his royal prerogative, may issue out his writ ne exeat regnum (let him not leave the kingdom), and prohibit any of his subjects from going into foreign parts without license.<sup>o</sup> This may be necessary for the public service and safeguard of the commonwealth.<sup>16</sup> But no power on earth, except the authority of parliament, can send any subject of England out of the land against his will; no, not even a criminal. For exile, or transportation is a punishment unknown to the common law; and, whenever it is now inflicted, it is either by the choice of the criminal himself to escape a capital punishment, or else by the express direction of some modern act of parliament.<sup>17</sup> To this purpose the great charter<sup>p</sup> declares, that no freeman shall be banished, unless by the judgment of his peers, or by the law of

<sup>o</sup> F. N. B. 85.

<sup>p</sup> C. 29.

<sup>16</sup> Practically, the writ ne exeat regno is now only issued in cases falling under sections 4 and 6 of the Debtors' Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict., c. 62). Colverson v. Bloomfield (1885), 29 Ch. D. 341.—STEPHEN, 1 Comm. (16th ed.), 91 n.

<sup>17</sup> Transportation, extradition, deportation, exile.—Is extradition, then, an innovation upon the common law? Lord Coke says so in 2 Inst. 46, 47. (See criticism in Wynne's Eunomus Dial. 3, p. 167.) Wharton, Private International Law, thinks that the surrender of their own subjects for trial abroad by England and the United States is an exception to the rule of other nations, and attributes it to the (supposed) rule of the common law, refusing all jurisdiction of extraterritorial offenses. Story on Conflict of Laws, sections 626–628, and Wheaton on International Law, section 115, make no distinction between surrender of citizens and foreigners. In Reg. v. Wilson, 3 Q. B. D. 42, and In re Dubois, Law R., 2 Ch. 47, the refusal to surrender an English subject is put expressly on an exception to that effect in the treaty. (Cf. dictum of Heath, J., in Mure v. Kaye, 4 Taunt. 34; In re Washburn, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 106, 8 Am. Dec. 548; Commonwealth v. Deacon 10 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 125; Ex parte Reggel, 114 U. S. 642, 29 L. Ed. 250.) That a state government cannot and should not surrender to a foreign state, see Homes v. Jennison, 14 Pet.

the land. And by the habeas corpus act, 31 Car. II, c. 2 (1679), (that second magna carta, and stable bulwark of our liberties), it is enacted, that no subject of this realm, who is an inhabitant of England, Wales, or Berwick, shall be sent prisoner into Scotland, Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, or places beyond the seas (where [138] they cannot have the benefit and protection of the common law); but that all such imprisonments shall be illegal; that the person, who shall dare to commit another contrary to this law, shall be disabled from bearing any office, shall incur the penalty of a præmunire (to forewarn), and be incapable of receiving the king's pardon: and the party suffering shall also have his private action against the person committing, and all his aiders, advisers and abettors, and shall recover treble costs; besides his damages, which no jury shall assess at less than five hundred pounds.

The law is in this respect so benignly and liberally construed for the benefit of the subject, that, though within the realm the king 540, 10 L. Ed. 579 (court divided), and Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. 66, 16 L. Ed. 717, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1148).—HAMMOND.

It is said that the first statute in which the word "transportation" was used is the 18 Car. II (1666), c. 3, which gave a power to the judges, at their discretion, either to execute, or to transport to America for life, the moss-troopers of Cumberland and Northumberland. Transportation was abolished by the Penal Servitude Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict., c. 3), and "penal servitude" in England substituted.

Mr. Justice Gray, in Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U. S. 698, 709, 37 L. Ed. 905, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1016, says: "Strictly speaking, 'transportation,' 'extradition,' and 'deportation,' although each has the effect of removing a person from the country, are different things, and have different purposes. 'Transportation' is by way of punishment of one convicted of an offense against the laws of the country. 'Extradition' is the surrender to another country of one accused of an offense against its laws, there to be tried, and, if found guilty, punished. 'Deportation' is the removal of an alien out of the country, simply because his presence is deemed inconsistent with the public welfare, and without any punishment being imposed or contemplated, either under the laws of the country out of which he is sent, or under those of the country to which he is taken."

Exile is said to have been introduced as a punishment in 1597 by statute 39 Eliz., c. 4, which enacted that such rogues as were dangerous to the inferior people should be banished the realm. (See Barrington, Observations on the Statutes, 268 n, 269; 1 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 92 n.) Exile may practically be enforced in the United States by granting a pardon on condition that the person pardoned shall leave the country. (Ex parte Marks, 64 Cal.

may command the attendance and service of all his liegemen, yet he cannot send any man out of the realm, even upon the public service; excepting sailors and soldiers, the nature of whose employment necessarily implies an exception: he cannot even constitute a man lord deputy or lieutenant of Ireland against his will, nor make him a foreign ambassador.<sup>4</sup> For this might in reality be no more than an honorable exile.

§ 191. (iii) Right of private property: law of the land.—The third absolute right, inherent in every Englishman, is that of property: which consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only by the laws of the land.<sup>18</sup> The original of private property is probably founded in nature, as will be more fully explained in the

• 2 Inst. 46.

---

29, 49 Am. Rep. 684, 28 Pac. 109; People v. James, 2 Caines (N. Y.), 57; Commonwealth v. Haggerty, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 326; Flavell's Case, 8 Watts & S. (Pa.) 197; State v. Chancellor, 1 Strob. (S. C.) 347, 47 Am. Dec. 557.)

<sup>18</sup> "The right of property, however, is an inherent or inalienable right of the citizen, and 'consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of his acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only of the laws of the land.' (1 Bl. Comm. 138.) But we venture to say that among the absolute rights of individuals enumerated by Blackstone no mention is made of a right to inherit property from another. All estates derived upon the death of another have been created by law, and are for that reason always subject to regulation by statute; indeed, frequent changes by legislative enactment have been and will doubtless yet be made in the law of descent and distribution. It is patent, therefore, that the guaranty in the Bill of Rights, and other provisions of the constitution, with respect to the right of acquiring and protecting property, does not include the mere privilege, right, or expectancy of inheritance."—SETTLE, J., in Booth's Exr. v. Commonwealth, 130 Ky. 88, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 592, 113 S. W. 61, 63.

"The right thus referred to and defined by the illustrious commentator is absolute and inherent in every American, subject of the United States, by virtue of the supreme law of the land. Therefore, 'when a law annihilates the value of property, and strips it of its attributes, by which alone it is distinguished as property, the owner is deprived of it according to the plainest interpretation, and certainly within the spirit of a constitutional provision intended especially to shield private rights from the exercise of arbitrary power.' Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 378, 398."—BARTCH, J., in Block v. Schwartz, 27 Utah, 387, 101 Am. St. Rep. 971, 1 Ann. Cas. 550, 65 L. R. A. 308, 76 Pac. 22, 25.

second book of the ensuing Commentaries; but certainly the modifications under which we at present find it, the method of conserving it in the present owner, and of translating it from man to man, are entirely derived from society: and are some of those civil advantages, in exchange for which every individual has resigned a part of his natural liberty. The laws of England are therefore, in point of honor and justice, extremely watchful in ascertaining and protecting this right. Upon this principle the great charter<sup>r</sup> has declared that no freeman shall be disseized or divested of his freehold, or of his liberties, or free cus-<sup>[139]</sup> toms, but by the judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. And by a variety of ancient statutes<sup>s</sup> it is enacted, that no man's lands or goods shall be seized into the king's hands, against the great charter, and the law of the land; and that no man shall be disinherited, nor put out of his franchises or freehold, unless he be duly brought to answer, and be forejudged by course of law; and if anything be done to the contrary, it shall be redressed, and holden for none.

§ 192. (aa) Right of eminent domain.—So great, moreover, is the regard of the law for private property, that it will not authorize the least violation of it; no, not even for the general good of the whole community.<sup>19</sup> If a new road, for instance, were to

<sup>r</sup> C. 29.

<sup>s</sup> 5 Edw. III. c. 9 (Confirmation of Great Charter, 1331). 25 Edw. III. st. 5. c. 4 (Confirmation of Great Charter, 1351). 28 Edw. III. c. 3 (Right of Trial, 1354).

<sup>19</sup> Eminent domain.—Whether this remark was true of the English law at the time when it was written may justly be doubted. The omnipotent character of the English parliament was nowhere more distinctly shown than in its power to overrule the ordinary safeguards of private property, by divesting estates, or permitting the exercise of powers inconsistent with rights of ownership; and that, often, in the case of private bills for the benefit of individuals. In the United States, the taking of private property for private use cannot be justified by any considerations of benefit, either to individuals or the community. Although not expressly forbidden by the letter of our constitutions, it is deemed to be as clearly so by the provision contained in all of them, that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. This has always been held to forbid a fortiori, such taking for private use, with compensation or without it; and the United States supreme court be made through the grounds of a private person, it might perhaps be extensively beneficial to the public; but the law permits no man, or set of men, to do this without consent of the owner of the land. In vain may it be urged, that the good of the individual ought to yield to that of the community; for it would be dangerous to allow any private man, or even any public tribunal, to be the judge of this common good, and to decide whether it be expedient have recently put the prohibition upon stronger grounds by holding that the legislative power does not extend to the taking of one man's property for the benefit of another. (Miller, J., Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655, 663, 22 L. Ed. 455; citing Whiting v. Sheboygan etc. R. Co., 25 Wis. 167, 188, 3 Am. Rep. 30; Cooley on Const. Lim., pp. 129, 175, 487; Dillon on Munic. Corp., sec. 587.)

But when private property is taken for public use, this may now be regarded not so much a violation of the right as the enforcement of a condition under which all private property must be holden in an organized state. This view is implied in the very term "eminent domain," which is so commonly employed to designate this power, that many writers and judges seem to forget that this is not its entire meaning. (Andrews, J., in Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 519, 30 Am. Rep. 323.) The eminent domain of the state properly signifies that higher ownership of all the property of its individual members, which warrants, not only the taking of it for public use, but also taxation, forfeiture, and escheat, or the entire absorption of it when no individual owner can be found. (See Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, pp. 523, 524, and the definitions found in n. 1; Vattel, c. 20, sec. 34; Campbell, J., in Sears v. Cottrell, 5 Mich. 251, 274.)

Until recently this power of eminent domain was supposed to inhere in the state governments only, and to be denied to the federal government by its constitution. But since 1875, by the decision of Kohl v. United States, 91 U. S. 367, 23 L. Ed. 449, these decisions have been overruled, and the power of the federal government to take land for its own purposes, even within the states, has been fully vindicated.

Another extension of the power, the reason of which is much less justifiable, has been accepted practically without question from a very early date in our law. I mean the delegation of the power to corporate bodies: not only municipal, which are public in their nature, and may be considered as sharing to some extent the powers of the sovereign, but even to private corporations formed for the construction of railroads, canals, and other works, as a means of private profit. The right of such bodies to take land against the will of the owner at their own discretion, and subject only to the condition of paying the market price, is a most anomalous delegation of sovereign power, but may be too firmly vested now to be successfully questioned.—HAMMOND.

The remainder of this note is omitted. (1 Hammond's Black. 359.)

or no. Besides, the public good is in nothing more essentially interested than in the protection of every individual's private rights, as modeled by the municipal law. In this and similar cases the legislature alone can, and indeed frequently does, interpose, and compel the individual to acquiesce. But how does it interpose and compel? Not by absolutely stripping the subject of his property in an arbitrary manner; but by giving him a full indemnification and equivalent for the injury thereby sustained. The public is now considered as an individual, treating with an individual for an exchange. All that the legislature does is to oblige the owner to alienate his possessions for a reasonable price; and even this is an exertion of power, which the legislature indulges with caution, and which nothing but the legislature can perform.

§ 193. (bb) Taxation and representation.—[<sup>140</sup>] Nor is this the only instance in which the law of the land has postponed even public necessity to the sacred and inviolable rights of private property. For no subject of England can be constrained to pay any aids or taxes, even for the defense of the realm or the support of government, but such as are imposed by his own consent, or that of his representatives in parliament. By the statute 25 Edw. I, c. 5 and 6 (Taxation, 1297), it is provided that the king shall not take any aids or tasks, but by the common assent of the realm. And what that common assent is, is more fully explained by 34 Edw. I, st. 4, c. 1 (Taxation, 1306), which † enacts, that no talliage or aid shall be taken without the assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other freemen of the land: and again, by 14 Edw. III, st. 2, c. 1 (Taxation, 1340), the prelates, earls, barons, and commons, citizens, burgesses, and merchants shall not be charged to make any aid, if it be not by the common assent of the great men and commons in parliament. And as this fundamental law had been shamefully evaded under many succeeding princes, by compulsive loans, and benevolences extorted without a real and voluntary consent, it was made an article in the petition of right, 3 Car. I (1627), that no man shall be compelled to yield any gift, loan, or benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament. And, lastly, by the statute 1 W. & M., st. 2, c. 2 (Bill of Rights, 1689), it is declared that levying money for or to the use of the crown, by pretense of prerogative, without grant of parliament, or for longer time, or in other manner, than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal.

† See the introduction to the great charter (edit. Oxon.) sub anno 1297; wherein it is shown that that statute de talliagio non concedendo (on the non-granting of talliage), supposed to have been made in 34 Edw. I (1306), is in reality nothing more than a sort of translation into Latin of the confirmatio cartarum (a confirmation of the charters), 25 Edw. I (1297), which was originally published in the Norman language. (The words “(edit. Oxon.)” were first added in the second edition. Blackstone himself was the editor.)

§ 194. (iv) Bulwarks of personal rights.—In the three preceding articles we have taken a short view of the principal absolute rights which appertain to every Englishman. But in vain would these rights be declared, ascertained, and protected by the dead letter of the laws, if the <sup>[141]</sup> constitution had provided no other method to secure their actual enjoyment. It has therefore established certain other auxiliary subordinate rights of the subject, which serve principally as barriers to protect and maintain inviolate the three great and primary rights, of personal security, personal liberty, and private property. These are,

§ 195. (aa) Parliament.—The constitution, powers, and privileges of parliament, of which I shall treat at large in the ensuing chapter.

§ 196. (bb) Limitation of king's prerogative.—The limitation of the king's prerogative, by bounds so certain and notorious, that it is impossible he should *exceed them without the consent of the people. Of this also I shall treat in its proper place. The former of these keeps the legislative power in due health and vigor, so as to make it improbable that laws should be enacted destructive of general liberty: the latter is a guard upon the executive power by restraining it from acting either beyond or in contradiction to the laws, that are framed and established by the other.

§ 197. (cc) The courts: due process of law.—A third subordinate right of every Englishman is that of applying to the courts of justice for redress of injuries. Since the law is in England the supreme arbiter of every man's life, liberty, and property, courts of justice must at all times be open to the subject, and the law be duly administered therein. The emphatical words of magna carta,<sup>u</sup> spoken in the person of the king, who in judgment of law (says Sir Edward Coke <sup>v</sup>) is ever present and repeating them in all his courts, are these; nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus, aut differemus rectum vel justitiam (to none will we sell, to none deny, to none delay either right or justice): "and therefore every subject," continues the same learned author, "for injury done to him in bonis, in terris, vel persona (either in his goods, lands, or person), by any other subject, be he ecclesiastical or temporal without any exception, may take his remedy by the course of the law, and have justice and right for the injury done to him, freely without sale, fully without any denial, and speedily without delay." It were endless to enumerate all the affirmative acts of parliament, [142] wherein justice is directed to be done according to the law of the land; and what that law is, every subject knows, or may know, if he pleases; for it depends not upon the arbitrary will of any judge; but is permanent, fixed and unchangeable, unless by authority of parliament. I shall, however, just mention a few negative statutes, whereby abuses, perversions, or delays of justice, especially by the prerogative, are restrained. It is ordained by magna carta,<sup>x</sup> that no freeman shall be outlawed, that is, put out of the protection and benefit of the laws, but according to the law of the land. By 2 Edw. III, c. 8 (Delay of Justice, 1328), and 11 Rich II, c. 10 (Pre-eminence of Law, 1387), it is enacted, that no commands or letters shall be sent under the great seal, or the little seal, the signet, or privy seal, in disturbance of the law; or to disturb or delay common right: and, though such commandments should come, the judges shall not cease to do right; which is also made a part of their oath by statute 18 Edw. III, st. 4 (1344). And by 1 W. & M., st. 2, c. 2 (Bill of Rights, 1689), it is declared, that the pretended power of suspending, or dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority without consent of parliament, is illegal.

* The ninth edition inserts here after should, "either mistake or legally."

Not only the substantial part, or judicial decisions, of the law, but also the formal part, or method of proceeding cannot be altered but by parliament; for, if once those outworks were demolished, there would be an inlet to all manner of innovation in the body of the law itself. The king, it is true, may erect new courts of justice; but then they must proceed according to the old-established forms of the common law. For which reason it is declared in the statute 16 Car. I, c. 10 (Star-Chamber, 1640), upon the dissolution of the court of star-chamber, that neither his majesty, nor his privy council, have any jurisdiction, power, or authority by English bill, petition, articles, libel (which were the course of proceeding in the star-chamber, borrowed from the civil law), or by any other arbitrary way whatsoever, to examine, or draw into question, determine, or dispose of the lands or goods of any subjects of this kingdom; but that the same ought to be tried and determined in the ordinary courts of justice, and by course of law.

<sup>u</sup> C. 29.

<sup>x</sup> C. 29.

<sup>v</sup> 2 Inst. 55.

§ 198. (dd) Right of petition.—[143] If there should happen any uncommon injury, or infringement of the rights before mentioned, which the ordinary course of law is too defective to reach, there still remains a fourth subordinate right, appertaining to every individual, namely, the right of petitioning the king, or either house of parliament, for the redress of grievances. In Russia we are told<sup>v</sup> that the Czar Peter established a law, that no subject might petition the throne, till he had first petitioned two different ministers of state. In case he obtained justice from neither, he might then present a third petition to the prince; but upon pain of death, if found to be in the wrong. The consequence of which was, that no one dared to offer such third petition; and grievances seldom falling under the notice of the sovereign, he had little opportunity to redress them. The restrictions, for some there are, which are laid upon petitioning in England, are of a nature extremely different; and while they promote the spirit of peace, they are no check upon that of liberty. Care only must be taken, lest, under the pretense of petitioning, the subject be guilty of any riot or tumult; as happened in the opening of the memorable parliament in 1640: and, to prevent this, it is provided by the statute 13 Car. II, st. 1, c. 5 (Riot, 1661), that no petition to the king, or either house of parliament, for any alteration in church or state, shall be signed by above twenty persons, unless the matter thereof be approved by three justices of the peace, or the major part of the grand jury, in the country; and in London by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council; nor shall any petition be presented by more than ten persons at a time. But, under these regulations, it is declared by the statute 1 W. & M., st. 2, c. 2 (Bill of Rights, 1689), that the subject hath a right to petition; and that all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal.

<sup>v</sup> Montesq. Sp. L. xii. 26.

§ 199. (ee) Right to bear arms.—The fifth and last auxiliary right of the subject, that I shall at present mention, is that of having arms for their defense, suitable to their condition and degree, and such as are [144] allowed by law. Which is also declared by the same statute, 1 W. & M., st. 2, c. 2, and it is indeed a public allowance, under due restrictions, of the natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression.<sup>20</sup>

§ 200. Summary of chapter.—In these several articles consist the rights, or, as they are frequently termed, the liberties of Englishmen: liberties, more generally talked of than thoroughly understood; and yet highly necessary to be perfectly known and considered by every man of rank or property, lest his ignorance of the points whereon they are founded should hurry him into faction and licentiousness on the one hand, or a pusillanimous indifference and criminal submission on the other. And we have seen that these rights consist, primarily, in the free enjoyment of personal security, of personal liberty, and of private property. So long as these remain inviolate, the subject is perfectly free; for every species of compulsive tyranny and oppression must act in opposition to one or other of these rights, having no other object upon which it can possibly be employed. To preserve these from violation, it is necessary that the constitution of parliament be supported in its full vigor; and limits, certainly known, be set to the royal prerogative. And, lastly, to vindicate these rights, when actually violated or attacked, the subjects of England are entitled, in the first place, to the regular administration and free course of justice in the courts of law; next, to the right of petitioning the king and parliament for redress of grievances; and lastly, to the right of having and using arms for self-preservation and defense. And all these rights and liberties it is our birthright to enjoy entire; unless where the laws of our country have laid them under necessary restraints. Restraints in themselves so gentle and moderate, as will appear upon further inquiry, that no man of sense or probity would wish to see them slackened. For all of us have it in our choice to do everything that a good man would desire to do; and are restrained from nothing, but what would be pernicious either to ourselves or our fellow-citizens. So that this review [145] of our situation may fully justify the observation of a learned French author, who indeed generally both thought and wrote in the spirit of genuine freedom;* and who hath not scrupled to profess, even in the very bosom of his native country, that the English is the only nation in the world, where political or civil liberty is the direct end of its constitution. Recommending, therefore, to the student in our laws a further and more accurate search into this extensive and important title, I shall close my remarks upon it with the expiring wish of the famous father Paul to his country, "ESTO PERPETUA!" (Mayst thou endure forever!)

<sup>20</sup> The constitutional right to bear arms in this country does not mean the right to bear them for individual defense, but only for the defense of the community against invasion or oppression. The use of arms for the latter purpose may be restricted but not prohibited; of all other, arms may be prohibited. (Andrews v. State, 3 Heisk. 165.)—HAMMOND.

* Montesq. Sp. L. xi. 5.

CHAPTER THE SECOND. OF THE PARLIAMENT.

§ 201. Relations of persons: public and private.—We are next to treat of the right and duties of persons, as they are members of society, and stand in various relations to each other. These relations are either public or private: and we will first consider those that are public.<sup>1</sup>

1 Division of persons, of rights, and of law: Holland.—A very radical division of rights is based upon a broad distinction between the public or private character of the persons with whom the right is connected. By a “public person” we mean either the state, or the sovereign part of it, or a body or individual holding delegated authority under it.

By a “private person” we mean an individual, or collection of individuals however large, who, or each one of whom, is of course a unit of the state, but in no sense represents it, even for a special purpose.

When both of the persons with whom a right is connected are private persons, the right also is private. When one of the persons is the state, while the other is a private person, the right is public.

From this division of rights there results a division of law, as the definer and protector of rights, which, when they subsist—

- (1) Between subject and subject, are regulated by “private” law.
- (2) When between state and subject, by “public” law.

And this distribution of the whole field of law is of such capital importance that we have no hesitation in adopting the division of rights out of which it springs as the radical division of them.

We have now to explain the application of the distinction, and to justify our assertion that this is the radical distinction between rights, and consequently between the departments of law.

By adopting this subdivision of municipal law, its whole field falls at once into two natural sections. On the one hand is the law which regulates rights where one of the persons concerned is “public”; where the state is, directly or indirectly, one of the parties. Here the very power which defines and protects the right is itself a party interested in or affected by the right. That is to say, it is at the option of one of the persons who are concerned with the right to uphold or to extinguish it. If the state is the “person of inherence,” it will naturally, though of course not of compulsion, protect its own right. If the state is the “person of incidence,” it may conceivably refuse to uphold the quasi right of the person of inherence against itself. If the state executes laws which protect rights against itself, it is acting upon the maxim applied to their own conduct by the Roman emperors: “Legibus soluti legibus vivimus”

§ 202. Government.—The most universal public relation, by which men are connected together, is that of government; namely, as governors and governed, or, in other words, as magistrates and people. Of magistrates some also are supreme, in whom the sovereign power of the state resides; others are subordinate, deriving all their authority from the supreme magistrate, accountable to him for their conduct, and acting in an inferior secondary sphere.

§ 203. 1. Departments of government.—In all tyrannical governments the supreme magistracy, or the right both of making and of enforcing the laws, is vested in one and the same man, or one and the same body of men; and wherever these two powers are united together, there can be no public liberty. The magistrate may enact tyrannical laws, and execute them in a tyrannical manner, since he is possessed in quality of dispenser of justice, with (Though not bound by the laws, we yet live in obedience to them).” Opposed to this is the law which regulates rights where both of the persons concerned are “private” persons. Here the parties interested in or affected by the right have nothing to do with protecting it. This is done by the state, whenever the person of inherence invokes its aid.

The punishment, for instance, of a traitor is a matter of public law. The right violated by him is a public right, because the person in whom it resides is the state. The state has a right not to be conspired against. The traitor violates this right, and the same state whose right has been violated intervenes to protect itself and to punish the offender. If, on the other hand, a carrier damages my goods, the question raised is one of private law. My right to have my goods safely carried is a private right, because both the carrier and myself are private individuals; though I am entitled to call for the intervention of the state to obtain compensation from him for the injury I have sustained. (It is noteworthy that in the Articles of Union between England and Scotland (art. 18) a distinction is drawn between Scots laws “concerning public right, policy, and civil government, and those which concern private right.”) It is necessary, in order to obviate a frequent confusion upon the point, to mention that the same act may often infringe both a public and a private right. Thus an assault or a libel upon an individual is a violation of two distinct rights, i. e., of the private right of the individual to be unmolested, and of the public right of the state not to be disturbed by acts constituting, or tending towards, breaches of the public peace.

The distribution of law which has been thus shown to be logically consistent possesses other advantages also. A moment’s consideration will show the convenience of an arrangement in accordance with which constitutional, ecclesiastical, criminal, and administrative law, on the one hand, and the law of all the power which he as legislator thinks proper to give himself. But, where the legislative and executive authority are in distinct hands, the former will take care not to entrust the latter with so large a power, as may tend to the subversion of its own independence, and therewith of the liberty of the subject. With us, therefore, in England this supreme power is divided into <sup>[147]</sup> two branches; the one legislative, to wit, the parliament, consisting of king, lords, and commons; the other executive, consisting of the king alone. It will be the business of this chapter to consider the British parliament; in which the legislative power, and (of course) the supreme and absolute authority of the state, is vested by our constitution.

§ 204. Parliament: 1. Beginnings in Europe.—The original or first institution of parliaments is one of those matters which lie so far hidden in the dark ages of antiquity, that the tracing of it out is a thing equally difficult and uncertain. The word, parliament, itself (parlement or colloquium, as some of our historians translate it), is comparatively of modern date; derived from the French, and signifying an assembly that met and conferred together. It was first applied to general assemblies of the states contracts, of real and personal property, of wills and successions, and of torts, on the other hand, form two groups, to one or other of which every legal topic may be readily referred.

In recognizing as the primary principle of the division of our science the distinction between public and private persons, resulting, through the severance of public and private rights, in the opposition of public and private law, we have the irrecusable authority of the Roman jurists. "Publicum ius," says Ulpian, and his words adopted by Justinian have influenced the legal speculation of the world, "est quod ad statum rei Romanæ spectat; privatum quod ad singulorum utilitatem pertinet." (Public law relates to the welfare of the Roman state; private law relates to the advantage of the individual citizen.)" Or as Paulus says: "Alterum utilitas privatorum, alterum vigor publicæ disciplinæ postulat." (The advantage of private persons demands one thing, the vigor of public discipline another.)"

But indeed the distinction is much older. It is beautifully worked out by Aristotle, who classifies offenses according to those against whom they are committed. They are committed, he says, either against the state (Το κοινόν) or an individual (ἐνα των κοινωρούτων). An assault is an injury to an individual, while avoiding military service is an injury to the state.—HOLLAND, Jurisprudence (11th ed.), 124.

under Louis VII in France, about the middle of the twelfth century.<sup>a</sup> But it is certain that, long before the introduction of the Norman language into England, all matters of importance were debated and settled in the great councils of the realm. A practice which seems to have been universal among the northern nations, particularly the Germans;<sup>b</sup> and carried by them into all the countries of Europe, which they overran at the dissolution of the Roman empire. Relics of which constitution, under various modifications and changes, are still to be met with in the diets of Poland, Germany, and Sweden, and the assembly of the estates in France;<sup>c</sup> for what is there now called the parliament is only the supreme court of justice, consisting of the peers, certain dignified ecclesiastics, and judges; which neither is in practice, nor is supposed to be in theory, a general council of the realm.

§ 205. 2. Saxon wittena-gemote.—With us in England this general council hath been held immemorially, under the several names of michelsynoth, or great council, michel-gemote or great meeting, and more [148] frequently wittena-gemote or the meeting of wise men. It was also styled in Latin, commune concilium regni, magnum concilium regis, curia magna, conventus magnatum vel procerum, assisa generalis (the common council of the kingdom, the great council of the king, the high court, the assembly of the nobles, and the general assize), and sometimes communitas regni Angliæ (the community of the kingdom of England).<sup>d</sup> We have instances of its meeting to order the affairs of the kingdom, to make new laws, and to amend the old, or, as Fleta<sup>e</sup> expresses it, "novis injuriis emeris nova constituere remedia (new injuries having arisen, to appoint new remedies for them)," so early as the reign of Ina, King of the West Saxons, Offa, King of the Mercians, <sup>a</sup> Mod. Un. Hist. xxiii. 307. The first mention of it in our statute law is in the preamble to the statute of Westm. 1. 3 Edw. I. A. D. 1275.

<sup>b</sup> De minoribus rebus principes consultant, de majoribus omnes. (In lesser affairs princes consult, in greater affairs, all the people.) Tac. de mor. Germ. c. 11.

<sup>c</sup> These were assembled for the last time, A. D. 1561 (See Whitelocke of Parl. c. 72) or according to Robertson, A. D. 1614. (Hist. Cha. V. i. 360.)

<sup>d</sup> Glanvill l. 13. c. 32. 1. 9. c. 10.—Pref. 9 Rep.—2 Inst. 526.

<sup>e</sup> l. 2. c. 2.

and Ethelbert, King of Kent, in the several realms of the heptarchy. And, after their union, the Mirror† informs us that King Alfred ordained for a perpetual usage, that these councils should meet twice in the year, or oftener, if need be, to treat of the government of God's people; how they should keep themselves from sin, should live in quiet, and should receive right. Our succeeding Saxon and Danish monarchs held frequent councils of this sort, as appears from their respective codes of laws; the titles whereof usually speak them to be enacted, either by the king with the advice of his wittena-gemote, or wise men, as, "hæc sunt instituta, quæ Edgarus rex consilio sapientum suorum instituit (these are the laws which King Edgar has instituted in an assembly of the wise men of his realm)"; or to be enacted by those sages with the advice of the king, as, "hæc sunt judicia, quæ sapientes consilio regis Ethelstani instituerunt (these are the decrees which the wise men, with the advice of King Ethelstane, have appointed)"; or lastly, to be enacted by them both together, as, "hæc sunt institutiones, quas rex Edmandus et episcopi sui cum sapientibus suis instituerunt (these are the institutions which King Edmund and his bishops and his wise men have decreed)."

§ 206. 3. Norman great council.—There is also no doubt but these great councils were occasionally held under the first princes of the Norman line. Glanvill, who wrote in the reign of Henry the Second, speaking of the particular amount of an amercement in the sheriff's court, says, it had never yet been ascertained by the general assize, or assembly, but was left to the custom of particular counties.§ Here the general assize is spoken of as a meeting well known, and its statutes or decisions are put in [149] a manifest contradistinction to custom, or the common law. And in Edward the Third's time an act of parliament, made in the reign of William the Conqueror, was pleaded in the case of the Abbey of St. Edmund's-bury, and judicially allowed by the court.<sup>h</sup>

† C. 1. § 3.

§ Quanta esse debeat per nullam assisam generalem determinatum est, sed pro consuetudine singulorum comitatuum debetur. l. 9. c. 10.

h Year-Book. 21 Edw. III. 60 (1347).

§ 207. 4. The modern parliament: magna carta.—Hence it indisputably appears, that parliaments, or general councils, are coeval with the kingdom itself. How those parliaments were constituted and composed, is another question, which has been matter of great dispute among our learned antiquaries; and, particularly, whether the commons were summoned at all; or, if summoned, at what period they began to form a distinct assembly. But it is not my intention here to enter into controversies of this sort. I hold it sufficient that it is generally agreed that in the main the constitution of parliament, as it now stands, was marked out so long ago as the seventeenth year of King John, A. D. 1215, in the great charter granted by that prince; wherein he promises to summon all archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, and greater barons, personally; and all other tenants in chief under the crown, by the sheriff and bailiffs: to meet at a certain place, with forty days' notice, to assess aids and scutages when necessary. And this constitution has subsisted in fact at least from the year 1266, 49 Hen. III: there being still extant writs of that date, to summon knights, citizens, and burgesses to parliament.<sup>2</sup> I proceed, therefore, to inquire wherein consists <sup>2</sup> Origin of parliament.—Far more important was the Great Council of the Magnates, a body consisting of the chief tenants in capite of the crown (including the prelates and the greater abbots), which, constructed on feudal lines, had assembled with more or less regularity on important occasions ever since the Norman Conquest. In strictness, this body should have contained all the tenants in capite of the crown; for every tenant in capite was bound to give his advice, if called upon, to his immediate lord, the king, and, conversely, to be consulted by his lord on important occasions. But the inconvenience and expense of attendance on, perhaps, a distant court, had, in practice, justified the abstention of the smaller tenants in capite; and, though the famous provision of the Great Charter (Cap. 14. It is noteworthy that this clause was clearly regarded as temporary, for it disappeared from the editions of the Charter which were issued after the death of King John) for summoning a "common council of the realm" recalls the existence of the theory, yet in fact the provision was never acted upon, and has generally been misunderstood.

In addition to the Great Council of the Magnates, there were, at the end of the thirteenth century, the convocations, or purely ecclesiastical assemblies of the two provinces of Canterbury and York, which had been rapidly assuming a regular and organized form during the earlier years of the thirteenth century, and may, perhaps, have given Simon de Montfort his famous idea of a representative gathering. (In 1265, after the battle of Lewes.) At any rate, this constitution of parliament, as it now stands and has stood for the space of at least five hundred years. And in the prosecution of this inquiry, I shall consider, first, the manner and time of its assembling: secondly, its constituent parts: thirdly, the laws and customs relating to parliament, considered as one aggregate body: fourthly and fifthly, the laws and customs relating to each house, separately and distinctly taken: sixthly, the methods of proceeding, and of making statutes, in both houses: and lastly, the manner of the parliament's adjournment, prorogation and dissolution.

§ 208. 5. Constitution of parliament—a. Meeting.—<sup>[150]</sup> As to the manner and time of assembling. The parliament is regularly to be summoned by the king's writ or letter, issued out of chancery by advice of the privy council, at least forty days before it begins to sit. It is a branch of the royal prerogative, that no parliament can be convened by its own authority, or by the authority of any, except the king alone. And this prerogative is founded upon very good reason. For, supposing it had a right to meet spontaneously, without being called together, it is impossible to conceive that all the members, and each of the houses, would agree unanimously upon the proper time and place of meeting; and if half of the members met, and half absented themselves, who shall it obviously suggested the inclusion of clerical "proctors" in the parliament of 1295.

Once more, in the ancient institution of the county or shire court, in which the freeholders of the county had from time immemorial been wont to assemble, and in the somewhat younger, but rapidly developing, councils and guilds of the chartered boroughs, King Edward the First found the material for his famous assembly; and it is not immaterial to observe that, in the county or shire court, there had long been in existence a practice of having the townships represented by the reeve, priest, and four best men. (Leges Henrici Primi, vii. (7).) It must not be hastily supposed that these "best men" were elected in any formal manner to represent the township in the shire court, still less that they were eager candidates for the office. Still, the fact of their presence as a familiar feature of a familiar institution would probably favor the policy of King Edward in applying his favorite maxim: "What touches all shall be approved by all." (This maxim appeared in the preamble of the bishops' writs which summoned them to the famous parliament of 1295. It was not, however, apparently, inserted in the writs sent to the lay peers and the sheriffs. See Stubbs, Select Charters, pp. 484-487.)—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 468.

determine which is really the legislative body, the part assembled, or that which stays away? It is therefore necessary that the parliament should be called together at a determinate time and place: and highly becoming its dignity and independence, that it should be called together by none but one of its own constituent parts: and, of the three constituent parts, this office can only appertain to the king; as he is a single person, whose will may be uniform and steady; the first person in the nation, being superior to both houses in dignity; and the only branch of the legislature that has a separate existence, and is capable of performing any act at a time when no parliament is in being.<sup>1</sup> Nor is it an exception to this rule that, by some modern statutes, on the demise of a king or queen, if there be then no parliament in being, the last parliament revives, and is to sit again for six months, unless dissolved by the successor: for this revived parliament must have been originally summoned by the crown.

[151] It is true, that by a statute, 16 Car. I, c. 1 (Triennial, 1640), it was enacted, that, if the king neglected to call a parliament for three years, the peers might assemble and issue out writs for choosing one; and, in case of neglect of the peers, the constituents might meet and elect one themselves. But this, if ever put in practice, would have been liable to all the inconveniences I have just now stated: and the act itself was esteemed so highly detrimental and injurious to the royal prerogative, that it was repealed by statute 16 Car. II, c. 1 (Parliament, 1664). From thence, therefore, no precedent can be drawn.

§ 209. (1) The convention parliament of 1660.—It is also true that the convention parliament, which restored King Charles the Second, met above a month before his return; the lords by their own authority, and the commons in pursuance of writs issued in the name of the keepers of the liberty of England by authority of parliament: and that the said parliament sat till the twenty-ninth of December, full seven months after the restoration; and enacted many laws, several of which are still in force. But this was for the necessity of the thing, which supersedes all law; for if they had not so met, it was morally impossible that the kingdom should have been settled in peace. And the first thing done after the king's return was to pass an act declaring this to be a good parliament, notwithstanding the defect of the king's writs.<sup>1</sup> So that, as the royal prerogative was chiefly wounded by their so meeting, and as the king himself, who alone had a right to object, consented to waive the objection, this cannot be drawn into an example in prejudice of the rights of the crown. Besides we should also remember, that it was at that time a great doubt among the lawyers,<sup>2</sup> whether even this healing act made it a good parliament; and held by very many in the negative: though it seems to have been too nice a scruple. And yet out of abundant caution, it was thought necessary to confirm its acts in the next parliament, by statute 13 Car. II, c. 7, and c. 14 (Confirmation of Statutes, 1661).

<sup>1</sup> By motives somewhat similar to these, the republic of Venice was actuated, when towards the end of the seventh century it abolished the tribunes of the people, who were annually chosen by the several districts of the Venetian territory, and constituted a doge in their stead; in whom the executive power of the state at present resides. For which their historians have assigned these, as the principal reasons. 1. The propriety of having the executive power a part of the legislative, or senate; to which the former annual magistrates were not admitted. 2. The necessity of having a single person to convoke the great council when separated. (Mod. Un. Hist. xxvii. 15.)

§ 210. (2) The convention of 1688.—<sup>[152]</sup> It is likewise true, that at the time of the revolution, A. D. 1688, the lords and commons by their own authority, and upon the summons of the Prince of Orange (afterwards King William) met in a convention, and therein disposed of the crown and kingdom. But it must be remembered that this assembling was upon a like principle of necessity as at the Restoration; that is, upon a full conviction that King James the Second had abdicated the government, and that the throne was thereby vacant: which supposition of the individual members was confirmed by their concurrent resolution, when they actually came together. And, in such a case as the palpable vacancy of a throne, it follows ex necessitate rei (from the urgency of the affair), that the form of the royal writs must be laid aside, otherwise no parliament can ever meet again. For, let us put another possible case, and suppose, for the sake of argument, that the whole royal line should at any time fail and become extinct, which would indisputably vacate the throne: in this situation it seems reasonable to presume, that the body of the nation, consisting of lords and commons, would have a right to meet and settle the government; otherwise there must be no government at all. And upon this and no other principle did the convention in 1688 assemble. The vacancy of the throne was precedent to their meeting without any royal summons, not a consequence of it. They did not assemble without writ, and then make the throne vacant; but, the throne being previously vacant by the king's abdication, they assembled without writ, as they must do if they assembled at all. Had the throne been full, their meeting would not have been regular; but, as it was really empty, such meeting became absolutely necessary. And accordingly it is declared by statute 1 W. & M., st. 1, c. 1 (Parliament, 1688), that this convention was really the two houses of parliament, notwithstanding the want of writs or other defects of form. So that, notwithstanding these two capital exceptions, which were justifiable only on a principle of necessity (and each of which, by the way, induced a revolution in the government), the rule laid down is in general certain, that the king, only, can convoke a parliament.

<sup>1</sup> Stat. 12 Car. II. c. 1 (Parliament, 1660).

<sup>2</sup> 1 Sid. 1.

§ 211. (3) Parliament convoked by the crown.—<sup>[153]</sup> And this by the ancient statutes of the realm,<sup>1</sup> he is bound to do every year, or oftener, if need be. Not that he is, or ever was, obliged by these statutes to call a new parliament every year; but only to permit a parliament to sit annually for the redress of grievances, and dispatch of business, if need be. These last words are so loose and vague, that such of our monarchs as were inclined to govern without parliaments, neglected the convoking them, sometimes for a very considerable period, under pretense that there was no need of them. But, to remedy this, by the statute 16 Car. II, c. 1 (Parliament, 1664), it is enacted, that the sitting and holding of parliaments shall not be intermitted above three years at the most. And by the statute 1 W. & M., st. 2, c. 2 (Bill of Rights, 1689), it is declared to be one of the rights of the people, that for redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently. And this indefinite frequency is again reduced to a certainty by statute 6 W. & M., c. 2 (Triennial, 1694), which enacts, as the statute of Charles the Second had done before, that a new parliament shall be called within three years<sup>m</sup> after the determination of the former.

<sup>1</sup> 4 Edw. III. c. 14 (Annual Parliaments, 1330). 36 Edw. III. c. 10 (Annual Parliaments, 1362).

§ 212. b. Constituent parts of parliament.—The constituent parts of a parliament are the next objects of our inquiry. And these are, the king's majesty, sitting there in his royal political capacity, and the three estates of the realm; the lords spiritual, the lords temporal (who sit together with the king in one house), and the commons, who sit by themselves in another.<sup>3</sup> And the king and these three estates, together, form the great corporation or body politic of the kingdom,<sup>n</sup> of which the king is said to be caput, principium et finis (the head, beginning and end). For <sup>m</sup> This is the same period that is allowed in Sweden for intermitting their general diets, or parliamentary assemblies. Mod. Un. Hist. xxxiii. 15.

<sup>n</sup> 4 Inst. 1, 2. Stat. 1 Eliz. c. 3 (Succession to the Crown, 1558). Hale of Parl. 1.

---

<sup>3</sup> The estates of the realm.—There can be no question, I suppose, that the three estates of the realm originally meant those that Blackstone mentions, and scarcely more that the lords spiritual and temporal had become so completely fused in one, even before the Reformation, that the spiritual lords have never since been able to vindicate a separate existence. In the seventh year of Henry VIII, it was holden that the presence of any spiritual lord was not essential to constitute a parliament. The reason given is that bishops have no place in parliament by means of their spiritual function, but only in respect of their temporal possessions or baronies; and, therefore, that the king might hold a parliament without any spiritual lords. (See Wooddesson, vol. 1, p. 22, and Blackstone's own note, p. *156, n. b, citing the same authority, Keilw. 184.) The final result of this gradual change will be recorded by some future annotator, or, not impossibly, in another edition.

A full explanation of the three estates, and their importance in English history, will be found in Stubbs' Const. History, par. 185, 186, vol. 2, p. 163. Gneist's Hist. of the Eng. Const. 2, 80, makes a purely fanciful division into lords, knights, and commons. But this division of Gneist's, as well as the attempt to fill up the traditional number of three estates, by making the king one of them (king, lords, and commons), is not only inconsistent with history, but with the very notion of an estate. The king could not be an estate of his own realm any more than he could hold an estate in land, in fee simple, upon their coming together the king meets them, either in person or by representation; without which there can be no beginning of a parliament;° and he also has alone the power of dissolving them.

§ 213. (1) The crown.—<sup>[154]</sup> It is highly necessary for preserving the balance of the constitution, that the executive power should be a branch, though not the whole, of the legislative. The total union of them, we have seen, would be productive of tyranny; the total disjunction of them, for the present, would in the end produce the same effects, by causing that union against which it seems to provide. The legislature would soon become tyrannical, by making continual encroachments, and gradually assuming to itself the rights of the executive power. Thus the long parliament of Charles the First, while it acted in a constitutional manner, with the royal concurrence, redressed many heavy grievances and established many salutary laws. But when the two houses assumed the power of legislation, in exclusion of the royal authority, they soon after assumed likewise the reins of administration; and, in consequence of these united powers, overturned both church and state, and established a worse oppression than any they pretended to remedy. To hinder, therefore, any such encroachments, the king is himself a part of the parliament: and, as this is the reason of his being so, very properly, therefore, the share of legislation, which the constitution has placed in the crown, consists in the power of rejecting rather than resolving; <sup>4</sup> this being sufficient to answer the end proposed. For we may apply to the royal negative, in this instance, what Cicero observes of the negative of the Roman tribunes, that the crown has not any power of doing wrong, but or otherwise, under his own suzerainty. The blunder is of no particular consequence, but spoils the distinctness of an important conception, which every student of the common law should strive to make as clear as possible. Those familiar with French history will find this conception illustrated in the discussion at the outbreak of the first revolution of the position of the Tiers Etat, as well as in the importance then attached to the union of the clergy and the nobles, which had preserved, till then, their distinct estates. (See Alison's History of Europe, c. 3, Am. reprint, 1, 72.)—HAMMOND.

° 4 Inst. 6.

---

<sup>4</sup> The king's right of veto has, in practice, been long since obsolete, not having been exercised since the reign of Queen Anne.

merely of preventing wrong from being done.<sup>p</sup> The crown cannot begin of itself any alterations in the present established law; but it may approve or disapprove of the alterations suggested and consented to by the two houses. The legislative, therefore, cannot abridge the executive power of any rights which it now has by law, without its own consent; since the law must perpetually stand as it now does, unless all the powers will agree to alter it. And herein, indeed, consists the true excellence of the English government, that all the parts of it form a mutual [155] check upon each other. In the legislature, the people are a check upon the nobility, and the nobility a check upon the people; by the mutual privilege of rejecting what the other has resolved: while the king is a check upon both, which preserves the executive power from encroachments. And this very executive power is again checked and kept within due bounds by the two houses, through the privilege they have of inquiring into, impeaching, and punishing the conduct (not indeed of the king,<sup>a</sup> which would destroy his constitutional independence; but, which is more beneficial to the public) of his evil and pernicious counselors. Thus every branch of our civil polity supports and is supported, regulates and is regulated, by the rest: for the two houses naturally drawing in two directions of opposite interest, and the prerogative in another still different from them both, they mutually keep each other from exceeding their proper limits; while the whole is prevented from separation, and artificially connected together by the mixed nature of the crown, which is a part of the legislative, and the sole executive magistrate. Like three distinct powers in mechanics, they jointly impel the machine of government in a direction different from what either, acting by itself, would have done; but at the same time in a direction partaking of each, and formed out of all; a direction which constitutes the true line of the liberty and happiness of the community.

Let us now consider these constituent parts of the sovereign power, or parliament, each in a separate view. The king's majesty will be the subject of the next, and many subsequent chapters, to which we must at present refer.

<sup>p</sup> Sulla—tribunis plebis sua lege injuriæ faciendæ potestatem ademit, auxilii ferendi reliquit. (Sulla, by his law, deprived the tribunes of the people of the power of doing injury, but left them that of protection.) De LL. 3. 9.

<sup>a</sup> Stat. 12 Car. II. c. 30 (Attainder of Persons Guilty of Murder of Chas. I.—1660).

§ 214. (2) House of lords. (a) Lords spiritual.—The next in order are the spiritual lords. These consist of two archbishops, and twenty-four bishops; and at the dissolution of monasteries by Henry VIII consisted likewise of twenty-six mitred abbots, and two priors: ' a very considerable body, and in those times equal in number to the temporal nobility.' All these hold, or are supposed to hold, certain [156] ancient baronies under the king: for William the Conqueror thought proper to change the spiritual tenure of frankalmoigne or free alms, under which the bishops held their lands during the Saxon government, into the feudal or Norman tenure by barony; which subjected their estates to all civil charges and assessments, from which they were before exempt: " and, in right of succession to those baronies, which were unalienable from their respective dignities, the bishops and abbots were allowed their seats in the house of lords.<sup>t</sup> But though these lords spiritual are in the eye of the law a distinct estate from the lords temporal, and are so distinguished in most of our acts of parliament, yet in practice they are usually blended together under the one name of the lords; they intermix in their votes; and the majority of such intermixture joins both estates. And from this want of a separate assembly and separate negative of the prelates, some writers have argued " very cogently, that the lords spiritual and temporal are now in reality only one estate: " which is unquestionably true in every effectual sense, though the ancient distinction between them still nominally continues. For if a bill should pass their house, there is no doubt of its validity, though every lord spiritual should vote against it; of which Selden * and Sir Edward Coke † gave many † Seld. Tit. Hon. 2. 5. 27.

• Co. Litt. 97.

■ Gilb. Hist. Exch. 55. Spelm. W. I. 291.

† Glanv. 7. 1. Co. Litt. 97. Seld. Tit. Hon. 2. 5. 19.

■ Whitelocke on Parliam. c. 72. Warburt. Alliance. b. 2. c. 3.

■ Dyer. 60.

* Baronege. p. 1. c. 6. The Act of Uniformity, 1 Eliz. c. 2 (1558) was passed with the dissent of all the bishops (Gibs. codex. 286); and therefore the style of lords spiritual is omitted throughout the whole.

† 2 Inst. 585, 6, 7. See Keilw. 184; where it is holden by the judges, 7 Hen. VIII (1515) that the king may hold a parliament without any spiritual lords. This was also exemplified in fact in the two first parliaments of Charles II.; wherein no bishops were summoned, till after the repeal of the statute 16 Car. I. c. 27 (Clergy, 1640) by statute 13 Car. II. st. 1. c. 2 (Clergy, 1661).

instances: as, on the other hand, I presume it would be equally good if the lords temporal present were inferior to the bishops in number, and every one of those temporal lords gave his vote to reject the bill; though Sir Edward Coke seems to doubt<sup>a</sup> whether this would not be an ordinance, rather than an act, of parliament.

§ 215. (b) Lords temporal.—<sup>[157]</sup> The lords temporal consist of all the peers of the realm (the bishops not being in strictness held to be such, but merely lords of parliament<sup>a</sup>) by whatever title of nobility distinguished; dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts, or barons; of which dignities we shall speak more hereafter. Some of these sit by descent, as do all ancient peers; some by creation, as do all new made ones; others, since the union with Scotland, by election, which is the case of the sixteen peers, who represent the body of the Scots nobility.<sup>5</sup> Their number is indefinite, and may be increased at will by the power of the crown: and once, in the reign of Queen Anne, there was an instance of creating no less than twelve together; in contemplation of which, in the reign of King George the First, a bill passed the house of lords, and was countenanced by the then ministry, for limiting the number of the peerage. This was thought by some to promise a great acquisition to the constitution, by restraining the prerogative from gaining the ascendant in that august assembly, by pouring in at pleasure an unlimited number of new created lords. But the bill was ill-relished and miscarried in the house of commons, whose leading members were then desirous to keep the avenues to the other house as open and easy as possible.<sup>6</sup>

§ 216. (c) Rank and honors in a state.—The distinction of rank and honors is necessary in every well-governed state: in order to reward such as are eminent for their services to the public, in a

<sup>a</sup> 4 Inst. 25.

<sup>a</sup> Staunford. P. C. 153.

---

<sup>5</sup> There are six Lords of Appeal in Ordinary of parliament, who sit during their lives.

<sup>6</sup> It was decided in the Wensleydale Peerage Case, debated in the year 1856, that the power of the crown does not extend to the creation of life members of the house of lords, except under the provisions of an act of parliament specifically authorizing such creation.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 474.

manner the most desirable to individuals, and yet without burden to the community : exciting thereby an ambitious yet laudable ardor, and generous emulation, in others. And emulation, or virtuous ambition, is a spring of action which, however dangerous or invidious in a mere republic or under a despotic sway, will certainly be attended with good effects under a free monarchy ; where, without destroying its existence, its excesses may be continually restrained by that superior power, from which all honor is derived. Such a spirit, when nationally diffused, gives life and vigor to the community ; it sets all the wheels of government in motion, [158] which under a wise regulator, may be directed to any beneficial purpose ; and thereby every individual may be made subservient to the public good, while he principally means to promote his own particular views.

§ 217. (d) Nobility in a state.—A body of nobility is also more peculiarly necessary in our mixed and compounded constitution, in order to support the rights of both the crown and the people, by forming a barrier to withstand the encroachments of both. It creates and preserves that gradual scale of dignity which proceeds from the peasant to the prince ; rising like a pyramid from a broad foundation, and diminishing to a point as it rises. It is this ascending and contracting proportion that adds stability to any government ; for when the departure is sudden from one extreme to another, we may pronounce that state to be precarious. The nobility, therefore, are the pillars, which are reared from among the people, more immediately to support the throne ; and, if that falls, they must also be buried under its ruins. Accordingly, when in the last century the commons had determined to extirpate monarchy, they also voted the house of lords to be useless and dangerous. And since titles of nobility are thus expedient in the state, it is also expedient that their owners should form an independent and separate branch of the legislature. If they were confounded with the mass of the people, and like them had only a vote in electing representatives, their privileges would soon be borne down and overwhelmed by the popular torrent, which would effectually level all distinctions. It is therefore highly necessary that the body of nobles should have a distinct assembly, distinct deliberations, and distinct powers from the commons.

§ 218. (3) The house of commons.—The commons consist of all such men of any property in the kingdom as have not seats in the house of lords; every one of which has a voice in parliament, either personally or by his representatives.

§ 219. (a) Principle of representation.—In a free state, every man, who is supposed a free agent, ought to be, in some measure, his own governor; and therefore a branch at least of the legislative power should reside in the whole body of the people. And this power, when the territories of the state are small and its citizens easily known, should be exercised by the people <sup>[159]</sup> in their aggregate or collective capacity, as was wisely ordained in the petty republics of Greece, and the first rudiments of the Roman state. But this will be highly inconvenient, when the public territory is extended to any considerable degree, and the number of citizens is increased. Thus when, after the social war, all the burghers of Italy, were admitted free citizens of Rome, and each had a vote in the public assemblies, it became impossible to distinguish the spurious from the real voter, and from that time all elections and popular deliberations grew tumultuous and disorderly; which paved the way for Marius and Sylla, Pompey and Cæsar, to trample on the liberties of their country, and at last to dissolve the commonwealth. In so large a state as ours it is therefore very wisely contrived, that the people should do that by their representatives, which it is impracticable to perform in person; representatives, chosen by a number of minute and separate districts, wherein all the voters are, or easily may be, distinguished. The counties are therefore represented by knights, elected by the proprietors of lands; the cities and boroughs are represented by citizens and burgesses, chosen by the mercantile part or supposed trading interest of the nation; much in the same manner as the burghers in the diet of Sweden are chosen by the corporate towns, Stockholm sending four, as London does with us, other cities two, and some only one.<sup>b</sup> The number of English representatives is 513, and of Scots 45; in all 558.<sup>7</sup> And every member, though chosen by one particular district, when elected and returned serves for the whole realm. For the end of his coming thither is not particular, but general; not barely to advantage his constituents, but the commonwealth; to advise his majesty (as appears from the writ of summons<sup>c</sup>) “de communi consilio super negotiis quibusdam arduis et urgentibus, regem, statum et defensionem regni Angliæ et ecclesiæ Anglicanæ concernentibus (concerning the common council upon certain difficult and urgent affairs relating to the king, the state, and defense of the kingdom of England and of the English church).” And therefore he is not bound, like a deputy in the united provinces, to consult with, or take the advice, of his constituents upon any particular point, unless he himself thinks it proper or prudent so to do.

<sup>b</sup> Mod. Un. Hist. xxxiii, 18.

<sup>7</sup> Representation in the house of commons.—Formerly the counties were represented by knights, and the cities and boroughs by citizens or burgesses;

§ 220. (4) Consent of all parts of parliament.—[160] These are the constituent parts of a parliament; the king, the lords, spiritual and temporal, and the commons. Parts, of which each is so necessary, that the consent of all three is required to make any new law that shall bind the subject. Whatever is enacted for law by one, or by two only, of the three is no statute; and to it no regard is due, unless in matters relating to their own privileges. For though, in the times of madness and anarchy, the commons once passed a vote,<sup>d</sup> “that whatever is enacted or declared for law by the commons in parliament assembled hath the force of law; and all the people of this nation are concluded thereby, although the

<sup>c</sup> 4 Inst. 14.

<sup>d</sup> 4 Jan. 1648.

---

but the distinction between the qualifications of knights and burgesses, which had long been merely social, has now entirely ceased, as a consequence of the assimilation of the county with the borough franchise, under the Representation of the People Act, 1884, and the Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885, and the repeal of the Property Qualification Act of 1710. (This statute required a “knight of the shire” to have an income of 600*l.* a year from land, and a “burgess” 300*l.* a year. It was repealed in 1858.) In addition, the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and London are represented by persons chosen by their respective graduates; as are also the Scottish universities, and the University of Dublin (Trinity College).

The aggregate number of members of the house of commons, under the Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885, is now 670; of whom 495 represent English, 72 Scottish, and 103 Irish constituencies.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 475.

consent and concurrence of the king or house of peers be not had thereto"; yet, when the constitution was restored in all its forms, it was particularly enacted by statute 13 Car. II, c. 1 (Treason, 1661), that if any person shall maliciously or advisedly affirm, that both or either of the houses of parliament have any legislative authority without the king, such person shall incur all the penalties of a præmunire.<sup>8</sup>

§ 221. c. Laws and customs of parliament.—We are next to examine the laws and customs relating to parliament, thus united together and considered as one aggregate body.

§ 222. (1) Supreme power of parliament.—The power and jurisdiction of parliament, says Sir Edward Coke,<sup>9</sup> is so tran-

• 4 Inst. 36.

---

<sup>8</sup> Changes introduced by the Parliament Act of 1911.—But, though the consent of the crown and both houses is still normally required for every legislative act, yet provision has recently been made for solving the difficulty which must inevitably arise, in the event of the two houses being strongly opposed to one another on a particular project. Thus, by the Parliament Act of 1911, it is enacted that, if a "Money Bill" (i. e., a legislative proposal certified by the speaker of the house of commons to be concerned only with taxation, the public debt, accounts, or finances generally, of the central government), after passing the commons and being sent to the house of lords for consideration, does not, during the following month of the parliamentary session, receive the assent of that house without amendment, it may be presented to the crown for the royal assent without it. And, with regard to public measures other than money bills, a similar provision is also contained in the Parliament Act; with the important modification, that the measure in question, before being presented to the crown, must have thrice passed the house of commons in three successive sessions, and have thrice in such sessions been rejected, or, at least, not passed without amendment, by the house of lords within one month of parliamentary session after it has been sent to that house. From this second provision, however, are excepted all measures proposing an extension of the maximum duration of a parliament beyond its present maximum of five years; while it is also provided that two years must elapse (if the act is to apply) between the second reading of the measure in the house of commons on the first occasion and the third reading on the third.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 476. See further, note 19, p. *170, post.

Penalties of præmunire.—The penalties of præmunire entailed forfeiture of lands and goods, imprisonment, and loss of all civil rights.

scendent and absolute, that it cannot be confined, either for causes or persons, within any bounds. And of this high court he adds, it may be truly said, "si antiquitatem spectes, est vetustissima; si dignitatem, est honoratissima; si jurisdictionem, est capacissima (if you consider its antiquity, it is most ancient; if its dignity, it is most honorable; if its jurisdiction, it is most extensive)." It hath sovereign and uncontrollable authority in making, confirming, enlarging, restraining, abrogating, repealing, reviving, and expounding of laws, concerning matters of all possible denominations, ecclesiastical, or temporal, civil, military, maritime, or criminal: this being the place where that absolute despotic power, which must in all governments reside somewhere, is entrusted by the constitution of these kingdoms. All mischiefs and <sup>[161]</sup>grievances, operations and remedies, that transcend the ordinary course of the laws, are within the reach of this extraordinary tribunal. It can regulate or new-model the succession to the crown; as was done in the reign of Henry VIII and William III. It can alter the established religion of the land; as was done in a variety of instances, in the reigns of King Henry VIII and his three children. It can change and create afresh even the constitution of the kingdom and of parliaments themselves; as was done by the act of union, and the several statutes for triennial and septennial elections. It can, in short, do everything that is not naturally impossible; and therefore some have not scrupled to call its power, by a figure rather too bold, the omnipotence of parliament.<sup>9</sup> True it is, that what the <sup>9</sup> Democratization of parliament.—"The omnipotence of parliament, which Bentham learned from Blackstone, might well, considered as an abstract doctrine, command the acquiescent admiration of the commentator. But the omnipotence of parliament—turned into a reality, and directed by bold reformers towards the removal of all actual or apparent abuses—might well alarm, not only adventurers who found in public life a lucrative as well as an honorable profession, but also statesmen, such as Pitt or Wilberforce, uninfluenced by any sinister interest. Parliamentary sovereignty, in short, taught as a theory by Blackstone and treated as a reality by Bentham, was an instrument well adapted for the establishment of democratic despotism. . . . Parliament under the progress of democracy became the representative, not of the middle classes, but of the whole body of householders; parliamentary sovereignty, therefore, came to mean, in the last resort, the unrestricted power of the wage-earners. English administrative mechanism was reformed and strengthened. The machinery was thus provided for the practical extension of the parliament doth, no authority upon earth can undo. So that it is a matter most essential to the liberties of this kingdom, that such members be delegated to this important trust, as are most eminent for their probity, their fortitude, and their knowledge; for it was a known apothegm of the great Lord Treasurer Burleigh, "that England could never be ruined but by a parliament": and, as Sir Matthew Hale observes,<sup>f</sup> this being the highest and greatest court, over which none other can have jurisdiction in the kingdom, if by any means a misgovernment should any way fall upon it, the subjects of this kingdom are left without all manner of remedy. To the same purpose the President Montesquieu, though I trust too hastily, presages; <sup>g</sup> that as Rome, Sparta, and Carthage have lost their liberty and perished, so the constitution of England will in time lose its liberty, will perish; it will perish whenever the legislative power shall become more corrupt than the executive.<sup>10</sup>

It must be owned that Mr. Locke,<sup>h</sup> and other theoretical writers, have held, that "there remains still inherent in the people a supreme power to remove or alter the legislative, when they find the legislative act contrary to the trust reposed in them: for, when such trust is abused, it is thereby [162] forfeited, and devolves to those who gave it." But however just this conclusion may be in theory, we cannot practically adopt it, nor take any legal steps for carrying it into execution, under any dispensation of government at present actually existing. For this devolution of power, to the people at large, includes in it a dissolution of the whole form

<sup>f</sup> Of Parliaments. 49.

<sup>h</sup> On Gov. p. 2. § 149. 227.

<sup>g</sup> Sp. L. 11. 6.

---

activity of the state; but, in accordance with the profound Spanish proverb, 'the more there is of the more the less there is of the less,' the greater the intervention of the government the less becomes the freedom of each individual citizen. Benthamites, it was then seen, had forged the arms most needed by socialists. Thus English collectivists have inherited from their utilitarian predecessors a legislative doctrine, a legislative instrument, and a legislative tendency pre-eminently suited for the carrying out of socialistic experiments." DICEY, Law and Opinion in England, 305, 310.

<sup>10</sup> This, as Professor A. V. Dicey says, is "the classical passage on the subject" of the unlimited legislative authority of parliament. For a highly informing discussion of this subject the reader is referred to the chapter entitled, "Nature of Parliamentary Sovereignty," in Dicey's "Law of the Constitution."

of government established by that people; reduces all the members to their original state of equality; and, by annihilating the sovereign power, repeals all positive laws whatsoever before enacted. No human laws will therefore suppose a case, which at once must destroy all law, and compel men to build afresh upon a new foundation; nor will they make provision for so desperate an event, as must render all legal provisions ineffectual.<sup>1</sup> So long, therefore, as the English constitution lasts, we may venture to affirm, that the power of parliament is absolute and without control.

§ 223. (2) Qualification of members.—In order to prevent the mischiefs that might arise, by placing this extensive authority in hands that are either incapable, or else improper, to manage it, it is provided by the custom and law of parliament,<sup>1</sup> that no one shall sit or vote in either house, unless he be twenty-one years of age. This is also expressly declared by statute 7 & 8 W. III, c. 25 (Parliamentary Elections, 1696), with regard to the house of commons; doubts have arisen, from some contradictory adjudications, whether or no a minor was incapacitated from sitting in that house.<sup>2</sup> It is also enacted by statute 7 Jac. I, c. 6 (Oath of Allegiance, 1609), that no member be permitted to enter the house of commons, till he hath taken the oath of allegiance before the lord steward or his deputy: and by 30 Car. II, st. 2 (Parliament, 1678), and 1 Geo. I, c. 13 (Succession to the Crown, 1714), that no member shall vote or sit in either house, till he hath in the presence of the house taken the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, and subscribed and repeated the declaration against transubstantiation, and invocation of saints, and the sacrifice of the mass. Aliens, unless naturalized, were likewise by the law of parliament incapable to serve therein:<sup>1</sup> and now it is enacted by statute 12 & 13 W. III, c. 2 (Act of Settlement, 1700), that no alien, [1693] even though he be naturalized, shall be capable of being a member of either house of parliament. And there are not only these standing incapacities; but if any person is made

<sup>1</sup> See page *244.

<sup>2</sup> Whitlocke. c. 50. 4 Inst. 47.

<sup>3</sup> Com. Journ. 16 Dec. 1690.

<sup>4</sup> Com. Journ. 10 Mar. 1623. 18 Febr. 1625.

a peer by the king, or elected to serve in the house of commons by the people, yet may the respective houses upon complaint of any crime in such person, and proof thereof, adjudge him disabled and incapable to sit as a member:<sup>m</sup> and this by the law and custom of parliament.

§ 224. (3) Jurisdiction of each house over its own affairs.—

For, as every court of justice hath laws and customs for its direction, some the civil and canon, some the common law, others their own peculiar laws and customs, so the high court of parliament hath also its own peculiar law, called the lex et consuetudo parliamenti (the law and custom of parliament): a law which Sir Edward Coke<sup>n</sup> observes, is “ab omnibus quærenda, a multis ignorata, a paucis cognita (to be sought by all, unknown to many, known by few).” It will not, therefore, be expected that we should enter into the examination of this law, with any degree of minuteness: since, as the same learned author assures us,<sup>o</sup> it is much better to be learned out of the rolls of parliament, and other records, and by precedents, and continual experience, than can be expressed by any one man. It will be sufficient to observe, that the whole of the law and custom of parliament has its original from this one maxim, “that whatever matter arises concerning either house of parliament, ought to be examined, discussed, and adjudged in that house to which it relates, and not elsewhere.”<sup>p</sup> Hence, for instance, the lords will not suffer the commons to interfere in settling the election of a peer of Scotland; the commons will not allow the lords to judge of the election of a burgess; nor will either house permit the subordinate courts of law to examine the merits of either case. But the maxims upon which they proceed, together with the method of proceeding, rest entirely in the breast of the parliament itself; and are not defined and ascertained by any particular stated laws.

<sup>m</sup> Whitelocke of Parl. c. 102. See Lord’s Journ. 3 May 1620. 13 May 1624. 26 May 1825. Com. Journ. 14 Feb. 1580. 21 Jun. 1628. 9 Nov. 21. Jan. 1640. 6 Mar. 1676. 6 Mar. 1711. 17 Feb. 1769.

<sup>n</sup> 1 Inst. 11.

<sup>o</sup> 4 Inst. 50.

<sup>p</sup> 4 Inst. 15.

§ 225. (4) Privileges of parliament.—<sup>[164]</sup> The privileges of parliament are likewise very large and indefinite.* And therefore when in 31 Hen. VI (1452), the house of lords propounded a question to the judges concerning them, the chief justice, Sir John Fortescue, in the name of his brethren, declared, “that they ought not to make answer to that question: for it hath not been used aforetime that the justices should in any wise determine the privileges of the high court of parliament. For it is so high and mighty in its nature, that it may make law; and that which is law, it may make no law: and the determination and knowledge of that privilege belongs to the lords of parliament, and not to the justices.”<sup>11</sup> Privilege of parliament was principally established, in order to protect its members not only from being molested by their fellow-subjects, but also more especially from being oppressed by the power of the crown. If, therefore, all the privileges of parliament were once to be set down and ascertained, and no privilege to be allowed but what was so defined and determined, it were easy for the executive power to devise some new case, not within the line of privilege, and under pretense thereof to harass any refractory member and violate the freedom of parliament. The dignity and independence of the two houses are therefore in great measure preserved by keeping their privileges indefinite.

§ 226. (a) Privileges of members.—Some, however, of the more notorious privileges of the members of either house are, privilege of speech, of person, of their domestics, and of their lands

* Third and previous editions contained this in addition, “which has occasioned an observation that the principal privilege of parliament consisted in this, that its privileges were not certainly known to any but the parliament itself.”

<sup>1</sup> Seld. Baronage. part. 1. c. 4.

---

<sup>11</sup> Lord Holt, however, expressed the opinion “that the authority of parliament being from the law is circumscribed by the law; and if the privilege is exceeded, the act is wrongful equally with the act of a private individual.” Reg. v. Paty (1705), 2 Ld. Raym. 1114. This has been approved in Stockdale v. Hansard (1839), 9 Ad. & E. 1; (1840) 11 Ad. & E. 253; Howard v. Gossett (1845), 10 Q. B. 359.

and goods.<sup>12</sup> As to the first, privilege of speech, it is declared by the statute 1 W. & M., st. 2, c. 2 (Bill of Rights, 1689), as one of the liberties of the people, "that the freedom of speech, and debates, and proceedings in parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of parliament." And this freedom of speech is particularly demanded of the king in person, by the speaker of the house of commons, at the opening of every new parliament. So, likewise, are the other privileges, of person, servants, lands, and goods: which are immunities as ancient as Edward the Confessor; in whose laws<sup>r</sup> we find this precept, "ad synodos venientibus, sive summoniti [<sup>165</sup>] sint, sive per se quid agendum habuerint, sit summa pax (let there be perfect security to those coming to the synods; whether summoned or coming on their own business)"; and so, too, in the old Gothic constitutions, "extenditur hæc pax et securitas ad quatuordecim dies, convocato regni senatu (this freedom from molestation is extended to fourteen days from the assembling of the senate of the kingdom.)"• This included formerly not only privilege from illegal violence, but also from legal arrests, and seizures by process from the courts of law. And still, to assault by violence a member of either house, or his menial servants, is a high contempt of parliament, and there punished with the utmost severity. It has likewise peculiar penalties annexed to it in the courts of law, by the statutes 5 Hen. IV, c. 6 (Privilege of Parliament, 1403), and 11 Hen. VI, c. 11 (Privilege of Parliament, 1433). Neither can any member of either house be arrested and taken into custody without a breach of the privilege of parliament.

But all other privileges, which derogate from the common law, are now at an end, save only as to the freedom of the member's person: which in a peer (by the privilege of peerage) is forever sacred and inviolable; and in a commoner (by the privilege of parliament) for forty days after every prorogation, and forty

<sup>r</sup> Cap. 3.

• Steirnh, de Jure Goth. l. 3. c. 3.

---

<sup>12</sup> Privileges of domestics, lands, and goods were taken away by 10 Geo. III, c. 50 (Parliament Privilege, 1770).

days before the next appointed meeting; <sup>t 13</sup> which is now in effect as long as the parliament subsists, it seldom being prorogued for more than fourscore days at a time. As to all other privileges, which obstruct the ordinary course of justice, they were restrained by the statutes 12 W. III, c. 3 (Parliamentary Privilege, 1700), 2 & 3 Ann., c. 18 (1703), and 11 Geo. II, c. 24 (Parliamentary Privilege, 1737), and are now totally abolished by statute 10 Geo. III, c. 50 (Parliamentary Privilege, 1770), which enacts, that any suit may at any time be brought against any peer or member of parliament, their servants, or any other person entitled to privilege of parliament; which shall not be impeached or delayed by pretense of any such privilege; except that the person of a member of the house of commons shall not thereby be subjected to any arrest or imprisonment.<sup>14</sup> Likewise, for the benefit of commerce, it is provided by statute 4 Geo. III, c. 33 (Bankrupts, 1764), that any trader, having privilege of parliament, may be served with legal process for any just debt (to the amount of 100*l.*), and unless he makes satisfaction within two months, it shall <sup>[166]</sup> be deemed an act of bankruptcy; and that commissions of bankrupt may be issued against such privileged traders, in like manner as against any other.

§ 227. (b) Writ of privilege.—The only way by which courts of justice could anciently take cognizance of privilege of parlia-t 2 Lev. 72.

---

<sup>13</sup> Blackstone's statement is criticised in Hoppin v. Jenckes, 8 R. I. 453, 459, where it is shown that this privilege was for a convenient or reasonable, and not for a period of forty days; and it was held that the privilege of a member of Congress under the constitution does not extend to forty days and more, but is limited to a reasonable time for going and returning.—HAMMOND.

<sup>14</sup> Editions previous to the fifth read, "Immediately after the dissolution or prorogation of the parliament, or adjournment of the houses for above a fortnight; and during these recesses a peer or member of the house of commons, may be sued like an ordinary subject, and in consequence of such suits may be dispossessed of his lands and goods. In these cases the king has also his prerogative: he may sue for his debts, though not arrest the person of a member, during the sitting of parliament; and by statute 2 & 3 Ann., c. 18 (1703), a member may be sued during the sitting of parliament for any misdemeanor or breach of trust in a public office."—HAMMOND.

ment was by writ of privilege, in the nature of a supersedeas (that you forbear. A command to stay or forbear doing that which ought not to be done), to deliver the party out of custody when arrested in a civil suit.<sup>u</sup> For when a letter was written by the speaker to the judges, to stay proceedings against a privileged person, they rejected it, as contrary to their oath of office.<sup>v</sup> But since the statute 12 W. III, c. 3 (Parliamentary Privilege, 1700), which enacts, that no privileged person shall be subject to arrest or imprisonment, it hath been held that such arrest is irregular ab initio (from the beginning), and that the party may be discharged upon motion.<sup>w</sup> It is to be observed, that there is no precedent of any such writ of privilege, but only in civil suits; and that the statute of 1 Jac. I, c. 13 (Execution, 1604), and that of King William (which remedy some inconveniences arising from privilege of parliament) speak only of civil actions. And therefore the claim of privilege hath been usually guarded with an exception as to the case of indictable crimes;<sup>x</sup> or, as it hath been frequently expressed, of treason, felony, and breach (or surety) of the peace.<sup>y</sup>

§ 228. (c) No privilege in crimes.—Whereby it seems to have been understood that no privilege was allowable to the members, their families, or servants, in any crime whatsoever; for all crimes are treated by the law as being contra pacem domini regis (against the king's peace). And instances have not been wanting, wherein privileged persons have been convicted of misdemeanors, and committed, or prosecuted to outlawry, even in the middle of a session;<sup>z</sup> which proceeding has afterwards received the sanction and approbation of parliament.<sup>a</sup> To which may be added, that, a few years ago, the case of writing and publishing seditious libels was resolved by both <sup>[167]</sup> houses<sup>b</sup> not to be entitled to privileges; and that the reasons, upon which that case proceeded,<sup>c</sup> extended equally to

<sup>u</sup> Dyer 59. 4 Pryn. Brev. Parl. 757.

<sup>v</sup> Latch. 48. Noy. 83.

<sup>w</sup> Stra. 989.

<sup>x</sup> Com. Journ. 17 Aug. 1641.

<sup>y</sup> 4 Inst. 25. Com. Journ. 20 May 1675.

<sup>z</sup> Mich. 16 Edw. IV. in Scaccb.—Lord Raym. 1461.

<sup>a</sup> Com. Journ. 16 May 1726.

<sup>b</sup> Com. Journ. 24 Nov. Lord's Journ. 29 Nov. 1763.

<sup>c</sup> Lord's Protest. Ibid.

every indictable offense. So that the chief, if not the only, privilege of parliament, in such cases, seems to be the right of receiving immediate information of the imprisonment or detention of any member, with the reason for which he is detained: a practice that is daily used upon the slightest military accusations, preparatory to a trial by a court-martial;<sup>4</sup> and which is recognized by the several temporary statutes for suspending the habeas corpus act;<sup>5</sup> whereby it is provided, that no member of either house shall be detained, till the matter of which he stands suspected be first communicated to the house of which he is a member, and the consent of the said house be obtained for his commitment or detaining. But yet the usage has uniformly been, ever since the revolution, that the communication has been subsequent to the arrest.<sup>15</sup>

These are the general heads of the laws and customs relating to parliament, considered as one aggregate body. We will next proceed to § 229. d. Privileges of the lords.—The laws and customs relating to the house of lords in particular. These, if we exclude their judicial capacity, which will be more properly treated of in the third and fourth books of these Commentaries, will take up but little of our time.

<sup>4</sup> Com. Journ. 20 Apr. 1761.

<sup>5</sup> Particularly 17 Geo. II. c. 6 (Conspiracy, 1743).

---

<sup>15</sup> Parliamentary privilege.—In addition to the privileges of freedom of speech and of freedom from arrest, the right of parliament freely to publish its own reports, papers, votes, and other proceedings, is now specially protected by statute. For it has been provided by the Parliamentary Papers Act, 1840, that anyone sued or prosecuted on account of the publication of such matters by authority of either house, may have the proceedings against him stayed, and all process therein superseded, on production to the court of a proper certificate of such authority; and that no person shall be liable to any civil or criminal proceeding for printing extracts from, or abstracts of, parliamentary documents, provided he can show that he did so bona fide and without malice. It is moreover clearly settled, that in any case in which the privileges of either house of parliament have been violated, that house has power to commit to prison the person guilty of such contempt; and also, by its order, to set at liberty anyone who, in breach of its privileges, has been arrested in respect of any act by him done in his capacity of member of parliament.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 482.

One very ancient privilege is that declared by the charter of the forest,<sup>f</sup> confirmed in parliament 9 Hen. III (1225); viz., that every lord spiritual or temporal summoned to parliament, and passing through the king's forests, may, both in going and returning, kill one or two of the king's deer without warrant; in view of the forester if he be present, or in blowing a horn if he be absent: that he may not seem to take the king's venison by stealth.

[168] In the next place they have a right to be attended, and constantly are, by the judges of the court of king's bench and common pleas, and such of the barons of the exchequer as are of the degree of the coif, or have been made sergeants at law; as likewise by the king's learned counsel, being sergeants, and by the matters of the court of chancery; for their advice in point of law, and for the greater dignity of their proceedings.<sup>16</sup> The secretaries of state, with the attorney and solicitor general, were also used to attend the house of peers, and have to this day (together with the judges, etc.) their regular writs of summons issued out at the beginning of every parliament,<sup>g</sup> ad tractandum et consilium impendendum (for consulting and giving advice), though not ad consentiendum (for consenting): but, whenever of late years they have been members of the house of commons,<sup>h</sup> their attendance here hath fallen into disuse.

Another privilege is, that every peer, by license obtained from the king, may make another lord of parliament his proxy, to vote for him in his absence.<sup>i</sup> A privilege which a member of the

<sup>f</sup> C. 11.

<sup>g</sup> Stat. 31 Hen. VIII. c. 10. (Parliament (Precedence) 1539.) Smith's Commonw. b. 2. c. 3. Moor. 551. 4 Inst. 4. Hale of Parl. 140.

<sup>h</sup> See Com. Journ. 11 Apr. 1614. 8 Feb. 1620. 10 Feb. 1625. 4 Inst. 48.

<sup>i</sup> Seld. Baronage. p. 1. c. 1.

---

<sup>16</sup> The house of lords, in the exercise of their appellate jurisdiction, have the right to request the opinion of the judges, on points of law upon the question before them for their determination. The power of summoning the judges, however, has been exercised only twice since the passage of the Judicature Act of 1873, namely, in the cases of Dalton v. Angus, [1881] 6 App. Cas. 740, and Allen v. Flood, [1898] App. Cas. 1.

other house can by no means have, as he is himself but a proxy for a multitude of other people.<sup>17</sup>

Each peer has also a right, by leave of the house, when a vote passes contrary to his sentiments, to enter his dissent on the journals of the house, with the reasons for such dissent; which is usually styled his protest.

All bills likewise, that may in their consequences any way affect the rights of the peerage, are by the custom of parliament to have their first rise and beginning in the house of peers, and to suffer no changes or amendments in the house of commons.<sup>18</sup>

There is also one statute peculiarly relative to the house of lords, 6 Ann., c. 23 (1706), which regulates the election of the [169] sixteen representative peers of North Britain, in consequence of the twenty-second and twenty-third articles of the union: and for that purpose prescribes the oath, etc., to be taken by the electors; directs the mode of balloting; prohibits the peers electing from being attended in an unusual manner; and expressly provides, that no other matter shall be treated of in that assembly, save only the election, on pain of incurring a præmunire.

§ 230. e. Privileges of the commons.—The peculiar laws and customs of the house of commons relate principally to the raising of taxes, and the elections of members to serve in parliament.

§ 231. (1) In respect to money bills.—First, with regard to taxes: it is the ancient indisputable privilege and right of the house of commons, that all grants of subsidies or parliamentary aids do begin in their house, and are first bestowed by them;<sup>1</sup> although

<sup>1</sup> 4 Inst. 12.

<sup>1</sup> 4 Inst. 29.

---

<sup>17</sup> Proxies in the house of lords.—By the rules of the house, no proxy might vote on a question of guilty or not guilty; and only a spiritual lord could be proxy for a spiritual lord, and a temporal lord for a temporal lord. Since 1868 even this privilege has been discontinued, and all votes are given in person.

<sup>18</sup> It is said by Edward Jenks, Esq., in the sixteenth edition of Stephen's Commentaries (II, 484 n.), that "Blackstone gives no authority for this remarkable statement, which has not been followed in modern practice. (See May, Parliamentary Practice, 11th ed., p. 460.)" their grants are not effectual to all intents and purposes, until they have the assent of the other two branches of the legislature. The general reason, given for this exclusive privilege of the house of commons, is, that the supplies are raised upon the body of the people, and therefore it is proper that they alone should have the right of taxing themselves. This reason would be unanswerable, if the commons taxed none but themselves: but it is notorious, that a very large share of property is in the possession of the house of lords; that this property is equally taxable, and taxed, as the property of the commons; and therefore the commons not being the sole persons taxed, this cannot be the reason of their having the sole right of raising and modeling the supply. The true reason, arising from the spirit of our constitution, seems to be this. The lords being a permanent hereditary body, created at pleasure by the king, are supposed more liable to be influenced by the crown, and when once influenced to continue so, than the commons, who are a temporary elective body, freely nominated by the people. It would therefore be extremely dangerous to give the lords any power of framing new taxes for the subject: it is sufficient that they have a power of rejecting, if they think the commons too lavish or impro- [170] vident in their grants. But so reasonably jealous are the commons of this valuable privilege, that herein they will not suffer the other house to exert any power but that of rejecting; they will not permit the least alteration or amendment to be made by the lords to the mode of taxing the people by a money bill; under which appellation are included all bills, by which money is directed to be raised upon the subject, for any purpose or in any shape whatsoever; either for the exigencies of government, and collected from the kingdom in general, as the land tax; or for private benefit, and collected in any particular district, as by turnpikes, parish rates, and the like. Yet Sir Matthew Hale<sup>m</sup> mentions one case, founded on the practice of parliament in the reign of Henry VI,<sup>n</sup> wherein he thinks the lords may alter a money bill: and that is, if the commons grant a tax, as that of tonnage and poundage, for four years; and the lords alter it to a less time, as for two years; here, he says, the bill need not be sent back to the commons for their concurrence, but may receive the royal assent without further ceremony; for the alteration of the lords is consistent with the grant of the commons. But such an experiment will hardly be repeated by the lords, under the present improved idea of the privilege of the house of commons, and, in any case where a money bill is remanded to the commons, all amendments in the mode of taxation are sure to be rejected.<sup>19</sup>

<sup>m</sup> On parliaments. 65, 66.

<sup>n</sup> Year-Book, 33 Hen. VI. 17 (1454). But see the answer to this case by Sir Heneage Finch. Com. Journ. 22 Apr. 1671.

§ 232. (2) In election of members.—Next, with regard to the elections of knights, citizens, and burgesses; we may observe, that

<sup>19</sup> The Parliament Act of 1911.—From the year 1861 to the year 1909, the alleged power of the lords even to reject a money bill was not exercised; and an attempt to insist upon it in the latter year led, after a general election, to the passing of the Parliament Act, 1911, under which (note 8, p. *160, supra), the power of the house of lords to reject, amend, or even seriously to delay a money bill, has been formally abolished.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 486.

The Parliament Act, 1911, is so significant of tendencies and so far-reaching in its effect, that the main portions are given here:

“THE PARLIAMENT ACT, 1911.

“An Act to make provision with respect to the powers of the House of Lords in relation to those of the House of Commons, and to limit the duration of Parliament. [18th August, 1911.]

“Whereas it is expedient that provision should be made for regulating the relations between the two Houses of Parliament:

“And whereas it is intended to substitute for the House of Lords as it at present exists a Second Chamber constituted on a popular instead of hereditary basis, but such substitution cannot be immediately brought into operation:

“And whereas provision will require hereafter to be made by Parliament in a measure effecting such substitution for limiting and defining the powers of the new Second Chamber, but it is expedient to make such provision as in this Act appears for restricting the existing powers of the House of Lords:

“Be it therefore enacted by the King’s most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

“Powers of House of Lords as to Money Bills.—1. (1) If a Money Bill, having been passed by the House of Commons, and sent up to the House of Lords at least one month before the end of the Session, is not passed by the House of Lords without amendment within one month after it is so sent up to herein consists the exercise of the democratical part of our constitution: for in a democracy there can be no exercise of sovereignty but by suffrage, which is the declaration of the people's will. In all democracies, therefore, it is of the utmost importance to regulate by whom, and in what manner, the suffrages are to be given. And the Athenians were so justly jealous of this prerogative, that a stranger, who interfered in the assemblies of the people, was punished by their laws with death: because such a man was esteemed guilty of high treason, by <sup>[171]</sup> usurping those rights of sovereignty, to which he had no title. In England, where the people do not debate in a collective body but by representation, the exercise of this sovereignty consists in the choice of representatives. The laws have therefore very strictly guarded against that House, the Bill shall, unless the House of Commons direct to the contrary, be presented to His Majesty and become an Act of Parliament on the Royal Assent being signified, notwithstanding that the House of Lords have not consented to the Bill."

Paragraph 2 defines a "money bill." Paragraph 3 requires the certificate of the speaker of the house of commons that the bill is a money bill.

"Restriction of the Powers of the House of Lords as to Bills other than Money Bills.—2. (1) If any Public Bill (other than a Money Bill or a Bill containing any provision to extend the maximum duration of Parliament beyond five years) is passed by the House of Commons in three successive sessions (whether of the same Parliament or not), and, having been sent up to the House of Lords at least one month before the end of the session, is rejected by the House of Lords in each of those sessions, that Bill shall, on its rejection for the third time by the House of Lords, unless the House of Commons direct to the contrary, be presented to His Majesty and become an Act of Parliament on the Royal Assent being signified thereto, notwithstanding that the House of Lords have not consented to the Bill: Provided that this provision shall not take effect unless two years have elapsed between the date of the second reading in the first of those sessions of the Bill in the House of Commons and the date on which it passes the House of Commons in the third of those sessions."

Paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 provide details for the carrying out of paragraph 1.

"Certificate of Speaker.—3. Any certificate of the Speaker of the House of Commons given under this Act shall be conclusive for all purposes, and shall not be questioned in any court of law.

"Enacting words.—4. (1) In every Bill presented to His Majesty under the preceding provisions of this Act, the words of enactment shall be as follows, that is to say:

"Be it enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, in usurpation or abuse of this power, by many salutary provisions; which may be reduced to these three points: 1. The qualifications of the electors. 2. The qualifications of the elected. 3. The proceedings at elections.

§ 233. (a) Qualifications of electors.—As to the qualifications of the electors. The true reason of requiring any qualification, with regard to property, in voters, is to exclude such persons as are in so mean a situation that they are esteemed to have no will of their own. If these persons had votes, they would be tempted to dispose of them under some undue influence or other. This would give a great, an artful, or a wealthy man, a larger share in elections than is consistent with general liberty. If it were probable that every man would give his vote freely and without influence of any kind, then, upon the true theory and genuine principles of liberty, every member of the community, however poor, should have a vote in electing those delegates, to whose charge is committed the disposal of his property, his liberty, and his life. But, since that can hardly be expected in persons of indigent fortunes, or such as are under the immediate dominion of others, all popular states have been obliged to establish certain qualifications; whereby some, who are suspected to have no will of their own, are excluded accordance with the provisions of the Parliament Act, 1911, and by authority of the same, as follows.’

“(2) Any alteration of a Bill necessary to give effect to this section shall not be deemed to be an amendment of the Bill.

“Provisional Order Bills excluded.—5. In this Act the expression ‘Public Bill’ does not include any Bill for confirming a Provisional Order.

“Saving for existing rights and privileges of the House of Commons.—6. Nothing in this Act shall diminish or qualify the existing rights and privileges of the House of Commons.

“Duration of Parliament, 1 Geo. I, stat. 2, c. 38.—7. Five years shall be substituted for seven years as the time fixed for the maximum duration of Parliament under the Septennial Act, 1715.

“Short title.—8. This Act may be cited as the Parliament Act, 1911.”

An interesting essay on the import of the Parliament Act of 1911 is that by Professor A. V. Dicey, entitled “The Parliament Act, 1911, and the Destruction of all Constitutional Safeguards,” published in a little volume, “Rights of Citizenship,” London and New York, 1912. The text of the Parliament Act of 1911 is published at the end of the volume mentioned.

from voting, in order to set other individuals, whose wills may be supposed independent, more thoroughly upon a level with each other.

And this constitution of suffrages is framed upon a wiser principle, with us, than either of the methods of voting, by centuries or by tribes, among the Romans. In the method by centuries, instituted by Servius Tullius, it was principally property, and not numbers, that turned the scale: in the method by tribes, gradually introduced by the tribunes of the people, numbers only were regarded, and property entirely overlooked. Hence the laws passed by the former method had <sup>[172]</sup> usually too great a tendency to aggrandize the patricians or rich nobles; and those by the latter had too much of a leveling principle. Our constitution steers between the two extremes. Only such are entirely excluded, as can have no will of their own: there is hardly a free agent to be found, who is not entitled to a vote in some place or other in the kingdom. Nor is comparative wealth, or property, entirely disregarded in elections; for though the richest man has only one vote at one place, yet, if his property be at all diffused, he has probably a right to vote at more places than one, and therefore has many representatives. This is the spirit of our constitution: not that I assert it is in fact quite so perfect<sup>na</sup> as I have here endeavored to describe it; for, if any alteration might be wished or suggested in the present frame of parliaments, it should be in favor of a more complete representation of the people.

§ 234. (i) Electors of knights of the shire.—But to return to our qualifications; and first those of electors for knights of the shire. 1. By statute 8 Hen. VI, c. 7 (Parliament, 1429), and 10 Hen. VI, c. 2 (Parliament, 1432) (amended by 14 Geo. III, c. 58)

<sup>na</sup> The candid and intelligent reader will apply this observation to many other parts of the work before him, wherein the constitution of our laws and government are represented as nearly approaching to perfection; without descending to the invidious task of pointing out such deviations and corruptions, as length of time and a loose state of national morals have too great a tendency to produce. The incurvations of practice are then the most notorious when compared with the rectitude of the rule; and to elucidate the clearness of the spring, conveys the strongest satire on those who have polluted or disturbed it.

(Parliamentary Elections, 1774), the knights of the shire shall be chosen of people, whereof every man shall have freehold to the value of forty shillings by the year within the county; which (by subsequent statutes) is to be clear of all charges and deductions, except parliamentary and parochial taxes. The knights of shires are the representatives of the landholders, or landed interest of the kingdom: their electors must therefore have estates in lands or tenements within the county represented: these estates must be freehold, that is, for term of life at least; because beneficial leases for long terms of years were not in use at the making of these statutes, and copyholders were then little better than villeins, absolutely dependent upon their lords: this freehold must be of forty shillings annual value; because that [173] sum would then, with proper industry, furnish all the necessaries of life and render the freeholder, if he pleased, an independent man. For Bishop Fleetwood, in his chronicon preciosum, written at the beginning of the present century, has fully proved forty shillings in the reign of Henry VI to have been equal to twelve pounds per annum in the reign of Queen Anne; and, as the value of money is very considerably lowered since the bishop wrote, I think we may fairly conclude, from this and other circumstances, that what was equivalent to twelve pounds in his days is equivalent to twenty at present. The other less important qualifications of the electors for counties in England and Wales may be collected from the statutes cited in the margin;° which direct, 2. That no person under twenty-one years of age shall be capable of voting for any member. This extends to all sorts of members as well for boroughs as counties; as does also the next, viz.: 3. That no person convicted of perjury or subornation of perjury shall be capable of voting in any election. 4. That no person shall vote in right of any freehold, granted to him fraudulently to qualify him to vote. Fraudulent grants are such as contain an agreement to reconvey, or to defeat the estate granted; which agreements are made void, and the estate is absolutely vested in the person to whom it is so granted. And, to guard the better against such frauds, it is further provided, 5. That every voter shall have been in the actual possession, or receipt of the profits, of his freehold to his own use for twelve calendar months before; except it came to him by descent, marriage, marriage settlement, will, or promotion to a benefice or office. 6. That no person shall vote in respect of an annuity or rent charge, unless registered with the clerk of the peace twelve calendar months before. 7. That in mortgaged or trust estates, the person in possession, under the above-mentioned restrictions, shall have the vote. 8. That only one person shall be admitted to vote for any one house or tenement, to prevent the splitting of freeholds. 9. That no estate shall qualify a voter, unless the estate has been assessed to some land tax aid, at least twelve months before the [174] election. 10. That no tenant by copy of court roll shall be permitted to vote as a freeholder. Thus much for the electors in counties.<sup>20</sup>

° 7 & 8 W. III. c. 25 (Parliamentary Elections, 1696). 10 Ann. c. 23 (1711). 2 Geo. II. c. 21 (1728). 18 Geo. II. c. 18 (Parliamentary Elections, 1744). 31 Geo. II. c. 14 (Parliamentary Elections, 1757). 3 Geo. III. c. 24 (Parliamentary Elections, 1762).

<sup>20</sup> The franchise under modern English legislation.—The knights of shires, that is to say, the members for counties, were for long considered to be peculiarly representative of the landed interest; and their electors were, down to the second quarter of the nineteenth century, required to have estates in lands or tenements within the county represented, and also, until the requirement was abolished by the 14 Geo. III (1774), c. 58, to be resident within that county. An estate of the value of 40s. per annum of free tenure, in which the voter had also a freehold interest, was from 1430 the invariable qualification for the franchise. And the law so continued until the year 1832, when, by the Representation of the People Act, 1832 (commonly called the "Reform Act"), the property vote in the counties was amended by the abolition of the forty shilling freehold franchise, unless acquired by settlement or devise, or for an estate of inheritance. The same act admitted, however, a general landed property franchise (freehold, copyhold, or long leasehold) of the annual value of ten pounds, and an occupation or short leasehold franchise of fifty pounds a year. The Reform Act of 1867 reduced the property qualification in the counties from ten pounds to five, and the occupation franchise from fifty pounds to twelve; while the Reform Act of 1884 introduced into the counties the residential and the ten pound lodger franchise. * * *

The ancient borough franchise, as it stood on the eve of the Reform Act, 1832, was a mass of anomalies and inconsistencies, due chiefly to the fact that the parliamentary qualification had become mixed up with the municipal qualification in chartered boroughs, which varied almost in each case. There was nothing of the uniformity of the county forty shilling franchise; except, perhaps, in those few instances in which the borough was governed as a county. In the others, the anomalies and complexities were not only the cause of frequent disputes and contested elections; they directly favored the acquisition of § 235. (ii) Electors of burgesses.—As for the electors of citizens and burgesses, these are supposed to be the mercantile part or trading interest of this kingdom. But as trade is of a fluctuating nature, and seldom long fixed in a place, it was formerly left to the crown to summon, pro re nata (according to circumstances), the most flourishing towns to send representatives to parliament. So that as towns increased in trade, and grew populous, they were admitted to a share in the legislature.<sup>21</sup> But the misfortune is, corrupt influence by wealthy patrons. In other words, they were the chief elements in the system of “close” or “rotten” boroughs.

The Reform Act of 1832, subject to a due regard to vested interests, swept away the whole mass of these anomalies, and substituted therefor a simple and uniform ten pound occupation franchise; while the act of 1867 added the resident household and lodger franchises, much on the lines that we have described above in speaking of the county franchise. But neither of these acts introduced the property franchise into the boroughs, where, therefore, it has no place; except in the anomalous “counties of towns” and “counties of cities” (see p. *120). * * *

In distinguishing between these various classes of franchise, the chief care of the student should be to note carefully the differences, not always easy to grasp, between the three processes of occupation, residence or inhabitancy, and lodging. “Occupation” merely means the exclusive right to possession; and may apply equally to a bare field, a warehouse or counting-house, a set of professional chambers, or a dwelling-house. “Residence,” or “inhabitancy,” does not necessarily imply sole possession; but it does imply actual living in a dwelling-house, while a man need never have actually seen the place which he “occupies.” “Lodging” is, unfortunately, a term about which there has, recently, been so much dispute, that a writer may well shrink from any attempt to define it. But, broadly speaking, a lodger is a resident in part of a dwelling-house or tenement, the general control of which is in the hands of another person (the householder), but who yet has, in respect of his own part of such tenement, sufficient control to make him, in a sense, master thereof, though not so much so as an ordinary householder. * * *

In order, however, that such a complicated system of franchises should be at all workable in a populous community like England, it is necessary that an official register of voters should be prepared in each constituency, and regularly kept up to date; so as to be ready for an election, which may, perchance, take place at the most unexpected moment. It is, therefore, a condition precedent to any exercise of the franchise, that the person claiming to exercise it should be registered as a voter.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 487 ff.

<sup>21</sup> On account of the shifting of trade and of population, there came about during the years a great change in the relative importance of many towns. Small and obscure towns came to be centers of population, wealth and trade, that the deserted boroughs continued to be summoned, as well as those to whom their trade and inhabitants were transferred; except a few which petitioned to be eased of the expense, then usual, of maintaining their members: four shillings a day being allowed for a knight of the shire, and two shilling for a citizen or burgess: which was the rate of wages established in the reign of Edward III.<sup>p</sup> Hence the members for boroughs now bear above a quadruple proportion to those for counties, and the number of parliament men is increased since Fortescue's time, in the reign of Henry the Sixth, from 300 to upwards of 500, exclusive of those of Scotland.

§ 236. (iii) Representation of universities.—The universities were in general not empowered to send burgesses to parliament; though once, in 28 Edw. I (1300), when a parliament was summoned to consider of the king's right to Scotland, there were issued writs, which required the University of Oxford to send up four or five, and that of Cambridge two or three, of their most discreet and learned lawyers for that purpose.<sup>q</sup> But it was King James the First who indulged them with the permanent privilege to send constantly two of their own body; to serve for those students who, though useful members of the community, were neither concerned in the landed nor the trading interest; and to protect in the legislature the rights of the republic of letters.<sup>22</sup> The right of election in boroughs is various, depending entirely on the several charters, customs, and constitutions of the respective places, which has occasioned infinite disputes; though now by statute [175] 2 Geo. II, c. 24 (Parliamentary Elections, 1728), the right of voting for the but remained unrepresented. Other towns, once important and flourishing, sank to relative obscurity, but continued to send members to parliament. To correct this condition, redistribution of seats has been made by the several acts of 1832, 1867, and 1885. As a consequence, the distinctions of representation between boroughs and counties are now almost wiped out. There are, however, differences of franchise requirements, as shown in the last note.

<sup>p</sup> 4 Inst. 16.

<sup>q</sup> Pryune Parl. Writs. I. 345.

---

<sup>22</sup> The privilege of representation in parliament is, also, now conferred on the universities of London, Dublin, Edinburgh, St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Aberdeen.

future shall be allowed according to the last determination of the house of commons concerning it. And by statute 3 Geo. III, c. 15 (Parliament, 1762), no freeman of any city or borough (other than such as claim by birth, marriage, or servitude) shall be entitled to vote therein, unless he hath been admitted to his freedom twelve calendar months before.

§ 237. (b) Qualifications of members of house of commons.—

Next, as to the qualifications of persons to be elected members of the house of commons. Some of these depend upon the law and custom of parliaments, declared by the house of commons;<sup>r</sup> others upon certain statutes. And from these it appears, 1. That they must not be aliens born,<sup>s</sup> or minors.<sup>t</sup> 2. That they must not be any of the twelve judges,<sup>u</sup> because they sit in the lords' house; nor of the clergy,<sup>v</sup> for they sit in the convocation; nor persons attainted of treason or felony,<sup>x</sup> for they are unfit to sit anywhere. 3. That sheriffs of counties, and mayors and bailiffs of boroughs, are not eligible in their respective jurisdictions, as being returning officers;<sup>y</sup> but that sheriffs of one county are eligible to be knights of another.<sup>z</sup> 4. That, in strictness, all members ought to have been inhabitants of the places for which they are chosen:<sup>a</sup> but this, having been long disregarded, was at length entirely repealed by statute 14 Geo. III, c. 58 (Parliamentary Elections, 1774). 5. That no persons concerned in the management of any duties or taxes created since 1692, except the commissioners of the treasury,<sup>b</sup> nor any of the officers following,<sup>c</sup> (viz., commissioners of prizes, transports,

<sup>r</sup> 4 Inst. 47, 48.

<sup>s</sup> See page *162.

<sup>t</sup> Ibid.

<sup>u</sup> Com. Journ. 9 Nov. 1605.

<sup>v</sup> Com. Journ. 13 Oct. 1553. 8 Feb. 1620. 17 Jan. 1661.

<sup>x</sup> Com. Journ. 21 Jan. 1580. 4 Inst. 47.

<sup>y</sup> Bro. Abr. t. Parliament. 7. Com. Journ. 25 June 1604. 14 Apr. 1614. 22 Mar. 1620. 2. 4. 15 Jun. 17 Nov. 1685. Hal. of Parl. 114.

<sup>z</sup> 4 Inst. 48. Whitelocke of Parl. c. 99, 100, 101.

<sup>a</sup> Stat. 1 Hen. V. c. 1 (Parliamentary Elections, 1413). 23 Hen. VI. c. 15 (1444).

<sup>b</sup> Stat. 5 & 6 W. & M. c. 7. (Rates and Duties on Salt, etc., 1693.)

<sup>c</sup> Stat. 11 & 12 W. III. c. 2 (Forfeited Estates, 1699). 12 & 13 W. III. c. 10 (Defraying Expense of Navy Guards and Garrisons for One Year (Cus-sick and wounded, wine licenses, navy, and victualing; secretaries or receivers of prizes; controllers of the army accounts; agents for regiments; governors of plantations and their deputies; officers of Minorca or Gibraltar; officers of the excise and customs; [176] clerks or deputies in the several offices of the treasury, exchequer, navy, victualing, admiralty, pay of the army or navy, secretaries of state, salt, stamps, appeals, wine licenses, hackney-coaches, hawkers, and peddlers) nor any persons that hold any new office under the crown created since 1705,<sup>d</sup> are capable of being elected or sitting as members. 6. That no person having a pension under the crown during pleasure, or, for any term of years, is capable of being elected or sitting.<sup>e</sup> 7. That if any member accepts an office under the crown, except an officer in the army or navy, accepting a new commission, his seat is void; but such member is capable of being re-elected.<sup>f</sup> 8. That all knights of the shire shall be actual knights, or such notable esquires and gentlemen as have estates sufficient to be knights, and by no means of the degree of yeomen.<sup>g</sup> This is reduced to a still greater certainty, by ordaining, 9. That every knight of a shire shall have a clear estate of freehold or copyhold to the value of six hundred pounds per annum, and every citizen and burgess to the value of three hundred pounds: except the eldest sons of peers, and of persons qualified to be knights of shires, and except the members for the two universities:<sup>h</sup> which somewhat balances the ascendant which the boroughs have gained over the counties, by obliging the trading interest to make choice of landed men: and of this qualification the member must make oath, and give in the particulars in writing at the time of his taking his seat.<sup>i</sup> But, subject to these standing restrictions and disqualifications, every subject of the realm is eligible of common right: though there are instances, wherein persons in particular circum-toms), 1701). 6 Ann. c. 7, (1706). 15 Geo. II. c. 22 (House of Commons Disqualification, 1741)

<sup>d</sup> Stat. 6 Ann. c. 7 (1706).

<sup>e</sup> Stat. 6 Ann. c. 7. 1 Geo. I. c. 56 (Crown Pensioners' Disqualification, 1715).

<sup>f</sup> Stat. 6 Ann. c. 7.

<sup>g</sup> Stat. 23 Hen. VI. c. 15 (Parliamentary Elections, 1444).

<sup>h</sup> Stat. 9 Ann. c. 5 (Parliament, 1710).

<sup>i</sup> Stat. 33 Geo. II. c. 20 (House of Commons Qualification, 1759).

stances have forfeited that common right, and have been declared ineligible for that parliament by a vote of the house of commons,† or forever by an act of the legislature.‡ But it was an unconstitutional prohibition, which was grounded on an ordinance of the house of lords,§ and inserted in the king's writs, for the parliament holden at Coventry, 6 Hen. IV (1404), that no apprentice or <sup>[177]</sup> other man of the law should be elected a knight of the shire therein:|| in return for which our law books and historians¶ have branded this parliament with the name of parliamentum indoctum, or the lack-learning parliament; and Sir Edward Coke observes with some spleen,Ⓢ that there was never a good law made thereat.<sup>23</sup>

§ 238. (c) Regulation of elections.—The third point, regarding elections, is the method of proceeding therein. This is also regulated by the law of parliament, and the several statutes referred to in the margin,Ⓣ all which I shall blend together, and † See page *163.

‡ Stat. 7 Geo. I. c. 28 (1720).

§ 4 Inst. 10. 48. Pryn. Plea for Lords, 379. 2 Whitlocke, 359, 368.

|| Pryn. on 4 Inst. 13.

¶ Walsingh A. D. 1405.

Ⓢ 4 Inst. 48.

Ⓣ 7 Hen. IV. c. 15 (Election of Knights of the Shire, 1405). 8 Hen. VI. c. 7 (Parliament, 1429). 23 Hen. VI. c. 14 (Parliamentary Elections, 1444). 1 W. & M. st. 1. c. 2 (Habeas Corpus Suspension, 1688). 2 W. & M. st. 1. c. 7 (Parliamentary Elections, 1690). 5 & 6 W. & M. c. 20 (Bank of England, 1694). 7 W. III. c. 4 (1695). [7 & 8 W. III. c. 4, "Preventing Charge and Expense in Elections of Members to Serve in Parliament," 1695.] 7 & 8 W. III. c. 7 (House of Commons Elections, 1695), and c. 25 (Parliamentary Elections, 1696). 10 & 11 W. III. c. 7 (1698). [10 W. III. c. 7, Parliamentary Elections, 1698.] 12 & 13 W. III. c. 10 ("Defraying Expense of Guards and Garrisons for One Year," 1701). 6 Ann. c. 23 (1706). 9 Ann. c. 5 ("Freedom of Parliaments," 1710). 10 Ann. c. 19 (Customs and Excise, 1711), and c. 33 (Militia, 1711). 2 Geo. II. c. 24 (Parliamentary Elections, 1728). 8 Geo. II. c. 30 (Parliamentary Elections, 1735). 18 Geo. II. c. 18 (Parliamentary Elections, 1744). 19 Geo. II. c. 28 (Parliamentary Elections, 1745). 10 Geo. III. c. 16 (Parliamentary Elections, 1770). 11 Geo. III. c. 42 (Parliamentary Elections, 1771). 14 Geo. III. c. 15 (Parliamentary Elections, 1774). 15 Geo. III. c. 36 (Parliament, 1775).

<sup>23</sup> In theory every male British subject of full age is capable of being elected to the house of commons for any constituency. But there are even extract out of them a summary account of the method of proceeding to elections.<sup>24</sup>

As soon as the parliament is summoned, the lord chancellor (or if a vacancy happens during the sitting of parliament, the speaker, by order of the house; and without such order, if a vacancy happens by death, or the member's becoming a peer, in the time of a recess for upwards of twenty days) sends his warrant to the clerk of the crown in chancery; who thereupon issues out writs to the sheriff of every county, for the election of all the members to serve for that county, and every city and borough therein. Within three days after the receipt of this writ, the sheriff is to send his precept, under his seal, to the proper returning officers of the cities and boroughs, commanding them to elect their members: and the said returning officers are to proceed to election within eight days from the receipt of the precept, giving four days' notice of the same;<sup>q</sup> and to return the persons chosen, together with the precept, to the sheriff.

But elections of knights of the shire must be proceeded to by the sheriffs themselves in person, at the next county court [178] that shall happen after the delivery of the writ. The county court is a court held every month or oftener by the sheriff, intended to try <sup>q</sup> In the borough of New-Shoreham in Sussex, wherein certain freeholders of the county are entitled to vote by statute 11 Geo. III, c. 55 (Parliamentary Elections, 1771), the election must be within twelve days, with eight days' notice of the same.

---

more disqualifications to-day, although not the identical ones, than Blackstone enumerates. Some of these disqualifications are founded on personal incapacity or misconduct, others depend upon the office or employment of the disqualified person. Some arise from rules and custom of the house of commons, others are imposed by various statutes. An enumeration of the disqualifications may be found in 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 499.

<sup>24</sup> Secret ballot.—The conduct of elections for members of the house of commons is regulated by statutes, the principal one being the Ballot Act of 1872. This act, although passed only for a period of six years, has been continued by successive acts. The most interesting change introduced by the Ballot Act was in the form of voting. Previously to the passage of this statute, the poll in a contested election was taken by each voter openly stating at the polling booth the name of the candidate for whom he desired to vote. The act of 1872 provides for a secret ballot, the voter marking the name of the candidate for whom he votes, and dropping the ballot in a closed box.

little causes not exceeding the value of forty shillings, in what part of the county he pleases to appoint for that purpose; but for the election of knights of the shire, it must be held at the most usual place. If the county court falls upon the day of delivering the writ, or within six days after, the sheriff may adjourn the court and election to some other convenient time, not longer than sixteen days, nor shorter than ten; but he cannot alter the place, without the consent of all the candidates: and, in all such cases, ten days' public notice must be given of the time and place of the election.

And, as it is essential to the very being of parliament that elections should be absolutely free, therefore all undue influences upon the electors are illegal, and strongly prohibited. For Mr. Locke ranks it among those breaches of trust in the executive magistrate, which according to his notions amount to a dissolution of the government, "if he employs the force, treasure, and offices of the society to corrupt the representatives, or openly to pre-engage the electors, and prescribe what manner of persons shall be chosen. For thus to regulate candidates and electors, and new-model the ways of election, what is it, says he, but to cut up the government by the roots, and poison the very fountain of public security?" As soon, therefore, as the time and place of election, either in counties or boroughs, are fixed, all soldiers quartered in the place are to remove, at least one day before the election, to the distance of two miles or more; and not to return till one day after the poll is ended. Riots likewise have been frequently determined to make an election void. By vote also of the house of commons, to whom alone belongs the power of determining contested elections, no lord of parliament, or lord lieutenant of a county, hath any right to interfere in the election of commoners; and, by statute, the lord warden of the cinque ports shall not recommend any members there. If any officer of the excise, customs, stamps, [179] or certain other branches of the revenue, presumes to intermeddle in elections, by persuading any voter or dissuading him, he forfeits 100*l.*, and is disabled to hold any office.

§ 239. (i) Purity of elections.—Thus are the electors of one branch of the legislature secured from any undue influence from either of the other two, and from all external violence and compulsion. But the greatest danger is that in which themselves cooperate, by the infamous practice of bribery and corruption. To prevent which it is enacted that no candidate shall, after the date (usually called the teste [witness]) of the writs, or after the vacancy, give any money or entertainment to his electors, or promise to give any, either to particular persons, or to the place in general, in order to his being elected: on pain of being incapable to serve for that place in parliament. And if any money, gift, office, employment, or reward be given or promised to be given to any voter, at any time, in order to influence him to give or withhold his vote, as well he that takes as he that offers such bribe forfeits 500*l.*, and is forever disabled from voting and holding any office in any corporation; unless, before conviction, he will discover some other offender of the same kind, and then he is indemnified for his own offense.* The first instance that occurs, of election bribery, was so early as 13 Eliz. (1571), when one Thomas Longe (being a simple man and of small capacity to serve in parliament) acknowledged that he had given the returning officer and others of the borough for which he was chosen four pounds to be returned member, and was for that premium elected. But for this offense the borough was amerced, the member was removed, and the officer fined and imprisoned.** But, as this practice hath since taken much deeper and more universal root, it hath occasioned the making of these wholesome statutes; to complete the efficacy of which there is nothing wanting but resolution and integrity to put them in strict execution.

<sup>r</sup> On Gov. p. 2. § 222.

§ 240. (ii) The poll.—<sup>[180]</sup> Undue influence being thus (I wish the depravity of mankind would permit me to say, effectually) guarded against, the election is to be proceeded to on the day appointed; the sheriff or other returning officer first taking an oath against bribery, and for the due execution of his office. The candidates likewise, if required, must swear to their qualification; and

* In like manner the Julian law de ambitu (of bribery) inflicted fines and infamy upon all who were guilty of corruption at elections; but, if the person guilty convicted another offender, he was restored to his credit again. Ff. 4*s.* 14. 1.

** 4 Inst. 23. Hale of Parl. 112. Com. Journ. 10 & 11 May 1571.

the electors in counties to theirs; and the electors both in counties and boroughs are also compellable to take the oath of abjuration and that against bribery and corruption. And it might not be amiss, if the members elected were bound to take the latter oath, as well as the former; which in all probability would be much more effectual than administering it only to the electors.

§ 241. (iii) Return and canvass of vote.—The election being closed, the returning officer in boroughs returns his precept to the sheriff, with the persons elected by the majority; and the sheriff returns the whole, together with the writ for the county and the knights elected thereupon, to the clerk of the crown in chancery; before the day of meeting, if it be a new parliament, or within fourteen days after the election, if it be an occasional vacancy; and this under penalty of 500*l.* If the sheriff does not return such knights only as are duly elected, he forfeits, by the old statutes of Henry VI, 100*l.*; and the returning officer in boroughs for a like false return 40*l.*; and they are besides liable to an action, in which double damages shall be recovered, by the later statutes of King William: and any person bribing the returning officer shall also forfeit 300*l.* But the members returned by him are the sitting members, until the house of commons, upon petition, shall adjudge the return to be false and illegal. The form and manner of proceeding upon such petition are now regulated by statute 10 Geo. III, c. 16 (1770) (amended by 11 Geo. III, c. 42 (1771), and made perpetual by 14 Geo. III, c. 15—1774), which directs the method of choosing by lot a select committee of fifteen members, who are sworn well and truly to try the same, and a true judgment to give according to the evidence. And this abstract of the proceedings at elections of knights, citizens, and <sup>[181]</sup>burgesses, concludes our inquiries into the laws and customs more peculiarly relative to the house of commons.

§ 242. f. Method of making laws. (1) Speakers; (2) Majority rule.—I proceed now, sixthly, to the method of making laws; which is much the same in both houses: and I shall touch it very briefly, beginning in the house of commons. But first I must premise, that for dispatch of business each house of parliament has its speaker. The speaker of the house of lords, whose office it is to preside there, and manage the formality of business, is the lord chancellor, or keeper of the king's great seal, or any other appointed by the king's commission: and, if none be so appointed, the house of lords (it is said) may elect. The speaker of the house of commons is chosen by the house; but must be approved by the king.<sup>25</sup> And herein the usage of the two houses differs, that the speaker of the house of commons cannot give his opinion or argue any question in the house; but the speaker of the house of lords, if a lord of parliament, may.<sup>26</sup> In each house the act of the majority binds the whole; and this majority is declared by votes openly and publicly given: not as at Venice, and many other senatorial assemblies, privately or by ballot. This latter method may be serviceable, to prevent intrigues and unconstitutional combinations: but is impossible to be practiced with us; at least in the house of commons, where every member's conduct is subject to the future censure of his constituents, and therefore should be openly submitted to their inspection.

§ 243. (3) Introduction of bills.—To bring a bill into the house, if the relief sought by it is of a private nature, it is first necessary to prefer a petition; which must be presented by a member, and usually sets forth the grievance desired to be remedied. This petition (when founded on facts that may be in their nature disputed) is referred to a committee of members, who examine the matter alleged, and accordingly report it to the house; and then (or, otherwise, upon the mere petition) leave is given to bring in the bill.<sup>27</sup> In public matters the bill is brought in upon motion

<sup>25</sup> Sir Edward Coke, in his address to the throne, on being elected speaker in 1592, said: "This is only as yet a nomination, and no election, until your majesty giveth allowance and approbation." (2 Hats. 164.)

<sup>26</sup> Speakers of the two houses.—The powers of the speaker of the house of commons are greater than those of the speaker of the house of lords. The latter may be a commoner. The former may speak to a question when the house is in committee of the whole; he may vote in case of a tie, but not otherwise. The speaker of the house of lords, if a member, may vote on all questions.

<sup>27</sup> This duty is now performed by certain appointed officers, known as "examiners." The introduction of both private and public bills is governed by standing orders.

made to the house, without any petition at all. Formerly, all bills were drawn in the form of petitions, which were entered upon the parliament rolls, with the king's answer [182] thereunto subjoined; not in any settled form of words, but as the circumstances of the case required;† and at the end of each parliament the judges drew them into the form of a statute, which was entered on the statute rolls. In the reign of Henry V, to prevent mistakes and abuses, the statutes were drawn up by the judges before the end of the parliament; and, in the reign of Henry VI, bills in the form of acts, according to the modern custom, were first introduced.<sup>28</sup>

§ 244. (4) Reading of bills.—The persons directed to bring in the bill, present it in a competent time to the house, drawn out on paper, with a multitude of blanks, or void spaces, where anything occurs that is dubious, or necessary to be settled by the parliament itself (such, especially, as the precise date of times, the nature and quantity of penalties, or of any sums of money to be raised); being, indeed, only the skeleton of the bill. In the house of lords, if the bill begins there, it is (when of a private nature) referred to two of the judges, who examine and report the state of the facts alleged, to see that all necessary parties consent, and to settle all points of technical propriety. This is read a first time, and at a convenient distance a second time; and after each reading the speaker opens to the house the substance of the bill, and puts the question, whether it shall proceed any further. The introduction of the bill may be originally opposed, as the bill itself may at either of the readings; and, if the opposition succeeds, the bill must be dropped for that session; as it must also if opposed with success in any of the subsequent stages.

† See, among numberless other instances, the articuli cleri (articles of the clergy), 9 Edw. II. (1315).

<sup>28</sup> The style now used in an action of parliament is as follows: "Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same." But in measures passed under the special provisions of the Parliament Act, 1911, previously described (note 19, p. *170, ante), there is a special form of preamble, which omits all reference to the lords, and states that the measure in question has been passed in accordance with the provisions of the act.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 521.

§ 245. (5) Debate and passage of bills.—After the second reading it is committed, that is, referred to a committee; which is either selected by the house in matters of small importance, or else, upon a bill of consequence the house resolves itself into a committee of the whole house. A committee of the whole house is composed of every member; and, to form it, the speaker quits the chair (another member being appointed chairman), and may sit and debate as a private member. In these committees the bill is debated clause by clause, amendments made, the blanks filled up, and sometimes the bill entirely new-modeled. After it [183] has gone through the committee, the chairman reports it to the house with such amendments as the committee have made; and then the house reconsiders the whole bill again, and the question is repeatedly put upon every clause and amendment. When the house hath agreed or disagreed to the amendments of the committee, and sometimes added new amendments of its own, the bill is then ordered to be engrossed, or written in a strong gross hand, on one or more long rolls (or presses) of parchment sewed together. When this is finished, it is read a third time, and amendments are sometimes then made to it; and if a new clause be added, it is done by tacking a separate piece of parchment on the bill, which is called a rider.<sup>u</sup> The speaker then again opens the contents, and, holding it up in his hands, puts the question, whether the bill shall pass. If this is agreed to, the title to it is then settled; which used to be a general one for all the acts passed in the session, till in the first year of Henry VIII (1509) distinct titles were introduced for each chapter. After this, one of the members is directed to carry it to the lords, and desire their concurrence; who, attended by several more, carries it to the bar of the house of peers, and there delivers it to their speaker, who comes down from his woosack to receive it.<sup>29</sup>

§ 246. (6) Consideration of bills in second house.—It there passes through the same forms as in the other house (except engrossing, which is already done), and, if rejected, no more notice is taken, but it passes sub silentio (in silence), to prevent unbecoming altercations. But if it is agreed to, the lords send a message by two masters in chancery (or sometimes two of the judges) that they have agreed to the same: and the bill remains with the lords, if they have made no amendment to it. But if any amendments are made, such amendments are sent down with the bill to receive the concurrence of the commons. If the commons disagree to the amendments, a conference usually follows between members deputed from each house; who for the most part settle and adjust the difference; but, if both houses remain inflexible, the bill is dropped.<sup>30</sup> If the commons agree to the amendments, the bill is sent back to the lords by one of the members, [184] with a message to acquaint them therewith. The same forms are observed, mutatis mutandis (altered according to the circumstances of the case), when the bill begins in the house of lords. But, when an act of grace or pardon is passed, it is first signed by his majesty, and then read once only in each of the houses, without any new engrossing or amendment.<sup>31</sup> And when both houses have done with any bill, it always is deposited in the house of peers, to wait the royal assent; except in the case of a bill of supply, which after receiving the concurrence of the lords is sent back to the house of commons.<sup>32</sup>

<sup>u</sup> Noy. 84.

---

<sup>29</sup> Bills are, of course, now printed and reprinted for their various stages in their passage through parliament.

§ 247. (7) The royal assent.—The royal assent may be given two ways: In person; when the king comes to the house of peers, in his crown and royal robes, and sending for the commons to the bar, the titles of all the bills that have passed both houses are read; and the king's answer is declared by the clerk of the parliament in Norman-French: a badge it must be owned (now the only one remaining) of conquest; and which one could wish to see fall into total oblivion; unless it be reserved as a solemn memento to remind us that our liberties are mortal, having once been destroyed by a foreign force. If the king consents to a public bill, the clerk

<sup>30</sup> D'Ewes Journ. 20. 73. Com. Journ. 17 June 1747.

<sup>32</sup> Com. Journ. 24 Jul. 1660.

---

<sup>30</sup> Bills may now be sent up to the king, notwithstanding the failure to receive the concurrence of the house of lords, in accordance with the provisions of the Parliament Act of 1911.

usually declares, "le roy le veut, the king wills it so to be"; if to a private bill, "soit fait comme il est desire, be it as it is desired." If the king refuses his assent, it is in the gentle language of "le roy s' avisera,<sup>31</sup> the king will advise upon it." When a bill of supply is passed, it is carried up and presented to the king by the speaker of the house of commons;<sup>7</sup> and the royal assent is thus expressed, "le roy remercie ses loyal subjects, accepte leur benevolence, et aussi le veut, the king thanks his loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and wills it so to be." In case of an act of grace, which originally proceeds from the crown and has the royal assent in the first stage of it, the clerk of the parliament thus pronounces the gratitude of the subject; "les prelates, seigneurs, et commons, en ce present parliament assemblees, au nom de tous vous autres subjects, [185] remercient tres humblement votre majesté, et prient a Dieu vous donner en santé bone vie et longue; the prelates, lords, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, in the name of all your other subjects, most humbly thank your majesty, and pray to God to grant you in health and wealth long to live."*

2. By the statute 33 Hen. VIII, c. 21 (Act of Parliament, 1541), the king may give his assent by letters patent under his great seal, signed with his hand, and notified in his absence to both houses assembled together in the high house. And when the bill has received the royal assent in either of these ways, it is then, and not before, a statute or act of parliament.

§ 248. (8) Publication of a statute.—This statute or act is placed among the records of the kingdom; there needing no formal promulgation to give it the force of a law, as was necessary by the 7 Rot. Parl. 9 Hen. IV. (1407) in Pryn. 4 Inst. 30, 31.

* D'Ewes Journ. 35.

31 The indispensable nature of this royal power of rejecting acts of parliament has been shown by the commentator in treating of the parliament, chapter 2, page 154, of this book.

A sad comment on the value of all such theorizing has been furnished by the fact that it is now almost two centuries since the sovereign executive has ventured to veto an act: and although the power still formally exists, it has been said by a wise and conservative thinker to be "an exercise of prerogative which no ordinary circumstances can reconcile either with prudence or a constitutional administration of government." (Hallam, Const. Hist. c. xv.)—

HAMMOND.

civil law with regard to the emperor's edicts; because every man in England is, in judgment of law, party to the making of an act of parliament, being present thereat by his representatives. However, a copy thereof is usually printed at the king's press for the information of the whole land.<sup>32</sup> And formerly, before the invention of printing, it was used to be published by the sheriff of every county; the king's writ being sent to him at the end of every session, together with a transcript of all the acts made at that session, commanding him, "ut statuta illa, et omnes articulos in eisdem contentos, in singulis locis ubi expedire viderit, publice proclamari, et firmiter teneri et observari faciat (that he cause those statutes, and all articles therein contained, to be publicly proclaimed and strictly observed and kept in every place where it shall seem expedient)."<sup>a</sup> And the usage was to proclaim them at his county court, and there to keep them, that whoever would might read or take copies thereof; which custom continued till the reign of Henry the Seventh.<sup>a</sup>

§ 249. (9) Effect of acts of parliament.—An act of parliament, thus made, is the exercise of the highest authority that this kingdom acknowledges upon earth. It hath power to bind every subject in the land, and the dominions thereunto belonging; nay, even the king himself, if particularly named therein. And it cannot be altered, [<sup>186</sup>] amended, dispensed with, suspended or repealed, but in the same forms and by the same authority of parliament: for it is a maxim in law, that it requires the same strength to dissolve, as to create an obligation. It is true it was formerly held, that the king might in many cases dispense with penal statutes:<sup>b</sup> but now by statute 1 W. & M., st. 2, c. 2 (Bill of Rights, 1689), it is declared that the suspending or dispensing with laws by regal authority, without consent of parliament, is illegal.

§ 250. g. Adjournment, prorogation, dissolution.—There remains only, in the seventh and last place, to add a word or two concerning the manner in which parliaments may be adjourned, prorogued, or dissolved.

<sup>a</sup> 3 Inst. 41. 4 Inst. 26.

<sup>b</sup> Finch. L. 81. 234. Bacon Elem. c. 19.

<sup>32</sup> All acts of parliament are now printed by the king's printer for public information.

§ 251. (1) Adjournment of parliament.—An adjournment is no more than a continuance of the session from one day to another, as the word itself signifies: and this is done by the authority of each house separately every day; and sometimes for a fortnight or a month together, as at Christmas or Easter, or upon other particular occasions. But the adjournment of one house is no adjournment of the other.<sup>c</sup> It hath also been usual, when his majesty hath signified his pleasure that both or either of the houses should adjourn themselves to a certain day, to obey the king's pleasure so signified, and to adjourn accordingly.<sup>d</sup> Otherwise, besides the indecorum of a refusal, a prorogation would assuredly follow; which would often be very inconvenient to both public and private business. For prorogation puts an end to the session; and then such bills as are only begun and not perfected, must be resumed de novo (anew) (if at all) in a subsequent session; whereas, after an adjournment, all things continue in the same state as at the time of the adjournment made, and may be proceeded on without any fresh commencement.

§ 252. (2) Prorogation of parliament.—A prorogation is the continuance of the parliament from one session to another, as an adjournment is a continuation [187] of the session from day to day. This is done by the royal authority, expressed either by the lord chancellor in his majesty's presence, or by commission from the crown, or frequently by proclamation.<sup>33</sup> Both houses are necessarily prorogued at the same time; it not being a prorogation of the house of lords, or commons, but of the parliament. The session is never understood to be at an end, until a prorogation: though, unless some act be passed or some judgment given in parliament, it is in truth no session at all.<sup>e</sup> And formerly the usage was, for the king to give the royal assent to all such bills as he

<sup>c</sup> 4 Inst. 28.

<sup>d</sup> Com. Journ. passim: e. g. 11 Jun. 1572. 5 Apr. 1604. 4 Jun. 14 Nov. 18 Dec. 1621. 11 Jul. 1625. 13 Sept. 1660. 25 Jul. 1667. 4 Aug. 1685. 24 Febr. 1691. 21 Jun. 1712. 16 Apr. 1717. 3 Feb. 1741. 10 Dec. 1745. 21 May 1768.

<sup>e</sup> 4 Inst. 28. Hale of Parl. 38.

---

<sup>33</sup> Prorogation is now governed by the Prorogation Act of 1867.

approved, at the end of every session, and then to prorogue the parliament; though sometimes only for a day or two,<sup>f</sup> after which all business then depending in the houses was to be begun again. Which custom obtained so strongly, that it once became a question,<sup>g</sup> whether giving the royal assent to a single bill did not of course put an end to the session. And, though it was then resolved in the negative, yet the notion was so deeply rooted, that the statute 1 Car. I, c. 7 (Parliament, 1625), was passed to declare, that the king's assent to that and some other acts should not put an end to the session; and, even so late as the reign of Charles II we find a proviso frequently tacked to a bill,<sup>h</sup> that his majesty's assent thereto should not determine the session of parliament.<sup>34</sup> But it now seems to be allowed, that a prorogation must be expressly made, in order to determine the session. And, if at the time of an actual rebellion, or imminent danger of invasion, the parliament shall be separated by adjournment or prorogation, the king is empowered<sup>i</sup> to call them together by proclamation, with fourteen days' notice of the time appointed for their reassembling.

§ 253. (3) Dissolution of parliament. (a) By the king's will.

A dissolution is the civil death of the parliament; and this may be effected three ways: 1. By the king's will, expressed either in person or by representation. For, as the king has the sole right of convening the parliament, so also [188] it is a branch of the royal prerogative, that he may (whenever he pleases) prorogue the parliament for a time, or put a final period to its existence. If nothing had a right to prorogue or dissolve a parliament but itself, it might happen to become perpetual. And this would be extremely

<sup>f</sup> Com. Journ. 21 Oct. 1553.

<sup>g</sup> Ibid. 21 Nov. 1554.

<sup>h</sup> Stat. 12 Car. II. c. 1 (Parliament, 1660). 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 1 (Criminal Law, 1670).

<sup>i</sup> Stat. 30 Geo. II. c. 25 (Militia, 1756).

---

<sup>34</sup> The prorogation is to a day fixed; but by the joint effect of the Meeting of Parliament Acts, 1797, 1799, and 1870, the crown may now by proclamation at any time, without regard to the period to which parliament may stand prorogued or adjourned, appoint it to reassemble for dispatch of business at the expiration of six days from the date of the proclamation.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 530.

dangerous, if at any time it should attempt to encroach upon the executive power: as was fatally experienced by the unfortunate King Charles the First; who, having unadvisedly passed an act to continue the parliament then in being till such time as it should please to dissolve itself, at last fell a sacrifice to that inordinate power, which he himself had consented to give them. It is therefore extremely necessary that the crown should be empowered to regulate the duration of these assemblies, under the limitations which the English constitution has prescribed: so that, on the one hand, they may frequently and regularly come together, for the dispatch of business, and redress of grievances; and may not, on the other, even with the consent of the crown, be continued to an inconvenient or unconstitutional length.

§ 254. (b) By demise of the crown.—A parliament may be dissolved by the demise of the crown. This dissolution formerly happened immediately upon the death of the reigning sovereign: for he being considered in law as the head of the parliament (caput, principium, et finis—the head, beginning and end), that failing, the whole body was held to be extinct.<sup>35</sup> But, the calling a new parliament immediately on the inauguration of the successor being found inconvenient, and dangers being apprehended from having no parliament in being in case of a disputed succession, it was enacted by the statutes 7 & 8 W. III, c. 15 (Parliament, 1695), and 6 Ann., c. 7 (1706), that the parliament in being shall continue for six months after the death of any king or queen, unless sooner prorogued or dissolved by the successor: that, if the parliament be, at the time of the king's death, separated by adjournment or prorogation, it shall notwithstanding assemble immediately: and that, if no parliament is then in being, the members of the last parliament shall assemble, and be again a parliament.<sup>36</sup>

§ 255. (c) By lapse of time.—<sup>[189]</sup> Lastly, a parliament may be dissolved or expire by length of time. For if either the legis-

<sup>35</sup> Accordingly, offices held under the crown were formerly, in general, vacated by the demise of the crown (Bac. Ab., Courts, c.); but now, by virtue of the Demise of the Crown Act, 1901, the holding of any office under the crown is not affected by the demise of the crown.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 531 n.

<sup>36</sup> The law on this subject, however, is now regulated by the Representation of the People Act, 1867, which enacts that the parliament in being at any lative body were perpetual; or might last for the life of the prince who convened them, as formerly; and were so to be supplied, by occasionally filling the vacancies with new representatives; in these cases, if it were once corrupted, the evil would be past all remedy: but when different bodies succeed each other, if the people see cause to disapprove of the present, they may rectify its faults in the next. A legislative assembly also, which is sure to be separated again (whereby its members will themselves become private men, and subject to the full extent of the laws which they have enacted for others) will think themselves bound, in interest as well as duty, to make only such laws as are good. The utmost extent of time that the same parliament was allowed to sit, by the statute 6 W. & M., c. 2 (1694), [6 & 7 W. & M., c. 2 (Frequent Meeting of Parliaments)], was three years; after the expiration of which, reckoning from the return of the first summons, the parliament was to have no longer continuance. But by the statute 1 Geo. I, st. 2, c. 38 (Septennial, 1715) (in order, professedly, to prevent the great and continued expenses of frequent elections, and the violent heats and animosities consequent thereupon, and for the peace and security of the government then just recovering from the late rebellion), this term was prolonged to seven years; and, what alone is an instance of the vast authority of parliament, the very same house that was chosen for three years, enacted its own continuance for seven. So that, as our constitution now stands, the parliament must expire, or die a natural death, at the end of every seventh year; if not sooner dissolved by the royal prerogative.<sup>87</sup> future demise of the crown shall not be determined or dissolved by such demise, but shall continue so long as it would have continued but for such demise, unless it shall be sooner prorogued or dissolved by the crown.

It is also enacted by the Meeting of Parliament Act, 1797, that, in case of a demise of the crown between a dissolution and the day appointed by the writs of summons for the meeting of a new parliament, the last preceding parliament shall immediately convene for six months, unless sooner prorogued or dissolved by the succeeding monarch; and that, in the event of a demise on or after the day appointed for assembling the new parliament, but before it has in fact assembled, then the new parliament shall in like manner convene for six months, unless sooner prorogued or dissolved.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 531.

<sup>87</sup> By the Parliament Act, 1911, the maximum duration of parliament is fixed at five years.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.
OF THE KING, AND HIS TITLE.

§ 256. The king: the supreme executive.—The supreme executive power of these kingdoms is vested by our laws in a single person, the king or queen: for it matters not to which sex the crown descends; but the person entitled to it, whether male or female, is immediately invested with all the ensigns, rights, and prerogatives of sovereign power; as is declared by statute 1 Mar., st. 3, c. 1 (Crown, 1554).

In discoursing of the royal rights and authority, I shall consider the king under six distinct views. 1. With regard to his title. 2. His royal family. 3. His councils. 4. His duties. 5. His prerogative. 6. His revenue. And first, with regard to his title.

§ 257. Importance of a rule of succession.—The executive power of the English nation being vested in a single person, by the general consent of the people, the evidence of which general consent is long and immemorial usage, it became necessary to the freedom and peace of the state, that a rule should be laid down, uniform, universal, and permanent; in order to mark out with precision, who is that single person, to whom are committed (in subservience to the law of the land) the care and protection of the community; and to whom, in return, the duty and allegiance of every individual are due. It is of the highest importance to the public tranquillity, and to the consciences <sup>[191]</sup> of private men, that this rule should be clear and indisputable; and our constitution has not left us in the dark upon this material occasion. It will therefore be the endeavor of this chapter to trace out the constitutional doctrine of the royal succession, with that freedom and regard to truth, yet mixed with that reverence and respect, which the principles of liberty and the dignity of the subject require.

§ 258. Succession to the throne.—The grand fundamental maxim upon which the jus coronæ, or right of succession to the throne of these kingdoms, depends, I take to be this: “that the crown is, by common law and constitutional custom, hereditary; and this in a manner peculiar to itself: but that the right of inheritance may from time to time be changed or limited by act of parliament; under which limitations the crown still continues hereditary." And this proposition it will be the business of this chapter to prove, in all its branches; first, that the crown is hereditary; secondly, that it is hereditary in a manner peculiar to itself; thirdly, that this inheritance is subject to limitation by parliament; lastly, that when it is so limited, it is hereditary in the new proprietor.

§ 259. 1. The royal succession is hereditary.—First, it is in general hereditary, or descendible to the next heir, on the death or demise of the last proprietor. All regal governments must be either hereditary or elective: and, as I believe there is no instance wherein the crown of England has ever been asserted to be elective, except by the regicides at the infamous and unparalleled trial of King Charles I, it must of consequence be hereditary. Yet while I assert an hereditary, I by no means intend a jure divino (by divine right) title to the throne. Such a title may be allowed to have subsisted under the theocratic establishments of the children of Israel in Palestine; but it never yet subsisted in any other country; save only so far as kingdoms, like other human fabrics, are subject to the general and ordinary dispensations of providence. Nor indeed have a jure divino and an hereditary right any necessary connection with each other; as some have very weakly imagined. The titles of David and Jehu were <sup>[192]</sup> equally jure divino, as those of either Solomon or Ahab; and yet David slew the sons of his predecessor, and Jehu his predecessor himself. And when our kings have the same warrant as they had, whether it be to sit upon the throne of their fathers, or to destroy the house of the preceding sovereign, they will then, and not before, possess the crown of England by a right like theirs, immediately derived from Heaven. The hereditary right which the laws of England acknowledge, owes its origin to the founders of our constitution, and to them only. It has no relation to, nor depends upon, the civil laws of the Jews, the Greeks, the Romans, or any other nation upon earth: the municipal laws of one society having no connection with, or influence upon, the fundamental polity of another. The founders of our English monarchy might perhaps, if they had thought proper, have made it an elective monarchy; but they rather chose, and upon good reason, to establish originally a succession by inheritance. This has been acquiesced in by general consent; and ripened by degrees into common law: the very same title that every private man has to his own estate. Lands are not naturally descendible any more than thrones: but the law has thought proper, for the benefit and peace of the public, to establish hereditary succession in the one as well as the other.

§ 260. a. Elective and hereditary monarchies.—It must be owned, an elective monarchy seems to be the most obvious, and best suited of any to the rational principles of government, and the freedom of human nature: and accordingly we find from history that, in the infancy and first rudiments of almost every state, the leader, chief magistrate, or prince, hath usually been elective. And, if the individuals who compose that state could always continue true to first principles, uninfluenced by passion or prejudice, unassailed by corruption, and unawed by violence, elective succession were as much to be desired in a kingdom, as in other inferior communities. The best, the wisest, and the bravest man would then be sure of receiving that crown, which his endowments have merited; and the sense of an unbiased majority would be dutifully acquiesced in by the few who were <sup>[193]</sup> of different opinions. But history and observation will inform us, that elections of every kind (in the present state of human nature) are too frequently brought about by influence, partiality, and artifice: and, even where the case is otherwise, these practices will be often suspected, and as constantly charged upon the successful, by a splenetic disappointed minority. This is an evil to which all societies are liable; as well those of a private and domestic kind, as the great community of the public, which regulates and includes the rest. But in the former there is this advantage; that such suspicions, if false, proceed no further than jealousies and murmurs, which time will effectually suppress; and, if true, the injustice may be remedied by legal means, by an appeal to those tribunals to which every member of society has (by becoming such) virtually engaged to submit. Whereas, in the great and independent society, which every nation composes, there is no superior to resort to but the law of nature; no method to redress the infringements of that law, but the actual exertion of private force. As therefore between two nations, complaining of mutual injuries, the quarrel can only be decided by the law of arms; so in one and the same nation, when the fundamental principles of their common union are supposed to be invaded, and more especially when the appointment of their chief magistrate is alleged to be unduly made, the only tribunal to which the complainants can appeal is that of the God of battles, the only process by which the appeal can be carried on is that of a civil and intestine war. An hereditary succession to the crown is therefore now established, in this and most other countries, in order to prevent that periodical bloodshed and misery, which the history of ancient imperial Rome, and the more modern experience of Poland and Germany, may show us are the consequences of elective kingdoms.<sup>1</sup>

§ 261. 2. The royal succession is feudal in character.—But, secondly, as to the particular mode of inheritance, it in general corresponds with the feudal path of descents, chalked out by the common law in the succession to landed estates; yet with one or two material exceptions. Like estates, the crown will descend lineally to the issue of the reigning monarch; as it did from King John to Richard II, through [194] a regular pedigree of six lineal generations. As in common descents, the preference of males to females, and the right of primogeniture among the males, are strictly adhered to. Thus Edward V succeeded to the crown, in preference to Richard, his younger brother, and Elizabeth, his elder sister. Like lands or tenements, the crown, on failure of the male line, descends to the issue female; according to the ancient British custom remarked by Tacitus,<sup>a</sup> “solent fœminarum ductu bellare, et sexum in imperiis non discernere (they are accustomed to wage war under the conduct of women, and not to consider sex in the government of their empire).” Thus Mary I succeeded to Edward VI; and the line of Margaret, Queen of Scots, the daughter of Henry VII, succeeded on failure of the line of Henry VIII, his son. But, among the females, the crown descends by right of primogeniture to the eldest daughter only and her issue; and not, as in common inheritances, to all the daughters at once; the evident necessity of a sole succession to the throne having occasioned the royal law of descents to depart from the common law in this respect: and therefore Queen Mary, on the death of her brother, succeeded to the crown alone, and not in partnership with her sister, Elizabeth. Again: the doctrine of representation prevails in the descent of the crown, as it does in other inheritances; whereby the lineal descendants of any person deceased stand in the same place as their ancestor, if living, would have done. Thus Richard II succeeded his grandfather, Edward III, in right of his father, the Black Prince; to the exclusion of all his uncles, his grandfather's younger children. Lastly, on failure of lineal descendants, the crown goes to the next collateral relations of the late king; provided they are lineally descended from the blood royal, that is, from that royal stock which originally acquired the crown. Thus Henry I succeeded to William II, John to Richard I, and James I to Elizabeth; being all derived from the Conqueror, who was then the only regal stock. But herein there is no objection (as in the case of common descents) to the succession of a brother, an uncle, or other collateral relation, of the half blood; that is, where the relationship proceeds not from the same couple of ancestors (which constitutes a kinsman of the whole blood) but from a single ancestor only; as when two persons <sup>[195]</sup> are derived from the same father, and not from the same mother, or vice versa: provided only, that the one ancestor, from whom both are descended, be that from whose veins the blood royal is communicated to each. Thus Mary I inherited to Edward VI, and Elizabeth inherited to Mary; all children of the same father, King Henry VIII, but all by different mothers. The reason of which diversity, between royal and common descents, will be better understood hereafter, when we examine the nature of inheritances in general.

<sup>a</sup> In Vit. Agricolaë.

<sup>1</sup> Succession to the throne is now regulated by the Act of Settlement of 1700, 12 & 13 Wm. III, c. 2, § 1.

§ 262. 3. The royal succession is not indefeasible.—The doctrine of hereditary right does by no means imply an indefeasible right to the throne. No man will, I think, assert this, that has considered our laws, constitution, and history, without prejudice, and with any degree of attention. It is unquestionably in the breast of the supreme legislative authority of this kingdom, the king and both houses of parliament, to defeat this hereditary right; and, by particular entails, limitations, and provisions, to exclude the immediate heir, and vest the inheritance in anyone else. This is strictly consonant to our laws and constitution; as may be gathered from the expression so frequently used in our statute book, of "the king's majesty, his heirs, and successors." In which we may observe, that as the word, "heirs," necessarily implies an inheritance or hereditary right, generally subsisting in the royal person; so the word, "successors," distinctly taken, must imply that this inheritance may sometimes be broken through; or, that there may be a successor, without being the heir, of the king. And this is so extremely reasonable, that without such a power, lodged somewhere, our polity would be very defective. For, let us barely suppose so melancholy a case, as that the heir apparent should be a lunatic, an idiot, or otherwise incapable of reigning: how miserable would the condition of the nation be, if he were also incapable of being set aside! It is therefore necessary that this power should be lodged somewhere: and yet the inheritance, and regal dignity, would be very precarious indeed, if this power were expressly and avowedly lodged in the hands of the subject only, to be exerted whenever prejudice, caprice, or discontent should happen to take the lead. Consequently it can nowhere be so properly lodged as in the two houses of parliament, by and with the consent [196] of the reigning king; who, it is not to be supposed, will agree to anything improperly prejudicial to the rights of his own descendants. And therefore in the king, lords, and commons, in parliament assembled, our laws have expressly lodged it.<sup>2</sup>

§ 263. 4. The royal succession is perpetual.—But, fourthly; however the crown may be limited or transferred, it still retains its descendible quality, and becomes hereditary in the wearer of it.

<sup>2</sup> Under the Act of Settlement of 1700, the succession was transferred from the issue of King James the Second (who, as the law then stood, were entitled to it), to the Princess Sophia of Hanover, who represented a remoter branch, but who thus became the founder of the reigning royal family. Post, p. *216.

And hence in our law the king is said never to die, in his political capacity; though, in common with other men, he is subject to mortality in his natural: because immediately upon the natural death of Henry, William, or Edward, the king survives in his successor. For the right of the crown vests, eo instanti (from that instant) upon his heir; either the hæres natus (the heir born), if the course of descent remains unimpeached, or the hæres factus (the heir appointed), if the inheritance be under any particular settlement. So that there can be no interregnum (the space between two reigns); but, as Sir Matthew Hale<sup>b</sup> observes, the right of sovereignty is fully invested in the successor by the very descent of the crown. And therefore, however acquired, it becomes in him absolutely hereditary, unless by the rules of the limitation it is otherwise ordered and determined. In the same manner as landed estates, to continue our former comparison, are by the law hereditary, or descendible to the heirs of the owner; but still there exists a power, by which the property of those lands may be transferred to another person. If this transfer be made simply and absolutely, the lands will be hereditary in the new owner, and descend to his heir at law: but if the transfer be clogged with any limitations, conditions, or entails, the lands must descend in that channel, so limited and prescribed, and no other.

§ 264. Historical review of the rulers of England.—In these four points consists, as I take it, the constitutional notion of hereditary right to the throne: which will be still further elucidated, and made clear beyond all dispute, from a short historical view of the successions to the crown of England, the doctrines of our ancient lawyers, and the several acts of parliament that have from time to time been made, to create, to declare, to confirm, to limit, or to bar, the hereditary <sup>[197]</sup> title to the throne. And in the pursuit of this inquiry we shall find, that from the days of Egbert, the first sole monarch of this kingdom, even to the present, the four cardinal maxims above mentioned have ever been held the constitutional canons of succession. It is true, this succession, through fraud, or force, or sometimes through necessity, when in hostile times the crown descended on a minor or the like, has been very frequently suspended; but has generally at last returned back into the old hereditary channel, though sometimes a very considerable period has intervened. And, even in those instances where the succession has been violated, the crown has ever been looked upon as hereditary in the wearer of it. Of which the usurpers themselves were so sensible, that they for the most part endeavored to vamp up some feeble show of a title by descent, in order to amuse the people, while they gained the possession of the kingdom. And, when possession was once gained, they considered it as the purchase or acquisition of a new estate of inheritance, and transmitted or endeavored to transmit it to their own posterity, by a kind of hereditary right of usurpation.

<sup>b</sup> 1 Hist. P. C. 61.

§ 265. 1. King Egbert (802-839).—King Egbert, about the year 800, found himself in possession of the throne of the West Saxons, by a long and undisturbed descent from his ancestors of above three hundred years. How his ancestors acquired their title, whether by force, by fraud, by contract, or by election, it matters not much to inquire; and is indeed a point of such high antiquity, as must render all inquiries at best but plausible guesses. His right must be supposed indisputably good, because we know no better. The other kingdoms of the heptarchy he acquired, some by consent, but most by a voluntary submission. And it is an established maxim in civil polity, and the law of nations, that when one country is united to another in such a manner, as that one keeps its government and states, and the other loses them; the latter entirely assimilates or is melted down in the former, and must adopt its laws and customs.* And in pursuance of this maxim there hath ever been, since the union of the heptarchy in King Egbert, a [198] general acquiescence under the hereditary monarchy of the west Saxons, through all the united kingdoms.

§ 266. 2. From Egbert to Edmund Ironside (802-1016).—From Egbert to the death of Edmund Ironside, a period of above two hundred years, the crown descended regularly, through a succession of fifteen princes, without any deviation or interruption: save only that the sons of King Ethelwolf succeeded to each other in the kingdom, without regard to the children of the elder branches, according to the rule of succession prescribed by their father, and confirmed by the wittena-gemote, in the heat of the Danish invasions; and also that King Edred, the uncle of Edwy, mounted the throne for about nine years, in the right of his nephew, a minor, the times being very troublesome and dangerous. But this was with a view to preserve, and not to destroy, the succession; and accordingly Edwy succeeded him.

* Puff. L. of N. and N. b. 8. c. 12. § 6.

§ 267. 3. The Danish kings (1014–1042).—King Edmund Ironside was obliged, by the hostile irruption of the Danes, at first to divide his kingdom with Canute, King of Denmark; and Canute, after his death, seized the whole of it, Edmund's sons being driven into foreign countries. Here the succession was suspended by actual force, and a new family introduced upon the throne: in whom, however, this new acquired throne continued hereditary for three reigns; when, upon the death of Hardiknute, the ancient Saxon line was restored in the person of Edward the Confessor.

§ 268. 4. Edward the Confessor (1042–1066); Harold (1066). He was not, indeed, the true heir to the crown, being the younger brother of King Edmund Ironside, who had a son Edward, surnamed (from his exile) the Outlaw, still living. But this son was then in Hungary; and the English having just shaken off the Danish yoke, it was necessary that somebody on the spot should mount the throne; and the Confessor was the next of the royal line then in England. On his decease without issue, Harold II usurped the throne; and almost at the same instant came on the Norman invasion: the right to the crown being all the time in Edgar, surnamed Atheling (which signifies in the Saxon language illustrious, or of royal blood), who was the son of Edward the Outlaw, and grandson of Edmund [199] Ironside; or, as Matthew Paris<sup>d</sup> well expresses the sense of our old constitution "Edmundus autem latus-ferreum, rex naturalis de stirpe regum, genuit Edwardum; et Edwardus genuit Edgarum, cui de jure debebatur regnum Anglorum (but Edmund Ironside, who was natural king by descent from the race of kings, begat Edward, and Edward begat Edgar, to whom of right the kingdom of England belonged)."

<sup>d</sup> A. D. 1066.

§ 269. 5. William I (1066–1087).—William the Norman claimed the crown by virtue of a pretended grant from King Edward the Confessor; a grant which, if real, was in itself utterly invalid: because it was made, as Harold well observed in his reply to William's demand,* "absque generali senatus et populi conventu et edicto (without the general assembly and edict of the senate and people)"; which also very plainly implies, that it then was generally understood that the king, with consent of the general council, might dispose of the crown and change the line of succession. William's title, however, was altogether as good as Harold's, he being a mere private subject, and an utter stranger to the royal blood. Edgar Atheling's undoubted right was overwhelmed by the violence of the times; though frequently asserted by the English nobility after the Conquest, till such time as he died without issue: but all their attempts proved unsuccessful, and only served the more firmly to establish the crown in the family which had newly acquired it.

§ 270. a. The Norman Conquest.—This Conquest, then, by William of Normandy was, like that of Canute before, a forcible transfer of the crown of England into a new family: but, the crown being so transferred, all the inherent properties of the crown were with it transferred also. For, the victory obtained at Hastings not being a victory over the nation collectively, but only over the person of Harold, the only right that the Conqueror could pretend to acquire thereby, was the right to possess the crown of England, not to alter the nature of the government. And therefore, as the English laws still remained in force, he must necessarily take the crown subject to those laws, and with all its inherent properties; the first and principal of which was its descendibility. Here, then, we must drop our race of Saxon kings, at least for awhile, and derive our descents from William the Conqueror as from a new stock, who acquired by right of war (such as it is, yet still the dernier [200] recours—court of ultimate appeal—of kings) a strong and undisputed title to the inheritable crown of England.

§ 271. 6. William II (1087–1100); Henry I (1100–1135).—Accordingly it descended from him to his sons William II and * William of Malmsb. 1. 3.

† Hale, Hist. C. L. c. 5. Seld. Review of Tithes, c. 8.

Henry I. Robert, it must be owned, his eldest son, was kept out of possession by the arts and violence of his brethren; who perhaps might proceed upon a notion, which prevailed for some time in the law of descents (though never adopted as the rule of public successions*), that when the eldest son was already provided for (as Robert was constituted Duke of Normandy by his father's will), in such a case the next brother was entitled to enjoy the rest of their father's inheritance. But, as he died without issue, Henry at last had a good title to the throne, whatever he might have at first.

§ 272. 7. Stephen (1135–1154).—Stephen of Blois, who succeeded him, was indeed the grandson of the Conqueror, by Adelia his daughter, and claimed the throne by a feeble kind of hereditary right: not as being the nearest of the male line, but as the nearest male of the blood royal, excepting his elder brother Theobald; who was Earl of Blois, and therefore seems to have waived, as he certainly never insisted on, so troublesome and precarious a claim. The real right was in the Empress Matilda or Maud, the daughter of Henry I; the rule of succession being (where women are admitted at all) that the daughter of a son shall be preferred to the son of a daughter. So that Stephen was little better than a mere usurper; and therefore he rather chose to rely on a title by election,<sup>a</sup> while the Empress Maud did not fail to assert her hereditary right by the sword: which dispute was attended with various success, and ended at last in a compromise,* that Stephen should keep the crown, but that Henry, the son of Maud, should succeed him; as he afterwards accordingly did.

§ 273. 8. House of Plantagenet (1154–1399). a. Henry II (1154–1189).—Henry, the second of that name, was (next after his mother, Matilda) the undoubted heir of William the Conqueror; but he had also another connection in blood, which endeared [201]

* Ninth edition inserts here, "made at Wallingford."

■ See Lord Lyttelton's Life of Henry II. Vol. I. pag. 467.

h "Ego Stephanus Dei gratia assensu cleri et populi in regem Anglorum electus, etc. (Cart. A. D. 1136. Ric. de Hagustald. 314. Hearne ad Guil. Neubr. 711). (I, Stephen, elected King of England, by the grace of God, and the assent of the clergy and people.)

him still further to the English. He was lineally descended from Edmund Ironside, the last of the Saxon race of hereditary kings. For Edward the Outlaw, the son of Edmund Ironside, had (besides Edgar Atheling, who died without issue) a daughter Margaret, who was married to Malcolm, King of Scotland; and in her the Saxon hereditary right resided. By Malcolm she had several children, and among the rest Matilda, the wife of Henry I, who by him had the Empress Maud, the mother of Henry II. Upon which account the Saxon line is in our histories frequently said to have been restored in his person: though in reality that right subsisted in the sons of Malcolm by Queen Margaret; King Henry's best title being as heir to the Conqueror.

§ 274. b. Richard I (1189-1199); c. John (1199-1216); d. Henry III (1216-1272); e. Edward I (1272-1307); f. Edward II (1307-1327); g. Edward III (1327-1377); h. Richard II (1377-1399).—From Henry II the crown descended to his eldest son, Richard I, who dying childless, the right vested in his nephew Arthur, the son of Geoffrey, his next brother: but John, the youngest son of King Henry, seized the throne; claiming, as appears from his charters, the crown by hereditary right;<sup>1</sup> that is to say, he was next of kin to the deceased king, being his surviving brother: whereas Arthur was removed one degree further, being his brother's son, though by right of representation he stood in the place of his father Geoffrey. And however flimsy this title, and those of William Rufus and Stephen of Blois, may appear at this distance to us, after the law of descents hath now been settled for so many centuries, they were sufficient to puzzle the understandings of our brave, but unlettered, ancestors. Nor, indeed, can we wonder at the number of partisans, who espoused the pretensions of King John in particular; since even in the reign of his father, King Henry II, it was a point undetermined<sup>1</sup> whether, even in common inheritances, the child of an elder brother should succeed to the land in right of representation, or the younger surviving brother in right of proximity of blood. Nor is it to this day decided in the collateral succession to the fiefs of the empire, whether the order of the stocks, or the proximity of degree shall take place.<sup>k</sup> However, on the death of Arthur <sup>[202]</sup> and his sister Eleanor without issue, a clear and indisputable title vested in Henry III, the son of John: and from him to Richard the Second, a succession of six generations, the crown descended in the true hereditary line. Under one of which race of princes<sup>l</sup> we find it declared in parliament, "that the law of the crown of England is, and always hath been, that the children of the king of England, whether born in England or elsewhere, ought to bear the inheritance after the death of their ancestors. Which law our sovereign lord, the king, the prelates, earls, and barons, and other great men, together with all the commons in parliament assembled, do approve and affirm forever."

<sup>1</sup> "Regni Angliæ; quod nobis jure competit hæreditario (Of the kingdom of England; which falls to us by hereditary right)." Spelm. Hist. B. Joh. apud Wilkins. 354.

<sup>1</sup> Glanv. l. 7. c. 3.

§ 275. 9. House of Lancaster (1399-1461); a. Henry IV (1399-1413).—Upon Richard the Second's resignation of the crown, he having no children, the right resulted to the issue of his grandfather, Edward III. That king had many children, besides his eldest, Edward the Black Prince of Wales, the father of Richard II: but to avoid confusion I shall only mention three; William, his second son, who died without issue; Lionel, Duke of Clarence, his third son; and John of Gant, Duke of Lancaster, his fourth. By the rules of succession, therefore, the posterity of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, were entitled to the throne, upon the resignation of King Richard; and had accordingly been declared by the king, many years before, the presumptive heirs of the crown: which declaration was also confirmed in parliament.<sup>m</sup> But Henry, Duke of Lancaster, the son of John of Gant, having then a large army in the kingdom, the pretense of raising which was to recover his patrimony from the king, and to redress the grievances of the subject, it was impossible for any other title to be asserted with any safety; and he became king under the title of Henry IV. But, as Sir Matthew Hale remarks,<sup>n</sup> though the people unjustly assisted Henry IV in his usurpation of the crown, yet he was not admitted

<sup>k</sup> Mod. Un. Hist. xxx. 512.

<sup>l</sup> Stat. 25 Edw. III. st. 2 (Bastardy, 1350).

<sup>m</sup> Sandford's General. Hist. 246.

<sup>n</sup> Hist. C. L. c. 5.

thereto, until he had declared that he claimed, not as a conqueror (which he very much inclined to do °), but as a successor, descended by right line of the blood royal; as appears from the rolls of parliament in those times. And in order to this he set up a show of two titles: [203] the one upon the pretense of being the first of the blood royal in the entire male line, whereas the Duke of Clarence left only one daughter, Philippa; from which female branch, by a marriage with Edmond Mortimer, Earl of March, the house of York descended: the other, by reviving an exploded rumor, first propagated by John of Gant, that Edmond, Earl of Lancaster (to whom Henry's mother was heiress), was in reality the elder brother of King Edward I, though his parents, on account of his personal deformity, had imposed him on the world for the younger: and therefore Henry would be entitled to the crown, either as successor to Richard II, in case the entire male line was allowed a preference to the female; or, even prior to the unfortunate prince, if the crown could descend through a female, while an entire male line was existing.

§ 276. (1) Act of Succession to the Crown, 1405.—However, as in Edward the Third's time, we find the parliament approving and affirming the law of the crown, as before stated, so in the reign of Henry IV they actually exerted their right of new settling the succession to the crown. And this was done by the statute 7 Hen. IV, c. 2 (Succession to the Crown, 1405), whereby it is enacted, "that the inheritance of the crown and realms of England and France, and all other the king's dominions, shall be set and remain ° in the person of our sovereign lord the king, and in the heirs of his body issuing"; and Prince Henry is declared heir apparent to the crown, to hold to him and the heirs of his body issuing, with remainder to Lord Thomas, Lord John, and Lord Humphry, the king's sons, and the heirs of their bodies respectively. Which is, indeed, nothing more than the law would have done before, provided Henry the Fourth had been a rightful king. It, however, serves to show that it was then generally understood that the king and parliament had a right to new-model and regulate the succession to the crown. And we may observe, with what caution and delicacy the parliament then avoided declaring any sentiment of Henry's original title. However, Sir Edward Coke more than once expressly declares,<sup>a</sup> that at the time of [204] passing this act the right of the crown was in the descent from Philippa, daughter and heir of Lionel, Duke of Clarence.

° Seld. Tit. Hon. 1. 3.

» Soit mys et demerge.

§ 277. b. Henry V (1413-1422); c. Henry VI (1422-1461).—Nevertheless, the crown descended regularly from Henry IV to his son and grandson, Henry V and VI; in the latter of whose reigns the house of York asserted their dormant title; and, after imbruing the kingdom in blood and confusion for seven years together, at last established it in the person of Edward IV.

§ 278. 10. House of York (1461-1485); a. Edward IV (1461-1483).—At his accession to the throne, after a breach of the succession that continued for three descents, and above threescore years, the distinction of a king de jure (by right) and a king de facto (in fact) began to be first taken; in order to indemnify such as had submitted to the late establishment, and to provide for the peace of the kingdom by confirming all honors conferred and all acts done, by those who were now called the usurpers, not tending to the disherison of the rightful heir. In statute 1 Edw. IV, c. 1 (Confirmation, 1461), the three Henrys are styled, "late kings of England successively in dede, and not of ryght." And, in all the charters which I have met with of King Edward, wherever he has occasion to speak of any of the line of Lancaster, he calls them "nuper de facto, et non de jure, reges Angliæ (recently kings of England, in fact and not of right)."

§ 279. b. Edward V (1483); c. Richard III (1483-1485).—Edward IV left two sons and a daughter; the eldest of which sons, King Edward V, enjoyed the regal dignity for a very short time, and was then deposed by Richard, his unnatural uncle; who immediately usurped the royal dignity, having previously insinuated to the populace a suspicion of bastardy in the children of Edward IV, to make a show of some hereditary title: after which he is generally believed to have murdered his two nephews; upon whose death the right of the crown devolved to their sister, Elizabeth.

<sup>a</sup> 4 Inst. 37. 205.

§ 280. 11. House of Tudor (1485–1603).—The tyrannical reign of King Richard III gave occasion to Henry, Earl of Richmond, to assert his title to the crown. A title the most remote and unaccountable that was ever set up, and which nothing could have given success to, but the universal detestation of the then usurper, Richard. For, besides that he claimed under a descent from John of Gant, whose title was now exploded, the claim (such as it was) was through John, Earl of Somerset, a bastard son, begotten by John of [205] Gant upon Catherine Swinford. It is true that, by an act of parliament 20 Rich. II (1396), this son was, with others, legitimated and made inheritable to all lands, offices, and dignities, as if he had been born in wedlock: but still, with an express reservation of the crown, "excepta dignitate regali."<sup>2</sup>

§ 281. a. Henry VII (1485–1509).—Notwithstanding all this, immediately after the battle of Bosworth field, he assumed the regal dignity; the right of the crown then being, as Sir Edward Coke expressly declares,<sup>3</sup> in Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward IV: and his possession was established by parliament, holden the first year of his reign. In the act for which purpose, the parliament seems to have copied the caution of their predecessors in the reign of Henry IV: and therefore (as Lord Bacon, the historian of this reign, observes) carefully avoided any recognition of Henry VII's right, which indeed was none at all,<sup>3</sup> and the king would not have it by way of new law or ordinance, whereby a right might seem to be created and conferred upon him; and therefore a middle way was rather chosen, by way (as the noble historian expresses it) of establishment, and that under covert and indifferent words,

<sup>2</sup> 4 Inst. 36.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid. 37.

---

<sup>3</sup> Title of Henry VII.—The title of Henry VII by descent from Edward III, and his relation to Richard III, whom he overthrew and succeeded, is more explicitly stated by Blackstone himself. (Post, Book II, page *207.)

Instead of commenting on the manifest exaggeration of the hereditary element in the succession to the English crown as stated by Blackstone in this chapter, I would refer the student to the excellent little work of Professor

“that the inheritance of the crown should rest, remain, and abide in King Henry VII and the heirs of his body”: thereby providing for the future, and at the same time acknowledging his present possession; but not determining either way, whether that possession was de jure or de facto merely. However, he soon after married Elizabeth of York, the undoubted heiress of the Conqueror, and thereby gained (as Sir Edward Coke<sup>m</sup> declares) by much his best title to the crown. Whereupon the act made in his favor was so much disregarded, that it never was printed in our statute books.

§ 282. b. Henry VIII (1509–1547); (1) Act of Succession to the Crown, 1534.—Henry the Eighth, the issue of this marriage, succeeded to the crown by clear indisputable hereditary right, and transmitted it to his three children in successive order. But in his reign we at several times find the parliament busy in regulating the succession to the kingdom. And, first, by [206] statute 25 Hen. VIII, c. 12 (1533), which recites the mischiefs, which have and may ensue by disputed titles, because no perfect and substantial provision hath been made by law concerning the succession; and then enacts, that the crown shall be entailed to his majesty, and the sons or heirs males of his body; and in default of such sons to the Lady Elizabeth (who is declared to be the king’s eldest issue female, in exclusion of the Lady Mary, on account of her supposed illegitimacy by the divorce of her mother, Queen Catherine) and to the Lady Elizabeth’s heirs of her body; and so on from issue female to issue female, and the heirs of their bodies, by course of inheritance according to their ages, as the crown of England hath been accustomed and ought to go, in case where there be heirs female of the same: and in default of issue female, then to the king’s right heirs forever. This single statute is an ample proof of all the four positions we at first set out with.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid.

---

E. A. Freeman, of Oxford, on the Growth of the English Constitution, c. i, pp. 24–40. (Lond. 1872.)

Professor Freeman has perhaps given the elective element more than its due weight in such a problem: but for that very reason his work is well adapted to reading in connection with this chapter, and the student will thus have both sides of the question presented by advocates of the highest merit.—HAMMOND.

§ 283. (2) Acts of Succession to the Crown, 1536, 1543; c. Edward VI (1547–1553); d. Mary (1553–1558).—But, upon the king's divorce from Ann Boleyn, this statute was, with regard to the settlement of the crown, repealed by statute 28 Hen. VIII, c. 7 (Succession to the Crown, 1536), wherein the Lady Elizabeth is also, as well as the Lady Mary, bastardized, and the crown settled on the king's children by Queen Jane Seymour, and his future wives; and, in defect of such children, then with this remarkable remainder, to such persons as the king by letters patent, or last will and testament, should limit and appoint the same. A vast power; but, notwithstanding, as it was regularly vested in him by the supreme legislative authority, it was therefore indisputably valid. But this power was never carried into execution; for by statute 35 Hen. VIII, c. 1 (Succession to the Crown, 1543) the king's two daughters are legitimated again, and the crown is limited to Prince Edward by name, after that to the Lady Mary, and then to the Lady Elizabeth, and the heirs of their respective bodies; which succession took effect accordingly, being indeed no other than the usual course of the law, with regard to the descent of the crown.

§ 284. (1) Act of Succession to the Crown, 1554.—But lest there should remain any doubt in the minds of the people, through this jumble of acts for limiting the succession, by statute 1 Mar., p. 2, c. 1 (Crown, 1554), Queen Mary's hereditary <sup>[207]</sup> right to the throne is acknowledged and recognized in these words: "the crown of these realms is most lawfully, justly, and rightly descended and come to the queen's highness that now is, being the very true, and undoubted heir and inheritrix thereof." And again, upon the queen's marriage with Philip of Spain, in the statute which settles the preliminaries of that match,<sup>1</sup> the hereditary right to the crown is thus asserted and declared: "as touching the right of the queen's inheritance in the realm and dominions of England, the children, whether male or female, shall succeed in them, according to the known laws, statutes, and customs of the same." Which determination of the parliament, that the succession shall continue in the usual course, seems tacitly to imply a power of new-modeling and altering it, in case the legislature had thought proper.

<sup>1</sup> 1 Mar. p. 2. c. 2 (1554).

§ 285. e. Elizabeth (1558-1603); (1) Acts of Succession to the Crown, 1558, 1571.—On Queen Elizabeth's accession, her right is recognized in still stronger terms than her sister's; the parliament acknowledging,<sup>u</sup> "that the queen's highness is, and in very deed and of most mere right ought to be, by the laws of God, and the laws and statutes of this realm, our most lawful and rightful sovereign liege lady and queen; and that her highness is rightly, lineally, and lawfully descended and come of the blood royal of this realm of England; in and to whose princely person, and to the heirs of her body lawfully to be begotten, after her, the imperial crown and dignity of this realm doth belong." And in the same reign, by statute 13 Eliz., c. 1 (Treason, 1571), we find the right of parliament to direct the succession of the crown asserted in the most explicit words. "If any person shall hold, affirm, or maintain that the common laws of this realm, not altered by parliament, ought not to direct the right of the crown of England; or that the queen's majesty, with and by the authority of parliament, is not able to make laws and statutes of sufficient force and validity, to limit and bind the crown of this realm, and the descent, limitation, inheritance, and government thereof;—such person so holding, affirming, or maintaining, shall, [208] during the life of the queen, be guilty of high treason; and after her decease shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and forfeit his goods and chattels."

§ 286. 12. House of Stuart (1603-1714); a. James I (1603-1625).—On the death of Queen Elizabeth, without issue, the line of Henry VIII became extinct. It therefore became necessary to recur to the other issue of Henry VII, by Elizabeth of York, his queen: whose eldest daughter, Margaret, having married James IV, King of Scotland, King James the Sixth of Scotland, and of England the First, was the lineal descendant from that alliance. So that in his person, as clearly as in Henry VIII, centered all the claims of different competitors, from the Conquest downwards, he being indisputably the lineal heir of the Conqueror. And, what is still more remarkable, in his person also centered the right of the Saxon monarchs, which had been suspended from the Conquest till his accession. For, as was formerly observed, Margaret, the sister of Edgar Atheling, the daughter of Edward the Outlaw, and granddaughter of King Edmund Ironside, was the person in whom the hereditary right of the Saxon kings, supposing it not abolished by the Conquest, resided. She married Malcolm, King of Scotland; and Henry II, by a descent from Matilda, their daughter, is generally called the restorer of the Saxon line. But it must be remembered, that Malcolm by his Saxon queen had sons as well as daughters; and that the royal family of Scotland from that time downwards were the offspring of Malcolm and Margaret. Of this royal family King James the First was the direct lineal heir, and therefore united in his person every possible claim by hereditary right to the English as well as Scottish throne, being the heir both of Egbert and William the Conqueror.

<sup>u</sup> Stat. 1 Eliz. c. 3 (Succession to the Crown, 1558).

§ 287. (1) Act of Succession to the Crown, 1603.—And it is no wonder that a prince of more learning than wisdom, who could deduce an hereditary title for more than eight hundred years, should easily be taught by the flatterers of the times to believe there was something divine in this right, and that the finger of Providence was visible in its <sup>[209]</sup> preservation. Whereas, though a wise institution, it was clearly a human institution; and the right inherent in him no natural, but a positive, right. And in this and no other light was it taken by the English parliament; who by statute 1 Jac. I, c. 1 (Succession to the Crown, 1603), did “recognize and acknowledge, that immediately upon the dissolution and decease of Elizabeth, late queen of England, the imperial crown thereof did by inherent birthright, and lawful and undoubted succession, descend and come to his most excellent majesty, as being lineally, justly, and lawfully, next and sole heir of the blood royal of this realm.” Not a word here of any right immediately derived from Heaven: which, if it existed anywhere, must be sought for among the aborigines of the island, the ancient Britons; among whose princes indeed some have gone to search it for him.▼

▼ Elizabeth of York, the mother of Queen Margaret of Scotland, was heiress of the house of Mortimer. And Mr. Carte observes, that the house of Mor-

§ 288. b. Charles I (1625-1649); (1) The Commonwealth (1649-1660); (2) Proclamation of restoration; c. Charles II (1660-1685).—But, wild and absurd as the doctrine of divine right most undoubtedly is, it is still more astonishing, that when so many human hereditary rights had centered in this king, his son and heir, King Charles the First, should be told by those infamous judges, who pronounced his unparalleled sentence, that he was an elective prince; elected by his people, and therefore accountable to them, in his own proper person, for his conduct. The confusion, instability, and madness, which followed the fatal catastrophe of that pious and unfortunate prince, will be a standing argument in favor of hereditary monarchy to all future ages; as they proved at last to the then deluded people: who, in order to recover that peace and happiness which for twenty years together they had lost, in a solemn parliamentary convention of the states restored the right heir of the crown. And in the proclamation for that purpose, which was drawn up and attended by both houses,* they declared, “that, according to their duty and allegiance, they did heartily, joyfully, and unanimously acknowledge and proclaim, that immediately upon the [210] decease of our late sovereign lord, King Charles, the imperial crown of these realms did by inherent birthright and lawful and undoubted succession descend and come to his most excellent majesty, Charles the Second, as being lineally, justly, and lawfully, next heir of the blood royal of this realm: and thereunto they most humbly and faithfully did submit and oblige themselves, their heirs, and posterity forever.”

§ 289. (1) The crown hereditary subject to parliament.—Thus I think it clearly appears, from the highest authority this nation is acquainted with, that the crown of England hath been ever an hereditary crown; though subject to limitations by parliament. The remainder of this chapter will consist principally of those instances, wherein the parliament has asserted or exercised this right of altering and limiting the succession; a right timer, in virtue of its descent from Gladys, only sister to Llewelin ap Jorwerth the Great, had the true right to the principality of Wales. Hist. Eng. iii, 705.

* Com. Journ. 8 May 1660.

which, we have seen, was before exercised and asserted in the reigns of Henry IV, Henry VII, Henry VIII, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth.

§ 290. (a) The bill of exclusion.—The first instance, in point of time, is the famous bill of exclusion, which raised such a ferment in the latter end of the reign of King Charles the Second. It is well known that the purport of this bill was to have set aside the king's brother and presumptive heir, the Duke of York, from the succession, on the score of his being a papist; that it passed the house of commons, but was rejected by the lords; the king having also declared beforehand, that he never would be brought to consent to it. And from this transaction we may collect two things; 1. That the crown was universally acknowledged to be hereditary; and the inheritance indefeasible unless by parliament: else it had been needless to prefer such a bill. 2. That the parliament had a power to have defeated the inheritance: else such a bill had been ineffectual. The commons acknowledged the hereditary right then subsisting; and the lords did not dispute the power, but merely the propriety, of an exclusion.

§ 291. d. James II (1685–1689).—However, as the bill took no effect, King James the Second succeeded to the throne of his ancestors; and might have enjoyed it during the remainder of his life, but for his own infatuated conduct, which (with other concurring circumstances) brought on the revolution in 1688.

§ 292. (1) The revolution of 1688.—<sup>[211]</sup> The true ground and principle, upon which that memorable event proceeded, was an entirely new case in politics, which had never before happened in our history; the abdication of the reigning monarch, and the vacancy of the throne thereupon. It was not a defeasance of the right of succession, and a new limitation of the crown, by the king and both houses of parliament: it was the act of the nation alone, upon a conviction that there was no king in being. For in a full assembly of the lords and commons, met in a convention upon the supposition of this vacancy, both houses<sup>7</sup> came to this resolution;

<sup>7</sup> Com. Journ. 7 Feb. 1688.

“that King James the Second, having endeavored to subvert the constitution of the kingdom, by breaking the original contract between king and people; and, by the advice of jesuits and other wicked persons, having violated the fundamental laws; and having withdrawn himself out of this kingdom, has abdicated the government, and that the throne is thereby vacant.” Thus ended at once, by this sudden and unexpected vacancy of the throne, the old line of succession; which from the Conquest had lasted above six hundred years, and from the union of the heptarchy in King Egbert almost nine hundred. The facts themselves thus appealed to, the king’s endeavor to subvert the constitution by breaking the original contract, his violation of the fundamental laws, and his withdrawing himself out of the kingdom, were evident and notorious: and the consequences drawn from these facts (namely, that they amounted to an abdication of the government; which abdication did not affect only the person of the king himself, but also all his heirs, and rendered the throne absolutely and completely vacant) it belonged to our ancestors to determine. For, whenever a question arises between the society at large and any magistrate vested with powers originally delegated by that society, it must be decided by the voice of the society itself; there is not upon earth any other tribunal to resort to. And that these consequences were fairly deduced from these facts, our ancestors have solemnly determined, in a full parliamentary convention representing the whole society. The reasons [212] upon which they decided may be found at large in the parliamentary proceedings of the times; and may be matter of instructive amusement for us to contemplate, as a speculative point of history. But care must be taken not to carry this inquiry further, than merely for instruction or amusement. The idea, that the consciences of posterity were concerned in the rectitude of their ancestors’ decisions, gave birth to those dangerous political heresies, which so long distracted the state, but at length are all happily extinguished. I therefore rather choose to consider this great political measure upon the solid footing of authority, than to reason in its favor from its justice, moderation, and expedience: because that might imply a right of dissenting or revolting from it, in case we should think it to have been unjust, oppressive, or inexpedient. Whereas, our ancestors having most indisputably a competent jurisdiction to decide this great and important question, and having in fact decided it, it is now become our duty at this distance of time to acquiesce in their determination; being born under that establishment which was built upon this foundation, and obliged by every tie, religious as well as civil, to maintain it.

§ 293. (a) Character of the revolution.—But, while we rest this fundamental transaction, in point of authority, upon grounds the least liable to cavil, we are bound both in justice and gratitude to add, that it was conducted with a temper and moderation which naturally arose from its equity; that, however it might in some respects go beyond the letter of our ancient laws (the reason of which will more fully appear hereafter<sup>a</sup>), it was agreeable to the spirit of our constitution, and the rights of human nature; and that though in other points (owing to the peculiar circumstances of things and persons) it was not altogether so perfect as might have been wished, yet from thence a new era commenced, in which the bounds of prerogative and liberty have been better defined, the principles of government more thoroughly examined and understood, and the rights of the subject more explicitly guarded by legal provisions, than in any other period of the English history. In particular it is worthy [<sup>213</sup>] observation that the convention, in this their judgment, avoided with great wisdom the wild extremes into which the visionary theories of some zealous republicans would have led them. They held that this misconduct of King James amounted to an endeavor to subvert the constitution; and not to an actual subversion, or total dissolution of the government, according to the principles of Mr. Locke:<sup>a</sup> which would have reduced the society almost to a state of nature; would have leveled all distinctions of honor, rank, offices, and property; would have annihilated the sovereign power, and in consequence have repealed all positive laws; and would have left the people at liberty to have erected a new system of state upon a new foundation of polity. They therefore very prudently voted it to amount to no more than an abdication of the government, and a consequent vacancy of the throne; whereby the government was allowed to subsist, though the executive magistrate was gone, and the kingly office to remain, though King James was no longer king.<sup>b</sup> And thus the constitution was kept entire; which upon every found principle of government must otherwise have fallen to pieces, had so principal and constituent a part as the royal authority been abolished, or even suspended.

<sup>a</sup> See chap. 7.

<sup>a</sup> On Gov. p. 2. c. 19.

§ 294. e. William and Mary (1689-1702); (1) Regulation of the Succession (Bill of Rights, 1689).—This single postulatam, the vacancy of the throne, being once established, the rest that was then done followed almost of course. For, if the throne be at any time vacant (which may happen by other means besides that of abdication; as if all the blood royal should fail, without any successor appointed by parliament); if, I say, a vacancy by any means whatsoever should happen, the right of disposing of this vacancy seems naturally to result to the lords and commons, the trustees and representatives of the nation. For there are no other hands in which it can so properly be entrusted; and there is a necessity of its being entrusted somewhere, else the whole frame of government must be dissolved and perish. The lords and commons having therefore determined this main fundamental article, that there was a vacancy of the throne, they proceeded to fill up that vacancy in such manner as they <sup>[214]</sup> judged the most proper. And this was done by their declaration of 12 February, 1688,<sup>c</sup> in the following manner: “that William and Mary, Prince and Princess of Orange, be, and be declared king and queen, to hold the crown and royal dignity during their lives, and the life of the survivor of them; and that the sole and full exercise of the regal power be only in, and executed by, the said Prince of Orange, in the names of the said prince and princess, during their joint lives: and after their deceases the said crown and royal dignity to be to the heirs of the body of the said princess; and for default of such issue to the Princess Anne of Denmark and the heirs of her body and for default of such issue to the heirs of the body of the said Prince of Orange.”<sup>4</sup>

<sup>b</sup> Law of Forfeit, 118, 119.

<sup>c</sup> Com. Journ. 12 Feb. 1688.

---

<sup>4</sup> This order of succession was embodied in the great statute known as the Bill of Rights, 1689, 1 W. & M., st. 2, c. 2.

§ 295. f. Anne (1702–1714).—Perhaps, upon the principles before established, the convention might (if they pleased) have vested the regal dignity in a family entirely new, and strangers to the royal blood: but they were too well acquainted with the benefits of hereditary succession, and the influence which it has by custom over the minds of the people, to depart any further from the ancient line than temporary necessity and self-preservation required. They therefore settled the crown, first on King William and Queen Mary, King James' eldest daughter, for their joint lives: then on the survivor of them; and then on the issue of Queen Mary: upon failure of such issue, it was limited to the Princess Anne, King James' second daughter, and her issue; and lastly, on failure of that to the issue of King William, who was the grandson of Charles the First, and nephew as well as son-in-law of King James the Second, being the son of Mary, his eldest sister. This settlement included all the Protestant posterity of King Charles I, except such other issue as King James might at any time have, which was totally omitted through fear of a popish succession. And this order of succession took effect accordingly.

§ 296. (1) Title of William, Mary, and Anne.—These three princes, therefore, King William, Queen Mary, and Queen Anne, did not take the crown by hereditary right or descent, but by way of donation or purchase, as the <sup>[215]</sup> lawyers call it; by which they mean any method of acquiring an estate otherwise than by descent. The new settlement did not merely consist in excluding King James, and the person pretended to be Prince of Wales, and then suffering the crown to descend in the old hereditary channel: for the usual course of descent was in some instances broken through; and yet the convention still kept it in their eye, and paid a great, though not total, regard to it. Let us see how the succession would have stood, if no abdication had happened, and King James had left no other issue than his two daughters, Queen Mary and Queen Anne. It would have stood thus: Queen Mary and her issue; Queen Anne and her issue; King William and his issue. But we may remember that Queen Mary was only nominally queen, jointly with her husband, King William, who alone had the regal power; and King William was personally preferred to Queen Anne, though his issue was postponed to hers. Clearly, therefore, these princes were successively in possession of the crown by a title different from the usual course of descent.

§ 297. (2) Act of Settlement, 1700.—It was towards the end of King William's reign, when all hopes of any surviving issue from any of these princes died with the Duke of Gloucester, that the king and parliament thought it necessary again to exert their power of limiting and appointing the succession, in order to prevent another vacancy of the throne; which must have ensued upon their deaths, as no further provision was made at the revolution than for the issue of Queen Mary, Queen Anne, and King William. The parliament had previously by the statute of 1 W. & M., st. 2, c. 2 (Bill of Rights, 1689), enacted, that every person who should be reconciled to, or hold communion with, the See of Rome, should profess the popish religion, or should marry a papist, should be excluded and forever incapable to inherit, possess, or enjoy, the crown; and that in such case the people should be absolved from their allegiance, and the crown should descend to such persons, being Protestants, as would have inherited the same, in case the person so reconciled, holding communion, professing, or marrying, were naturally dead. To act, therefore, consistently with themselves, and at the same [216] time pay as much regard to the old hereditary line as their former resolutions would admit, they turned their eyes on the Princess Sophia, electress and duchess dowager of Hanover, the most accomplished princess of her age.<sup>4</sup> For, upon the impending extinction of the Protestant posterity of Charles the First, the old law of regal descent directed them to recur to the descendants of James the First; and the Princess Sophia, being the youngest daughter of Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia, who was the daughter of James the First, was the nearest of the ancient blood royal, who was not incapacitated by professing the popish religion. On her, therefore, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants, the remainder of the crown, expectant on the death of King William and Queen Anne without issue, was settled by statute 12 & 13 W. III, c. 2 (Act of Settlement, 1700). And at the same time it was enacted, that whosoever should hereafter come to the possession of the crown should join in the communion of the church of England as by law established.

<sup>4</sup> Sandford in his Genealogical History, published A. D. 1677, speaking (page 535) of the Princesses Elizabeth, Louisa, and Sophia, daughters of the Queen of Bohemia, says, the first was reputed the most learned, the second the greatest artist, and the last one of the most accomplished ladies in Europe.

§ 298. (3) Act of Succession to the Crown, 1707.—This is the last limitation of the crown that has been made by parliament: and these several actual limitations, from the time of Henry IV to the present, do clearly prove the power of the king and parliament to new-model or alter the succession. And indeed it is now again made highly penal to dispute it: for by the statute 6 Ann., c. 7 (1705), it is enacted, that if any person maliciously, advisedly, and directly, shall maintain by writing or printing, that the kings of this realm with the authority of parliament are not able to make laws to bind the crown and the descent thereof, he shall be guilty of high treason; or if he maintains the same by only preaching, teaching, or advised speaking, he shall incur the penalties of a præmunire.

§ 299. 13. House of Hanover (1714—); a. George I (1714–1727); b. George II (1727–1760); c. George III (1760–1820).—The Princess Sophia dying before Queen Anne, the inheritance thus limited descended on her son and heir, King George the First; and, having on the death of the queen taken effect in his person, from him it descended to his late majesty, King George the Second; and from him to his grandson and heir, our present gracious sovereign, King George the Third.<sup>5</sup>

§ 300. Succession to the crown, conditionally hereditary.—<sup>[217]</sup> Hence, it is easy to collect, that the title to the crown is at present hereditary, though not quite so absolutely hereditary as formerly: and the common stock or ancestor, from whom the de-scient must be derived, is also different. Formerly the common stock was King Egbert; then William the Conqueror; afterwards in James the First's time the two common stocks united, and so continued till the vacancy of the throne in 1688: now it is the Princess Sophia, in whom the inheritance was vested by the new king and parliament. Formerly the descent was absolute, and the crown went to the next heir without any restriction: but now, upon the new settlement, the inheritance is conditional; being limited to such heirs only, of the body of the Princess Sophia, as are Protestant members of the church of England, and are married to none but Protestants.

<sup>5</sup> Later sovereigns of the Hanoverian House.—From George the Third to his son, George the Fourth, who, dying childless, was succeeded by his brother, William the Fourth (1830–1837). The next in succession was Victoria (1837–1901), daughter of Edward, Duke of Kent, brother of William the Fourth. From Victoria the crown descended to her son, Edward the Seventh (1901–1910), and on his death, in 1910, to his eldest surviving son, George the Fifth.

§ 301. Constitutional basis of succession to the crown.—And in this due medium consists, I apprehend, the true constitutional notion of the right of succession to the imperial crown of these kingdoms. The extremes, between which it steers, are each of them equally destructive of those ends for which societies were formed and are kept on foot. Where the magistrate, upon every succession, is elected by the people, and may by the express provision of the laws be deposed (if not punished) by his subjects, this may sound like the perfection of liberty, and look well enough when delineated on paper; but in practice will be ever productive of tumult, contention, and anarchy. And, on the other hand, divine indefeasible hereditary right, when coupled with the doctrine of unlimited passive obedience, is surely of all constitutions the most thoroughly slavish and dreadful. But when such an hereditary right, as our laws have created and vested in the royal stock, is closely interwoven with those liberties, which, we have seen in a former chapter, are equally the inheritance of the subject; this union will form a constitution, in theory the most beautiful of any, in practice the most approved, and, I trust, in duration the most permanent. It was the duty of an expounder of our laws to lay this constitution before the student in its true and genuine light; it is the duty of every good Englishman to understand, to revere, to defend it.

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

[218]

OF THE KING'S ROYAL FAMILY.

§ 302. The queen.—The first and most considerable branch of the king's royal family, regarded by the laws of England, is the queen.

§ 303. 1. Queen, regent, regnant, or sovereign.—The queen of England is either queen regent, queen consort, or queen dowager. The queen regent, regnant, or sovereign, is she who holds the crown in her own right; as the first (and perhaps the second) Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth, and Queen Anne; and such a one has the same powers, prerogatives, rights, dignities, and duties, as if she had been a king. This was observed in the entrance of the last chapter, and is expressly declared by statute 1 Mar. I, st. 3, c. 1 (Crown, 1554).

§ 304. 2. Queen consort.—But the queen consort is the wife of the reigning king; and she by virtue of her marriage is participant of divers prerogatives above other women.<sup>a</sup> And, first, she is a public person, exempt and distinct from the king; and not like other married women, so closely connected as to have lost all legal or separate existence so long as the marriage continues. For the queen is of ability to purchase lands, and to convey them, to make leases, to grant copyholds, and do other acts of ownership, without the concurrence of her lord; which no other married woman can do;<sup>b</sup> a privilege as old as the Saxon era.<sup>c</sup> She is also capable of taking a grant from the king, which no other wife is from her husband; and in this particular she agrees with the Augusta, or piissima regina conjux divi imperatoris (the most pious queen consort of the divine emperor) of the Roman laws; who, according to Justinian,<sup>d</sup> was equally [219] capable of making a grant to, and receiving one from, the emperor. The queen of England hath separate courts and officers distinct from the king's

<sup>a</sup> Finch. L. 86.

<sup>c</sup> Seld. Jan. Angl. I. 42.

<sup>b</sup> 4 Rep. 23.

<sup>d</sup> Cod. 5. 16. 26.

not only in matters of ceremony, but even of law; and her attorney and solicitor general are entitled to a place within the bar of his majesty's courts, together with the king's counsel.<sup>a</sup> She may likewise sue and be sued alone, without joining her husband. She may also have a separate property in goods as well as lands, and has a right to dispose of them by will. In short, she is in all legal proceedings looked upon as a feme sole, and not as a feme covert; as a single, not as a married woman.<sup>f</sup> For which the reason given by Sir Edward Coke is this: because the wisdom of the common law would not have the king (whose continual care and study is for the public, and circa ardua regni—concerning the arduous affairs of the kingdom) to be troubled and disquieted on account of his wife's domestic affairs; and therefore it vests in the queen a power of transacting her own concerns, without the intervention of the king, as if she was an unmarried woman.

§ 305. a. Queen consort's exemptions and prerogatives.—The queen hath also many exemptions, and minute prerogatives. For instance: she pays no toll;<sup>g</sup> nor is she liable to any amercement in any court.<sup>h</sup> But in general, unless where the law has expressly declared her exempted, she is upon the same footing with other subjects: being to all intents and purposes the king's subject, and not his equal: in like manner as, in the imperial law, "Augusta legibus soluta non est (The queen is not exempt from the laws)."<sup>i</sup>

§ 306. (1) Queen consort's revenue: queen-gold.—The queen hath also some pecuniary advantages, which form her a distinct revenue; as, in the first place, she is entitled to an ancient perquisite called queen-gold or aurum reginæ; which is a royal revenue, belonging to every queen consort during her marriage with the king, and due from every person who hath made a voluntary offering or fine to the king, amounting to ten marks or upwards, for and in consideration of any privileges, grants, licenses, pardons, or [220] other matter of royal favor conferred upon him by the king: and it is due in the proportion of one-tenth part more, over and above the entire offering or fine made to the king; and becomes

<sup>a</sup> Seld. Tit. Hon. 1. 6. 7.

<sup>h</sup> Finch. L. 185.

<sup>f</sup> Finch. L. 86. Co. Litt. 133.

<sup>i</sup> Ff. 1. 3. 31.

<sup>g</sup> Co. Litt. 133.

an actual debt of record to the queen's majesty by the mere recording of the fine.<sup>k</sup> As, if an hundred marks of silver be given to the king for liberty to take in mortmain, or to have a fair, market, park, chase, or free-warren: there the queen is entitled to ten marks in silver, or (what was formerly an equivalent denomination) to one mark in gold, by the name of queen-gold, or aurum reginæ.<sup>l</sup> But no such payment is due for any aids or subsidies granted to the king in parliament or convocation: nor for fines imposed by courts on offenders, against their will: nor for voluntary presents to the king, without any consideration moving from him to the subject; nor for any sale or contract whereby the present revenues or possessions of the crown are granted away or diminished.<sup>m</sup>

§ 307. (a) Origin and history of the queen-gold.—The original revenue of our ancient queens, before and soon after the Conquest, seems to have consisted in certain reservations or rents out of the demesne lands of the crown, which were expressly appropriated to her majesty, distinct from the king. It is frequent in Domesday Book, after specifying the rent due to the crown, to add likewise the quantity of gold or other renders reserved to the queen.<sup>n</sup> These were frequently appropriated to particular purposes; to buy wool for her majesty's use,<sup>o</sup> to purchase oil for her lamps,<sup>p</sup> or to furnish her attire from head to foot,<sup>q</sup> which was frequently very costly, as one single robe in the fifth year of Henry II

<sup>k</sup> Pryn. Aur. Reg. 2.

<sup>l</sup> 12 Rep. 21. 4 Inst. 358.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid. Pryn. 6. Madox. Hist. Exch. 242.

<sup>n</sup> Bedefordscire. Maner. Lestone redd. per annum xxii lib. etc.: ad opus reginæ ii uncias auri.—Herefordscire. In Lene, etc., consuetud. ut præpositus manerii veniente domina sua (regina) in maner, præsentaret ei xviii oras denar. ut esset ipsa læto animo. (Bedfordshire: The manor of Leighton pays twenty-two pounds per annum, etc.; two ounces of gold for the queen's use. Herefordshire: In Lene, etc., it is the custom for the steward of the manor, on the arrival of his lady (the queen) at the manor to congratulate her with a present of eighteen oras denarii.) Pryn. Append. to Aur. Reg. 2, 3.

<sup>o</sup> Causa coadunandi lanam reginæ. Domesd. Ibid.

<sup>p</sup> Civitas London. Pro oleo ad lampad. reginæ. (Mag. Rot. Pip. temp. Hen. II. Ibid.)

<sup>q</sup> Viccomes Berkescire, xvi l. pro cappa reginæ. (Mag. Rot. Pip. 19.—22 Hen. II. (1175) Ibid.) Civitas Lund. cordubanario reginæ xx s. Mag. Rot. 2 Hen. II. (1155). (Madox Hist. Exch. 419.)

[221] stood the city of London in upwards of fourscore pounds.* A practice somewhat similar to that of the eastern countries, where whole cities and provinces were specifically assigned to purchase particular parts of the queen's apparel.† And, for a further addition to her income, this duty of queen-gold is supposed to have been originally granted: those matters of grace and favor, out of which it arose, being frequently obtained from the crown by the powerful intercession of the queen. There are traces of its payment, though obscure ones, in the book of Domesday and in the great pipe-roll of Henry the First.‡ In the reign of Henry the Second the manner of collecting it appears to have been well understood, and it forms a distinct head in the ancient dialogue of the exchequer<sup>u</sup> written in the time of that prince, and usually attributed to Gervase of Tilbury. From that time downwards it was regularly claimed and enjoyed by all the queen consorts of England till the death of Henry VIII: though after the accession of the Tudor family the collecting of it seems to have been much neglected: and, there being no queen consort afterwards till the accession of James I, a period of near sixty years, its very nature and quantity became then a matter of doubt: and, being referred by the king to the chief justices and chief baron, their report of it was so very unfavorable,‡ that his consort, Queen Anne (though she claimed it), yet never thought proper to exact it. In 1635, 11 Car. I, a time fertile of expedients for raising money upon dormant precedents in our old records (of which ship-money was a fatal instance), the king, at the petition of his Queen Henrietta Maria, issued out his writ<sup>w</sup> for levying it: but afterwards pur-

* Pro roba ad opus reginæ, quater ex l, and vi s. viii d. (Mag. Rot. 5 Hen. II. (1158), Ibid. 250.)

† Solere aiunt barbaros reges Persarum ac Syrorum—uzoribus civitates attribuere, hoc modo; hæc civitas mulieri redimiculum præbeat, hæc in collum, hæc in crines, etc. (They say that the barbarian kings of Persia and Syria were accustomed to assess cities for their wives in this manner; one city was to provide her headdress, another the ornaments for her neck, and the third those for her hair, etc.) (Cic. in Verrem, lib. 3. cap. 33.)

‡ See Madox Disceptat. Epistolar. 74. Pryn. Aur. Reg. Append. 5.

<sup>u</sup> Lib. 2. c. 26.

<sup>v</sup> Mr. Prynne, with some appearance of reason, insinuates that their researches were very superficial. (Aur. Reg. 125.)

<sup>w</sup> 19 Rym. Fœd. 721.

chased it of his consort at the price of ten thousand pounds: finding it, perhaps, too trifling and troublesome to levy. And when afterwards, at the Restoration, by [222] the abolition of the military tenures, and the fines that were consequent upon them, the little that legally remained of this revenue was reduced to almost nothing at all, in vain did Mr. Prynne, by a treatise which does honor to his abilities as a painful and judicious antiquary, endeavor to excite Queen Catherine to revive this antiquated claim.

§ 308. (2) Other perquisites of the queen consort.—Another ancient perquisite belonging to the queen consort, mentioned by all our old writers,<sup>x</sup> and, therefore only, worthy notice, is this: that on the taking of a whale on the coasts, which is a royal fish, it shall be divided between the king and queen; the head only being the king's property, and the tail of it the queen's. "De sturione observetur, quod rex illum habebit integrum: de balena vero sufficit, si rex habeat caput, et regina caudam (Of the sturgeon be it known that the king shall have the whole: but with respect to a whale it is sufficient if the king have the head and the queen the tail)."<sup>y</sup> The reason of this whimsical division, as assigned by our ancient records,<sup>z</sup> was, to furnish the queen's wardrobe with whalebone.

§ 309. (3) Queen consort's personal security and liability.—But further: though the queen is in all respects a subject, yet, in point of the security of her life and person, she is put on the same footing with the king. It is equally treason (by the statute 25 Edw. III—Treason, 1351) to compass or imagine the death of our lady, the king's companion, as of the king himself: and to violate, or defile the queen consort, amounts to the same high crime; as well in the person committing the fact, as in the queen herself, if consenting. A law of Henry the Eighth<sup>a</sup> made it treason also for any woman, who was not a virgin, to marry the king without informing him thereof: but this law was soon after repealed; it trespassing too strongly, as well on natural justice as female modesty. If, however, the queen be accused of any species of treason, she shall (whether consort or dowager) be tried by the peers of parliament, as Queen Ann Boleyn was in 28 Hen. VIII (1536).

<sup>x</sup> Bracton. l. 3. c. 3. Britton. c. 17. Flet. l. 1, c. 45 & 46.

<sup>y</sup> Pryn. Aur. Reg. 127.

<sup>z</sup> Stat. 33 Hen. VIII. c. 21 (Treason, 1542).

§ 310. (4) The prince consort.—The husband of a queen regnant, as Prince George of Denmark was to Queen Anne, is her subject; and may be guilty of high treason against her: but, in the instance of conjugal infidelity, he is not subjected to the same penal [223] restrictions. For which the reason seems to be, that, if a queen consort is unfaithful to the royal bed, this may debase or bastardize the heirs to the crown; but no such danger can be consequent on the infidelity of the husband to a queen regnant.

§ 311. 3. Queen dowager.—A queen dowager is the widow of the king, and as such enjoys most of the privileges belonging to her as queen consort. But it is not high treason to conspire her death; or to violate her chastity, for the same reason as was before alleged, because the succession to the crown is not thereby endangered. Yet still, pro dignitate regali (for the royal dignity), no man can marry a queen dowager without special license from the king, on pain of forfeiting his lands and goods. This Sir Edward Coke<sup>a</sup> tells us was enacted in parliament in 6 Hen. VI (Queen Dowager, 1427), though the statute be not in print. But she, though an alien born, shall still be entitled to dower after the king's demise, which no other alien is.<sup>b</sup> A queen dowager, when married again to a subject, doth not lose her regal dignity, as peeresses dowager do their peerage when they marry commoners. For Katherine, queen dowager of Henry V, though she married a private gentleman, Owen ap Meredith ap Theodore, commonly called Owen Tudor; yet, by the name of Katherine, Queen of England, maintained an action against the bishop of Carlisle. And so, the queen dowager of Navarre marrying with Edmond, Earl of Lancaster, brother to King Edward the First, maintained an action of dower (after the death of her second husband) by the name of Queen of Navarre.<sup>c</sup>

<sup>a</sup> 2 Inst. 18. See Riley's Plac. Parl. 72.

<sup>b</sup> Co. Litt. 31.

<sup>c</sup> 2 Inst. 50.

§ 312. The heir apparent.—The Prince of Wales, or heir apparent to the crown, and also his royal consort, and the princess royal, or eldest daughter of the king, are likewise peculiarly regarded by the laws. For, by statute 25 Edw. III (Treason, 1351), to compass or conspire the death of the former, or to violate the chastity of either of the latter, are as much high treason as to conspire the death of the king, or violate the chastity of the queen. And this upon the same reason, as was before given: because the Prince of Wales is next in succession to the crown, and to violate his wife might taint the blood royal with bastardy; and the eldest daughter of the king is also alone inheritable to the [224] crown, on failure of issue male, and therefore more respected by the laws than any of her younger sisters; insomuch that upon this, united with other (feudal) principles, while our military tenures were in force, the king might levy an aid for marrying his eldest daughter, and her only. The heir apparent to the crown is usually made Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester, by special creation, and investiture; but, being the king's eldest son, he is by inheritance Duke of Cornwall, without any new creation.<sup>4</sup>

§ 313. Meaning of royal family.—The rest of the royal family may be considered in two different lights, according to the different senses in which the term royal family, is used. The larger sense includes all those who are by any possibility inheritable to the crown. Such, before the revolution, were all the descendants of William the Conqueror; who had branched into an amazing extent, by intermarriages with the ancient nobility. Since the revolution and Act of Settlement, it means the Protestant issue of the Princess Sophia; now comparatively few in number, but which in process of time may possibly be as largely diffused. The more confined sense includes only those who are within a certain degree of propinquity to the reigning prince, and to whom, therefore, the law pays an extraordinary regard and respect: but, after that degree is past, they fall into the rank of ordinary subjects, and are seldom considered any further, unless called to the succession upon failure of the nearer lines. For, though collateral consanguinity is regarded indefinitely, with respect to inheritance or suc-

<sup>4</sup> 8 Rep. 1. Seld. Tit. of Hon. 2. 5.

cession, yet it is and can only be regarded within some certain limits in any other respect, by the natural constitution of things and the dictates of positive law.*

§ 314. 1. Younger sons and daughters.—The younger sons and daughters of the king, and other branches of the royal family, who are not in the immediate line of succession, were therefore little further regarded by the ancient law, than to give them to a certain degree precedence before all peers and public officers as well ecclesiastical as temporal. This is done by the statute 31 Hen. VIII, c. 10 (Parliament (Precedence), 1539), [225] which enacts that no person, except the king's children, shall presume to sit or have place at the side of the cloth of estate in the parliament chamber; and that certain great officers therein named shall have precedence above all dukes, except only such as shall happen to be the king's son, brother, uncle, nephew (which Sir Edward Coke † explains to signify grandson or nepos) or brother's or sister's son.

§ 315. 2. Other members of the royal family.—But under the description of the king's children his grandsons are held to be included, without having recourse to Sir Edward Coke's interpretation of nephew: and therefore when his late majesty, King George II, created his grandson Edward, the second son of Frederick, Prince of Wales, deceased, Duke of York, and referred it to the house of lords to settle his place and precedence, they certified ‡ that he ought to have place next to the late Duke of Cumberland, the then king's youngest son; and that he might have a seat on the left hand of the cloth of estate. But when, on the accession of his present majesty, those royal personages ceased to take place as the children, and ranked only as the brother and uncle, of the king, they also left their seats on the side of the cloth of estate: so that when the Duke of Gloucester, his majesty's second brother, took his seat in the house of peers, † he was placed on the upper end of the earls' bench (on which the dukes usually * See Essay on Collateral Consanguinity, in Law-tracts, 4to. Oxon. 1771.

† 4 Inst. 362.

‡ Lords' Journ. 24 Apr. 1760.

† Ibid. 10 Jan. 1765.

sit) next to his royal highness, the Duke of York.* And in 1718, upon a question referred to all the judges by King George I, it was resolved by the opinion of ten against the other two, that the education and care of all the king's grandchildren while minors did belong of right to his majesty as king of this realm, even during their father's life.<sup>1</sup> But they all agreed, that the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, belonged to the king, their grandfather. And the judges have more recently concurred in opinion,<sup>2</sup> that this care and approbation extend also to the presumptive heir of the crown; though to what other branches of the royal family the same did extend they did not find precisely determined. The most frequent instances of the crown's interposition go no [226] further than nephews and nieces;<sup>3</sup> but examples are not wanting of its reaching to more distant collaterals.<sup>m</sup> And the statute 6 Henry VI (Queen Dowager, 1427) before mentioned, which prohibits the marriage of a queen dowager without the consent of the king, assigns this reason for it: "because the dis-

* Ninth edition here inserts: "Therefore, after these degrees are past, peers or others of the blood royal are entitled to no place or precedence except what belongs to them by their personal rank or dignity, which made Sir Edward Walker complain [Tracts, p. 301], that by the hasty creation of Prince Rupert to be Duke of Cumberland, and of the Earl of Lenox to be duke of that name previous to the creation of King Charles' second son, James, to be Duke of York, it might happen that their grandsons would have precedence of the grandsons of the Duke of York. Indeed."

<sup>1</sup> Fortesc. Al. 401-440.

<sup>2</sup> Lords' Journ. 28 Feb. 1772.

<sup>3</sup> See (besides the instances cited in Fortescue Aland) for brothers and sisters; under King Edward III. 4 Rym. 392. 403. 411. 501. 508. 512. 549. 683:—under Henry V. 9 Rym. 710. 711. 741:—under Edward IV. 11 Rym. 564. 565. 590. 601:—under Henry VIII. 13 Rym. 249. 423:—under Edw. VI. 7 St. Tr. 3. 8. For nephews and nieces; under Henry III. 1 Rym. 852:—under Edward I. 2 Rym. 489:—under Edward III. 5 Rym. 561: under Richard II. 7 Rym. 264:—under Richard III. 12 Rym. 232. 244:—under Henry VIII. 15 Rym. 26. 31.

<sup>m</sup> To great nieces; under Edward II. 3 Rym. 575. 644. To first cousins; under Edward III. 5 Rym. 177. To second, and third cousins; under Edward III. 5 Rym. 729:—under Richard II. 7 Rym. 225:—under Henry VI. 10 Rym. 322:—under Henry VII. 12 Rym. 529:—under Queen Elizabeth, Camd. Ann. A. D. 1562. To fourth cousins; under Henry VII. 12 Rym. 329. To the blood royal in general; under Richard II. 7 Rym. 787.

paragement of the queen shall give greater comfort and example to other ladies of estate, who are of the blood royal, more lightly to disparage themselves.”<sup>a</sup> Therefore, by the statute 28 Hen. VIII, c. 18 (Treason, 1536) (repealed, among other statutes of treasons, by 1 Edw. VI, c. 12—Criminal Law, 1547), it was made high treason for any man to contract marriage with the king’s children or reputed children, his sisters or aunts ex parte paterna (by the father’s side), or the children of his brethren or sisters; being exactly the same degrees, to which precedence is allowed by the statute 31 Hen. VIII (Parliament (Precedence), 1539), before mentioned. And now, by statute 12 Geo. III, c. 11 (Royal Marriages, 1772), no descendant of the body of King George II (other than the issue of princesses married into foreign families), is capable of contracting matrimony, without the previous consent of the king signified under the great seal; and any marriage contracted without such consent is void. Provided, that such of the said descendants, as are above the age of twenty-five, may after a twelve months’ notice given to the king’s privy council, contract and solemnize marriage without the consent of the crown; unless both houses of parliament shall, before the expiration of the said year, expressly declare their disapprobation of such intended marriage. And all persons solemnizing, assisting, or being present at, any such prohibited marriage, shall incur the penalties of the statute of præmunire.*

* Previous to the sixth edition, “and the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, did belong of right to his majesty as king of this realm, during their father’s life [Fortesc. Al. 401–440]. And this may suffice for the notice, taken by law of his majesty’s royal family.”

<sup>a</sup> Ril. Plac. Parl. 672.

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

[227]

OF THE COUNCILS BELONGING TO THE KING.

§ 316. Various councils of the king.—The third point of view, in which we are to consider the king, is with regard to his councils. For, in order to assist him in the discharge of his duties, the maintenance of his dignity, and the exertion of his prerogative, the law hath assigned him a diversity of councils to advise with.

§ 317. 1. Parliament.—The first of these is the high court of parliament, whereof we have already treated at large.

§ 318. 2. Peers of the realm.—Secondly, the peers of the realm are by their birth hereditary counselors of the crown, and may be called together by the king to impart their advice in all matters of importance to the realm, either in time of parliament, or, which hath been their principal use, when there is no parliament in being.<sup>a</sup> Accordingly Bracton,<sup>b</sup> speaking of the nobility of his time, says they might properly be called “consules, a consulendo; reges enim tales sibi associant ad consulendum (counselors, from consulting; for kings assemble such for consultation).” And in our law books<sup>c</sup> it is laid down, that peers are created for two reasons: 1. Ad consulendum, 2. Ad defendendum regem (for advising and defending the king); for which reasons the law gives them certain great and high privileges; such as freedom from arrests, etc., even when no parliament is sitting: because the law intends, that they are always assisting the king with their counsel for the commonwealth; or keeping the realm in safety by their prowess and valor.

§ 319. a. Older conventions of the peers.—<sup>[228]</sup> Instances of conventions of the peers, to advise the king, have been in former times very frequent; though now fallen into disuse, by reason of the more regular meetings of parliament. Sir Edward Coke<sup>d</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Co. Litt. 110.

<sup>b</sup> L. 1. c. 8.

<sup>c</sup> 7 Rep. 34. 9. Rep. 49. 12. Rep. 96.

<sup>d</sup> 1 Inst. 110.

gives us an extract of a record, 5 Hen. IV (1403), concerning an exchange of lands between the king and the Earl of Northumberland, wherein the value of each was agreed to be settled by advice of parliament (if any should be called before the feast of St. Lucia) or otherwise by advice of the grand council of peers which the king promises to assemble before the said feast, in case no parliament shall be called. Many other instances of this kind of meeting are to be found under our ancient kings: though the formal method of convoking them had been so long left off, that when King Charles I, in 1640, issued out writs under the great seal to call a great council of all the peers of England to meet and attend his majesty at York, previous to the meeting of the long parliament, the Earl of Clarendon * mentions it as a new invention, not before heard of; that is, as he explains himself, so old, that it had not been practiced in some hundreds of years. But, though there had not so long before been an instance, nor has there been any since, of assembling them in so solemn a manner, yet, in cases of emergency, our princes have at several times thought proper to call for and consult as many of the nobility as could easily be got together: as was particularly the case with King James the Second, after the landing of the Prince of Orange; and with the Prince of Orange himself, before he called that convention parliament, which afterwards called him to the throne.

§ 320. b. A peer's right of audience.—Besides this general meeting it is usually looked upon to be the right of each particular peer of the realm, to demand an audience of the king, and to lay before him, with decency and respect, such matters as he shall judge of importance to the public weal. And therefore, in the reign of Edward II, it was made an article of impeachment in parliament against <sup>[229]</sup> the two Hugh Spencers, father and son, for which they were banished the kingdom, "that they by their evil covin would not suffer the great men of the realm, the king's good counselors, to speak with the king, or to come near him; but only in the presence and hearing of the said Hugh the father and Hugh the son, or one of them, and at their will, and according to such things as pleased them."†

* Hist. b. 2.

† 4 Inst. 53.

§ 321. 3. Judges of the courts of justice.—A third council belonging to the king, are, according to Sir Edward Coke,<sup>1</sup> his judges of the courts of law, for law matters. And this appears frequently in our statutes, particularly 14 Edw. III, c. 5 (Delays in Court, 1340), and in other books of law. So that when the king's council is mentioned generally, it must be defined, particularized, and understood, secundum subjectam materiam (according to the subject matter); and, if the subject be of a legal nature, then by the king's council is understood his council for matters of law; namely, his judges. Therefore, when by statute 16 Rich. II, c. 5 (Præmunire, 1392), it was made a high offense to import into this kingdom any papal bulls, or other processes from Rome; and it was enacted, that the offenders should be attached by their bodies, and brought before the king and his council to answer for such offense; here, by the expression of king's council, were understood the king's judges of his courts of justice, the subject matter being legal:<sup>1</sup> this being the general way of interpreting the word, council.<sup>2</sup>

§ 322. 4. Privy council.—But the principal council belonging to the king is his privy council, which is generally called, by way of eminence, the council. And this, according to Sir Edward Coke's description of it,<sup>1</sup> is a noble, honorable, and reverend assembly, of the king and such as he wills to be of his privy council, in the king's court or palace. The king's will is the sole constituent of a privy counselor; and this also regulates their number, which of ancient times was twelve or thereabouts. Afterwards it increased to so large a number, that it was found inconvenient for secrecy and dispatch: and [230] therefore King Charles the Sec-

<sup>1</sup> 1 Inst. 110.

<sup>1</sup> 4 Inst. 53.

<sup>2</sup> 3 Inst. 125.

<sup>1</sup> Coke's interpretation is extremely doubtful. In Coleridge's Blackstone (vol. I, p. 229) it is suggested that the "council" referred to was a court of very extensive jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, and was the source from which the court of chancery and the star-chamber sprang. Hale omits the "council of the law" from his enumeration of royal councils; his concilium ordinarium being different from Coke's "council of the law."—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 575 n.

ond in 1679 limited it to thirty: whereof fifteen were to be the principal officers of state, and those to be counselors, virtute officii (by virtue of their office); and the other fifteen were composed of ten lords and five commoners of the king's choosing.* But since that time the number has been much augmented, and now continues indefinite. At the same time also, the ancient office of lord president of the council was revived in the person of Anthony, Earl of Shaftsbury; an officer, that by the statute of 31 Hen. VIII, c. 10 (Parliament (Precedence), 1539), has precedence next after the lord chancellor and lord treasurer.<sup>2</sup>

§ 323. a. Appointment of privy counselors.—Privy counselors are made by the king's nomination, without either patent or grant; and, on taking the necessary oaths, they become immediately privy counselors during the life of the king that chooses them, but subject to removal at his discretion.

§ 324. b. Qualifications of privy counselors.—As to the qualifications of members to sit at this board: any natural-born subject of England is capable of being a member of the privy council; taking the proper oaths for security of the government, and the test for security of the church. But, in order to prevent any persons under foreign attachments from insinuating themselves into this important trust, as happened in the reign of King William in many instances, it is enacted by the Act of Settlement,<sup>1</sup> that no person born out of the dominions of the crown of England, unless born of English parents, even though naturalized by parliament, shall be capable of being of the privy council.

* Temple's Mem. part 3.

<sup>2</sup> The Cabinet.—The Cabinet is what in England gives name and character to the king's administration. It is perhaps the most significant feature of the government of Great Britain. The Cabinet consists of those privy counselors, who actually conduct the business of government. The members of the Cabinet are usually the principal officers of state, namely, the lord high chancellor, the prime minister, the lord president of the council, the first lord of the treasury, the first lord of the admiralty, the chancellor of the exchequer, and the five principal secretaries of state,—the secretary for the home department, for foreign affairs, for the colonies, for the war department, and for India. Until recently neither the prime minister nor the Cabinet was officially recognized by the constitution. In 1905, however, the office of prime minister was definitely established. Yet he ranks, although the leading governing authority of the United Kingdom, after the lord chancellor. The ministers who compose the Cabinet are regarded as "responsible" for the acts of the crown, and they hold office practically at the pleasure of the house of commons.

§ 325. c. Duties of privy counselors.—The duty of a privy counselor appears from the oath of office,<sup>m</sup> which consists of seven articles: 1. To advise the king according to the best of his cunning and discretion. 2. To advise for the king's honor and good of the public, without partiality through affection, love, meed, doubt, or dread. 3. To keep the king's counsel secret. 4. To avoid corruption. 5. To help and strengthen the execution of what [231] shall be there resolved. 6. To withstand all persons who would attempt the contrary. And, lastly, in general, 7. To observe, keep and do all that a good and true counselor ought to do to his sovereign lord.

§ 326. d. Jurisdiction of the privy council.—The power of the privy council is to inquire into all offenses against the government, and to commit the offenders to safe custody, in order to take their trial in some of the courts of law.<sup>3</sup> But their jurisdiction herein is only to inquire, and not to punish: and the persons committed by them are entitled to their habeas corpus by statute 16 Car. I, c. 10 (Star-Chamber, 1640), as much as if committed by an ordinary justice of the peace. And, by the same statute, the court of star-chamber, and the court of requests, both of which consisted of privy counselors, were dissolved; and it was declared

<sup>1</sup> Stat. 12 & 13 Will. III. c. 2 (Act of Settlement, 1700).

<sup>m</sup> 4 Inst. 54.

---

<sup>3</sup> For a great length of time this was the common course in regard to all political offenses, but now it is usual to send even political offenders before a magistrate to be dealt with in the ordinary way. When Oxford shot at the queen he was examined in the first instance before the privy council, but was afterwards sent before a police magistrate. Maclean, who committed the same offense in 1882, was not brought before the privy council at all, but was committed in the common way by the borough magistrates at Windsor.—STEPHEN, 1 Hist. Crim. Law, 183; Carter, Hist. Eng. Legal Institutions, 129.

illegal for them to take cognizance of any matter of property, belonging to the subjects of this kingdom. But, in plantation or admiralty causes, which arise out of the jurisdiction of this kingdom; and in matters of lunacy or idiocy,<sup>a</sup> being a special flower of the prerogative; with regard to these, although they may eventually involve questions of extensive property, the privy council continues to have cognizance, being the court of appeal in such cases: or, rather, the appeal lies to the king's majesty himself in council. Whenever also a question arises between two provinces in America or elsewhere, as concerning the extent of their charters and the like, the king in his council exercises original jurisdiction therein, upon the principles of feudal sovereignty. And so likewise when any person claims an island or a province, in the nature of a feudal principality, by grant from the king or his ancestors, the determination of that right belongs to his majesty in council; as was the case of the Earl of Derby with regard to the Isle of Man in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and the Earl of Cardigan and others, as representatives of the Duke of Montague, with relation to the Island of St. Vincent in 1764. But from all the dominions of the crown, excepting Great Britain and Ireland, an appellate jurisdiction [<sup>232</sup>] (in the last resort) is vested in the same tribunal; which usually exercises its judicial authority in a committee of the whole privy council, who hear the allegations and proofs, and make their report to his majesty in council, by whom the judgment is finally given.<sup>4</sup>

§ 327. e. Privileges of privy counselors.—The privileges of privy counselors, as such, consist principally in the security which

<sup>a</sup> 3 P. Wms. 108.

<sup>4</sup> Jurisdiction of the privy council.—The jurisdiction of the privy council is, for the most part, appellate; an appeal lying to it in the last resort from the judgment or sentence of nearly every court of justice in the colonies, dependencies, and all other British possessions (including the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man), as also from the judgment or sentence of the various courts established by virtue of the Foreign Jurisdiction Acts, e. g., the supreme court of China, at Shanghai, the supreme court of Cyprus, the supreme consular court for the dominions of the Sublime Ottoman Porte, and many others. Apart, however, from the case of courts established under the Foreign Juristhe law has given them against attempts and conspiracies to destroy their lives. For, by statute 3 Hen. VII, c. 14 (King's Household, 1487), if any of the king's servants, of his household, conspire or imagine to take away the life of a privy counselor, it is felony, though nothing be done upon it. And the reason of making this statute, Sir Edward Coke<sup>o</sup> tells us, was because such servants have greater and readier means, either by night or by day, to destroy such as be of great authority, and near about the king: and such a conspiracy was, just before this parliament, made by some of King Henry the Seventh's household servants, and great mischief was like to have ensued thereupon. This extends only to the king's menial servants. But the statute 9 Ann., c. 16 (Assaulting a Privy Counselor, 1710), goes further, and enacts that any person that shall unlawfully attempt to kill, or shall unlawfully assault, and strike, or wound, any privy counselor in the execution of his office, shall be a felon without benefit of clergy.

o 3 Inst. 38.

---

diction Acts, no appeal lies to his majesty in council from the judgments of courts situate within countries over which no territorial sovereignty has been authoritatively asserted; even where the judicial administration of any such country has itself been established by the British government.

Under the provisions of modern statutes, all the judicial authority of the privy council is now exercised by a select number of its members, called the judicial committee, who hear the allegations and proofs, and make their report thereon to his majesty in council; whose order in council finally determines the matter. * * *

Another important committee of the privy council is the committee appointed for the consideration of matters relating to trade and foreign plantations, commonly called the board of trade. The board of trade is charged with many miscellaneous duties; among others, the supervision and regulation of railways, the superintendence of all matters relating to merchant ships and seamen, and the discharge of various functions under the acts for the formation of piers and harbors, and under divers acts relating to trading companies and other associations, and to the copyright in designs, and the like. * * *

Like the board of trade, the local government board, the board of education, and the board of agriculture and fisheries, are in their origin committees of the privy council, though they have now become almost independent statutory bodies, each under a single responsible minister. Another committee, called the universities committee of the privy council, exercises certain powers with regard to the amendment or repeal of university statutes.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 581-586.

This statute was made upon the daring attempt of the Sieur Guiscard, who stabbed Mr. Harley, afterwards Earl of Oxford, with a penknife, when under examination for high crimes in a committee of the privy council.

§ 328. f. Dissolution of the privy council.—The dissolution of the privy council depends upon the king's pleasure; and he may, whenever he thinks proper, discharge any particular member, or the whole of it, and appoint another. By the common law also it was dissolved ipso facto by the king's demise; as deriving all its authority from him. But now, to prevent the inconveniences of having no council in being at the accession of a new prince, it is enacted by statute 6 Ann., c. 7 (1706), that the privy council shall continue for six months after the demise of the crown, unless sooner determined by the successor.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>5</sup> By the Demise of the Crown Act, 1901, no fresh appointment to the office of privy councilor is rendered necessary by the demise of the crown.

OF THE KING'S DUTIES.

§ 329. Constitutional duties of the king.—I proceed next to the duties, incumbent on the king by our constitution; in consideration of which duties his dignity and prerogative are established by the laws of the land: it being a maxim in the law, that protection and subjection are reciprocal.<sup>a</sup> And these reciprocal duties are what, I apprehend, were meant by the convention in 1688, when they declared that King James had broken the original contract between king and people. But, however, as the terms of that original contract were in some measure disputed, being alleged to exist principally in theory, and to be only deducible by reason and the rules of natural law: in which deduction different understandings might very considerably differ; it was, after the revolution, judged proper to declare these duties expressly, and to reduce that contract to a plain certainty. So that, whatever doubts might be formerly raised by weak and scrupulous minds about the existence of such an original contract, they must now entirely cease; especially with regard to every prince, who hath reigned since the year 1688.

§ 330. King's duty to govern according to the law.—The principal duty of the king is, to govern his people according to law. Nec regibus infinita aut libera potestas (the power of kings should be neither free nor unlimited), was the constitution of our German ancestors on the Continent.<sup>b</sup> And this is not only consonant to the principles of nature, of <sup>[234]</sup> liberty, of reason, and of society, but has always been esteemed an express part of the common law of England, even when prerogative was at the highest. "The king," saith Bracton,<sup>c</sup> who wrote under Henry III, "ought not to be subject to man, but to God, and to the law; for the law maketh the king. Let the king therefore render to the law, what the law has invested in him with regard to others; dominion, and power: for he is not truly king, where will and pleasure rules, and not the law." And again,<sup>4</sup> "the king also hath a superior, namely God, and also the law, by which he was made a king." Thus Bracton: and Fortescue also,<sup>5</sup> having first well distinguished between a monarchy absolutely and despotically regal, which is introduced by conquest and violence, and a political or civil monarchy, which arises from mutual consent (of which last species he asserts the government of England to be); immediately lays it down as a principle, that "the king of England must rule his people according to the decrees of the laws thereof: insomuch that he is bound by an oath at his coronation to the observance and keeping of his own laws." But, to obviate all doubts and difficulties concerning this matter, it is expressly declared by statute 12 & 13 W. III, c. 2 (Act of Settlement, 1700), "that the laws of England are the birthright of the people thereof; and all the kings and queens who shall ascend the throne of this realm ought to administer the government of the same according to the said laws; and all their officers and ministers ought to serve them respectively according to the same: and therefore all the laws and statutes of this realm, for securing the established religion, and the rights and liberties of the people thereof, and all other laws and statutes of the same now in force, are by his majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal and commons, and by authority of the same, ratified and confirmed accordingly."

<sup>a</sup> 7 Rep. 5.

<sup>c</sup> L. 1. c. 8.

<sup>b</sup> Tac. de Mor. Germ. c. 7.

§ 331. The coronation oath.—And, as to the terms of the original contract between king and people, these I apprehend to be now couched in the [235] coronation oath, which by the statute 1 W. & M., st. 1, c. 6 (Coronation Oath, 1688), is to be administered to every king and queen, who shall succeed to the imperial crown of these realms, by one of the archbishops or bishops of the realm, in the presence of all the people; who on their parts do reciprocally take the oath of allegiance to the crown. This coronation oath is conceived in the following terms:

"The archbishop or bishop shall say, Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of this kingdom of England, and the dominions thereto belonging, according to the statutes in parliament agreed on, and the laws and customs of the same? The king or queen shall say, I solemnly promise so to do.

<sup>4</sup> L. 2. c. 16. § 3.

<sup>5</sup> C. 9. & 34.

“Archbishop or bishop. Will you to your power cause law and justice, in mercy, to be executed in all your judgments? King or queen. I will.

“Archbishop or bishop. Will you to the utmost of your power maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the gospel, and the Protestant reformed religion established by the law? And will you preserve unto the bishops and clergy of this realm, and to the churches committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as by law do or shall appertain unto them, or any of them? King or queen. All this I promise to do.

“After this the king or queen, laying his or her hand upon the holy gospels shall say, The things which I have here before promised I will perform and keep: so help me God. And then shall kiss the book.”

This is the form of the coronation oath, as it is now prescribed by our laws; the principal articles of which appear to be at least as ancient as the mirror of justices,<sup>f</sup> and even as the time of Bracton:<sup>g</sup> but the wording of it was changed at the revolution, because (as the statute alleges) the oath itself [236] had been framed in doubtful words and expressions, with relation to ancient laws and constitutions at this time unknown.<sup>h</sup> However, in what form soever it be conceived, this is most indisputably a fundamental and original express contract; though doubtless the duty of protection is impliedly as much incumbent on the sovereign before

<sup>f</sup> Cap. 1. § 2.

<sup>g</sup> L. 3. tr. 1. c. 9.

<sup>h</sup> In the old folio abridgment of the statutes, printed by Lettou and Machlinia in the reign of Edward IV. (penes me—in my possession) there is preserved a copy of the old coronation oath; which, as the book is extremely scarce, I will here transcribe. Ceo est le serement que le roy jurre a soun coronement: que il gardera et meintenera lez droitez et lez franchises de seynt esglise grauntez auncienment dez droitez roys christiens dEngleterre, et quil gardera toutes sez terres honoures et dignitees droiturelles et franks del coron du roialme dEngleterre en tout maner dentierre sanz null maner damenuement, et lez droitez dispergez dilapidez ou perdus de la corone a soun poiair reappeller en launcien estate, et quil gardera le peas de seynt esglise et al clergie et al people de bon accorde, et quil face faire en toutes sez jugementz owel et droit justice oue discretion et misericorde, et quil grauntera a tenure lez leyes et custumes du roialme, et a soun poiair lez face garder et affirmer que lez gentes du people avont faites et esliez, et les malreys leys et custumes de tout oustera, et ferme peas et establie al people de soun roialme en ceo garde esgardera a soun poiair:

coronation as after: in the same manner as allegiance to the king becomes the duty of the subject immediately on the descent of the crown, before he has taken the oath of allegiance, or whether he ever takes it at all. This reciprocal duty of the subject will be considered in its proper place. At present we are only to observe, that in the king's part of this original contract are expressed all the duties that a monarch can owe to his people: viz., to govern according to law; to execute judgment in mercy; and to maintain the established religion. And, with respect to the latter of these three branches, we may further remark, that by the act of union, 5 Ann., c. 8 (1705), two preceding statutes are recited and confirmed; the one of the parliament of Scotland, the other of the parliament of England: which enact; the former, that every king at his accession shall take and subscribe an oath, to preserve the Protestant religion and Presbyterian church government in Scotland; the latter, that at his coronation he shall take and subscribe a similar oath, to preserve the settlement of the church of England within England, Ireland, Wales, and Berwick, and the territories thereunto belonging.<sup>1</sup> come Dieu luy aide. (This is the oath which the king swears at his coronation; that he will keep and maintain the rights and franchises of holy church granted anciently by the rightful Christian kings of England, and that he will keep all the lands, honors and dignities, rights and privileges, of the crown of the kingdom of England in all respects entire, without any kind of injury, and that he will recall to their ancient state, as far as in him lies, all the scattered, injured, or lost rights of the crown, and that he will keep the peace of holy church, and concord between the clergy and people; and that he will cause equal and true justice to be administered in all his judgments with discretion and mercy, and that he will cause to be maintained the laws and customs of the kingdom, and as far as in him lies will make those be confirmed and kept which the people have made and chosen, and will abolish entirely all bad laws and customs, and will, in all respects, as far as he can, maintain a firm and established peace for the people of his kingdom: So help him God.) (Tit. sacramentum regis. fol. m. ij.) Prynne has also given us a copy of the coronation oaths of Richard III. (Signal Loyalty. II. 246.) Edward VI. (Ibid. 251.) James I, and Charles I. (Ibid. 269.)

---

<sup>1</sup> On the accession of George V, the anti-Catholic feature of the coronation oath, which had been required since 1679, was removed. The Accession Declaration Act, 1910, provides that the king or queen shall simply declare that he or she is a faithful Protestant, and that he or she will uphold and maintain the enactments which secure the Protestant succession to the throne.

CHAPTER THE SEVENTH. [237]

OF THE KING'S PREROGATIVE.

§ 332. Constitutional limitations on the royal prerogative.—It was observed in a former chapter,<sup>a</sup> that one of the principal bulwarks of civil liberty, or (in other words) of the British constitution, was the limitation of the king's prerogative by bounds so certain and notorious, that it is impossible he should ever exceed them, without the consent of the people, on the one hand; or without, on the other, a violation of that original contract, which in all states impliedly, and in ours most expressly, subsists between the prince and the subject. It will now be our business to consider this prerogative minutely; to demonstrate its necessity in general; and to mark out in the most important instances its particular extent and restrictions: from which considerations this conclusion will evidently follow, that the powers, which are vested in the crown by the laws of England, are necessary for the support of society; and do not entrench any further on our natural liberties, than is expedient for the maintenance of our civil.

§ 333. 1. Former pretensions.—There cannot be a stronger proof of that genuine freedom, which is the boast of this age and country, than the power of discussing and examining, with decency and respect, the limits of the king's prerogative. A topic, that in some former ages was thought too delicate and sacred to be profaned by the pen of a subject. It was ranked among the arcana imperii (secrets of the empire); and, like the mysteries of the bona dea (good goddess), was [238] not suffered to be pried into by any but such as were initiated in its service: because perhaps the exertion of the one, like the solemnities of the other, would not bear the inspection of a rational and sober inquiry. The glorious Queen Elizabeth herself made no scruple to direct her parliaments to abstain from discoursing of matters of state;<sup>b</sup> and it was the constant language of this favorite princess and her ministers, that even that august assembly "ought not to deal, to judge, or to meddle, with her majesty's prerogative royal."c And her successor, King James the First, who had imbibed high notions of the divinity of regal sway, more than once laid it down in his speeches, that "as it is atheism and blasphemy in a creature to dispute what the Deity may do, so it is presumption and sedition in a subject to dispute what a king may do in the height of his power: good Christians, he adds, will be content with God's will, revealed in his His word; and good subjects will rest in the king's will, revealed in his law."d § 334. 2. The king subject to the law.—But, whatever might be the sentiments of some of our princes, this was never the language of our ancient constitution and laws. The limitation of the regal authority was a first and essential principle in all the Gothic systems of government established in Europe; though gradually driven out and overborne, by violence and chicane, in most of the kingdoms on the Continent. We have seen, in the preceding chapter, the sentiments of Bracton and Fortescue, at the distance of two centuries from each other. And Sir Henry Finch, under Charles the First, after the lapse of two centuries more, though he lays down the law of prerogative in very strong and emphatical terms, yet qualifies it with a general restriction, in regard to the liberties of the people. "The king hath a prerogative in all things, that are not injurious to the subject; for in them all it must be remembered, that the king's prerogative stretcheth not to the doing of any wrong."e Nihil enim aliud potest rex, nisi id solum quod [239] de jure potest (for the king can only act according to law).f And here it may be some satisfaction to remark, how widely the civil law differs from our own, with regard to the authority of the laws over the prince, or (as a civilian would rather have expressed it) the authority of the prince over the laws. It is a maxim of the English law, as we have seen from Bracton, that "rex debet esse sub lege, quia lex facit regem (the king should be subject to the law, because the law makes the king)": the imperial law will tell us, that "in omnibus, imperatoris excipitur fortuna; cui ipsas leges Deus subjecit (the interest of the emperor

<sup>a</sup> Chap. 1. page *141.

<sup>b</sup> Dewes. 479.

c Ibid. 645.

• Finch. L. 84. 85.

d King James' Works, 557. 531.

f Bracton, l. 3. tr. 1. c. 9.

is in all things to be reserved; to whom God has made the laws themselves subject)."<sup>a</sup> We shall not long hesitate to which of them to give the preference, as most conducive to those ends for which societies were framed, and are kept together; especially as the Roman lawyers themselves seem to be sensible of the unreasonableness of their own constitution. "Decet tamen principem," says Paulus, "servare leges, quibus ipse solutus est (nevertheless it becomes a prince to protect those laws from which he is himself exempt)."<sup>b</sup> This is at once laying down the principle of despotic power, and at the same time acknowledging its absurdity.

§ 335. Meaning of prerogative.—By the word "prerogative" we usually understand that special pre-eminence, which the king hath over and above all other persons, and out of the ordinary course of the common law, in right of his regal dignity.<sup>1</sup> It signifies, in its etymology (from præ—before and rogo—to ask) something that is required or demanded before, or in preference to all others. And hence it follows, that it must be in its nature singular and eccentric; that it can only be applied to those rights and capacities which the king enjoys alone, in contradistinction to others, and not to those which he enjoys in common with any of his subjects: for if once any one prerogative of the crown could be held in common with the subject, it would cease to be prerogative any longer. And therefore Finch<sup>1</sup> lays it down as a maxim, that the prerogative is that law in case of the king, which is law in no case of the subject.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Nov. 105. § 2.

<sup>1</sup> Finch. L. 85.

<sup>b</sup> Ff. 32. 1. 23.

---

<sup>1</sup> This definition has been called too vague; and it has been said that the prerogative may be more precisely defined as "the discretionary authority of the executive"; i. e., everything which the king, or his servants in his name, may do without the authority of an act of parliament. Anson, 2 Law and Custom, p. 2; and see Dicey, Law of the Constitution (6th ed.), p. 368.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 588.

<sup>2</sup> Historical view of the king's prerogative.—"The position which the king and his prerogative hold in the full-grown common law is well summarized in Blackstone's Commentaries. Beginning with the statement that the king is subject to law, Blackstone proceeds to distinguish between his direct and § 336. Classes of prerogative.—Prerogatives are either direct or incidental. The direct are such positive substantial parts of the royal character and [240] authority, as are rooted in and spring from the king's political person, considered merely by itself, without reference to any other extrinsic circumstance; as, the right of sending ambassadors, of creating peers, and of making war or peace. But such prerogatives as are incidental bear always a relation to something else, distinct from the king's person; and are indeed only exceptions, in favor of the crown, to those general rules that are established for the rest of the community: such as, that no costs shall be recovered against the king; that the king can never be a joint tenant; and that his debt shall be preferred before a debt to any of his subjects. These and an infinite number of other instances will better be understood, when we come regularly to consider the rules themselves, to which these incidental prerogatives are exceptions. And therefore we will at present only dwell upon the king's substantive or direct prerogatives.

his incidental prerogatives. The direct prerogatives 'are such positive substantial parts of the royal character and authority as are rooted in and spring from the king's political person.' By virtue of these prerogatives he is personally sovereign, and has the pre-eminence over all within his realm; he can do no wrong; he can never die; he is the representative of the state in its dealings with foreign nations; he is a part of the legislature; the head of the army; the fountain of justice, always present in all his courts; the fountain of honor; the arbiter of commerce; the head of the church. The incidental prerogatives are, so Blackstone tells us, 'only exceptions in favor of the crown to those general rules that are established for the rest of the community.' Instances are the rules that no costs shall be recovered against the king, that he cannot be a joint tenant, that a debt due to him is preferred.

"We could have no better illustration of the gradual way in which the common law has been built up than these doctrines as to the meaning and extent of the king's prerogative. The department of law relating to the prerogative is the oldest part of our constitution and our law; and it bears upon it the marks of all the varied phases through which that constitution and that law have passed. It is this fact which gives to it its 'peculiar import,' and makes it impossible to define it completely 'by any theory of executive functions.' Taking a broad view of our legal and constitutionad history, we can see three distinct periods in its development. (1) The mediæval period. In this period the king is regarded indeed as the head and the representative of the state and the fountain of justice; but it is then that the doctrines as to those prerogatives which Blackstone calls 'incidental' were elaborated. The king is regarded quite as much as a superior feudal lord with special privileges as a ruler entrusted with the executive powers of the state. (2) It is to the lawyers of the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries that we owe those attributes of perfection and immortality with which the law still invests the king. They gave him a politic capacity, and they emphasized his powers in such a way that, through his prerogative, he was able to act as the executive of a modern state. What Blackstone calls the direct prerogatives of the crown were given their modern shape by lawyers who based their theories upon the achievements of the Tudor dynasty. (3) In the seventeenth century the controversy as to the relation of the prerogative to the law was fought out and decided. The events of that century decided that the prerogative was subject to law; and Blackstone prefaces his account of it by a clear statement to this effect. In this section we are concerned chiefly with the mediæval period and its influence upon the subsequent law.

§ 337. 1. Direct prerogatives.—These substantive or direct prerogatives may again be divided into three kinds: being such as regard, first, the king's royal character; secondly, his royal authority; and, lastly, his royal income. These are necessary, to secure reverence to his person, obedience to his commands, and an affluent supply for the ordinary expenses of government; without all of which it is impossible to maintain the executive power in due independence and vigor. Yet, in every branch of this large and extensive dominion, our free constitution has interposed such seasonable checks and restrictions, as may curb it from trampling on those liberties, which it was meant to secure and establish. The enormous weight of prerogative, if left to itself (as in arbitrary governments it is), spreads havoc and destruction among all the inferior movements: but, when balanced and regulated (as with us) by its proper counterpoise, timely and judiciously ap-

"In this period the prerogative has, so to speak, a double aspect. The king is the head and the representative of the English state in a truer sense, perhaps, than any other ruler in Europe could claim to be the head and representative of his state. The strong centralized government which had given England a common law gave the king this position. But, for all that, men's legal and political ideas were cast in a feudal mold. Legal theories could not help being influenced by these ideas. They have exercised, as we have seen, an enduring influence upon the land law, and, they had some effect upon the law of treason. They exercised at this period a large influence upon the view which the law took of the king and his prerogative."—HOLDSWORTH, 3 Hist. Eng. Law, 350.

Professor Holdsworth continues, in the scholarly and interesting way characteristic of his work, to "say something, first, of the feudal ideas which colored men's conception of the prerogative at this period, and, secondly, of the national ideas."

plied, its operations are then equable and certain, it invigorates the whole machine, and enables every part to answer the end of its construction.

In the present chapter we shall only consider the two first of these divisions, which relate to the king's political <sup>[241]</sup> character and authority; or, in other words, his dignity and regal power; to which last the name of prerogative is frequently narrowed and confined. The other division, which forms the royal revenue, will require a distinct examination; according to the known distribution of the feudal writers, who distinguish the royal prerogatives into the majora and minora regalia (the greater and lesser regalia), in the latter of which classes the rights of the revenue are ranked. For, to use their own words, "majora regalia imperii præ-eminentiam spectant; minora vero ad commodum pecuniarium immediate attinent; et hæc proprie fiscalia sunt, et ad jus fisci pertinent (the greater royalties of the kingdom appertain to dignity of station; but the inferior immediately concern the acquisition of money; these are properly fiscal, and relate to the rights of the king's revenue)." <sup>k</sup>

§ 338. a. The royal dignity.—First, then, of the royal dignity. Under every monarchical establishment, it is necessary to distinguish the prince from his subjects, not only by the outward pomp and decorations of majesty, but also by ascribing to him certain qualities, as inherent in his royal capacity, distinct from and superior to those of any other individual in the nation. For, though a philosophical mind will consider the royal person merely as one man appointed by mutual consent to preside over many others, and will pay him that reverence and duty which the principles of society demand, yet the mass of mankind will be apt to grow insolent and refractory, if taught to consider their prince as a man of no greater perfection than themselves. The law therefore ascribes to the king, in his high political character, not only large powers and emoluments, which form his prerogative and revenue, but likewise certain attributes of a great and transcendent nature; by which the people are led to consider him in the light of a superior being, and to pay him that awful respect, which may enable him with greater ease to carry on the business of government. This is what I understand by the royal dignity, the several branches of which we will now proceed to examine.

<sup>k</sup> Peregrin. de Jure Fisc. l. 1, c. 1. num. 9.

§ 339. (1) Sovereignty.—And, first, the law ascribes to the king the attribute of sovereignty, or pre-eminence. “Rex est vicarius,” says Bracton,<sup>1</sup> “et minister Dei in terra: omnis quidem sub eo est, et ipse [242] sub nullo, nisi tantum sub Deo (The king is the vicegerent and minister of God on earth: all are subject to him; and he is subject to none but to God alone).” He is said to have imperial dignity; and in charters before the Conquest is frequently styled basileus (king) and imperator (emperor), the titles respectively assumed by the emperors of the east and west.<sup>m</sup> His realm is declared to be an empire, and his crown imperial, by many acts of parliament, particularly the statutes 24 Hen. VIII, c. 12 (Appeals to Rome, 1532), and 25 Hen. VIII, c. 28 (Lady Dowager, 1533);<sup>n</sup> which at the same time declare the king to be the supreme head of the realm in matters both civil and ecclesiastical, and of consequence inferior to no man upon earth, dependent on no man, accountable to no man. Formerly, there prevailed a ridiculous notion, propagated by the German and Italian civilians, that an emperor could do many things which a king could not (as the creation of notaries and the like) and that all kings were in some degree subordinate and subject to the emperor of Germany or Rome.<sup>3</sup> The meaning, therefore, of the legislature, when it uses these terms of empire and imperial, and applies them to the realm and crown of England, is only to assert that our king is equally sovereign and independent within these his dominions, as any emperor is in his empire;<sup>o</sup> and owes no kind of subjection to any

<sup>1</sup> L. 1. c. 8.

<sup>m</sup> Seld. Tit. of Hon. I. 2.

<sup>n</sup> See also 24 Geo. II. c. 24 (Minority of Successor to Crown, 1750). 5 Geo. III. c. 27 (Minority of Heir to the Crown, 1765).

<sup>o</sup> Rex allegavit, quod ipse omnes libertates haberet in regno suo, quas imperator vendicabat in imperio. (The king alleged that he should possess the same privileges in his kingdom as an emperor claimed in his empire.) (M. Paris, A. D. 1095.)

<sup>3</sup> Blackstone here refers to the head of the Holy Roman Empire, which was formally dissolved in 1806. Its history is given in a famous book, Bryce, Holy Roman Empire.

other potentate upon earth. Hence it is, that no suit or action can be brought against the king, even in civil matters, because no court can have jurisdiction over him.<sup>4</sup> For all jurisdiction implies superiority of power: authority to try would be vain and idle, without an authority to redress; and the sentence of a court would be contemptible, unless that court had power to command the execution of it: but who, says Finch,<sup>p</sup> shall command the king? Hence it is likewise, that by law the person of the king is sacred, even though the measures pursued in his reign be completely tyrannical and arbitrary: for no jurisdiction upon earth has power to try him in a criminal way; much less to condemn him to punishment. If any foreign jurisdiction had this power, as was formerly claimed by the pope, the independence of the kingdom would be no more: and, if such a power were vested in any domestic [243] tribunal, there would soon be an end of the constitution, by destroying the free agency of one of the constituent parts of the sovereign legislative power.

▷ Finch. L. 83.

---

<sup>4</sup> No action lies against the state.—For the same reason no action lies under a republican form of government against the state or nation, unless the legislature have authorized it: a principle recognized in the jurisprudence of the United States, and of the individual states. (Case v. Terrell, 11 Wall. 199, 20 L. Ed. 134; Hill v. United States, 9 How. 386, 18 L. Ed. 185; United States v. McLemore, 4 How. 286, 11 L. Ed. 977; Avery v. United States, 12 Wall. 304, 20 L. Ed. 405; People v. Dennison, 84 N. Y. 272, with many cases cited.) For the allowance of such an action implies the right to enforce the judgment rendered against any dissent or opposition made by the executive or legislative departments: and this would be inconsistent with the fundamental theory of our constitutions, which make one or the other of these independent and supreme in every matter that could properly be the subject of a judgment at law. It is not necessary, therefore, to derive the origin of this rule from the infallibility attributed to the king or the sacredness of his person, or to suppose that it is inconsistent with free government. The royal exemptions from the law of the land have no counterpart with us. The president or the governor of a state may be convicted of treason or other crimes as a man, and impeached and removed from office as a magistrate. (U. S. Const., arts. 1, 11, and the state constitutions, passim.)

Still less is it necessary to invoke as the foundation of this rule Mr. Austin's theory, that as all law is given by the sovereign, therefore no subject can have any rights against that sovereign. (Lectures on Jurisp. 1, 280, 292.) Even § 340. (a) Protection of the subject.—Are, then, it may be asked, the subjects of England totally destitute of remedy, in case the crown should invade their rights, either by private injuries, or public oppressions? To this we may answer, that the law has provided a remedy in both cases.

§ 341. (i) In cases of private injuries.—And, first, as to private injuries: if any person has, in point of property, a just demand upon the king, he must petition him to his court of chancery, where his chancellor will administer right as a matter of grace, though not upon compulsion.<sup>45</sup> And this is entirely consonant to what is laid down by the writers on natural law. “A subject,” says Puffendorf,<sup>r</sup> “so long as he continues a subject, in the establishment of the court of claims, Congress has adhered to this principle; for the judgments of that court only ascertain the amount justly due from the government to individuals, and leave to Congress the duty of appropriating funds for their payment. A suit in the court of claims is equivalent to a “petition of right” to the crown in England. (United States v. O’Keefe, 11 Wall. 178, 20 L. Ed. 131; Carlisle v. United States, 16 Wall. 147, 21 L. Ed. 426.) Some of the states have provided by general act that actions may be brought against the state or the people for the recovery of lands, or similar relief. Most of them, however, leave the matter as at common law. But the rule does not prevent the bringing of a writ of error or like proceeding in which the state may be named defendant, or the pleading by a defendant of a setoff or counterclaim against the state, legal or equitable, though in the latter case no recovery of a balance due from the state could follow. (United States v. Eckford, 6 Wall. 484, 18 L. Ed. 920; People v. Dennison, 84 N. Y. 272.)—HAMMOND.

<sup>4</sup> Finch. L. 255.

<sup>r</sup> Law of N. and N. b. 8. c. 10.

---

<sup>5</sup> Cited and followed, 2 Dall. 437; 12 Peters, 750; 11 Allen, 171. Judge Wilson, in Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 460, tries hard to show that Blackstone was wrong here, but his authorities are very weak. The doctrine that the king cannot be sued in his own courts is at least as old as Bracton, who states explicitly that he can only be besought by petition, since his writ does not run against himself. (Fols. 5, 171.) There are several passages in the Year-Books of the reign of Edward III, which state that in the reign of Henry III. the king could be sued as a private person, though the one in which Wilby, C. J., is said to have reported that he himself had seen such a writ, Præcipe Henricæ Regi, etc., is not to be found in the common editions. But Staunforde, who quotes them (Prærog. Regis 42 a), notices their inconsistency with Bracton, and with good judgment doubts them, and they are refuted by cases in the recently published Note Book, ed. Maitland.—HAMMOND.

hath no way to oblige his prince to give him his due, when he refuses it; though no wise prince will ever refuse to stand to a lawful contract. And, if the prince gives the subject leave to enter an action against him, upon such contract, in his own courts, the action itself proceeds rather upon natural equity, than upon the municipal laws." For the end of such action is not to compel the prince to observe the contract, but to persuade him. And, as to personal wrongs; it is well observed by Mr. Locke,* "the harm which the sovereign can do in his own person not being likely to happen often, nor to extend itself far; nor being able by his single strength to subvert the laws, nor oppress the body of the people (should any prince have so much weakness and ill nature as to endeavor to do it),—the inconveniency, therefore, of some particular mischiefs, that may happen sometimes, when a heady prince comes to the throne, are well recompensed by the peace of the public and security of the government, in the person of the chief magistrate being thus set out of the reach of danger."

§ 342. (ii) In cases of public oppression—(aa) Responsibility of king's advisers.—<sup>[244]</sup> Next, as to cases of ordinary public oppression, where the vitals of the constitution are not attacked, the law hath also assigned a remedy. For as a king cannot misuse his power, without the advice of evil counselors, and the assistance of wicked ministers, these men may be examined and punished. The constitution has therefore provided, by means of indictments, and parliamentary impeachments, that no man shall dare to assist the crown in contradiction to the laws of the land. But it is at the same time a maxim in those laws, that the king himself can do no wrong: since it would be a great weakness and absurdity in any system of positive law, to define any possible wrong, without any possible redress.

§ 343. (bb) Remedies for oppression.—For, as to such public oppressions as tend to dissolve the constitution, and subvert the fundamentals of government, they are cases, which the law will not, out of decency suppose: being incapable of distrusting those, whom it has invested with any part of the supreme power; since such distrust would render the exercise of that power precarious and impracticable.† For, wherever the law expresses its distrust of abuse of power, it always vests a superior coercive authority in some other hand to correct it; the very notion of which destroys the idea of sovereignty. If, therefore (for example), the two houses of parliament, or either of them, had avowedly a right to animadvert on the king, or each other, or if the king had a right to animadvert on either of the houses, that branch of the legislature, so subject to animadversion, would instantly cease to be part of the supreme power; the balance of the constitution would be overturned; and that branch or branches, in which this jurisdiction resided, would be completely sovereign. The supposition of law therefore is, that neither the king nor either house of parliament (collectively taken) is capable of doing any wrong; since in such cases the law feels itself incapable of furnishing any adequate [245] remedy. For which reason all oppressions which may happen to spring from any branch of the sovereign power, must necessarily be out of the reach of any stated rule, or express legal provision: but, if ever they unfortunately happen, the prudence of the times must provide new remedies upon new emergencies.

* On Gov. p. 2. § 205.

§ 344. (cc) Theory of the king's abdication.—Indeed, it is found by experience, that whenever the unconstitutional oppressions, even of the sovereign power, advance with gigantic strides and threaten desolation to a state, mankind will not be reasoned out of the feelings of humanity; nor will sacrifice their liberty by a scrupulous adherence to those political maxims, which were originally established to preserve it. And therefore, though the positive laws are silent, experience will furnish us with a very remarkable case, wherein nature and reason prevailed. When King James the Second invaded the fundamental constitution of the realm, the convention declared an abdication, whereby the throne was rendered vacant, which induced a new settlement of the crown. And so far as this precedent leads, and no further, we may now be allowed to lay down the law of redress against public oppression. If, therefore, any future prince should endeavor to subvert the constitution by breaking the original contract between king and people, should violate the fundamental laws, and should withdraw himself out of the kingdom; we are now authorized to declare that this conjunction of circumstances would amount to an abdication, and the throne would be thereby vacant. But it is not for us to say that any one, or two, of these ingredients would amount to such a situation; for there our precedent would fail us. In these, therefore, or other circumstances, which a fertile imagination may furnish, since both law and history are silent, it becomes us to be silent too; leaving to future generations whenever necessity and the safety of the whole shall require it, the exertion of those inherent (though latent) powers of society, which no climate, no time, no constitution, no contract, can ever destroy or diminish.

† See these points more fully discussed in the Considerations of the Law of Forfeiture, 3d edit. pag. 109-126, wherein the very learned author has thrown many new and important lights on the texture of our happy constitution.

§ 345. (2) The royal perfection: "The king can do no wrong."<sup>[246]</sup> Besides the attribute of sovereignty, the law also ascribes to the king, in his political capacity, absolute perfection. The king can do no wrong.<sup>6</sup> Which ancient and fundamental maxim is not to be understood, as if everything transacted by the government was of course just and lawful, but means only two things. First, that whatever is exceptionable in the conduct of public affairs is not to be imputed to the king, nor is he answerable for it personally to his people: for this doctrine would totally destroy that constitutional independence of the crown, which is necessary for the balance of power, in our free and active, and therefore compounded constitution. And, secondly, it means that the prerogative of the crown extends not to do any injury; it is created for the benefit of the people, and therefore cannot be exerted to their prejudice.*

<sup>6</sup> In the second place, we are plunged into talk about kings who do not die, who are never under age, who are ubiquitous, who do no wrong and (says Blackstone) think no wrong; and such talk has not been innocuous. Readers of Kinglake's Crimea will not have forgotten the instructive and amusing account of "the two kings" who shared between them control of the British army: "the personal king" and "his constitutional rival."—MAITLAND, 3 Coll. Papers, 251. And see this interesting essay of Maitland's on "The Crown as Corporation." See, also, Maitland's remarks in his Constitutional History of England, 482.

§ 346. (a) Corrective for royal mistakes.—The king, moreover, is not only incapable of doing wrong, but even of thinking wrong; he can never mean to do an improper thing: in him is no folly or weakness. And therefore if the crown should be induced to grant any franchise or privilege to a subject contrary to reason, or in anywise prejudicial to the commonwealth, or a private person, the law will not suppose the king to have meant either an unwise or an injurious action, but declares that the king was deceived in his grant; and thereupon such grant is rendered void, merely upon the foundation of fraud and deception, either by or upon those agents, whom the crown has thought proper to employ. For the law will not cast an imputation on that magistrate whom it intrusts with the executive power, as if he was capable of intentionally disregarding his trust: but attributes to mere imposition (to which the most perfect of sublunary beings must still continue liable) those little inadvertencies, which, if charged on the will of the prince, might lessen him in the eyes of his subjects.

§ 347. (b) Parliamentary right of remonstrance.—<sup>[247]</sup> Yet still, notwithstanding this personal perfection, which the law attributes to the sovereign, the constitution has allowed a latitude of supposing the contrary, in respect to both houses of parliament; each of which, in its turn, hath exerted the right of remonstrating and complaining to the king even of those acts of royalty, which are most properly and personally his own; such as messages signed by himself, and speeches delivered from the throne. And yet, such is the reverence which is paid to the royal person, that though the two houses have an undoubted right to consider these acts of state in any light whatever, and accordingly treat them in their addresses as personally proceeding from the prince, yet among themselves (to preserve the more perfect decency, and for the greater freedom of debate), they usually suppose them to flow from the advice of the administration. But the privilege of canvassing thus freely the personal acts of the sovereign (either directly, or even through the medium of his reputed advisers) belongs to no individual, but is confined to those august assemblies: and there, too, the objections must be proposed with the utmost respect and deference. One member was sent to the tower<sup>w</sup> for suggesting that his majesty's answer to the address of the commons contained "high words to fright the members out of their duty," and another,<sup>x</sup> for saying that a part of the king's speech "seemed rather to be calculated for the meridian of Germany than Great Britain, and that the king was a stranger to our language and constitution."

* Plowd. 487.

§ 348. (c) "Time runs not against the king."—In further pursuance of this principle, the law also determines that in the king can be no negligence, or laches, and therefore no delay will bar his right. Nullum tempus occurrit regi (no time runs against the king) is the standing maxim upon all occasions:<sup>7</sup> for the law

<sup>w</sup> Com. Journ. 18 Nov. 1685.

<sup>x</sup> Ibid. 4 Dec. 1717.

<sup>7</sup> Lapse of time does not bar the sovereign.—From the doctrine embodied in the maxim, nullum tempus occurrit regi, it followed that not only the civil claims of the crown were not barred by lapse of time, but that criminal prosecutions might be commenced no matter how long after the commission of the offense. Except as modified by statute, this is still the law. But in modern times it has been largely qualified by acts of parliament. The Crown Suits Act, 1769, also known as the Nullum Tempus Act, as amended in 1861, the crown is now barred from its civil right in suits relating to landed property, after sixty years. By the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, re-enacting provisions contained in the act of 1792 (32 Geo. III, c. 58), the crown is barred in informations for usurping corporate offices or franchises after the lapse of six years, or, in quo warranto against a municipal corporation, after one year. And in criminal matters, there are certain offenses which can be prosecuted only within a limited time after their commission. Thus, by the Treason Act of 1695, an indictment for treason, except for an attempt to assassinate the king, must be found within three years after the commission of the act of treason.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 600; BROOM, Legal Maxims (8th ed.), 52.

The principle of the maxim applies equally in the United States, and consequently, statutes of limitation do not run against a state or the federal government, unless by express provision of the statute itself. Mr. Justice Story, in United States v. Hoar, 2 Mason, 311, Fed. Cas. No. 15,373, said: "The true reason, indeed, why the law has determined that there can be no negligence or laches imputed to the crown, and, therefore, no delay should bar its right (though sometimes asserted to be, because the king is always intends that the king is always busied for the public good, and therefore has not leisure to assert his right within the times limited to subjects.<sup>7</sup> In the king also can be no stain or corruption of [248] blood: for if the heir to the crown were attained of busied for the public good, and, therefore, has not leisure to assert his right within the times limited to subjects, 1 Bl. Comm. 247), is to be found in the great public policy of preserving the public rights, revenues and property from injury and loss, by the negligence of public officers. And though this is sometimes called a prerogative right, it is in fact nothing more than a reservation or exception, introduced for the public benefit, and equally applicable to all governments. . . . But, independently of any doctrine founded on the notion of prerogative, the same construction of statutes of this sort ought to prevail, founded upon the legislative intention. Where the government is not expressly or by necessary implication included, it ought to be clear from the nature of the mischiefs to be redressed, or the language used, that the government itself was in contemplation of the legislature, before a court of law would be authorized to put such an interpretation upon any statute. In general, acts of the legislature are meant to regulate and direct the acts and rights of citizens; and in most cases, the reasoning applicable to them applies with very different, and often contrary force to the government itself." (Stanley v. Schwalby, 147 U. S. 508, 515, 37 L. Ed. 259, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418.)

<sup>7</sup> Finch. L. 82. Co. Litt. 90.

Judge Dillon has said that a careful examination of the decisions shows that the maxim, nullum tempus occurrit regi, is not restricted in its application to sovereign states or governments, but extends to public rights of all kinds. It protects municipal and other public corporations in all property held for or devoted to a public use, no matter how lax the municipal authorities may have been in asserting the rights of the public. Here, however, a distinction must be made between a municipality acting in a public or governmental capacity and a municipality acting in a private or proprietary capacity. It is only in the former capacity that it has the exemptions implied in the maxim; in the latter, it is subject to the general statute of limitations in force. Thus, it is widely held that no adverse possession, however long-continued, of a public street will suffice to destroy the rights of the public in such street. (Webb v. Demopolis, 95 Ala. 116, 21 L. R. A. 62, 13 South. 289; Brown v. Trustees of Schools, 224 Ill. 184, 115 Am. St. Rep. 146, 8 Ann. Cas. 96, 79 N. E. 579.) The rule is held to apply, also, to a suit by a state university (Cox v. Board of Trustees, 161 Ala. 639, 49 South. 814); to lands purchased for and used as a county hospital (Yolo County v. Barney, 79 Cal. 375, 12 Am. St. Rep. 152, 21 Pac. 833); and to lands held by a district agricultural society. (Sixth Dist. Agric. Assn. v. Wright, 154 Cal. 119, 97 Pac. 144.) But, generally, in actions on tort or contract, a municipal corporation may have the statute of limitations pleaded against it. (3 Dillon, Mun. Corp. (5th ed.), secs. 1193, 1194.) treason or felony, and afterwards the crown should descend to him, this would purge the attainer ipso facto.<sup>a</sup> And therefore when Henry VII, who as Earl of Richmond stood attainted, came to the crown, it was not thought necessary to pass an act of parliament to reverse this attainder; because, as Lord Bacon in his history of that prince, informs us, it was agreed that the assumption of the crown had at once purged all attainders. Neither can the king in judgment of law, as king, ever be a minor or under age; and therefore his royal grants and assents to acts of parliament are good, though he has not in his natural capacity attained the legal age of twenty-one.<sup>a</sup> By a statute indeed, 28 Hen. VIII, c. 17 (Repeal of Acts, 1536), power was given to future kings to rescind and revoke all acts of parliament that should be made while they were under the age of twenty-four: but this was repealed by the statute 1 Edw. VI, c. 11 (1547), so far as related to that prince; and both statutes are declared to be determined by 24 Geo. II, c. 24 (Minority of Successor to Crown, 1750). It hath also been usually thought prudent, when the heir apparent has been very young, to appoint a protector, guardian, or regent, for a limited time: but the very necessity of such extraordinary provision is sufficient to demonstrate the truth of that maxim of the common law, that in the king is no minority; and therefore he hath no legal guardian.<sup>b</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Finch. L. 82.

<sup>a</sup> Co. Litt. 43. 2 Inst. Præm. 3.

<sup>b</sup> The methods of appointing this guardian or regent have been so various; and the duration of his power so uncertain, that from hence alone it may be collected that his office is unknown to the common law; and therefore (as Sir Edward Coke says, 4 Inst. 58), the surest way is to have him made by authority of the great council in parliament. The Earl of Pembroke, by his own authority, assumed in very troublesome times the regency of Henry III., who was then only nine years old; but was declared of full age by the pope at seventeen, confirmed the great charter at eighteen, and took upon him the administration of the government at twenty. A guardian and council of regency were named for Edward III., by the parliament, which deposed his father; the young king being then fifteen, and not assuming the government till three years after. When Richard II. succeeded at the age of eleven, the Duke of Lancaster took upon him the management of the kingdom, till the parliament met, which appointed a nominal council to assist him. Henry V. on his death-bed named a regent and a guardian for his infant son Henry VI.,

§ 349. (3) The royal immortality.—<sup>[249]</sup> A third attribute of the king's majesty is his perpetuity. The law ascribes to him, in his political capacity, an absolute immortality. The king never dies. Henry, Edward, or George may die; but the king survives them all. For immediately upon the decease of the reigning prince in his natural capacity, his kingship or imperial dignity, by act of law, without any interregnum or interval, is vested at once in his heir; who is eo instanti (from that instant), king to all intents and purposes. And so tender is the law of supposing even a possibility of his death, that his natural dissolution is generally called his demise; dimissio regis, vel coronæ (the demise of the king or the crown): an expression which signifies merely a transfer of property; for, as is observed in Plowden,* when we say the demise of the crown, we mean only that in consequence of the disunion of the king's natural body from his body politic, the kingdom is transferred or demised to his successor; and so the royal dignity remains perpetual. Thus too, when Edward the Fourth, in the tenth year of his reign, was driven from his throne for a few months by the then nine months old: but the parliament altered his disposition, and appointed a protector and council, with a special limited authority. Both these princes remained in a state of pupillage till the age of twenty-three. Edward V., at the age of thirteen, was recommended by his father, to the care of the Duke of Gloucester; who was declared protector by the privy council. The statutes 25 Hen. VIII. c. 12 (1533), and 28 Hen. VIII. c. 7 (Succession to the Crown, 1536), provided, that the successor, if a male, and under eighteen, or if a female and under sixteen, should be till such age in the governance of his or her natural mother (if approved by the king), and such other counselors as his majesty should by will or otherwise appoint: and he accordingly appointed his sixteen executors to have the government of his son Edward VI., and the kingdom, which executors elected the Earl of Hertford protector. The statute 24 Geo. II. c. 24 (Minority of Successor to Crown, 1750), in case the crown should descend to any of the children of Frederick, late Prince of Wales, under the age of eighteen, appointed the princess dowager;—and that of 5 Geo. III. c. 27 (Minority of Heir to the Crown, 1765), in case of a like descent to any of his present majesty's children, empowers the king to name either the queen, the princess dowager, or any descendant of King George II. residing in this kingdom;—to be guardian and regent, till the successor attains such age, assisted by a council of regency: the powers of them all being expressly defined and set down in the several acts. [On the accession of George V. the Regency Act, 1910, was passed to provide for the minority of the Prince of Wales, who was then only sixteen years of age.]

* Plowd. 177. 234.

house of Lancaster, this temporary transfer of his dignity was denominated his demise; and all process was held to be discontinued, as upon a natural death of the king.<sup>4</sup>

§ 350. Executive department of government.—<sup>[250]</sup> We are next to consider those branches of the royal prerogative, which invest this our sovereign lord, thus all-perfect and immortal in his kingly capacity, with a number of authorities and powers; in the exertion whereof consists the executive part of government. This is wisely placed in a single hand by the British constitution, for the sake of unanimity, strength, and dispatch. Were it placed in many hands, it would be subject to many wills: many wills, if disunited and drawing different ways, create weakness in a government; and to unite those several wills, and reduce them to one, is a work of more time and delay than the exigencies of state will afford. The king of England is therefore not only the chief, but properly the sole, magistrate of the nation; all others acting by commission from, and in due subordination to him: in like manner as, upon the great revolution in the Roman state, all the powers of the ancient magistracy of the commonwealth were concentrated in the new emperor: so that, as Gravina* expresses it, "in ejus unius persona veteris rei publicæ vis atque majestas percumulatas magistratum potestates exprimebatur (all the power and majesty of the old commonwealth were concentrated in the person of that one man by the united powers of the magistrates)."<sup>8</sup>

<sup>4</sup> M. 49 Hen. VI. pl. 1-8 (1470).

• Orig. 1. § 103.

---

<sup>8</sup> Real character of the royal authority.—"The language of this passage is impressive; it stands curtailed but in substance unaltered in Stephen's Commentaries. It has but one fault; the statements it contains are the direct opposite of the truth. The executive of England is in fact placed in the hands of a committee called the cabinet. If there be any one person in whose single hand the power of the state is placed, that one person is not the queen but the chairman of the committee, known as the prime minister. Nor can it be urged that Blackstone's description of the royal authority was a true account of the powers of the king at the time when Blackstone wrote. George the Third enjoyed far more real authority than has fallen to the share of any of his descendants. But it would be absurd to maintain that the language I have cited painted his true position. The terms used by the commentator were, when he used them, unreal, and known to be so. They have become only

§ 351. 1. Absolute character of king's power.—After what has been premised in this chapter, I shall not (I trust) be considered as an advocate for arbitrary power, when I lay it down as a principle, that in the exertion of lawful prerogative, the king is and ought to be absolute; that is, so far absolute, that there is no legal authority that can either delay or resist him. He may reject what bills, may make what treaties, may coin what money, may create what peers, may pardon what offenses he pleases: unless where the constitution hath expressly, or by evident consequence, laid down some exception or boundary; declaring, that thus far the prerogative shall go and no further. For otherwise the power of the crown would indeed be but a name and a shadow, insufficient for the ends of government, if, where its jurisdiction is clearly established and allowed, any man or body of men were permitted to disobey it, in the ordinary course of law: I say, in the ordinary course of law; for I do not [251] now speak of those extraordinary recourses to first principles, which are necessary when the contracts of society are in danger of dissolution, and the law proves too weak a defense against the violence of fraud or oppression. And yet the want of attending to this obvious distinction has occasioned these doctrines, of absolute power a little more unreal during the century and more which has since elapsed."—Dicey, Law of the Constitution (3 ed.), 8.

Professor Dicey, in a note to the above paragraph, quotes the following passage from Paley's Moral Philosophy, published in 1785, which as he says is full of instruction:

"In the British, and possibly in all other constitutions, there exists a wide difference between the actual state of the government and the theory. The one results from the other; but still they are different. When we contemplate the theory of the British government, we see the king invested with the most absolute personal impunity; with a power of rejecting laws, which have been resolved upon by both houses of parliament; of conferring by his charter, upon any set or succession of men he pleases, the privilege of sending representatives into one house of parliament, as by his immediate appointment he can place whom he will in the other. What is this, a foreigner might ask, but a more circuitous despotism? Yet, when we turn our attention from the legal existence to the actual exercise of royal authority in England, we see these formidable prerogatives dwindled into mere ceremonies; and in their stead, a sure and commanding influence, of which the constitution, it seems, is totally ignorant, growing out of that enormous patronage, which the increased extent and opulence of the empire has placed in the disposal of the executive magistrate."

in the prince and of national resistance by the people, to be much misunderstood and perverted by the advocates for slavery on the one hand, and the demagogues of faction on the other. The former, observing the absolute sovereignty and transcendent dominion of the crown laid down (as it certainly is) most strongly and emphatically in our law books, as well as our homilies, have denied that any case can be excepted from so general and positive a rule; forgetting how impossible it is, in any practical system of laws, to point out beforehand those eccentric remedies, which the sudden emergence of national distress may dictate, and which that alone can justify. On the other hand, overzealous republicans, feeling the absurdity of unlimited passive obedience, have fancifully (or sometimes factiously) gone over to the other extreme: and, because resistance is justifiable to the person of the prince when the being of the state is endangered, and the public voice proclaims such resistance necessary, they have therefore allowed to every individual the right of determining this expedience, and of employing private force to resist even private oppression. A doctrine productive of anarchy, and (in consequence) equally fatal to civil liberty as tyranny itself. For civil liberty rightly understood, consists in protecting the rights of individuals by the united force of society: society cannot be maintained, and of course can exert no protection, without obedience to some sovereign power: and obedience is an empty name, if every individual has a right to decide how far he himself shall obey.

§ 352. a. Responsibility of king's advisers.—In the exertion, therefore, of those prerogatives, which the law has given him, the king is irresistible and absolute, according to the forms of the constitution. And yet, if the consequence of that exertion be manifestly to the grievance or dishonor of the kingdom, the parliament will call his advisers <sup>[252]</sup> to a just and severe account. For prerogative consisting (as Mr. Locke<sup>1</sup> has well defined it) in the discretionary power of acting for the public good, where the positive laws are silent, if that discretionary power be abused to the public detriment, such prerogative is exerted in an unconstitutional manner. Thus the king may make a treaty with a foreign state, which shall irrevocably bind the nation; and yet, when such treaties have been judged pernicious, impeachments have pursued those ministers, by whose agency or advice they were concluded.

<sup>1</sup> On Gov. 2. § 166.

§ 353. 2. King's prerogative in (1) foreign relations; (2) domestic affairs.—The prerogatives of the crown (in the sense under which we are now considering them) respect either this nation's intercourse with sovereign nations, or its own domestic government and civil polity.

§ 354. a. The king, the national representative in foreign relations.—With regard to foreign concerns, the king is the delegate or representative of his people. It is impossible that the individuals of a state, in their collective capacity, can transact the affairs of that state with another community equally numerous as themselves. Unanimity must be wanting to their measures, and strength to the execution of their counsels. In the king, therefore, as in a center, all the rays of his people are united, and form by that union a consistency, splendor, and power, that make him feared and respected by foreign potentates; who would scruple to enter into any engagement, that must afterwards be revised and ratified by a popular assembly. What is done by the royal authority, with regard to foreign powers, is the act of the whole nation: what is done without the king's concurrence is the act only of private men. And so far is this point carried by our law, that it hath been held,* that should all the subjects of England make war with a king in league with the king of England, without the royal assent, such war is no breach of the league. And, by the statute 2 Hen. V, c. 6 (Safe-Conducts, 1414), any subject committing acts of hostility upon any nation in league with the king was declared to be guilty of high treason: and, though that act was repealed by the statute 20 Hen. VI, c. 11 (1442), so far as [253] relates to the making this offense high treason, yet still it remains a very great offense against the law of nations, and punishable by our laws, either capitally or otherwise, according to the circumstances of the case.

* 4 Inst. 152.

§ 355. (1) Ambassadors.—The king, therefore, considered as the representative of his people, has the sole power of sending ambassadors to foreign states, and receiving ambassadors at home. This may lead us into a short inquiry, how far the municipal laws of England intermeddle with or protect the rights of these messengers from one potentate to another, whom we call ambassadors.

§ 356. (a) Privileges of ambassadors.—The rights, the powers, the duties, and the privileges of ambassadors are determined by the law of nature and nations, and not by any municipal constitutions. For, as they represent the persons of their respective masters, who owe no subjection to any laws but those of their own country, their actions are not subject to the control of the private law of that state, wherein they are appointed to reside. He that is subject to the coercion of laws is necessarily dependent on that power by whom those laws were made: but an ambassador ought to be independent of every power, except that by which he is sent; and of consequence ought not to be subject to the mere municipal laws of that nation, wherein he is to exercise his functions. If he grossly offends, or makes an ill use of his character, he may be sent home and accused before his master,<sup>h</sup> who is bound either to do justice upon him, or avow himself the accomplice of his crimes.<sup>1</sup>

§ 357. (i) In criminal prosecutions.—But there is great dispute among the writers on the laws of nations, whether this exemption of ambassadors extends to all crimes, as well natural as positive; or whether it only extends to such as are mala prohibita (crimes because forbidden), as coining, and not to those that are mala in se (crimes in themselves), as murder.<sup>k</sup> Our law seems to have formerly taken in the restriction, as well as the general exemption. [254] For it has been held, both by our common lawyers and civilians,<sup>1</sup> that an ambassador is privileged by the law of nature and nations; and yet, if he commits any offense against the law of

<sup>h</sup> As was done with Count Gyllenberg, the Swedish minister to Great Britain. A. D. 1716.

<sup>1</sup> Sp. L. 26. 21.

<sup>k</sup> Van Leeuwen in Ff. 50. 7. 17. Barbeyrac's Puff. l. 8. c. 9. § 9 & 17. Van Bynkershoek de Foro Legator. c. 17, 18, 19.

<sup>1</sup> 1 Roll. Rep. 175. 3 Bulstr. 27.

reason and nature, he shall lose his privilege:<sup>m</sup> and that therefore, if an ambassador conspires the death of the king in whose land he is, he may be condemned and executed for treason; but if he commits any other species of treason, it is otherwise, and he must be sent to his own kingdom.<sup>n</sup>° And these positions seem to be built upon good appearance of reason. For since, as we have formerly shown, all municipal laws act in subordination to the primary law of nature, and, where they annex a punishment to natural crimes, are only declaratory of and auxiliary to that law; therefore to this natural, universal rule of justice ambassadors, as well as other men, are subject in all countries; and of consequence it is reasonable that, wherever they transgress it, there they shall be liable to make atonement.° But, however these principles might formerly obtain, the general practice of this country, as well as of the rest of Europe, seems now to pursue the sentiments of the learned Grotius, that the security of ambassadors is of more importance than the punishment of a particular crime.º And therefore few, if any, examples have happened within a century past, where an ambassador has been punished for any offense, however atrocious in its nature.

§ 358. (ii) In civil suits.—In respect to civil suits, all the foreign jurists agree, that neither an ambassador, nor any of his train or comites, can be prosecuted for any debt or contract in the courts of that kingdom wherein he is sent to reside. Yet Sir Ed-

<sup>m</sup> 4 Inst. 153.

<sup>n</sup> 1 Roll. Rep. 185.

° Foster's Reports. 188.

º Securitas legatorum utilitati quæ ex pœna est præponderat. (De jure b. and p. 18. 4. 4.)

° Sir James Stephen (2 Hist. Crim. Law, 4) remarks on these privileges of an ambassador as follows:

"Blackstone's language about the law of nature and nations and his reasoning appear to me weak, but I apprehend that if the question should ever arise how far an ambassador's privilege against the criminal law extends, the great question for the court to decide would be as to English usage and authority, and as to actual usages, as illustrated by historical facts, between other nations. Why an English court should be bound to attach special importance to the theories upon international law of foreign writers whose language is obviously rhetorical and inaccurate, and whose views do not agree, I am unable to understand."

ward Coke maintains, that, if an ambassador make a contract which is good jure gentium (by the law of nations), he shall answer for it here.<sup>a</sup> 10 But the truth is, so few cases (if any) had arisen, wherein the privilege was either claimed or disputed, even with regard to civil suits, that our law books are silent upon it, previous to the [255] reign of Queen Anne; when an ambassador from Peter the Great, Czar of Muscovy, was actually arrested and taken out of his coach in London,<sup>r</sup> for a debt of fifty pounds, which he had there

<sup>a</sup> 4 Inst. 153.

<sup>r</sup> 21 July 1708. Boyer's Annals of Queen Anne.

---

10 Jurisdiction over diplomatic agents.—Coke was reasoning on the principles which were then held to apply to foreigners, and especially foreign merchants, who were not bound by the municipal law or entitled to its privileges. (See 1 Comm. 260, 273.) But the exemption is now placed not on the nature of the duty or obligation to be enforced, but on the jurisdiction to enforce it. The ambassador "must be independent of the sovereign's authority, and of the jurisdiction of the country, both civil and criminal," says Vattel, book 4, chapter 7, section 92, in order that he may discharge his duties to his own government without interference or embarrassment. And the exemption includes his subordinates, attachés, and servants. Whether it includes his property, so far as the same can be reached, without assuming jurisdiction in personam (as by distress for rent, etc.) has been questioned, but the American state department maintained the affirmative in the case of its minister at Berlin. (Wheaton's International Law, p. 287; Felix, Revue du Droit Français et Etranger, vol. 2, 31.)

The rule extends to all diplomatic agents, whether ambassadors or of lower rank, and their domestics; but not to consuls, who do not come within the class, but are commercial agents, and may be (and often are), citizens of the country in which they exercise their functions. Jurisdiction of suits against consuls of foreign powers is reserved to courts of the United States by article III, section 2 of the Constitution, and made exclusive by Judiciary Act, section 9, and Rev. Stats., section 711. State courts, therefore, had no power over them. (Davis v. Packard, 7 Pet. 276, 8 L. Ed. 684.) But the repeal of part of Rev. Stats. of the United States, section 711, by Act of February 18, 1875, took away the exclusive character of such jurisdiction. (Bors v. Preston, 111 U. S. 252, 28 L. Ed. 419, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407.) The distinction is now well marked by United States Rev. Stats., section 687, saying that the supreme court shall have exclusively all such jurisdiction of suits or proceedings against ambassadors or other public ministers, or their domestics, or domestic servants, as a court of law can have consistently with the law of nations, and original but not exclusive jurisdiction of all suits brought by ambassadors or other public ministers, or in which a consul or vice-consul is a party.—HAMMOND.

contracted. Instead of applying to be discharged upon his privilege, he gave bail to the action, and the next day complained to the queen. The persons who were concerned in the arrest were examined before the privy council (of which the Lord Chief Justice Holt was at the same time sworn a member<sup>a</sup>) and seventeen were committed to prison: 'most of whom were prosecuted by information in the court of queen's bench, at the suit of the attorney general,<sup>a</sup> and at their trial before the lord chief justice were convicted of the facts by the jury,<sup>w</sup> reserving the question of law, how far those facts were criminal, to be afterwards argued before the judges; which question was never determined. In the meantime the czar resented this affront very highly, and demanded that the sheriff of Middlesex and all others concerned in the arrest should be punished with instant death.<sup>x</sup> But the queen (to the amazement of that despotic court) directed her secretary to inform him,* "that she could inflict no punishment upon any, the meanest of her subjects, unless warranted by the law of the land: † and therefore was persuaded that he would not insist upon impossibilities."† † To satisfy, however, the clamors of the foreign ministers (who made it a common cause) as well as to appease the wrath of Peter, a bill was brought into parliament,<sup>a</sup> and afterwards passed into a law,<sup>a</sup> to prevent and to punish such outrageous insolence for the future. And with a copy of this act, elegantly engrossed and illuminated, accompanied by a letter from the queen, an ambassador extraordinary<sup>b</sup> was commissioned to appear at Moscow,<sup>c</sup> who declared "that

* First edition contains the following in addition: "that the law of England had not yet protected ambassadors from the payment of their lawful debts; that therefore the arrest was no offense by the laws; and."

† First edition has following note here: "A copy of the act made upon this occasion, very elegantly engrossed and illuminated, was sent him to Moscow as a present."

▪ 25 July 1708. Ibid.

† 25, 29 Jul. 1708. Ibid.

▪ 23 Oct. 1708. Ibid.

▪ 14 Feb. 1708. Ibid.

▪ 17 Sept. 1708. Ibid.

▪ 11 Jan. 1708. Ibid. Mod. Un. Hist. xxxv. 454.

▪ Com. Journ. 23 Dec. 1708.

▪ 21 Apr. 1709. Boyer, Ibid.

▪ Mr. Whitworth.

▪ 8 Jan. 1709. Boyer, Ibid.

though her majesty could not inflict such punishment as was required, [256] because of the defect in that particular of the former established constitutions of her kingdom, yet, with the unanimous consent of the parliament, she had caused a new act to be passed, to serve as a law for the future." This humiliating step was accepted as a full satisfaction by the czar; and the offenders, at his request, were discharged from all further prosecution.

§ 359. (iii) The Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708.—This statute<sup>d</sup> recites the arrest which had been made, "in contempt of the protection granted by her majesty, contrary to the law of nations, and in prejudice of the rights and privileges, which ambassadors and other public ministers have at all times been thereby possessed of, and ought to be kept sacred and inviolable": wherefore it enacts, that for the future all process whereby the person of any ambassador, or of his domestic or domestic servant may be arrested, or his goods distrained or seized, shall be utterly null and void; and the persons prosecuting, soliciting, or executing such process shall be deemed violators of the law of nations, and disturbers of the public repose; and shall suffer such penalties and corporal punishment as the lord chancellor and the two chief justices, or any two of them, shall think fit. But it is expressly provided, that no trader, within the description of the bankrupt laws, who shall be in the service of any ambassador, shall be privileged or protected by this act; nor shall anyone be punished for arresting an ambassador's servant, unless his name be registered with the secretary of state, and by him transmitted to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex. Exceptions, that are strictly conformable to the rights of ambassadors,<sup>e</sup> as observed in the most civilized countries. And, in consequence of this statute, thus declaring and enforcing the law of nations, these privileges are [257] now held to be part of the law of the land, and are constantly allowed in the courts of common law.<sup>f</sup>

<sup>d</sup> 7 Ann. c. 12 (Diplomatic Privileges, 1708).

<sup>e</sup> Sæpe quæsitum est an comitum numero et jure habendi sunt, qui legatum comitantur, non ut instructor fiat legatio, sed unice ut lucro suo consulant, institores forte et mercatores. Et, quamvis hos sæpe defenderint et comitum loco habere voluerint legati, apparet tamen satis eo non pertinere, qui in legati legationisve officio non sunt. Quum autem ea res nonnunquam turbas dederit, optimo exemplo in quibusdam aulis olim receptum fuit, ut legatus teneretur exhibere nomenclaturam comitum suorum. (It was often a question whether they who accompanied the ambassador, not that the embassy might be better

§ 360. (2) Treaties.—It is also the king's prerogative to make treaties, leagues, and alliances with foreign states and princes. For it is by the law of nations essential to the goodness of a league, that it be made by the sovereign power;<sup>g</sup> and then it is binding upon the whole community: and in England the sovereign power, quoad hoc (as to this), is vested in the person of the king. Whatever contracts, therefore, he engages in, no other power in the kingdom can legally delay, resist, or annul. And yet, lest this plenitude of authority should be abused to the detriment of the public, the constitution (as was hinted before) hath here interposed a check, by the means of parliamentary impeachment, for the punishment of such ministers as from criminal motives advise or conclude any treaty, which shall afterwards be judged to derogate from the honor and interest of the nation.<sup>11</sup> appointed, but merely to consult their own advantage, perhaps as hucksters and merchants, should be reckoned in the number and enjoy the rights of his train. And although the ambassadors often protected them, and wished to reckon them in the number of their suite, yet it is evident that they who are neither in the office of ambassador, nor employed in the embassy, do not belong to it. But as this frequently caused disturbances, it was formerly adjudged in some courts the best mode of proceeding, that the ambassador should be bound to show a list of the names of his attendants.) Van Bynkersh. c. 15. prope finem.

<sup>f</sup> Fitzg. 200. Stra. 797.

<sup>g</sup> Puff. L. of N. b. 8. c. 9. § 6.

---

<sup>11</sup> Treaty-making and war-making authority.—Maitland, in his Const. Hist. of England, p. 424, passes the following criticism upon Blackstone's statements: "Stephen (following Blackstone) says that to make a war completely effectual it is necessary that it be publicly declared, and duly proclaimed by the sovereign's authority. I believe that to be misleading, and that neither English law, nor what is called International Law, requires any formal declaration of war. I believe that an English court would hold that there was war so soon as the queen had authorized acts of hostility.

"Close to this power of making war and peace, Blackstone speaks of the power of making treaties, and says what seems to me very untrue. 'It is also the sovereign's prerogative to make treaties, leagues and alliances with foreign states and princes. For it is by the law of nations essential to the

§ 361. (3) Power to make war.—Upon the same principle the king has also the sole prerogative of making war and peace. For it is held by all the writers on the law of nature and nations, that the right of making war, which by nature subsisted in every individual, is given up by all private persons that enter into society, and is vested in the sovereign power:<sup>a</sup> and this right is given up, not only by individuals, but even by the entire body of people, that are under the dominion of a sovereign. It would indeed be extremely improper, that any number of subjects should have the power of binding the supreme magistrate, and putting him against his will in a state of war. Whatever hostilities, therefore, may be committed by private citizens, the state ought not to be affected thereby; unless that should justify their proceedings, and thereby become partner in the guilt. Such unauthorized volunteers in violence are not ranked among open enemies, but are treated like pirates and robbers: according to that rule of the civil law; <sup>1</sup> hostes goodness of a league, that it be made by the sovereign power; and then it is binding upon the whole community; and in England the sovereign power, quoad hoc, is vested in the king. Whatever contracts, therefore, he engages in, no other power in the kingdom can legally delay, resist or annul.'

<sup>a</sup> Puff. b. 8. c. 6. § 8. and Barbeyr. in loc.

<sup>1</sup> Ff. 50. 16. 118.

---

"Now, in contradiction to this we may, I believe, say that a treaty made by the king has in general no legal effect whatever. The king, as just said, can make peace and can make war, and the making of either will of course have important effects: whether an act be a laudable attack on a public enemy, or mere piracy, is one of the many questions that might thus be decided. Also it seems certain that as an incident to a treaty of peace, the king may cede territory, may at all events cede territory acquired by him during the war. Exactly how far this power extends is a somewhat debatable matter, and I think it very doubtful whether the queen can cede land subject to the British parliament, except in a treaty of peace; could she sell Jersey, Guernsey, or Kent to France? I much doubt it. When in 1782 it became necessary to recognize the independence of the American colonies, an act of parliament was passed authorizing the king to make peace and to repeal all statutes relating to those colonies. But as to the more general principle put forward by Blackstone and Stephen, its unsoundness can be easily proved by reference to the law about extradition. The common law of England, at least for a long time past, has been that though the king bound himself to surrender criminals, still the treaty could not be carried out, save by virtue of an act of parliament. Suppose that under such a treaty a person was arrested and brought before

hi sunt qui nobis, aut quibus nos, publice bellum decrevimus: cæteri latrones aut prædones sunt (those are enemies who have publicly declared war against us, or against whom we have publicly declared war; all others are thieves or robbers). And the reason which is given by [258] Grotius,<sup>1</sup> why according to the law of nations a denunciation of war ought always to precede the actual commencement of hostilities, is not so much that the enemy may be put upon his guard (which is matter rather of magnanimity than right), but that it may be certainly clear that the war is not undertaken by private persons, but by the will of the whole community; whose right of willing is in this case transferred to the supreme magistrate by the fundamental laws of society. So that, in order to make a war completely effectual, it is necessary with us in England that it be publicly declared and duly proclaimed by the king's authority; and, then, all parts of both the contending nations, from the highest to the lowest, are bound by it. And wherever the right resides of beginning a national war, there also must reside the right of ending it, or the power of making peace. And the same check of one of the courts by habeas corpus; the treaty would have been treated as waste-paper—the king has no power to send men out of the country, and cannot give himself power by making a treaty. This has been law at least all through the nineteenth century. It is fair to Blackstone to say that the point was not so clear in his own day. The court of exchequer seems to have thought that the king might hand over fugitives. However, there is no doubt about the matter now. Our earliest extradition treaties were individually sanctioned by parliament. The general act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict., c. 52), now in force, enables the queen, by Order in Council, to apply that act in the case of any foreign state with which she has made an arrangement for reciprocal extradition. This is a good instance of a power given to the queen by act of parliament, one of those royal powers which we do not usually call prerogatives. I take extradition as one example, but the general principle is quite unsound. Suppose the queen contracts with France that English iron or coal shall not be exported to France—until a statute has been passed forbidding exportation, one may export and laugh at the treaty. Still, though this is so, we must remark that the king has here a very substantial power, though it does not operate directly on the law. It would obviously be a serious step, were parliament to refuse to pass the laws necessary for carrying out a treaty already concluded. The honor of the nation might be already pledged. The interrogation of ministers in parliament, perhaps, is a sufficient guard against this danger.”

<sup>1</sup> De jur. b. and p. l. 3. c. 3. § 11.

---

parliamentary impeachment, for improper or inglorious conduct, in beginning, conducting, or concluding a national war, is in general sufficient to restrain the ministers of the crown from a wanton or injurious exertion of this great prerogative.

§ 362. (4) Letters of marque and reprisal.—But, as the delay of making war may sometimes be detrimental to individuals who have suffered by depredations from foreign potentates, our laws have in some respects armed the subject with powers to impel the prerogative; by directing the ministers of the crown to issue letters of marque and reprisal upon due demand: the prerogative of granting which is nearly related to, and plainly derived from, that other of making war: this being indeed only an incomplete state of hostilities, and generally ending in a formal denunciation of war. These letters are grantable by the law of nations,<sup>k</sup> whenever the subjects of one state are oppressed and injured by those of another; and justice is denied by that state to which the oppressor belongs. In this case letters of marque and reprisal (words used as synonymous; and signifying, the latter a taking in return, the former the passing the frontiers in order to such taking<sup>l</sup>) may be obtained, in order to seize the bodies or goods of the subjects of the offending state, until satisfaction [<sup>259</sup>] be made, wherever they happen to be found. And, indeed, this custom of reprisals seems dictated by nature herself; for which reason we find in the most ancient times very notable instances of it.<sup>m</sup> But here the necessity is obvious of calling in the sovereign power, to determine when reprisals may be made; else every private sufferer would be a judge in his own cause. In pursuance of which principle, it is with us declared by the statute 4 Hen. V, c. 7 (Letters of Marque, 1416), that, if any subjects of the realm are oppressed in time of truce by any foreigners, the king will grant marque in due form, to all that feel themselves grieved. Which form is thus directed to be observed: the sufferer must first apply to the lord privy seal, and he shall make out letters of request under the privy seal; and, if, after such request of satisfaction made, the party required do not within convenient time make due satisfaction or restitution to the party grieved, the lord chancellor shall make him out letters of marque under the great seal; and by virtue of these he may attack and seize the property of the aggressor nation, without hazard of being condemned as a robber or pirate.<sup>12</sup>

<sup>k</sup> Ibid. l. 3. c. 2. § 4 & 5.

<sup>l</sup> Dufresne. tit. Marca.

<sup>m</sup> See the account given by Nestor, in the eleventh book of the Iliad, of the reprisals made by himself on the Epeian nation; from whom he took a multitude of cattle, as a satisfaction for a prize won at the Elian games by his father Neleus, and for debts due to many private subjects of the Pylian kingdom; out of which booty the king took three hundred head of cattle for his own demand, and the rest were equitably divided among the other creditors.

§ 363. (5) Passports and safe-conducts.—Upon exactly the same reason stands the prerogative of granting safe-conducts, without which by the law of nations no member of one society has a right to intrude into another.<sup>13</sup> And therefore Puffendorf very <sup>12</sup> Letters of marque.—Letters of marque now mean a commission granted by the government to a private person to take the property of a foreign state, or of the citizens or subjects of such state, as a reparation for an injury committed by such state, or its citizens or subjects. The prizes so captured are divided between the owners of the privateer, the captain and the crew. By the United States constitution (art. 1, sec. 8), Congress is given power to grant letters of marque and reprisal. By the Declaration of Paris in 1856 privateering was condemned and declared to be abolished among the signatory powers. The United States was not a party to the declaration, but did not issue any letters of marque in the war with Spain in 1898.

<sup>13</sup> Safe-conducts.—This statement has been criticised by Professor Wooddesson (Lectures, vol. 1, p. 51, n. n), as if it were inconsistent with the doctrine that subjects of one state may come, without license, into any other in league or amity with it (Calvin's Case, 7 Coke, 21 b), or with Vattel's rule that, in Europe, the access is everywhere free to every person who is not an enemy to the state. (Book II, secs. 100, 123, 132.) But the whole passage of Blackstone shows that such is not his meaning; and certainly it would be incorrect to say that anyone has a right to intrude into the territories of a state of which he is not a member. Blackstone's meaning plainly was that the stranger could not claim admission as a right, contrary to express prohibition, individual or general, without such a safe-conduct from the sovereign. Upon this rule nations are acting at the present day, whenever occasion requires. A marked example of its application is in the legislation of Congress (1888), excluding the Chinese from the United States. Upon what grounds such exclusions may be enforced, and how general they may be made, each nation may determine for itself, without violating any right of foreigners. The example of Paraguay, during the long dictatorship of Francia, shows that even the entire exclusion of foreigners is not recognized by civilized nations justly resolves,<sup>a</sup> that it is left in the power of all states, to take such measures about the admission of strangers, as they think convenient; those being ever excepted who are driven on the coasts by necessity, or by any cause that deserves pity or compassion. Great tenderness is shown by our laws, not only to foreigners in distress (as will appear when we come to speak of shipwrecks) but with regard also to the admission of strangers who come spontaneously. For so long as their nation continues at peace with ours, and they themselves behave peaceably, they are under [280] the king's protection; though liable to be sent home whenever the king sees occasion. But no subject of a nation at war with us can, by the law of nations, come into the realm, nor can travel himself upon the high seas, or send his goods and merchandise from one place to another, without danger of being seized by our subjects, unless he has letters of safe conduct; which by divers ancient statutes<sup>o</sup> must be granted under the king's great seal and enrolled in chancery, or else are of no effect: the king being supposed the best judge of such emergencies, as may deserve exception from the general law of arms. But passports under the king's sign-manual,<sup>14</sup> or licenses from his ambassadors abroad, are now more usually obtained, and are allowed to be of equal validity.

§ 364. (a) Protection of foreign merchants.—Indeed, the law of England, as a commercial country, pays a very particular regard as a cause of war. The interference of the United States to compel the opening of the ports of Japan was justified, at least in part, upon the barbarous treatment of shipwrecked strangers. This is a very different matter, since a nation has no more right than an individual to destroy the unfortunate beings whom accident or misfortune has thrown into its power. This, too, is the case referred to in the striking lines of Vergil, Aen. I, 542; where the poet makes Dido justify the treatment of the shipwrecked Trojans, by the necessities of self-defense in a new state, and Professor Wooddesson himself, in quoting the passage, has said that the sovereign may issue prohibition against entering his coast, where he thinks necessity requires it. (Lectures, vol. 1, lv.) Indeed, it is evident from this passage that the entire difference between Wooddesson and his great predecessor grew out of the ambiguous use of the word "right."—HAMMOND.

<sup>a</sup> Law of N. and N. b. 3. c. 3. § 9.

<sup>o</sup> 15 Hen. VI. c. 3 (Safe-Conducts, 1436). 18 Hen. VI. c. 8 (Safe-Conducts, 1439). 20 Hen. VI. c. 1 (Safe-Conducts, 1442).

---

<sup>14</sup> Passports are now issued under the hand of the secretary of state.

to foreign merchants in innumerable instances. One I cannot omit to mention: that by magna carta <sup>p</sup> it is provided, that all merchants (unless publicly prohibited beforehand) shall have safe-conduct to depart from, to come into, to tarry in, and to go through England, for the exercise of merchandise, without any unreasonable imposts, except in time of war: and, if a war breaks out between us and their country, they shall be attached (if in England) without harm of body or goods, till the king or his chief justiciary be informed how our merchants are treated in the land with which we are at war; and, if ours be secure in that land, they shall be secure in ours. This seems to have been a common rule of equity among all the northern nations; for we learn from Stiernhook,<sup>q</sup> that it was a maxim among the Goths and Swedes, "quam legem exteri nobis posuere, eandem illis ponemus (we will impose the same law on foreign merchants that they have imposed on us)." But it is somewhat extraordinary, that it should have found a place in magna carta, a mere interior treaty between the king and his natural-born subjects: which occasions the learned Montesquieu to remark with a degree of admiration, "that the English have made [261] the protection of foreign merchants one of the articles of their national liberty."<sup>r</sup> But indeed it well justifies another observation which he has made,<sup>s</sup> "that the English know better than any other people upon earth, how to value at the same time these three great advantages, religion, liberty, and commerce." Very different from the genius of the Roman people; who in their manners, their constitution, and even in their laws, treated commerce as a dishonorable employment,<sup>15</sup> and prohibited the exercise thereof to persons of

<sup>p</sup> C. 30.

<sup>r</sup> Sp. L. 20. 13.

<sup>q</sup> De Jure Sueon. l. 3. c. 4.

<sup>s</sup> Ibid. 20. 6.

---

<sup>15</sup> Roman view of commerce.—It is hardly fair to judge the manners, law, and constitution of the Roman people by the rescript of a Byzantine emperor, such as Blackstone cites for authority here. It proceeds from Honorius and Theodosius in the fifth century after Christ; and the kind of merchants against whom it is directed appears, in chapter 4 of the same title, a law of the same emperors. They were simply peddlers who hovered on the borders of the Roman and Persian empires and acted as spies, now for one side, now for the other. The fame of Rome in war and legislation long overshadowed the services it rendered to commerce and the peaceful intercourse of birth, or rank, or fortune:† and equally different from the bigotry of the canonists, who looked on trade as inconsistent with Christianity,‡ and determined at the council of Melfi, under Pope Urban II, A. D. 1090, that it was impossible with a safe conscience to exercise any traffic, or follow the profession of the law.‣

§ 365. b. King's prerogative in domestic affairs.—These are the principal prerogatives of the king respecting this nation's intercourse with foreign nations; in all of which he is considered as the delegate or representative of his people. But in domestic affairs he is considered in a great variety of characters, and from thence there arises an abundant number of other prerogatives.

§ 366. (1) King as part of legislature.—First, he is a constituent part of the supreme legislative power; and, as such, has the prerogative of rejecting such provisions in parliament, as he judges improper to be passed. The expediency of which constitution has before been evinced at large.* I shall only further remark, that the king is not bound by any act of parliament, unless he be named therein by special and particular words. The most general words that can be devised (“any person or persons, bodies politic, or corporate, etc.”) affect not him in the least, if [262] they may † Nobiliores natalibus, et honorum luce conspicuos, et patrimonio ditiores, perniciosum urbibus mercimonium exercere prohibemus. (We forbid those who are noble by birth, conspicuous from the splendor of their honors, and wealthy in their patrimony, to exercise traffic, so pernicious to cities.) C. 4. 63. 3.

‡ Homo mercator vix aut nunquam potest Deo placere: et ideo nullus christianus debet esse mercator; aut si voluerit esse, projiciatur de ecclesia Dei. (A trader can seldom or never please God; therefore, no Christian ought to be a trader; or, if he will be one, he should be cast out from the church of God.) Decret. 1. 88. 11.

‣ Falsa fit pœnitentia [laici] cum penitus ab officio curiali vel negotiali non recedit, quæ sine peccatis agi ulla ratione non prævalet. (The repentance [of a layman] becomes fallacious if he quit not entirely the profession of law and traffic, which it is impossible to exercise in any manner without sin.) Act Concil. apud Baron. c. 16.

* C. 2. page 154.

---

nations; but it should not be forgotten that the very word “commerce” was first used to designate that right of such intercourse and mutual contracts which they introduced into the jus gentium.—HAMMOND.

tend to restrain or diminish any of his rights or interests.<sup>7</sup> For it would be of most mischievous consequence to the public, if the strength of the executive power were liable to be curtailed without its own express consent, by constructions and implications of the subject.<sup>16</sup> Yet, where an act of parliament is expressly made for the preservation of public rights and the suppression of public wrongs, and does not interfere with the established rights of the crown, it is said to be binding as well upon the king as upon the subject:<sup>8</sup> and, likewise, the king may take the benefit of any particular act, though he be not especially named.<sup>9</sup>

§ 367. (2) King as generalissimo.—The king is considered, in the next place, as the generalissimo, or the first in military command, within the kingdom. The great end of society is to protect the weakness of individuals by the united strength of the community: and the principal use of government is to direct that united strength in the best and most effectual manner, to answer the end proposed. Monarchical government is allowed to be the fittest of any for this purpose; it follows, therefore, from the very end of its institution, that in a monarchy the military power must be trusted in the hands of the prince.

§ 368. (a) The Militia Act, 1661.—In this capacity, therefore, of general of the kingdom, the king has the sole power of raising and regulating fleets and armies. Of the manner in which they are raised and regulated I shall speak more, when I come to consider the military state. We are now only to consider the prerogative of enlisting and of governing them; which indeed was disputed and claimed, contrary to all reason and precedent, by the long parlia-

<sup>7</sup> 11 Rep. 74.

<sup>8</sup> 7 Rep. 32.

<sup>9</sup> Ibid. 71.

---

<sup>16</sup> "This rule has been adapted to the requirements of the political system prevailing in this country, and is now universally recognized. Chancellor Kent states it as follows: 'It is likewise a general rule, in the interpretation of statutes limiting rights and interests, not to construe them to embrace the sovereign power or government, unless the same be expressly named therein, or intended by necessary implication.' 1 Kent, Comm., 460." State v. American Book Co., 69 Kan. 1, 2 Ann. Cas. 56, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1041, 76 Pac. 411, 418.

ment of King Charles I; but, upon the restoration of his son, was solemnly declared by the statute 13 Car. II, c. 6 (Militia, 1661), to be in the king alone: for that the sole supreme government and command of the militia within all his majesty's realms and dominions, and of all forces by sea and land, and of all forts and places of strength, ever was and is the [263] undoubted right of his majesty, and his royal predecessors, kings and queens of England; and that both or either house of parliament cannot, nor ought to, pretend to the same.

§ 369. (b) Trinoda necessitas.—This statute, it is obvious to observe, extends not only to fleets and armies, but also to forts, and other places of strength, within the realm; the sole prerogative, as well of erecting, as manning and governing of which, belongs to the king in his capacity of general of the kingdom:<sup>b</sup> and all lands were formerly subject to a tax, for building of castles wherever the king thought proper. This was one of the three things, from contributing to the performance of which no lands were exempted; and therefore called by our Saxon ancestors the trinoda necessitas: sc. pontis reparatio, arcis constructio, et expeditio contra hostem (the threefold obligation: that is, to repair bridges, to build towers, and to serve against the enemy).<sup>c</sup><sup>17</sup> And this they were called upon to do so often, that, as Sir Edward Coke from M. Paris assures us,<sup>d</sup> there were in the time of Henry III, 1,115 castles subsisting in England. The inconvenience of which, when granted out to private subjects, the lordly barons of those times were severely felt by the whole kingdom; for, as William of Newburgh remarks in the reign of King Stephen, "erant in Anglia quodam-

<sup>b</sup> 2 Inst. 30.

<sup>c</sup> Cowel's Interpr. tit. Castellorum Operatio. Seld. Jan. Angl. 1. 42.

<sup>d</sup> 2 Inst. 31.

---

<sup>17</sup> But, though the king, acting through his ministers, will undoubtedly be supreme commander of any forces which may be lawfully raised in or by the country, yet it must be remembered that, in time of peace, he cannot lawfully raise or keep a standing army within the kingdom without the consent of parliament, and that, whether in time of peace or in time of war, the issue of commissions for proceeding by martial law, unless under the express provisions of an act of parliament, is illegal.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 611.

modo tot reges vel potius tyranni, quot domini castellorum (there were in England, in effect, as many kings, or rather tyrants, as there were lords of castles)'' : but it was felt by none more sensibly than by two succeeding princes, King John and King Henry III. And therefore, the greatest part of them being demolished in the barons' wars, the kings of after times have been very cautious of suffering them to be rebuilt in a fortified manner: and Sir Edward Coke lays it down,* that no subject can build a castle, or house of strength embattled, or other fortress, defensible, without the license of the king; for the danger which might ensue, if every man at his pleasure might do it.

§ 370. (c) Regulation of commerce and navigation.—It is partly upon the same, and partly upon a fiscal foundation, to secure his marine revenue, that the king has the [264] prerogative of appointing ports and havens, or such places only, for persons and merchandise to pass into and out of the realm, as he in his wisdom sees proper. By the feudal law all navigable rivers and havens were computed among the regalia (royalties),<sup>f</sup> and were subject to the sovereign of the state. And in England it hath always been held, that the king is lord of the whole shore,<sup>g</sup> and particularly is the guardian of the ports and havens, which are the inlets and gates of the realm:<sup>h</sup> and therefore, so early as the reign of King John, we find ships seized by the king's officers for putting in at a place that was not a legal port.<sup>i</sup> These legal ports were undoubtedly at first assigned by the crown; since to each of them a court of portmote is incident,<sup>k</sup> the jurisdiction of which must flow from the royal authority: the great ports of the sea are also referred to, as well known and established, by statute 4 Hen. IV, c. 20 (Customs and Excise, 1402), which prohibits the landing elsewhere under pain of confiscation: and the statute 1 Eliz., c. 11 (Customs, 1559), recites that the franchise of lading and discharging had been frequently granted by the crown.

* 1 Inst. 5.

<sup>f</sup> 2 Feud. t. 56. Grag. 1. 15. 15.

<sup>g</sup> F. N. B. 113.

<sup>h</sup> Dav. 9. 56.

<sup>i</sup> Madox. Hist. Exch. 530.

<sup>k</sup> 4 Inst. 148.

§ 371. (i) Limitation of ports.—But though the king had a power of granting the franchise of havens and ports, yet he had not the power of resumption, or of narrowing and confining their limits when once established; but any person had a right to load or discharge his merchandise in any part of the haven: whereby the revenue of the customs was much impaired and diminished, by fraudulent landings in obscure and private corners. This occasioned the statutes of 1 Eliz., c. 11 (Customs, 1559), and 13 & 14 Car. II, c. 11 (Customs, 1662), § 14, which enable the crown by commission to ascertain the limits of all ports, and to assign proper wharfs and quays in each port, for the exclusive landing and loading of merchandise.

§ 372. (ii) Light-houses and buoys.—The erection of beacons, light-houses, and sea-marks is also a branch of the royal prerogative: whereof the first was [265] anciently used in order to alarm the country, in case of the approach of an enemy; and all of them are signally useful in guiding and preserving vessels at sea by night as well as by day. For this purpose the king hath the exclusive power, by commission under his great seal,<sup>1</sup> to cause them to be erected in fit and convenient places,<sup>m</sup> as well upon the lands of the subject as upon the demesnes of the crown: which power is usually vested by letters patent in the office of lord high admiral.<sup>n</sup> And by statute 8 Eliz., c. 13 (Sea-marks, 1566), the corporation of the Trinity-House are empowered to set up any beacons or sea-marks wherever they shall think them necessary; and if the owner of the land or any other person shall destroy them, or shall take down any steeple, tree, or other known sea-mark, he shall forfeit 100*l.*, or in case of inability to pay it, shall be ipso facto outlawed.

§ 373. (iii) Writ of ne exeat regno.—To this branch of the prerogative may also be referred the power vested in his majesty, by statutes 12 Car. II, c. 4 (Subsidies, 1660), and 29 Geo. II, c. 16 (Exportation, 1755), of prohibiting the exportation of arms or ammunition out of this kingdom, under severe penalties: and likewise the right which the king has, whenever he sees proper, of confining his subjects to stay within the realm, or of recalling them when beyond the seas. By the common law,<sup>o</sup> every man may go out of the realm for whatever cause he pleaseth, without obtaining the king's leave; provided he is under no injunction of staying at home (which liberty was expressly declared in King John's great charter, though left out in that of Henry III); but, because that every man ought of right to defend the king and his realm, therefore the king at his pleasure may command him by his writ that he go not beyond the seas, or out of the realm, without license; and, if he do the contrary he shall be punished for disobeying the king's command. Some persons there anciently were, that, by reason of their stations, were under a perpetual prohibition of going abroad without license obtained; among which were reckoned all peers, on account of their being counselors of <sup>[266]</sup> the crown; all knights, who were bound to defend the kingdom from invasions; all ecclesiastics, who were expressly confined by the fourth chapter of the constitutions of Clarendon, on account of their attachment in the times of popery to the See of Rome; all archers and other artificers, lest they should instruct foreigners to rival us in their several trades and manufactures. This was law in the times of Britton,<sup>p</sup> who wrote in the reign of Edward I: and Sir Edward Coke<sup>q</sup> gives us many instances to this effect in the time of Edward III. In the succeeding reign the affair of traveling wore a very different aspect: an act of parliament being made,<sup>r</sup> forbidding all persons whatever to go abroad without license; except only the lords and other great men of the realm; and true and notable merchants; and the king's soldiers. But this act was repealed by the statute 4 Jac. I, c. 1 (Union of England and Scotland, 1606). And at present everybody has, or at least assumes, the liberty of going abroad when he pleases. Yet undoubtedly if the king, by writ of ne exeat regnum (let him not leave the kingdom), under his great seal or privy seal, thinks proper to prohibit him from so doing; or if the king sends a writ to any man, when abroad, commanding his return; and in either case the subject disobeys; it is a high

<sup>1</sup> 3 Inst. 204. 4 Inst. 148.

<sup>m</sup> Rot. Claus. 1 Rich. II. m. 42 (1377). Pryn. on 4 Inst. 136.

<sup>n</sup> Sid. 158. 4 Inst. 149.

<sup>o</sup> F. N. B. 85.

<sup>p</sup> C. 123.

<sup>q</sup> 3 Inst. 175.

<sup>r</sup> 5 Rich. II. c. 2 (1381).

contempt of the king's prerogative, for which the offender's lands shall be seized till he return: and then he is liable to fine and imprisonment.*<sup>18</sup>

§ 374. (3) The king as fountain of justice—(a) King erects courts of justice.—Another capacity, in which the king is considered in domestic affairs is as the fountain of justice and general conservator of the peace of the kingdom. By the fountain of justice the law does not mean the author or original, but only the distributor. Justice is not derived from the king, as from his free gift; but he is the steward of the public, to dispense it to whom it is due.† He is not the spring, but the reservoir; from whence right and equity are conducted, by a thousand channels, to every individual. The original power of judicature, by the fundamental principles of society, is [<sup>267</sup>] lodged in the society at large: but as it would be impracticable to render complete justice to every individual, by the people in their collective capacity, therefore every nation has committed that power to certain select magistrates, who with more ease and expedition can hear and determine complaints; and in England this authority has immemorially been exercised by the king or his substitutes. He therefore has alone the right of erecting courts of judicature: for, though the constitution of the kingdom hath entrusted him with the whole executive power of the laws, it is impossible, as well as improper, that he should personally carry into execution this great and extensive trust: it is consequently necessary, that courts should be erected, to assist him in executing this power; and equally necessary, that,

* 1 Hawk. P. C. 22.

† Ad hoc autem creatus est et electus, ut justitiam faciat universis. (But he is created and chosen for the purpose of dispensing justice to all.) Bract. l. 3. tr. 1. c. 9.

---

<sup>18</sup> But, at the present day, everybody (other than the holder of the great seal and officers in the army) has, or at least assumes, the liberty of going abroad when he pleases, and without license; and the writ ne exeat regno is no longer resorted to for state purposes. It is now used only to prevent one of the parties to an action from withdrawing his person or property from the jurisdiction of the court by going abroad; unless he shall first give security for the satisfaction of such claim as the other party shall establish.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 614.

if erected, they should be erected by his authority. And hence it is that all jurisdictions of courts are either mediately or immediately derived from the crown, their proceedings run generally in the king's name, they pass under his seal, and are executed by his officers.

§ 375. (b) Tenure of judges.—It is probable, and almost certain, that in very early times, before our constitution arrived at its full perfection, our kings in person often heard and determined causes between party and party. But at present, by the long and uniform usage of many ages, our kings have delegated their whole judicial power to the judges of their several courts; which are the grand depositaries of the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and have gained a known and stated jurisdiction, regulated by certain and established rules, which the crown itself cannot now alter but by act of parliament.<sup>u</sup> And, in order to maintain both the dignity and independence of the judges in the superior courts, it is enacted by the statute 13 W. III, c. 2 (Act of Settlement, 1700), that their commissions shall be made (not, as formerly, durante bene placito—during pleasure—but) quamdiu bene se gesserint (so long as they shall have conducted themselves uprightly), and their salaries ascertained and established; but that it may be lawful to remove them on the address of both houses of parliament. And now, by the noble improvements of that law in the statute of 1 Geo. III, c. 23 (Privileges of the Crown, 1760), enacted at the earnest recommendation of [268] the king himself from the throne, the judges are continued in their offices during their good behavior, notwithstanding any demise of the crown (which was formerly held<sup>w</sup> immediately to vacate their seats), and their full salaries are absolutely secured to them during the continuance of their commissions; his majesty having been pleased to declare, that “he looked upon the independence and uprightness of the judges, as essential to the impartial administration of justice; as one of the best securities of the rights and liberties of his subjects; and as most conducive to the honor of the crown.”<sup>x</sup>

<sup>u</sup> 2 Hawk. P. C. 2.

<sup>x</sup> Com. Journ. 3 Mar. 1761.

<sup>w</sup> Lord Raym. 747.

§ 376. (c) Criminal jurisdiction.—In criminal proceedings, or prosecutions for offenses, it would still be a higher absurdity, if the king personally sat in judgment; because in regard to these he appears in another capacity, that of prosecutor. All offenses are either against the king's peace or his crown and dignity: and are so laid in every indictment. For though in their consequences they generally seem (except in the case of treason and a very few others) to be rather offenses against the kingdom than the king; yet, as the public, which is an invisible body, has delegated all its power and rights, with regard to the execution of the laws, to one visible magistrate, all affronts to that power, and breaches of those rights, are immediately offenses against him, to whom they are so delegated by the public. He is therefore the proper person to prosecute for all public offenses and breaches of the peace, being the person injured in the eye of the law. And this notion was carried so far in the old Gothic constitution (wherein the king was bound by his coronation oath to conserve the peace), that in case of any forcible injury offered to the person of a fellow-subject, the offender was accused of a kind of perjury, in having violated the king's coronation oath; dicebatur fregisse juramentum regis juratum (he was said to have broken the sworn oath of the king).<sup>7</sup>

§ 377. (d) Pardoning power.—And hence also arises another [<sup>269</sup>] branch of the prerogative, that of pardoning offenses; for it is reasonable that he only who is injured should have the power of forgiving.* Of prosecutions and pardons I shall treat more at large hereafter; and only mention them here, in this cursory manner, to show the constitutional grounds of this power of the crown, and how regularly connected all the links are in this vast chain of prerogative.

* First edition reads here in addition: "And therefore, in parliamentary impeachment, the king has no prerogative of pardoning: because there the commons of Great Britain are in their own names the prosecutors, and not the crown; the office being for the most part avowedly taken to be done against the public."

<sup>7</sup> Stiernh. de Jure Goth. l. 3. c. 3. A notion somewhat similar to this may be found in the Mirror. c. l. § 5. And so also, when the Chief Justice Thorpe was condemned to be hanged for bribery, he was said sacramentum domini regis fregisse (to have broken the oath of the king). Bot. Parl. 25 Edw. III. (1350).

§ 378. (e) Theory of separate departments.—In this distinct and separate existence of the judicial power in a peculiar body of men, nominated indeed, but not removable at pleasure, by the crown, consists one main preservative of the public liberty; which cannot subsist long in any state, unless the administration of common justice be in some degree separated both from the legislative and also from the executive power. Were it joined with the legislative, the life, liberty, and property, of the subject would be in the hands of arbitrary judges, whose decisions would be then regulated only by their own opinions, and not by any fundamental principles of law; which, though legislators may depart from, yet judges are bound to observe. Were it joined with the executive, this union might soon be an over-balance for the legislative. For which reason, by the statute of 16 Car. I. c. 10 (Star-Chamber, 1640), which abolished the court of star-chamber, effectual care is taken to remove all judicial power out of the hands of the king's privy council; who, as then was evident from recent instances, might soon be inclined to pronounce that for law, which was most agreeable to the prince or his officers. Nothing, therefore, is more to be avoided, in a free constitution, than uniting the provinces of a judge and a minister of state. And indeed, that the absolute power, claimed and exercised in a neighboring nation, is more tolerable than that of the eastern empires, is in great measure owing to their having vested the judicial power in their parliaments, a body separate and distinct from both the legislative and executive: and, if ever that nation recovers its former liberty, it will owe it to the efforts of those assemblies. In Turkey, where everything is centered in the sultan or his ministers, [270] despotic power is in its meridian, and wears a more dreadful aspect.

§ 379. (f) Legal ubiquity of the king.—A consequence of this prerogative is the legal ubiquity of the king. His majesty, in the eye of the law, is always present in all his courts, though he cannot personally distribute justice.* His judges are the mirror by which the king's image is reflected. It is the regal office, and not the royal person, that is always present in court, always ready to undertake prosecutions, or pronounce judgment, for the benefit and protection of the subject. And from this ubiquity it follows that the king can never be nonsuit;<sup>a</sup> for a nonsuit is the desertion of the suit or action by the nonappearance of the plaintiff in court. For the same reason also, in the forms of legal proceedings, the king is not said to appear by his attorney, as other men do; for in contemplation of law he is always present in court.<sup>b 19</sup>

* Fortesc. c. 8. 2 Inst. 186.

§ 380. (g) The king's proclamations.—From the same original, of the king's being the fountain of justice, we may also deduce the prerogative of issuing proclamations, which is vested in the

<sup>a</sup> Co. Litt. 139.

<sup>b</sup> Finch. L. 81.

---

<sup>19</sup> Bentham's criticism on the king's "ubiquity."—As an example of the style of Bentham's severe criticisms of Blackstone's laudatory exposition of the British constitution, the following passage is quoted: "In the Seventh Chapter of the First Book. The king has 'attributes'; he possesses 'ubiquity'; he is 'all-perfect and immortal.' These childish paradoxes, begotten upon servility by false wit, are not more adverse to manly sentiment, than to accurate apprehension. Far from contributing to place the institutions they are applied to in any clear point of view, they serve but to dazzle and confound, by giving to Reality the air of Fable. It is true, they are not altogether of our Author's invention: it is he, however, that has revived them, and that with improvements and additions.

"One might be apt to suppose they were no more than so many transient flashes of ornament: it is quite otherwise. He dwells upon them in sober sadness. The attribute of 'ubiquity,' in particular, he lays hold of, and makes it the basis of a chain of reasoning. He spins it out into consequences: He makes one thing 'follow' from it, and another thing be so and so 'for the same reason': and he uses emphatic terms, as if for fear he should not be thought to be in earnest. 'From the ubiquity,' says our author [1 Comm., p. 270], 'it follows, that the king can never be nonsuit; for a nonsuit is the desertion of the suit or action by the nonappearance of the plaintiff in court.'—'For the same reason also the king is not said to appear by his attorney, as other men do; for he always appears in contemplation of law in his own proper person.'

"This is the case so soon as you come to this last sentence of the paragraph. For so long as you are at the last but two, 'it is the regal office, and not the royal person, that is always present.' All this is so dryly and so strictly true, that it serves as the groundwork of a metaphor that is brought in to embellish and enliven it. The king, we see, is, that is to say is not, present in court. The king's judges are present too. So far is plain downright truth. These judges, then, speaking metaphorically, are so many looking-glasses, which have this singular property, that when a man looks at them, instead of seeing his own face in them, he sees the king's. 'His Judges,' king alone.<sup>20</sup> These proclamations have then a binding force, when (as Sir Edward Coke observes<sup>c</sup>), they are grounded upon and enforce the laws of the realm. For, though the making of laws is entirely the work of a distinct part, the legislative branch, of the sovereign power, yet the manner, time, and circumstances of putting those laws in execution must frequently be left to the discretion of the executive magistrate. And therefore his constitutions or edicts, concerning these points, which we call proclamations, are binding upon the subject, where they do not either contradict the old laws, or tend to establish new ones; but only enforce the execution of such laws as are already in being, in such manner as the king shall judge necessary. Thus the established law is, that the king may prohibit any of his subjects from leaving the realm: a proclamation, therefore, forbidding this in general for three weeks, by laying <sup>[271]</sup> an embargo upon all shipping in time of war,<sup>d</sup> will be equally binding as an act of parliament, because founded upon a prior law. But a proclamation to lay an embargo in time of peace upon all vessels laden with wheat (though in the time of a public scarcity) being contrary to law, and particularly to statute, 22 Car. II, c. 13 (Tillage, 1670), the advisers of such a proclamation and all persons acting under it found it necessary to be indemnified by a special act of parliament, 7 Geo. III, c. 7 (Indemnity, 1766). A proclamation for disarming papists is also says our author, 'are the mirror by which the king's image is reflected.'—BENTHAM, Fragment on Government (Montague's edition), 114 n.

<sup>c</sup> 3 Inst. 162.

<sup>d</sup> 4 Mod. 177. 179.

---

The king's ubiquity.—From this ubiquity, the king can never be nonsuit; . . . is not said to appear by attorney.

The latter consequence seems rather fanciful, since the king's attorney general has been for centuries an established officer, the head of the practicing bar; and the former, though true in form is not so in substance. In this country a criminal prosecution may be dismissed on several grounds even against the wish of the state's representative; while here, as in England, it has long been customary for him to enter on proper occasions a nolle prosequi, which is a voluntary nonsuit.—HAMMOND.

<sup>20</sup> Cited, 17 Wall. 196. The definition of a proclamation (by the President) is very fully considered here. A proclamation by the President of the United States takes effect from the date of its signing and before publication. (Four judges dissenting. Lapeyre v. United States, 17 Wall. 191.)—HAMMOND.

binding, being only in execution of what the legislature has first ordained: but a proclamation for allowing arms to papists, or for disarming any Protestant subjects, will not bind; because the first would be to assume a dispensing power, the latter a legislative one; to the vesting of either of which in any single person the laws of England are absolutely strangers. Indeed, by the statute 31 Hen. VIII, c. 8 (Crown Proclamations, 1539), it was enacted that the king's proclamations should have the force of acts of parliament: a statute, which was calculated to introduce the most despotic tyranny; and which must have proved fatal to the liberties of this kingdom, had it not been luckily repealed in the minority of his successor, about five years after.*

§ 381. (4) The king as fountain of honor, office, and privilege.
 (a) Power to create honors and titles of nobility.—The king is likewise the fountain of honor, of office, and of privilege:<sup>21</sup> and this * Stat. 1 Edw. VI. c. 12 (Criminal Law, 1547).

<sup>21</sup> The appointing power.—I mention this power of appointing and dismissing the high officers of state by itself because it is so very important, but of course the king has a very general power of appointing not only those whom we speak of as collectively forming the ministry, but all or almost all of those who hold public offices of first-rate importance. Blackstone calls him the fountain of honor, of office and of privilege. As regards mere honors, it were needless to say much; the making of knights and baronets, the invention of new orders of knighthood, the conferring of ceremonial precedence, is no very great matter; and as to the power of making peers, which is of considerable importance, we have already spoken. But look at the whole legal structure of society, and we shall generally find that the holders of important public offices are appointed by the king and very commonly hold their posts merely during his pleasure. I do not think it possible to lay down any sweeping principle about this matter: the terms and mode of appointment vary very greatly. Thus almost all persons who have any judicial duties to perform are appointed by the king, but that is not universally true; the county court judges are appointed by the lord chancellor under statutory power. Again, we may say that since 1700 it has been the general policy of the legislature to secure the independence of the judges by making their tenure of office tenure during good behavior. The judges of the superior courts hold during good behavior, but can be dismissed on an address presented by both houses of parliament. The tenure of the county court judges is rather different: they can be removed by the lord chancellor for inability or misbehavior. On the other hand, the justices of the

in a different sense from that wherein he is styled the fountain of justice; for here he is really the parent of them. It is impossible that government can be maintained without a due subordination of rank; that the people may know and distinguish such as are set over them, in order to yield them their due respect and obedience; and also that the officers themselves, being encouraged by emulation and the hopes of superiority, may the better discharge their functions: and the law supposes that no one can be so good a judge of their several merits and services as the king himself who employs them. It has therefore entrusted with him the sole power of conferring dignities and honors, in confidence that he will bestow them upon none, but such as deserve them. And therefore all degrees of [272] nobility, of knighthood, and other titles are received by immediate grant from the crown: either expressed in writing, by writs or letters patent, as in the creations of peers and baronets; or by corporeal investiture, as in the creation of a simple knight.

§ 382. (b) Appointing power.—From the same principle also arises the prerogative of erecting and disposing of offices: for honors and offices are in their nature convertible and synonymous. All offices under the crown carry in the eye of the law an honor along with them; because they imply a superiority of parts and peace, whose duties may perhaps be said to be in part judicial, in part executive, hold only during good pleasure and can be dismissed without the assignment of any cause. It is, on the other hand, the general policy of our modern law that executive officers shall hold only during good pleasure, shall be dismissable without the assignment of any cause. But we must look to the statute-book about each office, and not rely very confidently on any general principle.—MAITLAND, Const. Hist. of England, 428.

“Can the power of appointing to office be said, in our government, to belong properly to the legislature, or to the governor, or to the courts, so that its exercise by any save one of these departments is prohibited? Under the English system of government, it might be said that in a sense the king was the depository of the power of appointing to public office—‘the fountain of honor, of office, and of privilege,’ as Blackstone calls him. (1 Comm. 271.) But in our system there appears no indication that any single department of the government can be deemed the king’s successor in this regard.” Ross v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of the County of Essex, 69 N. J. L. 291, 55 Atl. 310, 311.

abilities, being supposed to be always filled with those that are most able to execute them. And, on the other hand, all honors in their original had duties or offices annexed to them: an earl, comes, was the conservator or governor of a county; and a knight, miles, was bound to attend the king in his wars. For the same reason, therefore, that honors are in the disposal of the king, offices ought to be so likewise; and as the king may create new titles, so may he create new offices: but with this restriction, that he cannot create new offices with new fees annexed to them, nor annex new fees to old offices; for this would be a tax upon the subject, which cannot be imposed but by act of parliament.<sup>f</sup> Wherefore, in 13 Hen. IV (1411), a new office being created by the king's letters patent for measuring cloths, with a new fee for the same, the letters patent were, on account of the new fee, revoked and declared void in parliament.

§ 383. (c) Special privileges, franchises, naturalization.—

Upon the same or a like reason the king has also the prerogative of conferring privileges upon private persons. Such as granting place or precedence to any of his subjects, as shall seem good to his royal wisdom:<sup>g</sup> or such as converting aliens, or persons born out of the king's dominions, into denizens; whereby some very considerable privileges of natural-born subjects are conferred upon them. Such also is the prerogative of erecting corporations; whereby a number of private persons are united and knit together, and enjoy many liberties, powers, and immunities in their politic [273] capacity, which they were utterly incapable of in their natural. Of aliens, denizens, natural-born, and naturalized subjects, I shall speak more largely in a subsequent chapter; as also of corporations at the close of this book of our Commentaries. I now only mention them incidentally, in order to remark the king's prerogative of making them; which is grounded upon this foundation, that the king, having the sole administration of the government in his hands, is the best and the only judge, in what capacities, with what privileges, and under what distinctions, his people are the best qualified to serve, and to act under him. A principle, which was carried so far by the imperial law, that it was determined to be the crime of sacrilege, even to doubt whether the prince had appointed proper officers in the state.<sup>b</sup>

<sup>f</sup> 2 Inst. 533.

<sup>g</sup> 4 Inst. 361.

§ 384. (5) The king as arbiter of commerce.—Another light, in which the laws of England consider the king with regard to domestic concerns, is as the arbiter of commerce. By commerce, I at present mean domestic commerce only. It would lead me into too large a field if I were to attempt to enter upon the nature of foreign trade, its privileges, regulations, and restrictions; and would be also quite beside the purpose of these Commentaries, which are confined to the laws of England. Whereas no municipal laws can be sufficient to order and determine the very extensive and complicated affairs of traffic and merchandise: neither can they have a proper authority for this purpose. For, as these are transactions carried on between subjects of independent states, the municipal laws of one will not be regarded by the other. For which reason the affairs of commerce are regulated by a law of their own, called the law-merchant or lex mercatoria, which all nations agree in and take notice of. And in particular *it is held to be part of the law of England, which decides the causes of merchants by the general rules which obtain in all commercial countries; and that often even in matters relating to domestic trade, as, for instance, with regard to the drawing, the acceptance, and the transfer, of inland bills of exchange.*<sup>1</sup>

[274] With us in England, the king's prerogative, so far as it relates to mere domestic commerce, will fall principally under the following articles.

§ 385. (a) Markets and fairs.—First, the establishment of public marts, or places of buying and selling, such as markets and

* First edition reads: "the law of England does in many cases refer itself to it, and leaves the causes of merchants to be tried by their own peculiar customs; and that often even in matters relating to inland trade, as for instance with regard to the drawing, the acceptance, and the transfer, of bills of exchange."

<sup>b</sup> Disputare de principali judicio non oportet: sacrilegii enim instar est, dubitare an is dignus sit, quem elegerit imperator. (It is not fit to dispute concerning the judgment of the prince; for it is a kind of sacrilege to doubt the eligibility of him whom the emperor shall have chosen.) C. 9. 29. 3.

<sup>1</sup> Co. Litt. 172. Raym. Ld. 181. 1542.

fairs, with the tolls thereunto belonging. These can only be set up by virtue of the king's grant, or by long and immemorial usage and prescription, which presupposes such a grant.*<sup>22</sup> The limitation of these public resorts, to such time and such place as may be most convenient for the neighborhood, forms a part of economics, or domestic polity; which, considering the kingdom as a large family, and the king as the master of it, he clearly has a right to dispose and order as he pleases.<sup>23</sup>

* 2 Inst. 220.

---

<sup>22</sup> Or by act of parliament. Manchester Corporation v. Lyons, 22 Ch. Div. 287.

<sup>23</sup> "On the argument, much was said by the plaintiffs of the importance of public markets, and the case was argued as if the right to maintain a market-house or to hold a market in Pennsylvania was a prerogative vested exclusively in the state, and one which no one can exercise without a grant from the commonwealth. At common law, in England, the establishment of public markets was no doubt a part of the king's prerogative, and no one could get up a market without a grant from him. Such grants were doubtless at one time fruitful sources of revenue to the royal exchequer. Their establishment was, as Blackstone says, 'a part of the economics or domestic polity, which, considering the kingdom as a large family and the king as master of it, he had the right to dispose of as he pleased.' (1 Bl. Comm. *274.) These English markets, with their stewards, their toll, their courts of piepoudre, in which all disputes originating in them must be decided before the setting of the sun, their special privileges and peculiar customs, constituted an important feature in the domestic economy of every English neighborhood. They were a part of the royal prerogative, undoubtedly, but they never crossed the seas to this country in that capacity, any more than did the right to all royal fish, such as the whale and the sturgeon, the right to corodies, to wrecks, to treasure-trove, or to bona waviata. Our ancestors, when they transplanted on these shores the principles of English freedom, left behind them all royal prerogatives except such as were to be, in the hands of the people, the necessary instruments of the free government which they here established. I am not aware that it has ever been supposed or maintained in Pennsylvania that no man or association of men could set up a market-house or establish a market without a grant from the legislature. The right to be a corporation and to carry on any business in a corporate capacity is a right derived from the commonwealth. The right to maintain a market-house or to carry on the business of a market is not a right so derived, but is a right belonging to all citizens of the commonwealth alike, and which any citizen or any association of citizens may exercise without any grant or any warrant whatever from the commonwealth." Twelfth St. Market Co. v. Philadelphia etc. R. Co., 142 Pa. 580, 21 Atl. 989, 991.

§ 386. (b) Weights and measures.—Secondly, the regulation of weights and measures. These, for the advantage of the public, ought to be universally the same throughout the kingdom; being the general criterions which reduce all things to the same or an equivalent value. But, as weight and measure are things in their nature arbitrary and uncertain, it is therefore expedient that they be reduced to some fixed rule or standard: which standard it is impossible to fix by any written law or oral proclamation; for no man can, by words only, give another an adequate idea of a foot-rule, or a pound-weight. It is therefore necessary to have recourse to some visible, palpable, material standard; by forming a comparison with which, all weights and measures may be reduced to one uniform size: and the prerogative of fixing this standard, our ancient law vested in the crown; as in Normandy it belonged to the duke.<sup>1</sup> This standard was originally kept at Winchester: and we find in the laws of King Edgar,<sup>m</sup> near a century before the Conquest, an injunction that the one measure, which was kept at Winchester, should be observed throughout the realm. Most nations have regulated the standard of measures of length by [275] comparison with the parts of the human body; as the palm, the hand, the span, the foot, the cubit, the ell (ulna, or arm), the pace, and the fathom. But, as these are of different dimensions in men of different proportions, our ancient historians<sup>n</sup> inform us, that a new standard of longitudinal measure was ascertained by King Henry the First; who commanded that the ulna or ancient ell, which answers to the modern yard, should be made of the exact length of his own arm. And, one standard of measures of length being gained, all others are easily derived from thence; those of greater length by multiplying, those of less by subdividing, that original standard. Thus, by the statute called compositio ulnarum et perticarum (composition of yards and perches), five yards and a half make a perch; and the yard is subdivided into three feet, and each foot into twelve inches; which inches will be each of the length of three grains of barley. Superficial measures are derived by squaring those of length; and measures of capacity by cubing them. The standard of weights was originally taken from corns of wheat, whence the lowest denomination of weights we have is still called a grain; thirty-two of which are directed, by the statute called compositio mensurarum (the composition of measures), to compose a penny-weight, whereof twenty make an ounce, twelve ounces a pound, and so upwards. And upon these principles the first standards were made; which, being originally so fixed by the crown, their subsequent regulations have been generally made by the king in parliament. Thus, under King Richard I, in his parliament holden at Westminster, A. D. 1197, it was ordained that there should be only one weight and one measure throughout the kingdom, and that the custody of the assize or standard of weights and measures should be committed to certain persons in every city and borough;° from whence the ancient office of the king's alnager seems to have been derived, whose duty it was, for a certain fee, to measure all cloths made for sale, till the office was abolished by the statute 11 and 12 W. III, c. 20 (Taxation, 1700). In King John's time this ordinance of King Richard was [276] frequently dispensed with for money;° which occasioned a provision to be made for enforcing it, in the great charters of King John and his son.ª These original standards were called pondus regis (the king's weight),<sup>r</sup> and mensura domini regis (the king's measure);<sup>s</sup> and are directed by a variety of subsequent statutes to be kept in the exchequer, and all weights and measures to be made conformable thereto.<sup>t</sup> But, as Sir Edward Coke observes,<sup>u</sup> though this hath so often by authority of parlia-° Hoved. Matth. Paris.

<sup>1</sup> Gr. Coustum. c. 16.

<sup>m</sup> Cap. 8.

<sup>n</sup> Will. Malmsb. in Vita Hen. I. Spelm. Hen. I. apud Wilkins. 299.

▷ Hoved. A. D. 1201.

¶ 9 Hen. III. c. 25 (1225).

‡ Plac. 35 Edw. I. (1306) apud Cowel's Interpr. tit. Pondus Regis.

▪ Flet. 2. 12.

‡ 14 Edw. III. st. 1. c. 12 (Measures and Weights, 1340). 25 Edw. III. st. 5. c. 10 (Measures, 1351). 16 Rich. II. c. 3 (Weights and Measures, 1392). 8 Hen. VI. c. 5 (Weights, 1429). 11 Hen. VI. c. 8 (Weights and Measures, 1433). 11 Hen. VII. c. 4 (Weights and Measures, 1495). 22 Car. II. c. 8 (Measures of Corn and Salt, 1670).

‡ Inst. 41.

ment been enacted, yet it could never be effected; so forcible is custom with the multitude.<sup>24</sup>

§ 387. (c) Coining money.—Thirdly, as money is the medium of commerce, it is the king's prerogative, as the arbiter of domestic commerce, to give it authority or make it current. Money is an universal medium, or common standard, by comparison with which the value of all merchandise may be ascertained: or it is a sign, which represents the respective values of all commodities. Metals are well calculated for this sign, because they are durable and are capable of many subdivisions: and a precious metal is still better calculated for this purpose, because it is the most portable. A metal is also the most proper for a common measure, because it can easily be reduced to the same standard in all nations: and every particular nation fixes on it its own impression, that the weight and standard (wherein consists the intrinsic value) may both be known by inspection only.

As the quantity of precious metals increases, that is, the more of them there is extracted from the mine this universal medium or common sign will sink in value, and grow less precious. Above a thousand millions of bullion are calculated to have been imported into Europe from America within less than three centuries; and the quantity is daily increasing. The consequence is, that more money must be given now for <sup>[277]</sup> the same commodity than was given an hundred years ago. And, if any accident was to diminish the quantity of gold and silver, their value would proportionately rise. A horse, that was formerly worth ten pounds, is now perhaps worth twenty; and, by any failure of current specie, the price may be reduced to what it was. Yet is the horse in reality neither dearer nor cheaper at one time than another: for, if the metal which constitutes the coin was formerly twice as scarce as at present, the commodity was then as dear at half the price, as now it is at the whole.

<sup>24</sup> The Weights and Measures Act, 1878, abolished most of the previous statutes on the subject, and has regulated the whole matter in the interest of simplicity and uniformity. The metric system of weights and measures is legalized by this act but not made compulsory. An act of 1897 contains other provisions in the same direction.

§ 388. (i) Essentials of coinage.—The coining of money is in all states the act of the sovereign power; for the reason just mentioned, that its value may be known on inspection. And with respect to coinage in general, there are three things to be considered therein; the materials, the impression, and the denomination.

§ 389. (aa) Coin must be metal.—With regard to the materials, Sir Edward Coke lays it down,<sup>v</sup> that the money of England must either be of gold or silver: and none other was ever issued by the royal authority till 1672, when copper farthings and half-pence were coined by King Charles the Second, and ordered by proclamation to be current in all payments, under the value of six-pence, and not otherwise. But this copper coin is not upon the same footing with the other in many respects, particularly with regard to the offense of counterfeiting it. And (as to the silver coin, it is enacted by statute 14 Geo. III, c. 42—Light Silver Coin, 1774), that no tender of payment in silver money, exceeding twenty-five pounds at one time, shall be a sufficient tender in law, for more than its value by weight, at the rate of 5s. 2d. an ounce.<sup>25</sup>

§ 390. (bb) Coin must be stamped.—As to the impression, the stamping thereof is the unquestionable prerogative of the crown: for, though divers bishops and monasteries had formerly the privilege of coining money, yet, as Sir Matthew Hale observes,<sup>w</sup> this was usually done by special grant from the king, or by prescription which [<sup>278</sup>] supposes one; and therefore was derived from, and not in derogation of, the royal prerogative. Besides that they had only the profit of the coinage, and not the power of instituting either the impression or denomination; but had usually the stamp sent them from the exchequer.

§ 391. (cc) Value of coin must be fixed.—The denomination, or the value for which the coin is to pass current, is likewise in the breast of the king; and, if any unusual pieces are coined, that value must be ascertained by proclamation. In order to fix the value, the weight and the fineness of the metal are to be taken into consideration together. When a given weight of gold or silver is of a given fineness, it is then of the true standard,* and called sterling metal; a name for which there are various reasons given,† but none of them entirely satisfactory. And of this sterling metal all the coin of the kingdom must be made, by the statute 25 Edw. III, c. 13 (Coinage, 1351). So that the king's prerogative seemeth not to extend to the debasing or enhancing the value of the coin, below or above the sterling value:‡ though Sir Matthew Hale§ appears to be of another opinion. The king may also, by his proclamation, legitimate foreign coin, and make it current here; declaring at what value it shall be taken in payments.<sup>b</sup> But this, I apprehend, ought to be by comparison with the standard of our own coin; otherwise the consent of parliament will be necessary. There is at present no such legitimated money; Portugal coin being only current by private consent, so that anyone who pleases may refuse to take it in payment. The king may also at any time decri, or cry down, any coin of the kingdom, and make it no longer current.<sup>c</sup><sup>26</sup>

<sup>v</sup> 2 Inst. 577.

<sup>w</sup> 1 Hist. P. C. 191.

<sup>25</sup> The Coinage Act, 1870, now regulates the legal tender relations of gold, silver, and bronze (which has been substituted for copper). By an act of 1833, Bank of England notes, payable to bearer on demand, are legal tender, except by the bank itself.

* This standard hath been frequently varied in former times; but hath for many years past been thus invariably settled. The pound troy of gold, consisting of twenty-two carats (or twenty-fourth parts) fine, and two of alloy, is divided into forty-four guineas, and an half of the present value of 21s. each. And the pound troy of silver, consisting of eleven ounces and two pennyweights pure, and eighteen pennyweights alloy, is divided into sixty-two shillings. (See Folkes on English Coins.)

† Spelm. Gloss. 203. (The ninth edition adds here, "Dufresne III. 165. The most plausible opinion seems to be that adopted by those two etymologists, that the name was derived from the Esterlingi or Easterlings; as those Saxons were anciently called, who inhabited that district of Germany, now occupied by the Hansetowns and their appendages; the earliest traders in modern Europe.")

‡ 2 Inst. 577.

§ 1 Hal. P. C. 194.

b Ibid. 197.

c Ibid.

---

<sup>26</sup> Parliament has, in fact, for over two hundred years regulated the coinage.

§ 392. (6) The king as head of the church.—<sup>[279]</sup> The king is, lastly, considered by the laws of England as the head and supreme governor of the national church.

To enter into the reasons upon which this prerogative is founded is matter rather of divinity than of law. I shall therefore only observe that by statute 26 Hen. VIII, c. 1 (Act of Supremacy, 1534) (reciting that the king's majesty justly and rightfully is and ought to be the supreme head of the church of England; and so had been recognized by the clergy of this kingdom in their convocation), it is enacted, that the king shall be reputed the only supreme head in earth of the church of England, and shall have, annexed to the imperial crown of this realm, as well the title and style thereof, as all jurisdictions, authorities, and commodities, to the said dignity of supreme head of the church appertaining. And another statute to the same purport was made, 1 Eliz., c. 1 (Act of Supremacy, 1558).

§ 393. (a) The convocation.—In virtue of this authority the king convenes, prorogues, restrains, regulates, and dissolves all ecclesiastical synods or convocations. This was an inherent prerogative of the crown, long before the time of Henry VIII, as appears by the statute 8 Hen. VI, c. 1 (Convocation, 1429), and the many authors, both lawyers and historians, vouched by Sir Edward Coke.<sup>4</sup> So that the statute 25 Hen. VIII, c. 19 (Crown, 1533), which restrains the convocation from making or putting in execution any canons repugnant to the king's prerogative, or the laws, customs, and statutes of the realm, was merely declaratory of the old common law:<sup>5</sup> that part of it only being new, which makes the king's royal assent actually necessary to the validity of every canon. The convocation or ecclesiastical synod, in England, differs considerably in its constitution from the synods of other Christian kingdoms: those consisting wholly of bishops; whereas with us the convocation is the miniature of a parliament, wherein the archbishop presides with regal state; the upper house of bishops represents the house of lords; and the lower house, composed of representatives of the several dioceses at large, and of each particular chapter therein, <sup>[280]</sup> resembles the house of commons with its knights of the shire and burgesses.<sup>27</sup> This constitution is said to be owing to the policy of Edward I; who thereby at one and the same time let in the inferior clergy to the privileges of forming ecclesiastical canons (which before they had not), and also introduced a method of taxing ecclesiastical benefices, by consent of convocation.<sup>28</sup>

<sup>4</sup> 4 Inst. 322, 323.

<sup>5</sup> 12 Rep. 72.

§ 394. (b) Nomination of bishops.—From this prerogative also, of being the head of the church, arises the king's right of nomination to vacant bishoprics, and certain other ecclesiastical preferments; which will more properly be considered when we come to treat of the clergy. I shall only here observe that this is now done in consequence of the statute 25 Hen. VIII, c. 20 (Annates, 1534).

§ 395. (c) Appeals in ecclesiastical causes.—As head of the church, the king is likewise the dernier resort (court of ultimate appeal) in all ecclesiastical causes; an appeal lying ultimately to him in chancery from the sentence of every ecclesiastical judge: which right was restored to the crown by statute 25 Hen. VIII, c. 19 (Crown, 1533), as will more fully be shown hereafter.<sup>28</sup>

<sup>27</sup> In the diet of Sweden, where the ecclesiastics form one of the branches of the legislature, the chamber of the clergy resembles the convocation of England. It is composed of the bishops and superintendents; and also of deputies, one of which is chosen by every ten parishes or rural deanery. Mod. Un. Hist. xxxiii. 18.

<sup>28</sup> Gilb. Hist. of Exch. c. 4.

---

<sup>27</sup> There are two convocations, one for the province of Canterbury, the other for the province of York.

<sup>28</sup> Appeals in ecclesiastical causes are now heard by the judicial committee of the privy council.

CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.
OF THE KING'S REVENUE.

§ 396. The king's fiscal prerogatives.—Having, in the preceding chapter, considered at large, those branches of the king's prerogative, which contribute to his royal dignity, and constitute the executive power of the government, we proceed now to examine the king's fiscal prerogatives, or such as regard his revenue; which the British constitution hath vested in the royal person, in order to support his dignity and maintain his power: being a portion which each subject contributes of his property, in order to secure the remainder.<sup>1</sup>

§ 397. 1. The king's ordinary revenue.—This revenue is either ordinary or extraordinary. The king's ordinary revenue is such, as has either subsisted time out of mind in the crown; or else has been granted by parliament, by way of purchase or exchange for such of the king's inherent hereditary revenues, as were found inconvenient to the subject.

<sup>1</sup> It is an interesting and important fact, that, in spite of the great attention given to financial matters in the course of English constitutional development, and the early pre-eminence of parliament in questions of taxation, yet there is not, and never has been, legally speaking, any national revenue. In the early days of our history, the defense of the realm, and the other duties of government, were performed by the king with the aid of such funds as he could claim by conquest, inheritance, tradition or gift; supplemented occasionally, and with considerable difficulty, by the results of national taxation. In later days, the recurrence of taxes became regular and frequent; and, after much disputing, the respective rights of the crown and the parliament in the matter of taxation were settled. Moreover, though not until much later, a definite distinction began to be drawn between such of the royal expenditure as was concerned with the king's private and domestic life, and such of it as was devoted to strictly public objects. But still, the legal doctrine, that all public revenue is the revenue of the crown, that it can only be granted to, and on the request of, the crown, and that it can only be expended by the crown, remains a fundamental principle of our fiscal system. Wherefore, though the right of levying taxation has, of course, long since ceased, if it ever existed, to be part of the royal prerogative, it is strictly correct to treat of the revenue as a branch of the royal prerogative.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 635.

When I say that it has subsisted time out of mind in the crown, I do not mean that the king is at present in the actual possession of the whole of this revenue. Much (nay, the greatest part) of it is at this day in the hands of subjects; to whom it has been granted out from time to time by the kings of England: which has rendered the crown in some measure dependent on the people for its ordinary support and subsistence. So that I must be obliged to recount, as part of the royal revenue, what lords of manors and other subjects [282] frequently look upon to be their own absolute right; because they are and have been vested in them and their ancestors for ages, though in reality originally derived from the grants of our ancient princes.

§ 398. a. Ecclesiastical revenues—(1) Temporalities of bishops.—The first of the king's ordinary revenues, which I shall take notice of, is of an ecclesiastical kind (as are also the three succeeding ones); viz., the custody of the temporalities of bishops: by which are meant all the lay revenues, lands, and tenements (in which is included his barony) which belong to an archbishop's or bishop's see. And these upon the vacancy of the bishopric are immediately the right of the king, as a consequence of his prerogative in church matters; whereby he is considered as the founder of all archbishoprics and bishoprics, to whom during the vacancy they revert. And for the same reason, before the dissolution of abbeys, the king had the custody of the temporalities of all such abbeys and priories as were of royal foundation (but not of those founded by subjects) on the death of the abbot or prior.* Another reason may also be given, why the policy of the law hath vested this custody in the king; because as the successor is not known, the lands and possessions of the see would be liable to spoil and devastation, if no one had a property therein. Therefore the law has given the king, not the temporalities themselves, but the custody of the temporalities, till such time as a successor is appointed; with power of taking to himself all the intermediate profits, without any account of the successor; and with the right of presenting (which the crown very frequently exercises) to such benefices and other preferments as fall within the time of vacation.<sup>b</sup> This revenue is of so high a nature, that it could not be granted out to a subject, before or even after, it accrued: but now by the statute 15 Edw. III, st. 4, c. 4 & 5 (1341), the king may, after the vacancy, lease the temporalities to the dean and chapter; saving to himself all advowsons, escheats, and the like. Our ancient kings, and particularly William Rufus, were not only remarkable for keeping the bishoprics a long time [283] vacant, for the sake of enjoying the temporalities, but also committed horrible waste on the woods and other parts of the estate; and to crown all, would never, when the see was filled up, restore to the bishop his temporalities again, unless he purchased them at an exorbitant price. To remedy which, King Henry the First<sup>c</sup> granted a charter at the beginning of his reign, promising neither to sell, nor let to farm, nor take anything from, the domains of the church, till the successor was installed. And it was made one of the articles of the great charter,<sup>d</sup> that no waste should be committed in the temporalities of bishoprics, neither should the custody of them be sold. The same is ordained by the statute of Westminster the First;<sup>e</sup> and the statute 14 Edw. III, st. 4, c. 4 (Episcopal Temporalities, 1340) (which permits, as we have seen, a lease to the dean and chapter), is still more explicit in prohibiting the other exactions. It was also a frequent abuse that the king would for trifling, or no causes, seize the temporalities of bishops, even during their lives, into his own hands: but this is guarded against by statute 1 Edw. III, st. 2, c. 2 (1326).

* 2 Inst. 15.

This revenue of the king, which was formerly very considerable, is now by a customary indulgence almost reduced to nothing: for at present, as soon as the new bishop is consecrated and confirmed, he usually receives the restitution of his temporalities quite entire, and untouched, from the king; and at the same time does homage to his sovereign: and then, and not sooner, he has a fee simple in his bishopric, and may maintain an action for the profits.<sup>f</sup>

<sup>b</sup> Stat. 17 Edw. II. c. 14 (1324). F. N. B. 32.

<sup>c</sup> Matt. Paris.

<sup>d</sup> 9 Hen. III. c. 5 (1225).

<sup>e</sup> 3 Edw. I. c. 21 (Lands in Ward, 1275).

<sup>f</sup> Co. Litt. 67. 341.

§ 399. (2) Corodies.—The king is entitled to a corody, as the law calls it, out of every bishopric, that is, to send one of his chaplains to be maintained by the bishop, or to have a pension allowed him till the bishop promotes him to a benefice.<sup>e</sup> This is also in the nature of an acknowledgment to the king, as founder of the see, since he had formerly the same corody or pension from every abbey or priory of royal foundation. It is, I [284] apprehend, now fallen into total disuse; though Sir Matthew Hale says,<sup>h</sup> that it is due of common right, and that no prescription will discharge it.

§ 400. (3) Tithes.—The king also (as was formerly observed<sup>i</sup>) is entitled to all the tithes arising in extraparochial places;<sup>k</sup> though perhaps it may be doubted how far this article, as well as the last, can be properly reckoned a part of the king's own royal revenue; since a corody supports only his chaplains, and these extraparochial tithes are held under an implied trust, that the king will distribute them for the good of the clergy in general.

§ 401. (4) First-fruits and tenths.—The next branch consists in the first-fruits, and tenths, of all spiritual preferments in the kingdom; both of which I shall consider together.

These were originally a part of the papal usurpations over the clergy of this kingdom; first introduced by Pandulph, the pope's legate, during the reigns of King John and Henry the Third, in the see of Norwich; and afterwards attempted to be made universal by the Popes Clement V and John XXII, about the beginning of the fourteenth century. The first-fruits, primitiæ, or annates, were the first year's whole profits of the spiritual preferment, according to a rate or valor made under the direction of Pope Innocent IV by Walter bishop of Norwich in 38 Hen. III (1253), and afterwards advanced in value by commission from Pope Nicholas III, A. D. 1292, 20 Edw. I;<sup>l</sup> which valuation of Pope Nicholas is still preserved in the exchequer.<sup>m</sup> The tenths, or decimæ were

<sup>e</sup> F. N. B. 230.

<sup>k</sup> 2 Inst. 647.

<sup>h</sup> Notes on F. N. B. above cited.

<sup>l</sup> F. N. B. 176.

<sup>i</sup> Page 113.

<sup>m</sup> 3 Inst. 154.

the tenth part of the annual profit of each living by the same valuation; which was also claimed by the holy see, under no better pretense than a strange misapplication of that precept of the Levitical law, which directs,<sup>a</sup> that the Levites, "should offer the tenth part of their tithes as a heave-offering to the Lord, and give it to Aaron the high priest." But [285] this claim of the pope met with a vigorous resistance from the English parliament; and a variety of acts were passed to prevent and restrain it, particularly the statute 6 Hen. IV, c. 1 (First-fruits, 1404), which calls it a horrible mischief and damnable custom. But the popish clergy, blindly devoted to the will of a foreign master, still kept it on foot; sometimes more secretly, sometimes more openly and avowedly; so that in the reign of Henry VIII, it was computed, that in the compass of fifty years 800,000 ducats had been sent to Rome for first-fruits only. And, as the clergy expressed this willingness to contribute so much of their income to the head of the church, it was thought proper (when in the same reign the papal power was abolished, and the king was declared the head of the church of England) to annex this revenue to the crown; which was done by statute 26 Hen. VIII, c. 3 (First-fruits, 1534), (confirmed by statute 1 Eliz., c. 4 (First-fruits, 1558), and a new valor beneficiorum (value of benefices) was then made, by which the clergy are at present rated.

By these last-mentioned statutes all vicarages under ten pounds a year, and all rectories under ten marks, are discharged from the payment of first-fruits: and if, in such livings as continue chargeable with this payment, the incumbent lives but half a year, he shall pay only one-quarter of his first-fruits; if but one whole year, then half of them; if a year and a half, three-quarters: and if two years, then the whole; and not otherwise. Likewise by the statute 27 Hen. VIII, c. 8 (First-fruits, 1535), no tenths are to be paid for the first year, for then the first-fruits are due: and by other statutes of Queen Anne, in the fifth and sixth years of her reign, if a benefice be under fifty pounds per annum clear yearly value, it shall be discharged of the payment of first-fruits and tenths.

<sup>a</sup> Numb. xviii. 26.

§ 402. (a) Queen Anne's bounty.—Thus the richer clergy, being, by the criminal bigotry of their popish predecessors, subjected at first to a foreign exaction, were afterwards, when that yoke was shaken off, liable to a like misapplication of their revenues, through the rapacious disposition of the then reigning monarch: till at length the piety of Queen Anne restored to the church what had been [286] thus indirectly taken from it. This she did, not by remitting the tenths and first-fruits entirely, but, in a spirit of the truest equity, by applying these superfluities of the larger benefices to make up the deficiencies of the smaller. And to this end she granted her royal charter, which was confirmed by the statute 2 Ann., c. 11 (Queen Anne's Bounty, 1703), whereby all the revenue of first-fruits and tenths is vested in trustees forever, to form a perpetual fund for the augmentation of poor livings. This is usually called Queen Anne's bounty; which has been still further regulated by subsequent statutes.*

§ 403. b. Rents from the crown lands.—The next branch of the king's ordinary revenue (which, as well as the subsequent branches, is of a lay or temporal nature) consists in the rents and profits of the demesne lands of the crown. These demesne lands, terræ dominicales regis, being either the share reserved to the crown at the original distribution of landed property, or such as came to it afterwards by forfeitures or other means, were anciently very large and extensive; comprising divers manors, honors, and lordships; the tenants of which had very peculiar privileges, as will be shown in the second book of these Commentaries, when we speak of the tenure in ancient demesne. At present they are contracted within a very narrow compass, having been almost entirely granted away to private subjects. This has occasioned the parliament frequently to interpose; and, particularly, after King William III had greatly impoverished the crown, an act passed,<sup>p</sup> whereby all future grants or leases from the crown for any longer term than thirty-one years or three lives are declared to be void; except with regard to houses, which may be granted for fifty years.

* 5 Ann. c. 24 (1705). 6 Ann. c. 27 (Taxation, 1706). 1 Geo. I. st. 2. c. 10 (Queen Anne's Bounty, 1714). 3 Geo. I. c. 10 (First Fruits, 1716).

<sup>p</sup> 1 Ann. st. 1. c. 7 (Crown Lands, 1702).

And no reversionary lease can be made, so as to exceed together with the estate in being, the same term of three lives or thirty-one years: that is, where there is a subsisting lease, of which there are twenty years still to come, the king cannot grant a future interest, to commence after the expiration of the former, for any longer term than eleven years. The tenant must also be made liable to be punished for committing waste; [287] and the usual rent must be reserved, or, where there has usually been no rent, one third of the clear yearly value.<sup>4</sup> The misfortune is, that this act was made too late, after almost every valuable possession of the crown had been granted away forever, or else upon very long leases; but may be of some benefit to posterity, when those leases come to expire.<sup>2</sup>

§ 404. c. Prerogative of purveyance.—Hither might have been referred the advantages which used to arise to the king from the profits of his military tenures, to which most lands in the kingdom were subject, till the statute 12 Car. II, c. 24 (Military Tenures, 1660), which in great measure abolished them all: the explication of the nature of which tenures must be referred to the second book of these Commentaries. Hither also might have been referred the profitable prerogative of purveyance and pre-emption: which was a right enjoyed by the crown of buying up provisions and other necessaries, by the intervention of the king's purveyors, for the use of his royal household, at an appraised valuation, in preference to all others, and even without consent of the owner: and also of forcibly impressing the carriages and horses of the subject, to do the king's business on the public roads, in the conveyance of timber, baggage, and the like, however inconvenient to the proprietor, upon paying him a settled price. A prerogative, which prevailed pretty generally throughout Europe, during the scarcity of gold and silver, and the high valuation of money consequential thereupon. In those early times the king's household (as well as those of inferior lords) were supported by specific renders of corn, and other victuals, from the tenants of the respective demesnes; and there was also a continual market kept at the palace gate to furnish viands for the royal use.<sup>r</sup> And this answered all purposes, in those ages of simplicity, so long as the king's court continued in any certain place. But when it removed from one part of the kingdom to another (as was formerly very frequently done) it was found necessary to send [288] purveyors beforehand, to get together a sufficient quantity of provisions and other necessaries for the household: and, lest the unusual demand should raise them to an exorbitant price, the powers before mentioned were vested in these purveyors: who in process of time very greatly abused their authority, and became a great oppression to the subject, though of little advantage to the crown; ready money in open market (when the royal residence was more permanent, and specie began to be plenty) being found upon experience to be the best provider of any. Wherefore by degrees the powers of purveyance have declined, in foreign countries as well as our own: and particularly were abolished in Sweden by Gustavus Adolphus, towards the beginning of the last century.<sup>s</sup> And, with us in England, having fallen into disuse during the suspension of monarchy, King Charles at his restoration consented, by the same statute, to resign entirely these branches of his revenue and power: and the parliament, in part of recompense, settled on him, his heirs, and successors, forever, the hereditary excise of fifteen pence per barrel on all beer and ale sold in the kingdom, and a proportionable sum for certain other liquors. So that this hereditary excise, the nature of which shall be further explained in the subsequent part of this chapter, now forms the sixth branch of his majesty's ordinary revenue.

<sup>4</sup> In like manner by the civil law, the inheritances or fundi patrimoniales (lands of inheritance) of the imperial crown could not be alienated, but only let to farm. Cod. l. 11. t. 61.

<sup>2</sup> Cited, 1 Halst. 80. In the American colonies grants of royal franchises in navigable waters, etc., to the original patentees vested to them in their public, not in their private capacity, and the rights are now vested in the people of the respective states. (Arnold v. Mundy, 1 Halst. 80.)—HAMMOND.

§ 405. d. Wine licenses.—A seventh branch might also be computed to have arisen from wine licenses; or the rents payable to the crown by such persons as are licensed to sell wine by retail throughout England, except in a few privileged places. These were first settled on the crown by the statute 12 Car. II, c. 25 (Wine, 1660), and, together with the hereditary excise, made up the equivalent in value for the loss sustained by the prerogative in the abolition of the military tenures, and the right of pre-emption and purveyance: but this revenue was abolished by the statute 30 Geo. II, c. 19 (National Debt, 1756), and an annual sum of upwards of 7,000*l.* per annum, issuing out of the new stamp duties imposed on wine licenses, was settled on the crown in its stead.

<sup>r</sup> 4 Inst. 273.

<sup>s</sup> Mod. Un. Hist. xxxiii. 220.

§ 406. e. Profits from the forests.—<sup>[289]</sup> An eighth branch of the king's ordinary revenue is usually reckoned to consist in the profits arising from his forests. Forests are waste grounds belonging to the king, replenished with all manner of beasts of chase or venary; which are under the king's protection, for the sake of his royal recreation and delight: and, to that end, and for preservation of the king's game, there are particular laws, privileges, courts and officers belonging to the king's forests; all which will be, in their turns, explained in the subsequent books of these Commentaries. What we are now to consider are only the profits arising to the king from hence, which consist principally in ameracements or fines levied for offenses against the forest laws. But as few, if any, courts of this kind for levying ameracements<sup>**</sup> have been held since 1632, 8 Car. I, and as, from the accounts given of the proceedings in that court by our histories and law books,† nobody would now wish to see them again revived, it is needless (at least in this place) to pursue this inquiry any further.

§ 407. f. Judicial fines and fees.—The profits arising from the king's ordinary courts of justice make a ninth branch of his revenue. And these consist not only in fines imposed upon offenders, forfeitures of recognizances, and ameracements levied upon defaulters; but also in certain fees due to the crown in a variety of legal matters, as, for setting the great seal to charters, original writs, and other forensic proceedings, and for permitting fines to be levied of lands in order to bar entails, or otherwise to insure their title. As none of these can be done without the immediate intervention of the king, by himself or his officers, the law allows him certain perquisites and profits, as a recompense for the trouble he undertakes for the public. These, in process of time, have been almost all granted out to private persons, or else appropriated to certain particular uses: so that, though our law proceedings are still loaded with their payment, very little of them is now returned into the king's [290] exchequer; for a part of whose royal maintenance they were originally intended. All future grants of them, however, by the statute 1 Ann., st. 2, c. 7 (1702), are to endure for no longer time than the prince's life who grants them.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>**</sup> Roger North, in his Life of Lord Keeper North (43, 44). mentions an eyre, or iter, to have been held south of Trent soon after the restoration; but I have met with no report to its proceedings.

† 1 Jones. 267, 298.

§ 408. g. Royal fish.—A tenth branch of the king's ordinary revenue, said to be grounded on the consideration of his guarding and protecting the seas from pirates and robbers, is the right to royal fish, which are whale and sturgeon: and these, when either thrown ashore, or caught near the coasts, are the property of the king, on account<sup>v</sup> of their superior excellence. Indeed, our ancestors seem to have entertained a very high notion of the importance of this right; it being the prerogative of the kings of Denmark and the dukes of Normandy;<sup>w</sup> and from one of these it was probably derived to our princes. It is expressly claimed and allowed in the statute de prerogativa regis (of the king's prerogative):<sup>x</sup> and the most ancient treatises of law now extant make mention of it;<sup>z</sup> though they seem to have made a distinction

<sup>v</sup> Plowd. 315.

<sup>w</sup> Stiernh. de Jure Sueonum. 1, 2. c. 8. Gr. Coustum. cap. 17.

<sup>x</sup> 17 Edw. II c. 11 (1324).

<sup>z</sup> Bracton l. 3. c. 3. Britton. c. 17. Fleta. l. 1. c. 45 & 46. Memorand. Scacch. H. 24 Edw. I. 37 (1296), prefixed to Maynard's Year-Book of Edward II.

<sup>3</sup> The fees formerly due to the crown in legal matters have been greatly reduced through improvements in the administration of justice, and are, for the most part, prepaid by way of stamps affixed to legal documents.

<sup>4</sup> Pollock and Maitland, Hist. of Eng. Law (2d ed.), I, 336, repudiate the idea that there was any statute of this name, speaking of it as the "apocryphal statute of Prærogativa Regis, which may represent the practice of the earlier years of Edward I."

between whale and sturgeon, as was incidentally observed in a former chapter.<sup>7</sup>

§ 409. h. Wrecks.—Another maritime revenue, and founded partly upon the same reason, is that of shipwrecks: which are also declared to be the king's property by the same prerogative statute 17 Edw. II, c. 11 (1324), and were so, long before, at the common law. It is worthy observation, how greatly the law of wrecks has been altered, and the rigor of it gradually softened in favor of the distressed proprietors. Wreck, by the ancient common law, was where any ship was lost at sea, and the goods or cargo were thrown upon the land; in which case these goods, so wrecked, were adjudged to belong to the king: for it was held, that, by the loss of the ship, all property was gone out of the original owner.<sup>a</sup> But this was undoubtedly adding sorrow to sorrow, and was consonant neither to reason nor humanity. Wherefore it was first [291] ordained by King Henry I, that if any person escaped alive out of the ship it should be no wreck;<sup>a</sup> and afterwards King Henry II, by his charter,<sup>b</sup> declared, that if on the coasts of either England, Poictou, Oleron, or Gascony, any ship should be distressed, and either man or beast should escape or be found therein alive, the goods should remain to the owners, if they claimed them within three months; but otherwise should be esteemed a wreck, and should belong to the king, or other lord of the franchise. This was again confirmed with improvements by King Richard the First; who, in the second year of his reign,<sup>c</sup> not only established these concessions, by ordaining that the owner, if he was shipwrecked and escaped, "omnes res suas liberas et quietas haberet (that he should have all his goods free and undisturbed)," but also, that if he perished, his children, or in default of them his brethren and sisters, should retain the property; and, in default of brother or sister, then the goods should remain to the king.<sup>d</sup> And the law, <sup>7</sup> C. 4. page *223.

<sup>a</sup> Dr. & St. d. 2. c. 51.

<sup>a</sup> Spelm. Cod. apud Wilkins. 305.

<sup>b</sup> 26 May, A. D. 1174. 1 Rym. Fœd. 36.

<sup>c</sup> Rog. Hoved. in Rich. I.

<sup>d</sup> In like manner Constantine the Great, finding that by the imperial law the revenue of wrecks was given to the prince's treasury or fiscus, restrained it as laid down by Bracton in the reign of Henry III, seems still to have improved in its equity. For then, if not only a dog (for instance) escaped, by which the owner might be discovered, but if any certain mark were set on the goods, by which they might be known again, it was held to be no wreck.* And this is certainly most agreeable to reason; the rational claim of the king being only founded upon this, that the true owner cannot be ascertained. *Afterwards, in the statute of Westminster the First,<sup>f</sup> the time of limitation of claims, given by the charter of Henry II, is extended to a year and a day, according to the usage of Normandy:<sup>g</sup> and it enacts; that if a man, a dog, or a cat, escape alive, the vessel shall not be adjudged a wreck. These animals, as in Bracton, are only put for example;<sup>h</sup> for it is now held,<sup>i</sup> that not only if any live thing escape, but if proof can be made of the [292] property of any of the goods or lading which come to shore, they shall not be forfeited as wreck. The statute further ordains, that the sheriff of the county shall be<sup>k</sup> bound to keep the goods a year and a day (as in France for one year, agreeably to the maritime laws of Oleron,<sup>j</sup> and in Holland for a year and a half) that if any man can prove a property in them, either in his own right or by right of representation,<sup>k</sup> they shall be restored to him without delay; but, if no such property be proved within that time, they then shall * Previously, "But afterwards in the statute of Westminster the First, the law is laid down more agreeable to the charter of King Henry the Second: and upon that statute hath stood the legal doctrine of wrecks to the present time. It enacts that if any live thing escape (a man, a cat, or a dog; which, as in Bracton, are only put for examples) in this case, and, as it seems in this case only, it is clearly not a legal wreck; but the sheriff of the county is."

by an edict (Cod. 11. 5. 1.) and ordered them to remain to the owners; adding this humane expostulation, "Quod enim jus habet fiscus in aliena calamitate, ut de re tam luctuosa compendium sectetur?" (For what right has the exchequer in other men's misfortunes, that it should seek gain from so lamentable a source?)

* Bract. l. 3. c. 3.

<sup>f</sup> 3 Edw. I. c. 4 (Wreckage, 1275).

<sup>g</sup> Gr. Coustum. c. 17.

<sup>h</sup> Flet. l. 1. c. 44. 2 Inst. 167. 5 Rep. 107.

<sup>i</sup> Hamilton v. Davies, Trin. 11 Geo. III. (1771) B. R.

<sup>j</sup> § 28.

<sup>k</sup> 2 Inst. 168.

be the king's. If the goods are of a perishable nature, the sheriff may sell them, and the money shall be liable in their stead.<sup>1</sup> This revenue of wrecks is frequently granted out to lords of manors, as a royal franchise; and if anyone be thus entitled to wrecks in his own land, and the king's goods are wrecked thereon, the king may claim them at any time, even after the year and day.<sup>m 5</sup>

§ 410. (1) Jetsam, flotsam, and ligan.—It is to be observed, that, in order to constitute a legal wreck, the goods must come to land. If they continue at sea, the law distinguishes them by the barbarous and uncouth appellations of jetsam, flotsam, and ligan. Jetsam is where goods are cast into the sea, and there sink and remain under water: flotsam is where they continue swimming on the surface of the waves: ligan is where they are sunk in the sea, but tied to a cork or buoy, in order to be found again.<sup>n</sup> These are also the king's if no owner appears to claim them; but, if any owner appears, he is entitled to recover the possession. For even if they be cast overboard, without any mark or buoy, in order to lighten the ship, the owner is not by this act of necessity construed to have renounced his property:° much less can things ligan be supposed to be abandoned, since the owner has done all in his power to assert and retain his property. These three are therefore accounted so far a distinct thing from the former, that by the [293]

<sup>1</sup> Plowd. 166.

<sup>m</sup> 2 Inst. 168. Bro. Abr. tit. Wreck.

<sup>n</sup> 5 Rep. 106.

° Quæ enim res in tempestate, levandæ navis causa, ejiciuntur, hæ dominorum permanent. Quia palam est, eas non eo animo ejici, quod quis habere nolit. (Those things which are cast overboard for the sake of lightening the ship still belong to the owners. For it is clear that they were not thrown away as relinquished on any other account.) Inst. 2. 1. § 48.

<sup>5</sup> Wreck of the sea, in this the purely technical sense of the common law, by which it constitutes a royal franchise, and is excluded from admiralty jurisdiction, is entirely different from "wreck" or shipwrecked property, in the sense of the maritime and commercial law. The latter is flotsam, jetsam, or ligan: only that which is cast upon the land is wreck. (See 3 Comm. 106; 1 Hagg. Adm. 17; U. S. v. Coombs, 12 Pet. 72, 77, where the text is cited; Garner's Case, 3 Gratt. 761.)—HAMMOND.

king's grant to a man of wrecks, things jetsam, flotsam, and ligan will not pass.<sup>p</sup>

§ 411. (2) Statutes protecting wrecks; salvage.—Wrecks, in their legal acception, are at present not very frequent: for, if any goods come to land, it rarely happens, since the improvement of commerce, navigation, and correspondence, that the owner is not able to assert his property within the year and day limited by law. And in order to preserve this property entire for him, and if possible to prevent wrecks at all, our laws have made many very humane regulations; in a spirit quite opposite to those savage laws, which formerly prevailed in all the northern regions of Europe, and a few years ago were still said to subsist on the coasts of the Baltic sea, permitting the inhabitants to seize on whatever they could get as lawful prize; or, as an author of their own expresses it, "in naufragorum miseria et calamitate tanquam vultures ad prædam currere (to run like vultures to their prey, amidst the misery and calamity of shipwrecked sufferers)."<sup>q</sup> For by the statute 27 Edw. III, c. 13 (Goods Stolen at Sea, 1353), if any ship be lost on the shore, and the goods come to land (which cannot, says the statute, be called wreck), they shall be presently delivered to the merchants, paying only a reasonable reward to those that saved and preserved them, which is entitled salvage. Also by the common law, if any persons (other than the sheriff) take any goods so cast on shore, which are not legal wreck, the owners might have a commission to inquire and find them out, and compel them to make restitution.<sup>r</sup> And by statute 12 Ann., st. 2, c. 18 (Relief of the Poor, 1713), confirmed by 4 Geo. I, c. 12 (Stranded Ships, 1717), in order to assist the distressed, and prevent the scandalous illegal practices on some of our sea coasts (too similar to those on the Baltic), it is enacted, that all head officers and others of towns near the sea shall, upon application made to them, summon as many hands as are necessary, and send them to the relief of any ship in distress, on forfeiture of 100*l.*, and, in case of assistance given, salvage shall be paid by the owners, to be assessed by three neighboring justices. All persons that secrete any goods shall forfeit their treble value: and if they willfully do any act whereby the ship is lost or destroyed, [294] by making holes in her, stealing her pumps, or otherwise, they are guilty of felony, without benefit of clergy. Lastly, by the statute 26 Geo. II, c. 19 (Stealing Shipwrecked Goods, 1753), plundering any vessel either in distress, or wrecked, and whether any living creature be on board, or not (for, whether wreck or otherwise, it is clearly not the property of the populace), such plundering, I say, or preventing the escape of any person that endeavors to save his life, or wounding him with intent to destroy him, or putting out false lights in order to bring any vessel into danger, are all declared to be capital felonies in like manner as the destroying of trees, steeples, or other stated sea-marks, is punished by the statute 8 Eliz., c. 13 (Sea-marks and Mariners, 1566), with a forfeiture of 100*l.* or outlawry. Moreover, by the statute of George II, pilfering any goods cast ashore is declared to be petty larceny; and many other salutary regulations are made, for the more effectually preserving ships of any nation in distress.*<sup>6</sup>

<sup>p</sup> 5 Rep. 108.

<sup>r</sup> F. N. B. 112.

<sup>q</sup> Stiernh. de Jure Sueon, 1. 3. c. 5.

§ 412. i. Royal mines.—A twelfth branch of the royal revenue, the right to mines, has its original from the king's prerogative of coinage, in order to supply him with materials; and therefore those mines, which are properly royal, and to which the king is entitled when found, are only those of silver and gold.<sup>55</sup> By the old common law, if gold or silver be found in mines of base metal, according to the opinion of some the whole was a royal mine, and belonged to the king; though others held that it only did so, if the

* By the civil law, to destroy persons shipwrecked, or prevent their saving the ship, is capital. And to steal even a plank from a vessel in distress, or wrecked, makes the party liable to answer for the whole ship and cargo. (Ff. 47. 9. 3.) The laws also of the Wisigoths, and the most early Neapolitan constitutions, punished with the utmost severity all those who neglected to assist any ship in distress, or plundered any goods cast on shore. (Lindenbrog. Cod. LL. Antiqu. 146. 715.)

<sup>55</sup> 2 Inst. 577.

---

<sup>6</sup> The law of wreck and salvage is now governed by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and the acts amendatory thereof. The general superintendence of all matters relating to wreck is in the hands of the board of trade.

quantity of gold or silver was of greater value than the quantity of base metal.† But now by the statutes 1 W. & M., st. 1, c. 30 (Crown Mines, 1689), and 5 W. & M., c. 6 (Crown Mines, 1693), this difference is made immaterial; it being enacted, that no mines of copper, tin, iron, or lead, shall be looked upon as royal mines, notwithstanding gold or silver may be extracted from them in any quantities: but that the king, or [295] persons claiming royal mines under his authority, may have the ore (other than tin-ore in the counties of Devon and Cornwall), paying for the same a price stated in the act. This was an extremely reasonable law: for now private owners are not discouraged from working mines, through a fear that they may be claimed as royal ones: neither does the king depart from the just rights of his revenue, since he may have all the precious metal contained in the ore, paying no more for it than the value of the base metal which it is supposed to be; to which base metal the land owner is by reason and law entitled.

§ 413. j. Treasure-trove.—To the same original may in part be referred the revenue of treasure-trove (derived from the French word, trover, to find), called in Latin thesaurus inventus, which is where any money or coin, gold, silver, plate, or bullion, is found hidden in the earth, or other private place, the owner thereof being unknown; in which case the treasure belongs to the king:<sup>7</sup> but if he that hid it be known, or afterwards found out, the owner and

† Plowd. 336. (Previous to fourth edition, "366.")

<sup>7</sup> "Lost property was such as was found on the surface of the earth, and with which the owner had involuntarily parted. The presumption arising from the place of finding was that the owner had intended to abandon his property, and that it had gone back to the original stock, and therefore belonged to the finder or first taker until the owner appeared and showed that its losing was accidental, or without an intention to abandon the property. Treasure-trove, on the other hand, was money or coin found hidden or secreted in the earth or other private place, the owner being unknown. It originally belonged to the finder if the owner was not discovered; but Blackstone says it was afterward adjudged expedient, for the purposes of state, and particularly for the coinage, that it should go to the king; and so the rule was promulgated that property found on the surface of the earth belonged to the finder until the owner appeared, but that found hidden in the earth belonged to the king. 1 Bl. Comm. *295. In this country the law relating to treasure-trove has not the king is entitled to it.<sup>u</sup> Also if it be found in the sea, or upon the earth, it doth not belong to the king, but the finder, if no owner appears.<sup>w</sup> So that it seems it is the hiding, and not the abandoning of it, that gives the king a property: Bracton<sup>x</sup> defining it, in the words of the civilians, to be "vetus depositio pecuniæ (the previous concealment of the money)."<sup>y</sup> This difference clearly arises from the different intentions which the law implies in the owner. A man that hides his treasure in a secret place, evidently does not mean to relinquish his property; but reserves a right of claiming it again, when he sees occasion: and, if he dies and the secret also dies with him, the law gives it the king, in part of his royal revenue. But a man that scatters his treasure into the sea, or upon the public surface of the earth, is construed to have absolutely abandoned his property, and returned it into the common stock, without any intention of reclaiming it; and therefore it belongs, as in a state of nature, to the first occupant, or finder; unless the owner appear and assert his right, which [296] then proves that the loss was by accident, and not with an intent to renounce his property.

Formerly all treasure-trove belonged to the finder;<sup>z</sup> as was also the rule of the civil law.<sup>a</sup> Afterwards it was judged expedient for the purposes of the state, and particularly for the coinage, to allow part of what was so found to the king; which part was assigned to be all hidden treasure; such as is casually lost and unclaimed, and also such as is designedly abandoned, still remaining the right of the fortunate finder. And that the prince shall be entitled to this hidden treasure is now grown to be, according to Grotius,<sup>a</sup>

<sup>u</sup> 3 Inst. 132. Dalt. of Sheriffs. c. 16.

<sup>w</sup> Britt. c. 17. Finch. L. 177.

<sup>x</sup> 1. 3. c. 3. § 4.

<sup>y</sup> Bracton. l. 3. c. 3. 3 Inst. 133.

<sup>z</sup> Ff. 41. 1. 31.

<sup>a</sup> De jur. b. & p. l. 2. c. 8. § 7.

---

generally been merged into the law of the finder of lost property, and it is said that the question as to whether the English law of treasure-trove obtains in any state has never been decided in America. 2 Kent, *357." Danielsou v. Roberts, 44 Or. 108, 102 Am. St. Rep. 627, 65 L. R. A. 526, 74 Pac. 913, 914.

<sup>8</sup> For a recent instance of treasure-trove, see the case of A.-G. v. Trustees of British Museum, [1903] 2 Ch. 598.

“jus commune, et quasi gentium (the common law, and, as it were, the law of nations)”: for it is not only observed, he adds, in England, but in Germany, France, Spain, and Denmark. The finding of deposited treasure was much more frequent, and the treasures themselves more considerable, in the infancy of our constitution than at present. When the Romans, and other inhabitants of the respective countries which composed their empire were driven out by the northern nations, they concealed their money underground: with a view of resorting to it again when the heat of the irruption should be over, and the invaders driven back to their deserts. But, as this never happened, the treasures were never claimed; and on the death of the owners the secret also died along with them. The conquering generals, being aware of the value of these hidden mines, made it highly penal to secrete them from the public service. In England, therefore, as among the feudists,<sup>b</sup> the punishment of such as concealed from the king the finding of hidden treasure was formerly no less than death; but now it is only fine and imprisonment.<sup>c</sup>

§ 414. k. Waifs.—Waifs, bona waviata, are goods stolen, and waived or thrown away by the thief in his flight, for fear of being apprehended. These are given to the king by the law, as a punishment upon the owner, for not himself pursuing the felon, and taking away his goods from him.<sup>d</sup> And therefore [297] if the party robbed do his diligence immediately to follow and apprehend the thief (which is called making fresh suit), or do convict him afterwards, or procure evidence to convict him, he shall have his goods again.<sup>e</sup> Waived goods do also not belong to the king, till seized by somebody for his use; for if the party robbed can seize them first, though at the distance of twenty years, the king shall never have them.<sup>f</sup> If the goods are hid by the thief, or left anywhere by him, so that he had them not about him, when he fled, and therefore did not throw them away in his flight; these also are not bona waviata, but the owner may have them again when he pleases.<sup>g</sup> The goods of a foreign merchant, though stolen and

<sup>b</sup> Glanv. 1. 1. c. 2. Crag. 1. 16. 40.

<sup>e</sup> Finch. L. 212.

<sup>c</sup> 3 Inst. 133.

<sup>f</sup> Ibid.

<sup>d</sup> Cro. Eliz. 694.

<sup>g</sup> 5 Rep. 109.

thrown away in flight, shall never be waifs:<sup>h</sup> the reason whereof may be, not only for the encouragement of trade, but also because there is no willful default in the foreign merchant's not pursuing the thief, he being generally a stranger to our laws, our usages, and our language.

§ 415. 1. Estrays.—Estrays are such valuable animals as are found wandering in any manor or lordship, and no man knoweth the owner of them; in which case the law gives them to the king as the general owner and lord paramount of the soil, in recompense for the damage which they may have done therein: and they now most commonly belong to the lord of the manor, by special grant from the crown. But, in order to vest an absolute property in the king, or his grantees, they must be proclaimed in the church and two market towns next adjoining to the place where they are found: and then, if no man claims them, after proclamation and a year and a day passed, they belong to the king or his substitute without redemption;<sup>i</sup> even though the owner were a minor, or under any other legal incapacity.<sup>k</sup> A provision similar to which obtained in the old Gothic constitution, with regard to all things that were found, which were to be thrice proclaimed; primum coram comitibus et viatoribus obviis, deinde in proxima [298] villa vel pago, postremo coram ecclesia vel iudicio (first before the inhabitants of the place and passing travelers, then in the next town or village, lastly before the church, or judgment court): and the space of a year was allowed for the owner to reclaim his property.<sup>l</sup> If the owner claims them within the year and day, he must pay the charges of finding, keeping, and proclaiming them.<sup>m</sup> The king or lord has no property till the year and day passed: for if a lord keepeth an estray three-quarters of a year, and within the year it strayeth again, and another lord getteth it, the first lord cannot take it again.<sup>n</sup> Any beast may be an estray, that is by nature

<sup>h</sup> Fitzh. Abr. tit. Estray. 1. 3 Bulstr. 19.

<sup>i</sup> Mirr. c. 3. § 19.

<sup>k</sup> 5 Rep. 108. Bro. Abr. tit. Estray. Cro. Eliz. 716.

<sup>l</sup> Stiernh. de Jur. Gothor. 1, 3. c. 5.

<sup>m</sup> Dalt. Sh. 79.

<sup>n</sup> Finch. L. 177.

tame or reclaimable, and in which there is a valuable property, as sheep, oxen, swine, and horses, which we in general call cattle;<sup>9</sup> and so Fleta<sup>o</sup> defines it, pecus vagans, quod nullus petit, sequitur vel advocat (wandering cattle, which no one seeks, follows, or calls to). For animals upon which the law sets no value, as a dog or cat, and animals feræ naturæ (wild by nature), as a bear or wolf, cannot be considered as estrays. So swans may be estrays, but not any other fowl;<sup>p</sup> whence they are said to be royal fowl. The reason of which distinction seems to be, that, cattle and swans being of a reclaimed nature, the owner's property in them is not lost merely by their temporary escape; and they also, from their intrinsic value, are a sufficient pledge for the expense of the lord of the franchise in keeping them the year and day. For he that takes an estray is found so long as he keeps it to find it in provisions and keep it from damage;<sup>q</sup> and may not use it by way of labor, but is liable to an action for so doing.<sup>r</sup> Yet he may milk a cow, or the like; for that tends to the preservation, and is for the benefit, of the animal.<sup>s 10</sup> § 416. (1) Bona vacantia.—Besides the particular reasons before given why the king should have the several revenues of royal fish, shipwrecks, treasure-trove, waifs, and estrays, there is also one general reason which holds for them all; and that is, because they are bona vacantia, or goods in which no one else can claim a property. And therefore by the law of nature they belonged to the first occupant or finder; and so continued under the [299] imperial law. But, in settling the modern constitutions of most of the governments in Europe, it was thought proper (to pre-o L. 1. c. 43.

r Cro. Jac. 147.

p 7 Rep. 17.

s Cro. Jac. 148. Noy. 119.

q 1 Roll. Abr. 889.

<sup>9</sup> "Blackstone uses the term 'cattle' as a general one, comprehending sheep, oxen, swine, and horses. 1 Bl. Comm. 298. It may comprehend any livestock kept for use or profit; animals useful for food or labor. And. Law Dict., p. 155." Haigh v. Bell, 41 W. Va. 19, 31 L. R. A. 131, 23 S. E. 666, 667.

<sup>10</sup> Cited, 30 Mich. 211; Walk. (Miss.) 294; 14 Tex. 430; 2 Gall. 388. Whether the owner must be unknown in all cases to constitute an estray is doubted in State v. Apel, 14 Tex. 428, 430.—HAMMOND.

vent that strife and contention, which the mere title of occupancy is apt to create and continue, and to provide for the support of public authority in a manner the least burdensome to individuals) that these rights should be annexed to the supreme power by the positive laws of the state. And so it came to pass that, as Bracton expresses it,<sup>1</sup> hæc quæ nullius in bonis sunt, et olim fuerunt inventoris de jure naturali, jam efficiuntur principis de jure gentium (those things which are no man's property and formerly belonged to the finder as by natural right, become now the property of the king by the law of nations).

§ 417. m. Forfeitures.—The next branch of the king's ordinary revenue consists in forfeitures of lands and goods for offenses; bona confiscata, as they are called by the civilians, because they belonged to the fiscus or imperial treasury; or, as our lawyers term them, forisfacta, that is, such whereof the property is gone away or departed from the owner. The true reason and only substantial ground of any forfeiture for crimes consist in this; that all property is derived from society, being one of those civil rights which are conferred upon individuals, in exchange for that degree of natural freedom, which every man must sacrifice when he enters into social communities. If, therefore, a member of any national community violates the fundamental contract of his association, by transgressing the municipal law, he forfeits his right to such privileges as he claims by that contract; and the state may very justly resume that portion of property, or any part of it, which the laws have before assigned him. Hence, in every offense of an atrocious kind, the laws of England have exacted a total confiscation of the movables or personal estate; and in many cases a perpetual, in others only a temporary, loss of the offender's immovables or landed property; and have vested them both in the king, who is the person supposed to be offended, being the one visible magistrate in whom the majesty of the public resides. The particulars of these forfeitures will be more properly recited when we treat of crimes and misdemeanors.<sup>11</sup> I therefore only mention them here, for <sup>[300]</sup> the sake of regularity, as a part of the census regalis (the royal revenue); and shall postpone for the present the further consideration of all forfeitures, excepting one species only, which arises from the misfortune rather than the crime of the owner, and is called a deodand.<sup>12</sup>

<sup>1</sup> 1. 1. c. 12.

<sup>11</sup> No forfeiture of property now takes place, under the law of England, on conviction of its owner for felony.

<sup>12</sup> Theory of the deodand.—In English men called the deodand, the bane, that is, the slayer. In accordance with ancient ideas this bane, we take it, would have gone to the kinsmen of the slain; the owner would have purchased his peace by a surrender of the noxal thing; but what we have said above about intestacy [p. 356] will prepare us to see that in the thirteenth century the claim of a soul which has been hurried out of this world outweighs the claim of the dead man's kinsfolk, and in the past they will have received the bane, not as a compensation for the loss that they suffered, but rather as an object upon which their vengeance must be wreaked before the dead man will lie in peace. Even therefore when, as was commonly the case, the bane was a thing that belonged to the dead man, none the less it was deodand. The deodand may warn us that in ancient criminal law there was a sacral element which Christianity could not wholly suppress, especially when what might otherwise have been esteemed a heathenry was in harmony with some of those strange old dooms that lie embodied in the holy books of the Christian. Also it is hard for us to acquit ancient law of that unreasoning instinct that impels the civilized man to kick, or consign to eternal perdition, the chair over which he has stumbled. (Holmes, Common Law, p. 11; Wigmore, Harvard Law Rev. vii, p. 317, n. 8.)—POLLOCK & MAITLAND, 2 Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 473.

The instinct which leads the golfer to break his club so that it shall bring no more woes upon the human race, is inherited from his ancestors, who if death was caused by animals or inanimate objects took vengeance on the offending object. The manslaying ox in Exodus, xxi, 28, is to be stoned; the Athenians banished the ax (Aeschines, κατὰ Κτησιφ, 244, 245). In the second century after Christ, Pausanias notes that they still sat in judgment on inanimate things in the Prytaneum (i. 28 (ii)). Mr. Tylor tells us that "if a tiger killed a Kuki (Southern Asia), his family were in disgrace till they had retaliated by killing and eating the tiger or another; but further, if a man was killed by a fall from a tree, his relatives would take their vengeance by cutting the tree down and scattering it in chips."

"Thus too by an ancient law," says Blackstone, "a well in which a person was drowned was ordered to be filled up under the inspection of the coroner" (Fleta, 1, 1, c. 25, sec. 10).

The same underlying feeling explains the noxæ datio of the Roman law. The thing is guilty; it, and not its owner, is to be punished. It is to be handed over to the relatives of the dead man to do what they please to it.

So in our law in death by misadventure, the thing causing the death was forfeited, according to the laws of Ine and Alfred, to the kindred, but later

§ 418. (1) Deodands.—By this is meant whatever personal chattel is the immediate occasion of the death of any reasonable creature: which is forfeited to the king, to be applied to pious uses, and distributed in alms by his high almoner;<sup>u</sup> though formerly destined to a more superstitious purpose. It seems to have been originally designed, in the blind days of popery, as an expiation for the souls of such as were snatched away by sudden death; and for that purpose ought properly to have been given to holy church: <sup>v</sup> in the same manner, as the apparel of a stranger who was found dead was applied to purchase masses for the good of his soul. And this may account for that rule of law, that no deodand is due where an infant under the age of discretion is killed by a fall from a cart, or horse, or the like, not being in motion; <sup>w</sup> whereas, if an adult person falls from thence and is killed, the thing is certainly forfeited. For the reason given by Sir Matthew

<sup>u</sup> 1 Hal. P. C. 419. Fleta l. 1. c. 25.

<sup>v</sup> Fitzh. Abr. tit. Enditement. pl. 27. Staunf. P. C. 20, 21.

<sup>w</sup> 3 Inst. 57. 1 Hal. P. C. 422.

---

in Bracton's time to God pro rege. In the thirteenth century the thing was taken by the sheriff or coroner or other officer and sold, and at the next eyre an order was made for him to account for its value. The justices could direct for what specific purposes the money should be applied, charitable or public, pro deo. Thus, when in 1221 some persons fell out of a boat on the Severn and were drowned, the record says, "value of boat eighteen pence, dentur deo ad pontem," i. e., to build a bridge (Select Pleas of County of Gloucester, 55). The church seems to have seen an opportunity of making a claim on the ground that as the person died unconfessed in actual sin, the thing should be devoted to buying masses for his soul, in the same way as the apparel of a stranger found dead was applied to that purpose.—CARTER, History of English Legal Institutions, (3d ed.) 198n.

Mr. Justice Holmes brings forward a mass of curious evidence, beginning with Exodus, xxi, 28, to show that the remedy was in early times against the immediate cause of damage, even inanimate, the owner of which was therefore bound to surrender it ("noxæ deditio"), though in later times he was allowed to redeem the offending property by a money payment. Common Law, pp. 7-35. Cf. Fitz. Abr. "Barre," 290. On the connected institution of the "Deodand," see 1 Comm. 300. A steam-engine which had caused death was forfeited to the crown by way of deodand as lately as 1842 (Reg. v. Eastern Counties Ry. Co., 10 M. & W. 58); but deodands were abolished by 9 & 10 Vict., c. 62 (1846). See Holmes, J., in Harvard L. B., xii, p. 445.—HOLLAND, Jurisprudence (11th ed.), 154 n.

Hale seems to be very inadequate, viz., because an infant is not able to take care of himself; for why should the owner save his forfeiture, on account of the imbecility of the child, which ought rather to have made him more cautious to prevent any accident of mischief? The true ground of this rule seems rather to be, that the child, by reason of its want of discretion, is presumed incapable of actual sin, and therefore needed no deodand to purchase propitiatory masses: but every adult, who dies in actual sin, stood in need of such atonement, according to the humane superstition of the founders of the English law.

Thus stands the law if a person be killed by a fall from a thing standing still. But if a horse, or ox, or other animal, [301] of his own motion, kill as well an infant as an adult, or if a cart run over him, they shall in either case be forfeited as deodands; 7 which is grounded upon this additional reason, that such misfortunes are in part owing to the negligence of the owner, and therefore he is properly punished by such forfeiture. A like punishment is in like cases inflicted by the mosaical law: 8 “if an ox gore a man that he die, the ox shall be stoned, and his flesh shall not be eaten.” And, among the Athenians, 9 whatever was the cause of a man’s death, by falling upon him, was exterminated or cast out of the dominions of the republic. Where a thing, not in motion, is the occasion of a man’s death, that part only which is the immediate cause is forfeited; as if a man be climbing up the wheel of a cart, and is killed by falling from it, the wheel alone is a deodand: 6 but, wherever the thing is in motion, not only that part which immediately gives the wound (as the wheel, which runs over his body), but all things which move with it and help to make the wound more dangerous (as the cart and loading, which increase the pressure of the wheel) are forfeited. 6 It matters not whether the owner were concerned in the killing or not; for, if a man kills

7 Omnia, quæ movent ad mortem, sunt Deo danda. Bracton, 1. 3. c. 5. (What moves to death we understand to be forfeit as a deodand.) Cowell, Tit. Deodand.

8 Exod. xxi. 28.

9 Æschin. contr. Ctesiph.

6 1 Hal. P. C. 422.

6 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 26.

another with my sword the sword is forfeited<sup>d</sup> as an accursed thing.<sup>e</sup> And therefore, in all indictments for homicide, the instrument of death and the value are presented and found by the grand jury (as, that the stroke was given by a certain penknife, value sixpence) that the king or his grantee may claim the deodand: for it is no deodand, unless it be presented as such by a jury of twelve men.<sup>f</sup> No deodands are due for accidents happening upon the high sea, that being out of the jurisdiction of the common law: but if a [302] man falls from a boat or ship in fresh water, and is drowned, it hath been said, that the vessel and cargo are in strictness of law a deodand.<sup>g</sup> But juries have of late very frequently taken upon themselves to mitigate these forfeitures, by finding only some trifling thing, or part of an entire thing, to have been the occasion of the death. And in such cases, although the finding by the jury be hardly warrantable by law, the court of king's bench hath generally refused to interfere on behalf of the lord of the franchise, to assist so odious a claim.<sup>h</sup>

Deodands, and forfeitures in general, as well as wrecks, treasure-trove, royal fish, mines, waifs, and estrays, may be granted by the king to particular subjects, as a royal franchise: and indeed they are for the most part granted out to the lords of manors, or other liberties: to the perversion of their original design.

§ 419. n. Escheats.—Another branch of the king's ordinary revenue arises from escheats of lands, which happen upon the

<sup>d</sup> A similar rule obtained among the ancient Goths. Si quis, me nesciente, quocunque meo telo vel instrumento in perniciem suam abutatur; vel ex ædibus meis cadat, vel incidat in puteum meum, quantumvis tectum et munitum, vel in cataractam, et sub molendino meo confringatur, ipse aliqua multa plectar; ut in parte infelicitatis meæ numeretur, habuisse vel ædificasse aliquod quo homo periret. (If anyone, without my knowledge, use any weapon or instrument of mine for his own destruction; or fall from my house, or into my well, however securely covered or fenced, or into my mill-stream, or be crushed in my mill, let me suffer by some fine; as the misfortune may be reckoned in part mine, to have built or possessed anything by which a man should perish.) Stiernhook de jure Goth. l. 3. c. 4.

<sup>e</sup> Dr. & St. d. 2. c. 51.

<sup>f</sup> 3 Inst. 57.

<sup>g</sup> 3 Inst. 58. 1 Hal. P. C. 423. Molloy de Jur. Maritim. 2. 225.

<sup>h</sup> Foster of Homicide. 266.

defect of heirs to succeed to the inheritance; whereupon they in general revert to and vest in the king, who is esteemed, in the eye of the law, the original proprietor of all the lands in the kingdom. But the discussion of this topic more properly belongs to the second book of these Commentaries, wherein we shall particularly consider the manner in which lands may be acquired or lost by escheat.

§ 420. o. Custody of idiots and lunatics.—I proceed, therefore, to the eighteenth and last branch of the king's ordinary revenue; which consists in the custody of idiots, from whence we shall be naturally led to consider also the custody of lunatics.<sup>13</sup>

§ 421. (1) Idiots.—An idiot, or natural fool, is one that hath had no understanding from his nativity; and therefore is by law presumed never likely to attain any. For which reason the custody of [303] him and of his lands was formerly vested in the lord of the fee<sup>1</sup> (and therefore still, by special custom, in some

<sup>1</sup> Flet. 1. 1. c. 11. § 10.

---

<sup>13</sup> The king's wardship of an idiot's lands.—Among the insane our law draws a marked distinction; it separates the lunatic from the idiot or born fool. About the latter there is a curious story to be told. In Edward I's day the king claims a wardship of the lands of all natural fools, no matter of whom such lands may be holden. He is morally bound to maintain the idiots out of the income of their estates, but still the right is a profitable right analogous to the lord's wardship of an infant tenant. But there is reason to believe that this is a new right, or that at any rate there has been a struggle for it between the lords and the king. If idiocy be treated as similar to infancy, this analogy is in favor of the lords; at all events, if the idiot be a military tenant, feudal principles would give the custody of his land not to the king, but to the lord, while of socage land some kinsman of the fool might naturally claim a wardship. Edward I was told that by the law of Scotland the lord had the wardship of an idiot's land. But in England a different rule had been established, and this, as we think, by some statute or ordinance made in the last days of Henry III. If we have rightly read an obscure tale, Robert Walerand, a minister, justice and favorite of the king, procured this ordinance foreseeing that he must leave an idiot as his heir and desirous that his land should fall rather into the king's hand than into the hands of his lords. The king's right is distinctly stated in the document known as Prærogativa Regis, which we believe to come from the early years of Edward I.—POLLOCK & MAITLAND, Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 481.

manors the lord shall have the ordering of idiot and lunatic copyholders<sup>1)</sup>; but, by reason of the manifold abuses of this power by subjects, it was at last provided by common consent that it should be given to the king, as the general conservator of his people; in order to prevent the idiot from wasting his estate, and reducing himself and his heirs to poverty and distress.<sup>k</sup> This fiscal prerogative of the king is declared in parliament by statute 17 Edw. II, c. 9 (1324), which directs (in affirmance of the common law<sup>1)</sup>) that the king shall have ward of the lands of natural fools, taking the profits without waste or destruction, and shall find them necessaries; and after the death of such idiots he shall render the estate to the heirs: in order to prevent such idiots from aliening their lands, and their heirs from being disinherited.

§ 422. (a) Inquest of idiocy.—By the old common law there is a writ de idiota inquirendo (of inquisition concerning an idiot), to inquire whether a man be an idiot or not:<sup>m</sup> which must be tried by a jury of twelve men;<sup>14</sup> and, if they find him purus idiota (an absolute idiot), the profits of his lands, and the custody of his person may be granted by the king to some subject, who has interest enough to obtain them.<sup>n</sup> This branch of the revenue hath been long considered as a hardship upon private families: and so long ago as in the 8 Jac. I (1610), it was under the consideration of parliament, to vest this custody in the relations of the party, and to settle an equivalent on the crown in lieu of it; it being then

<sup>1</sup> Dyer. 302. Hutt. 17. Noy. 27.

<sup>k</sup> F. N. B. 232.

<sup>1</sup> 4 Rep. 126 Memorand' Ccacc' 20 Edw. I. (1292) (prefixed to Maynard's Year-Book of Edw. II.) fol. 20. 24.

<sup>m</sup> F. N. B. 232.

<sup>n</sup> This power, though of late very rarely exerted, is still alluded to in common speech, by that usual expression of begging a man for a fool.

---

<sup>14</sup> "It will be noticed that in reference to the writ de idiota inquirendo, Blackstone states that it must be tried by a jury of twelve men. In another place, however, where he is discussing inquisitions of office as one of the common forms of suits by the crown, he says that such inquiries concerning any matter that entitled the king to the possession of lands or tenements, goods or chattels, 'is done by a jury of any determinate number, being either twelve or less or more.' 3 Bl. Comm. 258." Sporza v. German Savings Bank, 192 N. Y. 8, 84 N. E. 406, 412.

proposed to share the same fate with the slavery of the feudal tenures, which has been since abolished.<sup>o</sup> Yet few instances can be given of the oppressive exertion of it, since it seldom happens that a jury finds a man an idiot a nativitate (from his birth), but only non compos mentis (not in his right mind) from some particular time; which has an operation very different in point of law.

[304] A man is not an idiot,<sup>p</sup> if he hath any glimmering of reason, so that he can tell his parents, his age, or the like common matters. But a man who is born deaf, dumb, and blind,<sup>15</sup> is looked upon by the law as in the same state with an idiot;<sup>q</sup> he being supposed incapable of any understanding, as wanting all those senses which furnish the human mind with ideas.

§ 423. (2) Lunatics, or persons non compos mentis.—A lunatic, or non compos mentis, is one who hath had understanding, but by disease, grief, or other accident hath lost the use of his reason.<sup>r</sup> A lunatic is indeed properly one that hath lucid intervals; sometimes enjoying his senses, and sometimes not, and that frequently depending upon the change of the moon. But under the general name of non compos mentis (which Sir Edward Coke says is the most legal name<sup>s</sup>) are comprised not only lunatics, but persons under frenzies; or who lose their intellects by disease; those that

<sup>o</sup> 4 Inst. 203. Com. Journ. 1610.

<sup>p</sup> F. N. B. 233.

<sup>q</sup> Co. Litt. 42. Fleta. 1. 6. c. 40.

<sup>r</sup> Idiota a casu et infirmitate. (An idiot by accident and infirmity.) (Mem. Scacch. 20 Edw. I. in Maynard's Year-Book of Edw. II. 20.)

<sup>s</sup> 1 Inst. 246.

---

<sup>15</sup> While some courts may hold that there is a presumption of lunacy or even idiocy in the case of a deaf mute, or a person both deaf and blind (Com. v. Hill, 14 Mass. 207), the correct statement is doubtless that "the presumption that a person deaf and dumb from birth should be deemed an idiot does not obtain in modern practice, at least in the United States." State v. Howard, 118 Mo. 127, 24 S. W. 41, 45; Alexier v. Matzke, 151 Mich. 36, 123 Am. St. Rep. 255, 14 Ann. Cas. 52, 115 N. W. 251. At any rate, it is only a presumption which may be rebutted. The great success achieved in the education of Laura Bridgman and Helen Keller is sufficient to cast doubt upon even a rule of presumption against the mental capacity of persons deaf and blind.

grow deaf, dumb, and blind, not being born so; or such in short, as are judged by the court of chancery incapable of conducting their own affairs. To these also, as well as idiots, the king is guardian, but to a very different purpose. For the law always imagines that these accidental misfortunes may be removed; and therefore only constitutes the crown a trustee for the unfortunate persons, to protect their property, and to account to them for all profits received, if they recover, or after their decease to their representatives. And therefore it is declared by the statute 17 Edw. II, c. 10 (1324), that the king shall provide for the custody and sustentation of lunatics, and preserve their lands and the profits of them for their use, when they come to their right mind; and the king shall take nothing to his own use: and if the parties die in such estate, the residue shall be distributed for their souls by the advice of the ordinary, and of course (by the subsequent amendments of the law of administrations) shall now go to their executors or administrators.<sup>16</sup>

[305] On the first attack of lunacy, or other occasional insanity, while there may be hopes of a speedy restitution of reason, it is usual to confine the unhappy objects in private custody under the direction of their nearest friends and relations: and the legislature, to prevent all abuses incident to such private custody, hath thought proper to interpose its authority by 14 Geo. III, c. 49 (Madhouses, 1774), for regulating private madhouses. But, when the disorder is grown permanent, and the circumstances of the party will bear such additional expense, it is proper to apply to the royal authority to warrant a lasting confinement.

§ 424. (a) Inquest of lunacy.—The method of proving a person non compos is very similar to that of proving him an idiot. The lord chancellor, to whom, by special authority from the king, the custody of idiots and lunatics is entrusted,<sup>22</sup> upon petition or information, grants a commission in nature of the writ de idiota inquirendo, to inquire into the party's state of mind; and if he be found non compos, he usually commits the care of his person, with a suitable allowance for his maintenance, to some friend, who is then called his committee.<sup>17</sup> However, to prevent sinister practices, the next heir is seldom permitted to be this committee of the person; because it is his interest that the party should die. But, it hath been said, there lies not the same objection against his next of kin, provided he be not his heir; for it is his interest to preserve the lunatic's life, in order to increase the personal estate by savings, which he or his family may hereafter be entitled to enjoy.<sup>t</sup> The heir is generally made the manager or committee of the estate, it being clearly his interest by good management to keep it in condition: accountable, however, to the court of chancery, and to the non compos himself, if he recovers; or otherwise, to his administrators.

<sup>22</sup> 3 P. Wms. 108.

<sup>16</sup> Cited, 10 R. I. 41; 2 Johns. Ch. 237; 4 Stew. (N. J. Eq.) 204; 4 Dana. 344. All the cases agree that the stat. 17 Edw. II, c. 10 (1324), committing to the king the case of the persons and estates of idiots and lunatics, was not introductory of a new right, but only went to regulate a right pre-existing in the crown. (4 Coke, 126; Amb. 707; 2 Ves. Jr. 21, 25; Chancellor Kent, in Matter of Barker, 2 Johns. Ch. 232, 237.)—HAMMOND.

§ 425. (3) Spendthrifts.—In this care of idiots and lunatics the civil law agrees with ours: by assigning them tutors to protect their persons, and curators to manage their estates. But in another instance the Roman law goes much beyond the English. For, if a man [306] by notorious prodigality was in danger of wasting his estate, he was looked upon as non compos, and committed to the care of curators or tutors by the prætor.<sup>u</sup> And by the laws of Solon such prodigals were branded with perpetual infamy.<sup>w</sup> But with us, when a man on an inquest of idiocy hath been returned an *unthrif*t and not an idiot,<sup>x</sup> no further proceedings have been had.

<sup>t</sup> 2 P. Wms. 638.

<sup>u</sup> Solent prætores, si talem hominem invenerint, qui neque tempus neque finem expensarum habet, sed bona sua dilacerando et dissipando profundit, curatorem ei dare, exemplo furiosi: et tamdiu erunt ambo in curatione, quamdiu vel furiosus sanitatem, vel ille bonos mores, receperit. (The prætors are accustomed, when they find a man who sets no bounds to his expenses, but lavishes his fortune in acts of dissipation, to appoint him a guardian as though he were a madman; and as the madman so the spendthrift shall be in wardship until the one be restored unto a sanity of mind and the other to reformed manners.) Ff. 27. 10. 1.

<sup>w</sup> Potter Antiqu. b. 1. c. 26.

<sup>x</sup> Bro. Abr. tit. Idiot. 4.

<sup>17</sup> The proceedings to determine whether a person is non compos are now governed by the provisions of the Lunacy Act, 1890, and the acts amendatory thereof.

And the propriety of the practice itself seems to be very questionable. It was doubtless an excellent method of benefiting the individual, and of preserving estates in families; but it hardly seems calculated for the genius of a free nation, who claim and exercise the liberty of using their own property as they please. "Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas (use your property in such a manner that you injure not that of another)," is the only restriction our laws have given with regard to economical prudence. And the frequent circulation and transfer of lands and other property, which cannot be effected without extravagance somewhere, are perhaps not a little conducive towards keeping our mixed constitution in its due health and vigor.

§ 426. p. Decline of the king's ordinary revenue.—This may suffice for a short view of the king's ordinary revenue, or the proper patrimony of the crown; which was very large formerly, and capable of being increased to a magnitude truly formidable: for there are very few estates in the kingdom that have not, at some period or other since the Norman Conquest, been vested in the hands of the king by forfeiture, escheat, or otherwise. But fortunately for the liberty of the subject, this hereditary landed revenue, by a series of improvident management, is sunk almost to nothing; and the casual profits, arising from the other branches of the census regalis, are likewise almost all of them alienated from the crown.<sup>18</sup> In order to supply the deficiencies of which we are now obliged to have recourse to new methods of raising money, unknown to our early ancestors; which methods constitute the king's extraordinary revenue.

§ 427. 2. The king's extraordinary revenue: taxes.—For the public patrimony being got into the hands of private subjects, it is but [307] reasonable that private contributions should supply the public service. Which, though it may perhaps fall harder upon some individuals whose ancestors have had no share in the general plunder than upon others, yet, taking the nation throughout, it amounts to nearly the same; provided the gain by the extraordinary, should appear to be no greater than the loss by the ordinary, revenue. And perhaps, if every gentleman in the kingdom was to be stripped of such of his lands, as were formerly the property of the crown; was to be again subject to the inconveniencies of purveyance and pre-emption, the oppression of forest laws, and the slavery of feudal tenures; and was to resign into the king's hands all his royal franchises of waifs, wrecks, estrays, treasure-trove, mines, deodands, forfeitures, and the like; he would find himself a greater loser, than by paying his quota to such taxes as are necessary to the support of the government. The thing therefore to be wished and aimed at in a land of liberty is by no means the total abolition of taxes, which would draw after it very pernicious consequences, and the very supposition of which is the height of political absurdity. For as the true idea of government and magistracy will be found to consist in this, that some few men are deputed by many others to preside over public affairs, so that individuals may the better be enabled to attend their private concerns; it is necessary that those individuals should be bound to contribute a portion of their private gains, in order to support that government, and reward that magistracy, which protects them in the enjoyment of their respective properties. But the things to be aimed at are wisdom and moderation, not only in granting, but also in the method of raising, the necessary supplies; by contriving to do both in such a manner as may be most conducive to the national welfare, and at the same time most consistent with economy and the liberty of the subject; who, when properly taxed, contributes only, as was before observed,<sup>7</sup> some part of his property, in order to enjoy the rest.

<sup>18</sup> The ordinary revenue of the crown is now, by arrangement with the monarch on his accession, surrendered to parliament in return for a Civil List (see post, *333.)

§ 428. a. Taxes granted by parliament.—These extraordinary grants are usually called by the synonymous names of aids, subsidies, and supplies; and are granted, we have formerly seen,<sup>8</sup> by the commons of Great [308] Britain in parliament assembled: who, when they have voted a supply to his majesty, and settled the quantum of that supply usually resolve themselves into what is called a committee of ways and means, to consider the ways and means of raising the supply so voted. And in this committee every member (though it is looked upon as the peculiar province of the chancellor of the exchequer) may propose such scheme of taxation as he thinks will be least detrimental to the public. The resolutions of this committee (when approved by a vote of the house) are in general esteemed to be (as it were) final and conclusive. For, though the supply cannot be actually raised upon the subject till directed by an act of the whole parliament, yet no moneyed man will scruple to advance to the government any quantity of ready cash, on the credit of a bare vote of the house of commons, though no law be yet passed to establish it.

<sup>7</sup> Pag. 281.

<sup>8</sup> Pag. 169.

§ 429. b. Kinds of taxes — (1) Annual taxes.—The taxes, which are raised upon the subject, are either annual or perpetual. The usual annual taxes are those upon land and malt.

§ 430. (a) Land tax.—The land tax in its modern shape has superseded all the former methods of rating either property, or persons in respect of their property, whether by tenths or fifteenths, subsidies on land, hydages, scutages, or talliages; a short explication of which will, however, greatly assist us in understanding our ancient laws and history.

§ 431. (b) Ancient levies — (i) Tenths and fifteenths.—Tenths, and fifteenths,<sup>a</sup> were temporary aids issuing out of personal property, and granted to the king by parliament. They were formerly the real tenth or fifteenth part of all the movables belonging to the subject; when such movables, or personal estates, were a very different and a much less considerable thing than what they usually are at this day. Tenths are said to have been first granted under Henry the Second, who took advantage of the fashionable zeal for crusades to introduce this new taxation, in order to defray the expense of a pious expedition to Palestine, which he really or seemingly had projected against Saladin, Emperor of the [309] Saracens; whence it was originally denominated the Saladin tenth.<sup>b</sup> But afterwards fifteenths were more usually granted than tenths. Originally the amount of these taxes was uncertain, being levied by assessments new-made at every fresh grant of the commons, a commission for which is preserved by Matthew Paris;<sup>c</sup> but it was at length reduced to a certainty in the eighth year of Edward III (1334), when by virtue of the king's commission new taxations were made of every township, borough, and city in the kingdom, and recorded in the exchequer; which rate was, at the time, the fifteenth part of the value of every township, the whole amounting to about 29,000*l.*,<sup>19</sup> and therefore it still kept up the name of a fifteenth, when, by the alteration of the value of money and the increase of personal property, things came to be in a very different situation. So that when, of later years, the commons granted the king a fifteenth, every parish in England immediately knew their proportion of it; that is, the same identical sum that was assessed by the same aid in the eighth of Edward III (1334); and then raised it by a rate among themselves, and returned it into the royal exchequer.

<sup>a</sup> 2 Inst. 77. 4 Inst. 34.

<sup>b</sup> Hoved. A. D. 1188. Carte. i. 719. Hume. i. 329.

<sup>c</sup> A. D. 1232.

§ 432. (ii) Scutages.—The other ancient levies were in the nature of a modern land tax: for we may trace up the original of that charge as high as to the introduction of our military tenures;<sup>4</sup> when every tenant of a knight's fee was bound, if called upon, to attend the king in his army for forty days in every year. But this personal attendance growing troublesome in many respects, the tenants found means of compounding for it, by first sending others in their stead, and in process of time by making a pecuniary satisfaction to the crown in lieu of it. This pecuniary satisfaction at last came to be levied by assessments, at so much for every knight's fee, under the name of scutages; which appear to have been levied for the first time in the fifth year of Henry the Second, on account of his expedition to Toulouse, and were then (I apprehend) mere arbitrary compositions, as the king and the subject could agree. [310] But this precedent being afterwards abused into a means of oppression (by levying scutages on the landholders by the royal authority only, whenever our kings went to war, in order to hire mercenary troops and pay their contingent expenses) it became thereupon a matter of national complaint; and King John was obliged to promise in his magna carta,<sup>5</sup> that no scutage should be imposed without the consent of the common council of the realm.

<sup>4</sup> See the second book of these Commentaries.

<sup>5</sup> Cap. 14.

---

<sup>19</sup> This is Blackstone's estimate. Later researches tend to show that it is too small. See 2 Stubbs (4th ed.), 579.

This clause was indeed omitted in the charters of Henry III,<sup>f</sup> where we only find it stipulated, that scutages should be taken as they were used to be in the time of King Henry the Second. Yet afterwards, by a variety of statutes under Edward I and his grandson,<sup>g</sup> it was provided that the king shall not take any aids or tasks, any talliage or tax, but by the common assent of the great men and commons in parliament.

§ 433. (iii) Hydage and talliage; subsidies.—Of the same nature with scutages upon knight's fees were the assessments of hydage upon all other lands, and of talliage upon cities and burghs.<sup>h</sup> But they all gradually fell into disuse upon the introduction of subsidies, about the time of King Richard II and King Henry IV. These were a tax, not immediately imposed upon property, but upon persons in respect of their reputed estates, after the nominal rate of 4s. in the pound for lands, and 2s. 6d. for goods; and for those of aliens in a double proportion. But this assessment was also made according to an ancient valuation; wherein the computation was so very moderate, and the rental of the kingdom was supposed to be so exceeding low, that one subsidy of this sort did not, according to Sir Edward Coke,<sup>i</sup> amount to more than 70,000*l.*; whereas a modern land tax at the same rate produces two millions. It was anciently the rule never to grant more than one subsidy, and two-fifteenths at a time: but this rule was broke through for the first time on a very pressing occasion, the Spanish invasion in 1588; when the parliament gave Queen Elizabeth two subsidies and four fifteenths. Afterwards, as money sunk in value, more subsidies [311] were given; and we have an instance in the first parliament of 1640 of the king's desiring twelve subsidies of the commons, to be levied in three years; which was looked upon as a startling proposal: though Lord Clarendon tells us,<sup>k</sup> that the speaker, Serjeant Glanvill, made it manifest to the house, how very inconsiderable a sum twelve subsidies amounted to by telling them he had computed what he was to pay for them; and when he named the sum,

<sup>f</sup> 9 Hen. III. c. 37 (1225).

<sup>g</sup> 25 Edw. I. c. 5 & 6 (Taxation, 1297). 34 Edw. I. st. 4. c. 1 (Taxation, 1306). 14 Edw. III. st. 2. c. 1 (Taxation, 1340).

<sup>h</sup> Madox. Hist. Exch. 480.

<sup>i</sup> 4 Inst. 33.

<sup>k</sup> Hist. b. 2.

he being known to be possessed of a great estate, it seemed not worth any further deliberation. And indeed, upon calculation, we shall find that the total amount of these twelve subsidies, to be raised in three years, is less than what is now raised in one year, by a land tax of two shillings in the pound.

§ 434. (iv) Ecclesiastical subsidies.—The grant of scutages, talliages, or subsidies by the commons did not extend to spiritual preferments; those being usually taxed at the same time by the clergy themselves in convocation: which grants of the clergy were confirmed in parliament, otherwise they were illegal, and not binding; as the same noble writer observes of the subsidies granted by the convocation, which continued sitting after the dissolution of the first parliament in 1640. A subsidy granted by the clergy was after the rate of 4s. in the pound according to the valuation of their livings in the king's books; and amounted, as Sir Edward Coke tells us,<sup>1</sup> to about 20,000*l.* While this custom continued, convocations were wont to sit as frequently as parliaments: but the last subsidies, thus given by the clergy, were those confirmed by statute 15 Car. II, cap. 10 (Taxation, 1663), since which another method of taxation has generally prevailed, which takes in the clergy as well as the laity: in recompense for which the beneficed clergy have from that period been allowed to vote at the election of knights of the shire;<sup>m</sup> and thenceforward also the practice of giving ecclesiastical subsidies hath fallen into total disuse.

§ 435. (v) Lay subsidies equivalent to a land tax.—The lay subsidy was usually raised by commissioners appointed by the crown, or the great officers of state: and therefore [312] in the beginning of the civil wars between Charles I and his parliament, the latter, having no other sufficient revenue to support themselves and their measures, introduced the practice of laying weekly and monthly assessments<sup>n</sup> of a specific sum upon the several counties of the kingdom; to be levied by a pound rate on lands and personal estates: which were occasionally continued during the whole usurpation, sometimes at the rate of 120,000*l.* a month, sometimes at inferior rates.* After the restoration the ancient method of granting subsidies, instead of such monthly assessments, was twice, and twice only, renewed; viz., in 1663, when four subsidies were granted by the temporality, and four by the clergy; and in 1670, when 800,000*l.* was raised by way of subsidy, which was the last time of raising supplies in that manner. For, the monthly assessments being now established by custom, being raised by commissioners named by parliament, and producing a more certain revenue; from that time forwards we hear no more of subsidies, but occasional assessments were granted as the national emergencies required. These periodical assessments, the subsidies which preceded them, and the more ancient scutage, hydage, and talliage, were to all intents and purposes a land tax; and the assessments were sometimes expressly called so.<sup>p</sup> Yet a popular opinion has prevailed that the land tax was first introduced in the reign of King William III; because in the year 1692 a new assessment or valuation of estates was made throughout the kingdom: which, though by no means a perfect one, had this effect, that a supply of 500,000*l.* was equal to 1*s.* in the pound of the value of the estates given in. And, according to this enhanced valuation from the year 1693 to the present, a period of above fourscore years, the land tax has continued an annual charge upon the subject; about half the time at 4*s.* in the pound, sometimes at 3*s.*, sometimes at 2*s.*, twice<sup>q</sup> at 1*s.*, but without any total intermission. The medium has been 3*s.* 3*d.* in the pound; being equivalent with twenty-three ancient subsidies, and amounting annually to [313] more than a million and a half of money. The method of raising it is by charging a particular sum upon each county, according to the valuation given in, A. D. 1692: and this sum is assessed and raised upon individuals (their personal estates, as well as real, being liable thereto) by commissioners appointed in the act, being the principal landholders of the county, and their officers.<sup>20</sup>

<sup>1</sup> 4 Inst. 33.

<sup>m</sup> Dalt. of Sheriffs, 418. Gilb. Hist. of Exch. c. 4.

<sup>n</sup> 29 Nov. 4 Mar. 1642.

* One of these bills of assessment, in 1656, is preserved in Scobell's Collection, 400.

<sup>p</sup> Com. Journ. 26 Jun. 9 Dec. 1678.

<sup>q</sup> In the years 1732 and 1733.

---

<sup>20</sup> The land tax is now, in the main, regulated by the Land Tax Perpetuation Act, 1798, and the Finance Acts, 1896, 1898 and 1910.

§ 436. (c) Malt tax.—The other annual tax is the malt tax; which is a sum of 750,000*l.* raised every year by parliament, ever since 1697, by a duty of 6*d.* in the bushel of malt, and a proportionable sum on certain liquors, such as cider and perry, which might otherwise prevent the consumption of malt. This is under the management of the commissioners of the excise; and is indeed itself no other than an annual excise, the nature of which species of taxation I shall presently explain: only premising at present, that in the year 1760 an additional perpetual excise of 3*d.* per bushel was laid upon malt; and in 1763 a proportionable excise was laid upon cider and perry, but new-modeled in 1766.

The perpetual taxes are,

§ 437. (2) Perpetual taxes—(a) Customs.—The customs; or the duties, toll, tribute, or tariff, payable upon merchandise exported and imported. The considerations upon which this revenue (or the more ancient part of it, which arose only from exports) was invested in the king, were said to be two; * 1. Because he gave the subject leave to depart the kingdom, and to carry his goods along with him. 2. Because the king was bound of common right to maintain and keep up the ports and havens, and to protect the merchant from pirates. Some have imagined they are called with us customs, because they were the inheritance of the king by immemorial usage and the common law, and not granted him by any statute: * but Sir Edward Coke hath clearly shown,† that the king's first claim to them was by [314] grant of parliament 3 Edw. I (1275), though the record thereof is not now extant. And indeed this is in express words confessed by statute 25 Edw. I, c. 7 (Toll on Wool, 1297), wherein the king promises to take no customs from merchants, without the common assent of the realm, "saving to us and our heirs, the customs on wool, skins, and leather, formerly granted to us by the commonalty aforesaid." These were formerly called hereditary customs of the crown; and were due on the exportation only of the said three commodities, and of none other: which were styled the staple commodities of the kingdom, because they were obliged to be brought to those ports where the king's staple was established, in order to be there first rated, and then exported.<sup>u</sup> They were denominated in the barbarous Latin of our ancient records, custuma (customs) :<sup>v</sup> not consuetudines (customs, i. e., usages), which is the language of our law whenever it means merely usages. The duties on wool, sheepskins, or woolfells, and leather, exported, were called custuma antiqua sive magna (ancient or great customs) : and were payable by every merchant, as well native as stranger; with this difference, that merchant strangers paid an additional toll, viz., half as much again as was paid by natives. The custuma parva et nova (small and new customs) were an impost of 3*d.* in the pound, due from merchant strangers only, for all commodities as well imported as exported; which was usually called the alien's duty, and was first granted in 31 Edw. I (1303).<sup>w</sup> But these ancient hereditary customs, especially those on wool and woolfells, came to be of little account, when the nation became sensible of the advantages of a home manufacture, and prohibited the exportation of wool by statute 11 Edw. III, c. 1 (1337).

* Dyer. 165.

† 2 Inst. 58, 59.

• Dyer. 43. pl. 24.

§ 438. (i) Prisage of wines.— There is also another very ancient hereditary duty belonging to the crown, called the prisage or butlerage of wines; which is considerably older than the customs, being taken notice of in the great roll of the exchequer, 8 Rich. I (1196), still extant.<sup>x</sup> Prisage was a right of taking two tons of wine from <sup>[315]</sup> every ship importing into England twenty tons or more; which by Edward I was exchanged into a duty of 2*s.* for every ton imported by merchant-strangers, and called butlerage, because paid to the king's butler.<sup>y</sup>

§ 439. (ii) Subsidies, tonnage, poundage, and other imposts. Other customs payable upon exports and imports were distinguished into subsidies, tonnage, poundage, and other imposts. Subsidies, were such as were imposed by parliament upon any of the staple commodities before mentioned, over and above the custuma antiqua et magna: tonnage was a duty upon all wines imported, over and

<sup>u</sup> Dav. 9.

<sup>v</sup> This appellation seems to be derived from the French word coustum, or coutum, which signifies toll or tribute, and owes its own etymology to the word cout, which signifies price, charge, or, as we have adopted it in English, cost.

<sup>w</sup> 4 Inst. 29.

<sup>x</sup> Madox, Hist. Exch. 526. 532.

<sup>y</sup> Dav. 8. 2 Bulst. 254. (Ninth edition adds here, "Stat. Estr. 16 Edw. II (1323). Com. Journ. 27 Apr. 1689.") above the prisage and butlerage aforesaid : poundage was a duty imposed ad valorem (according to the value), at the rate of 12*d.* in the pound, on all other merchandise whatsoever ; and the other imposts were such as were occasionally laid on by parliament, as circumstances and times required.* These distinctions are now in a manner forgotten, except by the officers immediately concerned in this department ; their produce being in effect all blended together, under the one denomination of the customs.

By these we understand, at present, a duty or subsidy paid by the merchant, at the quay, upon all imported as well as exported commodities, by authority of parliament ; unless where, for particular national reasons, certain rewards, bounties, or drawbacks, are allowed for particular exports or imports. Those of tonnage and poundage, in particular, were, at first, granted, as the old statutes (and particularly 1 Eliz., c. 19—1559) express it, for the defense of the realm, and the keeping and safeguard of the seas, and for the intercourse of merchandise safely to come into and pass out of the same. They were at first usually granted only for a stated term of years, as, for two years in 5 Rich. II (1381) ;<sup>a</sup> but in Henry the Sixth's time, they were granted him for life by a statute in the thirty-first year of his reign (1452) ; and again to Edward IV for the term of his life also : since which time they were regularly granted to all his successors, for life, sometimes at the first, sometimes at other subsequent parliaments, till the reign of Charles the [316] First ; when, as the noble historian expresses it,<sup>b</sup> his ministers were not sufficiently solicitous for a renewal of this legal grant. And yet they were imprudently and unconstitutionally levied and taken, without consent of parliament, for fifteen years together ; which was one of the causes of those unhappy discontents, justifiable at first in too many instances, but which degenerated at last into causeless rebellion and murder. For, as in every other, so in this particular case, the king (previous to the commencement of hostilities) gave the nation ample satisfaction for the errors of his former conduct, by passing an act,<sup>c</sup> whereby he renounced all power in the crown of levying the duty of tonnage and poundage, without the express consent of parliament ; and also all power of imposition upon any merchandise whatever. Upon the restoration

<sup>a</sup> Dav. 11, 12.

<sup>b</sup> Hist. Rebell. b. 3.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid. 12.

<sup>e</sup> 16 Car. I. c. 8 (Customs, 1640).

this duty was granted to King Charles the Second for life, and so it was to his two immediate successors; but now by three several statutes, 9 Ann., c. 6 (Continuing Certain Duties, 1710), 1 Geo. I, c. 12 (Bank of England, 1714), and 3 Geo. I, c. 7 (National Debt, 1716), it is made perpetual and mortgaged for the debt of the public. The customs thus imposed by parliament are chiefly contained in two books of rates, set forth by parliamentary authority;<sup>4</sup> one signed by Sir Harbottle Grimston, speaker of the house of commons in Charles the Second's time; and the other an additional one signed by Sir Spenser Compton, speaker in the reign of George the First; to which also subsequent additions have been made. Aliens pay a larger proportion than natural subjects, which is what is now generally understood by the aliens' duty; to be exempted from which is one principal cause of the frequent applications to parliament for acts of naturalization.<sup>21</sup>

§ 440. (iii) Theory and evils of a customs tariff.—These customs are then, we see, a tax immediately paid by the merchant, although ultimately by the consumer. And yet these are the duties felt least by the people; and, if prudently managed, the people hardly consider that they pay them at all. For the merchant is easy, being sensible he does not pay them for himself; and the consumer, who really [<sup>317</sup>] pays them, confounds them with the price of the commodity: in the same manner as Tacitus observes, that the Emperor Nero gained the reputation of abolishing the tax of the sale of slaves, though he only transferred it from the buyer to the seller, so that it was, as he expresses it, "remissum magis specie, quam vi: quia, cum venditor pendere juberetur, in partem pretii emptoribus accrescebat (remitted rather in appearance than reality, for when the seller was ordered to pay it, he enhanced proportionally the price to the buyers)."<sup>20</sup> But this inconvenience attends it on the other hand, that these imposts, if too heavy, are a check and cramp upon trade; and especially when the value of the commodity bears little or no proportion to the quantity of the duty

<sup>4</sup> Stat. 12 Car. II. c. 4 (Tonnage and Poundage, 1660). 11 Geo. I. c. 7 (Customs, 1724).

• Hist. i. 13.

<sup>21</sup> The Customs Tariff Act, 1876, and the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, are the basis of the present laws governing the customs.

imposed. This in consequence gives rise also to smuggling, which then becomes a very lucrative employment; and its natural and most reasonable punishment, viz., confiscation of the commodity, is in such cases quite ineffectual; the intrinsic value of the goods, which is all that the smuggler has paid, and therefore all that he can lose, being very inconsiderable when compared with his prospect of advantage in evading the duty. Recourse must therefore be had to extraordinary punishments to prevent it; perhaps even to capital ones: which destroys all proportion of punishment, and puts murderers upon an equal footing with such as are really guilty of no natural, but merely a positive, offense.

There is also another ill consequence attending high imposts on merchandise, not frequently considered, but indisputably certain; that the earlier any tax is laid on a commodity, the heavier it falls upon the consumer in the end: for every trader through whose hands it passes must have a profit, not only upon the raw material and his own labor and time in preparing it, but also upon the very tax itself, which he advances to the government; otherwise he loses the use and interest of the money which he so advances. To instance in the article of foreign paper. The merchant pays a duty upon importation, which he does not receive again till he sells the commodity, perhaps at the end of three months. He is therefore equally entitled to a profit upon that duty [318] which he pays at the custom-house, as to a profit upon the original price which he pays to the manufacturer abroad; and considers it accordingly in the price he demands of the stationer. When the stationer sells it again, he requires a profit of the printer or bookseller upon the whole sum advanced by him to the merchant: and the bookseller does not forget to charge the full proportion to the student or ultimate consumer; who therefore does not only pay the original duty, but the profits of these three intermediate traders, who have successively advanced it for him. This might be carried much further in any mechanical, or more complicated, branch of trade.

§ 441. (b) Internal revenue or excise.—Directly opposite in its nature to this is the excise duty; which is an inland imposition, paid sometimes upon the consumption of the commodity, or frequently upon the retail sale, which is the last stage before the consumption. This is doubtless, impartially speaking, the most economical way of taxing the subject: the charges of levying, collecting, and managing the excise duties being considerably less in proportion, than in other branches of the revenue. It also renders the commodity cheaper to the consumer than charging it with customs to the same amount would do; for the reason just now given, because generally paid in a much later stage of it. But, at the same time, the rigor and arbitrary proceedings of excise laws seem hardly compatible with the temper of a free nation. For the frauds that might be committed in this branch of the revenue, unless a strict watch is kept, make it necessary, wherever it is established, to give the officers a power of entering and searching the houses of such as deal in excisable commodities, at any hour of the day, and in many cases, of the night likewise. And the proceedings in case of transgressions are so summary and sudden, that a man may be convicted in two days' time in the penalty of many thousand pounds by two commissioners or justices of the peace: to the total exclusion of the trial by jury, and disregard of the common law. For which reason, though Lord [319] Clarendon tells us,<sup>ε</sup> that to his knowledge the Earl of Bedford (who was made lord treasurer by King Charles the First, to oblige his parliament) intended to have set up the excise in England, yet it never made a part of that unfortunate prince's revenue; being first introduced, on the model of the Dutch prototype, by the parliament itself after its rupture with the crown. Yet such was the opinion of its general unpopularity, that when in 1642 "asspersions were cast by malignant persons upon the house of commons, that they intended to introduce excises, the house for its vindication therein did declare, that these rumors were false and scandalous; and that their authors should be apprehended and brought to condign punishment."<sup>h</sup> Its original<sup>1</sup> establishment was in 1643, and its progress was gradual; being at first laid upon

† Montesq. Sp. L. b. 13. c. 8.

<sup>ε</sup> Hist. b. 3.

<sup>h</sup> Com. Journ. 8 Oct. 1642.

<sup>1</sup> The translator and continuator of Petavius' chronological history (Lond. 1659, fol.) informs us, that it was first moved for, 28 Mar. 1643, by Mr. Prynne. And it appears from the journals of the commons that on that day the house those persons and commodities, where it was supposed the hardship would be least perceivable, viz., the makers and venders of beer, ale, cide~~a~~, and perry,<sup>k</sup> and the royalists at Oxford soon followed the example of their brethren at Westminster by imposing a similar duty; both sides protesting that it should be continued no longer than to the end of the war, and then be utterly abolished.<sup>l</sup> But the parliament at Westminster soon after imposed it on flesh, wine, tobacco, sugar, and such a multitude of other commodities, that it might fairly be denominated general: in pursuance of the plan laid down by Mr. Pymme (who seems to have been the father of the excise) in his letter to Sir John Hotham,<sup>m</sup> signifying, "that they had proceeded in the excise to many particulars, and intended to go on further; but that it [<sup>320</sup>] would be necessary to use the people to it by little and little." And afterwards, when the nation had been accustomed to it for a series of years, the succeeding champions of liberty boldly and openly declared, "the impost of excise to be the most easy and indifferent levy that could be laid upon the people":<sup>n</sup> and accordingly continued it during the whole usurpation. Upon King Charles' return, it having then been long established and its produce well known, some part of it was given to the crown, in 12 Car. II (1660) by way of purchase (as was before observed) for the feudal tenures and other oppressive parts of the hereditary revenue. But, from its first original to the present time, its very name has been odious to the people of England. It has nevertheless been imposed on abundance of other commodities in the reign of King William III, and every succeeding prince, to support the enormous expenses occasioned by our wars on the Continent. Thus brandies and other spirits are now resolved itself into a committee to consider of raising money, in consequence of which the excise was afterwards voted. But Mr. Prynne was not a member of parliament till 7 Nov. 1648; and published in 1654, "A protestation against the illegal, detestable, and oft-condemned tax and extortion of excise in general." It is probably therefore a mistake of the printer for Mr. Pymme, who was intended for chancellor of the exchequer under the Earl of Bedford. (Lord. Clar. b. 7.)

<sup>k</sup> Com. Journ. 17 May. 1643.

<sup>l</sup> Lord Clar. b. 7.

<sup>m</sup> 30 May 1643. Dugdale of the Troubles, 120.

<sup>n</sup> Ord. 14 Aug. 1649. c. 50. Scobell. 72. Stat. 1656. c. 19. Scobell. 453.

excised at the distillery; printed silks and linens, at the printer's; starch and hair powder at the maker's; gold and silver wire, at the wiredrawer's; plate in the hands of the vender, who pays yearly for a license to sell it; lands and goods sold by auction, for which a pound-rate is payable by the auctioneer, who also is charged with an annual duty for his license; and coaches and other wheel carriages, for which the occupier is excised, though not with the same circumstances of arbitrary strictness, as in most of the other instances. To these we may add coffee and tea, chocolate and cocoa paste, for which the duty is paid by the retailer; all artificial wines, commonly called sweets; paper and pasteboard, first when made, and again if stained or printed; malt as before mentioned; vinegars; and the manufacture of glass; for all which the duty is paid by the manufacturer; hops, for which the person that gathers them is answerable: candles and soap, which are paid for at the maker's; malt liquors brewed for sale, which are excised at the brewery; cider and perry, at the vender's; and leather and skins, at the tanner's. A list, which no friend to his country would wish to see further increased.

§ 442. (c) Salt tax.—<sup>[321]</sup> I proceed, therefore, to a third duty, namely, that upon salt; which is another distinct branch of his majesty's extraordinary revenue, and consists in an excise of 3s. 4d. per bushel imposed upon all salt, by several statutes of King William and other subsequent reigns. This is not generally called an excise, because under the management of different commissioners: but the commissioners of the salt duties have by statute 1 Ann., c. 21 (1702), the same powers, and must observe the same regulations, as those of other excises. This tax had usually been only temporary; but by statute 26 Geo. II, c. 3 (Salt Duties, 1753), was made perpetual.<sup>22</sup>

§ 443. (d) The postoffice.—Another very considerable branch of the revenue is levied with greater cheerfulness, as, instead of being a burden, it is a manifest advantage to the public. I mean the postoffice, or duty for the carriage of letters. As we have traced the original of the excise to the parliament of 1643, so it is but justice to observe that this useful invention owes its first legislative establishment to the same assembly. It is true there existed postmasters in much earlier times: but I apprehend their business was confined to the furnishing of post-horses to persons who were desirous to travel expeditiously, and to the dispatching of extraordinary packets upon special occasions. King James I originally erected a postoffice under the control of one Matthew de Quester or de l'Equester for the conveyance of letters to and from foreign parts; which office was afterwards claimed by Lord Stanhope,<sup>o</sup> but was confirmed and continued to William Frizell and Thomas Witherings by King Charles I, A. D. 1632, for the better accommodation of the English merchants.<sup>p</sup> In 1635, the same prince erected a letter office for England and Scotland, under the direction of the same Thomas Witherings, and settled certain rates of postage:<sup>q</sup> but this extended only to a few of the principal roads, the times of carriage were uncertain, and the postmasters on each road were required to furnish the mail with horses at the rate of  $2\frac{1}{2}d.$  a mile. Witherings was superseded, for abuses in the execution of [322] both his offices, in 1640; and they were sequestered into the hands of Philip Burlamachy, to be exercised under the care and oversight of the king's principal secretary of state.<sup>r</sup> On the breaking out of the civil war, great confusions and interruptions were necessarily occasioned in the conduct of the letter office. And, about that time, the outline of the present more extended and regular plan seems to have been conceived by Mr. Edmond Prideaux, who was appointed attorney general to the commonwealth after the murder of King Charles. He was chairman of a committee in 1642 for considering what rates should be set upon inland letters;<sup>s</sup> and afterwards appointed postmaster by an ordinance of both the houses,<sup>t</sup> in the execution of which office he first established a weekly conveyance of letters into all parts of the nation;<sup>u</sup> thereby saving to the public the charge of maintain-\* Latch. Rep. 87.

<sup>22</sup> Excises proper are now confined to taxes on beer, spirits, chicory, coffee, glucose, and saccharin. But a considerable number of license fees is classed under this head. Also, duties formerly known as assessed taxes, that is to say, duties assessed upon persons in respect to the houses they inhabit and to certain articles they use, are assigned to this branch of the revenue.

† 19 Rym. Fœd. 385.

‡ Ibid. 650. 20 Rym. 192.

§ 20 Rym. 429.

▪ Com. Journ. 28 Mar. 1642.

• Ibid. 7 Sept. 1644.

▪ Ibid. 21 Mar. 1649.

ing postmasters, to the amount of 7,000*l.* per annum. And, his own' emoluments being probably very considerable, the common council of London endeavored to erect another postoffice in opposition to his; till checked by a resolution of the house of commons,<sup>w</sup> declaring, that the office of postmaster is and ought to be in the sole power and disposal of the parliament. This office was afterwards farmed by one Manley in 1654.<sup>x</sup> But, in 1657, a regular postoffice was erected by the authority of the protector and his parliament, upon nearly the same model as has been ever since adopted, with the same rates of postage as were continued till the reign of Queen Anne.<sup>y</sup> After the restoration a similar office, with some improvements, was established by statute 12 Car. II, c. 35 (Establishing a Postoffice, 1660), but the rates of letters were altered, and some further regulations added, by the statutes 9 Ann., c. 10 (1710), 6 Geo. I, c. 21 (Excise, 1719), 26 Geo. II, c. 12 (Customs, 1753), 5 Geo. III, c. 25 (Postage, 1765), and 7 Geo. III, c. 50 (Postoffice, 1766), and penalties were enacted, in order to confine the carriage of letters to the public office only, except in some few cases: a provision, which is absolutely necessary; for nothing but an exclusive right can support an office of this sort: many rival independent offices would only serve to ruin one <sup>[323]</sup> another. The privilege of letters coming free of postage, to and from members of parliament, was claimed by the house of commons in 1660, when the first legal settlement of the present postoffice was made;<sup>z</sup> but afterwards dropped<sup>a</sup> upon a private assurance from the crown that this privilege should be allowed the members.<sup>b</sup> And accordingly a warrant was constantly issued to the postmaster general,<sup>c</sup> directing the allowance thereof, to the extent of two ounces in weight: till at length it was expressly confirmed by statute 4 Geo. III, c. 24 (Postage, 1763); which adds many new regulations, rendered necessary by the great abuses crept into the practice of franking; whereby the annual amount of franked letters had grad-

<sup>w</sup> Ibid. 21 Mar. 1649.

<sup>x</sup> Scobell. 358.

<sup>y</sup> Com. Journ. 9 June 1657. Scobell. 511.

<sup>z</sup> Com. Journ. 17 Dec. 1660.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. 22 Dec. 1660.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. 16 Apr. 1735.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid. 26 Feb. 1734.

ually increased, from 23,600*l.* in the year 1715, to 170,700*l.* in the year 1763.<sup>4</sup> There cannot be devised a more eligible method, than this, of raising money upon the subject: for therein both the government and the people find a mutual benefit. The government acquires a large revenue; and the people do their business with greater ease, expedition, and cheapness, than they would be able to do if no such tax (and of course no such office) existed.<sup>23</sup>

§ 444. (e) Stamp duties.—A fifth branch of the perpetual revenue consists in the stamp duties, which are a tax imposed upon all parchment and paper whereon any legal proceedings, or private instruments of almost any nature whatsoever, are written; and also upon licenses for retailing wines, of all denominations; upon all almanacs, newspapers, advertisements, cards, dice, and pamphlets containing less than six sheets of paper. These imposts are very various, according to the nature of the thing stamped, rising gradually from a penny to ten pounds. This is also a tax, which though in some instances it may be heavily felt, by greatly increasing the expense of all mercantile as well as legal proceedings, yet (if moderately imposed) is of service to the public in general, by authenticating instruments, and rendering it much more difficult than formerly to forge deeds of any standing; since, as the officers of this branch of the revenue vary their stamps frequently, [324] by marks perceptible to none but themselves, a man that would forge a deed of King William's time, must know and be able to counterfeit the stamp of that date also. In France and some other countries the duty is laid on the contract itself, not on the instrument in which it is contained; as, with us too (besides the stamps on the indentures), a tax is laid by statute 8 Ann., c. 9

<sup>4</sup> Ibid. 28 Mar. 1764.

<sup>23</sup> The privilege of franking, or sending and receiving letters free of duty, formerly exercised by members of parliament, was abolished in 1840. Postage has, likewise, been gradually and steadily reduced. The postoffice provides a class of savings banks, small life insurances and life annuities. The telegraph and telephone systems of Great Britain are under the management of the postoffice. Likewise, duties in connection with the Old Age Pensions Acts of 1908 and 1911 and with the National Insurance Act of 1911 have been placed upon the postoffice.

(1709), on every apprentice fee; of 6*d.* in the pound, if it be 50*l.* or under, and 1*s.* in the pound, if a greater sum: but this tends to draw the subject into a thousand nice disquisitions and disputes concerning the nature of his contract, and whether taxable or not; in which the farmers of the revenue are sure to have the advantage.* Our general method answers the purposes of the state as well, and consults the ease of the subject much better. The first institution of the stamp duties was by statute 5 & 6 W. & M., c. 21 (Stamps, 1694), and they have since in many instances been increased to ten times their original amount.

§ 445. (f) Duty on houses and windows.—A sixth branch is the duty upon houses and windows. As early as the Conquest mention is made in Domesday Book of fumage or fuage, vulgarly called smoke farthings; which were paid by custom to the king for every chimney in the house. And we read that Edward, the Black Prince (soon after his successes in France), in imitation of the English custom, imposed a tax of a florin upon every hearth in his French dominions.† But the first parliamentary establishment of it in England was by statute 13 & 14 Car. II, c. 10 (Taxation, 1662), whereby an hereditary revenue of 2*s.* for every hearth, in all houses paying to church and poor, was granted to the king forever. And, by subsequent statutes, for the more regular assessment of this tax, the constable and two other substantial inhabitants of the parish, to be appointed yearly (or the surveyor, appointed by the crown, together with such constable or other public officer), were, once in every year, empowered to view the inside of every house in the parish. But upon the revolution, by statute 1 W. & M., st. 1, c. 10 (Hearth Money, 1688), hearth money was declared to be “not only a great oppression to the poorer sort, but a badge of slavery upon [325] the whole people, exposing every man’s house to be entered into, and searched at pleasure, by persons unknown to him; and therefore, to erect a lasting monument of their majesties’ goodness in every house in the kingdom, the duty of hearth money was taken away and abolished.” This monument of goodness remains among us to this day: but the prospect of it was somewhat darkened, when in six years afterwards by statute 7 W. III, c. 18 (Taxation, 1695), a tax was laid upon all houses (except cottages) of 2s. now advanced to 3s. per house, and a tax also upon all windows, if they exceeded nine, in such house. Which rates have been from time to time varied, being now extended to all windows exceeding six; and the power is given to surveyors, appointed by the crown, to inspect the outside of houses, and also to pass through any house two days, in the year, into any court or yard to inspect the windows there.

* Sp. of L. b. xiii. c. 9.

† Mod. Un. Hist. xxiii. 463. Spelm. Gloss. tit. Fuage.

§ 446. (g) Duty on servants.—The seventh branch of the extraordinary perpetual revenue is a duty of 21s. per annum for every male servant retained or employed in the several capacities specifically mentioned in the act of parliament, and which almost amount to an universality, except such as are employed in husbandry, trade, or manufactures. This was imposed by statute 17 Geo. III, c. 39 (Taxation, 1776),* and is under the management of the commissioners of the land and window tax.

§ 447. (h) Licenses to hackney-coaches.—An eighth branch is the duty arising from licenses to hackney-coaches and chairs in London, and the parts adjacent. In 1654 two hundred hackney-coaches were allowed within London, Westminster, and six miles round, under the direction of the court of aldermen.<sup>b</sup> By statute 13 & 14 Car. II, c. 2 (1662), four hundred were licensed; and the money arising thereby was applied to repairing the streets.<sup>1</sup> This number was increased to seven hundred by statute 5 W. & M., c. 22 (Hackney-coaches, 1694), and the duties vested in the crown: and by the statute 9 Ann., c. 23 (Highways, 1710), and other subse-

* Ninth edition inserts, "18 Geo. III. c. 26 (House Duty, 1778). 19 Geo. III. c. 59 (Duties on Houses, 1779)"; and adds in a note "Stat. 21 Geo. III. c. 31 (Duties on Servants, 1781)." But all these statutes were repealed by 43 Geo. III. c. 161 (House Tax, 1803), § 84.

<sup>a</sup> Stat. 20 Geo. II. c. 3 (National Debt, 1746). 31 Geo. II. c. 22 (Pension Duties, 1757). 2 Geo. III. c. 8 (Window Duties, 1761). 6 Geo. III. c. 38 (House and Window Duties, 1765).

<sup>b</sup> Scobell. 313.

<sup>1</sup> Com. Journ. 14 Feb. 1661.

quent statutes for their government,<sup>1</sup> there are now a thousand licensed coaches and four hundred chairs. This revenue is governed by commissioners [326] of its own, and is, in truth, a benefit to the subject; as the expense of it is felt by no individual, and its necessary regulations have established a competent jurisdiction, whereby a very refractory race of men may be kept in some tolerable order.

§ 448. (i) Duty on offices and pensions.—The ninth and last branch of the king's extraordinary perpetual revenue is the duty upon offices and pensions; consisting in a payment of 1s. in the pound (over and above all other duties<sup>k</sup>) out of all salaries, fees, and perquisites, of offices and pensions payable by the crown. This highly popular taxation was imposed by statute 31 Geo. II, c. 22 (Pension Duties, 1757), and is under the direction of the commissioners of the land tax.<sup>24</sup>

§ 449. 3. How the revenue is appropriated.—The clear neat produce of these several branches of the revenue, after all charges of collecting and management paid, amounts at present annually to about seven millions and three-quarters sterling; besides more than two millions and a quarter raised by the land and malt tax. How these immense sums are appropriated, is next to be considered. And this is, first and principally, to the payment of the interest of the national debt.

<sup>1</sup> 10 Ann. c. 19 (Customs and Excise, 1711), § 158. 12 Geo. I. c. 15 (1725). 7 Geo. III. c. 44 (Stamps, 1766). 10 Geo. III. c. 44 (1770). 11 Geo. III. c. 24. 28 (Hackney-coaches and Hackney-coachmen, 1770). 12 Geo. III. c. 49 (Hackney-coaches, 1772).

<sup>k</sup> Previous to this, a deduction of 6d. in the pound was charged on all pensions and annuities, and all salaries, fees, and wages of all offices of profit granted by or derived from the crown; in order to pay the interest at the rate of three per cent. on one million, which was raised for discharging the debts on the civil list, by statutes 7 Geo. I. st. 1. c. 27 (Pension Duty, 1720), 11 Geo. I. c. 17 (National Debt, 1724) and 12 Geo. I. c. 2 (Pension Duty, 1725). This million, being charged on this particular fund, is not considered as any part of the national debt.

---

<sup>24</sup> A duty on profits and pensions payable by the crown, exceeding 100l. per annum, was made perpetual in 1836.

§ 450. a. The national debt.—In order to take a clear and comprehensive view of the nature of this national debt, it must first be premised, that after the revolution, when our new connections with Europe introduced a new system of foreign politics, the expenses of the nation, not only in settling the new establishment, but in maintaining long wars, as principals, on the Continent, for the security of the Dutch barrier, reducing the French monarchy, settling the Spanish succession, supporting the house of Austria, maintaining the liberties of the Germanic body, and other purposes, increased to an unusual degree: insomuch that it was not thought advisable to raise all the expenses of any one year by taxes to be levied within that year, lest the unaccustomed weight of them should create murmurs among the people. It was therefore the policy of the times to anticipate the revenues of their posterity, by borrowing immense [327] sums for the current service of the state, and to lay no more taxes upon the subject than would suffice to pay the annual interest of the sums so borrowed: by this means converting the principal debt into a new species of property, transferable from one man to another at any time and in any quantity. A system which seems to have had its original in the state of Florence, A. D. 1344: which government then owed about 60,000*l.* sterling: and, being unable to pay it, formed the principal into an aggregate sum, called metaphorically a mount or bank, the shares whereof were transferable like our stocks, with interest at 5 per cent, the prices varying according to the exigencies of the state.<sup>1</sup> This laid the foundation of what is called the national debt: for a few long annuities created in the reign of Charles II will hardly deserve that name. And the example then set has been so closely followed during the long wars in the reign of Queen Anne, and since, that the capital of the national debt (funded and unfunded), amounted at the close of the session in June; 1777, to about an hundred and thirty-six millions: <sup>25</sup> to pay the interest of which, together with certain annuities for lives and years, and the charges of management, amounting annually to upwards of four millions and three-quarters, the extraordinary revenues just now enumerated (excepting only the land tax and annual malt tax) are in the first place mortgaged, and made perpetual by parliament. Perpetual, I say; but still redeemable by the same authority that imposed them: which, if it at any time can pay off the capital, will abolish those taxes which are raised to discharge the interest.

<sup>1</sup> Pro tempore, pro spe, pro commodo, minuitur eorum pretium atque augetur. (Their price was lessened and increased according to time, expectation, or advantage.) Aretin. See Mod. Un. Hist. xxxvi. 116.

<sup>25</sup> The national debt in 1913 was £593,453,857.

§ 451. (1) Relation of national debt and property.—By this means the quantity of property in the kingdom is greatly increased in idea, compared with former times; yet, if we coolly consider it, not at all increased in reality. We may boast of large fortunes and quantities of money in the funds. But where does this money exist? It exists only in name, in paper, in public faith, in parliamentary security: and that is undoubtedly sufficient for the creditors of the public to rely on. But, then, what is the pledge which the public faith has pawned for the security of these debts? The land, <sup>[328]</sup> the trade, and the personal industry of the subject; from which the money must arise that supplies the several taxes. In these, therefore, and these only, the property of the public creditors does really and intrinsically exist: and of course the land, the trade, and the personal industry of individuals, are diminished in their true value just so much as they are pledged to answer. If A's income amounts to 100*l. per annum*; and he is so far indebted to B, that he pays him 50*l. per annum* for his interest; one-half of the value of A's property is transferred to B the creditor. The creditor's property exists in the demand which he has upon the debtor, and nowhere else; and the debtor is only a trustee to his creditor for one-half of the value of his income. In short, the property of a creditor of the public consists in a certain portion of the national taxes: by how much, therefore, he is the richer, by so much the nation, which pays these taxes, is the poorer.

§ 452. (2) Relation of national debt and currency.—The only advantage, that can result to a nation from public debts, is the increase of circulation by multiplying the cash of the kingdom, and creating a new species of currency, assignable at any time and in any quantity; always, therefore, ready to be employed in any beneficial undertaking, by means of this its transferable quality; and yet producing some profit even when it lies idle and unemployed. A certain proportion of debt seems, therefore, to be highly useful to a trading people; but what that proportion is, it is not for me to determine. Thus much is indisputably certain, that the present magnitude of our national encumbrances very far exceeds all calculations of commercial benefit, and is productive of the greatest inconveniences. For, first, the enormous taxes, that are raised upon the necessities of life for the payment of the interest of this debt, are a hurt both to trade and manufactures, by raising the price as well of the artificer's subsistence, as of the raw material, and of course, in a much greater proportion, the price of the commodity itself. Nay, the very increase of paper circulation itself, when extended beyond what is requisite for commerce or foreign exchange, has a natural tendency to increase the price of provisions as well as of all other merchandise. For, as its effect is to multiply the cash of the kingdom, and this to such an extent [329] that much must remain unemployed, that cash (which is the universal measure of the respective values of all other commodities) must necessarily sink in its own value,<sup>m</sup> and everything grow comparatively dearer. Secondly, if part of this debt be owing to foreigners, either they draw out of the kingdom annually a considerable quantity of specie for the interest; or else it is made an argument to grant them unreasonable privileges, in order to induce them to reside here. Thirdly, if the whole be owing to subjects only, it is then charging the active and industrious subject, who pays his share of the taxes, to maintain the indolent and idle creditor who receives them. Lastly, and principally, it weakens the internal strength of a state, by anticipating those resources which should be reserved to defend it in case of necessity. The interest we now pay for our debts would be nearly sufficient to maintain any war that any national motives could require. And if our ancestors in King William's time had annually paid, so long as their exigencies lasted, even a less sum than we now annually raise upon their accounts, they would in the time of war have borne no greater burdens than they have bequeathed to and settled upon their posterity in time of peace; and might have been eased the instant the exigence was over.

<sup>m</sup> See page 276.

§ 453. (3) The principal funds.—The respective produces of the several taxes before mentioned were originally separate and distinct funds; being securities for the sums advanced on each several tax, and for them only. But at last it became necessary in order to avoid confusion, as they multiplied yearly, to reduce the number of these separate funds, by uniting and blending them together; superadding the faith of parliament for the general security of the whole. So that there are now only three capital funds of any account, the aggregate fund, and the general fund, so called from such union and addition; and the South Sea fund, being the produce of the taxes appropriated to pay the interest of such part of the national debt as was advanced by that company and its annuitants. Whereby the separate funds, which was thus united, are become mutual securities for each other; and the whole produce of them, thus aggregated, [230] liable to pay such interest or annuities as were formerly charged upon each distinct fund; the faith of the legislature being moreover engaged to supply any casual deficiencies.<sup>26</sup>

§ 454. (4) The sinking fund.—The customs, excises, and other taxes, which are to support these funds, depending on contingencies, upon exports, imports, and consumptions, must necessarily be of a very uncertain amount; but they have always been considerably more than was sufficient to answer the charge upon them. The surpluses, therefore, of the three great national funds, the aggregate, general, and South Sea funds, over and above the interest and annuities charged upon them, are decided by statute 3 Geo. I, c. 7 (National Debt, 1716), to be carried together, and to attend the disposition of parliament; and are usually denominated the sinking fund, because originally destined to sink and lower the national debt. To this have been since added many other entire duties, granted in subsequent years; and the annual interest of the sums borrowed on their respective credits is charged on and payable out of the produce of the sinking fund. However, the neat surpluses and savings, after all deductions paid, amount annually to a very considerable sum. For as the interest on the national debt has been at several times reduced (by the consent of the proprietors, who had their option either to lower their interest or be paid their principal), the savings from the appropriated revenues must needs be extremely large. This sinking fund is the last resort of the nation; its only domestic resource, on which must chiefly depend all the hopes we can entertain of ever discharging or moderating our encumbrances. And therefore the prudent and steady application of the large sums now arising from this fund, is a point of the utmost importance, and well worthy the serious attention of parliament; which was thereby enabled, in the year 1765, to reduce above two millions sterling of the public debt; and several additional millions in several succeeding years.

<sup>26</sup> By act of 1816 the various funds mentioned were combined into the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

§ 455. (5) King's household and civil list.—But, before any part of the aggregate fund (the surpluses whereof are one of the chief ingredients that form the sinking <sup>[331]</sup> fund) can be applied to diminish the principal of the public debt, it stands mortgaged by parliament to raise an annual sum for the maintenance of the king's household and the civil list. For this purpose, in the late reigns, the produce of certain branches of the excise and customs, the postoffice, the duty on wine licenses, the revenues of the remaining crown lands, the profits arising from courts of justice (which articles include all the hereditary revenues of the crown), and also a clear annuity of 120,000*l.* in money, were settled on the king for life, for the support of his majesty's household, and the honor and dignity of the crown. And, as the amount of these several branches was uncertain (though in the last reign they were computed to have sometimes raised almost a million), if they did not arise annually to 800,000*l.* the parliament engaged to make up the deficiency. But his present majesty having, soon after his accession, spontaneously signified his consent, that his own hereditary revenues might be so disposed of as might best conduce to the utility and satisfaction of the public; and having graciously accepted the limited sum of 800,000*l.* per annum for the support of his civil list; the said hereditary and other revenues were carried into and made a part of the aggregate fund, and the aggregate fund was charged with the payment of the whole annuity to the crown of 800,000*l.*, which, being found insufficient, was increased in 1777 to 900,000*l.* per annum.<sup>a</sup> Hereby the revenues themselves, being put under the same care and management as the other branches of the public patrimony, produce more and are better collected than heretofore; and the public is still a gainer of near 100,000*l.* per annum by this disinterested conduct of his majesty. The civil list, thus liquidated, together with the four millions and three-quarters, interest of the national debt, and more than two millions produced from the sinking fund, make up the seven millions and three-quarters per annum, neat money, which were before stated to be the annual produce of our perpetual taxes; besides the immense, though uncertain, sums arising from the annual taxes on land and malt, but which at an average may be calculated at more than two millions and a quarter; and, [332] added to the preceding sum, make the clear produce of the taxes (exclusive of the charge of collecting) which are raised yearly on the people of this country, amount to about ten millions sterling.

§ 456. (a) Expenses of the civil list.—The expenses defrayed by the civil list are those that in any shape relate to civil government; as, the expenses of the household; all salaries to officers of state, to the judges, and every of the king's servants; the appointments to foreign ambassadors; the maintenance of the queen and royal family; the king's private expenses, or privy purse; and other very numerous outgoings, as secret service money, pensions, and other bounties: which sometimes have so far exceeded the revenues appointed for that purpose, that application has been made to parliament to discharge the debts contracted on the civil list; as particularly in 1724, when one million was granted for that purpose by the statute 11 Geo. I, c. 17 (National Debt, 1724), and in 1769 and 1777, when half a million and 600,000*l.* were appropriated to the like uses, by the statutes 9 Geo. III, c. 34 (1768), and 17 Geo. III, c. 47 (Appropriation, 1776).

<sup>a</sup> Stat. 1 Geo. III. c. 1 (Civil List, 1760).

§ 457. (b) History of the civil list.—The civil list is indeed properly the whole of the king's revenue in his own distinct capacity; the rest being rather the revenue of the public, or its creditors, though collected and distributed again, in the name and by the officers of the crown: it now standing in the same place, as the hereditary income did formerly; and, as that has gradually diminished, the parliamentary appointments have increased. The whole revenue of Queen Elizabeth did not amount to more than 600,000*l.* a year: ° that of King Charles I was <sup>p</sup> 800,000*l.* and the revenue voted for King Charles II was <sup>a</sup> 1,200,000*l.*, though complaints were made (in the first years at least) that it did not amount to so much.<sup>r</sup> But it must be observed, that under these sums were included all manner of public expenses; among which Lord Clarendon in his speech to the parliament computed, that the charge of the navy and land <sup>[333]</sup> forces amounted annually to 800,000*l.* which was ten times more than before the former troubles.<sup>a</sup> The same revenue, subject to the same charges, was settled on King James II: <sup>t</sup> but by the increase of trade, and more frugal management, it amounted on an average to a million and half per annum (besides other additional customs, granted by parliament,<sup>u</sup> which produced an annual revenue of 400,000*l.*) out of which his fleet and army were maintained at the yearly expense of <sup>w</sup> 1,100,000*l.* After the revolution, when the parliament took into its own hands the annual support of the forces both maritime and military, a civil list revenue was settled on the new king and queen, amounting, with the hereditary duties, to 700,000*l.* per annum; <sup>x</sup> and the same was continued to Queen Anne and King George I.<sup>r</sup> That of King George II, we have seen, was nominally augmented to <sup>y</sup> 800,000*l.* and in fact was considerably more: and ° Lord Clar. Continuation. 163.

▷ Com. Journ. 4 Sept. 1660.

¶ Ibid.

† Ibid. 4 Jun. 1663. Lord Clar. Ibid.

‡ Lord Clar. 165.

§ Stat. 1 Jac. II. c. 1 (Revenue, 1685).

¶ Ibid. c. 3. & 4.

‖ Com. Journ. 1 Mar. 20 Mar. 1688.

✕ Com. Journ. 14 Mar. 1701.

‡ Ibid. 17 Mar. 1701. 11 Aug. 1714.

• Stat. 1 Geo. II. c. 1 (Civil List, 1727).

that of his present majesty is avowedly increased to the limited sum of 900,000*l.* And upon the whole it is doubtless much better for the crown, and also for the people, to have the revenue settled upon the modern footing rather than the ancient. For, the crown; because it is more certain, and collected with greater ease: for the people; because they are now delivered from the feudal hardships, and other odious branches of the prerogative. And though complaints have sometimes been made of the increase of the civil list, yet if we consider the sums that have been formerly granted, the limited extent under which it is now established, the revenues and prerogatives given up in lieu of it by the crown, the numerous branches of the present royal family, and (above all) the diminution of the value of money compared with what it was worth in the last century, we must acknowledge these complaints to be void of any rational foundation; and that it is impossible to support that dignity which a king of Great Britain should maintain, with an income in any degree less than what is now established by parliament.<sup>27</sup>

§ 458. Restrictions on the king's prerogative.—[334] This finishes our inquiries into the fiscal prerogatives of the king; or

<sup>27</sup> The modern civil list.—The civil list above mentioned is an annual sum granted by parliament at the commencement of each reign, for the expense of the royal household and establishment, as distinguished from the general exigencies of the state; and is the provision before stated to be made for the crown out of the taxes, in lieu of the crown's proper patrimony, and in consideration of the assignment of that patrimony to the public use. It must be pointed out that, though there has been a civil list so called since the revolution, the king was originally required to provide out of the income so assigned to him practically all the expenses of the civil government; it is only since the reign of William the Fourth that the civil list has been freed from all public charges, and come to mean the income granted for the personal expenses of the monarch. The amount fixed for the civil list has been subject in different reigns to considerable variation. At the commencement of the present reign, a civil list was granted to, and settled on, his majesty (George V), during his reign, and for six months afterwards, to the amount of 470,000*l.* per annum, payable out of the Consolidated Fund, at such times, and in such manner, as the treasury may direct; of which sum, 110,000*l.* is assigned for their majesties' privy purse, and the remainder is applicable chiefly to the salaries and expenses connected with their household, but the "civil list pensions" are no longer chargeable on the civil list. In return for that grant, his revenue, both ordinary and extraordinary. We have therefore now chalked out all the principal outlines of this vast title of the law, the supreme executive magistrate, or the king's majesty, considered in his several capacities and points of view. But, before we entirely dismiss this subject, it may not be improper to take a short comparative review of the power of the executive magistrate, or prerogative of the crown, as it stood in former days and as it stands at present. And we cannot but observe, that most of the laws for ascertaining, limiting, and restraining this prerogative have been made within the compass of little more than a century past; from the petition of right in 3 Car. I (1627) to the present time. So that the powers of the crown are now to all appearance greatly curtailed and diminished since the reign of King James the First: particularly, by the abolition of the star-chamber and high commission courts in the reign of Charles the First, and by the disclaiming of martial law, and the power of levying taxes on the subject, by the same prince: by the disuse of forest laws for a century past: and by the many excellent provisions enacted under Charles the Second; especially the abolition of military tenures, purveyance, and pre-emption; the habeas corpus act; and the act to prevent the discontinuance of parliaments for above three years; and, since the revolution, by the strong and emphatical words in which our liberties are asserted in the Bill of Rights, and Act of Settlement; by the act for triennial, since turned into septennial, elections; by the exclusion of certain officers from the house of commons; by rendering the seats of the judges permanent, and their salaries independent; and by restraining the king's pardon from obstructing parliamentary impeachments. Besides all this, if we consider how the crown is impoverished and stripped of all its ancient revenues, so that it greatly depends on the liberality of parliament for its necessary support and maintenance, we may perhaps be led to think that the balance is inclined pretty strongly to the popular scale, and that the executive magistrate has neither independence nor power enough left to form that check upon the lords and commons which the founders of our constitution intended.

it was at the same time provided that the hereditary revenues of the crown should, during the present reign, be carried to, and form part of, the Consolidated Fund. The civil list, therefore, now stands in the same place as the hereditary income did formerly; but with this great difference, namely, that it is not chargeable, as the hereditary income was, with the general and public expenses of the government.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 681.

§ 459. The king's sources of power.—<sup>[335]</sup> But, on the other hand, it is to be considered that every prince, in the first parliament after his accession, has by long usage a truly royal addition to his hereditary revenue settled upon him for his life; and has never any occasion to apply to parliament for supplies, but upon some public necessity of the whole realm. This restores to him that constitutional independence, which at his first accession seems, it must be owned, to be wanting. And then, with regard to power, we may find, perhaps, that the hands of government are at least sufficiently strengthened; and that an English monarch is now in no danger of being overborne by either the nobility or the people. The instruments of power are not perhaps so open and avowed as they formerly were, and therefore are the less liable to jealous and invidious reflections; but they are not the weaker upon that account. In short, our national debt and taxes (besides the inconveniences before mentioned) have also in their natural consequences thrown such a weight of power into the executive scale of government, as we cannot think was intended by our patriot ancestors; who gloriously struggled for the abolition of the then formidable parts of the prerogative, and by an unaccountable want of foresight established this system in their stead. The entire collection and management of so vast a revenue, being placed in the hands of the crown, have given rise to such a multitude of new officers created by and removable at the royal pleasure, that they have extended the influence of government to every corner of the nation. Witness the commissioners, and the multitude of dependents on the customs, in every port of the kingdom; the commissioners of excise, and their numerous subalterns, in every inland district; the postmasters, and their servants, planted in every town, and upon every public road; the commissioners of the stamps, and their distributors, which are full as scattered and full as numerous; the officers of the salt duty, which though a species of excise and conducted in the same manner, are yet made a distinct corps from the ordinary managers of that revenue; the surveyors of houses and windows; the receivers of the land tax; the managers of lotteries; and the commissioners of hackney-coaches; all which [336] are either mediately or immediately appointed by the crown, and removable at pleasure without any reason assigned: these, it requires but little penetration to see, must give that power, on which they depend for subsistence, an influence most amazingly extensive. To this may be added the frequent opportunities of conferring particular obligations, by preference in loans, subscriptions, tickets, remittances, and other money transactions, which will greatly increase this influence; and that over those persons whose attachment, on account of their wealth, is frequently the most desirable. All this is the natural, though perhaps the unforeseen, consequence of erecting our funds of credit, and to support them establishing our present perpetual taxes: the whole of which is entirely new since the restoration in 1660; and by far the greatest part since the revolution in 1688. And the same may be said with regard to the officers in our numerous army, and the places which the army has created. All which put together give the executive power so persuasive an energy with respect to the persons themselves, and so prevailing an interest with their friends and families, as will amply make amends for the loss of external prerogative.

But, though this profusion of offices should have no effect on individuals, there is still another newly acquired branch of power; and that is, not the influence only, but the force of a disciplined army: paid, indeed, ultimately by the people, but immediately by the crown: raised by the crown, officered by the crown, commanded by the crown. They are kept on foot, it is true, only from year to year, and that by the power of parliament: but during that year they must by the nature of our constitution, if raised at all, be at the absolute disposal of the crown. And there need but few words to demonstrate how great a trust is thereby reposed in the prince by his people. A trust that is more than equivalent to a thousand little troublesome prerogatives.

Add to all this, that, besides the civil list, the immense revenue of almost seven millions sterling, which is annually paid to the creditors of the public, or carried to the sinking [337] fund, is first deposited in the royal exchequer, and thence issued out to the respective offices of payment. This revenue the people can never refuse to raise, because it is made perpetual by act of parliament: which also, when well considered, will appear to be a trust of great delicacy and high importance.

§ 460. The existing situation as to the king's prerogative.— Upon the whole, therefore, I think it is clear that, whatever may have become of the nominal, the real power of the crown has not been too far weakened by any transactions in the last century. Much is indeed given up; but much is also acquired. The stern commands of prerogative have yielded to the milder voice of influence: the slavish and exploded doctrine of nonresistance has given way to a military establishment by law; and to the disuse of parliaments has succeeded a parliamentary trust of an immense perpetual revenue. When, indeed, by the free operation of the sinking fund, our national debts shall be lessened; when the posture of foreign affairs, and the universal introduction of a well planned and national militia, will suffer our formidable army to be thinned and regulated; and when (in consequence of all) our taxes shall be gradually reduced; this adventitious power of the crown will slowly and imperceptibly diminish, as it slowly and imperceptibly rose. But, till that shall happen, it will be our especial duty, as good subjects and good Englishmen, to reverence the crown, and yet guard against corrupt and servile influence from those who are intrusted with its authority; to be loyal, yet free; obedient, and yet independent; and, above everything, to hope that we may long, very long, continue to be governed by a sovereign, who, in all those public acts that have personally proceeded from himself, hath manifested the highest veneration for the free constitution of Britain; hath already in more than one instance remarkably strengthened its outworks; and will therefore never harbor a thought, or adopt a persuasion, in any the remotest degree detrimental to public liberty.

OF SUBORDINATE MAGISTRATES.

§ 461. Principal subordinate magistrates.—In a former chapter of these Commentaries<sup>a</sup> we distinguished magistrates into two kinds; supreme, or those in whom the sovereign power of the state resides; and subordinate, or those who act in an inferior secondary sphere. We have hitherto considered the former kind only, namely, the supreme legislative power of parliament, and the supreme executive power, which is the king: and are now to proceed to inquire into the rights and duties of the principal subordinate magistrates.

And herein we are not to investigate the powers and duties of his majesty's great officers of state, the lord treasurer, lord chamberlain, the principal secretaries, or the like: because I do not know that they are in that capacity in any considerable degree the objects of our laws, or have any very important share of magistracy conferred upon them: except that the secretaries of state are allowed the power of commitment, in order to bring offenders to trial.<sup>b1</sup> Neither shall I here treat of the office and authority of

<sup>a</sup> C. 2, page 146.

<sup>b</sup> 1 Leon. 70. 2 Leon. 175. Comb. 143. 5 Mod. 84. Salk. 347. Carth. 291.

---

1 Relation of king and officers of state.—How vast a change has taken place since Blackstone's day we may see from a very interesting passage in his book, Book I, chap. ix. He has a chapter on the Subordinate Magistrates. In this he speaks of sheriffs, coroners, justices of the peace, constables, surveyors of highways, and overseers of the poor. He prefaces it with these words: "In a former chapter of these Commentaries we distinguished magistrates into two kinds: supreme, or those in whom the sovereign power of the state resides; and subordinate, or those who act in an inferior secondary sphere. We have hitherto considered the former kind only, namely, the supreme legislative power or parliament, and the supreme executive power, which is in the king; and are now to proceed to inquire into the rights and duties of the principal subordinate magistrates. And herein we are not to investigate the powers and duties of his majesty's great officers of state, the lord treasurer, lord chamberlain, the principal secretaries or the like; because I do not know that they are in that capacity in any considerable degree the objects of our laws or have any very the lord chancellor, or the other judges of the superior courts of justice; because they will find a more proper place in the third part of these Commentaries. Nor shall I enter into any minute disquisitions, with regard to the rights and dignities of mayors and aldermen, [339] or other magistrates of particular corporations; because these are mere private and strictly municipal rights, depending entirely upon the domestic constitution of their respective franchises. But the magistrates and officers, whose rights and duties it will be proper in this chapter to consider, are such as are generally in use and have a jurisdiction and authority dispersedly throughout the kingdom: which are, principally, sheriffs; coroners; justices of the peace; constables; surveyors of highways; and overseers of the poor. In treating of all which I shall inquire into, first, their antiquity and original; next, the manner in which they are appointed and may be removed; and lastly, their rights and duties. And first of sheriffs.

§ 462. 1. The sheriff.—The sheriff is an officer of very great antiquity in this kingdom, his name being derived from two Saxon important share, of magistracy conferred upon them: except that the secretaries of state are allowed the power of commitment in order to bring offenders to trial." Now that is a very memorable sentence, and on the whole (though perhaps it is a little exaggerated) I think that it was true in Blackstone's day. The lord treasurer, the secretaries of state, were of course very important persons—perhaps quite as important then as now—but the law knew them not, or merely knew them as persons who advised the king in the use of his prerogatives. The law gave powers to sheriffs and coroners, to surveyors of highways and overseers of the poor; it gave few powers to the high officers of state, to the men who for good and evil had really the destinies of England in their hands: the powers that they in fact exercised were in law the king's powers. But I know no proof of the power of Blackstone's genius so striking as the fact that the sentence that I have just quoted should be repeated nowadays in books which profess to set forth the modern law of England. Does not our law know these high officers of state? Open the statute book, on almost every page of it you will find, "it shall be lawful for the treasury to do this," "it shall be lawful for one of the secretaries of state to do that."

This is the result of a modern movement, a movement which began, we may say, about the time of the Reform Bill of 1832. The new wants of a new age have been met in a new manner—by giving statutory powers of all kinds, sometimes to the queen in council, sometimes to the treasury, sometimes to a secretary of state, sometimes to this board, sometimes to the other. But of this words, scire gerefa, the reeve, bailiff, or officer of the shire. He is called in Latin vice-comes, as being the deputy of the earl or comes; to whom the custody of the shire is said to have been committed at the first division of this kingdom into counties. But the earls in process of time, by reason of their high employments and attendance on the king's person, not being able to transact the business of the county, were delivered of that burden:° reserving to themselves the honor, but the labor was laid on the sheriff. So that now the sheriff does all the king's business in the county; and though he be still called vice-comes, yet he is entirely independent of, and not subject to the earl; the king by his letters patent committing custodiam comitatus (the custody of the county) to the sheriff, and him alone.

§ 463. a. Election of sheriff.—Sheriffs were formerly chosen by the inhabitants of the several counties. In confirmation of which it was ordained by statute 28 Edw. I, c. 8 (Election of Sheriffs, 1300), that the people should have election of sheriffs in every shire, where the shrievalty is not of inheritance. For anciently in some counties the sheriffs were hereditary; as I apprehend they were in Scotland till the statute 20 Geo. II, c. 43 vast change our institutional writers have hardly yet taken any account. They go on writing as though England were governed by the royal prerogatives, as if ministers had nothing else to do than to advise the king as to how his prerogatives should be exercised.

• Dalton of Sheriffs, c. 1.

---

In my view, which I put forward with some diffidence and with a full warning that it is not orthodox, we can no longer say that the executive power is vested in the king: the king has powers, this minister has powers, and that minister has powers. The requisite harmony is secured by the extra-legal organization of cabinet and ministry. The powers legally given to the king are certainly the most important, but I cannot consent to call them supreme. To be able to declare war and peace is certainly an important power, perhaps the most important power that the law can give, and this belongs to the king. But the power to make rules for the government of the police force is also an important power, and this our law gives to a secretary of state. The one power may be vastly more important than the other, but it is in no sense supreme over the other. The supremacy of the king's powers, if it is to be found anywhere, must be found in the fact that the ministers legally hold their offices during his good pleasure.—Maitland, Const. Hist. of England, 416.

(Heritable Jurisdictions, 1746); and still continue in the county of [340] Westmoreland to this day; the city of London having also the inheritance of the shrievalty of Middlesex vested in their body by charter.<sup>d</sup> The reason of these popular elections is assigned in the same statute, c. 13, "that the commons might choose such as would not be a burden to them." And herein appears plainly a strong trace of the democratic part of our constitution; in which form of government it is an indispensable requisite, that the people should choose their own magistrates.<sup>e</sup> This election was in all probability not absolutely vested in the commons, but required the royal approbation. For in the Gothic constitution, the judges of their county courts (which office is executed by our sheriff) were elected by the people, but confirmed by the king: and the form of their election was thus managed; the people, or incolæ territorii (the inhabitants of the territory), chose twelve electors, and they nominated three persons, ex quibus rex unum confirmabat (of whom the king confirmed one.)<sup>f</sup> But, with us in England, these popular elections, growing tumultuous, were put an end to by the statute 9 Edw. II, st. 2 (Sheriffs, 1315), which enacted that the sheriffs should from thenceforth be assigned by the chancellor, treasurer, and the judges; as being persons in whom the same trust might with confidence be reposed. By statutes 14 Edw. III, c. 7 (Sheriffs, 1340), 23 Hen. VI, c. 8 (Commissioners of Sewers, 1444), and 21 Hen. VIII, c. 20 (President of the Council, 1529), the chancellor, treasurer, president of the king's council, chief justices, and chief baron, are to make this election; and that on the morrow of All Souls in the exchequer. And the king's letters patent, appointing the new sheriffs, used commonly to bear date the sixth day of November.<sup>g</sup> The statute of Cambridge, 12 Rich. II, c. 2 (Corrupt Appointments to Offices, 1388), ordains, that the

<sup>d</sup> 3 Rep. 72.

• Montesq. Sp. L. b. 2. c. 2.

<sup>f</sup> Stiernh. De Jure Goth. l. 1. c. 3.

<sup>g</sup> Stat. 12 Edw. IV. c. 1 (Sheriff, 1472).

<sup>2</sup> Upon the death of the hereditary holder, Earl of Thanet, without issue, all hereditary claims and title to the office of sheriff of Westmoreland were abolished in 1850. By the Local Government Act, 1888, it was provided that the crown should appoint the sheriff of Middlesex, and of the county of London, then newly created, and that with the consent of the city, the sheriff of the county of London might exercise jurisdiction in the city also.

chancellor, treasurer, keeper of the privy seal, steward of the king's house, the king's chamberlain, clerk of the rolls, the justices of the one bench and the other, barons of the exchequer, and all other that shall be called to ordain, name, or make justices of the peace, sheriffs, and other officers of the king, shall be sworn to act indifferently, and to name no man that sueth to be put in office, but such only as they shall judge to be the best and most sufficient. And the custom now is (and has been at least [341] ever since the time of Fortescue,<sup>a</sup> who was chief justice and chancellor to Henry the Sixth) that all the judges, together with the other great officers, meet in the exchequer chamber on the morrow of All Souls yearly (which day is now altered to the morrow of St. Martin by the last act for abbreviating Michaelmas term) and then and there propose three persons to the king, who afterwards appoints one of them to be sheriff. This custom, of the twelve judges proposing three persons, seems borrowed from the Gothic constitution before mentioned: with this difference, that among the Goths the twelve nominors were first elected by the people themselves. And this usage of ours at its first introduction, I am apt to believe, was founded upon some statute, though not now to be found among our printed laws: first, because it is materially different from the direction of all the statutes before mentioned; which it is hard to conceive that the judges would have countenanced by their concurrence, or that Fortescue would have inserted in his book, unless by the authority of some statute: and also, because a statute is expressly referred to in the record, which Sir Edward Coke tells us<sup>1</sup> he transcribed from the council book of 3 March, 34 Hen. VI (1455), and which is in substance as follows. The king had of his own authority appointed a man sheriff of Lincolnshire, which office he refused to take upon him: whereupon the opinions of the judges were taken, what should be done in this behalf. And the two chief justices, Sir John Fortescue and Sir John Prisot, delivered the unanimous opinion of them all: "that the king did an error when he made a person sheriff, that was not chosen and presented to him according to the statute; that the person refusing was liable to no fine for disobedience, as if he had been one of the three persons chosen according to the tenor of the statute; that they would advise the king to have recourse to the three persons that were chosen according to the statute, or that some other thrifty man be entreated to occupy the office for this year; and that, the next year, to eschew such inconveniences, the order of the statute in this behalf made be observed." But notwithstanding this unanimous resolution of [342] all the judges of England, thus entered in the council book, and the statute 34 & 35 Hen. VIII, c. 26, sec. 61 (1543), which expressly recognizes this to be the law of the land, some of our writers' have affirmed, that the king, by his prerogative, may name whom he pleases to be sheriff, whether chosen by the judges or no. This is grounded on a very particular case in the fifth year of Queen Elizabeth (1562), when, by reason of the plague, there was no Michaelmas term kept at Westminster; so that the judges could not meet there in crastino animarum (on the morrow of All Souls) to nominate the sheriffs: whereupon the queen named them herself, without such previous assembly, appointing for the most part one of two remaining in the last year's list.* And this case, thus circumstanced, is the only authority in our books for the making these extraordinary sheriffs. It is true, the reporter adds, that it was held that the queen by her prerogative might make a sheriff without the election of the judges, non obstante aliquo statuto in contrarium (notwithstanding any statute to the contrary): but the doctrine of non obstante's which sets the prerogative above the laws, was effectually demolished by the Bill of Rights at the revolution, and abdicated Westminster Hall when King James abdicated the kingdom. However, it must be acknowledged, that the practice of occasionally naming what are called pocket-sheriffs, by the sole authority of the crown, hath uniformly continued to the reign of his present majesty; in which, I believe, few (if any) instances have occurred.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>a</sup> De L. L. c. 24.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Inst. 559.

† Jenkins. 229.

* Dyer. 225.

---

<sup>3</sup> Under the Sheriffs Act, 1887, the annual appointment of sheriffs is made at the Royal Courts of Justice on the 12th day of November in every year, in the manner heretofore in use, and by the same high officers, or two of them, together with the judges, or two of them. And by the same act, in continuance of a similar provision in the Fines Act, 1833, whenever any person is duly pricked or appointed to be sheriff of any county, a warrant is to be made out § 464. b. Sheriff's term of office.—Sheriffs, by virtue of several old statutes, are to continue in their office no longer than one year; and yet it hath been said<sup>1</sup> that a sheriff may be appointed durante bene placito or during the king's pleasure; and so is the form of the royal writ.<sup>m</sup> Therefore, till a new sheriff be named, his office cannot be determined, unless by his own death or the demise of the king;<sup>4</sup> in which last case it was usual for the successor to send a new writ to the old sheriff:<sup>n</sup> but now by statute 1 Ann., st. 1, c. 8 (1702), all officers appointed by the [343] preceding king may hold their offices, for six months after the king's demise, unless sooner displaced by the successor. We may further observe, that by statute 1 Rich. II, c. 11 (Sheriffs, 1377), no man that has served the office of sheriff for one year can be compelled to serve the same again within three years after.

§ 465. c. Powers and duties of the sheriff.—We shall find it is of the utmost importance to have the sheriff appointed according to law, when we consider his power and duty. These are either as a judge, as the keeper of the king's peace, as a ministerial officer of the superior courts of justice, or as the king's bailiff.

§ 466. (1) Judicial capacity of the sheriff.—In his judicial capacity he is to hear and determine all causes of forty shillings value and under, in his county court, of which more in its proper place; and he has also a judicial power in divers other civil cases.<sup>o</sup> He is likewise to decide the elections of knights of the shire (subject to the control of the house of commons), of coroners, and of

<sup>1</sup> 4 Rep. 32.

<sup>n</sup> Ibid. 7.

<sup>m</sup> Dalt. of Sheriffs. 8.

<sup>o</sup> Dalt. c. 4.

---

and signed by the clerk to the privy council, and transmitted by him to the person so appointed; and this appointment so made is of the same effect as if by patent under the great seal. A duplicate of the warrant is within ten days from the date thereof to be transmitted by the clerk of the privy council to the clerk of the peace for the county; and the sheriff so appointed continues in office until his successor is duly and fully appointed. In the event of his dying within the term of his office, the under-sheriff takes his place, and acts as occasional sheriff.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 718.

<sup>4</sup> The office of sheriff no longer determines on the demise of the crown.

verderers; to judge of the qualification of voters, and to return such as he shall determine to be duly elected.

§ 467. (2) Sheriff as keeper of the king's peace.—As the keeper of the king's peace, both by common law and special commission, he is the first man in the county,<sup>5</sup> and superior in rank to any nobleman therein, during his office.<sup>6</sup> He may apprehend, and commit to prison, all persons who break the peace, or attempt to break it: and may bind anyone in a recognizance to keep the king's peace. He may, and is bound ex officio to pursue, and take all traitors, murderers, felons, and other misdoers, and commit them to jail for safe custody. He is also to defend his county against any of the king's enemies when they come into the land: and for this purpose, as well as for keeping the peace and pursuing felons, he may command all the people of his county to attend him; which is called the posse comitatus, or power of the county:<sup>7</sup> which summons, every person above fifteen years old, and under the degree of a peer, is bound to attend upon warning,<sup>8</sup> [344] under pain of fine and imprisonment.<sup>9</sup> But though the sheriff is thus the principal conservator of the peace in his county, yet by the express directions of the great charter,<sup>10</sup> he, together with the constable, coroner, and certain other officers of the king, are forbidden to hold any pleas of the crown, or, in other words, to try any criminal offense. For it would be highly unbecoming, that the executioners of justice should be also the judges; should impose, as well as levy, fines and amercements; should one day condemn a man to death, and personally execute him the next. Neither may he act as an ordinary justice of the peace during the time of his office:<sup>11</sup> for this would be equally inconsistent; he being in many respects the servant of the justices.

<sup>5</sup> 1 Roll. Rep. 237.

<sup>6</sup> Dalt. c. 95.

<sup>7</sup> Lamb. Eiren. 315.

<sup>8</sup> Stat. 2 Hen. V. c. 8 (Riots and Unlawful Assemblies, 1414).

<sup>9</sup> Cap. 17.

<sup>11</sup> Stat. 1 Mar. st. 2. c. 8 (Sheriffs, 1553).

---

<sup>5</sup> He is now the second man in the county.

§ 468. (3) Sheriff executes judicial process.—In his ministerial capacity the sheriff is bound to execute all process issuing from the king's courts of justice. In the commencement of civil causes, he is to serve the writ, to arrest, and to take bail; when the cause comes to trial, he must summon and return the jury; when it is determined, he must see the judgment of the court carried into execution. In criminal matters, he also arrests and imprisons, he returns the jury, he has the custody of the delinquent, and he executes the sentence of the court, though it extends to death itself.

§ 469. (4) Sheriff as the king's bailiff.—As the king's bailiff, it is his business to preserve the rights of the king within his bailiwick; for so his county is frequently called in the writs: a word introduced by the princes of the Norman line; in imitation of the French, whose territory is divided into bailiwicks, as that of England into counties.<sup>v</sup> He must seize to the king's use all lands devolved to the crown by attainder or escheat; must levy all fines and forfeitures, must seize and keep all waifs, wrecks, estrays, and the like, unless they be granted to some subject; and must also collect the king's rents within his bailiwick, if commanded by process from the exchequer.<sup>x</sup>

§ 470. (5) Officers subordinate to the sheriff.—<sup>[345]</sup> To execute these various offices, the sheriff has under him many inferior officers; an under-sheriff, bailiffs, and jailers; who must neither buy, sell, nor farm their offices, on forfeiture of 500*l*.<sup>y</sup>

§ 471. (a) Deputy sheriffs.—The under-sheriff usually performs all the duties of the office; a very few only excepted, where the personal presence of the high-sheriff is necessary. But no under-sheriff shall abide in his office above one year;<sup>z</sup> and if he does, by statute 23 Hen. VI, c. 8 (1444), he forfeits 200*l*., a very large penalty in those early days. And no under-sheriff or

<sup>v</sup> Fortesc. de L. L. c. 24.

<sup>x</sup> Dalt. c. 9.

<sup>y</sup> Stat. 3 Geo. I. c. 15 (Estreats, 1717).

<sup>z</sup> Stat. 42 Edw. III. c. 9 (Crown Debts, 1368).

sheriff's officer shall practice as an attorney, during the time he continues in such office:<sup>a</sup> for this would be a great inlet to partiality and oppression. But these salutary regulations are shamefully evaded, by practicing in the names of other attorneys, and putting in sham deputies by way of nominal under-sheriffs: by reason of which, says Dalton,<sup>b</sup> the under-sheriffs and bailiffs do grow so cunning in their several places, that they are able to deceive, and it may well be feared that many of them do deceive, both the king, the high-sheriff, and the county.

§ 472. (b) Bailiffs.—Bailiffs, or sheriff's officers, are either bailiffs of hundreds, or special bailiffs. Bailiffs of hundreds are officers appointed over those respective districts by the sheriffs, to collect fines therein; to summon juries; to attend the judges and justices at the assizes, and quarter sessions; and also to execute writs and process in the several hundreds. But, as these are generally plain men, and not thoroughly skillful in this latter part of their office, that of serving writs, and making arrests and executions, it is now usual to join special bailiffs with them; who are generally mean persons employed by the sheriffs on account only of their adroitness and dexterity in hunting and seizing their prey.<sup>c</sup> The sheriff being answerable for the misdemeanors of these bailiffs, they are therefore usually bound in an obligation for the due execution [346] of their office, and thence are called bound bailiffs; which the common people have corrupted into a much more homely appellation.

§ 473. (c) Jailers.—Jailers are also the servants of the sheriff, and he must be responsible for their conduct. Their business is to keep safely all such persons as are committed to them by lawful warrant: and, if they suffer any such to escape, the sheriff shall answer it to the king, if it be a criminal matter; or,

<sup>a</sup> Stat. 1 Hen. V. c. 4 (Bailiffs of Sheriffs, 1413).

<sup>b</sup> Of Sheriffs, c. 115.

---

<sup>c</sup> Cited 2 N. H. 519. The power of the sheriff to make deputies for the execution or on mean process is incident to his office at common law, and cannot be restrained unless by positive statute. (4 Bacon's Abr., tit. Sheriff; Clark v. Bray, Kirby, 240; Dungan v. Hall, 64 Ill. 255.)—HAMMOND.

in a civil case, to the party injured.<sup>c</sup> And to this end the sheriff must<sup>d</sup> have lands sufficient within the county to answer the king and his people. The abuses of jailers and sheriff's officers toward the unfortunate persons in their custody are well restrained and guarded against by statute 32 Geo. II, c. 28 (Debtor's Imprisonment, 1758), and by statute 14 Geo. III, c. 59 (Health of Prisoners, 1774), provisions are made for better preserving the health of prisoners and preventing the jail distemper.

§ 474. (6) Sheriff's personal expenses.—The vast expense, which custom had introduced in serving the office of high-sheriff, was grown such a burden to the subject, that it was enacted, by statute 13 & 14 Car. II, c. 21 (Expenses of Sheriffs, 1662), that no sheriff (except of London, Westmoreland, and towns which are counties of themselves) should keep any table at the assizes, except for his own family, or give any presents to the judges or their servants, or have more than forty men in livery: yet, for the sake of safety and decency, he may not have less than twenty men in England and twelve in Wales: upon forfeiture, in any of these cases, of 200l.<sup>7</sup>

§ 475. 2. The coroner.—The coroner's is also a very ancient office at the common law.<sup>8</sup> He is called coroner, coronator, because he hath principally to do with pleas of the crown, or such

<sup>c</sup> Dalt. c. 118. 4 Rep. 34.

<sup>d</sup> Stat. 9 Edw. II. st. 2 (Sheriffs, 1315). 2 Edw. III. c. 4 (Sheriffs, 1328). 4 Edw. III. c. 9 (Civil Procedure, 1330). 5 Edw. III. c. 4 (Sheriff's Qualification, 1331). 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 21. § 7 (Sheriffs, 1662).

<sup>7</sup> The office of sheriff is now regulated by the Sheriff's Act, 1887, the substance of which may be found in 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 719 ff.

<sup>8</sup> Below [the sheriff] in rank and of more recent origin stand the coroners, or, to give them their full title, the keepers of the pleas of the crown (custodes placitorum coronæ). Normally the county has four coroners who are elected by the county in the county court. Their origin is traced to an ordinance of 1194. The function implied by their title is that of keeping (custodire) as distinguished from that of holding (tenere) the pleas of the crown; they are not to hear and determine causes, but are to keep record of all that goes on in the county and concerns the administration of criminal justice, and more particularly must they guard the revenues which will come to the king if such justice be duly done.—POLLOCK & MAITLAND, 1 Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 534.

wherein the king is more immediately concerned.* And in this light the lord chief justice of the king's bench is the principal coroner in the kingdom, and may (if he pleases) exercise the jurisdiction of a coroner in any part of the realm.<sup>f</sup> But [<sup>347</sup>] there are also particular coroners for every county of England; usually four, but sometimes six, and sometimes fewer.<sup>g</sup> This officer<sup>h</sup> is of equal antiquity with the sheriff; and was ordained together with him to keep the peace, when the earls gave up the wardship of the county.

§ 476. a. Election of coroner.—He is still chosen by all the freeholders in the county court as by the policy of our ancient laws the sheriffs, and conservators of the peace, and all other officers were, who were concerned in matters that affected the liberty of the people;<sup>1</sup> and as verderers of the forest still are, whose business it is to stand between the prerogative and the subject in the execution of the forest laws. For this purpose there is a writ at common law de coronatore eligendo (of choosing a coroner):<sup>k</sup> in which it is expressly commanded the sheriff, “quod talem eligi faciat, qui melius et sciat, et velit, et possit, officio illi intendere (that he cause such one to be chosen as is the best informed, and most willing and able to hold that office).”<sup>9</sup> And, in order to effect this the more surely, it was enacted by the statute<sup>1</sup> of Westm. 1 that none but lawful and discreet knights should be chosen; and there was an instance in the 5 Edw. III (1331), of a man being removed from this office, because he was only a merchant.<sup>m</sup> But it seems it is now sufficient if a man hath lands enough to be made a knight, whether he be really knighted or not:<sup>n</sup> for the coroner ought to have an estate sufficient to maintain the dignity of his office, and answer any fines that may be set upon him for his mis-

* 2 Inst. 31. 4 Inst. 271.

f 4 Rep. 57.

g F. N. B. 163.

h Mirror. c. 1. § 3.

i 2 Inst. 558.

k F. N. B. 163.

l 3 Edw. I. c. 10 (Coroners, 1275).

m 2 Inst. 32.

n F. N. B. 163, 164.

<sup>9</sup> The writ de coronatore eligendo is now, by the Local Government Act, 1888, directed to the county council, who are also made the electors of the sheriff.

behavior;° and if he hath not enough to answer, his fine shall be levied on the county, as a punishment for electing an insufficient officer.º Now, indeed, through the culpable neglect of gentlemen of property, this office has been suffered to fall into disrepute, and get into low and indigent hands: so that, although formerly no coroners would condescend to be paid for serving their country, and they were by the aforesaid statute of Westm. 1 expressly forbidden to take a [348] reward, under pain of great forfeiture to the king; yet for many years past they have only desired to be chosen for the sake of their perquisites: being allowed fees for their attendance by the statute 3 Hen. VII, c. 1 (Star-Chamber, 1487), which Sir Edward Coke complains of heavily;ª though since his time those fees have been much enlarged.† 10

§ 477. b. Coroner's term of office.—The coroner is chosen for life: but may be removed, either by being made sheriff, or chosen verderer, which are offices incompatible with the other; or by the king's writ de coronatore exonerando (of discharging the coroner), for a cause to be therein assigned, as that he is engaged in other business, is incapacitated by years of sickness, hath not a sufficient estate in the county, or lives in an inconvenient part of it.ª And by the statute 25 Geo. II, c. 29 (Coroners, 1751), extortion, neglect, or misbehavior are also made causes of removal.

§ 478. c. Powers and duties of the coroner—(1) Coroner's judicial functions.—The office and power of a coroner are also, like those of the sheriff, either judicial or ministerial; but principally judicial. This is in great measure ascertained by statute 4 Edw. I (1276), de officio coronatoris (of the office of coroner); and consists, first, in inquiring, when any person is slain, or dies

• Ibid.

º Mirr. c. 1. § 3. 2 Inst. 175.

ª 2 Inst. 210.

† Stat. 25 Geo. II. c. 29 (1751).

• F. N. B. 163, 164.

---

<sup>10</sup> Coroners are now said to be in general persons of high respectability. By the Coroners Act, 1887, they are required to possess land in fee in the county. They are paid by salary, and no longer by fees.

suddenly, or in prison, concerning the manner of his death. And this must be "super visum corporis (on the view of the body)";<sup>t</sup> for, if the body be not found, the coroner could not sit.<sup>u</sup> He must also sit at the very place where the death happened; and his inquiry is made by a jury from four, five, or six of the neighboring towns, over whom he is to preside. If any be found guilty by this inquest of murder, he is to commit to prison for further trial, and is also to inquire concerning their lands, goods and chattels, which are forfeited thereby: but, whether it be murder or not, he must inquire whether any deodand has accrued to the king, or the [349] lord of the franchise, by this death: and must certify the whole of this inquisition* to the court of king's bench, or the next assizes. Another branch of his office is to inquire concerning shipwrecks; and certify whether wreck or not, and who is in possession of the goods. Concerning treasure-trove, he is also to inquire who were the finders, and where it is, and whether anyone be suspected of having found and concealed a treasure; "and that may be well perceived (saith the old statute of Edw. I) where one liveth riotously, hunting taverns, and hath done so of long time": whereupon he might be attached, and held to bail, upon this suspicion only.

§ 479. (2) Coroner's municipal functions.—The ministerial office of the coroner is only as the sheriff's substitute. For when just exception can be taken to the sheriff, for suspicion of partiality (as that he is interested in the suit, or of kindred to either plaintiff or defendant), the process must then be awarded to the coroner, instead of the sheriff, for execution of the king's writs.<sup>v 11</sup>

* Ninth edition inserts here, "under his own seal and the seals of the jurors [Stat. 33 Hen. VIII. c. 12 (Murder, 1541). 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 13 (1554). 2 West Symbol. § 310. Crompt. 264. Tremain. P. C. 621.] together with the evidence thereon."

<sup>t</sup> 4 Inst. 271.

<sup>u</sup> Thus, in the Gothic constitution, before any fine was payable by the neighborhood, for the slaughter of a man therein, "de corpore delicti constare oportebat; i. e. non tam fuisse aliquem in territorio isto mortuum inventum, quam vulneratum et cæsum. Potest enim homo etiam ex alia causa subito mori." (It was necessary that the crime should be evident; that is, not merely that a person was found dead in that district, but that he was wounded and slain. For a man may die suddenly from other causes.)" Stiernhook, De Jure Gothor. l. 3. c. 4.

§ 480. 3. Justices of the peace.—The next species of subordinate magistrates, whom I am to consider, are justices of the peace; the principal of whom is the custos rotulorum, or keeper of the records of the county. The common law hath ever had a special care and regard for the conservation of the peace; for peace is the very end and foundation of civil society. And therefore, before the present constitution of justices was invented, there were peculiar officers appointed by the common law for the maintenance of the public peace. Of these some had, and still have, this power annexed to other offices which they hold; others had it merely by itself, and were thence named custodes or conservatores pacis (keepers of the peace). Those that were so virtute officii (by virtue of their office) still continue: but the latter sort are superseded by the modern justices.

§ 481. a. Conservators of the peace.—The king's majesty<sup>w</sup> is, by his office and dignity royal, the principal conservator of the peace within all his dominions; [350] and may give authority to any other to see the peace kept, and to punish such as break it: hence it is usually called the king's peace.<sup>12</sup> The lord chancellor v 4 Inst. 271.

w Lambard. Eirenarch. 12.

<sup>11</sup> The office of coroner is now governed by the Coroners Acts of 1844, 1887, and 1892, the substance of which is given in 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 730 ff.

<sup>12</sup> We said that the king's peace and protection had become the established right of every peaceable subject. Nevertheless a trace of the archaic ideas persisted as long as the art of common law pleading itself. The right was to be enjoyed only on condition of being formally demanded. In order to give the king's courts jurisdiction of a plea of trespass it was needful to insert in the writ the words vi et armis, which imported a breach of the peace; and it was usual, if not necessary, also to add expressly the words contra pacem nostram. Without the allegation of force and arms the writ was merely "vicountiel," that is, the sheriff did not return it to the superior court but had to determine the matter in the county court. By so many steps and transformations did it become possible for Lambarde, and Blackstone after him, to say, with unconscious inversion of the historical order of development, and as if the matter were in itself too obvious to need explanation: "The king's majesty or keeper, the lord treasurer, the lord high steward of England, the lord marshal, the lord high constable of England (when any such officers are in being) and all the justices of the court of king's bench (by virtue of their offices) and the master of the rolls (by prescription) are general conservators of the peace throughout the whole kingdom, and may commit all breakers of it, or bind them in recognizances to keep it:<sup>x</sup> the other judges are only so in their own courts. The coroner is also a conservator of the peace within his own county;<sup>y</sup> as is also the sheriff;<sup>z</sup> and both of them may take a recognizance or security for the peace. Constables, tithing-men, and the like, are also conservators of the peace within their own jurisdictions; and may apprehend all breakers of the peace, and commit them, till they find sureties for their keeping it.<sup>a</sup>

Those that were, without any office, simply and merely conservators of the peace, either claimed that power by prescription;<sup>b</sup> or were bound to exercise it by the tenure of their lands;<sup>c</sup> or, lastly, were chosen by the freeholders in full county court before the sheriff; the writ for their election directing them to be chosen "de probioribus et potentioribus comitatus sui in custodes pacis (from the most upright and powerful of their county as keepers of the peace)."<sup>d</sup> But when Queen Isabel, the wife of Edward II, had contrived to depose her husband by a forced resignation of the crown, and had set up his son Edward III in his place; this, being a thing then without example in England, it was feared would much alarm the people: especially as the old king was living, though hurried about from castle to castle: till at last he met with an untimely death. To prevent, therefore, any risings, or other disturbance of the peace, the new king sent writs to all the sheriffs in England, the form of which is preserved by [351] Thomas Walsingham,<sup>e</sup> giving a plausible account of the manner of his ob-

<sup>x</sup> Lamb. 12.

<sup>y</sup> Britton. 3.

<sup>z</sup> F. N. B. 81.

<sup>a</sup> Lamb. 14.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. 15.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid. 17.

<sup>d</sup> Ibid. 16.

<sup>e</sup> Hist. A. D. 1327.

---

is, by his office and dignity royal, the principal conservator of the peace within all his dominions; and may give authority to any other to see the peace kept, and to punish such as break it; hence it is usually called the King's Peace."—POLLOCK, The King's Peace, in Oxford Lectures, 90.

taining the crown; to wit, that it was done ipsius patris beneplacito (by the good pleasure of his father): and withal commanding each sheriff that the peace be kept throughout his bailiwick, on pain and peril of disinheritance and loss of life and limb. And in a few weeks after the date of these writs, it was ordained in parliament,<sup>f</sup> that, for the better maintaining and keeping of the peace in every county, good men and lawful, which were no maintainers of evil, or barretors in the country, should be assigned to keep the peace. And in this manner, and upon this occasion, was the election of the conservators of the peace taken from the people, and given to the king;<sup>g</sup> this assignment being construed to be by the king's commission.<sup>h</sup> But still they were only called cohservators, wardens, or keepers of the peace, till the statute 34 Edw. III, c. 1 (1360), gave them the power of trying felonies; and then they acquired the more honorable appellation of justices.<sup>i</sup>

§ 482. b. Appointment of justices.—These justices are appointed by the king's special commission under the great seal, the form of which was settled by all the judges, A. D. 1590.<sup>j</sup> This appoints them all,<sup>k</sup> jointly and severally, to keep the peace, and any two or more of them to inquire of and determine felonies and other misdemeanors: in which number some particular justices, or one of them, are directed to be always included, and no business to be done without their presence: the words of the commission running thus, "Quorum aliquem vestrum, A. B. C. D. etc. unum esse volumus (Of whom we will that some one of you, A, B, C, D, etc., be one)"; whence the persons so named are usually called justices of the quorum. And formerly it was customary to appoint only a select number of justices, eminent for their skill and discretion, to be of the quorum; but now the practice is to advance almost all of them to that dignity, naming them all over again in the quorum clause, except perhaps only some one inconsiderable

<sup>f</sup> Stat. 1 Edw. III. c. 16 (Justices of the Peace, 1327).

<sup>g</sup> Lamb. 20.

<sup>h</sup> Stat. 4 Edw. III. c. 2 (Justices of Assize, 1330). 18 Edw. III. st. 2. c. 2 (Justices of the Peace, 1344).

<sup>i</sup> Lamb. 23.

<sup>j</sup> Ibid. 43.

<sup>k</sup> See the form itself, Lamb. 35. Burn. tit. Justices, § 1. person for the sake of propriety: and no exception is now allowable, [352] for not expressing in the form of warrants, etc., that the justice who issued them is of the quorum.<sup>13</sup> When any justice intends to act under this commission, he sues out a writ of dedimus potestatem (we have empowered) from the clerk of the crown in chancery, empowering certain persons therein named to administer the usual oaths to him; which done, he is at liberty to act.<sup>14</sup>

§ 483. c. Number and qualifications of justices.—Touching the number and qualifications of these justices; it was ordained by statute 18 Edw. III, c. 2 (Justices of the Peace, 1344), that two or three, of the best reputation in each county shall be assigned to be keepers of the peace. But these being found rather too few for that purpose, it was provided by statute 34 Edw. III, c. 1 (1360), that one lord, and three, or four, of the most worthy men in the county, with some learned in the law, shall be made justices in every county. But afterwards the number of justices, through the ambition of private persons, became so large, that it was thought necessary by statute, 12 Rich. II, c. 10 (Justice of the Peace, 1388), and 14 Rich. II, c. 11 (Justice of the Peace, 1390), to restrain them at first to six, and afterwards to eight only. But this rule is now disregarded, and the cause seems to be (as Lambard observed long ago<sup>m</sup>) that the growing number of statute laws, committed from time to time to the charge of justices of the peace, have occasioned also (and very reasonably) their increase to a larger number. And, as to their qualifications, the statutes just cited direct them to be of the best reputation and most worthy men in the county: and the statute 13 Rich. II, c. 7 (1389), orders them to be of the most sufficient knights, esquires, and gentlemen of the law. Also by statute 2 Hen. V, st. 1, c. 4, and st. 2, c. 1

<sup>1</sup> Stat. 26 Geo. II. c. 27 (Justices, 1752). See also Stat. 7 Geo. III. c. 21 (Justices' Quorum, 1767).

<sup>m</sup> Lamb. 34.

<sup>13</sup> The keeping of the proper record of all justices of the peace is now regulated by the Crown Office Act, 1877.

<sup>14</sup> Cited 4 Me. 418, as to quorum; 25 N. H. 491; 58 N. Y. 530, as to jurisdiction generally.—HAMMOND.

(Justice of the Peace, 1414), they must be resident in their several counties. And because, contrary to these statutes, men of small substance had crept into the commission, whose poverty made them both covetous and contemptible, it was enacted by statute 18 Hen. VI, c. 11 (Justices of the Peace, 1439), that no justice should be put in commission if he had not lands to the value of 20*l. per annum*. And, the rate of money being greatly altered since that time, it is now enacted by statute 5 Geo. II, c. 11 (1731), that every justice, except [353] as is therein excepted, shall have 100*l. per annum* clear of all deductions; and, if he acts without such qualification, he shall forfeit 100*l.* This qualification<sup>a</sup> is almost an equivalent to the 20*l. per annum* required in Henry the Sixth's time: and of this<sup>o</sup> the justice must now make oath. Also it is provided by the act 5 Geo. II, that no practicing attorney, solicitor, or proctor shall be capable of acting as a justice of the peace.

§ 484. d. Term of office of justices.—As the office of these justices is conferred by the king, so it subsists only during his pleasure; and is determinable, 1. By the demise of the crown; that is, in six months after.<sup>p</sup> But if the same justice is put in commission by the successor, he shall not be obliged to sue out a new dedimus (i. e., the writ of dedimus potestatem—we have empowered), or to swear to his qualification afresh:<sup>q</sup> nor, by reason of any new commission, to take the oaths more than once in the same reign.<sup>r</sup> 2. By express writ under the great seal,<sup>s</sup> discharging any particular person from being any longer justice. 3. By superseding the commission by writ of supersedeas, which suspends the power of all the justices, but does not totally destroy it; seeing it may be revived again by another writ, called a procedendo (proceeding). 4. By a new commission, which virtually, though silently, discharges all the former justices that are not included therein; for two commissions cannot subsist at once. 5. By acces-

<sup>a</sup> See Bishop Fleetwood's calculations in his Chronicon Pretiosum.

<sup>o</sup> Stat. 18 Geo. II. c. 20 (Justices' Qualification, 1744).

<sup>p</sup> Stat. 1 Ann. c. 8 (1702).

<sup>q</sup> Stat. 1 Geo. III. c. 13 (Justice of the Peace, 1760).

<sup>r</sup> Stat. 7 Geo. III. c. 9 (Justice of the Peace, 1766).

<sup>s</sup> Lamb. 67.

sion of the office of sheriff or coroner.<sup>t</sup> Formerly it was thought, that if a man was named in any commission of the peace, and had afterwards a new dignity conferred upon him, that this determined his office; he no longer answering the description of the commission: but now<sup>u</sup> it is provided, that, notwithstanding a new title of dignity, the justice on whom it is conferred shall still continue a justice.

§ 435. e. Jurisdiction of justices.—The power, office, and duty of a justice of the peace depend on his commission, and on the several statutes which [354] have created objects of his jurisdiction. His commission, first, empowers him singly to conserve the peace; and thereby gives him all the power of the ancient conservators at the common law, in suppressing riots and affrays, in taking securities for the peace, and in apprehending and committing felons and other inferior criminals. It also empowers any two or more to hear and determine all felonies and other offenses; which is the ground of their jurisdiction at sessions, of which more will be said in its proper place. And as to the powers given to one, two, or more justices by the several statutes, which from time to time have heaped upon them such an infinite variety of business, that few care to undertake, and fewer understand, the office; they are such and of so great importance to the public, that the country is greatly obliged to any worthy magistrate, that without sinister views of his own will engage in this troublesome service. And therefore, if a well-meaning justice makes any undesigned slip in his practice, great lenity and indulgence are shown to him in the courts of law; and there are many statutes made to protect him in the upright discharge of his office;<sup>w</sup> which, among other privileges, prohibit such justices from being sued for any oversights without notice beforehand; and stop all suits begun, on tender made of sufficient amends. But, on the other hand, any malicious or tyrannical abuse of their office is usually severely punished; and all persons who recover a verdict against a justice, for any willful or malicious injury, are entitled to double costs.

<sup>t</sup> Stat. 1 Mar. st. 1. c. 8 (1553).

<sup>u</sup> Stat. 1 Edw. VI. c. 7 (Demise of the Crown, 1547).

<sup>w</sup> Stat. 7 Jac. I. c. 5 (Public Officers: Protection, 1609). 21 Jac. I. c. 12 (Public Officers: Protection, 1623). 24 Geo. II. c. 44 (Constables: Protection, 1750).

It is impossible upon our present plan to enter minutely into the particulars of the accumulated authority, thus committed to the charge of these magistrates. I must therefore refer myself at present to such subsequent part of these Commentaries as will in their turns comprise almost every object of the justices' jurisdiction: and in the meantime recommend to the student the perusal of Mr. Lambard's Eirenarcha, and Dr. Burn's Justice of the Peace; wherein he will find everything relative to this subject, both in ancient and modern practice, collected with great care and accuracy, and disposed in a most clear and judicious method.<sup>15</sup>

[355] I shall next consider some officers of lower rank than those which have gone before, and of more confined jurisdiction; but still such as are universally in use through every part of the kingdom.

§ 486. 4. The constable.—Fourthly, then, of the constable. The word constable is frequently said to be derived from the Saxon, koning-stapel, and to signify the support of the king. But, as we borrowed the name as well as the office of constable from the French, I am rather inclined to deduce it, with Sir Henry Spelman and Dr. Cowel, from that language wherein it is plainly derived from the Latin comes stabuli (count of the stable), an officer well known in the empire; so called because, like the great constable of France, as well as the lord high constable of England, he was to regulate all matters of chivalry, tilts, tournaments, and feats of arms, which were performed on horseback. This great office of lord high constable hath been disused in England, except only upon great and solemn occasions, as the king's coronation and the like, ever since the attainder of Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, under King Henry VIII; as in France it was suppressed about a century after by an edict of Louis XIII:<sup>x</sup> but from his office, says Lambard,<sup>y</sup> this lower constableness was at first drawn and fetched, and is as it were a very finger of that hand. For x Phillips' Life of Pole. ii. 111.

y Of Constables. 5.

<sup>15</sup> The office of justice of the peace is now regulated by various statutes, such as the Justices Qualifications Act, 1875, and the Justices of the Peace Act, 1906.

the statute of Winchester,<sup>a</sup> which first appoints them, directs that, for the better keeping of the peace, two constables in every hundred and franchise shall inspect all matters relating to arms and armor.<sup>16</sup>

§ 487. a. Kinds of constables: (1) High constables; (2) Petty constables.—Constables are of two sorts, high constables, and petty constables. The former were first ordained by the statute of Winchester, as before mentioned: and are appointed at the court-leets of the franchise or hundred over which they preside, or in default of that, by the justices at their quarter sessions; and are removable by the same authority that [<sup>356</sup>] appoints them.<sup>a</sup> <sup>17</sup> The petty constables are inferior officers in every town and parish, subordinate to the high constable of the hundred, first instituted about the reign of Edw. III<sup>b</sup> (1326–1377). These petty constables have two offices united in them; the one ancient, the other modern. Their ancient office is that of headborough, tithing-man, or borsholder; of whom we formerly spoke,<sup>c</sup> and who are as ancient as the time of King Alfred: their more modern office is that of constable merely; which was appointed (as was observed) so lately as the reign of Edward III, in order to assist the high constable.<sup>d</sup> And in general the ancient headboroughs, tithing-men, and borsholders, were made use of to serve as petty constables; though not so generally, but that in many places they still continue distinct officers from the constable. They are all chosen by the jury at the court-leet; or, if no court-leet be held, are appointed by two justices of the peace.<sup>e</sup>

§ 488. b. Duties of constables.—The general duty of all constables, both high and petty, as well as of the other officers, is to keep the king's peace in their several districts; and to that pur-

<sup>a</sup> 13 Edw. I. c. 6 (1285).

<sup>a</sup> Salk. 150.

<sup>b</sup> Spelm. Gloss. 148.

<sup>c</sup> Page. 114.

<sup>d</sup> Lamb. 9.

<sup>e</sup> Stat. 14 & 15 Car. II. c. 12 (1663).

<sup>16</sup> An historical sketch of the office of constable, both in England and the United States, may be found in the case of Allor v. Wayne County Auditors, 43 Mich. 76, 4 N. W. 492.

<sup>17</sup> High constables have now almost disappeared.

pose they are armed with very large powers, of arresting, and imprisoning, of breaking open houses, and the like: of the extent of which powers, considering what manner of men are for the most part put into these offices, it is perhaps very well that they are generally kept in ignorance. One of their principal duties, arising from the statute of Winchester, which appoints them, is to keep watch and ward in their respective jurisdictions. Ward, guard, or custodia, is chiefly applied to the daytime, in order to apprehend rioters, and robbers on the highways; the manner of doing which is left to the discretion of the justices of the peace and the constable: the hundred being, however, answerable for all robberies committed therein, by daylight, for having kept negligent guard. Watch is properly applicable to the night only (being called among our Teutonic ancestors wacht or wacta †), and it [357] begins at the time when ward ends, and ends when that begins: for, by the statute of Winchester, in walled towns the gates shall be closed from sunsetting to sunrise, and watch shall be kept in every borough and town, especially in the summer season, to apprehend all rogues, vagabonds, and night-walkers, and make them give an account of themselves. The constable may appoint watchmen, at his discretion, regulated by the custom of the place; and these, being his deputies, have for the time being the authority of their principal. But, with regard to the infinite number of other minute duties, that are laid upon constables by a diversity of statutes, I must again refer to Mr. Lambard and Dr. Burn; in whose compilations may be also seen, what powers and duties belong to the constable or tithing-man indifferently, and what to the constable only: for the constable may do whatever the tithing-man may; but it does not hold e converso (conversely), the tithing-man not having an equal power with the constable.<sup>18</sup>

§ 489. 5. Surveyors of highways.—We are next to consider the surveyors of the highways. Every parish is bound of common † Dalt. Just. c. 104.

‡ Excubias et explorationes quas wactas vocant. (Watches and searches which they call wactas). Capitular. Hludov. Pii. cap. 1. A. D. 815.

<sup>18</sup> For a brief account of the modern parochial and borough police and the county constabulary, see 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 744 ff.

right to keep the high roads, that go through it, in good and sufficient repair; unless by reason of the tenure of lands, or otherwise, this care is consigned to some particular private person. From this burden no man was exempt by our ancient laws, whatever other immunities he might enjoy: this being part of the trinoda necessitas (the threefold obligation), to which every man's estate was subject; viz., expeditio contra hostem, arcium constructio, et pontium reparatio (expedition against the enemy, the construction of arsenals, and the repair of bridges). For, though the reparation of bridges only is expressed, yet that of roads also must be understood; as in the Roman law, ad instructiones reparationesque itinerum et pontium, nullum genus hominum, nulliusque dignitatis ac venerationis meritis, cessare oportet (with respect to the construction and repairing of ways and bridges, no class of men of whatever rank or dignity should be exempted).<sup>b</sup> And indeed now, for the most part, the care of the roads only seems to be left to parishes; that of bridges being in great measure devolved upon the county at large, by statute 22 Hen. VIII, c. 5 (Bridges, 1530). If the parish neglected these repairs, they might formerly, as they may still, be indicted for such their neglect: but it was not then incumbent on any particular officer to call the parish together, and [359] set them upon this work; for which reason by the statute 2 & 3 Ph. & M., c. 8 (Highways, 1555), surveyors of the highways were ordered to be chosen in every parish.<sup>1</sup>

§ 490. a. Appointment of highway surveyors.—These surveyors were originally, according to the statute of Philip and Mary, to be appointed by the constable and churchwardens of the parish; but now<sup>k</sup> they are constituted by two neighboring justices, out of such substantial inhabitants or others, as are specially described in a subsequent statute, and may have salaries allotted them for their trouble.

<sup>b</sup> C. 11. 74. 4.

<sup>1</sup> This office, Mr. Dalton (Just. cap. 50.) says exactly answers that of the curatores viarum (keepers of the ways) of the Romans: but I should guess that theirs was an office of rather more dignity and authority than ours, not only from comparing the method of making and mending the Roman ways with those of our country parishes: but also because one Thermus, who was the curator of the Flaminian way, was candidate for the consulship with Julius Cæsar. (Cic. ad Attic. l. 1. ep. 1.)

<sup>k</sup> Stat. 13 Geo. III. c. 78 (Highways, 1772).

§ 491. b. Powers and duties of highway surveyors.—Their office and duty consists in putting in execution a variety of ancient statutes for the repairs of the public highways; that is, of ways leading from one town to another: all which are now reduced into one act by statute 13 Geo. III, c. 78 (Highways, 1773), amended by 14 Geo. III, c. 14 (Turnpike Roads, 1774). By these it is enacted, 1. That they may remove all annoyances in the highways, or give notice to the owner to remove them; who is liable to penalties on noncompliance. 2. They are to call together all the inhabitants and occupiers of lands, tenements, and hereditaments within the parish, six days in every year, to labor in fetching materials or repairing the highways: all persons keeping drafts (of three horses, etc.) or occupying lands, being obliged to send a team for every draft, and for every 50*l.* a year, which they keep or occupy; persons keeping less than a draft, or occupying less than 50*l.* a year, to contribute in a less proportion; and all other persons chargeable, between the ages of eighteen and sixty-five, to work or find a laborer. But they may compound with the surveyors, at certain easy rates established by the act. And every cartway leading to any market-town must be made twenty feet wide at the least, if the fences will permit; and may be increased by two justices, at the expense of the [359] parish, to the breadth of thirty feet. 3. The surveyors may lay out their own money in purchasing materials for repairs, in erecting guide-posts, and making drains, and shall be reimbursed by a rate, to be allowed at a special sessions. 4. In case the personal labor of the parish be not sufficient, the surveyors, with the consent of the quarter sessions, may levy a rate on the parish, in aid of the personal duty, not exceeding, in any one year, together with the other highway rates, the sum of 9*d.* in the pound; for the due application of which they are to account upon oath. As for turnpikes, which are now universally introduced in aid of such rates, and the law relating to them, these depend principally on the particular powers granted in the several road acts, and upon some general provisions which are extended to all turnpike roads in the kingdom, by statute

13 Geo. III, c. 84 (1773), amended by 14 Geo. III, c. 57 and 82 (1774).<sup>19</sup>

§ 492. 6. Overseers of the poor.—I proceed, therefore, lastly, to consider the overseers of the poor; their original, appointment, and duty.

The poor of England, till the time of Henry VIII, subsisted entirely upon private benevolence, and the charity of well-disposed Christians. For, though it appears by the Mirror,<sup>1</sup> that by the common law the poor were to be “sustained by parsons, rectors of the church, and the parishioners; so that none of them die for default of sustenance”; and though by the statutes 12 Rich. II, c. 7 (1388), and 19 Hen. VII, c. 12 (Vagrancy, 1503), the poor are directed to abide in the cities or towns wherein they were born, or such wherein they had dwelt for three years (which seem to be the first rudiments of parish settlements), yet till the statute 27 Hen. VIII, c. 25 (Vagabonds, 1535), I find no compulsory method chalked out for this purpose: but the poor seem to have been left to such relief as the humanity of their neighbors would afford them. The monasteries were, in particular, their principal resource; and among other bad effects which attended the monastic institutions, it was not perhaps one of the least (though frequently esteemed quite otherwise) that they supported and [360] fed a very numerous and very idle poor, whose sustenance depended upon what was daily distributed in alms at the gates of the religious houses. But, upon the total dissolution of these, the inconvenience of thus encouraging the poor in habits of indolence and beggary was quickly felt throughout the kingdom: and abundance of statutes were made in the reign of King Henry the Eighth and his children, for providing for the poor and impotent; which, the preambles to some of them recite, had of late years greatly increased. These poor were principally of two sorts: sick and impotent, and therefore unable to work; idle and sturdy, and therefore able, but not willing, to exercise any honest employment. To provide in some measure for both of these, in and about the metropolis, Edward the Sixth founded three royal hospitals; Christ's and St. Thomas' for the relief of the impotent through infancy or sickness; and Bridewell for the punishment and employment of the vigorous and idle. But these were far from being sufficient for the care of the poor throughout the kingdom at large; and therefore, after many other fruitless experiments, by statute 43 Eliz., c. 2 (Poor Relief, 1601), overseers of the poor were appointed in every parish.

<sup>1</sup> C. 1. § 3.

<sup>19</sup> Highways and highway authorities are now governed by modern statutes. The subject is treated in 3 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 83–98.

§ 493. a. Appointment of overseers of the poor.—By virtue of the statute last mentioned, these overseers are to be nominated yearly in Easter-week, or within one month after (though a subsequent nomination will be valid<sup>m</sup>), by two justices dwelling near the parish. They must be substantial householders, and so expressed to be in the appointment of the justices.<sup>n</sup>

§ 494. b. Powers and duties of overseers of the poor.—Their office and duty, according to the same statute, are principally these: first, to raise competent sums for the necessary relief of the poor, impotent, old, blind, and such other, being poor and not able to work: and secondly, to provide work for such as are able, and cannot otherwise get employment: but this latter part of their duty, which, according to the wise regulations of that salutary statute, should go hand in hand with the other, is now most shamefully neglected. [<sup>361</sup>] However, for these joint purposes, they are empowered to make and levy rates upon the several inhabitants of the parish, by the same act of parliament; which has been further explained and enforced by several subsequent statutes.

§ 495. (1) Poor Relief Act, 1601.—The two great objects of this statute seem to have been, 1. To relieve the impotent poor, and them only. 2. To find employment for such as are able to work: and this principally by providing stocks of raw materials to be worked up at home, which perhaps might be more beneficial than accumulating all the poor in one common workhouse; a practice which tends to destroy all domestic connections (the only felicity of the honest and industrious laborer), and to put the sober and diligent upon a level, in point of their earnings, with those who are dissolute and idle. Whereas, if none were to be relieved but those who are incapable to get their livings and that in proportion to their incapacity; if no children were to be removed from their parents, but such as are brought up in rags and idleness; and if every poor man and his family were employed whenever they requested it, and were allowed the whole profits of their labor;—a spirit of cheerful industry would soon diffuse itself through every cottage; work would become easy and habitual, when absolutely necessary to their daily subsistence; and the most indigent peasant would go through his task without a murmur, if assured that he and his children (when incapable of work through infancy, age, or infirmity) would then, and then only, be entitled to support from his opulent neighbors.

<sup>m</sup> Stra. 1123.

<sup>n</sup> 2 Lord Raym. 1394.

This appears to have been the plan of the statute of Queen Elizabeth; in which the only defect was confining the management of the poor to small, parochial districts; which are frequently incapable of furnishing proper work, or providing an able director. However, the laborious poor were then at liberty to seek employment wherever it was to be had: none being obliged to reside in the places of their settlement, but such as were unable or unwilling to work; and those places of settlement being only such where they [1362] were born, or had made their abode, originally for three years,<sup>o</sup> and afterwards (in the case of vagabonds) for one year only.<sup>p</sup>

§ 496. (2) Poor Relief Act, 1662.—After the restoration a very different plan was adopted, which has rendered the employment of the poor more difficult, by authorizing the subdivisions of parishes; has greatly increased their number, by confining them all to their respective districts; has given birth to the intricacy of our poor laws, by multiplying and rendering more easy the methods of gaining settlements; and, in consequence, has created an infinity of expensive lawsuits between contending neighborhoods, concerning those settlements and removals. By the statute 13 & 14 Car. II, c. 12 (Poor Relief, 1662), a legal settlement was declared to be gained by birth; or by inhabitaney, apprenticeship, or service, for forty days: within which period all intruders were made removable from any parish by two justices of the peace, unless they settled in a tenement of the annual value of 10*l*. The frauds, naturally consequent upon this provision, which gave a settlement by so short a residence, produced the statute 1 Jac. II, c. 17 (1685), which directed notice in writing to be delivered to the parish officers, before a settlement could be gained by such residence. Subsequent provisions allowed other circumstances of notoriety to be equivalent to such notice given; and those circumstances have from time to time been altered, enlarged, or restrained, whenever the experience of new inconveniences, arising daily from new regulations, suggested the necessity of a remedy. And the doctrine of certificates was invented, by way of counterpoise, to restrain a man and his family from acquiring a new settlement by any length of residence whatever, unless in two particular excepted cases; which makes parishes very cautious of giving such certificates, and of course confines the poor at home, where frequently no adequate employment can be had.

<sup>o</sup> Stat. 19 Hen. VII. c. 12 (Vagrancy, 1503). 1 Edw. VI. c. 3 (Poor Relief, 1547). 3 Edw. VI. c. 16 (Vagrancy, 1550). 14 Eliz. c. 5 (Poor Relief, 1572).

<sup>p</sup> Stat. 39 Eliz. c. 4 (Vagrancy, 1597).

§ 497. (3) The law of settlements.—The law of settlements may be therefore now reduced to the following general heads; or, a settlement in a parish may be acquired, 1. By birth; for, wherever a child is first known <sup>[363]</sup> to be, that is always prima facie the place of settlement, until some other can be shown.<sup>a</sup> This is also generally the place of settlement of a bastard child; for a bastard having in the eye of the law no father, cannot be referred to his settlement, as other children may.<sup>b</sup> But in legitimate children, though the place of birth be prima facie the settlement, yet it is not conclusively so; for there are, 2. Settlements by parentage, being the settlement of one's father or mother: all legitimate children being really settled in the parish where their parents are settled, until they get a new settlement for themselves.<sup>c</sup> A new

<sup>a</sup> Carth. 433. Comb. 364. Salk. 485. 1 Lord Raym. 567.

<sup>b</sup> See p. 459.

<sup>c</sup> Salk. 427.

<sup>cc</sup> Salk. 528. 2 Lord Raym. 1473.

settlement may be acquired several ways; as, 3. By marriage. For a woman, marrying a man that is settled in another parish, changes her own settlement: the law not permitting the separation of husband and wife.<sup>t</sup> But if the man has no settlement, hers is suspended during his life, if he remains in England and is able to maintain her; but in his absence, or after his death, or during (perhaps) his inability, she may be removed to her old settlement.<sup>u</sup> The other methods of acquiring settlements in any parish are all reducible to this one, of forty days' residence therein: but this forty days' residence (which is construed to be lodging or lying there) must not be by fraud, or stealth, or in any clandestine manner; but accompanied with one or other of the following concomitant circumstances. The next method, therefore, of gaining a settlement, is, 4. By forty days' residence, and notice. For if a stranger comes into a parish, and delivers notice in writing of his place of abode, and number of his family, to one of the overseers (which must be read in the church and registered) and resides there unmolested for forty days after such notice, he is legally settled thereby.<sup>v</sup> For the law presumes that such a one at the time of notice is not likely to become chargeable, else he would not venture to give it; or that, in such case, the parish would take care to remove him. But there are also other circumstances equivalent to such notice: therefore, 5. Renting for a year a [364] tenement of the yearly value of ten pounds, and residing forty days in the parish, gains a settlement without notice;<sup>x</sup> upon the principle of having substance enough to gain credit for such a house. 6. Being charged to and paying the public taxes and levies of the parish (excepting those for scavengers, highways,<sup>y</sup> and windows<sup>z</sup>); and, 7. Executing, when legally appointed, any public parochial office for a whole year in the parish, as churchwarden, etc., are both of them equivalent to notice, and gain a settlement,<sup>a</sup> if coupled with

<sup>t</sup> Stra. 544.

<sup>u</sup> Foley. 249. 252. Bur. Sett. C. 370.

<sup>v</sup> Stat. 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 12 (Poor Relief, 1662). 1 Jac. II. c. 17 (1685).
3 & 4 W. & M. c. 11 (Poor Relief, 1691).

<sup>x</sup> Stat. 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 12.

<sup>y</sup> Stat. 9 Geo. I. c. 7. § 6 (Poor Relief, 1722).

<sup>z</sup> Stat. 21 Geo. II. c. 10. § 13 (Window Duties, 1747).

<sup>a</sup> Stat. 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 11.

a residence of forty days. 8. Being hired for a year, when unmarried and childless, and servng a year in the same service; and 9. Being bound an apprentice, give the servant and apprentice a settlement, without notice,<sup>b</sup> in that place wherein they serve the last forty days. This is meant to encourage application to trades, and going out to reputable services. 10. Lastly, the having an estate of one's own, and residing thereon forty days, however small the value may be, in case it be acquired by act of law or of a third person, as by descent, gift, devise, etc., is a sufficient settlement:<sup>c</sup> but if a man acquire it by his own act, as by purchase (in its popular sense, in consideration of money paid), then unless the consideration advanced, bona fide, be 30*l.* it is no settlement for any longer time than the person shall inhabit thereon.<sup>d</sup> He is in no case removable from his own property; but he shall not, by any trifling or fraudulent purchase of his own, acquire a permanent and lasting settlement.

All persons, not so settled, may be removed to their own parishes, on complaint of the overseers, by two justices of the peace, if they shall adjudge them likely to become chargeable to the parish, into which they have intruded: unless they are in a way of getting a legal settlement, as by having hired a house of 10*l.*, per annum, or living in an [365] annual service; for then they are not removable.<sup>e</sup> And in all other cases, if the parish to which they belong, will grant them a certificate, acknowledging them to be their parishioners, they cannot be removed merely because likely to become chargeable, but only when they become actually chargeable.<sup>f</sup> But such certificated person can gain no settlement by any of the means above mentioned; unless by renting a tenement of 10*l.* per annum, or by serving an annual office in the parish, being legally placed therein: neither can an apprentice or servant to such certificated person gain a settlement by such their service.<sup>g</sup>

<sup>b</sup> Stat. 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 11 (1692). 8 & 9 W. III. c. 10 (Juries, 1696). 31 Geo. II. c. 11 (Poor, 1757).

<sup>c</sup> Salk. 524.

<sup>d</sup> Stat. 9 Geo. I. c. 7 (Poor Relief, 1722).

<sup>e</sup> Salk. 472.

<sup>f</sup> Stat. 8 & 9 W. III. c. 30 (Poor Relief, 1697).

<sup>g</sup> Stat. 12 Ann. c. 18 (Poor, 1712).

These are the general heads of the laws relating to the poor, which, by the resolutions of the courts of justice thereon within a century past, are branched into a great variety. And yet, notwithstanding the pains that have been taken about them, they still remain very imperfect, and inadequate to the purposes they are designed for: a fate that has generally attended most of our statute laws, where they have not the foundation of the common law to build on. When the shires, the hundreds, and the tithings were kept in the same admirable order that they were disposed in by the great Alfred, there were no persons idle, consequently none but the impotent that needed relief: and the statute of 43 Eliz. (Poor Relief, 1601) seems entirely founded on the same principle. But when this excellent scheme was neglected and departed from, we cannot but observe with concern what miserable shifts and lame expedients have from time to time been adopted, in order to patch up the flaws occasioned by this neglect. There is not a more necessary or more certain maxim in the frame and constitution of society than that every individual must contribute his share, in order to the well-being of the community: and surely they must be very deficient in sound policy, who suffer one-half of a parish to continue idle, dissolute, and unemployed, and at length are amazed to find that the industry of the other half is not able to maintain the whole.<sup>20</sup>

<sup>20</sup> The relief of the poor is provided for by modern statutes, which are discussed in 3 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 116 ff.

OF THE PEOPLE, WHETHER ALIENS, DENIZENS, OR NATIVES.

§ 498. The people.—Having, in the eight preceding chapters treated of persons as they stand in the public relations of magistrates, I now proceed to consider such persons as fall under the denomination of the people. And herein all the inferior and subordinate magistrates, treated of in the last chapter, are included.

§ 499. Division of the people—1. Natural-born subjects. 2. Aliens.—The first and most obvious division of the people is into aliens and natural-born subjects.<sup>1</sup> Natural-born subjects are such

<sup>1</sup> Citizens.—“It is interesting to notice that these words, ‘citizen’ and ‘citizenship,’ which we use so freely and familiarly to-day as indicating membership of a self-governing state, did not have that meaning in English speech until a little more than a hundred years ago; and it is we, on this side of the water, who have given them this sense, as it is we who have given prominence to the thing for which these words now stand. The words, indeed, are very old in English usage, as one may see by his Blackstone; but they imported merely membership of a burgh or local municipal corporation. [See 5 Seld. Soc. Pub. xxxvii, lxxxv-lxxxvii, 40, 43, 55, for conciuis in 13th and 14th centuries.] The word ‘subject’ was the English representative of our present term ‘citizen.’ Our sense of it seems to have been a Gallicism; in French use (teste Rousseau) it was common enough to speak of one’s countrymen as citoyens and conciitoyens. In the Declaration of Independence we read it once: ‘He has constrained our fellow-citizens,’ etc.; and once in 1781, in the Articles of Confederation. In the treaty with France of 1778, the usual phrase is ‘subjects,’ ‘people,’ or ‘inhabitants,’ but ‘citizens’ does occur as applicable to the United States. In the treaty with Great Britain of 1782, it is used in a marked way: ‘There shall be a . . . peace between his British majesty and the said states, and between the subjects of the one and the citizens of the other.’ There was evidently felt to be an awkwardness in calling these newly emancipated republican ‘sovereigns’ of America by the old phrase of ‘subjects.’ Of course, as all know, the word was freely used in the national Constitution in 1789; and so, but less freely, in the Massachusetts Constitution of 1780; but it does not occur in the rejected constitution of 1778. I believe that it is not to be found in any of the ten state constitutions that were adopted before that of Massachusetts. In the ninth decade it seems to have become a familiar phrase. There are, however, interesting little signs, in the correspondence of the period, of a certain perplexity that was felt by foreigners at our use of the word. See, for as are born within the dominions of the crown of England; that is, within the ligeance, or as it is generally called, the allegiance of the king: and aliens, such as are born out of it.

§ 500. 3. Allegiance and fealty.—Allegiance is the tie, or ligamen, which binds the subject to the king, in return for that protection which the king affords the subject. The thing itself, or substantial part of it, is founded in reason and the nature of government; the name and the form are derived to us from our Gothic ancestors. Under the feudal system, every owner of lands held them in subjection to some superior or lord, from whom or whose ancestors the tenant or vassal had received them; and there was a mutual trust or confidence subsisting between the lord and vassal, that the lord should protect the vassal in the enjoyment of the territory he had granted him, and, on the other hand, that the vassal should be faithful to the lord and defend him against all his example, in 1784, John Adams' Works, viii, 213.—The Dawes Bill and the Indians, J. B. Thayer, 61 Atlantic Monthly, 318, n.

"In the usage of English-speaking people, the word 'citizen,' in the sense of membership of the state, is quite modern. The term "citizen," said Mr. Justice Daniel, in a dissenting opinion in Rundle v. Delaware etc. Canal Co., 14 Howard (1852), 80, 97, 14 L. Ed. 335, 342, 'will be found rarely occurring in the writers of English law.' The word is, indeed, familiar enough in our older reports, law books, and general literature as designating the member of a borough. For instance, in R. v. Hanger (1614–15), 1 Rolle, 138, the rights of 'un citizen de London,' are elaborately considered by Coke, C. J., with many references to the Year-Books. 'Sont 5 sorts de Citizens,' he says, etc. So Blackstone (1 Comm. 174): 'As for the (parliamentary) electors of citizens and burgesses, these are supposed to be the mercantile part or trading interest of the kingdom.' And in Shakespeare (As You Like It, Act II, sc. 1), when the banished duke, having proposed to 'go and kill us venison,' adds,—

'And yet it irks me the poor dappled fools,
Being native burghers in this desert city,
Should in their own confines,' etc.,— we hear just afterwards of Jaques moralizing in the forest over a wounded deer, 'left and abandoned of his velvet friends':—

'Ay, quoth Jaques,
Sweep on, you fat and greasy citizens.'

"The proper English meaning of the term 'citizen' imported membership of a borough or local municipal corporation. The usual word for a man's political relation to the monarch or the state was 'subject.' In France, the correspond-enemies. This obligation on the part of the vassal was called his fidelitas or fealty; and an oath of fealty was required, by the feudal law, to be taken by all tenants to their landlord, which is couched in almost [367] the same terms as our ancient oath of allegiance:<sup>a</sup> except that in the usual oath of fealty there was frequently a saving or exception of the faith due to a superior lord by name, under whom the landlord himself was perhaps only a tenant or vassal. But when the acknowledgment was made to the absolute superior himself, who was vassal to no man, it was no longer called the oath of fealty, but the oath of allegiance; and therein the tenant swore to bear faith to his sovereign lord, in opposition to all men, without any saving or exception: "contra omnes homines fidelitatem fecit."<sup>b</sup> Land held by this exalted species of fealty was called feudum ligium, a liege fee; the vassals homines ligii, or liege men; and the sovereign their dominus ligius, or liege lord. And when sovereign princes did homage to each other, for lands held under their respective sovereignties, a distinction was always made between simple homage, which was only an acknowledgment of tenure;<sup>c</sup> and liege homage, which included the fealty before mentioned, and the services consequent upon it. Thus when our Edward III in 1329, did homage to Philip VI of France, for his ducal dominions on that continent, it was warmly disputed of what species the homage was to be, whether liege or simple homage.<sup>d</sup> But with us in England, it becoming a settled principle of tenure, that all lands in the kingdom are holden of the king as their sovereign and lord paramount, no oath but that of fealty could ever be

<sup>a</sup> 2 Feud. 5, 6, 7.

<sup>c</sup> 7 Rep. Calvin's Case. 7.

<sup>b</sup> 2 Feud. 99.

<sup>d</sup> 2 Carte 401. Mod. Un. Hist. xxiii. 420.

---

ing phrase citoyen, concitoyen, seems to have long been familiar, in the modern sense of the word 'citizen.'

"In the Massachusetts Constitution (1780), the word occurs, but more sparingly than would be expected in a similar document now. In the Federal Constitution, prepared in 1787, it is freely used.

"It seems, then, to have been the events which happened in this country in the eighth and ninth decades of the last century which first brought the word 'citizen,' in our modern sense of it, into familiar English speech. See Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. 162, 166, 22 L. Ed. 627, 628.

"Compare 1 Blackstone's Comm. 366." 1 Thayer's Const. Cas. 459, n.—Legal Essays by JAMES BRADLEY THAYER, note 3, p. 122.

taken to inferior lords, and the oath of allegiance was necessarily confined to the person of the king alone. By an easy analogy the term of allegiance was soon brought to signify all other engagements, which are due from subjects to their prince, as well as those duties which were simply and merely territorial. And the oath of allegiance, as administered for upwards of six hundred years,* contained a promise "to be true and faithful to the king and his heirs, and truth and faith to bear of life and limb and terrene honor, and not to know or hear of any ill or damage intended him, [368] "without defending him therefrom." Upon which Sir Matthew Hale<sup>f</sup> makes this remark; that it was short and plain, not entangled with long or intricate clauses or declarations, and yet is comprehensive of the whole duty from the subject to his sovereign. But, at the revolution, the terms of this oath being thought perhaps to favor too much the notion of nonresistance, the present form was introduced by the convention parliament, which is more general and indeterminate than the former; the subject only promising "that he will be faithful and bear true allegiance to the king," without mentioning "his heirs," or specifying in the least wherein that allegiance consists. The oath of supremacy is principally calculated as a renunciation of the pope's pretended authority: and the oath of abjuration, introduced in the reign of King William,<sup>g</sup> very amply supplies the loose and general texture of the oath of allegiance; it recognizing the right of his majesty, derived under the act of settlement; engaging to support him to the utmost of the juror's power; promising to disclose all traitorous conspiracies against him: and expressly renouncing any claim of the descendants of the late pretender, in as clear and explicit terms as the English language can furnish. This oath must be taken by all persons in any office, trust, or employment; and may be tendered by two justices of the peace to any person whom they shall suspect of disaffection.<sup>h</sup> And the oath of allegiance may be tendered<sup>i</sup> to all persons above the age of twelve years, whether natives, * Mirror. c. 3. § 35. Fleta. 3. 16. Britton. c. 29. 7 Rep. Calvin's Case. 6.

<sup>f</sup> 1 Hale P. C. 63.

<sup>g</sup> Stat. 13 W. III. c. 6 (Succession to the Crown, 1701).

<sup>h</sup> Stat. 1 Geo. I. c. 13 (Succession to the Crown, 1714). 6 Geo. III. 53 (Treason, 1766).

<sup>i</sup> 2 Inst. 121. 1 Hal. P. C. 64.

denizens, or aliens, either in the court-leet of the manor, or in the sheriff's tourn, which is the court-leet of the county.<sup>2</sup>

But, besides these express engagements, the law also holds that there is an implied, original, and virtual allegiance, owing from every subject to his sovereign, antecedently to any express promise; and although the subject never swore any faith or allegiance in form. For as the king, by the very descent of the crown, is fully invested with all the rights and bound to all the duties of sovereignty, before his coronation; [269] so the subject is bound to his prince by an intrinsic allegiance, before the superinduction of those outward bonds of oath, homage and fealty; which were only instituted to remind the subject of this his previous duty, and for the better securing its performance.<sup>1</sup> The formal profession, therefore, or oath of subjection, is nothing more than a declaration in words of what was before implied in law. Which occasions Sir Edward Coke very justly to observe,<sup>1</sup> that "all subjects are equally bounden to their allegiance, as if they had taken the oath; because it is written by the finger of the law in their hearts, and the taking of the corporal oath is but an outward declaration of the same." The sanction of an oath, it is true, in case of violation of duty, makes the guilt still more accumulated, by superadding perjury to treason: but it does not increase the civil obligation to loyalty; it only strengthens the social tie by uniting it with that of religion.

§ 501. a. Natural, or perpetual allegiance.—Allegiance, both express and implied, is, however, distinguished by the law into two sorts or species, the one natural, the other local; the former being also perpetual, the latter temporary. Natural allegiance is such as is due from all men born within the king's dominions immedi-

<sup>1</sup> 1 Hal. P. C. 61.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Inst. 121.

---

<sup>2</sup> In 1868, by the Promissory Oaths Act, the former oaths of allegiance and supremacy were abolished, and a simple and comprehensive oath of allegiance was substituted. Furthermore, this oath is only exacted of aliens upon naturalization, of members of parliament, persons on acceptance of certain offices, and a few others. And an affirmation is allowed in place of an oath, and the kissing of the Book is no longer required.

ately upon their birth.<sup>m</sup> For, immediately upon their birth, they are under the king's protection; at a time too, when (during their infancy) they are incapable of protecting themselves. Natural allegiance is therefore a debt of gratitude; which cannot be forfeited, canceled, or altered, by any change of time, place or circumstance, nor by anything but the united concurrence of the legislature.<sup>n</sup> An Englishman who removes to France, or to China, owes the same allegiance to the king of England there as at home, and twenty years hence as well as now. For it is a principle of universal law,<sup>o</sup> that the natural-born subject of one prince cannot by any act of his own—no, not by swearing allegiance to another—put off or discharge his natural allegiance to the former: for this natural allegiance was intrinsic, and primitive, <sup>[370]</sup> and antecedent to the other; and cannot be divested without the concurrent act of that prince to whom it was first due. Indeed, the natural-born subject of one prince, to whom he owes allegiance, may be entangled by subjecting himself absolutely to another: but it is his own act that brings him into these straits and difficulties, of owing service to two masters; and it is unreasonable that, by such voluntary act of his own, he should be able at pleasure to unloose those bands, by which he is connected to his natural prince.

§ 502. b. Local, or temporary, allegiance.—Local allegiance is such as is due from an alien,<sup>3</sup> or stranger born, for so long time as he continues within the king's dominion and protection:<sup>p</sup>

<sup>m</sup> 7 Rep. 7.

<sup>o</sup> 1 Hal. P. C. 68.

<sup>n</sup> 2 P. Wms.

<sup>p</sup> 7 Rep. 6.

---

<sup>3</sup> Local allegiance.—Aliens resident in this country are subject to its laws, written or unwritten, whenever applicable to them. This is a consequence of the territorial applicability of all law, which has been for at least a thousand years the jus gentium of civilized states, though they have never conceded it to barbarous nations. It is expressly enacted also by a statute of 1540, 32 Hen. VIII, c. 16, 9, which may be considered common law with us. It is true of all laws imposing duty, but may be limited in the case of rights. (Kelyng, 38; Andree v. Fletcher, 2 Term Rep. 135.) It is said in a recent case that such an alien may even be guilty of treason or misprision of treason. (Carlisle v. United States, 16 Wall. 147, 21 L. Ed. 426.) A resident alien is bound by the state insolvent laws. (Von Glahn v. Varrenne, 1 Dill. 515, Fed. Cas. No. 16,994.)—HAMMOND.

and it ceases the instant such stranger transfers himself from this kingdom to another.<sup>4</sup> Natural allegiance is therefore perpetual, and local temporary only: and that for this reason, evidently founded upon the nature of government; that allegiance is a debt due from the subject, upon an implied contract with the prince, that so long as the one affords protection, so long the other will demean himself faithfully. As, therefore, the prince is always under a constant tie to protect his natural-born subjects, at all times and in all countries, for this reason their allegiance due to him is equally universal and permanent. But, on the other hand, as the prince affords his protection to an alien, only during his residence in this realm, the allegiance of an alien is confined (in point of time) to the duration of such his residence, and (in point of locality) to the dominions of the British empire. From which considerations Sir Matthew Hale<sup>a</sup> deduces this consequence, that, though there be an usurper of the crown, yet it is treason for any subject, while the usurper is in full possession of the sovereignty, to practice anything against his crown and dignity: wherefore, although the true prince regain the sovereignty, yet such attempts against the usurper (unless in defense or aid of the rightful king) have been afterwards punished with death; because of the breach of that temporary allegiance, which was due to him as king de

<sup>a</sup> 1 Hal. P. C. 60.

---

<sup>4</sup> Change of domicile.—To constitute a domicile, two things must concur: First, residence; second, the intention to remain there. (Mitchell v. United States, 21 Wall. 350, 22 L. Ed. 584.) Domicile, therefore, means more than residence. A man may be a resident of a particular locality without having his domicile there. He can have but one domicile at one and the same time, at least for the same purpose, although he may have several residences. (Per Staples, J., in Long v. Ryan, 30 Gratt. (Va.) 718.)

Two things must concur to effectuate a change of domicile: First, an actual change or removal of residence; second, an intention to make such change or removal permanent. If both of these requisites concur on point of time, the place to which removal is made becomes instantly the place of domicile, notwithstanding the party may entertain a floating intention to return at some future period. (Story on Conflict of Laws, § 46.) The leading English case is Summerville v. Summerville, 5 Ves. 760, so often reaffirmed as to be the unquestioned law. (Per Brown, J., in Doyle v. Clark, 1 Flip. 536, Fed. Cas. No. 4053, 8 Rep. 163.)—HAMMOND.

facto. And upon this footing, after Edward IV recovered the crown, which had been long [371] detained from his house by the line of Lancaster, treasons committed against Henry VI were capitally punished, though Henry had been declared an usurper by parliament.

§ 503. c. Allegiance is personal.—This oath of allegiance, or rather the allegiance itself, is held to be applicable not only to the political capacity of the king, or regal office, but to his natural person, and blood royal: and for the misapplication of their allegiance, viz., to the regal capacity or crown, exclusive of the person of the king, were the Spencers banished in the reign of Edward II (1307–1327).<sup>r</sup> And from hence arose that principle of personal attachment, and affectionate loyalty which induced our forefathers (and, if occasion required, would doubtless induce their sons) to hazard all that was dear to them, life, fortune, and family, in defense and support of their liege lord and sovereign.

This allegiance, then, both express and implied, is the duty of all the king's subjects, under the distinctions here laid down, of local and temporary, or universal and perpetual. Their rights are also distinguishable by the same criterions of time and locality; natural-born subjects having a great variety of rights, which they acquire by being born within the king's ligeance, and can never forfeit by any distance of place or time, but only by their own misbehavior: the explanation of which rights is the principal subject of the two first books of these Commentaries. The same is also in some degree the case of aliens; though their rights are much more circumscribed, being acquired only by residence here, and lost whenever they remove. I shall, however, here endeavor to chalk out some of the principal lines, whereby they are distinguished from natives, descending to further particulars when they come in course.

§ 504. 4. Rights of aliens.—An alien born may purchase lands, or other estates, but not for his own use; for the king is thereupon entitled to them.<sup>s</sup> If an alien could acquire a per-

<sup>r</sup> 1 Hal. P. C. 67.

<sup>s</sup> Co. Litt. 2.

---

<sup>s</sup> Property rights of aliens in the United States.—The common law, unmodified by statute or treaty, excludes aliens from inheriting lands in the manent property in lands, he must owe an allegiance, equally permanent with that property, to the king of England; which would probably be inconsistent with that, which he owes to his own [372] natural liege lord: besides that thereby the nation might in time be subject to foreign influence, and feel many other inconveniences. Wherefore by the civil law such contracts were also made void:† but the prince had no such advantage of forfeiture thereby, as with us in England. Among other reasons, which might be given for our constitution, it seems to be intended by way of punishment for the alien's presumption, in attempting to acquire any landed property:‡ for the vendor is not affected by it, he having † Cod. l. 11. tit. 55.

---

United States from a citizen thereof. The disabilities of aliens in respect to holding lands are removed in many of the states. In respect to some nations, treaties have given the subjects of such nations, although alien residents, the right to hold land in the United States. It is held by the supreme court of the United States that the treaty power extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our government and the governments of other nations; and that the manner in which property may be transferred, devised, or inherited is a fitting subject for such negotiation and regulation by mutual stipulations between the two countries. De Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258, 33 L. Ed. 642, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 295; Wunderle v. Wunderle, 144 Ill. 40, 19 L. R. A. 84, 33 N. E. 195. The California Act of 1913 provides that aliens not eligible to citizenship may hold lands to the extent provided by any existing treaty between the United States and such aliens' nation, and may hold land for agricultural purposes for a term not exceeding three years.

Aliens have a right to acquire personal estate and make and enforce contracts in relation to the same. Airhart v. Massieu, 98 U. S. 491, 25 L. Ed. 213; McNair v. Toler, 21 Minn. 175; Crashley v. Press Pub. Co., 179 N. Y. 27, 1 Ann. Cas. 196, 71 N. E. 258.

‡ An alien's inability to hold land.—Blackstone is at no loss for reasons why an alien should not hold land in England, but when he has to explain why the king should seize the land which aliens acquire, we feel that he is in difficulties. He suggests that this forfeiture "is intended by way of punishment for the alien's presumption in attempting to acquire any landed property." The truth seems to be that in the course of the thirteenth century our kings acquired a habit of seizing the lands of Normans and other Frenchmen. The Normans are traitors; the Frenchmen are enemies. All this will be otherwise if a permanent peace is ever established. But that permanent peace never comes, and it is always difficult to obtain a restoration of lands which the king has seized. France is the one foreign country that has to be considered in this context; Germans and Italians come here as merchants, but they have no ancestral claims resigned his right, and received an equivalent in exchange. Yet an alien may acquire a property in goods, money, and other personal estate, or may hire a house for his habitation: "for personal estate is of a transitory and movable nature; and, besides, this indulgence to strangers is necessary for the advancement of trade."<sup>7</sup> Aliens also may trade as freely as other people; only they are subject to certain higher duties at the custom-house: and there are also some obsolete statutes of Henry VIII, prohibiting alien artificers to work for themselves in this kingdom; but it is generally held that they were virtually repealed by statute 5 Eliz., c. 7 (Importation, 1562). Also an alien may bring an action concerning personal property, and may make a will, and dispose of his personal estate: "not as it is in France, where the king at the death of an alien is entitled to all he is worth, by the droit d'aubaine or jus albinatus (the right of inheriting the estate of a deceased alien),"<sup>8</sup> unless he has a peculiar exemption. When I mention

<sup>7</sup> 7 Rep. 17.

<sup>8</sup> A word derived from alibi notus. Spelm. Gl. 24.

<sup>v</sup> Lutw. 34.

---

to urge and do not want English lands, while as to Scotland, owing to the English king's claim to an overlordship or to some other reason, Balliols and Bruces hold land on both sides of the border until a long war breaks out between the two countries. To us it seems that the king's claim to seize the lands of aliens is an exaggerated generalization of his claim to seize the lands of his French enemies. Such an exaggerated generalization of a royal right will not seem strange to those who have studied the growth of the king's prerogatives. (See the apocryphal statute, Prærogativa Regis, c. 14—Statutes, i. p. 226.) Here we seem to see the king's claim growing. First we have an assertion of his right to the lands of the Normans, then we are told that this extends also to lands of certain persons born beyond the sea, and we have various readings of the clause which defines this class of persons. One version says, "those whose ancestors were in the faith of the king of France in the reign of King John." Another, "those who were not in the king's faith." In this context "foreigner" and "subject of the king of France" are for practical purposes synonymous terms. In France also the droit d'aubaine but slowly attains its full stature. (Viollet, Histoire du Droit Civil, p. 365.)—POLL. & MART., 1 Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 462.

<sup>7</sup> Now, under the Naturalization Act, 1870, real and personal property of every description may be acquired and disposed of by an alien; and a title to such property may be derived through, from, or in succession to an alien, in all respects as though he were a natural-born British subject.

<sup>8</sup> Droit d'aubaine.—The municipal laws of all European countries formerly prohibited aliens from holding real property within the territory of the

these rights of an alien, I must be understood of alien friends only, or such whose countries are in peace with ours; for alien enemies have no rights, no privileges, unless by the king's special favor, during the time of war.<sup>9</sup>

§ 505. 5. British subjects born abroad.—When I say that an alien is one who is born out of the king's dominions, or allegiance, this also must be understood with some restrictions. The common law, indeed, stood absolutely so; with only a very few exceptions; so that a particular act of parliament became necessary after the restoration,<sup>7</sup> “for the naturalization of children of his majesty's English subjects, born in foreign countries during the late [1713] troubles.” And this maxim of the law proceeded upon a general principle, that every man owes natural allegiance where he is born, and cannot owe two such allegiances, or serve two masters, at once.

<sup>7</sup> Stat. 29 Car. II. c. 6 (1677).

state. During the prevalence of the feudal system, the acquisition of property in land involved the notion of allegiance to the prince within whose dominions it lay, which might be inconsistent with that which the proprietor owed to his native sovereign. It was also during the same rude ages that the jus albinagii or droit d'aubaine was established; by which all the property of a deceased foreigner (movable or immovable) was confiscated to the use of the state, to the exclusion of his heirs, whether claiming ab intestato, or under a will of the decedent. In the progress of civilization, this barbarous and inhospitable usage has been, by degrees, almost entirely abolished. This improvement has been accomplished either by municipal regulations, or by international compacts founded upon the basis of reciprocity. Previous to the French revolution of 1789, the droit d'aubaine had been either abolished or modified by treaties between France and other states; and it was entirely abrogated by a decree of the Constituent Assembly in 1791, with respect to all nations, without exception and without regard to reciprocity. This gratuitous concession was retracted, and the subject placed on its original footing of reciprocity by the Code Napoleon, in 1803; but this part of the Civil Code was again repealed, by the Ordinance of the 14th July, 1819, admitting foreigners to the right of possessing both real and personal property in France, and of taking by succession ab intestato, or by will, in the same manner with native subjects.—WHEATON, Int. Law (4th Eng. ed.), 134.

<sup>9</sup> Right to exclude aliens.—It seems that the crown of England enjoyed at common law the right of excluding or expelling from the country any alien. Contrarily, it has been held, that an alien has not any right, enforceable by action, to enter British territory. Musgrove v. Chun Teeong Toy, [1891] App. Cas. 272. And the Aliens Act, 1905, provides for the exclusion in certain

Yet the children of the king's ambassadors born abroad were always held to be natural subjects: * for as the father, though in a foreign country, owes not even a local allegiance to the prince to whom he is sent; so, with regard to the son also, he was held (by a kind of postliminium)<sup>10</sup> to be born under the king of England's allegiance, represented by his father, the ambassador. To encourage, also, foreign commerce, it was enacted by statute 25 Edw. III, st. 2 (British Subject, 1350), that all children, born abroad, provided both their parents were at the time of the birth in allegiance to the king, and the mother had passed the seas by her husband's consent, might inherit as if born in England: and accordingly it hath been so adjudged in behalf of merchants.<sup>a</sup> But by several more modern statutes<sup>b</sup> these restrictions are still further taken off: so that all children born out of the king's ligeance, whose fathers (or grandfathers by the father's side) were natural-born subjects, are now deemed to be natural-born subjects themselves, to all intents and purposes; unless their said ancestors were attainted, or banished beyond sea, for high treason; or were at the birth of such children in the service of a prince at enmity with Great Britain. Yet so as that the grandchildren of such ancestors shall not be privileged in respect of the alien's duty, except they be Protestants, and actually reside within the realm; nor shall be enabled to claim any estate or interest, unless the claim be made within five years after the same shall accrue.

<sup>a</sup> 7 Rep. 18.

<sup>a</sup> Cro. Car. 601. Mar. 91. Jenk. Cent. 3.

<sup>b</sup> 7 Ann. c. 5 (Foreign Protestants' Naturalization, 1708). 4 Geo. II. c. 21 (British Nationality, 1730), and 13 Geo. III. c. 21 (British Nationality, 1772).

---

cases from the United Kingdom of aliens who are criminals or in destitute circumstances.

In the United States it has been held that the right to exclude or expel aliens, absolutely or upon condition, being an inherent and inalienable right of a sovereign and independent nation, Congress has the power to expel as well as to exclude undesirable immigrants. Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U. S. 698, 37 L. Ed. 905, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1016; Lem Moon Sing v. United States, 158 U. S. 538, 39 L. Ed. 1082, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 967.

<sup>10</sup> Postliminium: the return or restoration of a person to a former estate or right.

§ 506. 6. Children of aliens.—The children of aliens, born here in England, are, generally speaking, natural-born subjects, and entitled to all the privileges of such.<sup>11</sup> In which the constitution of France differs from ours; for there, by their jus albinatus, if a child be born of foreign parents, it is an alien.<sup>o</sup>

<sup>o</sup> Jenk. Cent. 3. cites treasure francois. 312.

---

<sup>11</sup> Citizens born abroad.—With the exception of those born of alien enemies who happen to hold a part of the country as enemies, it is the allegiance, not the soil, that determines. (7 Coke Rep. 18 a.) Whether a child born in the house of a foreign ambassador would be an alien or citizen seems doubtful.

The dictum of the commentator as to French law is no longer true. A child born in France of foreign parents may claim French citizenship under certain conditions. (Code Nap. I, 1, 9.) In both countries the citizenship derived by actual birth is probably now held to be conclusive if properly claimed. (See Wooddesson, Lect. 1, 231.)

Two distinct and sometimes contradictory principles lie at the foundation of the law of allegiance: (1) That children follow the parents' condition. (2) That allegiance depends on place of birth. The former is termed by Westlake (Private International Law, § 7) the Roman principle; but it seems rather to be that of the doctrine of personal law, common among all early European peoples, perhaps among the Romans in an early stage of their development as well as the rest. The latter is no doubt feudal in its origin, and dates from the time when territorial law had become the accepted rule. Westlake states (§ 16) the present English rule thus: "Legitimate children, wherever born, are regularly members of that state of which their fathers are members at the time of their birth, but may choose, if they prefer it, the nationality of their place of birth."

Vattel, sections 213, 215, also makes the father's condition the natural one of the child, though he recognizes the power of positive laws to change the rule. But the English common-law rule seems to have reversed this order, and to have made the place of birth the controlling consideration—to be overruled only by positive statutes, such as that of 25 Edw. III, st. 2, and those following, which gave citizenship to the children of English fathers born abroad. "To this day, not only are all persons born within the United Kingdom ipso facto entitled to all the civil privileges conferred by the British character, but our law holds that they cannot divest themselves of that character by any act of theirs." (Westlake, § 12; Macdonald's Case, 18 State Trials, 857; Udny v. Udny, 1 H. L. Cas. 441.) And this was the doctrine of the American courts down to a very recent period. They held to indefeasible allegiance, even while the legislature provided, and the courts themselves administered oaths of naturalization. (2 Kent, 42, 49; Wharton's Am. State Trials, 655. See Holmes' note to 2 Kent, 49.) By the common law, allegiance is not a matter of individual choice. It attaches at the time, and on account of birth, and under § 507. 7. Denizens.—A denizen is an alien born, but who has obtained ex donatione regis (by gift of the king) letters patent to make him an English subject: [374] a high and incommunicable branch of the royal prerogative.<sup>d</sup> A denizen is in a kind of middle state, between an alien and natural-born subject, and partakes of both of them. He may take lands by purchase or devise, which an alien may not; but cannot take by inheritance: * for his parent, through whom he must claim, being an alien, had no inheritable blood; and therefore could convey none to the son. And, upon a like defect of hereditary blood, the issue of a denizen, born before denization, cannot inherit to him; but his issue born after may.<sup>f</sup> A denizen is not excused<sup>e</sup> from paying the alien's duty and some

<sup>d</sup> 7 Rep. Calvin's Case. 25.

<sup>e</sup> 11 Rep. 67.

<sup>f</sup> Co. Litt. 8. Vaugh. 285.

<sup>g</sup> Stat. 22 Hen. VIII. c. 8 (Customs, 1530).

---

circumstances in which the family owe allegiance, and is entitled to protection. A person may be domiciled in one place or country, and owe allegiance to and be a citizen of another. "The fact that plaintiff's grandfather made his permanent domicile in Canada does not of itself prove him to be an alien. Even if he was regarded as a British subject, this would not necessarily make him an alien. The laws of the United States determine what persons shall be regarded as citizens, irrespective of such persons' pleasure or the laws or pleasure of any other government." (Seevers, J., in State v. Adams, 45 Iowa, 99, 101, 24 Am. Dec. 760.) A. removed to Canada in 1790. His son was born there in 1795; his grandson in 1834. The two latter came to Iowa that year, and have resided there ever since. Held, that the grandson was a citizen by virtue of the Act of 1802. (U. S. Rev. Stats. § 2172.) "Children of persons who now are, or have been citizens of the United States, shall, though born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, be considered as citizens thereof." Seevers, J., cites also as authorities, Calais v. Marshfield, 30 Me. 511; Peck v. Young, 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 613; Inglis v. Sailors' Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. 99, 7 L. Ed. 617. But this would not apply to a colored man, born of slaves who emigrated to Canada. (People v. Board of Registration of Detroit, 26 Mich. 51, 12 Am. Rep. 297.) By the common law, a child born within the allegiance of the United States is born a subject thereof, without reference to the political status or condition of its parents. (McKay v. Campbell (1871), Fed. Cas. No. 8840, 2 Saw. 118; Lynch v. Clarke, 1 Sand. Ch. (N. Y.) 583.) Aliter as to an Indian child. (Lynch v. Clarke, 1 Sand. Ch. (N. Y.) 583.) In Lynch v. Clarke, the point decided was that Julia Lynch, born in New York in 1819, of alien parents temporarily there, who returned to Ireland when she other mercantile burdens. And no denizen can be of the privy council, or either house of parliament, or have any office of trust, civil or military, or be capable of any grant of lands, etc., from the crown.<sup>b</sup>

§ 508. 8. Naturalization.—Naturalization cannot be performed but by act of parliament: for by this an alien is put in exactly the same state as if he had been born in the king's ligeance; except only that he is incapable, as well as a denizen, of being a member of the privy council, or parliament, holding offices, grants, etc.<sup>1</sup> No bill for naturalization can be received in either house of

<sup>b</sup> Stat. 12 W. III. c. 2 (Act of Settlement, 1700).

<sup>1</sup> Ibid.

---

was a few months old, was a citizen of the United States. This question is very fully argued on pages 588–637. The abandonment of the doctrine of indefeasible allegiance by England and the United States destroys the force of this reasoning, and seems to leave no presumption in favor of either the citizenship by birthplace, or that by inheritance. The American-born child of an English native subject domiciled in America is a subject of both countries. (Cranworth, L. C., in Dawson v. Jay, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 764, 772, 1853.) A man may at the same time enjoy the rights of citizenship under two governments. (Rutledge, C. J., in Talbot v. Janson, 3 Dall. 138, 169, 1 L. Ed. 543, 556.)—HAMMOND.

Elective citizenship.—A question of difficulty upon which there is now very little authority is that of the effect of choice in cases of elective citizenship. In a variety of forms, most civilized nations recognize the citizenship of all children actually born upon their soil, except those of alien enemies, without reference to the nationality of their parents. Most of them also recognize as native citizens the children of their own citizens, though born in a foreign country. This is a common-law doctrine with us, and perhaps in England, also, though the first clear recognition of it there was by the statute 25 Edw. III, c. 2, and 33 Hen. VIII, c. 25. Such children have the option of claiming either the country of their actual birth, or that of their parents as their native land. And while it is understood that this option once deliberately exercised cannot be revoked, it is far from settled what acts shall constitute such a choice of citizenship, or when it ceases to be revocable. Instances have been known of repeated changes in the citizenship claimed by a single individual, as in the command, indifferently, of English and American merchant vessels. The following cases throw some light upon it, while far from yielding a settled doctrine:

A native citizen of England, who had become a citizen of the United States, was held entitled in the latter character to trade with the East Indies, although parliament, without such disabling clause in it:’ nor without a clause disabling the person from obtaining any immunity in trade thereby, in any foreign country; unless he shall have resided in Britain for seven years next after the commencement of the session in which he is naturalized.<sup>k</sup> Neither can any person be naturalized or restored in blood unless he hath received the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper within one month before the bringing in of the bill; and unless he also takes the oaths of allegiance and supremacy in the presence of the parliament.<sup>l</sup> But these provisions have been usually dispensed with by special acts of par-

<sup>j</sup> Stat. 1 Geo. I. c. 4 (Naturalization, 1714).

<sup>k</sup> Stat. 14 Geo. III. c. 84 (Naturalization, 1774).

<sup>l</sup> Stat. 7 Jac. I. c. 2 (Naturalization and Restoration of Blood, 1609).

---

the charter of the East India company excluded him as an Englishman. The English court decided that his being a natural-born subject of England did not exclude him from the advantages by treaty as a citizen of the United States. (Wilson v. Marryat, 8 Term Rep. 31; Marryat v. Wilson [in Error], 1 Bos. & P. 430.)

A native of France, grandson of a native Englishman, and therefore entitled to English citizenship by stat. 3 Geo. III, c. 26, claimed as an Englishman, damages for confiscation of his property in France; but the judicial committee of the privy council held that he and his father had sufficiently indicated by their conduct that they elected to be citizens of France, in spite of the opinions of six eminent French lawyers to the contrary. (Drummond’s Case, 2 Knapp, 295.) The English courts have also held that naturalization abroad, with abjuration of British allegiance, did not divest one of the character of British subject, and therefore did not disqualify his (foreign-born) son or grandson from inheriting as such. (Fitch v. Weber, 6 Hare, 51.)

Although it is more than a century since the separation of the United States from England, questions are still arising as to rights to lands, honors, etc., accruing by descent, and dependent on the citizenship of parties at and after the time of separation. Rights existing before the separation were not affected by it unless actually confiscated then. By the treaty of 1794, article 9, it was stipulated that subjects of either state and their heirs should not be treated as aliens, except with reference to rights purchased after the separation. But there is an important difference in the two countries as to the date of separation. The Americans consider July 4, 1776, the English, September 3, 1783, as that date. (2 Kent, 59, and cases cited; Dawson’s Lessee v. Godfrey, 4 Cranch, 321, 2 L. Ed. 634; Harden v. Fisher, 1 Wheat. 300, 4 L. Ed. 96; Orr v. Hodgson, 4 Wheat. 453, 4 L. Ed. 613; Blight’s Lessee v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. 535, 5 L. Ed. 516; Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. 489, 6 L. Ed. 142; Read v. Read, liament, previous to bills of naturalization of any foreign princes or princesses.<sup>m 12</sup>

These are the principal distinctions between aliens, denizens, and natives: distinctions, which endeavors have been [375] frequently used since the commencement of this century to lay almost totally aside, by one general naturalization act for all foreign Protestants.

<sup>m</sup> Stat. 4 Ann. c. 1 (Land Tax, 1705). 7 Geo. II. c. 3 (Prince of Orange, 1733). 9 Geo. II. c. 24 (Princess of Wales, 1735). 4 Geo. III. c. 4 (Naturalization, 1763).

---

5 Call (Va.), 189, Hunter v. Fairfax's Devises, 1 Munf. (Va.) 218; Doe v. Mulcoster, 5 Barn. & C. 771.)

Of course the same question may arise as to the duties of such an individual to one state or the other, especially in cases of war between them. The only precedents upon this point were made under the old doctrine of indefeasible allegiance, such as the case of Aeneas Macdonald, who was tried and convicted as a traitor for assisting the Pretender in the rebellion of 1745 (18 St. Tr. 857), though carried to France in his infancy and living there all his life. Such cases can hardly be said to help us at all in settling the present doctrine, unless it be as showing the hardships to be avoided. (See, also, Dr. Storey's Case, 1 St. Tr. 1087; Dyer, 298, 300; 1 Hale P. C. 68, 96; Woolsey's International Law, § 66.)

Entirely different is the question of the divided allegiance of American citizens between the state and the Union. "Every citizen of the United States is also a citizen of a state or territory. He may be said to owe allegiance to two sovereigns, and may be liable to punishment for an infraction of the laws of either. The same act may be a transgression of the laws of both. That either or both (if they see fit) may punish such an offender, cannot be doubted; yet it cannot be truly averred that the offender has been twice punished for the same offense; but that only by one act he has committed two offenses, for each of which he is justly punishable. He could not plead the punishment by one in bar to a conviction by the other." (Moore v. People, 14 How. 13, 14 L. Ed. 306, citing as a proof that passing false coin may be an offense against both the state and the Union, Fox v. Ohio, 5 How. 432, 12 L. Ed. 223, and United States v. Marigold, 9 How. 560, 13 L. Ed. 257. See, also, People v. Kelly, 38 Cal. 145, 99 Am. Dec. 360; State v. Tuller, 34 Conn. 280; State v. Zulich, 29 N. J. L. 409.) It is not correct to say that there is concurrent jurisdiction in such a case, as said in 1 Bishop on Criminal Law (6th ed.), § 178; United States v. Doss, 11 Am. Law Reg., N. S., 320, Fed. Cas. No. 14,985.—HAMMOND.

12 Alienage and naturalization.—The present division in this country may be stated as that of aliens and citizens, whether natural born or naturalized, since the latter have all the rights of native citizens and all their political

An attempt which was once carried into execution by the statute 7 Ann., c. 5 (Foreign Protestants' Naturalization, 1708), but this, after three years' experience of it, was repealed by the statute 10 Ann., c. 5 (1711), except one clause, which was just now mentioned, for naturalizing the children of English parents born abroad. However, every foreign seaman, who in time of war serves two years on board an English ship by virtue of the king's proclamation, is ipso facto naturalized under the like restrictions as in statute 12 W. III, c. 2 (1700);<sup>a</sup> and all foreign Protestants, and Jews, upon their residing seven years in any of the American colonies, without being absent above two months at a time, and all rights, with a few exceptions, imposed by positive law. (Opinions of the Attorneys-General, art. ix, p. 360, by Black, A. G.) A native citizen only is eligible to the presidency and vice-presidency, and in a few states to the governorship, and by the navigation laws to the command of an American ship, and as to all property rights there is no distinction. Naturalization is granted under the authority of the federal government, and is recognized by all the states alike, but it may be obtained in any court of record having common-law jurisdiction, whether state or federal.

<sup>a</sup> Stat. 13 Geo. II. 3 (Supply of Seamen, 1739).

---

No such intermediate class as denizens is recognized by our law, but a distinction is made in some cases by legislation between resident and nonresident aliens. The laws of some states allow the former to hold, purchase, or inherit land and enjoy other rights of citizenship while still excluding nonresident aliens. For these distinctions reference must be made to the statutes of each state. In a few cases also resident aliens who have declared their intention of becoming citizens are allowed to vote before naturalization; but this does not make them citizens even of the particular state. It is now agreed that the power to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, given to Congress by United States Constitution, article i, section 8, is exclusive (1 Kent, 390), though some early decisions held the contrary. The alien wishing to be naturalized must have declared his intention in some court of record at least two years beforehand, and prove this by certified copy of the record, commonly called the preliminary papers. He must also prove by witnesses that he has resided within the United States five years, at least, and within the state (or territory) where the court sits, one year, and that during that time he has conducted himself as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the United States Constitution, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same. He must also take an oath that he will support the United States Constitution, and renounce all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince or state, and particularly to the prince, potentate or state of foreign Protestants serving two years in a military capacity there, or being three years employed in the whale fishery, without afterwards absenting themselves from the king's dominions for more than one year, and none of them falling within the incapacities declared by statute 4 Geo. II, c. 21 (British Nationality, 1730), shall be (upon taking the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, or in some cases, an affirmation to the same effect) naturalized to all intents and purposes, as if they had been born in this kingdom; except as to sitting in parliament or in the privy council, and holding offices or grants of lands, etc., from the crown within the kingdoms of Great Britain or Ireland.<sup>o</sup> They therefore are admissible ° Stat. 13 Geo. II. c. 7 (Naturalization, 1739). 20 Geo. II. c. 44 (Aliens, 1746). 22 Geo. II. c. 45 (1748). 2 Geo. III. c. 25 (Naturalization, 1761). 13 Geo. III. c. 25 (Naturalization, 1772).

---

which he has been a subject (naming him or it), and renounce his title of nobility, if any. (U. S. Rev. Stats., §§ 2165, 2170, 2174.)

The wife and minor children of a naturalized citizen residing in this country become citizens by the act of court admitting the husband and father. (U. S. Rev. Stats., § 2172, Act of 10 Feb., 1855; Campbell v. Gordon, 6 Cranch, 177, 3 L. Ed. 191; State v. Penney, 10 Ark. 621.) So as to the wife in England. (Stat. 7 & 8 Vict., c. 60.) If he has made the preliminary declaration but dies before admission, they are citizens. (U. S. Rev. Stats., § 2168.) But a wife may be naturalized without her husband's concurrence. (Shanks v. Dupont, 3 Pet. 248, 7 L. Ed. 669.) The preliminary declaration may be dispensed with in the case of an alien who has resided in the United States at least three years before majority (U. S. Rev. Stats., § 2167); or of one who has been in the military service of the United States and honorably discharged upon proof of one year's residence and good character. (U. S. Rev. Stats., § 2166.) This is on the same principle with an English statute of 13 Geo. II, c. 3. (See 1 Comm. 375, note n.) The admission is conclusive as a record of the facts recited, and they cannot be afterwards inquired into. (Campbell v. Gordon, 6 Cranch, 182, 3 L. Ed. 192; Stark v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 7 Cranch, 420, 3 L. Ed. 391.)

Although the United States assumed the right to naturalize foreigners from the beginning of its existence as a nation, and required of them as a condition the renunciation of all allegiance to the state or monarch of their nativity, yet for more than half a century its courts and legal writers adhered to the doctrine of indefeasible allegiance of the common law. During this time the singular spectacle was presented of a court gravely administering to a new citizen an oath to disown all allegiance to foreign powers, and especially by name to the king of Great Britain or of France, etc., as the case might be, to all other privileges, which Protestants or Jews born in this kingdom are entitled to. What those privileges are, with respect to Jews<sup>p</sup> in particular, was the subject of very high debates about the time of the famous Jew bill,<sup>q</sup> which enabled all Jews to prefer bills of naturalization in parliament, without receiving the sacraand certifying that he had thus become a citizen of the United States, and no longer one of his native kingdom, and at the same session, perhaps, deciding in a litigated case that such oaths were invalid, and that no man could cast off his natural allegiance. This inconsistency, however, has now been cured by the adoption of a more liberal doctrine.

<sup>p</sup> A pretty accurate account of the Jews till their banishment in 8 Edw. I. may be found in Molloy De Jure Maritimo, b. 3. c. 6.

<sup>q</sup> Stat. 26 Geo. II. c. 26 (Naturalization of Jews, 1753).

---

England also has finally abandoned the older doctrine and recognized the right of expatriation. Neither country, probably, would hold the right to be an absolute one, exercisable at the pleasure of the individual in the midst of a foreign war, or while in a position of trust and responsibility. But the extent of such exceptions is yet to be determined by actual decisions. The speculations upon this subject of writers upon public law give some hint of what the decisions may be, but are not authoritative.

On this much discussed and unsettled subject, see Sharswood's and Cooley's notes to this passage in their editions; 1 Kent. Comm. Lect. 4; 2 Kent. Comm. Lect. 25; Bowyer on Public Law, p. 152; Vattel, lib. 1. c. 19, §§ 220-228 (a very full discussion of the question on principle, maintaining the existence of the right wherever a good reason exists, but not absolutely); Woolsey's International Law, § 66; Wheaton's International Law, Dana's note, 49; Phillimore's International Law, vol. 1, 350-354; New Am. Cyclopedia, art. "Naturalization"; Marcy to Sartiges, Senate Ex. Doc. No. 9, Feb. 26, 1857; Marcy to Hulsemann, Senate Ex. Doc. Nos. 1 and 41 (33d Cong.), Sept., 1853; Story on Constitution, note to § 1104; Rawle on Constitution, c. 9, pp. 85-101; Sergeant's Const. Law, c. 30, pp. 318-322; note to Williams' Case, Wharton's Am. State Trials, 655. (The note to this contains the fullest collection of references to decisions bearing on the question, pp. 654-658.) The earlier doctrine of indefeasible allegiance is supported in Foster Cr. Law, 184; 1 Kent, 42; Doe v. Acklon, 2 Barn. & C. 779; Williams' Case, Wharton Am. St. Tr. 652; Inglis v. Sailors' Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. 99, 7 L. Ed. 617; Shanks v. Dupont, 3 Pet. 242, 7 L. Ed. 666. The better doctrine was sustained by foreign jurists much earlier. (Puffendorf, lib. 8, 2, § 11, etc.; Grotius De Jure B. et P., lib. 2, 5, 24; Burlamaqui, vol. 2, 5, 13; Vattel, lib. 1, § 223, etc.) It was early advocated in America. (Tucker's Blackstone, vol. 2, App. 90; Talbot v. Janson, 3 Dall. 152, 1 L. Ed. 549; Murray v. The Charming Betsy, 2 Cranch, 64, 2 L. Ed. 208; The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. 347, 5 L. Ed. 470; Murray v. McCarty, 2 Munf. (Va.)

ment, as ordained by statute 7 Jac. I (1609). It is not my intention to revive this controversy again; for the act lived only a few months, and was then repealed:† therefore peace be now to its manes.

† Stat. 27 Geo. II. c. 1 (Naturalization of Jews, 1754).

---

396; Branch v. Bowman, 2 Leigh (Va.), 170; Stoughton v. Taylor, 2 Paine, 652, Fed. Cas. No. 7558.)

As the law stood before 1870, every person born within the British dominions, though he should be removed in infancy to another country where his family resides, owes an allegiance to the British crown which he could never resign or lose except by act of parliament, or by the recognition of the independence, or the cession of the portion of British territory in which he resided. By the Naturalization Act, 1870, 33 & 34 Vict., c. 14, it was made possible for British subjects to renounce their nationality and allegiance, and the ways in which that nationality is lost are defined. So British subjects voluntarily naturalized in a foreign state are deemed aliens from the time of such naturalization, unless, in the case of persons naturalized before the passing of the act, they have declared their desire to remain British subjects, within two years from the passing of the act. Persons who from having been born within British territory are British subjects, but who at birth became under the law of any foreign state subjects of such state, and also persons who, though born abroad, are British subjects by reason of parentage, may by declarations of alienage get rid of British nationality. (Ency. Britannica, art. "Allegiance," vol. 1, p. 589.)—HAMMOND.

§ 509. The clergy.—The people, whether aliens, denizens, or natural-born subjects, are divisible into two kinds; the clergy and laity: the clergy, comprehending all persons in holy orders, and in ecclesiastical offices, will be the subject of the following chapter.

§ 510. Privileges and disabilities of the clergy.—This venerable body of men, being separate and set apart from the rest of the people, in order to attend the more closely to the service of Almighty God, have thereupon large privileges allowed them by our municipal laws: and had formerly much greater, which were abridged at the time of the Reformation on account of the ill use which the popish clergy had endeavored to make of them. For, the laws having exempted them from almost every personal duty, they attempted a total exemption from every secular tie. But it is observed by Sir Edward Coke,<sup>a</sup> that, as the overflowing of waters doth many times make the river to lose its proper channel, so in times past ecclesiastical persons, seeking to extend their liberties beyond their true bounds, either lost or enjoyed not those which of right belonged to them. The personal exemptions do indeed for the most part continue. A clergyman cannot be compelled to serve on a jury, nor to appear at a court-leet or view of frank-pledge; which almost every other person is obliged to do;<sup>b</sup> but if a layman is summoned on a jury, and before the trial takes orders, he shall notwithstanding appear and be sworn.<sup>c</sup> Neither can he be [377] chosen to any temporal office; as bailiff, reeve, constable, or the like: in regard of his own continual attendance on the sacred function.<sup>d</sup> During his attendance on divine service he is privileged from arrests in civil suits.<sup>e</sup> In cases also of felony, a clerk in orders shall have the benefit of his clergy, without being branded

<sup>a</sup> 2 Inst. 4.

<sup>b</sup> F. N. B. 160. 2 Inst. 4.

<sup>c</sup> 4 Leon. 190.

<sup>d</sup> Finch. L. 88.

<sup>e</sup> Stat. 50 Edw. III. c. 5 (1376). 1 Rich. II. c. 16 (1377).

in the hand; and may likewise have it more than once; in both which particulars he is distinguished from a layman.<sup>f</sup> But as they have their privileges, so also they have their disabilities, on account of their spiritual avocations. Clergymen, we have seen,<sup>g</sup> are incapable of sitting in the house of commons; and by statute 21 Hen. VIII, c. 13 (Clergy, 1529), are not (in general) allowed to take any lands or tenements to farm, upon pain of 10*l.* per month, and total avoidance of the lease; nor upon like pain to keep any tan-house or brew-house; nor shall engage in any manner of trade, nor sell any merchandise, under forfeiture of the treble value. Which prohibition is consonant to the canon law.

§ 511. Ecclesiastical orders.—In the frame and constitution of ecclesiastical polity there are divers ranks and degrees: which I shall consider in their respective order, merely as they are taken notice of by the secular laws of England; without intermeddling with the canons and constitutions, by which the clergy have bound themselves. And under each division I shall consider, 1. The method of their appointment; 2. Their rights and duties; and 3. The manner wherein their character or office may cease.

§ 512. 1. Archbishops and bishops: appointment.—An archbishop or bishop is elected by the chapter of his cathedral church, by virtue of a license from the crown. Election was, in very early times, the usual mode of elevation to the episcopal chair throughout all Christendom; and this was promiscuously performed by the laity as well as the clergy;<sup>h</sup> till at length it becoming tumultuous, the [378] emperors and other sovereigns of the respective kingdoms of Europe took the appointment in some degree into their own hands; by reserving to themselves the right of confirming these elections, and of granting investiture of the temporalities, which now began almost universally to be annexed to this spiritual dignity; without which confirmation and investiture the elected

<sup>f</sup> 2 Inst. 637. Stat. 4 Hen. VII. c. 13 (Benefit of Clergy, 1488), and 1 Edw. VI. c. 12 (Criminal Law, 1547).

<sup>g</sup> Page 175.

<sup>h</sup> Per clericum et populum. (By the clergy and people.) Palm. 25. 2 Roll. Rep. 102. M. Paris. A. D. 1095.

bishop could neither be consecrated nor receive any secular profits. This right was acknowledged in the Emperor Charlemagne, A. D. 773, by Pope Hadrian I, and the Council of Lateran,<sup>1</sup> and universally exercised by other Christian princes: but the policy of the court of Rome at the same time began by degrees to exclude the laity from any share in these elections, and to confine them wholly to the clergy, which at length was completely effected; the mere form of election appearing to the people to be a thing of little consequence, while the crown was in possession of an absolute negative, which was almost equivalent to a direct right of nomination. Hence the right of appointing to bishoprics is said to have been in the crown of England<sup>k</sup> (as well as other kingdoms in Europe) even in the Saxon times; because the rights of confirmation and investiture were in effect (though not in form) a right of complete donation.<sup>l</sup> But when, by length of time, the custom of making elections by the clergy only was fully established, the popes began to except to the usual method of granting these investitures, which was per annulum et baculum (by the ring and staff), by the prince's delivering to the prelate a ring, and pastoral staff or crosier; pretending, that this was an encroachment on the church's authority, and an attempt by these symbols to confer a spiritual jurisdiction: and Pope Gregory VII, towards the close of the eleventh century, published a bull of excommunication against all princes who should dare to confer investitures, and all prelates who should venture to receive them.<sup>m</sup> This was a bold step towards effecting the plan then adopted [<sup>379</sup>] by the Roman see, of rendering the clergy entirely independent of the civil authority: and long and eager were the contests occasioned by this papal <sup>1</sup> Decret. 1 dist. 63. c. 22.

<sup>k</sup> Palm. 28.

<sup>l</sup> "Nulla electio prælatorum (sunt verba Ingulphi) erat mere libera et canonica; sed omnes dignitates tam episcoporum, quam abbatum, per annulum et baculum regis curia pro sua complacencia conferebat." Penes clericos et monachos fuit electio, sed electum a rege postulabant. ("There was no election of prelates [says Ingulphus] purely free and canonical; but the king's court granted all dignities at its pleasure, as well of bishops as abbots, by the ring and the staff." The election was in the power of the clergy and monks, but they requested election by the king.) Selden, Jan. Angl. 1. 1. § 39.

<sup>m</sup> Decret. 2. caus. 16. qu. 7. c. 12 & 13.

claim. But at length, when the Emperor Henry V agreed to remove all suspicion of encroachment on the spiritual character, by conferring investitures for the future per sceptrum (by the scepter) and not per annulum et baculum (by the ring and staff); and when the kings of England and France consented also to alter the form in their kingdoms, and receive only homage from the bishops for their temporalities, instead of investing them by the ring and crosier; the court of Rome found it prudent to suspend for awhile its other pretensions.<sup>a</sup>

This concession was obtained from King Henry the First in England, by means of that obstinate and arrogant prelate, Archbishop Anselm:° but King John (about a century afterwards) in order to obtain the protection of the pope against his discontented barons, was also prevailed upon to give up by a charter, to all the monasteries and cathedrals in the kingdom, the free right of electing their prelates, whether abbots or bishops: reserving only to the crown the custody of the temporalities during the vacancy; the form of granting a license to elect (which is the original of our conge d' eslire—permission to elect), on refusal whereof the electors might proceed without it; and the right of approbation afterwards, which was not to be denied without a reasonable and lawful cause.<sup>p</sup> This grant was expressly recognized and confirmed in King John's magna carta,<sup>q</sup> and was again established by statute 25 Edw. III, st. 6, sec. 3 (Benefices, 1352).

But by statute 25 Hen. VIII, c. 20 (Annates, 1534), the ancient right of nomination was, in effect, restored to the crown: it being enacted that, at every future avoidance of a bishopric, the king may send the dean and chapter his usual license to proceed to election; which is always to be accompanied with a letter missive from the king, containing the name of the person whom he would have them elect: and, if the dean and chapter delay their election above twelve days, the <sup>[380]</sup> nomination shall devolve to the king, who may by letters patent appoint such person as he pleases. This election or nomination, if it be of a bishop, must be signified by the

<sup>a</sup> Mod. Un. Hist. xxv. 363. xxix. 115.

° M. Paris. A. D. 1107.

<sup>p</sup> M. Paris. A. D. 1214. 1 Rym. Fœd. 198.

<sup>q</sup> Cap. 1. edit. Oxon. 1759.

king's letters patent to the archbishop of the province; if it be of an archbishop, to the other archbishop and two bishops, or to four bishops; requiring them to confirm, invest, and consecrate the person so elected: which they are bound to perform immediately, without any application to the See of Rome. After which the bishop-elect shall sue to the king for his temporalities, shall make oath to the king and none other, and shall take restitution of his secular possessions out of the king's hands only. And if such dean and chapter do not elect in the manner by this act appointed, or if such archbishop or bishop do refuse to confirm, invest, and consecrate such bishop-elect, they shall incur all the penalties of a præmunire.<sup>1</sup>

§ 513. a. Rights and duties of archbishops.—An archbishop is the chief of the clergy in a whole province;<sup>2</sup> and has the inspection of the bishops of that province, as well as of the inferior clergy, and may deprive them on notorious cause.<sup>r</sup> The archbishop has also his own diocese, wherein he exercises episcopal jurisdiction; as in his province he exercises archiepiscopal. As archbishop, he, upon receipt of the king's writ, calls the bishops and clergy of his province to meet in convocation: but without the king's writ he cannot assemble them.<sup>s</sup> To him all appeals are made from inferior jurisdictions within his province; and, as an appeal lies from the bishop in person to him in person, so it also lies from the consistory courts of each diocese to his archiepiscopal court. During the vacancy of any see in his province, he is guardian of the spiritualities thereof, as the king is of the temporalities; and he executes all ecclesiastical jurisdiction therein. If an archiepiscopal see be vacant, the dean and chapter are the spiritual guardians, ever since the office of prior of Canterbury was abolished at the Reformation.<sup>t</sup> The archbishop is entitled to present by

<sup>r</sup> Lord. Raym. 541.

<sup>t</sup> 2 Roll. Abr. 22.

<sup>s</sup> 4 Inst. 322, 323.

<sup>1</sup> The penalties of a præmunire involves the loss of all civil rights, with forfeiture of lands, goods, and chattels, and imprisonment during the royal pleasure.

<sup>2</sup> There are two archbishops for England and Wales, namely, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Archbishop of York.

lapse to all the ecclesiastical livings in the disposal of his [381] diocesan bishops, if not filled within six months. And the archbishop has a customary prerogative, when a bishop is consecrated by him, to name a clerk or chaplain of his own to be provided for by such suffragan bishop; in lieu of which it is now usual for the bishop to make over by deed to the archbishop, his executors and assigns, the next presentation of such dignity or benefice in the bishop's disposal within that see, as the archbishop himself shall choose; which is therefore called his option:▪ which options are only binding on the bishop himself who grants them, and not on his successors. The prerogative itself seems to be derived from the legatine power formerly annexed by the popes to the metropolitan of Canterbury.¶ And we may add, that the papal claim itself (like most others of that encroaching see) was probably set up in imitation of the imperial prerogative called primæ or primariæ preces (first prayers, or suits); whereby the emperor exercises, and hath immemorially exercised,▪ a right of naming to the first prebend that becomes vacant after his accession in every church of the empire.¶ A right that was also exercised by the crown of England in the reign of Edward I;▪ and which probably gave rise to the royal corodies, which were mentioned in a former chapter.¶ It is likewise the privilege, by custom, of the archbishop of Canterbury, to crown the kings and queens of this kingdom. And he hath also by the statute 25 Hen. VIII, c. 21 (Peter-pence, 1534), the power of granting dispensations in any case, not contrary to the holy scriptures and the law of God, where the pope used formerly to grant them: which is the foundation of his grant-▪ Cowell's Interp. tit. Option.

¶ Sherlock of Options. 1.

▪ Goldast. Constit. Imper. tom. 3. pag. 406.

¶ Dufresne. V. 806. Mod. Univ. Hist. xxix. 5.

▪ Rez, etc., salutem. Scribatis episcopo Karl. quod—Roberto de Icard pensionem suam, quam ad preces regis prædicto Roberto concessit, de cætero solvat; et de proxima ecclesia vacatura de collatione prædicti episcopi, quam ipse Robertus acceptaverit, respiciat. (The king, etc., sends greeting. That you write to the Bishop of Carlisle, that he henceforth pay to Robert de Icard the pension which he granted to the said Robert at the desire of the king: and that the aforesaid bishop see that the said Robert be appointed to the next church vacancy in his collation.) Brev. 11 Edw. I (1283), 3 Pryn. 1264.

▪ C. 8, page 283.

ing special licenses, to marry at any place or time, to hold two livings, and the like: and on this also is founded the right he exercises of conferring degrees, in prejudice of the two universities.<sup>b</sup>

§ 514. b. Rights and duties of bishops.—<sup>[382]</sup> The power and authority of a bishop, besides the administration of certain holy ordinances peculiar to that sacred order, consist principally in inspecting the manners of the people and clergy, and punishing them in order to reformation, by ecclesiastical censures. To this purpose he has several courts under him, and may visit at pleasure every part of his diocese. His chancellor is appointed to hold his courts for him, and to assist him in matters of ecclesiastical law; who, as well as all other ecclesiastical officers, if lay or married, must be a doctor of the civil law, so created in some university.<sup>c</sup> It is also the business of a bishop to institute, and to direct induction, to all ecclesiastical livings in his diocese.

§ 515. c. Expiration of office of archbishops and bishops.—Archbishoprics and bishoprics may become void by death, deprivation for any very gross and notorious crime, and also by resignation. All resignations must be made to some superior.<sup>d</sup> Therefore, a bishop must resign to his metropolitan; but the archbishop can resign to none but the king himself.

§ 516. Dean and chapter.—A dean and chapter are the council of the bishop, to assist him with their advice in affairs of religion, and also in the temporal concerns of his see.<sup>e</sup> When the rest of the clergy were settled in the several parishes of each diocese (as hath formerly<sup>f</sup> been mentioned) these were reserved for the celebration of divine service in the bishop's own cathedral; and the chief of them, who presided over the rest, obtained the name of decanus or dean, being probably at first appointed to superintend ten canons or prebendaries.

All ancient deans are elected by the chapter, by conge d' eslire (permission to elect) from the king, the letters missive of recom-

<sup>b</sup> See the Bishop of Chester's Case, Oxon. 1721.

<sup>c</sup> Stat. 37 Hen. VIII. c. 17 (Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, 1545).

<sup>d</sup> Gibs. Cod. 822.

<sup>e</sup> 3 Rep. 75. Co. Litt. 103, 300.

<sup>f</sup> Pages 112, 113.

mendation, in the same manner as bishops: but in those chapters, that were founded by Henry VIII out of the spoils of the dissolved monasteries, the deanery is donative, and the installation [383] merely by the king's letters patent.<sup>e</sup> The chapter, consisting of canons or prebendaries, are sometimes appointed by the king, sometimes by the bishop, and sometimes elected by each other.

The dean and chapter are, as was before observed, the nominal electors of a bishop. The bishop is their ordinary and immediate superior; and has, generally speaking, the power of visiting them, and correcting their excesses and enormities. They had also a check on the bishop at common law: for till the statute 32 Hen. VIII, c. 28 (Leaseholds, 1540), his grant or lease would not have bound his successors, unless confirmed by the dean and chapter.<sup>h</sup>

Deaneries and prebends may become void, like a bishopric, by death, by deprivation, or by resignation to either the king or the bishop.<sup>i</sup> Also I may here mention, once for all, that if a dean, prebendary, or other spiritual person be made a bishop, all the preferments of which he was before possessed are void; and the king may present to them in right of his prerogative royal. But they are not void by the election, but only by the consecration.<sup>j</sup>

§ 517. 3. Archdeacons.—An archdeacon hath an ecclesiastical jurisdiction, immediately subordinate to the bishop, throughout the whole of his diocese, or in some particular part of it. He is usually appointed by the bishop himself; and hath a kind of episcopal authority, originally derived from the bishop, but now independent and distinct from his.<sup>k</sup> He therefore visits the clergy; and has his separate court for punishment of offenders by spiritual censures, and for hearing all other causes of ecclesiastical cognizance.

§ 518. 4. Rural deans.—The rural deans are very ancient officers of the church,<sup>l</sup> but almost grown out of use; though their

<sup>e</sup> Gibs. Cod. 173.

<sup>h</sup> Co. Litt. 103.

<sup>i</sup> Plowd. 498.

<sup>j</sup> Bro. Abr. t. Presentation. 3. 61. Cro. Eliz. 542. 790. 2 Roll. Abr. 352
4 Mod. 200. Salk. 137.

<sup>k</sup> 1 Burn. Eccl. Law. 68, 69.

<sup>l</sup> Kennet. Par. Antiq. 633.

deaneries still subsist as an ecclesiastical division of the diocese, or archdeaconry. They seem to have been deputies of the [384] bishop, planted all round his diocese, the better to inspect the conduct of the parochial clergy, to inquire into and report dilapidations, and to examine the candidates for confirmation; and armed, in minuter matters, with an inferior degree of judicial and coercive authority.<sup>m</sup>

§ 519. 5. Parsons and vicars.—The next, and indeed the most numerous, order of men in the system of ecclesiastical polity, are the parsons<sup>3</sup> and vicars of churches: in treating of whom I shall first mark out the distinction between them; shall next observe the method by which one may become a parson or vicar; shall then briefly touch upon their rights and duties; and shall, lastly, show how one may cease to be either.

A parson, persona ecclesiæ, is one that hath full possession of all the rights of a parochial church. He is called parson, persona, because by his person the church, which is an invisible body, is represented; and he is in himself a body corporate, in order to protect and defend the rights of the church (which he personates) by a perpetual succession.<sup>n</sup> He is sometimes called the rector, or governor, of the church: but the appellation of parson (however it may be depreciated by familiar, clownish, and indiscriminate use), is the most legal, most beneficial, and most honorable title that a parish priest can enjoy; because such a one (Sir Edward Coke observes), and he only, is said vicem seu personam ecclesiæ gerere (to represent the church). A parson has, during his life, the freehold in himself of the parsonage house, the glebe, the tithes, and other dues. But these are sometimes appropriated; that is to say, the benefice is perpetually annexed to some spiritual corporation, either sole or aggregate, being the patron of the living; whom the law esteems equally capable of providing for the service of the church, as any single private clergyman. This contrivance seems to have sprung from the policy of the monastic orders, who have never been deficient in subtle inventions for the increase of their own power and emoluments. At the first establishment of parochial clergy, the tithes of the parish were distributed in a fourfold division; one for the use of the bishop, another for maintaining (385) the fabric of the church, a third for the poor, and the fourth to provide for the incumbent. When the sees of the bishops became otherwise amply endowed, they were prohibited from demanding their usual share of these tithes, and the division was into three parts only. And hence it was inferred by the monasteries that a small part was sufficient for the officiating priest; and that the remainder might well be applied to the use of their own fraternities (the endowment of which was construed to be a work of the most exalted piety), subject to the burden of repairing the church and providing for its constant supply. And therefore they begged and bought, for masses and obits, and sometimes even for money, all the advowsons within their reach, and then appropriated the benefices to the use of their own corporation. But, in order to complete such appropriation effectually, the king's license, and consent of the bishop, must first be obtained: because both the king and the bishop may sometime or other have an interest, by lapse, in the presentation to the benefice; which can never happen if it be appropriated to the use of a corporation, which never dies: and also because the law reposes a confidence in them, that they will not consent to anything that shall be to the prejudice of the church. The consent of the patron also is necessarily implied, because (as was before observed) the appropriation can be originally made to none, but to such spiritual corporation, as is also the patron of the church; the whole being indeed nothing else but an allowance for the patrons to retain the tithes and glebe in their own hands, without presenting any clerk, they themselves undertaking to provide for the service of the church.<sup>o</sup> When the appropriation is thus made, the appropriators and their successors are perpetual parsons of the church; and must sue and be sued, in all matters concerning the rights of the church, by the name of parsons.<sup>p</sup>

<sup>m</sup> Gibs. Cod. 972. 1550.

<sup>n</sup> Co. Litt. 300.

<sup>3</sup> Parsons are now regularly called "rectors."

This appropriation may be severed, and the church become disappropriate, two ways: as, first, if the patron or appropriator presents a clerk, who is instituted and inducted to the parsonage: for the incumbent so instituted and inducted is to all intents and purposes complete parson; and the appropriation, [386] being once severed, can never be reunited again, unless by a repetition of the same solemnities.<sup>a</sup> And, when the clerk so presented is distinct from the vicar, the rectory thus vested in him becomes what is called a sinecure; because he hath no cure of souls, having a vicar under him to whom that cure is committed.<sup>r</sup> Also, if the corporation which has the appropriation is dissolved, the parsonage becomes disappropriate at common law; because the perpetuity of person is gone, which is necessary to support the appropriation.

<sup>o</sup> Plowd. 496-500.

<sup>p</sup> Hob. 307.

In this manner, and subject to these conditions, may appropriations be made at this day: and thus were most, if not all, of the appropriations at present existing originally made; being annexed to bishoprics, prebends, religious houses, nay, even to nunneries, and certain military orders, all of which were spiritual corporations. At the dissolution of monasteries by statutes 27 Hen. VIII, c. 28 (Religious Houses, 1536), and 31 Hen. VIII, c. 13 (Religious Houses, 1539), the appropriations of the several parsonages, which belonged to those respective religious houses (amounting to more than one-third of all the parishes in England<sup>s</sup>) would have been by the rules of the common law disappropriated, had not a clause in those statutes intervened, to give them to the king in as ample a manner as the abbots, etc., formerly held the same, at the time of their dissolution. This, though perhaps scarcely defensible, was not without example; for the same was done in former reigns, when the alien priories (that is, such as were filled by foreigners only) were dissolved and given to the crown.<sup>t</sup> And from these two roots have sprung all the lay appropriations or secular parsonages, which we now see in the kingdom; they having been afterwards granted out from time to time by the crown.<sup>u</sup>

These appropriating corporations, or religious houses, were wont to depute one of their own body to perform divine service, and

<sup>a</sup> Co. Litt. 46.

<sup>r</sup> Sinecures might also be created by other means. 2 Burn. Eccl. Law. 347.

<sup>s</sup> Seld. Review of Tith. c. 9. Spelm. Apology. 35.

<sup>t</sup> 2 Inst. 584.

<sup>u</sup> Sir H. Spelman (of Tithes, c. 29) says these are now called impropriations as being improperly in the hands of laymen.

administer the sacraments, in those parishes of which the society was thus the parson. This officiating <sup>[387]</sup> minister was in reality no more than a curate, deputy, or vicegerent of the appropriator, and therefore called vicarius or vicar. His stipend was at the discretion of the appropriator, who was, however, bound of common right to find somebody, qui illi de temporalibus, episcopo de spiritualibus, debeat respondere (who should answer to him concerning temporal, to the bishop concerning spiritual, affairs).<sup>v</sup> But this was done in so scandalous a manner, and the parishes suffered so much by the neglect of the appropriators, that the legislature was forced to interpose: and accordingly it is enacted by statute 15 Rich. II, c. 6 (Benefices, 1391), that in all appropriations of churches, the diocesan bishop shall ordain (in proportion to the value of the church) a competent sum to be distributed among the poor parishioners annually; and that the vicarage shall be sufficiently endowed. It seems the parish were frequently sufferers, not only by the want of divine service, but also by withholding those alms, for which, among other purposes, the payment of tithes was originally imposed: and therefore in this act a pension is directed to be distributed among the poor parochians, as well as a sufficient stipend to the vicar. But he, being liable to be removed at the pleasure of the appropriator, was not likely to insist too rigidly on the legal sufficiency of the stipend: and therefore by statute 4 Hen. IV, c. 12 (Benefices, 1402), it is ordained, that the vicar shall be a secular person, not a member of any religious house; that he shall be vicar perpetual, not removable at the caprice of the monastery; and that he shall be canonically instituted and inducted, and be sufficiently endowed, at the discretion of the ordinary, for these three express purposes, to do divine service, to inform the people, and to keep hospitality. The endowments in consequence of these statutes have usually been by a portion of the glebe, or land, belonging to the parsonage, and a particular share of the tithes, which the appropriators found it most troublesome to collect, and which are therefore generally called privy or small tithes; the greater, or predial, tithes being still reserved to their own use. But one and the same rule was not observed in the endowment of all vicarages. Hence some are more liberally, and some more scantily, endowed: and hence the tithes of many things, as wood in particular, are in some parishes rectorial, and in some vicarial tithes.

<sup>v</sup> Seld. Tith. c. 11. 1.

[388] The distinction, therefore, of a parson and vicar is this: the parson has for the most part the whole right to all the ecclesiastical dues in his parish; but a vicar has generally an appropriator over him, entitled to the best part of the profits, to whom he is in effect perpetual curate, with a standing salary. Though in some places the vicarage has been considerably augmented by a large share of the great tithes; which augmentations were greatly assisted by the statute 29 Car. II, c. 8 (Benefices, 1677), enacted in favor of poor vicars and curates, which rendered such temporary augmentations (when made by the appropriators) perpetual.

§ 520. a. Holy orders.—The method of becoming a parson or vicar is much the same. To both there are four requisites necessary: holy orders; presentation; institution; and induction. The method of conferring the holy orders of deacon and priest, according to the liturgy and canons,* is foreign to the purpose of these Commentaries; any further than as they are necessary requisites to make a complete parson or vicar. By common law a deacon, of any age, might be instituted and inducted to a parsonage or vicarage: but it was ordained by statute 13 Eliz., c. 12 (Church Discipline, 1571), that no person under twenty-three years of age, and in deacon's orders, should be presented to any benefice with cure; and if he were not ordained priest within one year after his induction, he should be ipso facto deprived: and now, by statute 13 & 14 Car. II, c. 4 (Act of Uniformity, 1662), no person is capable to be admitted to any benefice, unless he hath been first ordained a priest; and then he is, in the language of the law, a clerk in orders. But if he obtains orders, or a license to preach, by money or corrupt practices (which seems to be the true, though not the common, notion of simony), the person giving such orders forfeits 40*l.* and the person receiving 10*l.*, and is incapable of any ecclesiastical preferment for seven years afterwards.

* See 2 Burn. Eccl. Law. 103.

† Stat. 31 Eliz. c. 6 (Benefices, 1588).

§ 521. b. Presentation.—Any clerk may be presented<sup>a</sup> to a parsonage or vicarage; that is, the patron, to whom the advowson of the church [389] belongs, may offer his clerk to the bishop of the diocese to be instituted. Of advowsons, or the right of presentation, being a species of private property, we shall find a more convenient place to treat in the second part of these Commentaries. But when a clerk is presented, the bishop may refuse him upon many accounts. As, 1. If the patron is excommunicated, and remains in contempt forty days.<sup>a</sup> Or, 2. If the clerk be unfit:<sup>b</sup> which unfitness is of several kinds. First, with regard to his person; as if he be a bastard, an outlaw, an excommunicate, an alien, under age, or the like.<sup>c</sup> Next, with regard to his faith or morals; as for any particular heresy, or vice that is malum in se (offense in itself): but if the bishop alleges only in generals, as that he is schismaticus inveteratus (an inveterate schismatic), or objects a fault that is malum prohibitum (offense because prohibited) merely, as haunting taverns, playing at unlawful games, or the like; it is not good cause of refusal.<sup>d</sup> Or, lastly, the clerk may be unfit to discharge the pastoral office for want of learning. In any of which cases the bishop may refuse the clerk. In case the refusal is for heresy, schism, inability of learning, or other matter of ecclesiastical cognizance, there the bishop must give notice to the patron of such his cause of refusal, who, being usually a layman, is not supposed to have knowledge of it; else he cannot present by lapse: but, if the cause be temporal, there he is not bound to give notice.<sup>e</sup>

If an action at law be brought by the patron against the bishop for refusing his clerk, the bishop must assign the cause. If the cause be of a temporal nature and the fact admitted (as, for instance, outlawry), the judges of the king's courts must determine its validity, or, whether it be sufficient cause of refusal: but if the

<sup>a</sup> A layman may also be presented; but he must take priest's orders before his admission. 1 Burn. 103.

<sup>b</sup> 2 Roll. Abr. 355.

<sup>c</sup> Glanv. l. 13. c. 20.

<sup>d</sup> 2 Roll. Abr. 356. 2 Inst. 632. Stat. 3 Rich. II. c. 3 (Benefice, 1379). 7 Rich. II. c. 12 (Benefice, 1383).

<sup>e</sup> 5 Rep. 58.

• 2 Inst. 632.

fact be denied, it must be determined by a jury. If the cause be of a spiritual nature (as, heresy, particularly alleged), the fact if denied shall also be determined by a jury; and if the fact be admitted or found, the court upon consultation and advice of learned divines shall decide its sufficiency.<sup>f</sup> If the cause be want of learning, the bishop need not specify in what points the clerk is deficient, [300] but only allege that he is deficient:<sup>g</sup> for the statute 9 Edw. II, st. 1, c. 13 (Benefice, 1315), is express, that the examination of the fitness of a person presented to a benefice belongs to the ecclesiastical judge. But because it would be nugatory in this case to demand the reason of refusal from the ordinary, if the patron were bound to abide by his determination, who has already pronounced his clerk unfit; therefore, if the bishop returns the clerk to be minus sufficiens in literatura (deficient in learning), the court shall write to the metropolitan, to re-examine him, and certify his qualifications; which certificate of the archbishop is final.<sup>h</sup>

§ 522. c. Institution.—If the bishop hath no objections, but admits the patron's presentation, the clerk so admitted is next to be instituted by him; which is a kind of investiture of the spiritual part of the benefice: for by institution the care of the souls of the parish is committed to the charge of the clerk. When a vicar is instituted, he (besides the usual forms) takes, if required by the bishop, an oath of perpetual residence; for the maxim of law is, that vicarius non habet vicarium (a vicar has no deputy): and, as the nonresidence of the appropriators was the cause of the perpetual establishment of vicarages, the law judges it very improper for them to defeat the end of their constitution, and by absence to create the very mischief which they were appointed to remedy: especially as, if any profits are to arise from putting in a curate and living at a distance from the parish, the appropriator, who is the real parson, has undoubtedly the elder title to them. When the ordinary is also the patron, and confers the living, the presentation and institution are one and the same act, and are called a collation to a benefice. By institution or collation the church is full, so that there can be no fresh presentation till another vacancy, at least in the case of a common patron; but the church is not full against the king, till induction: nay, even if a clerk is instituted upon the king's presentation, the crown may revoke it before induction, and present another clerk.<sup>1</sup> Upon institution also the clerk may enter on the parsonage house and glebe, and take the tithes; but he cannot grant or let them, or bring an action for them, till induction.

<sup>f</sup> 2 Inst. 632.

<sup>h</sup> 2 Inst. 632.

<sup>g</sup> 5 Rep. 58. 3 Lev. 313.

§ 523. d. Induction.—<sup>[391]</sup> Induction is performed by a mandate from the bishop to the archdeacon, who usually issues out a precept to other clergymen to perform it for him. It is done by giving the clerk corporal possession of the church, as by holding the ring of the door, tolling a bell, or the like; and is a form required by law, with intent to give all the parishioners due notice, and sufficient certainty of their new minister, to whom their tithes are to be paid. This, therefore, is the investiture of the temporal part of the benefice, as institution is of the spiritual. And when a clerk is thus presented, instituted, and inducted into a rectory, he is then, and not before, in full and complete possession, and is called in law persona impersonata, or parson imparsonee.<sup>k</sup>

§ 524. e. Rights of parsons and vicars.—The rights of a parson or vicar, in his tithes and ecclesiastical dues, fall more properly under the second book of these Commentaries: and as to his duties, they are principally of ecclesiastical cognizance; those only excepted which are laid upon him by statute. And those are indeed so numerous, that it is impracticable to recite them here with any tolerable conciseness or accuracy. Some of them we may remark, as they arise in the progress of our inquiries, but for the rest I must refer myself to such authors as have compiled treatises expressly upon this subject.<sup>1</sup> I shall only just mention the article of residence, upon the supposition of which the law doth style every parochial minister an incumbent. By statute 21 Hen. VIII, c. 13 (Clergy, 1529), persons willfully absenting themselves from their benefices, for one month together, or two months in the year, incur a penalty of 5*l.* to the king, and 5*l.* to any person that will sue for the same: except chaplains to the king, or others therein mentioned,<sup>m</sup> during their attendance in the household of such as retain them: and also except<sup>n</sup> all heads of houses, magistrates, and professors in the universities, and all students under forty years of age residing there, bona fide, [392] for study. Legal residence is not only in the parish, but also in the parsonage house, if there be one: for it hath been resolved,<sup>o</sup> that the statute intended residence, not only for serving the cure, and for hospitality; but likewise for maintaining the house, that the successor also may keep hospitality there, and, if there be no parsonage house, it hath been holden that the incumbent is bound to hire one, in the same or some neighboring parish, to answer the purposes of residence. For the more effectual promotion of which important duty among the parochial clergy, a provision is made by the statute 17 Geo. III, c. 53 (Clergy Residences Repair, 1776), for raising money upon ecclesiastical benefices, to be paid off by annually decreasing installments, and to be expended in rebuilding or repairing the houses belonging to such benefices.

<sup>1</sup> Co. Litt. 344.

<sup>k</sup> Co. Litt. 300.

<sup>1</sup> These are very numerous: but there are few which can be relied on with certainty. Among these are Bishop Gibson's Codex, Dr. Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, and the earlier editions of the Clergyman's Law, published under the name of Dr. Watson, but compiled by Mr. Place, a barrister.

§ 525. f. Expiration of office.—We have seen that there is but one way whereby one may become a parson or vicar: there are many ways by which one may cease to be so. 1. By death. 2. By cession, in taking another benefice. For by statute 21 Hen. VIII, c. 13 (Clergy, 1529), if anyone having a benefice of 8*l.* per annum, or upwards (according to the present valuation in the king's books<sup>p</sup>), accepts any other, the first shall be adjudged void, unless he obtains a dispensation; which no one is entitled to have, but the chaplains of the king and others therein mentioned; the brethren and sons of lords and knights, and doctors and bachelors of divinity and law, admitted by the universities of this realm. And a vacancy thus made, for want of a dispensation, is called

<sup>m</sup> Stat. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 16 (Clergy, 1533). 33 Hen. VIII. c. 28 (Clergy, 1541).

<sup>n</sup> Stat. 28 Hen. VIII. c. 13 (Clergy, 1536).

<sup>o</sup> 6 Rep. 21.

<sup>p</sup> Cro. Car. 456.

cession. 3. By consecration; for, as was mentioned before,<sup>a</sup> when a clerk is promoted to a bishopric, all his other preferments are void the instant that he is consecrated. But there is a method, by the favor of the crown, of holding such livings in commendam (in trust). Commenda, or ecclesia commendata (a living in trust), is a living commended by the crown to the care of a clerk, to hold till a proper pastor is provided for it. This may be temporary for one, two, or three years; or perpetual: being a kind of dispensation to avoid the vacancy of the living, and is called a commenda retinere (to retain a trust living). There is also a commenda recipere (to receive a trust living), which is to take a benefice de novo, in the bishop's [<sup>393</sup>] own gift, or the gift of some other patron consenting to the same; and this is the same to him as institution and induction are to another clerk.<sup>q</sup> 4. By resignation. But this is of no avail, till accepted by the ordinary; into whose hands the resignation must be made.<sup>r</sup> 5. By deprivation; either, first, by sentence declaratory in the ecclesiastical courts, for fit and sufficient causes allowed by the common law; such as attainder of treason or felony,<sup>s</sup> or conviction of other infamous crime in the king's courts; for heresy, infidelity,<sup>t</sup> gross immorality, and the like: or, secondly, in pursuance of divers penal statutes, which declare the benefice void, for some nonfeasance or neglect, or else some malfeasance or crime. As, for simony;<sup>u</sup> for maintaining any doctrine in derogation of the king's supremacy, or of the thirty-nine articles, or of the book of common-prayer;<sup>v</sup> for neglecting after institution to read the liturgy and articles in the church, or make the declarations against popery, or take the abjuration oath;<sup>w</sup> for using any other form of prayer than the liturgy of the church of England;<sup>x</sup> or for absenting himself sixty

<sup>q</sup> Page 383.

<sup>r</sup> Hob. 144.

<sup>s</sup> Cro. Jac. 198.

<sup>t</sup> Dyer. 108. Jenk. 210.

<sup>u</sup> Fitzh. Abr. t. Trial. 54.

<sup>v</sup> Stat. 31 Eliz. c. 6 (Benefices, 1588). 12 Ann. c. 12 (1713).

<sup>w</sup> Stat. 1 Eliz. c. 1 & 2 (Act of Supremacy, 1558; Act of Uniformity, 1558). 13 Eliz. c. 12 (Church Discipline, 1571).

<sup>x</sup> Stat. 13 Eliz. c. 12. 14 Car. II. c. 4 (Act of Uniformity, 1662). 1 Geo. I. c. 6 (1714).

<sup>y</sup> Stat. 1 Eliz. c. 2.

Bl. Comm.—35

days in one year from a benefice belonging to a popish patron, to which the clerk was presented by either of the universities;<sup>x</sup> in all which and similar cases<sup>y</sup> the benefice is ipso facto void, without any formal sentence of deprivation.

§ 526. 6. Curates.—A curate is the lowest degree in the church; being in the same state that a vicar was formerly an officiating temporary minister, instead of the proper incumbent. Though there are what are called perpetual curacies, where all the tithes are appropriated, and no vicarage endowed (being for some particular reasons<sup>z</sup> exempted from the statute of Hen. IV), but, instead thereof, such perpetual curate is appointed by the appropriator. With regard to the other species of curates, they are the objects of some particular statutes, which ordain, that such as serve a church during its vacancy shall [394] be paid such stipend as the ordinary thinks reasonable, out of the profits of the vacancy; or, if that be not sufficient, by the successor within fourteen days after he takes possession:<sup>a</sup> and that, if any rector or vicar nominates a curate to the ordinary to be licensed to serve the cure in his absence, the ordinary shall settle his stipend under his hand and seal, not exceeding 50*l.* per annum nor less than 20*l.*, and on failure of payment may sequester the profits of the benefice.<sup>b</sup>

§ 527. Inferior ecclesiastical officers.—Thus much of the clergy, properly so called. There are also certain inferior ecclesiastical officers of whom the common law takes notice; and that, principally, to assist the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, where it is deficient in powers. On which officers I shall make a few cursory remarks.

§ 528. 1. Churchwardens.—Churchwardens are the guardians or keepers of the church and representatives of the body of the

<sup>x</sup> Stat. 1 W. & M. c. 26 (Benefices, 1689).

<sup>y</sup> 6 Rep. 29, 30.

<sup>z</sup> 1 Burn. Eccl. Law. 427.

<sup>a</sup> Stat. 28 Hen. VIII. c. 11 (First-fruits, 1536).

<sup>b</sup> Stat. 12 Ann. St. 2. c. 12 (1713).

parish.<sup>c</sup> They are sometimes appointed by the minister, sometimes by the parish, sometimes by both together, as custom directs. They are taken, in favor of the church, to be for some purposes a kind of corporation at the common law; that is, they are enabled by that name to have a property in goods and chattels, and to bring actions for them, for the use and profit of the parish. Yet they may not waste the church goods, but may be removed by the parish, and then called to account by action at the common law; but there is no method of calling them to account, but by first removing them; for none can legally do it, but those who are put in their place. As to lands, or other real property, as the church, churchyard, etc., they have no sort of interest therein; but if any damage is done thereto, the parson only or vicar shall have the action. Their office also is to repair the church, and make rates and levies for that purpose: but these are recoverable only in the ecclesiastical court. They are also joined with the overseers in the care and maintenance of the poor. They are to levy<sup>d</sup> a shilling forfeiture on all such as do not repair to church on Sundays and holidays, and are [395] empowered to keep all persons orderly while there; to which end it has been held that a churchwarden may justify the pulling off a man's hat without being guilty of either an assault or trespass.<sup>e</sup> There are also a multitude of other petty parochial powers committed to their charge by divers acts of parliament.<sup>f</sup>

§ 529. 2. Parish clerks and sextons.—Parish clerks and sextons are also regarded by the common law, as persons who have freeholds in their offices; and therefore though they may be punished, yet they cannot be deprived, by ecclesiastical censures.<sup>g</sup> The parish clerk was formerly very frequently in holy orders, and some are so to this day. He is generally appointed by the incumbent, but by custom may be chosen by the inhabitants; and if such cus-

<sup>c</sup> In Sweden they have similar officers, whom they call kiorckiovarianides. Stiernhook. l. 3. c. 7.

<sup>d</sup> Stat. 1 Eliz. c. 2 (Act of Uniformity, 1558).

<sup>e</sup> 1 Lev. 196.

<sup>f</sup> See Lambard of Churchwardens, at the end of his Eirenarcha; and Dr. Burn. tit. Church, Churchwardens, Visitations.

<sup>g</sup> 2 Roll. Abr. 234.

tom appears, the court of king's bench will grant a mandamus to the archdeacon to swear him in, for the establishment of the custom turns it into a temporal or civil right.<sup>h 4</sup>

<sup>h</sup> Cro. Car. 589.

---

<sup>4</sup> The government of the Church of England has been modified by many modern statutes. The subject is fully treated in 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 763 ff.

OF THE CIVIL STATE.

§ 530. The civil, military, and maritime states.—The lay part of his majesty's subjects, or such of the people as are not comprehended under the denomination of clergy, may be divided into three distinct states, the civil, the military, and the maritime.

§ 531. The civil state.—That part of the nation which falls under our first and most comprehensive division, the civil state, includes all orders of men from the highest noblemen to the meanest peasant, that are not included under either our former division, of clergy, or under one of the two latter, the military and maritime states: and it may sometimes include individuals of the other three orders; since a nobleman, a knight, a gentleman, or a peasant, may become either a divine, a soldier, or a seaman.

§ 532. 1. The nobility and commonalty.—The civil state consists of the nobility and the commonalty. Of the nobility, the peerage of Great Britain, or lords temporal, as forming (together with the bishops) one of the supreme branches of the legislature, I have before sufficiently spoken: we are here to consider them according to their several degrees, or titles of honor.

§ 533. 2. The nobility.—All degrees of nobility and honor are derived from the king as their fountain:<sup>a</sup> and he may institute what new titles he pleases. Hence it is that all degrees of nobility are not of equal antiquity. Those now in use are dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts and barons.<sup>b</sup>

§ 534. a. Dukes.—<sup>[397]</sup> A duke, though he be with us, in respect of his title of nobility, inferior in point of antiquity to many others, yet is superior to all of them in rank; his being the first title of dignity after the royal family.<sup>c</sup> Among the Saxons the Latin name of dukes, duces, is very frequent, and signified, as among the Romans, the commanders or leaders of their armies, whom in their own language they called heretoga;<sup>d</sup> and in the laws of Henry I (as translated by Lambard) we find them called heretochii. But after the Norman Conquest, which changed the military polity of the nation, the kings themselves continuing for many generations dukes of Normandy, they would not honor any subjects with the title of duke, till the time of Edward III; who, claiming to be king of France, and thereby losing the ducal in the royal dignity, in the eleventh year of his reign created his son, Edward the Black Prince, Duke of Cornwall: and many, of the royal family especially, were afterwards raised to the like honor. However, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, A. D. 1572,* the whole order became utterly extinct; but it was revived about fifty years afterwards by her successor, who was remarkably prodigal of honors, in the person of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.

<sup>a</sup> 4 Inst. 363.

<sup>b</sup> For the original of these titles on the Continent of Europe, and their subsequent introduction into this island, see Mr. Selden's Titles of Honor.

<sup>c</sup> Camden. Britan. tit. Ordines.

§ 535. b. Marquises.—A marquise, marchio, is the next degree of nobility. His office formerly was (for dignity and duty were never separated by our ancestors) to guard the frontiers and limits of the kingdom; which were called the marches, from the Teutonic word, marche, a limit: as, in particular, were the marches of Wales and Scotland, while each continued to be an enemy's country. The persons, who had command there, were called lords marchers, or marquises; whose authority was abolished by statute 27 Hen. VIII, c. 27 (Court of Augmentations, 1535): though the title had long before been made a mere ensign of honor; Robert Vere, Earl of Oxford, being created marquise of Dublin, by Richard II, in the eighth year of his reign (1384).<sup>f</sup>

§ 536. c. Earls.—<sup>[398]</sup> An earl is a title of nobility so ancient, that its original cannot clearly be traced out. Thus much seems tolerably certain: that among the Saxons they were called ealdormen, quasi (as it were) elder men, signifying the same as senior or senator among the Romans; and also schiremen, because they had each of them the civil government of a several division or shire. On the irruption of the Danes, they changed the name to eorles, which, according to Camden,<sup>5</sup> signified the same in their language.<sup>1</sup> In Latin they are called comites (earls) (a title first uscd in the empire) from being the king's attendants; "a societate nomen sumpserunt, reges enim tales sibi associant (they received their name from their society, because they were the king's companions)."<sup>2</sup> After the Norman Conquest they were for some time called counts, or countees, from the French; but they did not long retain that name themselves, though their shires are from thence called counties to this day. It is now become a mere title, they having nothing to do with the government of the county; which, as has been more than once observed, is now entirely devolved on the sheriff, the earl's deputy, or vice-comes. In writs, and commissions, and other formal instruments, the king, when he mentions any peer of the degree of an earl, usually styles him "trusty and well-beloved cousin": an appellation as ancient as the reign of Henry IV: who being either by his wife, his mother, or his sisters, actually related or allied to every earl in the kingdom, artfully and constantly acknowledged that connection in all his letters and other public acts: from whence the usage has descended to his successors, though the reason has long ago failed.

<sup>d</sup> This is apparently derived from the same root as the German hertzog, the ancient appellation of dukes in that country. Seld. Tit. Hon. 2. 1. 12.

* Camden. Britan. tit. Ordines. Spelman. Gloss. 191.

<sup>f</sup> 2 Inst. 5.

§ 537. d. Viscounts.—The name of vice-comes or viscount was afterwards made use of as an arbitrary title of honor, without any shadow of office pertaining to it, by Henry the Sixth; when, in the eighteenth year of his reign (1439), he created John Beaumont a

<sup>5</sup> Britan. t. Ordines.

<sup>2</sup> Bracton. l. 1. c. 8. Flet. l. 1. c. 5.

---

<sup>1</sup> Title of earl.—Pollock and Maitland (1 Hist. Eng. Law, 32) say: "The noble by birth is an 'eorl.' This word came later, under Danish influence, to denote a specific office of state, and our present 'earl' goes back to it in that sense. The Latin equivalent comes got specialized in much the same way. But such was not its ancient meaning. Special relations to the king's person or service produced another and somewhat different classification. 'Gestj' was the earliest English equivalent, in practical as well as literal meaning, of comes as employed by Tacitus; it signified a well-born man attached to the king by the general duty of warlike service, though not necessarily holding any special office about his person."

peer, by the name of Viscount Beaumont, which was the first instance of the kind.<sup>1</sup>

§ 538. e. Barons.—A baron's is the most general and universal title of nobility; for originally every one of the peers of superior rank [399] had also a barony annexed to his other titles.<sup>k</sup> But it hath sometimes happened that, when an ancient baron hath been raised to a new degree of peerage, in the course of a few generations the two titles have descended differently; one perhaps to the male descendants, the other to the heirs general; whereby the earldom or other superior title hath subsisted without a barony: and there are also modern instances, where earls and viscounts have been created without annexing a barony to their other honors: so that now the rule doth not hold universally that all peers are barons. The original and antiquity of baronies has occasioned great inquiries among our English antiquaries. The most probable opinion seems to be, that they were the same with our present lords of manors; to which the name of court baron (which is the lord's court, and incident to every manor), gives some countenance. It may be collected from King John's magna carta,<sup>1</sup> that originally all lords of manors, or barons, that held of the king in capite (in chief, i. e., directly of the king), had seats in the great council or parliament: till about the reign of that prince the conflux of them became so large and troublesome, that the king was obliged to divide them, and summon only the greater barons in person; leaving the small ones to be summoned by the sheriff, and (as it is said) to sit by representation in another house; which gave rise to the separation of the two houses of parliament.<sup>m 2</sup> By degrees

<sup>1</sup> 2 Inst. 5.

<sup>k</sup> 2 Inst. 5, 6.

<sup>1</sup> Cap. 14.

<sup>m</sup> Gilb. Hist. of Exch. c. 3. Seld. Tit. of Hon. 2. 5. 21.

---

<sup>2</sup> The baronage.—The barons, together with the earls, have become an estate of the realm, and to make a man a member of this estate it is not sufficient that he should be a military tenant in chief of the crown. A line has been drawn which cuts the body of such tenants into two classes. The question by what means and in accordance with what principle that line was drawn has been much debated. We shall probably be near the truth if, in accordance the title came to be confined to the greater barons, or lords of parliament only; and there were no other barons among the peerage but such as were summoned by writ, in respect of the tenure of their lands or baronies, till Richard the Second first made it a mere title of honor, by conferring it on divers persons by his letters patent.<sup>a</sup>

§ 539. f. Creation of peers.—Having made this short inquiry into the original of our several degrees of nobility, I shall next consider the manner in which they may be created. The right of peerage seems to have been originally territorial; that is, annexed to lands, honors, castles, manors, and the like, the proprietors and possessors of which were (in right of those estates) allowed to be [400] peers of the realm, and were summoned to parliament to do suit and service to their sovereign: and, when the land was alienated, the dignity passed with it as appendant. Thus the bishops still sit in the house of lords in right of succession to certain ancient baronies annexed, or supposed to be annexed, to their episcopal lands:° and thus, in 11 Hen. VI (1433), the possession of the castle of Arundel was adjudged to confer an earldom on its possessor.<sup>p</sup> But afterwards, when alienations grew to be fre-

<sup>a</sup> 1 Inst. 9. Seld. Jan. Angl. 2. § 68.    <sup>p</sup> Seld. Tit. of Hon. b. 2. c. 9. § 5.
° Glan. l. 7. c. 1.

---

with recent writers, we regard the distinction as one that is gradually introduced by practice and has no precise theory behind it. The heterogeneous mass of military tenants in chief could not hold together as an estate of the realm. The greater men dealt directly with the king, paid their dues directly to the exchequer, brought their retainers to the host under their own banners, were summoned to do suit in the king's court by writs directed to them by name; the smaller men dealt with the sheriff, paid their dues to him, fought under his banner, were summoned through him and by general writs. Then two rules emphasized the distinction: the knight's fee paid a fixed relief of 100 shillings, the baron made the best bargain he could for his barony; the practice of summoning the greater people by name, the smaller by general writs was consecrated by the charter of 1215. The greater people are maiores barones, or simply barones, the lesser are for a while barones secundæ dignitatis, and then lose the title altogether; the estates of the greater people are baronies, those of the smaller are not; but the line between great and small has been drawn in a rough empirical way and is not the outcome of any precise principle.—POLLOCK & MAITLAND, 1 Hist. of Eng. Law (2d ed.), 280.

quent, the dignity of peerage was confined to the lineage of the party ennobled, and instead of territorial became personal. Actual proof of a tenure by barony became no longer necessary to constitute a lord of parliament; but the record of the writ of summons to him or his ancestors was admitted as a sufficient evidence of the tenure.

Peers are now created either by writ, or by patent; for those who claim by prescription must suppose either a writ or patent made to their ancestors: though by length of time it is lost. The creation by writ, or the king's letter, is a summons to attend the house of peers, by the style and title of that barony, which the king is pleased to confer: that by patent is a royal grant to a subject of any dignity and degree of peerage. The creation by writ is the more ancient way; but a man is not ennobled thereby, unless he actually take his seat in the house of lords: and some are of opinion that there must be at least two writs of summons, and a sitting in two distinct parliaments, to evidence an hereditary barony:<sup>a</sup> and therefore the most usual, because the surest, way is to grant the dignity by patent, which inures to a man and his heirs according to the limitations thereof, though he never himself makes use of it.<sup>r</sup> Yet it is frequent to call up the eldest son of a peer to the house of lords by writ of summons, in the name of his father's barony: because in that case there is no danger of his children's losing the nobility in case he never takes his seat; for they will succeed to their grandfather. Creation by writ has also one advantage over that by patent: for a person created by writ holds the dignity to him and his [401] heirs, without any words to that purport in the writ; but in letters patent there must be words to direct the inheritance, else the dignity inures only to the grantee for life.<sup>s</sup> For a man or woman may be created noble for their own lives, and the dignity not descend to their heirs at all, or descend only to some particular heirs: as where a peerage is limited to a man, and the heirs male of his body by Elizabeth his present lady, and not to such heirs by any former or future wife.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Whitelocke of Parl. c. 114.

<sup>r</sup> Co. Litt. 9. 16.

<sup>r</sup> Co. Litt. 16.

---

<sup>3</sup> Privileges of peerage.—It must, however, be noticed that, though the crown may create a life dignity of this kind, that dignity will not of itself make

§ 540. g. Incidents of nobility.—Let us next take a view of a few of the principal incidents attending the nobility, exclusive of their capacity as members of parliament, and as hereditary counselors of the crown; both of which we have before considered. And first we must observe, that in criminal cases a nobleman shall be tried by his peers.<sup>4</sup> The great are always obnoxious to popular envy: were they to be judged by the people, they might be in danger from the prejudice of their judges; and would moreover be deprived of the privilege of the meanest subjects, that of being tried by their equals, which is secured to all the realm by magna carta, c. 29. It is said that this does not extend to bishops; who, though they are lords of parliament, and sit there by virtue of their baronies which they hold jure ecclesiæ (by right of the church), yet are not ennobled in blood, and consequently not peers with the nobility.<sup>5</sup> As to peeresses, there was no precedent for their trial when accused of treason or felony, till after Eleanor, Duchess of Gloucester, wife to the lord protector, was accused of the holder a lord of parliament; this point having been clearly decided in 1856 in the Wensleydale Peerage Case, when the committee of privileges of the house of lords declared that the letters patent granted to Mr. Baron Parke, creating him Lord Wensleydale for life, did not entitle him to sit and vote in parliament. But now, under the Appellate Jurisdiction Acts, 1876 and 1887, every lord of appeal in ordinary appointed to aid the house of lords in the hearing and determination of appeals, if he is not otherwise entitled to sit as a member of the house of lords, becomes, by virtue of his appointment, entitled during his life to rank as a baron, and to sit and vote in the house of lords. A peerage, however, is, except in the case last mentioned, always now conferred by letters patent in such a way as to give an hereditary dignity; sometimes to the heirs male of the body of the grantee, sometimes to the heirs female of his body, and sometimes to the heirs general of his body. It may even be made to descend to some particular heirs male.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 704.

<sup>4</sup> 3 Inst. 30, 31.

---

<sup>4</sup> This holds good in cases of treason and felony, but not in case of libel, perjury, conspiracy, and other misdemeanors.

<sup>5</sup> The house of lords in 1692 resolved "that bishops are only lords of parliament but not peers, for they are not of trial by nobility." E. May, Treatise on Parliament, p. 15. Whatever force such a resolution may legally have, it is of no historical authority; for it is certain that from the beginning of the use of the term "peers" the bishops were recognized as peers, and that it was by one of them, Archbishop Stratford, that the right of trial was chiefly treason and found guilty of witchcraft, in an ecclesiastical synod, through the intrigues of Cardinal Beaufort. This very extraordinary trial gave occasion to a special statute, 20 Hen. VI, c. 9 (Trial of Peeress, 1442), which declares<sup>t</sup> the law to be that peeresses, either in their own right or by marriage, shall be tried before the same judicature as other peers of the realm. If a woman, noble in her own right, marries a commoner, she still remains noble, and shall be tried by her peers: but if she be only noble by marriage, then by a second marriage with a commoner, she loses her dignity; for as by marriage it is gained, by marriage it is also lost.<sup>u</sup> Yet if a duchess dowager [402] marries a baron, she continues a duchess still; for all the nobility are pares (peers or equals), and therefore it is no degradation.<sup>uu</sup> <sup>6</sup> A peer, or peeress (either in her own right or by marriage) cannot be arrested in civil cases:<sup>v</sup> and they have also many peculiar privileges annexed to their peerage in the course of judicial proceedings. A peer, sitting in judgment, gives not his verdict upon oath, like an ordinary jurymen, but upon his honor:<sup>w</sup> he answers also to bills in chancery upon his honor, and not upon his oath;<sup>x</sup> but, when he is examined as a witness either in civil or criminal cases, he must be sworn:<sup>y</sup> for the respect, which the law shows to the honor of a peer, does not extend so far as to overturn a settled maxim, that in judicio non creditur nisi juratis (no one is believed in court but upon his oath).<sup>z</sup> The

<sup>t</sup> Moor. 769. 2 Inst. 50. 6 Rep. 52. Staundf. P. C. 152.

<sup>u</sup> Dyer. 79. Co. Litt. 16.

<sup>uu</sup> 2 Inst. 50.

<sup>v</sup> Finch. L. 355. 1 Ventr. 298.

<sup>w</sup> 2 Inst. 49.

<sup>x</sup> 1 P. Wms. 146.

<sup>y</sup> Salk. 512.

<sup>z</sup> Cro. Car. 64.

---

won. The doctrine of ennobled blood, by which this theory has been supported, is historically a mere absurdity; it is impossible to regard the blood as ennobled by law, when the nobility of the blood is restricted to the bearer of the title and does not extend even to his younger children.—STUBBS, 3 Const. Hist. 443, n. 2.

<sup>6</sup> All dowager peeresses, though afterwards married to commoners, are ordinarily, through courtesy, addressed by their former title. A divorced peer cannot restrain by legal proceedings his former wife, upon her marriage with a commoner, from using her former title. Cowley v. Cowley, [1901] App. Cas. 450.

honor of peers is, however, so highly tendered by the law, that it is much more penal to spread false reports of them and certain other great officers of the realm, than of other men: scandal against them being called by the peculiar name of scandalum magnatum (scandal of the peers), and subjected to peculiar punishments by divers ancient statutes.<sup>a 7</sup>

§ 541. h. Loss of nobility.—A peer cannot lose his nobility, but by death or attainder; though there was an instance in the reign of Edward the Fourth, of the degradation of George Nevile, Duke of Bedford, by act of parliament,<sup>b</sup> on account of his poverty, which rendered him unable to support his dignity.<sup>c</sup> But this is a singular instance: which serves at the same time, by having happened, to show the power of parliament; and, by having happened but once, to show how tender the parliament hath been, in exerting so high a power. It hath been said indeed,<sup>d</sup> that if a baron wastes his estate, so that he is not able to support the degree, the king may degrade him: but it is expressly held by later authorities,<sup>e</sup> that a peer cannot be degraded but by act of parliament.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>a</sup> 3 Edw. I. c. 34 (Slander, 1275). 2 Rich. II. st. 1. c. 5 (Slander, 1378). 12 Rich. II. c. 11 (Slander, 1388).

<sup>b</sup> 4 Inst. 355.

<sup>c</sup> The preamble to the act is remarkable; “forasmuch as oftentimes it is seen, that when any lord is called to high estate, and hath not convenient livelihood to support the same dignity, it induceth great poverty and indigence, and causeth oftentimes great extortion, embracery, and maintenance to be had; to the great trouble of all such countries where such estate shall happen to be: therefore, etc.”

<sup>d</sup> Moor. 678.

<sup>e</sup> 12 Rep. 107. 12 Mod. 56.

---

<sup>7</sup> These statutes were all repealed by Statute Law Revision Act, 1887.

<sup>8</sup> Different varieties of peerages.—The privileges of peerage, it is lastly to be observed, are not extended by the law to such persons as hold foreign titles of nobility; who are in this country no more than commoners. But, since the union with Scotland, all the peers of Scotland are peers of Great Britain, and, save a seat in the house of lords, have all the attendant privileges; and since the union with Ireland all peers of Ireland, with the exception of such as are elected members of the house of commons, have all the privileges of peerage, save only the right to a seat in the house of lords. Therefore, the peerage, regarded as a dignity, presents the following varieties, that is to say: (1) peerages which in their creation were peerages of England; (2) peerages which in their creation were peerages of the United Kingdom of Great Britain;

§ 542. 3. Orders of the commonalty.—<sup>[403]</sup> The commonalty, like the nobility, are divided into several degrees; and, as the lords, though different in rank, yet all of them are peers in respect of their nobility, so the commoners, though some are greatly superior to others, yet all are in law peers, in respect of their want of nobility.<sup>f</sup>

§ 543. a. Vidames.—The first name of dignity, next beneath a peer, was anciently that of vidames, vice-domini, or valvasors:<sup>g</sup> who are mentioned by our ancient lawyers<sup>h</sup> as virī magnæ dignitatis (men of great dignity); and Sir Edward Coke<sup>i</sup> speaks highly of them. Yet they are now quite out of use; and our legal antiquaries are not agreed upon even their original or ancient office.<sup>9</sup>

§ 544. b. Knights.—Now, therefore, the first personal dignity, after the nobility, is a knight of the order of St. George, or of the garter; first instituted by Edward III, A. D. 1344.<sup>k</sup> Next (but not till after certain official dignities, as privy counselors, the chancellors of the exchequer and duchy of Lancaster, the chief justice of the king's bench, the master of the rolls, and the other English judges) follows a knight banneret; who, indeed, by statutes 5 Rich. II, st. 2, c. 4 (Parliament, 1382), and 14 Rich. II, c. 11 (Justices of the Peace, 1390), is ranked next after barons: and his precedence before the younger sons of viscounts was confirmed to him by order of King James I, in the tenth year of his reign (1612).<sup>l</sup> But, in order to entitle himself to this rank, he must have been created by the king in person, in the field, under the royal banners, in time of open war.<sup>m</sup> Else he ranks after baronets; who are the next order: which title is a dignity of inheritance, created by letters patent, and usually descendable to the

<sup>f</sup> 2 Inst. 29.

<sup>g</sup> Camden. Britan. t. Ordines.

<sup>h</sup> Bracton. l. 1. c. 8.

<sup>i</sup> 2 Inst. 667.

<sup>k</sup> Seld. Tit. of Hon. 2. 5. 41.

<sup>l</sup> Ibid. 2. 11. 3.

<sup>m</sup> 4 Inst. 6.

---

(3) peerages which in their creation were peerages of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; (4) peerages which in their creation were peerages of Scotland; and (5) peerages which in their creation were peerages of Ireland.—STEPHEN, 2 Comm. (16th ed.), 707.

<sup>9</sup> On this subject one may consult 1 Poll. & Mait. Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 545.

issue male. It was first instituted by King James the First, A. D. 1611, in order to raise a competent sum for the reduction of the province of Ulster in Ireland; for which reason all baronets have the arms of Ulster superadded to their family coat. Next follow knights of the bath; an order instituted by King Henry IV [404] and revived by King George the First.<sup>10</sup> They are so called from the ceremony of bathing, the night before their creation. The last of these inferior nobility are knights bachelors; the most ancient, though the lowest, order of knighthood amongst us: for we have an instance<sup>a</sup> of King Alfred's conferring this order on his son, Athelstan. The custom of the ancient Germans was to give their young men a shield and a lance in the great council: this was equivalent to the toga virilis (the gown of manhood) of the Romans: before this they were not permitted to bear arms, but were accounted as part of the father's household; after it, as part of the community.<sup>b</sup> Hence some derive the usage of knighting, which has prevailed all over the western world, since its reduction by colonies from those northern heroes. Knights are called in Latin equites aurati: aurati, from the gilt spurs they wore; and equites, because they always served on horseback: for it is observable<sup>c</sup> that almost all nations call their knights by some appellation derived from an horse. They are also called in our law milites, because they formed a part, or indeed the whole, of the royal army, in virtue of their feudal tenures; one condition of which was, that everyone who held a knight's fee (which in Henry the Second's time<sup>d</sup> amounted to 20*l. per annum*) was obliged to be knighted, and attend the king in his wars, or fine for his noncompliance. The exertion of this prerogative, as an expedient to raise money in the reign of Charles the First, gave great offense; though warranted by law, and the recent example of Queen Elizabeth: but it was, at the restoration, together with all other military branches of the feudal law, abolished; and this kind of knighthood has, since that time, fallen into great disregard.

These, Sir Edward Coke says,<sup>e</sup> are all the names of dignity in this kingdom, esquires and gentlemen being only names of worship.

<sup>a</sup> Will. Malmsb. lib. 2.

<sup>c</sup> Glanvill. l. 9. c. 4.

<sup>b</sup> Tac. de Morib. Germ. 13.

<sup>e</sup> 2 Inst. 667.

<sup>d</sup> Camden. Ibid. Co. Litt. 74.

<sup>10</sup> They were newly regulated in the reign of Queen Victoria.

But before these last the heralds rank all [405] colonels, serjeants at law, and doctors in the three learned professions.*

* Table of precedence.—The rules of precedence in England may be reduced to the following table: in which, those marked * are entitled to the rank here allotted them, by statute 31 Hen. VIII. c. 10 (Parliament (Precedence), 1539); ——— marked †, by statute 1 W. & M. c. 21 (Great Seal, 1689); ——— marked ‡, by letters patent 9, 10, and 14 Jac. I., which see in Seld. Tit. of Hon. II. 5. 46. and II. 11. 3; ——— marked †, by ancient usage and established custom; for which see (among others) Camden's Britannia, tit. Ordines. Milles' Catalogue of Honor, edit. 1610, and Chamberlayne's Present State of England. b. 3. c. 3.

TABLE OF PRECEDENCE.

* The king's children and grandchildren.	* Secretary of state, if a baron.
* The king's brethren.	* Barons.
— uncles.	† Speaker of the house of commons.
— nephews.	† Lords commissioners of the great seal.
* Archbishop of Canterbury.	‡ Viscounts' eldest sons.
* Lord chancellor or keeper, if a baron.	‡ Earls' younger sons.
* Archbishop of York.	‡ Barons' eldest sons.
* Lord treasurer.	‡ Knights of the garter.
* Lord president of the council. } if barons.	‡ Privy counselors.
* Lord privy seal. } if barons.	‡ Chancellor of the exchequer.
* Lord great chamberlain. } if barons.	‡ Chancellor of the duchy.
But see private stat. 1 } if barons.	‡ Chief justice of the king's bench.
Geo. I. c. 3. } if barons.	‡ Master of the rolls.
* Lord high constable.	‡ Chief justice of the common pleas.
* Lord marshal.	‡ Chief baron of the exchequer.
* Lord admiral.	‡ Judges, and barons of the coif.
* Lord steward of the household.	‡ Knights bannerets, royal.
* Lord chamberlain of the household.	‡ Viscounts' younger sons.
	‡ Barons' younger sons.
	‡ Baronets.
	‡ Knights bannerets.
	‡ Knights of the bath.
	‡ Knights bachelors.
	‡ Baronets' eldest sons.
	‡ Knights' eldest sons.
	‡ Baronets' younger sons.
	‡ Knights' younger sons.
	‡ Colonels.
	‡ Serjeants at law.
	‡ Doctors.
	‡ Esquires.
	‡ Gentlemen.
	‡ Yeomen.
	‡ Tradesmen.
	‡ Artificers.
	‡ Laborers.

N. B. Married women and widows are entitled to the same rank among each other, as their husbands would respectively have borne between themselves, except such rank is merely professional, or official;—and unmarried women to the same

§ 545. c. Esquires, gentlemen and yeomen.—[406] Esquires and gentlemen are confounded together by Sir Edward Coke, who observes,<sup>m</sup> that every esquire is a gentleman, and a gentleman is defined to be one qui arma gerit, who bears coat armor, the grant of which adds gentility to a man's family: in like manner as civil nobility, among the Romans, was founded in the jus imaginum, or having the image of one ancestor at least, who had borne some curule office. It is indeed a matter somewhat unsettled, what constitutes the distinction, or who is a real esquire: for it is not an estate, however large, that confers this rank upon its owner. Camden, who was himself a herald, distinguishes them the most accurately; and he reckons up four sorts of them: ' 1. The eldest sons of knights, and their eldest sons, in perpetual succession: " 2. The eldest sons of younger sons of peers, and their eldest sons in like perpetual succession: both which species of esquires Sir Henry Spelman entitles armigeri natalitii (esquires by birth).<sup>n</sup> 3. Esquires created by the king's letters patent, or other investiture; and their eldest sons. 4. Esquires by virtue of their offices; as justices of the peace, and others who bear any office of trust under the crown. To these may be added<sup>11</sup> the esquires of knights of the bath, each of whom constitutes three at his installation: and all foreign, nay, Irish peers; for not only these, but the eldest sons of peers of Great Britain, though frequently titular lords, are only esquires in the law, and must so be named in all legal proceedings.<sup>x</sup> As for gentlemen, says Sir Thomas Smith,<sup>y</sup> they be made good cheap in this kingdom: for whosoever studieth the laws of the realm, who studieth in the universities, who professeth the liberal sciences, and (to be short) who can live idly, and without manual labor, and will bear the port, charge, and countenance of a gentleman, he shall be called master, and shall be taken for a gen-rank as their eldest brothers would bear among men, during the lives of their fathers. [The following changes are now to be made in Blackstone's table: Prime minister comes after Archbishop of York; law lords' children come after barons' younger sons; chief justice of the common pleas and chief baron of the exchequer are now obsolete.]

<sup>m</sup> 2 Inst. 668.

<sup>n</sup> Gloss. 43.

<sup>t</sup> Ibid.

<sup>x</sup> 3 Inst. 30. 2 Inst. 667.

<sup>u</sup> 2 Inst. 667.

<sup>y</sup> Commonw. of Eng. b. 1. c. 20.

---

<sup>11</sup> Barristers-at-law are to be included among esquires.

tleman. A yeoman is he that hath free land of forty shillings by the year; who is thereby qualified to serve on juries, vote for knights of the [407] shire, and do any other act, where the law requires one that is probus et legalis homo (a true and lawful man).<sup>2</sup>

§ 546. d. Rest of the commonalty.—The rest of the commonalty are tradesmen, artificers, and laborers; who (as well as all others) must in pursuance of the statute 1 Hen. V, c. 5 (Legal Procedure, 1413), be styled by the name and addition of their estate, degree, or mystery, and the place to which they belong, or where they have been conversant, in all original writs of actions personal, appeals, and indictments, upon which process of outlawry may be awarded; in order, as it should seem, to prevent any clandestine or mistaken outlawry, by reducing to a specific certainty the person who is the object of its process.<sup>12</sup>

<sup>2</sup> 2 Inst. 668.

---

<sup>12</sup> But under the law as it now stands, no indictment is insufficient for error in, or lack of, the estate or description of the defendant.

CHAPTER THE THIRTEENTH. [408]

OF THE MILITARY AND MARITIME STATES.

§ 547. The military state.—The military state includes the whole of the soldiery; or, such persons as are peculiarly appointed among the rest of the people for the safeguard and defense of the realm.

In a land of liberty it is extremely dangerous to make a distinct order of the profession of arms. In absolute monarchies this is necessary for the safety of the prince, and arises from the main principle of their constitution, which is that of governing by fear: but in free states the profession of a soldier, taken singly and merely as a profession, is justly an object of jealousy. In these no man should take up arms, but with a view to defend his country and its laws: he puts not off the citizen when he enters the camp; but it is because he is a citizen, and would wish to continue so, that he makes himself for awhile a soldier. The laws, therefore, and constitution of these kingdoms know no such state as that of a perpetual standing soldier, bred up to no other profession than that of war: and it was not till the reign of Henry VII (1485–1509) that the kings of England had so much as a guard about their persons.

§ 548. 1. Military system of the Saxons.—In the time of our Saxon ancestors, as appears from Edward the Confessor's laws,<sup>a</sup> the military force of this kingdom was in the hands of the dukes or heretochs, who were constituted through every province and county in the kingdom; being taken out of the principal nobility, and such as were most remarkable for being "sapientes, fideles, et animosi (wise, faithful and brave)." Their duty was to lead and regulate the English armies, with a very unlimited power; "prout eis visum fuerit, ad honorem coronæ et utilitatem regni (as it should seem to them, for the honor of the crown and the advantage of the kingdom).” And because of this great power they were elected by the people in their full assembly, or folkmote, in the same manner as sheriffs were elected: [409] following still that old fundamental maxim of the Saxon constitution, that where any officer was entrusted with such power, as if abused might tend to the oppression of the people, that power was delegated to him by the vote of the people themselves.<sup>b</sup> So, too, among the ancient Germans, the ancestors of our Saxon forefathers, they had their dukes, as well as kings, with an independent power over the military, as the kings had over the civil state. The dukes were elective, the kings hereditary: for so only can be consistently understood that passage of Tacitus,<sup>c</sup> “reges ex nobilitate, duces ex virtute sumunt (they chose their kings for their nobility, their leaders for their valor)”; in constituting their kings, the family or blood royal was regarded; in choosing their dukes or leaders, warlike merit: just as Cæsar relates of their ancestors in his time, that whenever they went to war, by way either of attack or defense, they elect leaders to command them.<sup>d</sup> This large share of power, thus conferred by the people, though intended to preserve the liberty of the subject, was perhaps unreasonably detrimental to the prerogative of the crown: and accordingly we find a very ill use made of it by Edric, Duke of Mercia, in the reign of King Edmund Ironside; who, by his office of duke or heretoch, was entitled to a large command in the king’s army, and by his repeated treacheries at last transferred the crown to Canute, the Dane.

<sup>a</sup> C. de heretochiis (of heretochs or leaders).

---

<sup>1</sup> Schmid, Gesetze der Angelsachsen, c. 32 a. Edward Jenks, Esq., says that "the meaning of the passage is very doubtful; and, in any case, it is poor evidence of Anglo-Saxon usage." <sup>2</sup> Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 683 n.

§ 549. 2. King Alfred’s militia.—It seems universally agreed by all historians, that King Alfred first settled a national militia in this kingdom, and by his prudent discipline made all the subjects of his dominion soldiers: but we are unfortunately left in the dark as to the particulars of this his so celebrated regulation; though, from what was last observed, the dukes seem to have been left in possession of too large and independent a power: which enabled Duke Harold on the death of Edward the Confessor, though a stranger to the royal blood, to mount for a short space the throne of this kingdom, in prejudice of Edgar Atheling, the rightful heir.

<sup>b</sup> “Isti vero viri eliguntur per commune consilium, pro communi utilitate regni, per provincias et patrias universas, et per singulos comitatus, in pleno folkmote, sicut et vice-comites provinciarum et comitatum eligi debent. (These men are chosen for the general benefit of the kingdom, by the common council, by the provinces, the whole country, and by each county in full assembly, as also the sheriffs of provinces and counties should be elected.)” LL. Edw. Confess. Ibid. See also Bede, Ecl. Hist. l. 5. c. 10.

<sup>c</sup> De Morib. German. 7.

<sup>d</sup> “Quum bellum civitas aut illatum defendit aut infert, magistratus qui ei bello præsent deliguntur. (When a city is engaged either in an offensive or defensive war, magistrates qualified to direct that war are chosen.)” De Bell. Gall l. 6. c. 22.

§ 550. 3. Military part of the feudal system.—[410] Upon the Norman Conquest the feudal law was introduced here in all its rigor, the whole of which is built on a military plan. I shall not now enter into the particulars of that constitution, which belongs more properly to the next part of our Commentaries; but shall only observe, that, in consequence thereof, all the lands in the kingdom were divided into what were called knight's fees, in number above sixty thousand;<sup>2</sup> and for every knight's fee a knight or soldier, miles, was bound to attend the king in his wars, for forty days in a year; in which space of time, before war was reduced to a science, the campaign was generally finished, and a kingdom either conquered or victorious.* By this means the king had, without any expense, an army of sixty thousand men always ready at his command. And accordingly we find one, among the laws of William the Conqueror,† which in the king's name commands and firmly enjoins the personal attendance of all knights and others; "quod habeant et teneant se semper in armis et equis, ut decet et oportet: et quod semper sint prompti et parati ad servitium suum integrum nobis explendum et peragendum, cum opus adfuerit, secundum quod debent de feodis et tenementis suis de jure nobis facere" (that they keep and hold themselves always well furnished with arms and horses, as is suitable and proper: and be always well prepared for fulfilling and performing their entire service to us when need shall be; according to what they are by law bound to do for us by reason of their fees and tenements).” This personal service in process of time degenerated into pecuniary commutations or aids, and at last the military part of the feudal system was abolished at the restoration, by statute 12 Car. II, c. 24 (Military Tenures, 1660).

* The Poles are, even at this day, so tenacious of their ancient constitution, that their pospolite, or militia, cannot be compelled to serve above six weeks, or forty days, in a year. Mod. Un. Hist. xxxiv. 12.

† C. 58. See Co. Litt. 75, 76.

<sup>2</sup> Professor Maitland suggests five thousand as a more probable number. (Domesday Book, 511.)

§ 551. 4. The militia from reign of Henry II.—In the meantime we are not to imagine that the kingdom was left wholly without defense in case of domestic insurrections, or the prospect of foreign invasions. Besides those, who by their military tenures were bound to perform forty days’ service in the field, first the assize of arms, enacted 27 Hen. II (1181),<sup>ε</sup> and afterwards the statute of Winchester,<sup>η</sup> under Edward I, obliged every man, according to his estate and degree, to provide a determinate quantity of such arms as were then in use, in order to keep the peace: and constables were appointed in all hundreds by the latter statute, to see that such [<sup>411</sup>] arms were provided. These weapons were changed, by the statute 4 & 5 Ph. & M., c. 2 (Military Service, 1557), into others of more modern service: but both this and the former provisions were repealed in the reign of James I.<sup>ι</sup> While these continued in force, it was usual from time to time for our princes to issue commissions of array, and send into every county officers in whom they could confide, to muster and array (or set in military order) the inhabitants of every district; and the form of the commission of array was settled in parliament in the 5 Hen. IV (1403), so as to prevent the insertion therein of any new penal clauses.<sup>κ</sup> But it was also provided<sup>λ</sup> that no man should be compelled to go out of the kingdom at any rate, nor out of his shire but in cases of urgent necessity; nor should provide soldiers unless by consent of parliament. About the reign of King Henry the

<sup>ε</sup> Hoved. A. D. 1181.

<sup>η</sup> 13 Edw. I. c. 6 (1285).

<sup>ι</sup> Stat. 1 Jac. I. c. 25 (1603). 21 Jac. I. c. 28 (Continuation of Statutes, 1623).

<sup>κ</sup> Rushworth. part 3. page 662. 667. See 8 Rym. 374, etc.

<sup>λ</sup> Stat. 1 Edw. III. st. 2. c. 5. & 7 (Military Service and Conveyance of Soldiers, 1326). 25 Edw. III. st. 5. c. 8 (Finding of Men at Arms, 1351).

Eighth, his children or lieutenants began to be introduced,<sup>m</sup> as standing representatives of the crown, to keep the counties in military order; for we find them mentioned as known officers in the statute 4 & 5 Ph. & M., c. 3 (Military Service, 1557), though they had not been then long in use, for Camden speaks of them<sup>n</sup> in the time of Queen Elizabeth, as extraordinary magistrates constituted only in times of difficulty and danger. But the introduction of these commissions of lieutenancy, which contained in substance the same powers as the old commissions of array, caused the latter to fall into disuse.

In this state things continued till the repeal of the statutes of armor in the reign of King James the First: after which, when King Charles the First had, during his northern expeditions, issued commissions of lieutenancy and exerted some military powers, which, having been long exercised, were thought to belong to the crown, it became a question in the long parliament, how far the power of the militia did inherently reside in the king; being now unsupported by any statute, and founded only upon immemorial usage. This question, long agitated, with great heat and resentment on both [<sup>412</sup>] sides, became at length the immediate cause of the fatal rupture between the king and his parliament: the two houses not only denying this prerogative of the crown, the legality of which claim perhaps might be somewhat doubtful; but also seizing into their own hands the entire power of the militia, the illegality of which step could never be any doubt at all.

§ 552. 5. Reorganization of the militia.—Soon after the restoration of King Charles the Second, when the military tenures were abolished, it was thought proper to ascertain the power of the militia, to recognize the sole right of the crown to govern and command them, and to put the whole into a more regular method of military subordination:<sup>nn</sup> and the order, in which the militia now stands by law, is principally built upon the statutes which were then enacted. It is true the two last of them are apparently repealed; but many of their provisions are re-enacted, with the addition of some new regulations, by the present militia laws: the general scheme of which is to discipline a certain number of the inhabitants of every county, chosen by lot for three years, and officered by the lord lieutenant, the deputy lieutenants, and other principal landholders, under a commission from the crown. They are not compellable to march out of their counties, unless in case of invasion or actual rebellion within the realm (or any of its dominions or territories<sup>o</sup>), nor in any case compellable to march out of the kingdom. They are to be exercised at stated times: and their discipline in general is liberal and easy; but, when drawn out into actual service, they are subject to the rigors of martial law, as necessary to keep them in order. This is the constitutional security, which our laws<sup>p</sup> have provided for the public peace, and for protecting the realm against foreign or domestic violence.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>m</sup> 15 Rym. 75.

<sup>n</sup> Brit. 103. Edit. 1594.

<sup>nn</sup> 13 Car. II. c. 6 (Militia, 1661). 14 Car. II. c. 3 (Militia, 1662). 15 Car. II. c. 4 (Militia, 1663).

§ 553. 6. Martial law.—When the nation was engaged in war, more veteran troops and more regular discipline were esteemed to be necessary, than could be expected from a mere militia. And therefore at such times more rigorous methods were put in use for the [413] raising of armies and the due regulation and discipline of the soldiery: which are to be looked upon only as temporary excrescences bred out of the distemper of the state; and not as any part of the permanent and perpetual laws of the kingdom. For martial law, which is built upon no settled principles, but is entirely arbitrary in its decisions, is, as Sir Matthew Hale observes,<sup>pp</sup> in truth and reality no law, but something indulged rather than allowed as a law. The necessity of order and discipline in an army is the only thing which can give it countenance; and therefore it ought not to be permitted in time of peace, when

<sup>o</sup> Stat. 16 Geo. III. c. 3 (Militia, 1775).

<sup>p</sup> 2 Geo. III. c. 20 (Militia, 1761). 9 Geo. III. c. 42 (Militia, 1768). 16 Geo. III. c. 3.

<sup>pp</sup> Hist. C. L. c. 2.

---

<sup>3</sup> There has been recently an entire reorganization of the auxiliary forces of Great Britain under the provisions of the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907. This subject is briefly treated in 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 687 ff.

the king's courts are open for all persons to receive justice according to the laws of the land. Wherefore, Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, being condemned at Pontefract, 15 Edw. II (1321), by martial law, his attainder was reversed 1 Edw. III (1326), because it was done in time of peace.<sup>a</sup> And it is laid down,<sup>r</sup> that if a lieutenant, or other, that hath commission of martial authority, doth in time of peace hang or otherwise execute any man by color of martial law, this is murder; for it is against magna carta.<sup>s</sup> § 554. 7. Quartering troops.—And the petition of right<sup>t</sup> enacts, that no soldier shall be quartered on the subject without his own consent;<sup>u</sup> and that no commission shall issue to proceed within this land according to martial law. And whereas, after the restoration, King Charles the Second kept up about five thousand regular troops, by his own authority, for guards and garrisons; which King James the Second by degrees increased to no less than thirty thousand, all paid from his own civil list; it was made one of the articles of the bill of rights,<sup>v</sup> that the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of parliament, is against law.

§ 555. 8. A standing army.—But, as the fashion of keeping standing armies (which was first introduced by Charles VII, in France, A. D. 1445<sup>w</sup>), has of late years universally prevailed over Europe (though [414] some of its potentates, being unable themselves to maintain them, are obliged to have recourse to richer powers, and receive subsidiary pensions for that purpose) it has also for many years past been annually judged necessary by our legislature, for the safety of the kingdom, the defense of the possessions of the crown of Great Britain, and the preservation of the balance of power in Europe, to maintain even in time of peace

<sup>a</sup> 2 Brad. Append. 59.

<sup>r</sup> 3 Inst. 52.

<sup>s</sup> Cap. 29.

<sup>t</sup> 3 Car. I (1627). See also Stat. 31 Car. II. c. 1 (Taxation, 1679).

<sup>u</sup> Thus, in Poland, no soldier can be quartered upon the gentry, the only free-men in that republic. Mod. Univ. Hist. xxxiv. 23.

<sup>v</sup> Stat. 1 W. & M. st. 2. c. 2 (Bill of Rights, 1689).

<sup>w</sup> Robertson, Chap. V. i. 64.

a standing body of troops, under the command of the crown; who are, however, ipso facto disbanded at the expiration of every year, unless continued by parliament. And it was enacted by statute 10 W. III, c. 1 (Taxation, 1698), that not more than twelve thousand regular forces should be kept on foot in Ireland, though paid at the charge of that kingdom; which permission is extended by statute 8 Geo. III, c. 13 (Army in Ireland, 1767), to 16,235 men, in time of peace.

To prevent the executive power from being able to oppress, says Baron Montesquieu,* it is requisite that the armies with which it is entrusted should consist of the people, and have the same spirit with the people; as was the case at Rome, till Marius new-modelled the legions by enlisting the rabble of Italy, and laid the foundation of all the military tyranny that ensued. Nothing then, according to these principles, ought to be more guarded against in a free state than making the military power, when such a one is necessary to be kept on foot, a body too distinct from the people. Like ours, therefore, it should wholly be composed of natural subjects; it ought only to be enlisted for a short and limited time; the soldiers also should live intermixed with the people; no separate camp, no barracks, no inland fortresses should be allowed. And perhaps it might be still better, if, by dismissing a stated number and enlisting others at every renewal of their term, a circulation could be kept up between the army and the people, and the citizen and the soldier be more intimately connected together.

§ 556. 9. The annual mutiny act.—To keep this body of troops in order, an annual act of parliament likewise passes, “to punish mutiny and desertion, [415] and for the better payment of the army and their quarters.” This regulates the manner in which they are to be dispersed among the several innkeepers and victualers throughout the kingdom; and establishes a law martial for their government. By this, among other things, it is enacted, that if any officer or soldier shall excite, or join any mutiny, or, knowing of it, shall not give notice to the commanding officer; or shall desert, or list in any other regiment, or sleep upon his post, or leave it before he is relieved, or hold correspondence with a rebel or enemy, or strike or use violence to his superior officer, or shall disobey his lawful commands: such offender shall suffer such punishment as a court-martial shall inflict, though it extend to death itself.

* Sp. L. 11. 6.

§ 557. 10. Military offenses.—However expedient the most strict regulations may be in time of actual war, yet, in times of profound peace, a little relaxation of military rigor would not, one should hope, be productive of much inconvenience. And, upon this principle, though by our standing laws<sup>7</sup> (still remaining in force, though not attended to) desertion in time of war is made felony, without benefit of clergy, and the offense is triable by a jury and before justices at the common law; yet, by our militia laws before mentioned, a much lighter punishment is inflicted for desertion in time of peace. So, by the Roman law also, desertion in time of war was punished with death, but more mildly in time of tranquillity.<sup>8</sup> But our mutiny act makes no such distinction: for any of the faults above mentioned are, equally at all times, punishable with death itself, if a court-martial shall think proper. This discretionary power of the court-martial is indeed to be guided by the directions of the crown; which, with regard to military offenses, has almost an absolute legislative power. “His majesty, says the act, may form articles of war, and constitute courts-martial, with power to try any crime by such articles, and inflict such penalties as the articles direct.” A vast and most important trust! An unlimited power to create crimes, and annex to them any punishments, not extending to life or limb! These are indeed forbidden to be inflicted, [416] except for crimes declared to be so punishable by this act; which crimes we have just enumerated, and, among which, we may observe that any disobedience to lawful commands is one. Perhaps in some future revision of this act, which is in many respects hastily penned, it may be thought worthy the wisdom of parliament to ascertain the limits of military subjection, and to enact express articles of war for the government of the army, as is done for the government of the navy: especially as, by our present constitution, the nobility and gentry of the kingdom, who serve their country as militia officers, are annually subjected to the same arbitrary rule, during their time of exercise.

<sup>7</sup> Stat. 18 Hen. VI. c. 19 (Soldiers, 1439). 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 2 (Soldiers, 1548).

<sup>8</sup> Ff. 49. 16. 5.

§ 558. 11. Danger of slavery.—One of the greatest advantages of our English law is, that not only the crimes themselves which it punishes, but also the penalties which it inflicts, are ascertained and notorious: nothing is left to arbitrary discretion: the king by his judges dispenses what the law has previously ordained: but is not himself the legislator. How much, therefore, is it to be regretted that a set of men, whose bravery has so often preserved the liberties of their country, should be reduced to a state of servitude in the midst of a nation of freemen! For Sir Edward Coke will inform us,<sup>a</sup> that it is one of the genuine marks of servitude, to have the law, which is our rule of action, either concealed or precarious: “misera est servitus ubi jus est vagum aut incognitum (wretched is the thraldom where the law is either uncertain or unknown).” Nor is this state of servitude quite consistent with the maxims of sound policy observed by other free nations. For, the greater the general liberty is which any state enjoys, the more cautious has it usually been in introducing slavery in any particular order or profession. These men, as Baron Montesquieu observes,<sup>b</sup> seeing the liberty which others possess and which they themselves are excluded from, are apt (like eunuchs in the eastern seraglios) to live in a state of perpetual envy and hatred towards the rest of the community; and indulge a malignant pleasure in contributing to destroy those privileges, to which they can never be admitted. Hence have many free states, by departing from this rule, been endangered by the revolt of [417] their slaves: while, in absolute and despotic governments where no real liberty exists, and consequently no invidious comparisons can be formed, such incidents are extremely rare. Two precautions are therefore advised to be observed in all prudent and free governments: 1. To prevent the introduction of slavery at all; or, 2. If it be already introduced, not to entrust those slaves with arms; who will then find themselves an overmatch for the freemen. Much less ought the soldiery to be an exception to the people in general, and the only state of servitude in the nation.

<sup>a</sup> 4 Inst. 332.

<sup>b</sup> Sp. L. 15. 12.

§ 559. 12. Privileges of soldiers.—But as soldiers, by this annual act, are thus put in a worse condition than any other subjects, so by the humanity of our standing laws, they are in some cases put in a much better. By statute 43 Eliz., c. 3. (Disabled Soldiers, 1601), a weekly allowance is to be raised in every county for the relief of soldiers that are sick, hurt, and maimed: not forgetting the royal hospital at Chelsea for such as are worn out in their duty. Officers and soldiers, that have been in the king's service, are by several statutes, enacted at the close of several wars, at liberty to use any trade or occupation they are fit for, in any town in the kingdom (except the two universities) notwithstanding any statute, custom, or charter to the contrary. And soldiers in actual military service may make nuncupative wills, and dispose of their goods, wages, and other personal chattels, without those forms, solemnities, and expenses, which the law requires in other cases.<sup>c</sup> Our law does not, indeed, extend this privilege so far as the civil law; which carried it to an extreme that borders upon the ridiculous. For if a soldier, in the article of death, wrote anything in bloody letters on his shield, or in the dust of the field with his sword, it was a very good military testament.<sup>d</sup> And thus much for the military state, as acknowledged by the laws of England.<sup>4</sup>

§ 560. The maritime state.—The maritime state is nearly related to the former: though much more agreeable to the principles of our free [418] constitution. The royal navy of England hath ever been its greatest defense and ornament; it is its ancient and natural strength; the floating bulwark of the island; an army, from which, however strong and powerful, no danger can ever be apprehended to liberty: and accordingly it has been assiduously cultivated, even from the earliest ages. To so much perfection was our naval reputation arrived in the twelfth century, that the code of maritime laws, which are called the laws of Oleron, and are received by all nations in Europe as the ground and substruction of all their marine constitutions, was confessedly compiled by our King Richard the First, at the Isle of Oleron on the coast of France, then part of the possessions of the crown of England.*<sup>5</sup> And yet, so vastly inferior were our ancestors in this point to the present age, that even in the maritime reign of Queen Elizabeth, Sir Edward Coke† thinks it matter of boast, that the royal navy of England then consisted of three and thirty ships.

<sup>c</sup> Stat. 29 Car. II. c. 3 (Statute of Frauds, 1677). 5 W. III. c. 21. § 6 (1693).

<sup>d</sup> Si milites quid in clypeo literis sanguine suo rutilantibus adnotaverint, aut in pulvere inscripserint gladio suo, ipso tempore quo, in prælio, vitæ sortem derelinquunt, hujusmodi voluntatem stabilem esse oportet. Cod. 6. 21. 15.

<sup>4</sup> The existing military code of Great Britain, known as the Army Act, contains regulations for the manner in which troops are to be enlisted and billeted, that is dispersed, among the innkeepers and victualers throughout the kingdom, for the government of the army, and for every person subject to military law. It likewise contains provisions for the regulation of courts-martial. A fuller account of this subject may be found in 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 691 ff.

§ 561. 1. Navigation acts.—The present condition of our marine is in great measure owing to the salutary provisions of the statutes, called the navigation acts; whereby the constant increase of English shipping and seamen was not only encouraged, but rendered unavoidably necessary. By the statute 5 Rich. II, c. 3 (1381), in order to augment the navy of England, then greatly diminished, it was ordained, that none of the king's liege people should ship any merchandise out of or into the realm but only in ships of the king's ligeance, on pain of forfeiture. In the next year, by statute 6 Rich. II, c. 8 (1382), this wise provision was enervated, by only obliging the merchants to give English ships (if able and sufficient) the preference. But the most beneficial statute for the trade and commerce of these kingdoms is that navigation act, the rudiments of which were first framed in 1650,‡ with a narrow partial view: being intended to mortify our own sugar

* 4 Inst. 144. Coutumes de la Mer. 2.      † Scobell. 132.

‡ 4 Inst. 50.

---

<sup>5</sup> The laws of Oleron have been held in peculiar respect by England, and incorporated into her maritime jurisprudence. Story, J., 2 Mason, 548.—HAMMOND.

islands, which were disaffected to the parliament and still held out for Charles II by stopping the gainful trade which they then carried on with the Dutch;<sup>a</sup> and at the same time to clip the wings of those our opulent and aspiring neighbors. This prohibited all ships of foreign nations from trading with any English plantations [419] without license from the council of state. In 1651<sup>1</sup> the prohibition was extended also to the mother country: and no goods were suffered to be imported into England, or any of its dependencies, in any other than English bottoms; or in the ships of that European nation of which the merchandise imported was the genuine growth or manufacture. At the restoration, the former provisions were continued, by statute 12 Car. II, c. 18 (Shipping and Navigation, 1660), with this very material improvement, that the master and three-fourths of the mariners shall also be English subjects.

§ 562. 2. The royal navy.—Many laws have been made for the supply of the royal navy with seamen; for their regulation when on board: and to confer privileges and rewards on them during and after their service.

§ 563. a. Recruiting the navy.—First, for their supply. The power of impressing seafaring men for the sea service by the king's commission, has been a matter of some dispute, and submitted to with great reluctance: though it hath very clearly and learnedly been shown, by Sir Michael Foster,<sup>1</sup> that the practice of impressing, and granting powers to the admiralty for that purpose, is of very ancient date, and hath been uniformly continued by a regular series of precedents to the present time: whence he concludes it to be part of the common law.<sup>2</sup> The difficulty arises from hence, that no statute has expressly declared this power to be in the crown, though many of them very strongly imply it. The statute 2 Rich. II, c. 4 (1378), speaks of mariners being arrested and retained for the king's service, as of a thing well known, and practiced without dispute; and provides a remedy against their running

<sup>a</sup> Mod. Un. Hist. xli. 289.

<sup>1</sup> Rep. 154.

<sup>1</sup> Scobell. 176.

<sup>2</sup> See also Comb. 245. Barr. 334.

away. By a later statute,<sup>1</sup> if any waterman, who uses the River Thames, shall hide himself during the execution of any commission of pressing for the king's service, he is liable to heavy penalties.<sup>6</sup> By another,<sup>m</sup> no fisherman shall be taken by the queen's commission to serve as a mariner;<sup>7</sup> but the commission shall be first brought to two justices of the peace, inhabiting near the seacoast where the mariners are to be taken, to the intent that the justices may [420] choose out and return such a number of able-bodied men, as in the commission are contained, to serve her majesty. And, by others,<sup>n</sup> especial protections are allowed to seamen in particular circumstances, to prevent them from being impressed. And ferry-men are also said to be privileged from being impressed, at common law.<sup>o</sup> All which do most evidently imply a power of impressing to reside somewhere; and, if anywhere, it must from the spirit of our constitution, as well as from the frequent mention of the king's commission, reside in the crown alone.

But, besides this method of impressing (which is only defensible from public necessity, to which all private considerations must give way), there are other ways that tend to the increase of seamen, and manning the royal navy. Parishes may bind out poor boys apprentices to masters of merchantmen, who shall be protected from impressing for the first three years; and if they are impressed afterwards, the masters shall be allowed their wages:<sup>p</sup> great advantages in point of wages are given to volunteer seamen in order to induce them to enter into his majesty's service:<sup>q</sup> and every foreign seaman, who during a war shall serve two years in any man-of-war, merchantman, or privateer, is naturalized ipso facto.<sup>r</sup> About the middle of King William's reign, a scheme was

<sup>1</sup> Stat. 2 & 3 Ph. & M. c. 16 (Thames Watermen, 1555).

<sup>m</sup> Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 5 (Maintenance of the Navy, 1562).

<sup>n</sup> Stat. 7 & 8 W. III. c. 21 (Greenwich Hospital, etc., 1695). 2 Ann. c. 6 (1703). 4 & 5 Ann. c. 19 (1705). 13 Geo. II. c. 17 (Navy, 1739), etc.

<sup>o</sup> Sav. 14.

<sup>p</sup> Stat. 2 Ann. c. 6 (1703).

<sup>q</sup> Stat. 31 Geo. II. c. 10 (Navy, 1757).

<sup>r</sup> Stat. 13 Geo. II. c. 3 (Supply of Seamen, 1739).

---

<sup>6</sup> This statute was repealed by 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 75, § 1 (1827).

<sup>7</sup> Repealed by the Sea Fisheries Act, 1868.

set on foot<sup>a</sup> for a register of seamen to the number of thirty thousand, for a constant and regular supply of the king's fleet; with great privileges to the registered men, and, on the other hand, heavy penalties in case of their nonappearance when called for: but this registry, being judged to be ineffectual as well as oppressive, was abolished by statute 9 Ann., c. 21 (1710).<sup>b</sup>

§ 564. b. Discipline in the navy.—The method of ordering seamen in the royal fleet, and keeping up a regular discipline there, is directed by certain express rules, articles, and orders, first enacted by the authority of parliament soon after the restoration;<sup>c</sup> but since [421] new-modeled and altered, after the peace of Aix la Chapelle,<sup>d</sup> to remedy some defects which were of fatal consequence in conducting the preceding war. In these articles of the navy almost every possible offense is set down, and the punishment thereof annexed: in which respect the seamen have much the advantage over their brethren in the land service: whose articles of war are not enacted by parliament, but framed from time to time at the pleasure of the crown. Yet from whence this distinction arose, and why the executive power, which is limited so properly with regard to the navy, should be so extensive with regard to the army, it is hard to assign a reason: unless it proceeded from the perpetual establishment of the navy, which rendered a permanent law for their regulation expedient: and the temporary duration of the army, which subsisted only from year to year, and might therefore with less danger be subjected to discretionary government. But, whatever was apprehended at the first formation of the mutiny act, the regular renewal of our standing force at the entrance of every year has made this distinction idle. For, if from experience past we may judge of future events, the army is now lastingly engrafted into the British constitution; with this singularly fortunate circumstance, that any branch of the legis-

<sup>a</sup> Stat. 7 & 8 W. III. c. 21 (Greenwich Hospital, etc., 1695).

<sup>b</sup> Stat. 13 Car. II. st. 1. c. 9 (Navy, 1661).

<sup>c</sup> Stat. 22 Geo. II. c. 23 (National Debt, 1749).

---

<sup>d</sup> The royal navy is, for the most part, supplied by voluntary enlistment. Naval Enlistment Acts, 1835, 1853, 1884.

lature may annually put an end to its legal existence, by refusing to concur in its continuance.<sup>9</sup>

§ 565, c. Privileges of sailors.—With regard to the privileges conferred on sailors, they are pretty much the same with those conferred on soldiers; with regard to relief, when maimed, or wounded, or superannuated, either by county rates or the royal hospital at Greenwich; with regard also to the exercise of trades, and the power of making nuncupative testaments: and further,<sup>w</sup> no seaman aboard his majesty's ships can be arrested for any debt, unless the same be sworn to amount to at least twenty pounds; though, by the annual mutiny acts, a soldier may be arrested for a debt which extends to half that value, but not to a less amount.

<sup>w</sup> Stat. 31 Geo. II. c. 10 (Navy, 1757).

---

<sup>9</sup> The government of the British navy is now regulated by the Naval Discipline Act of 1866, as amended in 1884 and subsequent statutes, a brief account of which may be found in 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 696 ff.

CHAPTER THE FOURTEENTH. [422]

OF MASTER AND SERVANT.

§ 566. The domestic relations.—Having thus commented on the rights and duties of persons, as standing in the public relations of magistrates and people, the method I have marked out now leads me to consider their rights and duties in private economical relations.

The three great relations in private life are, 1. That of master and servant;<sup>1</sup> which is founded in convenience, whereby a man is directed to call in the assistance of others, where his own skill and labor will not be sufficient to answer the cares incumbent upon him. 2. That of husband and wife; which is founded in nature, but modified by civil society: the one directing man to continue and multiply his species, the other prescribing the manner in which that natural impulse must be confined and regulated. 3. That of parent and child, which is consequential to that of marriage, being its <sup>1</sup> Service and agency discriminated.—The relation of master and servant has been known to the English law from a very early period; indeed, its doctrines date back, as Judge Holmes has shown (Common Law, pp. 15, 16), to the time when the servant was the property of the master, and it is still founded in all its essential features upon the notion that the master has a control of the servant, and can direct his action irrespective of any contract between them. This doctrine has been obscured of late years by being mixed up with another of very different origin. The law of principal and agent is derived from the canon law, and has only been introduced into the common law in recent times. If the older books of English law are examined, no such words as “principal and agent” will be found in them. Whenever any question is discussed which would now be treated under that head, it is treated of as master and servant. Principal and agent does not occur in Viner’s Abridgment, or those preceding it; and it is only at the end of the eighteenth century that we find it beginning to appear as a separate title, as yet of very limited application. Even Blackstone treats it only as one of the minor forms of contract, and of very little importance in comparison with the older relation. It is to explain the master’s liability that he quotes (p. *429) Coke’s maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se, which has of late been used so often less appropriately in a sense that Coke never thought of as the principle governing agency.

But from his time to the present, or at least to that of Judge Story, there is a rapid change in the relative treatment of the two topics. Agency becomes principal end and design: and it is by virtue of this relation that infants are protected, maintained, and educated. But, since the parents, on whom this care is primarily incumbent, may be snatched away by death before they have completed their duty, the law has therefore provided a fourth relation; 4. That of guardian and ward, which is a kind of artificial parentage, in order to supply the deficiency, whenever it happens, of the natural. Of all these relations in their order.

the rubric under which almost everything is ranged that relates either to the contracts or the torts, formed or committed by one person at the instance of another. In our American digests it occupies much the greater space. (In the United States Digest, one hundred and four pages to eleven for master and servant, while the latest English one [Mews'] gives fifty to sixty-four. I take these as examples rather than the text-books, although showing the same facts, because the digests represent more exactly the common usage of the terms in the reports, unaffected by any theories of the writers.) And since Judge Story's time, it has been the general custom to use the words without distinction, and to speak of the liability of a master or principal, of an agent or servant, as if it made no difference which term was used.

"The foundation of this branch of the law [agency], is avowedly in the maxim of the Romans, Qui facit per alium facit per se, 4 Inst. tit. 5 [sic!]; namely, that the agency of a servant is but an instrument; and that any man having authority over the actions of another, who either expressly commands him to do an act, or by the absence of a due care or control, either previously in the choice of his servant, or immediately in the act itself, negligently suffers him to do an injury, shall be responsible for the act of his servant as if it were the act of himself." (Note to Weyland v. Elkins, 1 Holt N. P. 227, quoted Story on Agency, p. 548.)

The attribution of this maxim to the Romans is as strange as the confusion between the rules stated, which are clearly applicable to service, and the conclusion drawn from them as to the law of agency; even "the agency of a servant," as it is expressed. A glance at the original sources of Roman law would have shown the author that instead of recognizing any such maxim, they held it iniquum nequitiam eorum ultra ipsorum corpora parentibus dominive damnosam esse (Gaii Com., lib. 4, 75, et seq.); i. e., unjust to demand of a master for a servant's wrongs, any compensation beyond the mere surrender of the servant.

The blunder by which Blackstone's citation of 4 Inst. 109, was turned into 4 Inst., tit. 5, and credited to Justinian instead of Coke, may not be the author's fault. It could hardly have been Judge Story's.

In some cases, this usage leads to no difficulty; it makes no difference whether we express the relation as one of service or of agency, since either will express clearly enough the facts put in evidence, and lead to correct conclusions. But § 567. Master and servant.—<sup>[423]</sup> In discussing the relation of master and servant, I shall, first, consider the several sorts of servants, and how this relation is created and destroyed: secondly, the effect of this relation with regard to the parties themselves: and, lastly, its effect with regard to other persons.

§ 568. 1. Classes of servants.—As to the several sorts of servants: I have formerly observed<sup>a</sup> that pure and proper slavery does not, nay cannot, subsist in England; such I mean, whereby an absolute and unlimited power is given to the master over the life and fortune of the slave. And, indeed, it is repugnant to reason, and the principles of natural law, that such a state should subsist anywhere.

§ 569. a. Slavery.—The three origins of the right of slavery, assigned by Justinian,<sup>b</sup> are all of them built upon false foundations.<sup>c</sup> As, first, slavery is held to arise “jure gentium (by the law

<sup>a</sup> Pag. 127.

<sup>b</sup> Servi aut sunt, aut nascuntur: sunt jure gentium, aut jure civili: nascuntur ex ancillis nostris. (Slaves are either born or made so: they are made slaves by the law of nations, or by the civil law; they are born slaves as the children of our female captives). Inst. 1. 3. 4.

<sup>c</sup> Montesq. Sp. L. xv. 2.

---

this is by no means always true. The two relations connote different things, and the use of one for the other frequently leads to false reasoning. It is desirable to point out a few of these distinctions.

1. The relation of master and servant is essentially one of status. The master's liability for the servant's acts does not depend upon any contract between them; otherwise there would be no such liability in the many cases where the servant is a minor. The only question bearing upon the rights and duties of third persons is, “Does the relation exist? Is the one actually engaged in the service of the other in the act from which the liability arises?”

On the other hand, principal and agent is essentially a contractual relation, as was the mandate of the civil law from which indirectly we took it. It is still so defined in all our books, and although they often speak of agency when service is meant, I think none of them have yet used such a term as the status of agency. The powers and duties of the agent, and the liability of the principal for his contracts, are always traced back to and measured by the contract in which the relation begins, whether expressed or implied. That service is a relation of status and not one of contract is clearly shown in Corbin v. American Mills, 27 Conn. 274, 71 Am. Dec. 63, where an employee hired by the

of nations),” from a state of captivity in war; whence slaves are called mancipia, quasi manu capti. The conqueror, say the civilians, had a right to the life of his captive; and, having spared that, has a right to deal with him as he pleases. But it is an untrue position, when taken generally, that, by the law of nature or nations, a man may kill his enemy: he has only a right to kill him, in particular cases; in cases of absolute necessity, for self-defense; and it is plain this absolute necessity did not subsist, since the victor did not actually kill him, but made him prisoner. War is itself justifiable only on principles of self-preservation; and therefore it gives no other right over prisoners but merely to disable them from doing harm to us, by confining their persons: much less can it give a right to kill, torture, abuse, plunder, or even to enslave an enemy, when the war is over. Since, therefore, the right of day was held to be not a servant, while engaged in laying a wall for his employers with stone which he and his men were removing from a ledge under a contract with the town. “Payment by the day is a circumstance to be considered, but not the criterion. So, also, of actual present control and supervision. To get at the truth we must see if the person is acting at the time for and in the place of his master, in accordance with and representing his master’s will and not his own. It must be strictly his master’s business he is doing, and not in any respect his own.” (Ellsworth, J., p. 63.) The master’s control over the mode of work is the test. (Cincinnati v. Stone, 5 Ohio St. 38.)

2. The relation of master and servant always implies a control over the act to be done of a different character from that in agency. The master may direct, not only what the servant is to do, but how he is to do it. As a rule, even the contract of service does not interfere with this: it allows the master to recall his orders, to change his mind, to undo what has been done, without making himself liable to the servant for breach of contract.

Agency, on the other hand, implies an agreement to do certain things in the agent’s own method. So long as he performs the exact contract between them, the principal cannot complain. He is entitled, like any other contracting party, to his own discretion as to the means he shall use, unless they have been expressly agreed upon between them, or are governed by some known custom; so if the principal changes his mind, or undoes what has been done for him, it is a breach of the contract discharging the agent or entitling him to damages. This distinction is well illustrated by the numerous cases upon willful or malicious wrongs by a servant. No question of the kind arises in a case of agency proper. An agent is supposed to act as an independent person, limited only by the terms of his contract; the servant to act as his master tells him to. (Wharton on Agency, §§ 479, 482, 538.) Hence it has been held that for a willful act of the servant a master is not liable, as its willfulness shows that the servant making slaves by captivity, depends on a supposed right of slaughter, that foundation failing, the consequence drawn from it must fail likewise. But, secondly, it is said that slavery may begin "jure civili (by the civil law)"; when one man sells himself to another. This, if only meant of contracts to serve or work for another, is very [424] just: but when applied to strict slavery, in the sense of the laws of old Rome or modern Barbary, is also impossible. Every sale implies a price, a quid pro quo (value for value), an equivalent given to the seller in lieu of what he transfers to the buyer: but what equivalent can be given for life, and liberty, both of which (in absolute slavery) are held to be in the master's disposal? His property also, the very price he seems to receive, devolves ipso facto to his master, the instant he becomes his slave. In this case, therefore, the buyer gives nothing, and the

is not acting in the scope of his employment. This is fully argued in Wright v. Wilcox, 19 Wend. 343, 32 Am. Dec. 507; and see cases in note, p. 511. (M. and S. riding together, S. whipped up horses and threw boy off.) But the doctrine now generally held is that the willfulness is an evidential, not an ultimate fact; i. e., that it goes to the jury, who are to determine under all the circumstances whether the act was within the scope of the master's employment. Some cases go further, and disregard the willful or malignant character of the act, "if within the scope of employment" (Perkins v. M. K. & T. R. Co., 55 Mo. 201), and even hold that the latter need not be alleged in pleading (Travers v. K. P. Ry. Co., 63 Mo. 421); but these can only be sustained where the harm done the plaintiff is a breach of some special duty owed him by the master, of which the servant's act is a breach or omission.

It is well said in a recent case that where the master's liability is for his own negligence, he is answerable in damages to the same extent as though the relation of master and servant did not exist (Lorentz v. Robinson, 61 Md. 64); and alike to servants and strangers. (Allen, J., in 64 N. Y. 8.) He cannot contract for immunity from such liability, either to the stranger or to the servant; it would be against public policy. (Roesner v. Hermann, 10 Biss. 486.)

The liability of an employer for willful torts of his servants towards persons with whom the employer has some peculiar contract (as distinguished from third persons in general to whom no special duty is due) is stated in Angell & Ames on Corporations, § 388, p. 404, and in Goddard v. G. T. R. Co., 57 Me. 202, 2 Am. Rep. 39, 10 Am. Law Reg. 17, 21; citing a number of cases, e. g., Railroad v. Finney, 10 Wis. 388; Railway v. Hinds, 53 Pa. St. 512; 7 Am. Law Reg. 14 (passenger's arm broken by fellow-passengers); Flint v. Transportation Co., 34 Conn. 554 (similar case); Nieto v. Clark, 1 Cliff. 145 (assault by steward of a ship on female passenger); Railroad v. Blocker, 27 Md. 277.

It is an old and well-settled doctrine of the common law that the possession seller receives nothing: of what validity, then, can a sale be, which destroys the very principles upon which all sales are founded? Lastly, we are told, that besides these two ways by which slaves “funt,” or are acquired they may also be hereditary: “servi nascuntur (they are born slaves)”; the children of acquired slaves are, jure naturæ (by the law of nature) by a negative kind of birth-right, slaves also. But this, being built on the two former rights, must fall together with them. If neither captivity, nor the sale of one’s self, can by the law of nature and reason reduce the parent to slavery, much less can they reduce the offspring.

§ 570. (1) No slavery in England.—Upon these principles the law of England abhors, and will not endure the existence of, slavery within this nation: so that when an attempt was made to introduce it, by statute 1 Edw. VI, c. 3 (Poor Relief, 1547), which or-of the servant is the possession of the master. This has many important consequences, but no one would think of applying it in all cases of agency. In a large proportion of those cases, e. g., those of factors, bailees, etc., the exact contrary is true. The independent possession of the agent is an essential mark of the relation. (Story on Agency, § 401a, and citations there; Wharton on Agency, § 766, and cases. Many cases are collected in 18 Am. Dec. 549.) A statute validating pledges by an agent in possession will not cover such a pledge by a servant. (Lamb v. Attenborough, 1 Best & S. 831; 8 Jur., N. S., 230.)

3. The relation of master and servant has legal effects, whether the work done is lawful or unlawful. The servant does not cease to be one if he commits a wrong in his master’s employ. Agency, on the other hand, can exist only for lawful purposes. From its very nature as a contract, it can only be formed for such ends. A contract of agency for the performance of an unlawful act, or the commission of a crime, would be as void as any other such contract. Story himself states this rule, although he goes on directly to speak of the torts of agents and the liabilities of principals therefor. “Although a person may do an unlawful act, it is clear that he cannot delegate authority to another person to do it, for it is against the policy of the law to allow any such authority, and therefore the appointment is utterly void. It imports neither duty nor obligation nor responsibility on either side, although it may involve both in punishment.” (Story on Agency, § 11. And see §§ 235, 261. But compare the language of §§ 308 and 451.) But his latest editor, Mr. C. P. Greenough, seems to have perceived the inconsistency of the two positions, and has pointed out in a very modest way the fact that it is service and not agency which makes the master liable. (Note 1 to § 451.)

“In regard to the liability of the principal to third persons for the torts of his agent, there is a distinction to be made between those torts that spring dained, that all idle vagabonds should be made slaves, and fed upon bread, water, or small drink, and refuse meat; should wear a ring of iron round their necks, arms, or legs; and should be compelled by beating, chaining, or otherwise, to perform the work assigned them, were it never so vile; the spirit of the nation could not brook this condition, even in the most abandoned rogues; and therefore this statute was repealed in two years afterwards.<sup>4</sup> And now it is laid down,* that a slave or negro, the instant he lands in England, becomes a freeman; that is, the law will protect him in the enjoyment of his person, and his property. Yet, with regard to any right which the master may have lawfully acquired to the

<sup>4</sup> Stat. 3 & 4 Edw. VI. c. 16 (Vagrancy, 1550).

* Salk. 666.

---

from the subject matter of the agency, and affect those with whom the agent deals on behalf of his principal through such person's relationship to the subject matter of the agency, and those torts which arise from the manner in which the agency is transacted, and which affect those who are in other respects strangers to it, or, if they affect those with whom the agent deals, yet affect them as they might be affected were they strangers. In the first class of cases the maxim, qui facit per alium, facit per se, applies. The principal, if liable at all, is liable for his own act performed by his agent. To the second class of cases the maxim has no application. The principal, if liable, is liable not for his own act, but for the act of another. His liability rests on grounds of expediency, and is in derogation of the rule, which, with this exception, is universal, that a person is answerable for his own acts only.

"In this second class of cases he is not liable, unless another relation, that of master and servant, is superimposed upon the relation of principal and agent. The cases appear to warrant the conclusion that this additional relation does not exist, unless the agent would be *legally* bound to obey* an order of the principal to abstain from the injurious act, or from the injurious mode of performing the act. When this relation exists, the master appears to be liable, provided the servant at the time is acting within the general scope of his employment, and is not obeying the directions of a third person (Murphy v. Caralli, 3 Hurl. & C. 462; Coomes v. Houghton, 102 Mass. 211; Kimball v. Cushman, 103 Mass. 194; McLaughlin v. Pryor, 4 Scott N. R. 655), who has some title to give directions (Garretzen v. Duenckel, 50 Mo. 104), such person not being * Sed quere as to the need of the servant being legally bound to obey. This would exclude all cases of service without binding contract, etc. The cases hold it sufficient that he be actually in the employment, and under the master's orders. If this is so, the master may be liable even for an act amounting to felony, qua master. (Osborn v. Gillet, Law R. 8 Ex. 88.)—HAMMOND.

---

perpetual service of John or Thomas,<sup>2</sup> this will remain exactly in the same state as before: [425] for this is no more than the same state of subjection for life, which every apprentice submits to for the space of seven years, or sometimes for a longer term. Hence, too, it follows, that the infamous and unchristian practice of withholding baptism from negro servants, lest they should thereby gain their liberty, is totally without foundation, as well as without excuse. The law of England acts upon general and extensive principles: it gives liberty, rightly understood, that is, protection to a Jew, a Turk, or a heathen, as well as to those who profess the true religion of Christ; and it will not dissolve a civil obligation between master and servant, on account of the alteration of faith in either of the parties: but the slave is entitled to the same protection in England before, as after, baptism; and, whatever service the heathen negro owed of right to his American master, by general not by local law, the same (whatever it be) is he bound to render when brought to England and made a Christian.

an intermediate agent of the master (Stone v. Cartwright, 6 Tenn. 411; Brown v. Lent, 20 Vt. 529), and is not willfully acting for himself instead of for his master. (Mitchell v. Crassweller, 13 Com. B. 237; Storey v. Ashton, Law R. 4 Q. B. 476.)—HAMMOND.

<sup>2</sup> Is perpetual service legal.—Can a freeman by contract alienate his freedom? If not, why not? Can he let his services to a master for his entire life? The question has been mooted, at least from the time of the glossators, utrum liber homo possit in perpetuum operas suas locare. Irnerius is said to have denied it, as an infringement of the natural right of liberty, arguing from Dig. de cond et dem. 35, 1, 1. Titio, section 2, which ends "potior est legato libertas: ergo contractu potior."

But Azo thinks the contrary, giving as his reason that the contract may be enforced in damages, or the labor of another equally good workman given in place of the locator operæ, provided his own be not demanded specifically. But all the force of this is destroyed at once by saying that all the doctors of Bologna agreed that the performance could be so enforced in person. (Azo, Summa in Cod. 4, 65, p. 613.) Struve (Syntagma J. C.; Exerc. 24, par. 4, ad Dig. 19, 2, note y; Tom. I., p. 1667), quotes authors on both sides at some length; the majority of DD. favoring the power, and this is even said by some to be the sententia communis, or weight of authority, though Struve only rests it on the weak ground (of Azo) that the contract can be fulfilled by paying damages, interesse præstando.

The English doctrine on the same subject is stated in 1 S. L. C. 443, as settled in favor of the contract, "though in some countries a restraint so extensive has been considered inconsistent with individual liberty, and accordingly § 571. b. Menial servants.—The first sort of servants, therefore, acknowledged by the laws of England, are menial servants; so called from being intra mœnia (within the walls), or domestics. The contract between them and their masters arises upon the hiring. If the hiring be general without any particular time limited, the law construes it to be a hiring for a year;<sup>f</sup> upon a principle of natural equity, that the servant shall serve, and the master maintain him, throughout all the revolutions of the respective seasons; as well when there is work to be done as when there is not:<sup>g</sup> but the contract may be made for any larger or smaller term. All single men between twelve years old and sixty, and married ones under thirty years of age, and all single women between twelve and forty, not having any visible livelihood, are compellable by two justices to go out to service in husbandry or certain specific trades, for the promotion of honest industry; and no master can put away his servant, or servant leave his master, after being so retained, either before or at the end of his term, without a quarter's warning; unless upon reasonable [426] cause to be allowed by a justice of the peace:<sup>h</sup> but they may part by consent, or make a special bargain.

<sup>f</sup> Co. Litt. 42.

<sup>g</sup> F. N. B. 168.

<sup>h</sup> Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4 (Artificers and Apprentices, 1562).

---

forbidden." But the cases cited do not warrant the statement "that the question is long since settled in our law." (1 S. L. C. 443).

In America, the leaning is the other way. (Schouler on Dom. Rel., § 460, and cases cited.) Clark's Case, 1 Blackf. 122, 12 Am. Dec. 213, holds a contract to serve for twenty years invalid; and also that contracts of service cannot be specifically enforced. Note on latter subject with American cases contra. (Parsons v. Trask, 7 Gray, 473, 66 Am. Dec. 502.) A contract for services indefinite as to their character and place of performance is void.

In the opinion Thomas, J., said: Such a contract, it is scarcely necessary to say, is against the policy of our institutions and laws. If such a sale of service could be lawfully made for five years, it might for the same reasons, for ten, and so for the term of one's life. The door would thus be opened for a species of servitude inconsistent with the first and fundamental article of our declaration of rights, which, proprio vigore, not only abolished every vestige of slavery then existing in the commonwealth, but rendered every form of it thereafter legally impossible. That article has always been regarded, not simply as the declaration of an abstract principle, but as having the active force and conclusive authority of law.—HAMMOND.

§ 572. c. Apprentices.—Another species of servants are called apprentices (from apprendre, to learn) and are usually bound for a term of years, by deed indented or indentures, to serve their masters, and be maintained and instructed by them. This is usually done to persons of trade, in order to learn their art and mystery; and sometimes very large sums are given with them, as a premium for such their instruction: but it may be done to husbandmen, nay to gentlemen, and others. And<sup>1</sup> children of poor persons may be apprenticed out by the overseers, with consent of two justices, till twenty-four years of age, to such persons as are thought fitting; who are also compellable to take them: and it is held, that gentlemen of fortune, and clergymen, are equally liable with others to such compulsion:<sup>k</sup> for which purposes our statutes have made the indentures obligatory, even though such parish apprentice be a minor.<sup>1</sup> Apprentices to trades may be discharged on reasonable cause, either at the request of themselves or masters, at the quarter sessions, or by one justice, with appeal to the sessions;<sup>m</sup> who may, by the equity of the statute, if they think it reasonable, direct restitution of a ratable share of the money given with the apprentice:<sup>n</sup> and parish apprentices may be discharged in the same manner, by two justices.<sup>o</sup> But if an apprentice, with whom less than ten pounds hath been given, runs away from his master, he is compellable to serve out his time of absence, or make satisfaction for the same, at any time within seven years after the expiration of his original contract.<sup>p</sup>

§ 573. d. Laborers.—A third species of servants are laborers, who are only hired by the day or the week, and do not live intra mœnia, as [<sup>427</sup>] part of the family; concerning whom the statutes <sup>1</sup> Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4 (Artificers and Apprentices, 1562). 43 Eliz. c. 2 (Poor Relief, 1601). 1 Jac. I. c. 25 (1603). 7 Jac. I. c. 3 (Apprentice, 1609). 8 & 9 W. & M. c. 30 (Poor Relief, 1697). 2 & 3 Ann. c. 6 (Navigation, 1703). 4 Ann. c. 19 (1705). 17 Geo. II. c. 5 (Justices' Commitment, 1743).

<sup>k</sup> Salk. 57. 491.

<sup>l</sup> Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4. 43 Eliz. c. 2. Cro. Car. 179.

<sup>m</sup> Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4.

<sup>n</sup> Salk. 67.

<sup>o</sup> Stat. 20 Geo. II. c. 19 (Regulation of Servants and Apprentices, 1746).

<sup>p</sup> Stat. 6 Geo. III. c. 26 (1765).

before cited<sup>a</sup> have made many very good regulations; 1. Directing that all persons who have no visible effects may be compelled to work: 2. Defining how long they must continue at work in summer and in winter: 3. Punishing such as leave or desert their work: 4. Empowering the justices at sessions, or the sheriff of the county, to settle their wages: and 5. Inflicting penalties on such as either give, or exact, more wages than are so settled.

§ 574. e. Stewards, factors and bailiffs.—There is yet a fourth species of servants, if they may be so called, being rather in a superior, a ministerial, capacity; such as stewards, factors, and bailiffs: whom, however, the law considers as servants pro tempore (for a time), with regard to such of their acts, as affect their master's or employer's property. Which leads me to consider,

§ 575. 2. Relation of service.—The manner in which this relation of service affects either the master or servant. And, first, by hiring and service for a year, or apprenticeship under indentures, a person gains a settlement in that parish wherein he last served forty days.<sup>r</sup> In the next place persons, serving seven years as apprentices to any trade, have an exclusive right to exercise that trade in any part of England.<sup>s</sup> This law, with regard to the exclusive part of it, has by turns been looked upon as a hard law, or as a beneficial one, according to the prevailing humor of the times: which has occasioned a great variety of resolutions in the courts of law concerning it; and attempts have been frequently made for its repeal, though hitherto without success. At common law every man might use what trade he pleased; but this statute restrains that liberty to such as have served as apprentices: the adversaries to which provision say, that all restrictions (which tend to introduce monopolies) are pernicious to trade; the advocates for it allege, that unskillfulness in trades is equally detrimental to the public, as monopolies. This reason indeed only extends to such trades, [428] in the exercise whereof skill is required: but another of their arguments goes much further; viz., that apprenticeships are useful to the commonwealth, by employing of youth, and learning them to be early industrious; but that no one would be induced to undergo a seven years' servitude, if others, though equally skillful, were allowed the same advantages without having undergone the same discipline: and in this there seems to be much reason. However, the resolutions of the courts have in general rather confined than extended the restriction. No trades are held to be within the statute, but such as were in being at the making of it:<sup>t</sup> for trading in a country village, apprenticeships are not requisite:<sup>u</sup> and following the trade seven years is sufficient without any binding; for the statute only says, the person must serve as an apprentice, and does not require an actual apprenticeship to have existed.<sup>w</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4 (1562). 6 Geo. III. c. 26.

<sup>r</sup> See pag. 364.

<sup>s</sup> Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4. § 31.

§ 576. a. Master's right of correction.—A master may by law correct his apprentice for negligence or other misbehavior, so it be done with moderation:<sup>x</sup> though, if the master or master's wife beats any other servant of full age, it is good cause of departure.<sup>y</sup> But if any servant, workman, or laborer assaults his master or dame,<sup>z</sup> he shall suffer one year's imprisonment, and other open corporal punishment, not extending to life or limb.<sup>z</sup>

§ 577. b. Servant's wages.—By service all servants and laborers, except apprentices, become entitled to wages: according to their

<sup>t</sup> Lord Raym. 514.

<sup>u</sup> 1 Ventr. 51. 2 Keb. 583.

<sup>w</sup> Lord Raym. 1179.

<sup>x</sup> 1 Hawk. P. C. 130. Lamb. Eiren. 127. Cro. Car. 179. 2 Show. 289.

<sup>y</sup> F. N. B. 168. Bro. Abr. tit. Laborers, 51. Trespass, 349.

<sup>z</sup> Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4.

---

<sup>3</sup> Assault on master.—The statute here cited might be common law in America by its date (5 Eliz., c. 4, 1563), but our courts have never regarded it as such (2 Kent Comm. 258, and notes), or held that any common-law distinction between master and servant as men of different ranks existed here. A crime committed by either against the other would be of the same nature and degree; the servant's assault upon the master would be judged precisely like the master's assault upon the servant under the same circumstances. The last vestige of a different doctrine disappeared with slavery. The control exercised by the master over the servant is an incident to their temporary relation, not a right of one class of men over another. A may be the master of B in one relation, and servant in another; as when a lawyer conducts an action for his coachman as a client.—HAMMOND.

agreement, if menial servants; or according to the appointment of the sheriff or sessions, if laborers or servants in husbandry: for the statutes for regulation of wages extend to such servants only;* it being impossible for any magistrate to be a judge of the employment of menial servants, or of course to assess their wages.

§ 578. c. Relation of service as to third persons.—Let us, lastly, see how strangers may be affected by this relation of master and servant: or how a master may [429] behave towards others on behalf of his servant; and what a servant may do on behalf of his master.

And, first, the master may maintain, that is, abet and assist his servant in any action at law against a stranger: whereas, in general, it is an offense against public justice to encourage suits and animosities, by helping to bear the expenses of them, and is called in law maintenance.<sup>b</sup> A master also may bring an action against any man for beating or maiming his servant: but in such case he must assign, as a special reason for so doing, his own damage by the loss of his service; and this loss must be proved upon the trial.<sup>c</sup> A master likewise may justify an assault in defense of his servant, and a servant in defense of his master:<sup>d</sup> the master, because he has an interest in his servant, not to be deprived of his service; the servant, because it is part of his duty, for which he receives his wages, to stand by and defend his master.<sup>e</sup> Also if any person do hire or retain my servant, being in my service, for which the servant departeth from me and goeth to serve the other, I may have an action for damages against both the new master and the servant, or either of them: but if the new master did not know that he is my servant, no action lies; unless he afterwards refuse to restore him upon information and demand.<sup>f</sup> The reason and foundation, upon which all this doctrine is built, seem to be the

* 2 Jones, 47.

<sup>b</sup> 2 Roll. Abr. 115.

<sup>c</sup> 9 Rep. 113.

<sup>d</sup> 2 Roll. Abr. 546.

<sup>e</sup> In like manner, by the laws of King Alfred, c. 38, a servant was allowed to fight for his master, a parent for his child, and a husband or father for the chastity of his wife or daughter.

<sup>f</sup> F. N. B. 167, 168.

property that every man has in the service of his domestics; acquired by the contract of hiring, and purchased by giving them wages.

§ 579. (1) Responsibility of master.—As for those things which a servant may do on behalf of his master, they seem all to proceed upon this principle, that the master is answerable for the act of his servant, if done by his command, either expressly given, or implied: nam qui facit per alium, facit per se (for he who does a thing by the agency of another, does it himself).<sup>s 4</sup> Therefore,

§ 4 Inst. 109.

---

4 The law of fellow-servant.—The recognized rule of the common law was that a master was liable for the acts, neglects, and defaults of his servants in the course of the service. It is stated in a classical case by Willes, J., thus: "The master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed in the course of the service and for the master's benefit, though no express command or privity of the master be proved." Barwick v. Eng. Joint Stock Bank, L. R. 2 Ex. 259, 265. "No reason for the rule, at any rate no satisfactory one, is commonly given in our books. Its importance belongs altogether to the modern law, and it does not seem to be illustrated by any early authority. Blackstone is short in his statement, and has no other reason to give than the fiction of an 'implied command.' It is currently said, respondet superior, which is a dogmatic statement, not an explanation. It is also said, qui facit per alium facit per se; but this in terms applicable only to authorized acts that, although done by the agent or servant 'in the course of the service,' are specifically authorized or even forbidden." Pollock, Torts (9th ed.), 78. Chief Justice Shaw gives the following explanation of the master's liability: "This rule is obviously founded on the great principle of social duty, that every man in the management of his own affairs, whether by himself or his servants, shall so conduct them as not to injure another; and if he does not, and another thereby sustains damage, he shall answer for it." Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 4 Met. (Mass.) 49, 55, 38 Am. Dec. 339.

An exception or modification to this rule of the master's liability is recognized in the case where the person injured is himself in the same master's service. The exception is known as the "fellow-servant rule." The first evidence of the rule is in the case of Priestley v. Fowler, 3 M. & W. 1, decided in the English exchequer chamber in 1837. The ground on which the servant was refused recovery from the master for an injury caused by the neglect of a fellow-servant in a common employment was, in the words of Lord Abinger, that "to allow this sort of action to prevail would be an encouragement to the servant to omit that diligence and caution which he is in duty bound to exercise on the behalf of his master, to protect him against the misconduct or negligence if the [430] servant commit a trespass by the command or encouragement of his master, the master shall be guilty of it: not that the servant is excused, for he is only to obey his master in matters that are honest and lawful. If an innkeeper's servants rob his guests, the master is bound to restitution:<sup>b</sup> for as there is a confidence reposed in him, that he will take care to provide honest servants, his negligence is a kind of implied consent to the robbery; nam, qui non prohibet, cum prohibere possit, jubet (for he who of others who serve him, and which diligence and caution, while they protect the master, are a much better security against any injury the servant may sustain by the negligence of others engaged under the same master, than any recourse against his master for damages could possibly afford." A like result was reached in South Carolina in 1841, but without any reference to the English case. Murray v. S. C. R. Co., 1 McMull. (S. C.) 385, 36 Am. Dec. 268. And then in 1842, in the Massachusetts case of Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 4 Met. (Mass.) 49, 38 Am. Dec. 339, Chief Justice Shaw laid down the rule in "a judgment which is the fountain-head of all the later decisions" (Pollock, Torts (9th ed.), 101), and has been judicially recognized in England as "the most complete exposition of what constitutes common employment" (Sir Francis Jeune in The Petrel, [1893] P. 320, 323).

<sup>b</sup> Noy's Max. c. 43.

---

The doctrine underlying the fellow-servant rule is thus laid down by Chief Justice Shaw: "When the object to be accomplished is one and the same, when the employers are the same, and the several persons employed derive their authority and their compensation from the same source, it would be extremely difficult to distinguish what constitutes one department and what a distinct department of duty. It would vary with the circumstances of every case. If it were made to depend upon the nearness or distance of the persons from each other, the question would immediately arise, how near or how distant must they be, to be in the same or different departments. In a blacksmith's shop, persons working in the same building, at different fires, may be quite independent of each other, though only a few feet distant. In a ropewalk, several may be at work on the same piece of cordage, at the same time, at many hundred feet distant from each other, and beyond the reach of sight and voice, and yet acting together. Besides, it appears to us, that the argument rests upon an assumed principle of responsibility which does not exist. The master, in the case supposed, is not exempt from liability, because the servant has better means of providing for his safety, when he is employed in immediate connection with those from whose negligence he might suffer; but because the implied contract of the master does not extend to indemnify the servant against the negligence of anyone but himself; and he is not liable in tort, as for the negligence of his servant, because the person suffering does not stand towards him in the relation of a does not forbid a crime while he may, sanctions it). So likewise if the drawer at a tavern sells a man bad wine, whereby his health is injured, he may bring an action against the master:<sup>1</sup> for although the master did not expressly order the servant to sell it to that person in particular, yet his permitting him to draw and sell it at all is impliedly a general command.

<sup>1</sup> 1 Roll. Abr. 95.

---

stranger, but is one whose rights are regulated by contract express or implied." Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 4 Met. (Mass.) 49, 60, 38 Am. Dec. 339.

As to who are fellow-servants, it is said that "the rule quoted by the greatest number of adjudged cases is that all who serve a common master, work under the same control, derive authority and compensation from the same common source, and are engaged in the same general business, though it may be in different grades or departments of it, are fellow-servants, who, under the rule under consideration, are deemed to take the risk of each other's negligence." 4 Thompson, Negligence, § 4917.

Chief Baron Pollock has advised that "we must not over-refine, but look at the common object, and not at the common immediate object." Morgan v. Vale of Neath R. Co., L. R. 1 Q. B. 149, 155. But this subject has become a difficult and intricate one, and all that it seems desirable now is to mention a few important cases on the general principle of the subject. Hough v. Ry. Co., 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. Ed. 612; New England R. Co. v. Conroy, 175 U. S. 323, 44 L. Ed. 181, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 85; Barlow v. Standard Steel Casting Co., 154 Pa. 130, 26 Atl. 12; Murphy v. Boston & A. R. Co., 88 N. Y. 146, 42 Am. Rep. 240; Casey's Admr. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 84 Ky. 79; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Marcelles, 59 Tex. 334; Brown v. Sennet, 68 Cal. 225, 9 Pac. 74; Young v. Boston & M. R. R., 168 Mass. 219, 46 N. E. 624.

Employers' Liability Acts.—In a Nebraska case in 1894, it was said: "When the law of fellow-servant was first announced, business enterprises were comparatively small and simple. The servants of one master were not numerous; they were all engaged in the pursuit of a simple and common undertaking. Now things have changed. Large enterprises are conducted by persons or corporations employing vast numbers of servants, divided into classes, each pursuing a different portion of the work, and each practically independent of the other. The old reasons do not apply to the new conditions." Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Erickson, 41 Neb. 1, 59 N. W. 347, 350. This argument points to the importance of the adoption of statutory modifications in the fellow-servant doctrine. One of the chief ways in which modifications have been introduced has been through the medium of "employers' liability acts." The first general act was passed in England in 1880. "It is confined in its operation to certain specified causes of injury; and only certain kinds of servants are entitled to the benefit of it, and then upon restrictive conditions as to notice of action, mode of trial, and amount of compensation, which are unknown to the common § 580. (2) Scope of employment.—In the same manner, whatever a servant is permitted to do in the usual course of his business, is equivalent to a general command. If I pay money to a banker's servant, the banker is answerable for it: if I pay it to a clergyman's or a physician's servant, whose usual business it is not to receive money for his master, and he embezzles it, I must pay law, and with a special period of limitation. The effect is that a 'workman' within the meaning of the act is put as against his employer in approximately the same position as an outsider as regards the safe and fit condition of the material instruments, fixed or movable, of the master's business. He is also entitled to compensation for harm incurred through the negligence of another servant exercising superintendence, or by the effect of specific orders or rules issued by the master or someone representing him; and there is a special wider provision for the benefit of railway servants, which virtually abolishes the master's immunity as to railway accidents in the ordinary sense of that term. So far as the act has any principle, it is that of holding the employer answerable for the conduct of those who are in delegated authority under him." Pollock, Torts (9th ed.), 107. It has, however, mitigated some of the harshest and most objectionable features of the common law. 5 Labatt, Master and Servant (2 ed.), section 1656, where the act is set out in full. The text of the English act of 1880, together with a digest of the decisions thereon, is also given in Pollock, Torts (9th ed.), 587 ff.

A number of the American states have passed statutes modeled on the English act. These may be found in 5 Labatt, Master and Servant (2d ed.), sections 1657-1661.

The United States Congress passed a federal employers' liability act in 1906. This act was, however, declared unconstitutional on the ground that its provisions were not confined within the scope of federal powers, that is to say, that they applied to carriers engaged in intrastate commerce, and not merely to carriers while engaged in interstate commerce. Howard v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 207 U. S. 463, 52 L. Ed. 297, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 141. This decision was rendered on January 6, 1908. On April 22, 1908, Congress passed a new law, the Employers' Liability Act of 1908. This act, as amended in 1910, provides for the liability of common carriers engaged in interstate or foreign commerce to their employees injured in such commerce, or in case of death it gives a right of action to their personal representatives for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee, and if none, then of such employee's parents, and if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee. Only one recovery, however, may be had for one and the same injury. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Hesterly, 228 U. S. 702, 57 L. Ed. 1031, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 703. This act does away with the fellow-servant rule and changes the doctrine of contributory negligence by adopting the rule of so-called comparative negligence, whereby the damages recoverable are diminished in proportion to the negligence of the employee. It likewise abolishes the rule it over again. If a steward lets a lease of a farm, without the owner's knowledge, the owner must stand to the bargain; for this is the steward's business. A wife, a friend, a relation, that use that an employee is held to have assumed the risk of his employment in any case where the violation by the carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of the employee. Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U. S. 1, 56 L. Ed. 327, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 169.

Workmen's Compensation Acts.—A workmen's compensation act was passed in Great Britain in 1897, and superseded by the act of 1906. With few exceptions, it places an obligation upon every employer of labor to make pecuniary compensation to a limited extent, whenever death or disablement happens to a workman in the course of his employment. Every employment is within the act where a contract of service or apprenticeship exists, whether the work involved is manual labor, clerical work, or otherwise, except those employments which are in terms excluded in the act itself. Germany first enacted a compensation law in 1884. This, with the various amendments thereto, was brought into a new act in 1911. Compensation acts with varying provisions have been passed in many of the European countries. Under the English act, the defense of contributory negligence, of voluntary assumption of risk, and of the negligence of a fellow-servant is abolished.

More or less modeled upon the English act, compensation laws have been enacted in a large number of the American states.

Under both employers' liability laws and workmen's compensation acts, the employer is personally liable for the compensation to be paid to an injured worker. In the case of compensation acts, however, the only negligence recognized on the part of either employer or employee, speaking generally, is that of willful negligence. Where the employer is guilty of willful negligence, he is penalized; where the employee is guilty, he is denied his compensation or is penalized or has his compensation reduced. The amount of the compensation is determined within a maximum and minimum limit by specified schedules of compensation in the law. These schedules are graded on a basis of a certain percentage of the loss or impairment of the injured worker's average weekly wage. Jury trials are either largely or wholly dispensed with, and the compensation allowed is determined by a board of arbitration, by a judge of some court, or by a board of awards, as may be provided in the act.

The first compensation law in the United States was passed by Maryland in 1902, restricted in its application to miners. This act was declared unconstitutional by a lower court, and the question was never carried to a court of appeal. Montana, in 1909, likewise passed a compensation law relating to miners, and this was also declared unconstitutional. Cunningham v. Northwestern Imp. Co., 44 Mont. 180, 119 Pac. 554. Congress passed a compensation act in 1908, applicable to certain specified government employees. This has been extended by subsequent acts, but is not yet universal in its application. New York, in 1910, passed a compulsory compensation act, applicable to certain dangerous employments. The act was declared unconstitutional, on to transact business for a man, are quoad hoc (as to this) his servants; and the principal must answer for their conduct: for the law implies, that they act under a general command; and without the grounds that the parties could not be denied the right of trial by jury, that an employee could not be compelled by the legislature to accept less than his common-law damages, and that an employer could not be forced to pay damages when he was nowise at fault. In the view of the court these privileges were guaranteed by constitutional provisions that no person should be deprived of life, liberty and property without due process of law. Ives v. South Buffalo Ry. Co., 201 N. Y. 271, 94 N. E. 431.

To avoid the objections of the New York court, New Jersey proceeded to adopt an elective or optional workmen's compensation law. By this elective feature employers were permitted to elect whether they would accept the principles of the compensation act and agree to pay their workmen the schedule of compensation provided in the law in all instances where they were injured or killed, or would stand on their common-law rights, in which latter event the law provided that all the common-law defenses of assumption of risk, contributory negligence, and negligence of fellow-servant should be denied to the employer. Compensation laws, according to the elective plan, but with variations as to the manner in which the election is made, have been adopted in a large number of states. The New Jersey act has been upheld in Sexton v. Newark Dist. Tel. Co., 84 N. J. L. 85, 86 Atl. 451, affirmed in court of errors and appeals, 91 Atl. 1070. An Ohio law has been sustained. State v. Creamer, 85 Ohio St. 349, 97 N. E. 602. Also, the Washington law: State v. Clausen, 65 Wash. 156, 117 Pac. 1101; Stoll v. Pac. Coast S. S. Co., 205 Fed. 169; the Wisconsin law: Borgnis v. Falk Co., 147 Wis. 327, 133 N. W. 209; and the Massachusetts law: In re Opinion of Justices, 209 Mass. 607, 96 N. E. 308.

The Wisconsin court summarized the law before it, and stated the purpose thereof, in the following extracts from its opinion: "It creates an administrative board to carry its provisions into effect. It divides all private employers of labor into two classes: (1) Those who elect to come under the law; and (2) those who do not so elect. It takes away the defenses of assumption of risk, and negligence of a coemployee from the second class (except that where there are less than four coemployees the latter defense is not disturbed), but leaves both defenses intact to the first class. It prescribes the manner in which an employer may elect to come under its terms, and how an employee may make his election, and when silence on the part of the employee will be considered an election; but it does not in terms compel either employer or employee to submit to its provisions. It then provides a comprehensive scheme by which, after both parties have so elected, any substantial injury, whether the result be fatal or not, received by the employee in the course of or incidental to his employment (except those caused by willful misconduct) shall be compensated for by the employer according to certain definite rules, which rules are to be administered by the administrative board aforesaid by means of simple procedure definitely laid down, which gives to both parties fair notice and hearing, such a doctrine as this no mutual intercourse between man and man could subsist with any tolerable convenience. If I usually deal with a tradesman by myself, or constantly pay him ready and results in findings and an award which may be filed in the circuit court and become a judgment. It further provides that the findings of fact shall be conclusive and the award subject to review only by action in the circuit court of Dane county, in which it can be set aside only (1) if the commission acted without or in excess of its powers; (2) if the award was procured by fraud; or (3) if the award is not supported by the findings of fact. It then provides that the judgment thus rendered shall be subject to appeal to the supreme court.

“For all the essential purposes of this discussion, it may truly be said that this is the law which is before us, and the question is simply whether there is any vital part of it which the legislature may not enact because the Constitution forbids it. It is matter of common knowledge that this law forms the legislative response to an emphatic, if not a peremptory, public demand. It was admitted by lawyers, as well as laymen, that the personal injury action brought by the employee against his employer to recover damages for injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of the employer had wholly failed to meet or remedy a great economic and social problem which modern industrialism has forced upon us, namely, the problem of who shall make pecuniary recompense for the toll of suffering and death which that industrialism levies and must continue to levy upon the civilized world. This problem is distinctly a modern problem. In the days of manual labor, the small shop, with few employees, and the stage-coach, there was no such problem, or, if there was, it was almost negligible. Accidents there were in those days, and distressing ones; but they were relatively few, and the employee who exercised any reasonable degree of care was comparatively secure from injury. There was no army of injured and dying, with constantly swelling ranks marching with halting step and dimming eyes to the great hereafter. This is what we have with us now, thanks to the wonderful material progress of our age, and this is what we shall have with us for many a day to come. Legislate as we may in the line of stringent requirements for safety devices or the abolition of employers’ common-law defenses, the army of the injured will still increase, and the price of our manufacturing greatness will still have to be paid in human blood and tears. To speak of the common-law personal injury action as a remedy for this problem is to jest with serious subjects, to give a stone to one who asks for bread. The terrible economic waste, the overwhelming temptation to the commission of perjury, and the relatively small proportion of the sums recovered which comes to the injured parties in such actions, condemn them as wholly inadequate to meet the difficulty.” Borgnis v. Falk Co., 147 Wis. 327, 133 N. W. 209, 214.

Workmen’s Industrial Insurance Acts.—“In many of the states the compensation acts require the companies to issue policies giving a direct remedy to employees. It is obvious, from the wording of some of the statutes, that the money, I am not answerable for what my servant takes up upon trust; for here is no implied order to the tradesman to trust my servant: but if I usually send him upon trust, or sometimes on various legislatures have not fully understood this subject. They have, in some instances, given to the employees the same right to recover against the insurance company that the employer has. Of course, this inadequately protects the rights of the employee. If they go a little further and say that the employee shall have the same right to recover against the insurer that the employer would have had if he had paid the compensation to the employee, this will be better. But even this is not entirely satisfactory, where the policy contains a provision that the insurer shall be liable only upon payment by the employer of a judgment entered after a trial of the issues. Because the employee may still find himself enmeshed in a net of technicalities by the requirement that the liability of the insurer must be predicated upon a judgment after a trial. Such a provision might be appropriate in common law, or so-called employers' liability cases, as distinguished from workmen's compensation controversies, but it is utterly unfitted for the latter, in which periodical payments are the rule.

"The necessity of some form of insurance in compensation cases is obvious. Under the old rule a judgment for the full amount could be enforced at once when the case finally went to judgment. In compensation cases the payments are distributed over a long period of time, not infrequently for ten or fifteen years. A good many employers become insolvent every year. Unless insured in some way the result would be that while compensation payments were awarded they would be uncollectible, in many cases, after a certain number of payments had been made. Dependents of workmen who had been killed, as well as injured workmen themselves, would therefore find themselves without redress if there was not some method of securing the payment of such benefits. This has been recognized in all of the more recent laws and is becoming a fixed policy in most of the American states.

"Up to this time two methods of insuring such payments have been devised. One is to compel the employer to demonstrate that he is of sufficient financial ability to insure such payments himself. This rule would apply to large corporations, such as railroads, where even if they should go into the hands of a receiver the preference in favor of such claims would be sufficient to insure their payment in most cases. The other is to compel the employer to take insurance either in a stock company or in a mutual association or in a state insurance fund. These problems are comparatively new, and are now being worked out in a number of states, especially New York, Massachusetts, Michigan, California, Ohio, Washington and Connecticut.

"The old employers' insurance policies were invariably limited in amount. That is, it was specified that the company should not be liable for a sum in excess of $5,000 by reason of the injury to or death of one employee, and not more than $10,000 because of any one accident in which two or more employees were injured or killed. Of course, these amounts were sometimes increased. For example, policies were written with limitations of $10,000 and $20,000.

trust and sometimes with ready money, I am answerable for all he takes up; for the tradesman cannot possibly distinguish when he comes by my order, and when upon his own authority.*

§ 581. (3, Negligence of servant.—<sup>[431]</sup> If a servant, lastly, by his negligence does any damage to a stranger, the master shall answer for his neglect: if a smith's servant lames a horse while he is shoeing him, an action lies against the master, and not against the servant.<sup>5</sup> But in these cases the damage must be done, while he is actually employed in the master's service; otherwise the ser-

* Dr. & Stud. d. 2. c. 42. Noy's Max. c. 44.

Policies were also written with an initial limitation of $10,000 and a second limitation of from $25,000 to $100,000. Such policies are still so written, even in the compensation states, unless the law itself requires them to be unlimited. The first law to require the companies to write unlimited policies was that of Massachusetts. That has been followed by similar laws in a number of other states, notably New York, Michigan, Connecticut, California and Texas. In New Jersey the employers are not required to insure, and the policies which have been written in that state have usually been limited in amount and have been in the form of the old employers' liability policies without right on the part of employees to sue the companies direct."—BRADBURY, 1 Workman's Compensation, 960.

5 Primitive notion of legal liability.—The original notion of a tort to one's person or property was an injury caused by an act of a stranger, in which the plaintiff did not in any way participate. A battery, an asportation of a chattel, an entry upon land, were the typical torts. If, on the other hand, one saw fit to authorize another to come into contact with his person or property, and damage ensued, there was, without more, no tort. The person injured took the risk of all injurious consequences, unless the other expressly assumed the risk himself, or unless the peculiar nature of one's calling, as in the case of the smith, imposed a customary duty to act with reasonable skill. This conception is well shown by the remarks of the judges in a case against a horse-doctor. Newton, C. J.: "Perhaps he applied his medicines de son bon gre, and afterwards your horse died; now, since he did it de son bon gre, you shall not have an action. . . . My horse is ill, and I come to a horse-doctor for advice, and he tells me that one of his horses had a similar trouble, and that he applied a certain medicine, and that he will do the same for my horse, and does so, and the horse dies; shall the plaintiff have an action? I say, No." Paston, J.: "You have not shown that he is a common surgeon to cure such horses, and so, although he killed your horse by his medicines, you shall have no action against him without an assumpsit." Newton, C. J.: "If I have a sore on my hand, and he applies a medicine to my heel, by which negligence my hand is maimed, vant shall answer for his own misbehavior. Upon this principle, by the common law,<sup>1</sup> if a servant kept his master's fire negligently, so that his neighbor's house was burned down thereby, an action lay against the master; because this negligence happened in his service: otherwise, if the servant, going along the street with a torch, by negligence sets fire to a house; for there he is not in his master's immediate service: and must himself answer the damage personally. But now the common law is, in the former case, altered by statute 6 Ann., c. 3 (1707), which ordains that no action still I shall not have an action unless he undertook to cure me." The court accordingly decided that a traverse of the assumpsit made a good issue.

<sup>1</sup> Noy's Max. c. 44.

---

It is believed that the view here suggested will explain the following passage in Blackstone, which has puzzled many of his readers: "If a smith's servant lames a horse while he is shoeing him, an action lies against the master, but not against the servant." This is of course, not law to-day, and probably had ceased to be law when written. Blackstone simply repeated the doctrine of the Year-Books. The servant had not expressly assumed to shoe carefully; he was, therefore, no more liable than the surgeon, the barber, and the carpenter, who had not undertaken in the cases already mentioned. This primitive notion of legal liability has, of course, entirely disappeared from the law. An assumpsit is no longer an essential allegation in these actions of tort, and there is, therefore, little or no semblance of analogy between these actions and actions of contract.—AMES, Lect. on Leg. Hist., 131.

"In the sixteenth century, therefore, one who was injured either by or because of the act of others, when their relation was not contractual, could recover both when he did not know of the danger and when he knew of and voluntarily encountered it; but, when the relation resulted from an agreement or understanding, the injured party could not recover, save for injuries caused by a breach of the agreement. Consequently he could not recover when the contract was silent, if he was injured by a danger he knew was peculiar to the undertaking. Ames, Hist. Assump.; 3 Select Essays, 260. In other words, as the law was understood at that time, the reciprocal duties of the parties depended on how the relation between them was created. It was the duty of everyone to use care not to injure or damage those with whom he came in contact. 1 Bl. Comm. 40. It was the duty of those brought together by virtue of a contract to use care not to injure or damage each other in what they agreed to do. The following from Blackstone illustrates this view of the law: 'If a smith's servant lames a horse while he is shoeing him, an action lies against the master, but not against the servant.' 1 Bl. Comm. 431. If an action lies against the master, why not against the servant whose misconduct lamed the horse? Obviously, because the owner of the horse had no contract with the servant, and shall be maintained against any, in whose house or chamber any fire shall accidentally begin; for their own loss is sufficient punishment for their own or their servant's carelessness.<sup>6</sup> But if such fire happens through negligence of any servant (whose loss is commonly very little) such servant shall forfeit 100*l.* to be distributed among the sufferers; and, in default of payment, shall be committed to some workhouse and there kept to hard labor for eighteen months.<sup>m</sup> A master is, lastly, chargeable if any of his family layeth or casteth anything out of his house into the street or common highway, to the damage of any individual, or the common <sup>m</sup> Upon a similar principle, by the law of the twelve tables at Rome, a person by whose negligence any fire began was bound to pay double to the sufferers; or, if he was not able to pay, was to suffer a corporal punishment.

---

the horse came rightfully under the servant's control, in such cases there could be no recovery, because there was neither wrongful possession nor breach of contract. The owner of the horse had a contract with the blacksmith, which made it his duty to use care in shoeing the horse; consequently he was liable for a failure to perform that duty. 2 Harv. Law Rev. 1, 18. This view of imposed duties prevailed until the middle of the nineteenth century, and during all that time it was necessary to know how the relation which brought the parties together was created in order to determine their rights and liabilities. Special rules were gradually adopted and applied to the more common relations, as landlord and tenant, and carrier and passenger. These rules were all based upon the proposition that, when the relation was created by contract, neither of the parties owed the other any duty as to known dangers. Priestley v. Fowler, 3 M. & W. 1." Kambour v. Boston & M. R. R. Co., 86 Atl. (N. H.) 624, 627.

<sup>6</sup> All the earlier American cases cite this passage or adopt Blackstone's view of the statute. Clark v. Foot, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 421; Lehigh Bridge Co. v. Lehigh Nav. Co., 4 Rawle (Pa.), 9, semble, per Gibson, J., pp. 24-25; Bachelor v. Heagan, 18 Me. 32; Tourtellot v. Rosebrook, 11 Met. (52 Mass.) 460; Stuart v. Hawley, 22 Barb. (N. Y.) 619; Fahn v. Reichart, 8 Wis. 255, 76 Am. Dec. 237. It is the view of these American cases that 6 Anne, c. 3, and amendatory statutes, constitute a part of the American common law. In Lansing v. Stone, 37 Barb. (N. Y.) 15, 17, Blackstone's view is carried to its logical conclusion, and it is held that a defendant is not liable for the spread of a fire started in his room, even by his negligence.

But in 1847 in the English case of Filliter v. Phippard, 11 A. & E. (N. S.) 347, Lord Denman said "it would appear that Blackstone had drawn a conclusion from the enactment cited (Stat. 6 Ann., c. 3), which it by no means sustains." See Bohlen, Cases on Torts, 559 n; Boston Ice Co. v. Boston & M. R. Co., 86 Atl. (N. H.) 356.

nuisance of his majesty's liege people:<sup>a</sup> for the master hath the superintendence and charge of all his household. And this also agrees with the civil law;<sup>o</sup> which holds, that the pater familias (head of the family), in this and similar cases, "ob alterius culpam tenetur, sive servi, sive liberi (is held accountable for the fault of another, whether of his servant, or his child)."

[432] We may observe, that in all the cases here put, the master may be frequently a loser by the trust reposed in his servant, but never can be a gainer: he may frequently be answerable for his servant's misbehavior, but never can shelter himself from punishment by laying the blame on his agent. The reason of this is still uniform and the same; that the wrong done by the servant is looked upon in law as the wrong of the master himself; and it is a standing maxim, that no man shall be allowed to make any advantage of his own wrong.

<sup>a</sup> Noy's Max. c. 44.

<sup>o</sup> Ff. 9. 3. 1. Inst. 4. 5. 1.

§ 582. Marriage.—The second private relation of persons is that of marriage, which includes the reciprocal rights and duties of husband and wife;<sup>1</sup> or as most of our elder law books call them, of baron and feme. In the consideration of which I shall in the first place inquire, how marriages may be contracted or made; shall next point out the manner in which they may be dissolved; and shall, lastly, take a view of the legal effects and consequence of marriage.

<sup>1</sup> The domestic relations in law and ethics.—The difference between Blackstone's theory of law and that now current is clearly seen in these chapters upon the domestic relations when compared with the doctrine of modern cases: for Blackstone regarding ethics or natural law a part of his subject, has devoted much space to the duties of husband and wife, parent and child, to each other, which are not strictly enforceable by law and can rarely become the subject of litigation. No fault can be found with him for this mode of treatment, because it was the necessary result of the definitions with which he commences his work: but a modern judge or writer, to whom law deals only with such rights and duties as can, by their very nature, be enforced by the power of the state, goes entirely beyond his province when he lays down the rules by which the conduct of the parents toward the child, or of one spouse toward the other, is to be governed in the tribunal of his own conscience, or as a matter of paternal or conjugal duty.

And even the legal duties of a parent or a husband, in the supply of subsistence, or clothing, or education, must be distinguished from those to which an absolute right corresponds in the object of the duty. These duties may be enforced indirectly by punishing a parent or husband for neglect, or, in some cases, by giving to third persons a right of action for goods furnished or moneys laid out in supply of their deficiencies. But the law gives no action to the wife or child, directly, for any breach of the husband's or the parent's duty.

One illustration of the consequences produced by neglecting this distinction may, perhaps, seem more ludicrous than instructive or useful. The statement of the commentator (p. *444) that the husband, by the old law, might give the wife moderate correction, has often been used, of late, to point criticisms upon the supposed barbarism of that law, and, by implication, if not expressly, to exalt our own. But the truth is that, if we confine ourselves to the strict rule of law, there has been no change in it from the earliest time. The rule referred to by Blackstone is that ethical rule which pointed out to the husband the § 533. 1. Marriage, a civil contract—a. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction over marriage.—Our law considers marriage in no other light than as a civil contract. The holiness of the matrimonial state is left entirely to the ecclesiastical law:<sup>2</sup> the temporal courts not having jurisdiction to consider unlawful marriage as a sin, but merely as a civil inconvenience. The punishment, therefore, or annulling, of incestuous or other unscriptural marriages, is the province of the spiritual courts; which act pro salute animæ (for proper method of governing his own household, as he should answer for the souls committed to his charge at the great day: and it was not the law of England, so much as the law of God, that was supposed to give him this wholesome means of fulfilling his responsibilities, just as it admonished the parent not to spare the rod. The only rule of the common law bearing on the subject was that which denied to the wife as well as the child an action for assault and battery, which any stranger might bring for such a correction. That rule of the common law remains unchanged so far as England and most of our American states are concerned to the present day. But in the "Body of Liberties," enacted by the Gen. Court of Mass., A. D. 1641, which was probably the first colonial legislation that exercised any considerable influence upon the development of American law, it was expressly provided that: "80. Every married woman shall be free from bodily correction or stripes by her husband, unless it be in his own defense upon her assault. If there be any just cause of correction, complaint shall be made to authority assembled in some court, from which only she shall receive it."

No doubt many of the diversities between American and English common law which are usually accounted for by mere changes of custom might be traced back to distinct legislation of the colonies. But the denial of any common law extending over all the states prevents us from reasoning from these colonial statutes to other states. If the common law, as we now understand it, had been the foundation of Blackstone's remark, it should have been made in the present tense and not in the preterit. It was only because Blackstone's conception of his theme included "ethics or natural law," that he stated a rule of personal conduct with which the common law, in our sense, had nothing to do: and it is a change in ethics, and in the teachings of the church, not in the common law, that has done away with it.—HAMMOND.

2 Marriage in the ecclesiastical law.—The law of marriage as laid down in our older books is subject to some peculiar difficulties, beside those common to all older law. Much of it was formed in the spiritual courts, which had exclusive jurisdiction of the subject (except so far as property rights grew out of it), and many rules now accepted in America as part of the common law were really formed in these courts, which in most respects are treated as of no common-law authority. (1 Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, §§ 56, 58, 68, 71.) The court of equity had no jurisdiction whatever of the subject. (1 Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, § 69, n. 6.) The legality of a marriage shall never be the welfare of the soul).<sup>a</sup> And, taking it in this civil light, the law treats it as it does all other contracts: allowing it to be good and valid in all cases, where the parties at the time of making it were, in the first place, willing to contract; secondly, able to contract; and, lastly, actually did contract, in the proper forms and solemnities required by law.

§ 584. b. Consent of the parties.—<sup>[434]</sup> First, they must be willing to contract. "Consensus non concubitus, facit nuptias

<sup>a</sup> Salk. 121.

---

agitated in equity, especially after sentence in the spiritual court, although the proceedings in the spiritual court were only faint and collusive. (Halfield v. Halfield, MS. case, 1715; cited, 5 Vin. Abr. 262, tit. "Marriage," G. 8. Cf. Burtis v. Eurtis, Hopk. Ch. 557.)

The common-law courts could issue a writ of prohibition to the spiritual courts when they exceeded their jurisdiction, or otherwise transgressed the law of the land; but otherwise had to recognize their judgments as conclusive upon such questions as unques accoupli in loied mat. marriage or no marriage, etc.

As a rule, the church courts throughout the middle ages held that there could be no lawful marriage without the sanction of the church, and that wherever that sanction was regularly given, the marriage was indissoluble and even incontestable in the lay tribunals. Hence the common-law courts recognized many marriages as binding that would not now be considered so, because there had been an actual ceremony, and no question of it in the spiritual courts. It is even said that if a man espouse his mother, they are baron and feme until it is defeated (4 Viner [340], 35; citing, Y. B. 9 Hen. VI, 34); or his sister. (4 Viner [340], 35; citing Y. B. 39 Edw. III, 31 b.) So if a priest take wife, or a nun take husband, impediments that then rated among the highest (Viner, ubi supra); but in Comyn will be found rulings the other way. (B. & F. B. 6.) If an idiot a nativitate take wife, they are baron and feme, and their issue legitimate. (Viner, citing MS. case of Still v. West, 3 Jac.) About the only point on which the common-law courts assumed to treat a marriage as null, without reference to the court Christian, was the case of a prior undissolved marriage. (Viner, B. & F. A. 2; Comyn B. & F. B. 6.)

As the common-law courts in England had no jurisdiction of marriage or divorce, it becomes a question whether those of America can act on the precedents of the ecclesiastical courts in such matters, as common-law authority. The leading case in the negative is Burtis v. Burtis, 1 Hopk. Ch. 557, 14 Am. Dec. 563, where Sanford, Ch., held that the ecclesiastical law of England was no part of the common law, and never adopted as such in New York, and consequently that the only causes of divorce in New York were those given by statute; and he refused a divorce for impotence because not given by statute.

(Consent, not cohabitation, makes the marriage),”<sup>a</sup> is the maxim of the civil law in this case:<sup>b</sup> and it is adopted by the common lawyers,<sup>c</sup> who indeed have borrowed (especially in ancient times) almost all their notions of the legitimacy of marriage from the canon and civil laws.

<sup>b</sup> Ff. 50. 17. 30.

<sup>c</sup> Co. Litt. 33.

(See, also, Hamaker v. Hamaker, 18 Ill. 137, 65 Am. Dec. 705.) Contra, Crump v. Morgan, 3 Ired. Eq. 91, 40 Am. Dec. 447, holds that the civil and canon laws as administered in the ecclesiastical courts are part of the common law (citing 1 Bl. Comm. 79; Hale Hist. Com. Law, 27, 32), and adopted by us with it, in testamentary and matrimonial causes. (Redmond v. Collins, 4 Dev. 330, 27 Am. Dec. 208; Wightman v. Wightman, 4 Johns. Ch. 343.) A third view is possible; that even though the English precedents are common law, yet they are set aside by the statutes of a state “which have virtually repealed the whole body of the ecclesiastical and common law on the subject,” as was said by that great judge, Lumpkin, C. J., in Brown v. Westbrook, 27 Ga. 102, 106, quoted by Bishop in 1 Marriage and Divorce, 137.—HAMMOND.

<sup>s</sup> Consensus non concubitus facit nuptias.—This maxim has so often been quoted as proving the binding force of a mere marriage by consent, without form, that it is worth while to inquire into its origin and true meaning. (For such quotations, see 2 Kent, Comm., 86; Bishop on Marriage and Divorce.) Schouler on Domestic Relations, section 25, criticises by implication former writers for assuming that the consensus means mere volition: he would interpret it by “a simple expression of mutual consent and no more.” But does this improve the matter?

The maxim is usually quoted from L. 30 Dig. de Regulis Juris, where it stands as above, credited to Ulpianus, lib. 36, ad Sabinum. But it is found in another place (L. 15 Dig. de cond. et dem. 15, 1, credited to lib. 35, of same work, no doubt a mere error in the one number or the other) and here we have the context from which we learn what Ulpian really meant by it. “When a legacy has been left under this condition, if married in the family, the condition seems performed as soon as the wife is led home, although she may not have yet come into her husband’s bed-chamber, for not concubitus, but consensus makes the marriage.”

“Led home” (ducta) might be translated by “as soon as the ceremony is performed,” for it evidently refers to the solemn procession from the bride’s home to that of the husband, which was the most public part of the rite. Ulpian’s meaning evidently is that the ceremony, evidencing the consent of parties, is a complete marriage, even before it is consummated by intercourse. The passage with its context shows this; still more when read in connection with the numerous other passages defining the same word; nuptias contrahunt justas qui secundum præcepta legum coeunt (Inst. tit. de Nuptiis pr.) and those which require the consent of all qui coeunt, quorumque in potestate sunt.

§ 585. c. Capacity of the parties.—Secondly, they must be able to contract. In general, all persons are able to contract themselves in marriage, unless they labor under some particular disabilities, and incapacities. What those are, it will here be our business to inquire.

§ 586. (1) Disabilities — (a) Canonical disabilities.—Now, these disabilities are of two sorts: first, such as are canonical, and therefore sufficient by the ecclesiastical laws to avoid the marriage in the spiritual court; but these in our law only make the marriage voidable, and not ipso facto void, until sentence of nullity be obtained. Of this nature are pre-contract; consanguinity, or relation

(L. 2 D. de ritu nupt. and others collected by Pothier, Pandectæ, lib. 1, tit. 17, cap. 4, § 1, art. 2, par. 379, etc.) The same doctrine is now held to be the law in Scotland, where the Roman law has preserved a more direct influence than in England or the United States. So stated by Lord Campbell in Hamilton v. Hamilton, 9 Clark & F. 326.—HAMMOND.

Marriage as a contract.—The conception of marriage as a contract is purely modern, unknown to either Germanic or Roman ancient law. Its popularity probably dates only from Donellus, Com., lib. 13, c. 18; Glück, lib. 23, tit. 2, p. 122. The Romans never applied the term contractus to this or any other institute of the jus personarum. Donellus acknowledges this, but makes a formal argument from the phrase nuptias contrahi (Inst. de Nuptiis), and the text calling marriage societas, that marriage is a kind of partnership, and like all partnerships belongs to the consensual contracts. The French contrat de mariage is a marriage settlement, not the marriage itself. (Glück, p. 123.) Even the coemptio was not a contract between the married parties. (Gaius, i. 113.) The derivation of our wedlock from wed might seem to identify it with contract; but wed was not a contract proper; it was only the conception out of which the German form of contract subsequently grew.

In England it is now settled doctrine that a celebration was always an essential requisite of valid marriage, even before the statutory requirement of 26 Geo. II, c. 33. (Reg. v. Millis, 10 Clark & F. 534, where the subject is discussed very fully.) But the historical fact is clearly otherwise, and we know that for centuries in England the same rule prevailed as in other Catholic countries, which made the marriage binding without religious celebration until the council of Trent. (Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 54; Hallett v. Collins, 10 How. 174.) And it is said that the courts in Canada differ from the House of Lords on this point. (Breakey v. Breakey, 2 Up. Can. Q. B. 349.)

“Marriage is more than a contract. It is not a mere matter of pecuniary consideration. It is a great public institution, giving character to our whole civil polity.” (Per Stewart, J., in Noel v. Ewing, 9 Ind. 37.) It is a status, a domestic relation resulting from a consummated contract to marry. (Ditson by blood; and affinity, or relation by marriage; and some particular corporal infirmities. And these canonical disabilities are either grounded upon the express words of the divine law, or are consequences plainly deducible from thence: it therefore being sinful in the persons, who labor under them, to attempt to contract matrimony together, they are properly the object of the ecclesiastical magistrate's coercion; in order to separate the offenders, and inflict penance for the offense, pro salute animarum (for the welfare of their souls). But such marriages not being void ab initio (from the beginning), but voidable only by sentence of separation, they are esteemed valid to all civil purposes, unless such separation is actually made during the life of the parties. For, after the death of either of them, the courts of common law will not suffer the spiritual court to declare such marriages to have been void; because such declaration cannot now tend to the reformation of the parties.<sup>d</sup> And therefore when a man had married his first wife's sister,<sup>4</sup> and after her death the bishop's court was proceeding [435] to annul the marriage and bastardize the issue, the court of king's

<sup>d</sup> Ibid.

---

v. Ditson, 4 R. I. 87; People v. Darnell, 25 Mich. 247.) Therefore, "to give jurisdiction in a divorce suit, the plaintiff must be a resident of the state where the divorce is obtained. This fact gives jurisdiction of [his] person, and renders the divorce (notice having been given to the defendant by publication or otherwise) valid as to the plaintiff; and being valid as to one, public policy demands that it should be valid as to both parties." (Per Perkins, C. J., in State v. Hood, S. C. Indiana; 9 Ch. L. N. 376, citing Falen v. Falen, 2 Blackf. 407; Jenners v. Jenners, 24 Ind. 355; Ewing v. Ewing, 24 Ind. 468; Ditson v. Ditson, 4 R. I. 87.)—HAMMOND.

<sup>4</sup> Deceased wife's sister.—Before the 28th August, 1907 (Deceased Wife's Sister's Marriage Act, 1907), a marriage with a deceased wife's sister or half-sister was void as being within the prohibited degrees of affinity. It is now provided that no such marriage, whether contracted before or after that date, within the realm or without, shall be deemed to have been or shall be void or voidable as a civil contract by reason only of such affinity, provided that in case any such marriage was, before the 28th August, 1907, annulled, or that either party thereto, after the marriage and during the life of the other party, did before that date lawfully marry another person, it is to be deemed to have become void upon and after the day on which it was so annulled, or on which either party so lawfully married another person.—HALSBURY, 16 Laws of Eng. 284.

bench granted a prohibition quoad hoc (as to this); but permitted them to proceed to punish the husband for incest.* These canonical disabilities being entirely the province of the ecclesiastical courts, our books are perfectly silent concerning them. But there are a few statutes, which serve as directories to those courts, of which it will be proper to take notice. By statute 32 Hen. VIII, c. 38 (Marriage, 1540), it is declared, that all persons may lawfully marry, but such as are prohibited by God's law; and that all marriages contracted by lawful persons in the face of the church, and consummate with bodily knowledge, and fruit of children, shall be indissoluble. And (because in the times of popery a great variety of degrees of kindred were made impediments to marriage, which impediments might, however, be bought off for money) it is declared by the same statute, that nothing (God's law except) shall impeach any marriage, but within the Levitical degrees; the furthest of which is that between uncle and niece.<sup>f</sup> By the same statute all impediments, arising from pre-contracts to other persons, were abolished and declared of none effect, unless they had been consummated with bodily knowledge: in which case the canon law holds such contract to be a marriage de facto. But this branch of the statute was repealed by statute 2 & 3 Edw. VI, c. 23 (Marriage, 1548). How far the act of 26 Geo. II, c. 33 (Clandestine Marriages, 1753), (which prohibits all suits in ecclesiastical courts to compel a marriage, in consequence of any contract) may collaterally extend to revive this clause of Henry VIII's statute, and abolish<sup>1</sup> the impediment of pre-contract, I leave to be considered by the canonists.<sup>5</sup>

§ 587. (b) Civil disabilities.—The other sort of disabilities are those which are created, or at least enforced, by the municipal

* Salk. 548.

<sup>f</sup> Gilb. Rep. 158.

---

<sup>5</sup> Civil and canonical disabilities.—Canonical disabilities, as such, have practically disappeared, the inability to procreate children being the only one that remains in that category. The disability arising from precontract had ceased to be any disability at all by virtue of Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act of 1753 (26 Geo. II, c. 33, repealed and re-enacted on this point by the Marriage Act of 1823). The disabilities resulting from consanguinity and affinity, enumerated by Blackstone as canonical, were made civil disabilities by the Marriage Act, 1835. See 2 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), 384.

laws. And, though some of them may be grounded on natural law, yet they are regarded by the laws of the land, not so much in the light of any moral offense, as on account of the civil inconveniences they draw after them. These civil disabilities<sup>6</sup> make the contract void ab initio (from the beginning), and not merely voidable; not that they [436] dissolve a contract already formed, but they render the parties incapable of forming any contract at all: they do not put asunder those who are joined together, but they previously hinder the junction. And, if any persons under these legal incapacities come together, it is a meretricious, and not a matrimonial, union.

§ 588. (i) Existing prior marriage.—The first of these legal disabilities is a prior marriage, or having another husband or wife living;<sup>7</sup> in which case, besides the penalties consequent upon it as a felony, the second marriage is to all intents and purposes void: polygamy being condemned both by the law of the New Testament, and the policy of all prudent states, especially in these northern climates. And Justinian, even in the climate of modern Turkey, is express,<sup>a</sup> that “duas uxores eodem tempore habere non licet (it is not lawful to have two wives at one time).”

<sup>6</sup> Bro. Abr. tit. Bastardy, pl. 8.

<sup>a</sup> Inst. 1. 10. 6.

---

<sup>6</sup> Except the disability arising from want of age.

<sup>7</sup> Disappearance of spouse.—Continuous absence of one spouse unheard from for seven years (or such term as may be fixed by state law) exempts the other from the penalty of bigamy, but does not make the second marriage lawful. (Glass v. Glass, 114 Mass. 563.) Quere as to effect of 1 Jac. I, c. 11, 1604, which may be common law in this country.

In some states the marriage is made valid. (Rev. Stats. Ky. 380; Strode v. Strode, 3 Bush, 227.) In others the marriage is null only from the time of a decree annulling it. (Crosey v. McKinney, 30 Barb. 47.) And generally when the former spouse disappears and is never heard of again, the presumption in favor of the second marriage will sustain it, even though less than the statutory period has elapsed between the marriages (Kelly v. Drew, 12 Allen, 107; Yates v. Houston, 3 Tex. 433); and though the party involved may have been the one to blame in the separation. (White v. Lowe, 1 Redf. 376.) Very commonly the children of such a marriage are legitimate by statute, though the marriage itself is invalid.—HAMMOND.

§ 589. (ii) Want of age.—The next legal disability is want of age. This is sufficient to avoid all other contracts, on account of the imbecility of judgment in the parties contracting; a fortiori, therefore, it ought to avoid this, the most important contract of any. Therefore, if a boy under fourteen, or a girl under twelve years of age, marries, this marriage is only inchoate and imperfect; and, when either of them comes to the age of consent aforesaid, they may disagree and declare the marriage void, without any divorce or sentence in the spiritual court. This is founded on the civil law.<sup>1</sup> But the canon law pays a greater regard to the constitution than the age of the parties:<sup>2</sup> for if they are habiles ad matrimonium (fit for marriage), it is a good marriage, whatever their age may be. And in our law it is so far a marriage, that, if at the age of consent they agree to continue together, they need not be married again.<sup>1</sup> If the husband be of years of discretion, and the wife under twelve, when she comes to years of discretion he may disagree as well as she may: for in contracts the obligation must be mutual;<sup>3</sup> both must be bound, or neither: and so it is, vice versa, when the wife is of years of discretion and the husband under.<sup>m</sup>

§ 590. (iii) Nonconsent of parents.—[437] Another incapacity arises from want of consent of parents or guardians. By the common law, if the parties themselves were of the age of consent, there wanted no other concurrence to make the marriage valid: and

<sup>1</sup> Leon. Constit. 109.

<sup>1</sup> Co. Litt. 79.

<sup>2</sup> Decretal. l. 4. tit. 2. qu. 3.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid.

---

<sup>3</sup> Disagreement to marriage of infant.—The reason given is hardly a good one, as Professor Christian has pointed out. An infant's right to disown his contract at majority does not prevent it from binding the other party if of full age. The true reason, doubtless, why both had the option to disagree in the case of marriage was that neither party could judge of the infant's fitness or attractiveness as a spouse until the marriageable age was reached. In an age when the espousals were often made in early childhood, it was but just that either party should have an opportunity of withdrawal when the child had grown up. It would have been a doubtful favor to the infant, especially if a female, to compel the adult to marry her when her person or disposition did not please him.—HAMMOND.

this was agreeable to the canon law. But, by several statutes,<sup>a</sup> penalties of 100*l.* are laid on every clergyman who marries a couple either without publication of banns (which may give notice to parents or guardians) or without a license, to obtain which the consent of parents or guardians must be sworn to. And by the statute 4 & 5 Ph. & M., c. 8 (Abduction, 1558), whosoever marries any woman child under the age of sixteen years, without consent of parents or guardians, shall be subject to fine, or five years' imprisonment: and her estate during the husband's life shall go to and be enjoyed by the next heir. The civil law, indeed, required the consent of the parent or tutor at all ages; unless the children were emancipated, or out of the parents' power:<sup>o</sup> and if such consent from the father was wanting, the marriage was null, and the children illegitimate;<sup>p</sup> but the consent of the mother or guardians, if unreasonably withheld, might be redressed and supplied by the judge, or the president of the province:<sup>q</sup> and if the father was non compos, a similar remedy was given.<sup>r</sup> These provisions are adopted and imitated by the French and Hollanders, with this difference: that in France the sons cannot marry without consent of parents till thirty years of age, nor the daughters till twenty-five;<sup>s</sup> and in Holland, the sons are at their own disposal at twenty-five, and the daughters at twenty.<sup>t</sup> Thus hath stood, and thus at present stands, the law in other neighboring countries. And it has lately been thought proper to introduce somewhat of the same policy into our laws, by statute 26 Geo. II, c. 33 (Clandestine Marriages, 1753), whereby it is enacted that all marriages celebrated by license (for banns suppose notice) where either of the parties is under twenty-one (not being [438] a widow or widower, who are supposed emancipated), without the consent of the father, or, if he be not living, of the mother or guardians, shall be absolutely void. A like provision is made as in the civil law, where the mother

<sup>a</sup> 6 & 7 Will. III. c. 6 (Duties on Marriages, 1694). 7 & 8 W. III. c. 35 (Marriage Without Banns, 1695). 10 Ann. c. 19 (Customs and Excise, 1711.)

<sup>o</sup> Ff. 23. 2. 2. & 18.

<sup>p</sup> Ff. 1. 5. 11.

<sup>q</sup> Cod. 5. 4. 1, & 20.

<sup>r</sup> Inst. 1. 10. 1.

<sup>s</sup> Domat. of Dowries. § 2. Montesq. Sp. L. 23. 7.

<sup>t</sup> Vinnius in Inst. l. 1. t. 10.

or guardian is non compos, beyond sea, or unreasonably froward, to dispense with such consent at the discretion of the lord chancellor: but no provision is made, in case the father should labor under any mental or other incapacity. Much may be, and much has been, said both for and against this innovation upon our ancient laws and constitution. On the one hand, it prevents the clandestine marriages of minors, which are often a terrible inconvenience to those private families wherein they happen. On the other hand, restraints upon marriages, especially among the lower class, are evidently detrimental to the public, by hindering the increase of people; and to religion and morality, by encouraging licentiousness and debauchery among the single of both sexes; and thereby destroying one end of society and government, which is concubitu prohibere vago (to forbid a promiscuous intercourse). And of this last inconvenience the Roman laws were so sensible, that at the same time that they forbade marriage without the consent of parents or guardians, they were less rigorous upon that very account with regard to other restraints: for, if a parent did not provide a husband for his daughter, by the time she arrived at the age of twenty-five, and she afterwards made a slip in her conduct, he was not allowed to disinherit her upon that account; "quia non sua culpa, sed parentum, id commisisse cognoscitur (because she was considered to have committed it, not through her own fault, but that of her parents)."<sup>u</sup>

§ 591. (iv) Mental incapacity.—A fourth incapacity is want of reason;<sup>9</sup> without a competent share of which, as no other, so neither can the matrimonial contract, be valid.<sup>w</sup> It was formerly adjudged that the issue of an idiot was legitimate, and consequently

<sup>u</sup> Nov. 115. § 11.

<sup>w</sup> 1 Roll. Abr. 357.

<sup>9</sup> Insanity as avoiding marriage.—That insanity makes the marriage void and null ab initio is clearly shown by Chancellor Kent in Wightman v. Wightman, 4 Johns. Ch. 343; Ewell's L. C. in Coverture, 602, though at the same time he holds that the nullity should be declared by some court of appropriate jurisdiction "for the sake of the good order of society, and the quiet and relief of the party," and holds also that the court of chancery is the appropriate court. Whether that court have power to declare a marriage null in cases where the statute gives no ground of divorce, he leaves undetermined.

that his marriage was valid. A strange determination, since consent is absolutely requisite to matrimony, and neither idiots nor lunatics are capable of consenting to anything. And therefore the civil law judged much more sensibly when it made such deprivations of reason a previous impediment, [439] though not a cause of divorce, if they happened after marriage.* And modern resolutions have adhered to the reason of the civil law, by determining<sup>7</sup> that the marriage of a lunatic, not being in a lucid interval, was absolutely void. But as it might be difficult to prove the exact state of the party's mind at the actual celebration of the nuptials, * Ff. 23. tit. 1. l. 8, & tit. 2. l. 16.     · v Morrison's Case. Coram. Delegat.

---

As to the use of the terms "void" and "voidable," see Professor Ewell's note, page 609.

Insanity at the time of marriage is not necessarily fatal to the status, where the cohabitation is continued. If the party recovers sanity, the cohabitation will affirm the invalid contract without any new solemnization. (Campbell v. Mesier, 4 Johns. Ch. 334, 8 Am. Dec. 570; Cole v. Cole, 5 Sneed, 57, 70 Am. Dec. 275. Allis v. Billings, 6 Met. 415, 39 Am. Dec. 744, though quoted to this point, is a case on the ratification of a deed. It may be read for the criticism on "void" and "voidable.")

What degree of insanity is sufficient to avoid the marriage? The old decisions that no degree was sufficient for the purpose rested unquestionably on the doctrine, that marriage was a sacrament and fell with it. (True v. Ranney, 21 N. H. 52, 53 Am. Dec. 165.) Some cases go to the other extreme and hold that a valid marriage may be formed in a condition that would invalidate any other contract. (Ex parte Glen, 4 Des. (S. C.) 546.) But in England it seems settled that the only question for the court is whether the mind of the contracting party was diseased or not at the time of the contract; if the evidence establishes that fact, the court will not enter into the consideration of the extent of the derangement. If disease is shown, the court has no means of gauging the extent of the derangement consequent upon it, or of affirming the limits within which the disease might operate to obscure or divest the mental power. (Peaty v. Peaty, L. R. 1 P. D. 335.) But some American cases hold that the question is whether the party is sane enough to marry: that the court must look to the effect of the disease in this particular consequence. "It is not altogether a question of brain quantity, or of brain quality in the abstract; . . . it is whether the alleged insane acted rationally regarding marriage, and the particular marriage; not indeed whether he acted wisely, but whether he acted from the impulse of a mind sane as respects the thing done." (1 Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, §§ 128, 129, and cases cited, few of which, however, discriminate between general incompetence and incompetence quoad hoc. See, also, cases collected 44 Am. Dec. 55, 56.)—HAMMOND.

upon this account (concurring with some private family * reasons) the statute 15 Geo. II, c. 30 (Marriage of Lunatics, 1741), has provided, that the marriage of lunatics and persons under frenzies (if found lunatics under a commission, or committed to the care of trustees by any act of parliament) before they are declared of sound mind by the lord chancellor or the majority of such trustees, shall be totally void.

§ 592. d. Celebration of marriage.—Lastly, the parties must not only be willing and able to contract, but actually must contract themselves in due form of law,<sup>10</sup> to make it a good civil marriage. Any contract made, per verba de præsenti, or in words of the present tense, and in case of cohabitation per verba de futuro (in * See private acts 23 Geo. II. c. 6 (1749).

---

<sup>10</sup> Marriage formal or by reputation.—The contract of marriage is tripartite, the husband, the wife, and the state being parties thereto; and it can neither be entered into nor dissolved except by the consent of and in the manner prescribed by the state. (It necessarily follows that no admission by either party to the contract, however conclusive upon such party, can be conclusive upon the state in a suit for dissolution of the contract.) (Summerbell v. Summerbell, 37 N. J. Eq. 603, 605; Roche v. Washington, 19 Ind. 53, 81 Am. Dec. 376; Cabell v. Cabell, 1 Met. (Ky.) 319.)

Marriage is not merely a civil contract, but something more. "The two parties whose consent is indispensable, with the consent of the state, whose concurrence also is indispensable, proceed to take upon themselves obligations of a solemn and indissoluble character." (Per Gantt, J., in Dyer v. Brannock, 2 Mo. App. 432, 449. The passage of this opinion, pp. 444-449, should be read as an admirable statement of the true legal nature of marriage as a relation. See, also, to same effect, remarks of Wright, J., in Lucas v. Sawyer, 17 Iowa, 522, and cases cited.)

The earlier American cases usually hold that there must be a formal marriage before a clergyman or civil officer (except in the case of Quakers, Jews, etc.), though his presence seems to be all that the law required, and no form or ceremony was essential. (Milford v. Worcester, 7 Mass. 48, 1807.) A few states still adhere to the requirement of a formal marriage. (Commonwealth v. Munson, 127 Mass. 459, 34 Am. Rep. 411; State v. Hodgskins, 19 Me. 155, 36 Am. Dec. 742; Estill v. Rogers, 1 Bush (Ky.), 62; Robertson v. State, 42 Ala. 509; Port v. Port, 70 Ill. 484.) But the United States supreme court holds that this is not a requirement of the common law, and that state statutes are not inconsistent with it, unless they go further than to prescribe a form of marriage, by expressly avoiding marriages where that form is not observed. (Meister v. Moore, 96 U. S. 76, 24 L. Ed. 826. The same question had been words of the future tense) also, between persons able to contract, was before the late act deemed a valid marriage to many purposes; and the parties might be compelled in the spiritual courts to celebrate it in facie ecclesie (in the face of the church). But these verbal contracts are now of no force, to compel a future marriage.<sup>a</sup> Neither is any marriage at present valid that is not celebrated in some parish church or public chapel, unless by dispensation from the Archbishop of Canterbury. It must also be preceded by publication of banns, or by license from the spiritual judge. Many left unanswered by an equal division of the court in Jewell's Lessee v. Jewell, 1 How. 219, 11 L. Ed. 108.)

<sup>a</sup> Stat. 26 Geo. II. c. 33 (Clandestine Marriages, 1753).

---

The courts of some states (e. g., New York, Missouri) have gone very far in indulging a presumption of marriage from cohabitation and reputation, declarations of the parties, etc., even where there was no pretense of showing an actual ceremony or formal contract of marriage. (Fenton v. Reed, 4 Johns. 52, 4 Am. Dec. 244; Jackson v. Claw, 18 Johns. 345; Clayton v. Wardell, 4 N. Y. 230; O'Gara v. Eisenlohr, 38 N. Y. 296; Brinkley v. Brinkley, 50 N. Y. 184, 10 Am. Rep. 460.) Note that in most of these cases the question arose after the death of one party, or both, and the cohabitation had lasted until death, and the rights of children or of the survivors were to be protected. Aliter as between the parties themselves. (See Collins v. Collins, 71 N. Y. 269, 80 N. Y. 1.) Such a presumption has been made even where it was clear that the parties cohabited at first without marriage (first two cases above; Rose v. Clark, 8 Paige (N. Y.) 574), or where there was a subsequent actual marriage (Starr v. Peck, 1 Hill (N. Y.), 270; Betsinger v. Chapman, 88 N. Y. 487); and it is not necessary to show any precise time to which the presumption of a change from illicit to lawful connection attaches. (Caujolle v. Ferrie, 23 N. Y. 90; Badger v. Badger, 88 N. Y. 547, 42 Am. Rep. 263.) The same presumption from acts abroad or at sea, where there is no evidence of law different from that of the forum (even though it is known to be so). (Hynes v. McDermott, 82 N. Y. 41, 37 Am. Rep. 538.)

Cohabitation and reputation of being husband and wife must both exist before a presumption of marriage can be raised. Either alone is not sufficient for that purpose. (Cargile v. Wood, 63 Mo. 501, 513; following, 1 Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, § 438; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 107. This was the case of a child born in 1861 of parents who had cohabited since 1853, and had been indicted for adultery in 1859, the father pleading guilty.) And where the cohabitation is at first notoriously illicit, it will not support such a presumption. (Lord Eldon, in Cunningham v. Cunningham, 2 Dow. P. C. 482.) If it is alleged that it subsequently changed to a lawful one, the burden of proof is on the party to show at what time it became lawful. (Clayton v.

other formalities are likewise prescribed by the act; the neglect of which, though penal, does not invalidate the marriage. It is held to be also essential to a marriage, that it be performed by a person in orders;<sup>b</sup> though the intervention of a priest to solemnize this contract is merely juris positivi (of positive law), and not juris naturalis aut divini (of natural or divine law): it being said that Pope Innocent the Third was the first who ordained the celebration of marriage in the church;<sup>c</sup> before [440] which it was totally a civil contract.<sup>11</sup> And, in the times of the grand rebellion, all Wardell, 4 N. Y. 230; Matter of Taylor, 9 Paige (N. Y.), 611; Rose v. Clark, 8 Paige (N. Y.), 574.) But an executory contract of marriage followed by cohabitation does not establish a marriage at common law (Cheney v. Arnold, 15 N. Y. 345, 69 Am. Dec. 609; Duncan v. Duncan, 10 Ohio St. 181; Queen v. Millis, 10 Clark & F. 534; Beamish v. Beamish, 9 H. L. Cas. 274); though it may be prima facie evidence of a marriage de præsenti. (Peck v. Peck, 12 B. I. 485, 34 Am. Rep. 702).

<sup>b</sup> Salk. 119.

<sup>c</sup> Moor. 170.

---

There are dicta and even cases which sustain a marriage per verba de futuro by a promise to marry, followed by cohabitation. In states where an actual marriage may be presumed from cohabitation there is of course no objection to such an inference of fact from these circumstances. But to argue its validity as a conclusion of law depends on an entire mistake. Such a promise could have a legal effect only in a system where espousals are regarded as legally binding, as they were in the canon law. (C. 30, X. de sponsalibus, iv. 1; C. 1, 3, 6, X. de cond. appos. iv. 5.) That law consistently gave an action for the enforcement of the promise, though if the party refused to perform it, it did not compel the marriage, but only imposed penance and compensation. (C. 10, 17, 22, de spons. iv. 1.) Only when cohabitation had followed, it treated the marriage as already complete. Even if the doctrine had passed from the church courts to those of the common law in England, it would have been abrogated by the marriage act; and in this country there has never been any logical basis for it, although Mr. Bishop, in Marriage and Divorce, sections 253, 265, seems to hold otherwise.—HAMMOND.

<sup>11</sup> Absence of ceremony in canonical marriage.—The one contract, which, to our thinking, should certainly be formal, had been made the most formless of all contracts. It is true that from a very early time the church had insisted that Christian spouses should seek a blessing for their union, should acknowledge their contract publicly and in face of the church. The ceremonies required by temporal law, Jewish, Roman or Germanic, were to be observed, and a new religious color was given to those rites; the veil and the ring were sanctified. In the little Anglo-Saxon tract which describes a betrothal—without any good warrant it has been treated as belonging to the laws of King marriages were performed by the justices of the peace; and these marriages were declared valid, without any fresh solemnization, by statute 12 Car. II, c. 33 (Confirmation of Marriages, 1660). But, as the law now stands, we may upon the whole collect, that no marriage by the temporal law is ipso facto void, that is celebrated by a person in orders,—in a parish church or public chapel (or elsewhere, by special dispensation)—in pursuance of banns or a license,—between single persons,—consenting,—of sound mind,—and of the age of twenty-one years;—or of the age of fourteen in males and twelve in females, with consent of parents or guardians,

Edmund—we see the mass priest present; but the part that is assigned to him is subordinate. After we have read how a solemn treaty is made between the bridegroom and the kinsmen of the bride, we read how at the delivery, the tradition, of the woman, a mass priest should be present, and confirm the union with God's blessing. But the variety of the marriage customs current among the Christian nations prevented the church from singling out any one rite as essential. From drastic legislation she was withstrained by the fear that she would thereby multiply sins. It was not well that there should be marriages contracted in secret and unblessed by God; still, better these than concubinage and unions dissoluble at will. And so, though at times she seemed to be on the point of decreeing that the marriage contracted without a due observance of religious ceremonies is no marriage at all, she held her hand. For example, soon after the Norman Conquest, Lanfranc issued a constitution condemning in strong words him who gives away his daughter or kinswoman without a priestly benediction. He says that the parties to such an union are fornicators; but it is very doubtful whether he says or means that the union is no indissoluble marriage. At all events, in the twelfth century, though the various churches have by this time evolved marriage rituals—rituals which have borrowed many a phrase and symbol from ancient Germanic custom—it becomes clear that the formless, the unblessed, marriage, is a marriage. In 1200 Archbishop Hubert Walter, with a salvo for the honor and privilege of the Roman church, published in a council at Lambeth a constitution which declared that no marriage was to be celebrated until after a triple publication of the church's ban. No persons were to be married save publicly in the face of the church and in the presence of a priest. Persons who married in other fashion were not to be admitted into a church without the bishop's license. At the Lateran Council of 1215 Innocent III extended over the whole of western Christendom the custom that had hitherto obtained in some countries of "publishing the banns of marriage," that is, of calling upon all and singular to declare any cause or just impediment that could be urged against the proposed union. From that time forward a marriage with banns had certain legal advantages over a marriage without banns, which can only be explained below when we speak of "putative" marriages. But still the formless, the unblessed, marriage is a or without it, in case of widowhood. And no marriage is voidable by the ecclesiastical law, after the death of either of the parties; nor during their lives, unless for the canonical impediments of pre-contract, if that indeed still exists; of consanguinity; and of affinity, or corporal imbecility, subsisting previous to the marriage.

§ 593. e. Dissolution of marriage.—I am next to consider the manner in which marriages may be dissolved; and this is either by death, or divorce.

§ 594. (1) Divorce—(a) Divorce a vinculo.—There are two kinds of divorce, the one total, the other partial;<sup>12</sup> the one a vin- marriage. This seems the origin of the belief that Innocent III “was the first who ordained the celebration of marriage in the church.” This belief is stated by Blackstone, Comm., I, 439, and was in his time traditional among English lawyers. Apparently it can be traced to Dr. Goldingham, a civilian who was consulted in the case of Bunting v. Lepingwell (Moore’s Reports, 169). See Friedberg, Recht der Eheschliessung, 314.)—POLLOCK & MAITLAND, 2 Hist. Eng. Law (2d ed.), 369.

<sup>12</sup> The law of divorce.—Divorce was entirely unknown to the courts of common law in England until long after the latest date at which the American law diverged from the parent system. The only divorce from the bond of marriage was given by the legislative power by a private bill in each case. The ecclesiastical courts granted divorce from the bond of matrimony only in cases where the marriage was originally null, and divorce from bed and board only (therefore without the privilege of marrying again to either party) for adultery and other causes. In the United States divorces were formerly granted by acts of the state legislatures; but in most of the states this is now forbidden by constitutional provision, and the power to dissolve the bonds of matrimony is in the courts of law by a general grant from the lawmakers. There being no spiritual courts in the American colonies, the legislatures possessed the only power that could at first be invoked to dissolve a marriage, and divorce by special act was the original rule in most, if not all the states. And it is still under authority derived from the legislature by general act that the courts obtain the power to dissolve a marriage regularly formed. A legislative divorce is not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of a contract (Cooley on Const. Lim. 280), nor as retrospective. (Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, §§ 665–679.) The objection that it is in its nature an exercise of judicial power, and therefore forbidden to legislatures, is well answered by Bishop, sections 680–686. Its plausibility depends on the theory of divorce adopted, to be discussed hereafter.

To define divorce properly we must determine first, whether distinction is to be made between suits for nullity of marriage and divorce, as is done in some culo matrimonii (from the bond of matrimony), the other merely a mensa et thoro (from bed and board). The total divorce, a vinculo matrimonii, must be for some of the canonical causes of impediment before mentioned; and those existing before the marriage, as is always the case in consanguinity; not supervenient, or arising afterwards, as may be the case in affinity or corporal imbe-states. (E. g., Iowa Code of 1873, § 2231 et seq.) Suits for nullity imply marriages void from the beginning, though even in such cases the statute may provide that the children be deemed legitimate. (Iowa Code of 1873, § 2234; and n. 2, post, p. *446.) The distinction has an important bearing on the question of jurisdiction also. In this country the power to dissolve the marriage tie must depend on positive statute; but jurisdiction to declare a pretended marriage null might be sustained on general principles, in a court of equity, without statutory grant. On the other hand, the distinction is encumbered with all the difficulties attaching to void and voidable marriages, and most statutes disregard it, treating all cases where the interposition of the court is requisite as cases of divorce.

When divorce and nullity are kept distinct, the logical consequence is that the former is only admissible where there has been a valid marriage, or a marriage at least capable of validation, though at first voidable. And in the latter case, if neither party averred that the marriage was void, the decree of divorce between them must be held to confirm its prior existence, so that it never could be avoided afterward. (Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, 116; Guest v. Shipley, 2 Hagg. Const. 321; Williams v. Dormer, 16 Jur. 366; 9 Eng. L. & Eq. 598.) American courts have followed this reasoning so far as to hold that a divorce suit cannot be maintained without proof of a valid marriage. (See Collins v. Collins, 71 N. Y. 269, 80 N. Y. 1.) But this seems to be arbitrary when severed from its logical basis, as it is in most American states where divorce and nullity are confounded, and the former granted in every case of void as well as voidable marriage. The only logical ground here is to abandon the distinction altogether, and grant divorce in all cases where a marriage in fact has existed. Another distinction is that no alimony can properly be allowed in suits for nullity; it is properly incident to divorce suits only, which presuppose a marriage, at least de facto, with its consequent disabilities and want of independent means (Chase v. Chase, 55 Me. 21; North v. North, 1 Barb. Ch. 241; Bartlett v. Bartlett, Clarke (N. Y.), 460); except pendente lite, when the wife defends, or has been misled by a formal marriage. (Cooper v. Mayhew, 40 Mich. 528; Cray v. Cray, 32 N. J. Eq. 25, 28.) In the latter case some courts will grant her compensation. (Griffin v. Griffin, 47 N. Y. 134, 142.)

Wherever there has been the form of marriage, a divorce suit may be maintained, and a decree of divorce (or nullity) obtained. The only question is whether the party may safely dispense with it and act as free. But even the courts that have gone furthest in recognizing marriage by cohabitation, etc., cility. For in cases of total divorce, the marriage is declared null, as having been absolutely unlawful ab initio (from the beginning); and the parties are therefore separated pro salute animarum (for the welfare of their souls): for which reason, as was before observed, no divorce can be obtained, but during the life of the parties. The issue of such marriage as is thus entirely dissolved are bastards.<sup>d</sup> [But see note 2, p. *446, and note 12, p. *457.]

<sup>d</sup> Co. Litt. 235.

---

without form, require a formal marriage as a condition of a decree of divorce. (Collins v. Collins, supra.) Is this consistent with the other position? If so, what is the legal situation of parties who have fully committed themselves by their conduct to the position of husband and wife without a formal marriage? They seem to be the only American (and Protestant) citizens to whom the alienable right of free divorce is denied.

The theories of divorce found in our books are irreconcilable, and must be reduced to three principal forms: (1) That which regards divorce as essentially the rescission or dissolution of the marriage contract, granted to one party as a relief against the other. The jurisdiction upon this theory depends on the same principles as in other cases of contract, and especially on jurisdiction over the defendant. But this may result in two different rules: (a) That which holds the place of marriage or lex loci contractus to be the only proper forum. This is the English rule, forbidding the recognition of any foreign divorce of an English marriage (see Chief Justice Gibson's criticisms on it, 32 Am. Dec. 769, 770). (b) That which holds the domicile of defendant at the time of suit to be the proper one, as in the Scotch and many American cases, on the general principles of jurisdiction in personam. (2) That which regards divorce as the consequence of a delict or wrong committed by one party, inconsistent with the duties of marriage, the jurisdiction depending on the place where the wrong was committed. (Dorsey v. Dorsey, 7 Watts, 349, 32 Am. Dec. 767, and cases cited. Read remark of Gibson, C. J., on p. 770.) (3) That which regards divorce as the consequence of the state's power to determine the status of its citizens; therefore, as in the nature of a suit in rem, the jurisdiction depending on the domicile of the plaintiff, the wronged and petitioning party.

"It is plain that every state has the right to determine the status, or domestic and social condition of persons domiciled within its territory. (Ditson v. Ditson, 4 R. I. 87; Strader v. Graham, 10 How. 82, 13 L. Ed. 337; Cheever v. Wilson, 9 Wall. 108, 19 L. Ed. 604; Barber v. Root, 10 Mass. 260; Kinnier v. Kinnier, 45 N. Y. 535, 6 Am. Rep. 132.) So it is that every state may determine for itself, for what causes that status may be changed or affected, and hence upon what grounds, based upon what acts or omissions of persons holding the relation to each other of marriage, they may be separated, and that relation dissolved; and it may prescribe what legal proceedings shall be had to § 595. (b) Divorce a mensa et thoro.—Divorce a mensa et thoro is when the marriage is just and lawful ab initio, and therefore the law is tender of dissolving <sup>[441]</sup> it; but, for some supervenient cause, it becomes improper or impossible for the parties to live together: as in the case of intolerable ill temper, or adultery, in either of the parties. For the canon law, which the common law follows in this case, deems so highly and with such mysterious reverence of the nuptial tie, that it will not allow it to be unloosed for any cause whatsoever, that arises after the union is made. And this is said to be built on the divine revealed law; though that expressly assigns incontinence as a cause, and indeed the only cause, that end, and what courts of its sovereignty shall have jurisdiction of the matrimonial status and power to adjudge a dissolution of that relation. All citizens of that state, domiciled within it and owing to it allegiance, are bound by the laws and regulations which it prescribes in that respect. When, without infringement of the constitution of the state, its statutes have conferred upon any of its courts the general power to act judicially upon the matrimonial status of its citizens, or of persons within its territorial limits, and to adjudge a dissolution of the relation of husband and wife, then, we take it, such court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of divorce.”—(FOLGER, J., in Hunt v. Hunt, 72 N. Y. 227, 28 Am. Rep. 129. And see People v. Dawell, 25 Mich. 247, 12 Am. Rep. 260; Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, § 720.)

The wife may acquire a separate domicile whenever it is necessary or proper that she should do so. The right springs from the necessity for its exercise, and endures as long as the necessity continues. The proceedings for divorce may be instituted where the wife has her domicile. The place of the marriage, of the offense, and of the domicile of the husband are of no consequence. (Per Swayne, J., 9 Wall. 124, 19 L. Ed. 608, citing Ditson v. Ditson. Wife was plaintiff, husband was defendant in case.) The wife's separation of domicile is enough to give the federal courts jurisdiction (to enforce payment of alimony under a state decree, Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582, 16 L. Ed. 226). But her husband's domicile governs her where she unjustifiably refuses to live with him. (Cheely v. Clayton, 110 U. S. 701, 28 L. Ed. 298, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 328.)

Where a divorce has been granted which prohibits the guilty party from marrying again during the lifetime of the other, it was formerly claimed that this prohibition was binding everywhere. (Thompson v. Thompson, 114 Mass. 566.) But the more common doctrine has been that other states would disregard the prohibition as a mere penalty of no extraterritorial effect, and hold a marriage elsewhere valid. (Thompson v. Thompson, 114 Mass. 566.) And now in New York it is held that the party under such a prohibition there may go abroad and marry, and return to the state where the prohibition exists, and the marriage will be held valid, at least so far as to sustain a divorce

why a man may put away his wife and marry another.<sup>o</sup> The civil law, which is partly of pagan original, allows many causes of absolute divorce; and some of them pretty severe ones (as if a wife goes to the theater or the public games, without the knowledge and consent of the husband<sup>t</sup>): but among them adultery is the principal, and with reason named the first.<sup>u</sup> But with us in England adultery is only a cause of separation from bed and board:<sup>h</sup> for which the best reason that can be given, is, that if divorces were allowed to depend upon a matter within the power of either the parties, they would probably be extremely frequent; as was the case when divorces were allowed for canonical disabilities, on the mere confession of the parties,<sup>l</sup> which is now prohibited by the canons.<sup>k</sup> However, divorces a vinculo matrimonii, for adultery, have of late years been frequently granted by act of parliament.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>o</sup> Matt. xix. 9.

<sup>t</sup> Nov. 117.

<sup>u</sup> Cod. 5. 17. 8.

<sup>h</sup> Moor. 683.

<sup>l</sup> 2 Mod. 314.

<sup>k</sup> Can. 1603. c. 105.

suit against the second spouse (Thorp v. Thorp, 90 N. Y. 602, 43 Am. Rep. 189), and to admit the children thereof to inherit as legitimate. (Moore v. Hegeman, 92 N. Y. 521, 44 Am. Rep. 408.) A fraudulent divorce is of no effect, not even to save a party from the penalty of bigamy. (People v. Dawell, 25 Mich. 247, 12 Am. Rep. 260.)

The requisites of a valid divorce are stated by Wharton on Conflict of Laws, sections 225-239, thus, in accordance with the doctrine last stated above: (1) One of the parties must be domiciled within the jurisdiction, and the wife may acquire an independent domicile for that purpose. The domicile must of course be bona fide. (2) The proceedings must be according to the rules of international law prescribed as to foreign judgments. (3) The defendant must be actually notified if he can be found. In Pennsylvania it is held that his forum must be sought. (Reel v. Elder, 62 Pa. St. 308, 315, 1 Am. Rep. 414; Colvin v. Reed, 55 Pa. St. 375; 2 West Jur. 229, with note. Dorsey v. Dorsey, 7 Watts (Pa.), 350, 32 Am. Dec. 767, is the leading case.) (4) The place of the marriage or its law is not material. Even in England the lex loci contractus no longer prevails. (5) It is immaterial where the offense was committed or the parties resided at that time. (Aliter in Pennsylvania, see above cases.) (6) There must be no collusion.—HAMMOND. [This subject is discussed in the light of recent decisions in the chapter on "Conflict of Laws," at the end of Book III.]

13 Legislative divorces.—During all modern times in England to 1858, when the statute 20 & 21 Vict., c. 85, establishing the court for matrimonial causes, went into operation, no marriage could be dissolved by the sentence

§ 596. (i) Alimony.—In case of divorce a mensa et thoro, the law allows alimony to the wife: which is that allowance which is made to a woman for her support out of the husband's estate; being settled at the discretion of the ecclesiastical judge, on consideration of all the circumstances of the case. This is sometimes called her estovers; for which, if he refuses payment, there is (besides the ordinary process of excommunication) a writ at common law de estoveriis habendis (of recovering estovers), in order to recover it.<sup>1</sup> It is generally proportioned to the rank and quality of [442] the parties. But in case of elopement, and living with an adulterer, the law allows her no alimony.<sup>m</sup>

§ 597. f. Legal consequences of marriage.—Having thus shown how marriages may be made, or dissolved, I come now, lastly, to speak of the legal consequences of such making, or dissolution.

§ 598. (1) Coverture of wife.—By marriage, the husband and wife are one person in law:<sup>n</sup> that is, the very being or legal existence of the woman is suspended during the marriage,<sup>14</sup> or at least

<sup>1</sup> 1 Lev. 6.

<sup>n</sup> Co. Litt. 112.

<sup>m</sup> Cowel. tit. Alimony.

---

of a court. Hence parliamentary divorces came into use. These divorces were regarded as valid, and the present statutes authorizing judicial dissolutions of marriage are in effect little else than a transferring of the jurisdiction to the courts. The Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 did not apply to Ireland, and it is only by bill in parliament that divorces can be granted there. Westropp's Divorce Bill, 11 App. Cas. (Eng.) 294.

When this country was settled the legislative bodies were naturally the only authorities with jurisdiction to grant divorces. But this function has been given over to the courts, and in some of the states constitutional provisions prohibit the granting of divorces by the legislature. Sparhawk v. Sparhawk, 116 Mass. 315; State v. Fry, 4 Mo. 120. It has been held in the supreme court of the United States that a special act of a territorial legislature dissolving the marriage relation between a husband resident in the territory and a nonresident wife was a valid act, and was not rendered invalid by the fact either that there was no cause for divorce or that the defendant was not notified. Maynard v. Hill, 125 U. S. 190, 31 L. Ed. 654, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 723; 1 Bishop, Mar., Div. & Sep., § 1424 ff; Tiffany, Persons & Dom. Rel. 229.

<sup>14</sup> Coverture of wife.—The common law is often criticised for the complete absorption of the wife's legal existence in that of the husband, and the control given to the latter over the wife's property. These criticisms are is incorporated and consolidated into that of the husband: under whose wing, protection, and cover, she performs everything; and is therefore called in our law-French a feme covert, fœmina viro co-operta; is said to be covert-baron, or under the protection and influence of her husband, her baron, or lord; and her condition during her marriage is called her coverture.<sup>15</sup> Upon this prin-perhaps just enough, if we compare its rules with our present notions of the true relations between the sexes. But when the critics reproach the English people with injustice toward the female sex according to the ideas of their own time, and assume that there law was peculiar in this respect, they err greatly. How completely its provisions reflected the general sentiment of Christendom at the time they were formed, may be seen by comparing Bodinus (De Repub. lib. 1, cap. 3, and especially the last paragraph, page 31), who states the husband's rights of property from civilian authors, almost exactly as the English law does, and even declares that settlements giving the wife control of her own property are contrary to all law, human and divine. (Cf. Kame's Equity, p. 151, to same effect in our law.)—HAMMOND.

<sup>15</sup> Wife's separate domicile.—"The question raised on the agreed statement of facts is whether a married woman, while the unity of the marriage relation exists undisturbed between them, can acquire a domicile other than that of her husband. In behalf of the plaintiff it is contended that she can. The contention rests on the argument that the common-law status of a married woman, by which her legal existence is suspended during the marriage, or merged in that of her husband (1 Bl. Comm. 442), has largely ceased to obtain in modern times, and especially in this state, where the law recognizes her as having a separate existence and separate rights as to her property, and consequently separate interests. After a careful examination of the authorities, however, we have come to the conclusion that, though a wife may acquire a domicile distinct from that of her husband, whenever it is necessary or proper for her to do so—as, for instance, where the husband and wife are living apart by mutual consent (In re Florance, 54 Hun, 328, 7 N. Y. Supp. 578), or where the wife has been abandoned by the husband (Shute v. Sargent, 67 N. H. 305, 36 Atl. 282), or for purposes of divorce (Ditson v. Ditson, 4 R. I. 87), or, in short, whenever the wife has adversary interests to those of her husband—she cannot acquire such a domicile so long as the unity of the marriage relation continues, notwithstanding that from considerations of health, as in the present case, or of expediency, one of the parties, with the consent of the other, is actually living in a different place from the other. The question was apparently carefully considered in McClellan v. Carroll (Tenn. Ch.), 42 S. W. 185. In this case the husband of the defendant Clear, who had formerly resided in Tennessee, had removed to and become a domiciled resident of Missouri. She had remained in Tennessee with the view of retaining a homestead. They had not separated. There was no disagreement between them, and neither had deserted the other. It was held that she was not ciple, of an union of person in husband and wife, depend almost all the legal rights, duties and disabilities, that either of them acquire by the marriage. I speak not at present of the rights of property, but of such as are merely personal.

§ 599. (2) Transactions between husband and wife.—For this reason, a man cannot grant anything to his wife, or enter into covenant with her: ° for the grant would be to suppose her separate existence; and to covenant with her, would be only to covenant with himself: and therefore it is also generally true, that all compacts made between husband and wife, when single, are voided by the intermarriage.º A woman, indeed, may be attorney for her husband;ª for that implies no separation from, but is rather a representation of, her lord. And a husband may also bequeath anything to his wife by will; for that cannot take effect till the coverture is determined by his death.ª

§ 600. (3) Liabilities of husband.—The husband is bound to provide his wife with necessaries by law, as much as himself: and if she contracts debts for them, he is obliged to pay them;ª but, for anything besides necessaries, he is not chargeable.† Also if a wife elopes, and lives with another man, the husband is [443] not

° Ibid.

º Cro. Car. 551.

ª F. N. B. 27.

ª Co. Litt. 112.

ª Salk. 118.

† 1 Sid. 120. .

---

a resident of Tennessee, and could not claim a homestead, for the reason that, where the relation of husband and wife exists, and the unity of the marriage state is maintained, the domicile of the husband is, in legal contemplation, that of the wife, even though the actual residence of the husband may be in one place and that of the wife in another. And see Harteau v. Harteau, 14 Pick. 181, 25 Am. Dec. 372; Harrison v. Harrison, 20 Ala. 629, 56 Am. Dec. 227; Beard v. Knox, 5 Cal. 252, 63 Am. Dec. 125; Hairston v. Hairston, 27 Miss. 704, 61 Am. Dec. 530; Harding v. Alden, 9 Greenl. (Me.) 140, 23 Am. Dec. 549; Dougherty v. Snyder, 15 Serg. & R. 84, 16 Am. Dec. 520. While the language of the court in Shute v. Sargent, 67 N. H. 305, 36 Atl. 282, is broad enough to support the plaintiff's contention as to the power of the wife to acquire a separate domicile for all purposes, the case shows that the wife had been abandoned by the husband, and the decision of the court seems to rest on that ground. Our opinion is that judgment should be rendered for the defendant for costs."—MATTESON, C. J., in Howland v. Granger, 22 B. I. 1, 45 Atl. 740.

chargeable even for necessaries;<sup>u</sup> at least if the person, who furnishes them, is sufficiently apprised of her elopement.<sup>w</sup><sup>16</sup> If the wife be indebted before marriage, the husband is bound afterwards to pay the debt; for he has adopted her and her circumstances together.<sup>x</sup>

§ 601. (4) Suits by and against wife.—If the wife be injured in her person or her property, she can bring no action for redress

<sup>u</sup> Stra. 647.

<sup>x</sup> 3 Mod. 186.

<sup>w</sup> 1 Lev. 5.

<sup>16</sup> Liabilities of husband.—The husband is bound to support the wife by common law, independent of any statute, at his own home. If she leave him of her own accord the duty ceases. If he drive her away or fail to support her there, he is liable to those who furnish her with necessaries, either individuals or town authorities. This is true even where they live apart by agreement. (Rumney v. Keyes, 7 N. H. 576; Charlestown v. Groodand, 15 Gray (Mass.), 15.) If she willfully abandons him, she does not carry his credit with her or impose any liability on him. That liability depends entirely on his neglect or default (People v. Pettit, 74 N. Y. 320); unless she is insane, then she is incapable of abandoning him, and it is his duty to support her. (Goodale v. Lawrence, 88 N. Y. 513, 42 Am. Rep. 259.) For debts of the wife during coverture there can be no obligation at common law, except so far as she can be considered the husband's agent to charge him. While covert she cannot charge herself nor can he charge her. His liability to pay debts of her contracting will depend as a question of fact upon her agency, save in the rare cases where it becomes a question of law by his breach of the duty to provide for her. If he by his conduct render the home unsuitable for her to live in, or wrongfully send her away without any provision for her support, she has the right to buy necessaries on his credit. (Ross v. Ross, 69 Ill. 569; Billing v. Pilcher, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 458, 46 Am. Dec. 523; Allen v. Aldrich, 29 N. H. 63; Hultz v. Gibbs, 66 Pa. St. 360.) If they separate by consent, and he furnish her no suitable support, his obligation for her necessaries continues (Rumney v. Keyes, 7 N. H. 571; Baker v. Barney, 8 Johns. 72; 5 Am. Dec. 326); but if he make her an allowance sufficient to support her, or otherwise provide for her, he cannot be charged by her or others, for such necessaries (Mott v. Comstock, 8 Wend. 544; Nurse v. Craig, 2 Bos. & P. 148, 127 Eng. Reprint, 511, reviewing English cases); and whether the provision be sufficient will be a question of fact for the jury. (Pearson v. Darrington, 32 Ala. 227.) If the separation be her fault, no liability attaches to him. (Allen v. Aldrich, 29 N. H. 63; Porter v. Bobb, 25 Mo. 36; McCutchen v. McGahay, 11 Johns. 231, 6 Am. Dec. 373.) That the husband's liability for contracts made by the wife during coverture, and while both are discharging their marital duties, rests solely on agency, and that without her husband's concurrence, and in his name, as well as her own: neither can she be sued, without making the husband a defendant.* There is, indeed, one case where the wife shall sue and be sued as a feme sole, viz., where the husband has abjured * Salk. 119. 1 Roll. Abr. 347.

* Bro. Error. 173. 1 Leon. 312. 1 Sid. 120. This was also the practice in the courts of Athens. (Pott. Antiqu. b. 1. c. 21.)

the agency is a matter of fact not law, is fully shown in Benjamin v. Benjamin, 15 Conn. 347, 39 Am. Dec. 384; Sawyer v. Cutting, 23 Vt. 486, 489; Butts v. Newton, 29 Wis. 632, 637; even when the contracts are for necessaries. (Tuttle v. Hoag, 46 Mo. 38, 43, 2 Am. Rep. 481.)

Even for actual necessaries furnished the wife, the vendor cannot recover without showing that the husband has not supplied her, the burden of proof of the negative being on him. (Rea v. Durkee, 25 Ill. 503; Mitchell v. Treanor, 11 Ga. 324, 56 Am. Dec. 421; Kimball v. Keyes, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 33; Barr v. Armstrong, 56 Mo. 577.) But if the husband is in default, a notice not to supply the wife on his credit will be of no avail. (Church, C. J., in Daubney v. Hughes, 60 N. Y. 187; Black v. Bryan, 18 Tex. 453, 467.) Upon his liability generally for support, cf. Cunningham v. Irwin, 7 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 247, 10 Am. Dec. 458, and note. Upon the connection and distinction between this and his right to earnings, Norcross v. Rodgers, 30 Vt. 588, 73 Am. Dec. 323. The husband's liability for necessaries is made by some cases to be the counterpart of cohabitation, and the consequent right to her obedience and services. "The duties of the wife while cohabiting with the husband form the consideration of his liability for her necessaries." (McCutchen v. McGahay, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 281, 6 Am. Dec. 373; Thornton, J., in Martin v. Robson, 65 Ill. 129, 135, 16 Am. Rep. 578. From the legislator's or moralist's point of view this is no doubt true, but not from the lawyer's. It is much on a par with the statement that he is liable for her debts because he has her property. (65 Ill. 136, 16 Am. Rep. 578; 2 Bright's H. & W., p. 2; Tyler on Coverture, §§ 216, 233.) Both are consequences of a single cause but no causal connection exists between them. If it were so, his liability would cease with cohabitation, and some new reason must be found for it when he turns her out of doors. The true ground is still the unity of person. A married woman is as liable for torts as a single woman. There is nothing in her coverture to exempt her from the rights and duties imposed by the general law of the land on all alike, or from the consequences of their violation. Hence there is no such distinction between torts committed dum sola and during coverture, as there is between debts or contracts in the two cases. And "the distinction between the liability of the husband for the contracts of the wife before marriage, and for her torts during marriage [as well as before] is too dim to be easily seen." (Thornton, J., in 65 Ill. 136, 16 Am. Rep. 578.) But there are two important qualifications of her liability for these torts: (1) She is not liable when she is under coercion of her husband, actual or implied.

the realm, or is banished:<sup>a</sup> for then he is dead in law; and, the husband being thus disabled to sue for or defend the wife, it would be most unreasonable if she had no remedy, or could make no defense at all. In criminal prosecutions, it is true, the wife may be indicted and punished separately;<sup>b</sup> for the union is only a civil union.

<sup>a</sup> Co. Litt. 133.

<sup>b</sup> 1 Hawk. P. C. 3.

(2) The liability can be enforced during coverture only on the joint person. If he dies it survives against her. If she dies it dies with her.

Frauds by the wife as well as her other torts come under this rule. "But where the fraud is directly connected with the contract with the wife, and is the means of effecting it, and parcel of the same transaction, the wife cannot be responsible, and the husband be sued for it together with the wife. If this were allowed, it is obvious that the wife would lose the protection which the law gives her against contracts made by her during coverture." (Per Pollock, C. B., 9 Ex. 429; leading cases, Cooper v. Witham, 2 Keb. 399, 84 Eng. Reprint, 250; Adelphi Loan Assn. v. Fairhurst and Wife, 9 Ex. 422, 1854.) In other words, "where the husband is liable for the torts of his wife, the tort upon which such liability is founded must be a tort simpliciter, and not one which is either founded upon or connected with a contract. Where the wife makes a representation which is in fact false, and fraudulently made to her knowledge to a third party, who by giving credit to it is thereby induced to enter into a contract, the husband is not liable for that tort, but the party who believes a representation so made must bear the consequences of his own credulity." (Arguendo, 9 Ex. 428.) If the wife be damnified by a tort to her person or reputation, the right of recovery is in her—of action, in the joint person. He cannot sue without her (Johnson v. Dicken, 25 Mo. 580); nor she without him. But the action survives to her, not to him.

The husband's liability cannot be prevented from arising on marriage by any agreement between husband and wife, or any antenuptial settlement by which it was stipulated that each should have exclusive ownership and control of their own property, which should be exempt from liability for the antenuptial debts of the other. A note given by the wife before marriage is collectible from both during coverture in spite of such agreement. (Obermayer v. Greenleaf, 42 Mo. 304.) The same rule applies to torts. It is not affected by the fact that she has a separate estate. (Callahan v. Patterson, 4 Tex. 61, 51 Am. Dec. 712; Neil v. Johnson, 11 Ala. 615; Strong v. Skinner, 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 516; Methodist E. Church v. Jaques, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 450.) But in most respects the above doctrine as to her immunity from obligations in personam is greatly changed by statute, which gives her the enjoyment of her own separate estate. The best account I know of the various married women's acts, in different states, allowing them to take, hold, convey, and devise separate § 602. (5) Incapacity as witnesses.—But, in trials of any sort, they are not allowed to be evidence for, or against, each other:° partly because it is impossible their testimony should be indifferent; but principally because of the union of person: and therefore, if they were admitted to be witnesses for each other, they would contradict one maxim of law, “nemo in propria causa testis”

• 2 Hawk. P. C. 431.

---

property, etc., is in 6 S. L. Rev. p. 633, by Henry Hitchcock, of the St. Louis bar. The acts themselves will be found collected in 76 Am. Dec. 367–401.

When the wife, even before these statutes, had a separate estate, and intended to charge it, the charge might be enforced in equity, subject to the question as to her power to charge, under the settlement or other instrument by which she held it. In such case there could be no judgment against her personally, no execution on which she could be taken, for that would violate her husband's rights (Reeve), and no remedy against general or after-acquired property. The only enforcement was by bill in equity against her (and her husband as a formal party) as on a right in rem. (2 Kent, Comm., 164; Reeve's Domestic Relations, 164; Adams' Equity, 45; 2 Story on Equity Jurisprudence, 1400; 1 Bright on H. & W. 254.) Hollis v. Francois, 5 Tex. 195, 51 Am. Dec. 760, note page 768, shows the general rule; but a different one in Texas.

It is now held, that under the statutes giving all married women a separate estate in property taken from others than their husbands, the charge need not be an express one. The execution of a bond, bill, or note is enough to presume such an intent. There need not be even a formal promise. (Dobbin v. Hubbard, 17 Ark. 189, 65 Am. Dec. 425; Coats v. Robinson, 10 Mo. 757, 760; Jarman v. Wilkerson, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 293; Leaycraft v. Hedden, 4 N. J. Eq. 512; Boarman v. Groves, 23 Miss. 280.) It may be created by buying on credit the property to be charged with the debt, she having no other personal estate (Cashman v. Henry, 75 N. Y. 103, 31 Am. Rep. 437), or by buying supplies for her family, including the husband (Tiemeyer v. Turnquist, 85 N. Y. 516, 39 Am. Rep. 674), though not by buying for her husband's sole use in business or otherwise. Sed contra many cases hold that the estate could not be made liable by implication. The charge must be express. In Dickson v. Miller, 11 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 594, 49 Am. Dec. 71, with note, a wife's debt for necessaries furnished her while sole and an infant was sustained as such a charge, without noticing the difference between the husband's absolute liability for her debts in that case, as stated in the clearest terms by Blackstone, “for he has adopted her and her circumstances together” (p. *443), and his liability by her agency in post-nuptial debts.

It has been held that a note constituting a valid charge on a separate estate may be sued in New York, and judgment rendered as if the wife were sole. It is unnecessary to allude to the coverture or separate estate. They can be set up in the answer, if a defense. “The judgment is properly the same in esse debet (no one may be a witness in his own cause)"; and if against each other, they would contradict another maxim, "nemo tenetur seipsum accusare (no one is bound to accuse himself)." <sup>17</sup> But, where the offense is directly against the person of the wife, this rule has been usually dispensed with: <sup>d</sup> and therefore, by statute 3 Hen. VII, c. 2 (Abduction, 1487), in case a woman be forcibly taken away, and married, she may be a witness against such her husband, in order to convict him of felony. For in this case she can with no propriety be reckoned his wife; because a main ingredient, her consent, was wanting to the contract: and also there is another maxim of law, that no man shall take advantage of his own wrong; which the ravisher [444] here would do, if by forcibly form and effect as if she were unmarried." (Earl, C., in Smith v. Dunning, 61 N. Y. 249; Corn Exch. Ins. Co. v. Babcock, 42 N. Y. 613, 1 Am. Rep. 601; Bodine v. Killeen, 53 N. Y. 93; Yale v. Dederer, ubi infra; Frecking v. Rolland, 53 N. Y. 422.) This goes far beyond the doctrine of the separate estate in equity courts, and the rulings in most of the other states, even on the most liberal statutes in favor of married women. It places the wife's contract substantially on the same footing with her husband's. The cases where such a charge (not express) is implied have been summed up in New York thus, in Manhattan B. & Mfg. Co. v. Thompson, 58 N. Y. 80: (1) When created in a trade or business of the wife. (Frecking v. Rolland, 53 N. Y. 422.) (2) When the contract relates to or is made for the benefit of the separate estate. (Owen v. Cawley, 36 N. Y. 600; Bollin v. Dillaye, 37 N. Y. 35.) (3) Where the intention is expressed in the contract or instrument by which the liability is created. (Yale v. Dederer, 18 N. Y. 265, 72 Am. Dec. 503, 22 N. Y. 450, 78 Am. Dec. 216, 68 N. Y. 329, 332.) The last is a leading case on the subject, and was before the court of appeals three times.—HAMMOND.

<sup>d</sup> State Trials, vol. 1. Lord Audley's Case, Stra. 633.

---

<sup>17</sup> In modern times the rules of the earlier law have been relaxed, and by the Evidence Amendment Act, 1853, and the further act of 1869, husbands and wives of the parties to civil proceedings (including proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery) were made competent and compellable to give evidence. In criminal proceedings, the incompetence of husband and wife to give evidence has even now been only partially removed. 2 Stephen's Comm. 407.

In the United States the common-law rule prevails where not changed by statute. Barron v. City of Anniston, 157 Ala. 399, 48 South. 58; Lucas v. State, 23 Conn. 18; Blain v. Patterson, 47 N. H. 523. But statutes have been passed making husbands and wives witnesses against each other even in criminal cases. See, generally, 4 Jones, Comm. Ev., §§ 733 ff.

marrying a woman, he could prevent her from being a witness, who is perhaps the only witness, to that very fact.

§ 603. (6) In ecclesiastical courts.—In the civil law the husband and the wife are considered as two distinct persons; and may have separate estates, contracts, debts, and injuries:° and therefore, in our ecclesiastical courts, a woman may sue and be sued without her husband.†

§ 604. (7) Separate acts of wife.—But, though our law in general considers man and wife as one person, yet there are some instances in which she is separately considered; as inferior to him, and acting by his compulsion. And therefore all deeds executed, and acts done, by her, during her coverture, are void; except it be a fine, or the like matter of record, in which case she must be solely and secretly examined, to learn if her act be voluntary.‡ She cannot by will devise lands to her husband, unless under special circumstances; for at the time of making it she is supposed to be under his coercion.⁴ And in some felonies, and other inferior crimes, committed by her, through constraint of her husband, the law excuses her:¹ but this extends not to treason or murder.

§ 605. (8) Husband's right of correction.—The husband also (by the old law) might give his wife moderate correction.² For, as he is to answer for her misbehavior, the law thought it reasonable to entrust him with this power of restraining her, by domestic chastisement, in the same moderation that a man is allowed to correct his apprentices or children; for whom the master or parent is also liable in some cases to answer. But this power of correction was confined within reasonable bounds,¹ and the husband was prohibited from using any violence to his wife, aliter quam ad virum, ex causa regiminis et castigationis uxoris suæ, licite et rationabiliter pertinet (otherwise than lawfully and reasonably belongs to the husband for the due government and correction of his wife).³ The civil law gave the husband the [445] same, or a larger, authority ° Cod. 4. 12. 1.

† 2 Roll. Abr. 298.

‡ Litt. § 669, 670.

⁴ Co. Litt. 112.

¹ 1 Hawk. P. C. 2.

² Ibid. 130.

³ Moor. 874.

⁴ F. N. B. 80.

over his wife: allowing him, for some misdemeanors, flagellis et fustibus arriter verberare uxorem (to beat his wife severely with scourges and sticks); for others, only modicam castigationem adhibere (to use moderate chastisement).<sup>n</sup> But, with us, in the politer reign of Charles the Second, this power of correction began to be doubted:<sup>o</sup> and a wife may now have security of the peace against her husband;<sup>p</sup> or, in return, a husband against his wife.<sup>q</sup> Yet the lower rank of people, who were always fond of the old common law, still claim and exert their ancient privilege: and the courts of law will still permit a husband to restrain a wife of her liberty, in case of any gross misbehaviour.<sup>r 18</sup>

These are the chief legal effects of marriage during the coverture; upon which we may observe, that even the disabilities, which the wife lies under, are for the most part intended for her protection and benefit. So great a favorite is the female sex of the laws of England.

<sup>n</sup> Nov. 117. c. 14. & Van Leeuwen. in loc.

<sup>q</sup> Stra. 1207.

<sup>o</sup> 1 Sid. 113. 3 Keb. 433.

<sup>r</sup> Stra. 478. 875.

<sup>p</sup> 2 Lev. 128.

---

<sup>18</sup> This touching attachment to their old common law still survives among "the lower rank of people" in the form of wife-beating. But among the politer classes the right to restrain a consort's liberty (except under very special circumstances) may be deemed to have become exploded since the case of Reg. v. Jackson in 1891 (1 Q. B., p. 671, in the court of appeal). The judgments are instructive. The master of the rolls goes so far as to doubt whether the husband ever had a legal power of correction, a curious instance of the way in which the sentiment of a later time sometimes tries to force upon the language of an older time a non-natural meaning, the new sentiment being one which the older time would have failed to understand. It would have been simpler to admit that what may well have been law in the seventeenth century is not to be taken to be law now, manners and ideas having so completely changed as to render the old rules obsolete. So that now the English wife, like the Roman, may quit her husband's house when she pleases, and the suit for restitution of conjugal rights, whereby either could compel the other to live in the common household, is falling into disuse, if indeed it can still be described as in any sense effective since the act, passed in 1884, which took away the remedy by attachment.—BRYCE, Studies in Hist. & Juris., 323.

CHAPTER THE SIXTEENTH. [446]

OF PARENT AND CHILD.

§ 606. Parent and child.—The next, and the most universal relation in nature, is immediately derived from the preceding, being that between parent and child.

§ 607. Children.—Children are of two sorts; legitimate and spurious, or bastards:<sup>1</sup> each of which we shall consider in their order; and first of legitimate children.

§ 608. 1. Legitimate children.—A legitimate child is he that is born in lawful wedlock, or within a competent time afterwards. "Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant (the nuptials show who is the father)," is the rule of the civil law;<sup>a</sup> and this holds with the civilians, whether the nuptials happen before, or after, the birth of the child. With us in England the rule is narrowed, for the nuptials must be precedent to the birth;<sup>2</sup> of which more will be

<sup>a</sup> Ff. 2. 4. 5.

---

<sup>1</sup> Adoption.—Adoption of children is now by statute the law of the majority of states, though only of late years, none of the statutes being earlier than 1850. Upon the interpretation of those statutes see note in 14 Am. Law Reg. 682, annexed to Barnhizel v. Ferrell, 47 Ind. 335, 1875, and article on The Law of Adoption (reviewing Sewall v. Roberts, 115 Mass. 262), in 9 Am. Law Rev. 74, 336. Adoption was unknown to the common law. (Coke, 2 Inst. 97.) Even the passage of Bracton referred to by Coke has an entirely different sense. (Lib. 2, c. 29, fol. 636; also in Coxe's trans. of Guterbock's Bracton, p. 83, n. g.—HAMMOND.)

<sup>2</sup> Legitimation by subsequent marriage.—Many American states adhere to the strict common-law rule, by which the only legitimate children are those born in wedlock, or within such a period after it as to justify the presumption that they were conceived within it. But Virginia set the example, soon after the revolution, of adopting the civil and canon law principle of legitimacy by the subsequent marriage of the parents: and added a rule which is found also in Code Napoleon, legitimizing the issue of null and void marriages. Many of the newer states have followed that example, and enacted both rules, or at least the former. (Virginia Code of 1873, c. 119, §§ 6, 7; Ash v. Way's Admr., 2 Gratt. (Va.) 203; Stone v. Keeling, 5 Call (Va.), 143.)

Difficult questions must arise in the interpretation of both rules, for which no answer can be found in common-law precedents. Some of them have already said when we come to consider the case of bastardy. At present let us inquire into, 1. The legal duties of parents to their legitimate children. 2. Their power over them. 3. The duties of such children to their parents.

§ 609. a. Duties of parents.—And, first, the duties of parents, to legitimate children: which principally consist in three particulars; their maintenance, their protection, and their education.

§ 610. (1) Duty to support children.—[447] The duty of parents to provide for the maintenance of their children, is a principle of natural law; an obligation, says Puffendorf,<sup>b</sup> laid on them been resolved by the consensus of civilians, and these will no doubt be decided in the same way, upon the familiar principle that when a state adopts a foreign law it is presumed to adopt with it the interpretation given in the state of its origin. Perhaps the most important question, arising as to legitimatio per subsequens matrimonium, is whether that effect is to be given in cases where the parents could not have lawfully intermarried before the child's birth, as in cases of adulterine bastardy, etc., or whether no such limitations are to be applied, none being found in the statutes themselves. The Roman law restricted such legitimation to cases of comparatively venial though irregular concubinage.

<sup>b</sup> L. of N. l. 4. c. 11.

---

Another question which must inevitably arise, and upon which the foreign law throws no light, is whether children may be made legitimate by what is now commonly termed a "common-law" marriage, without any public ceremony. Our courts have lately gone very far in presuming such a marriage from cohabitation and repute, without the possibility of fixing any certain date for its commencement. It would be hard to deny to some children of such cohabitation the legitimacy thus assured to others; yet such may be the effect, if it is not held retroactive. At the same time there can be no doubt that the rule in its original sense was confined to actually solemnized marriages. So, also, was the French rule from which we derive the other statutory change, that "the issue of marriages deemed null in law or dissolved by a court shall nevertheless be legitimate"; but in this case it is difficult to give any definite meaning to the rule, or prevent it from legitimizing all bastards indiscriminately, unless we confine the word "marriages" to actually solemnized unions. If the restriction put upon the jurisdiction in divorce by such cases as Collins v. Collins, 80 N. Y. 1, that the courts have no power to grant divorce where there has not been a regular and duly celebrated marriage, should prevail, it would give rise to two singular anomalies, that these informal "common-law" marriages, hardly distinguishable from concubinage, would be the only marriages indissoluble by law, and the only ones of which the innocent offspring could not only by nature itself, but by their own proper act, in bringing them into the world: for they would be in the highest manner injurious to their issue, if they only gave their children life, that they might afterwards see them perish. By begetting them, therefore, they have entered into a voluntary obligation, to endeavor, as far as in them lies, that the life which they have bestowed shall be supported and preserved. And thus the children will have a perfect right of receiving maintenance from their parents.<sup>3</sup> And the President Montesquieu<sup>c</sup> has a very just observation upon this head: that the establishment of marriage in all civilized states is invoke no legal protection of their status, if their unnatural parents saw fit to bastardize them. Even the remote possibility of such results is a disgrace to our laws, and calls loudly for a wise and uniform revision of them.

<sup>c</sup> Sp. L. b. 23. c. 2.

---

The Roman law made a distinction that seems never to have been recognized in our own, dating the life and status of a child born in legitimate wedlock from the time of conception, that of others from the time of birth (Ulpian, Fragm. v. 10; Gaius, i. 89; Gaius, Vis. i. 4, § 9; and see the note of Schulting, 41); but in spite of this they allow a child to be free-born whose mother was free at any moment while bearing him. (Paulus, R. S. ii. 24; L. 5, 2, Dig. de Stat. Hom.)—HAMMOND.

3 Rights and liabilities of father.—There is a fallacy in the term "perfect right," used here, very unusual with Blackstone. By a perfect right of receiving maintenance, we can only understand that it is morally right for the child to receive whatever the parent, in the fulfillment of his duty, may provide. But a perfect right in legal language imports much more: it imports the right to demand the maintenance, or, at least, to have a remedy for the parent's neglect to provide it, and this neither common nor statute law has ever given. The only legal duty imposed on the parent is to so provide for his children that they shall not become a burden to the community; and, for a breach of this duty, it is the state only that can punish him. Upon the amount and manner of the maintenance to be given, and upon the education and protection to be furnished, the parent must act in his own discretion, over which the child has no control. Harsh as this doctrine may seem when thus stated, it is only a just expression of the principle that the law deals only with enforceable rights and duties, and not with ethical ones. Experience has not shown that English and American fathers have been less careful or less generous in maintaining and educating their children than those living under a system of government which enforced these parental duties, and many other ethical ones, by the oversight of the state.

When it is claimed that a father has promised to pay for things not necessary, furnished to his child, that is, when the father as such is to be holden built on this natural obligation of the father to provide for his children; for that ascertains and makes known the person who is bound to fulfill this obligation; whereas, in promiscuous and illicit conjunctions, the father is unknown; and the mother finds a thousand obstacles in her way—shame, remorse, the constraint of her sex, and the rigor of laws;—that stifle her inclinations to perform this duty: and besides, she generally wants ability.

The municipal laws of all well-regulated states have taken care to enforce this duty: though Providence has done it more effectually than any laws, by implanting in the breast of every parent for the contract made by his child, the plaintiff must show that the contract binds him as it would any stranger; that it is made for a good consideration (Freeman v. Robinson, 38 N. J. L. 383, 20 Am. Rep. 399), and that it is in writing, so as to satisfy the statute of frauds. (Dexter v. Blanchard, 11 Allen (Mass.), 365.)

By common law. (a) neither the father is legally bound to support the child (Mortimore v. Wright, 6 Mees. & W. 482; Shellon v. Springer, 20 Eng. L. & Eq. 281; Hunt v. Thompson, 3 Scam. (Ill.) 180, 36 Am. Dec. 538), nor (b) the child to support the father (Rex v. Munden, 1 Strange, 190; Edwards v. Davis, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 821); and it is now held (c) that the moral duty is not sufficient to sustain an express promise. (Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57, 18 Am. Dec. 79.) Upon the implied promise to repay a stranger who has furnished necessities to a child or parent, the cases conflict. (Pro, Van Valkinburg v. Watson, 13 Johns. 480, 7 Am. Dec. 395. Con, Hunt v. Thompson, supra, followed in 78 Ill. 230, 445, 84 Ill. 40, 25 Am. Rep. 424, 88 Ill. 75, 89 Ill. 456.) Where a child is sent into the world to look out for himself, even without emancipation, he cannot claim his earnings (Stiles v. Granville, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 458), nor can the father's creditors. (McCloshey v. Cyphert, 27 Pa. St. 220; Cloud v. Hamilton, 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 104, 53 Am. Dec. 778.)

Against another employer, the father cannot recover the value of minor's services to him. (Williams v. Williams, 132 Mass. 304.) The father is liable for support of infant children, not of adults (Hawkins v. Hyde, 55 Vt. 55); but if they live with him not as boarders, he cannot collect board even from their estates. (Beardsley v. Hotchkins, 96 N. Y. 201.) He is not entitled to an allowance for support from the infant's estate except under special circumstances (Beardsley v. Hotchkins, 96 N. Y. 201; Re Walling, 35 N. J. Eq. 105); nor liable for services (Cooper v. Cooper, 12 Ill. App. 478); but the mother is, during the husband's life. (Gladding v. Follett, 95 N. Y. 652.) But when an express contract is shown, child may recover quantum meruit. (Byrnes v. Clarke, 57 Wis. 13, 14 N. W. 815.) Stepchildren once received into the family, the father cannot recover from their estates. (Norton v. Ailor, 11 Lea (Tenn.), 563.)

The father's consent for the son to receive his own earnings is put on the same footing with a gift delivered. It is valid against the father (2 Mass.

that natural σοφγη, or insuperable degree of affection, which not even the deformity of person or mind, not even the wickedness, ingratitude, and rebellion of children, can totally suppress or extinguish.

§ 611. (a) Duty of support under the civil law.—The civil law<sup>d</sup> obliges the parent to provide maintenance for his child; and, if he refuses, “judex de ea re cognoscet (the judge shall take cognizance of that matter).” Nay, it carries this matter so far, that it will not suffer a parent at his death totally to disinherit his child, without expressly giving [448] his reason for so doing; and there are fourteen such reasons reckoned up,<sup>e</sup> which may justify such disinherison. If the parent alleged no reason, or a bad, or a false

<sup>d</sup> Ff. 25. 3. 5.

<sup>e</sup> Nov. 115.

---

113, 115; 12 Mass. 275, 378; 3 Pick. 201, 15 Am. Dec. 207), even if not against creditors (6 Conn. 547); but it is held not liable for father's debts (49 N. H. 543), and the consent may be implied. (7 Cow. 92, 49 N. H. 544.) That it does not withdraw from the creditors any fund to which they are justly entitled, see Lord v. Poor, 23 Me. 569; Wolcott v. Rickey, 22 Iowa, 171 (homestead bought by son's earnings). But such a consent is not necessarily permanent; if by parol and without consideration it is revocable. (Abbott v. Converse, 4 Allen (Mass.), 530; Ream v. Watkins, 27 Mo. 516, 72 Am. Dec. 283; Everett v. Sherfey, 1 Iowa, 356.) The child's own desertion does not emancipate him without the father's consent. (Bangor v. Readfield, 32 Me. 60.) As to driving from home the cases differ. For emancipation, Nightingale v. Withington, 15 Mass. 272, 8 Am. Dec. 101; against, Sumner v. Sebec, 3 Me. 223; Clinton v. York, 26 Me. 167. But some cases call this emancipation. (Lyon v. Bolling, 9 Ala. 463, 44 Am. Dec. 444. See, also, Lyon v. Bolling, 14 Ala. 753, 48 Am. Dec. 122.)

The father may emancipate the minor, and thus surrender his own rights; but cannot thereby make him competent to obligate himself. (Note to Burlingame v. Burlingame, 7 Cow. 92.) The father's creditors cannot touch the earnings of the son so emancipated, or property acquired by him; and such emancipation may be inferred from circumstances (Dierker v. Heas, 54 Mo. 246); but in some states, the emancipation may be followed by an order of the district court, giving all the powers of full age. Upon emancipation by permanent departure from home with consent of the father, see Lowell v. Newport, 66 Me. 78; West Gardiner v. Manchester, 72 Me. 509. That the departure of a minor from home, to obtain employment, does not constitute emancipation, even in regard to settlement laws, is shown by Parsonsfeld v. Kennebunkport, 4 Me. 47; Searsmont v. Thorndike, 77 Me. 504, 1 Atl. 448. No public notice is necessary. (Wood v. Corcoran, 1 Allen (Mass.), 405.)

one, the child might set the will aside, tanquam testamentum inofficiosum (as an undutiful will), a testament contrary to the natural duty of the parent. And it is remarkable under what color the children were to move for relief in such a case: by suggesting that the parent had lost the use of his reason, when he made the inofficious testament. And this, as Puffendorf observes,<sup>f</sup> was not to bring into dispute the testator's power of disinheriting his own offspring; but to examine the motives upon which he did it: and, if they were found defective in reason, then to set them aside. But perhaps this is going rather too far: every man has, or ought to have, by the laws of society, a power over his own property: and, as Grotius very well distinguishes,<sup>g</sup> natural right obliges to give a necessary maintenance to children; but what is more than that

<sup>f</sup> l. 4. c. 11. § 7.

<sup>g</sup> De j. b. & p. l. 2. c. 7. n. 3.

---

A minor's liability for necessaries implies that he has not been otherwise furnished by his father; but he must show it as defense. (Parsons v. Keys, 43 Tex. 557.) But the mere fact that the father is poor and unable to pay (for medical services furnished the child) will not make the minor liable. (Hoyt v. Casey, 114 Mass. 397, 19 Am. Rep. 371.) The father is entitled to the services of the child till majority; and may recover against anyone who seduces him or her away, or by a tort deprives him of services, with allowance for expenses incurred, labor of nursing, etc. (Frick v. St. L. K. C. etc. R. Co., 75 Mo. 542; Connell v. Putnam, 58 N. H. 534), although the child has his own action. (Evansich v. G. C. & S. F. B. Co., 57 Tex. 123.) Upon the distinction between the two cases, see Durkee v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 56 Cal. 388, 38 Am. Rep. 59.

It was indeed formerly held that the moral duty of a parent to support the child was a sufficient consideration for an express promise to repay money laid out by another person in such support. But this ruling was due, not to any misconception of the nature of this relation, but to a temporary extension of the doctrine of consideration beyond its just bounds. Now, it is well settled that, at common law, neither the child nor a third person who has supported the child has any action against the parent for such support, or for damage due to the failure of support. In like manner, the child, even when of full age and abundant means, is not legally liable, at common law, for the support of the parent. Either one may, of course, be liable upon a contract for the support of the other to third persons, with whom the contract may have been made. Such a contract need not be expressed, but may be inferred from facts and circumstances. But it must be actually inferred as a fact; it will not be implied as of law from the relation between them. (Schouler on Domestic they have no other right to, than as it is given them by the favor of their parents, or the positive constitutions of the municipal law.

§ 612. (b) Duty of support under English law.—Let us next see what provision our own laws have made for this natural duty. It is a principle of law,<sup>h</sup> that there is an obligation on every man to provide for those descended from his loins; and the manner, in which this obligation shall be performed, is thus pointed out.<sup>1</sup> The father, and mother, grandfather, and grandmother of poor impotent persons shall maintain them at their own charges, if of sufficient ability, according as the quarter sessions shall direct: and <sup>k</sup> if a parent runs away, and leaves his children, the churchwardens and overseers of the parish shall seize his rents, goods, and chattels, and dispose of them toward their relief. By the interpretations which the courts of law have made upon these statutes, if a mother or grandmother marries again, and was before such second marriage of sufficient ability to keep the child, the husband shall be charged to maintain [449] it:<sup>1</sup> for this being a debt of hers, when single, shall like others extend to charge the husband. But at her death, the relation being dissolved, the husband is under no further obligation.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>h</sup> Raym. 500.

<sup>1</sup> Stat. 43 Eliz. c. 2 (Poor Relief, 1601).

<sup>k</sup> Stat. 5 Geo. I. c. 8 (Poor Relief, 1718).

<sup>1</sup> Styles. 283. 2 Bulstr. 346.

---

Relations, § 241, and cases; Allen v. Jacobi, 14 Ill. App. 277; Tyler v. Arnold, 47 Mich. 564, 11 N. W. 387.)

A parent is not liable for the debts or torts of his child as such. The law makes no difference in this respect between the minor child and one of full age. In order to charge the parent, the debt or wrong must be shown to have been his, either as that of a joint wrongdoer or of a master who has given the child, as a servant, power to incur it. The cases in which a father is held liable for maintenance furnished a child, not provided for at home, are better explained upon this principle than from any duty arising from the status. The strongest case is that where a parent, having the means to support a child, turns it out of doors without reason and without means. He is then liable for maintenance furnished, as a husband would be for a wife under like circumstances.—HAMMOND.

<sup>4</sup> Duty to support children.—The statutes mentioned by Blackstone have been supplemented by later statutes, both in England and in America. In

No person is bound to provide a maintenance for his issue, unless where the children are impotent and unable to work, either through infancy, disease, or accident; and then is only obliged to find them with necessaries, the penalty on refusal being no more than 20s. a month. For the policy of our laws, which are ever watchful to promote industry, did not mean to compel a father to maintain his idle and lazy children in ease and indolence: but thought it unjust to oblige the parent, against his will, to provide them with superfluities, and other indulgences of fortune; imagining they might trust to the impulse of nature, if the children were deserving of such favors. Yet, as nothing is so apt to stifle the calls of nature as religious bigotry, it is enacted,<sup>m</sup> that if any popish parent shall <sup>m</sup> Stat. 11 & 12 W. III. c. 4 (Popery, 1700).

---

Great Britain the various acts relating to the relief of the poor make it compulsory upon all parents, able to do so, to provide for the maintenance of their offspring when in poverty, of whatever age they may be, and whenever in fact, through infancy, disease, or accident, they are unable to support themselves. A mother, too, under the Married Women's Property Act of 1882, who has separate property, has to provide for the maintenance of her children and grandchildren. Under the provisions of the Children Act, 1908, any person over the age of sixteen years, who, having the custody of any child under the age of sixteen years, willfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons, or exposes such child, so as to cause it suffering or to injure its health, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

The obligation of a father to provide for the maintenance which is said to exist at common law is not a legal obligation, but only a moral one. Thus the father is not obliged to pay for necessaries supplied for the child's use. Mortimore v. Wright, 6 Mees. & W. 481. "Courts have not generally undertaken to enforce the obligation of parents to maintain their infant children. Indeed, in England, under the common law, the maintenance of minor children was considered merely a moral obligation not enforceable at law. It was generally there held that an action against the parent for necessaries furnished the child could not be maintained. This view has also been taken in some American decisions; although in others the other, and we think the better, rule has been declared that an action for necessaries against a parent is maintainable. See Tiffany on Persons and Domestic Relations, pp. 230, 234. It is probable that these later decisions rest on the proposition that the obligation is only a moral one, but that this moral obligation is a good consideration for the furnishing of necessaries, and a sufficient foundation for an action to recover for necessaries which have been actually furnished, although no sufficient foundation for a decree for future maintenance." Paxton v. Paxton, 150 Cal. 667, 671, 89 Pac. 1083.

refuse to allow his Protestant child a fitting maintenance, with a view to compel him to change his religion, the lord chancellor shall by order of court constrain him to do what is just and reasonable.<sup>5</sup> But this did not extend to persons of another religion, of no less bitterness and bigotry than the popish: and therefore in the very next year we find an instance of a Jew of immense riches, whose only daughter having embraced Christianity, he turned her out of doors; and on her application for relief, it was held she was entitled to none.<sup>n</sup> But this gave occasion<sup>o</sup> to another statute,<sup>p</sup> which ordains, that if Jewish parents refuse to allow their Protestant children a fitting maintenance suitable to the fortune of the parent,

<sup>n</sup> Lord Raym. 699.

<sup>o</sup> Com. Journ. 18 Feb. 12 Mar. 1701.

<sup>p</sup> 1 Ann. st. 1. c. 30 (Protestant Children of Jews, 1702).

---

5 Religious instruction in American public schools.—The constitutions and laws of the states of the American Union prohibit, either in letter or in spirit, sectarian teaching in the public schools. The questions then arise whether religious instruction is necessarily sectarian, and, if that be answered in the affirmative, whether reading the Bible is religious instruction. The latter question is the one that has provoked the most controversy. In a considerable number of jurisdictions it is held that exercises in the public schools, consisting of reading from the Bible, singing hymns, or reciting prayers, do not infringe any constitutional provision. Donahoe v. Richards, 38 Me. 379, 61 Am. Dec. 256; Billard v. Board of Education, 69 Kan. 53, 105 Am. St. Rep. 148, 2 Ann. Cas. 521, 66 L. R. A. 166, 76 Pa. 422; Hackett v. Brooksville Graded School Dist., 120 Ky. 608, 117 Am. St. Rep. 599, 9 Ann. Cas. 36, 69 L. R. A. 592, 87 S. W. 792; Spiller v. Woburn, 12 Allen (Mass.), 127; Pfeiffer v. Board of Education, 118 Mich. 560, 42 L. R. A. 536, 77 N. W. 250; Church v. Bullock, 104 Tex. 1, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 860, 109 S. W. 115; Moore v. Monroe, 64 Iowa, 367, 20 N. W. 475, 52 Am. Rep. 444.

On the other hand, some courts take the view that such exercises are necessarily sectarian in character. "The Bible is not read in the public schools as mere literature or mere history. It cannot be separated from its character as an inspired book of religion. It is not adapted for use as a text-book for the teaching alone of reading, of history, or of literature without regard to its religious character." People v. Board of Education, 245 Ill. 334, 19 Ann. Cas. 220, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 442, 92 N. E. 251; State v. Scheve, 65 Neb. 853, 59 L. R. A. 927, 91 N. W. 846, 93 N. W. 169; State v. District Board, 76 Wis. 177, 20 Am. St. Rep. 41, 7 L. R. A. 330, 44 N. W. 967. See articles by Henry Schofield in 6 Illinois Law Rev. 17, 91; and Willis A. Estrich in 20 Case and Comment, 249.

the lord chancellor on complaint may make such order therein as he shall see proper.<sup>5a</sup>

§ 613. (c) Disinheriting of children.—[450] Our law has made no provision to prevent the disinheriting of children by will: leaving every man's property in his own disposal, upon a principle of liberty in this, as well as every other, action: though perhaps it had not been amiss, if the parent had been bound to leave them at the least a necessary subsistence. Indeed, among persons of any rank or fortune, a competence is generally provided for younger children, and the bulk of the estate settled upon the eldest, by the marriage articles. Heirs also, and children, are favorites of our courts of justice, and cannot be disinherited by any dubious or ambiguous words; there being required the utmost certainty of the testator's intentions to take away the right of an heir.<sup>q</sup>

§ 614. (2) Duty to protect children.—From the duty of maintenance we may easily pass to that of protection; which is also a natural duty, but rather permitted than enjoined by any municipal laws: nature, in this respect, working so strongly as to need rather a check than a spur. A parent may, by our laws, maintain and uphold his children in their lawsuits, without being guilty of the legal crime of maintaining quarrels.<sup>r</sup> A parent may also justify an assault and battery in defense of the persons of his children:<sup>s</sup> nay, where a man's son was beaten by another boy, and the father went near a mile to find him, and there revenged his son's quarrel by beating the other boy, of which beating he afterwards unfortunately died; it was not held to be murder, but manslaughter merely.<sup>t</sup> Such indulgence does the law show to the frailty of human nature, and the workings of parental affection.<sup>6</sup>

q 1 Lev. 130.

s 1 Hawk. P. C. 131.

r 2 Inst. 564.

t Cro. Jac. 296. 1 Hawk. P. C. 83.

<sup>5a</sup> Cited, 45 N. H. 561, 49 N. H. 189, 6 Am. Rep. 499, 53 N. H. 115, 59 Pa. St. 285. The liability of a child to support its parents, who are infirm, or destitute, or aged, is wholly created by statute. (Spencer, J., 16 Johns. 281; 45 N. H. 561; 2 Kent, Comm., 208.)—HAMMOND.

<sup>6</sup> Battery in defense of kin.—As one may justify a battery in defense of himself, so may he justify a battery in defense of persons closely allied to him.

§ 615. (3) Duty to educate children.—The last duty of parents to their children is that of giving them an education suitable to their station in life: a duty pointed out by reason, and of far the greatest importance of any. For, as Puffendorf very well observes,<sup>u</sup> it is not [451] easy to imagine or allow, that a parent has conferred any considerable benefit upon his child, by bringing him into the world; if he afterwards entirely neglects his culture and education, and suffers him to grow up like a mere beast, to lead a life useless to others, and shameful to himself. Yet the municipal laws of most countries seem to be defective in this point, by not constraining the parent to bestow a proper education upon his children. Perhaps they thought it punishment enough to leave the parent, who neglects the instruction of his family, to labor under those griefs and inconveniences, which his family, so uninstructed, will be sure to bring upon him. Our laws, though their defects in this particular cannot be denied, have in one instance made a wise provision for breeding up the rising generation: since the poor and laborious part of the community, when past the age of nurture, are taken out of the hands of their parents, by the statutes of apprenticing poor children;<sup>w</sup> and are placed out by the public in such a manner, as may render their abilities, in their several stations, of the greatest advantage to the commonwealth. The rich, indeed, are left at their own option, whether they will breed up their children to be ornaments or disgraces to their family. Yet in one case, that of religion, they are under peculiar restrictions: for<sup>x</sup> it is provided, that if any person sends any child under his

<sup>u</sup> L. of N. b. 6. c. 2. § 12.

<sup>w</sup> See pag. 426.

<sup>x</sup> Stat. 1 Jac. I. c. 4 (Jesuits, 1603). & 3 Jac. I. c. 5 (Popish Recusants, 1605).

---

Thus, a person is justified in using sufficient force to protect his wife, children or other members of his family, provided the circumstances be such as to induce one having reasonable judgment to intervene to prevent the infliction of injury. "His whole defense was based on whether or not he in good faith believed that one of his sons was then and there in danger of bodily harm about to be inflicted upon him by the plaintiff, and that he used no more force than was necessary, or appeared to him in the exercise of a reasonable judgment to be necessary, to protect his son from injury at the hands of the plaintiff." Downs v. Jackson (Ky.), 128 S. W. 339. This principle extends to all family relations (Leward v. Basely, 1 Ld. Raym. 62), and a child may interfere to protect his parent (Drinkhorn v. Bubel, 85 Mich. 532, 48 N. W. 710), and a brother to protect his brother (Mellen v. Thompson, 32 Vt. 407).

government beyond the seas, either to prevent its good education in England, or in order to enter into or reside in any popish college, or to be instructed, persuaded, or strengthened in the popish religion; in such case, besides the disabilities incurred by the child so sent, the parent or person sending shall forfeit 100*l.*, which <sup>r</sup> shall go to the sole use and benefit of him that shall discover the offense. And <sup>s</sup> if any parent, or other, shall send or convey any person beyond sea, to enter into, or be resident in, or trained up in, any priory, abbey, nunnery, popish university, college, or school, or house of jesuits, or priests, or in any private popish family, in order to be instructed, persuaded, or confirmed in the [452] popish religion; or shall contribute anything towards their maintenance when abroad by any pretext whatever, the person both sending and sent shall be disabled to sue in law or equity, or to be executor or administrator to any person, or to enjoy any legacy or deed of gift, or to bear any office in the realm, and shall forfeit all his goods and chattels, and likewise all his real estate for life.<sup>7</sup>

§ 616. b. Parental authority—(1) Parental authority under Roman law.—The power of parents over their children is derived from the former consideration, their duty: this authority being given them, partly to enable the parent more effectually to perform his duty, and partly as a recompense for his care and trouble in the faithful discharge of it. And upon this score the municipal laws of some nations have given a much larger authority to the parents, than others. The ancient Roman laws gave the father a power of life and death over his children; upon this principle, that he who gave had also the power of taking away.<sup>a</sup> But the rigor of these laws was softened by subsequent constitutions; so that <sup>b</sup> we find a father banished by the Emperor Hadrian for kill-

<sup>r</sup> Stat. 11 & 12 W. III. c. 4 (Popery, 1700).

<sup>s</sup> Stat. 3 Car. I. c. 2 (1627).

<sup>a</sup> Ff. 28. 2. 11. Cod. 8. 47. 10.

<sup>b</sup> Ff. 48. 9. 5.

---

<sup>7</sup> Great improvements have been made in the matter of popular education in England. The most important provisions in recent years have been the Elementary Education Acts of 1870 and 1876, and the acts amendatory thereof. On this subject consult 3 Stephen's Comm. (16th ed.), pp. 53-75.

ing his son, though he had committed a very heinous crime, upon this maxim, that "patria potestas in pietate debet, non in atrocitate, consistere (paternal power should consist in kindness, not in cruelty)." But still they maintained to the last a very large and absolute authority: for a son could not acquire any property of his own during the life of his father; but all his acquisitions belonged to the father, or at least the profits of them for his life.<sup>c</sup>

§ 617. (2) Parental authority under English law.—The power of a parent by our English laws is much more moderate; but still sufficient to keep the child in order and obedience. He may lawfully correct his child, being under age, in a reasonable manner;<sup>d</sup> for this is for the benefit of his education.<sup>e</sup> The consent or concurrence of the parent to the marriage of his child under age, was also directed by our ancient law to be obtained: but now it is absolutely necessary; for without it the contract is void.<sup>e</sup> And this also is another means, which the law has put into the parent's hands, in order [453] the better to discharge his duty; first, of protecting his children from the snares of artful and designing persons; and, next, of settling them properly in life, by preventing the ill consequences of too early and precipitate marriages. A father has no other power over his son's estate, than as his trustee or guardian; for, though he may receive the profits during the child's minority, yet he must account for them when he comes of age. He may indeed have the benefit of his children's labor while

<sup>c</sup> Inst. 2. 9. 1.

<sup>d</sup> 1 Hawk. P. C. 130.

<sup>e</sup> Stat. 26 Geo. II. 33 (Clandestine Marriages, 1753).

---

<sup>8</sup> A parent, or one authorized by a parent to take control or charge of a minor child, is not liable for the use of a reasonable force to secure the child's obedience. Rowe v. Rugg, 117 Iowa, 606, 94 Am. St. Rep. 318, 91 N. W. 903. On grounds of supposed expediency, a child is not allowed in some courts to sue his parent for excessive punishment. McKelvey v. McKelvey, 111 Tenn. 388, 102 Am. St. Rep. 787, 1 Ann. Cas. 130, 64 L. R. A. 991, 77 S. W. 664. In other jurisdictions recovery may be allowed. Clasen v. Pruhs, 69 Neb. 278, 5 Ann. Cas. 112, 95 N. W. 640. But a parent will be liable criminally, being guilty, according to circumstances, of assault and battery: State v. Bitman, 13 Iowa, 485; or murder or manslaughter: Grey's Case, J. Kel. 64; Rex v. Hazel, 1 Leach, 368, 1 East P. C. 236; 2 Bishop, New Cr. Law, § 683.

they live with him, and are maintained by him: but this is no more than he is entitled to from his apprentices or servants. The legal power of a father (for a mother, as such, is entitled to no power,<sup>9</sup> but only to reverence and respect), the power of a father, I say, over the persons of his children ceases at the age of twenty-one: for they are then enfranchised by arriving at years of discretion, or that point which the law has established (as some must necessarily be established) when the empire of the father, or other guardian, gives place to the empire of reason. Yet, till that age arrives, this empire of the father continues even after his death; for he may by his will appoint a guardian to his children. He may also delegate part of his parental authority, during his life, to the tutor or schoolmaster, of his child; who is then in loco parentis (in the place of a parent), and has such a portion of the power of the parent committed to his charge, viz., that of restraint and correction, as may be necessary to answer the purposes for which he is employed.

§ 618. c. Duties of children.—The duties of children to their parents arise from a principle of natural justice and retribution. For to those, who gave us existence, we naturally owe subjection and obedience during our minority, and honor and reverence ever after: they, who protected the weakness of our infancy, are en-

<sup>9</sup> Rights of mother.—At common law the father's rights were paramount; the mother had none during his life, and few after his death. (Mercein v. People, 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 64, 35 Am. Dec. 653; People v. Mercein, 3 Hill (N. Y.), 399, 38 Am. Dec. 644.) But in this country, even at common law, the courts will give custody to the mother as against the father in a proper case (McShan v. McShan, 56 Miss. 413; English v. English, 32 N. J. Eq. 738. Cf. 31 N. J. Eq. 543); and in some states the law puts them on an equality, e. g., Iowa, where both have equal power. In case of great neglect a guardian may be appointed in his lifetime, and custody taken from him. (Heinemann's Appeal, 96 Pa. St. 112, 42 Am. Rep. 532.) Neither has an absolute right, even against third persons, though a prima facie one. (McGlennan v. Margowski, 90 Ind. 150.) Grandparents, to whom the child has been given as an infant to bring up, can retain it against the mother (Bonnett v. Bonnett, 61 Iowa, 199, 47 Am. Rep. 810, 16 N. W. 91), the father (Sturtevant v. State, 15 Neb. 459, 48 Am. Rep. 349, 19 N. W. 617; Verser v. Ford, 37 Ark. 27. Contra, Re Scarritt, 76 Mo. 565, 43 Am. Rep. 768, Henry, J., dissenting). The aunt may retain it against the father in some cases. (Chapsky v. Wood, 26 Kan. 650, 40 Am. Rep. 321.)
—HAMMOND.

titled to our protection in the infirmity of their age; they who by sustenance and education have enabled their offspring to prosper, ought in return to be supported by that offspring, in case they stand in need of assistance. Upon this principle proceed all the duties of children to their parents which are enjoined by positive laws. And the Athenian laws<sup>f</sup> carried [454] this principle into practice with a scrupulous kind of nicety: obliging all children to provide for their father, when fallen into poverty; with an exception to spurious children, to those whose chastity had been prostituted by consent of the father, and to those whom he had not put in any way of gaining a livelihood. The legislature, says Baron Montesquieu,<sup>g</sup> considered, that in the first case the father, being uncertain, had rendered the natural obligation precarious; that, in the second case, he had sullied the life he had given, and done his children the greatest of injuries, in depriving them of their reputation; and that, in the third case, he had rendered their life (so far as in him lay) an insupportable burden, by furnishing them with no means of subsistence.

Our laws agree with those of Athens with regard to the first only of these particulars, the case of spurious issue. In the other cases the law does not hold the tie of nature to be dissolved by any misbehavior of the parent; and therefore a child is equally justifiable in defending the person, or maintaining the cause or suit, of a bad parent, as a good one; and is equally compellable,<sup>h</sup> if of sufficient ability, to maintain and provide for a wicked and unnatural progenitor, as for one who has shown the greatest tenderness and parental piety.

§ 619. 2. Illegitimate children, or bastards.—We are next to consider the case of illegitimate children, or bastards; with regard to whom let us inquire, 1. Who are bastards. 2. The legal duties of the parents towards a bastard child. 3. The rights and incapacities attending such bastard children.

§ 620. a. Who are bastards: legitimation.—Who are bastards. A bastard, by our English laws, is one that is not only begotten, <sup>f</sup> Potter's Antiqu. b. 4. c. 15.

<sup>g</sup> Sp. L. b. 26. c. 5.

<sup>h</sup> Stat. 43 Eliz. c. 2 (Poor Relief, 1601).

but born, out of lawful matrimony. The civil and canon laws do not allow a child to remain a bastard, if the parents afterwards intermarry:† and herein they differ most materially from our law; which, though not so strict as to require that the child shall be begotten, [455] yet makes it an indispensable condition that it shall be born, after lawful wedlock. And the reason of our English law is surely much superior to that of the Roman, if we consider the principal end and design of establishing the contract of marriage, taken in a civil light; abstractedly from any religious view, which has nothing to do with the legitimacy or illegitimacy of the children. The main end and design of marriage, therefore, being to ascertain and fix upon some certain person, to whom the care, the protection, the maintenance, and the education of the children should belong; this end is undoubtedly better answered by legitimating all issue born after wedlock, than by legitimating all issue of the same parties, even born before wedlock, so as wedlock afterwards ensues: 1. Because of the very great uncertainty there will generally be, in the proof that the issue was really begotten by the same man; whereas, by confining the proof to the birth, and not to the begetting, our law has rendered it perfectly certain, what child is legitimate, and who is to take care of the child. 2. Because by the Roman law a child may be continued a bastard, or made legitimate, at the option of the father and mother, by a marriage ex post facto, thereby opening a door to many frauds and partialities, which by our law are prevented. 3. Because by those laws a man may remain a bastard till forty years of age, and then become legitimate, by the subsequent marriage of his parents; whereby the main end of marriage, the protection of infants, is totally frustrated. 4. Because this rule of the Roman law admits of no limitations as to the time, or number of bastards so to be legitimated; but a dozen of them may, twenty years after their birth, by the subsequent marriage of their parents, be admitted to all the privileges of legitimate children. This is plainly a great discouragement to the matrimonial state; to which one main inducement is usually not only the desire of having children, but also the desire of procreating lawful heirs. Whereas our constitutions guard against this indecency, and at the same time give sufficient allowance to the frailties of human nature. For, if a child be begotten while the parents are single, and they will endeavor to make [456] an early reparation for the offense, by marrying within a few months after, our law is so indulgent as not to bastardize the child, if it be born, though not begotten, in lawful wedlock, for this is an incident that can happen but once; since all future children will be begotten, as well as born, within the rules of honor and civil society. Upon reasons like these we may suppose the peers to have acted at the parliament of Merton, when they refused to enact that children born before marriage should be esteemed legitimate.*

† Inst. l. 10. 13. Decret. l. 4. t. 17. c. 1.

§ 621. (1) Children of dubious parentage.—From what has been said it appears, that all children born before matrimony are bastards by our law: and so it is of all children born so long after the death of the husband, that, by the usual course of gestation, they could not be begotten by him. But, this being a matter of some uncertainty, the law is not exact as to a few days.<sup>1</sup> And this gives occasion to a proceeding at common law, where a widow is suspected to feign herself with child, in order to produce a supposititious heir to the estate: an attempt which the rigor of the Gothic constitutions esteemed equivalent to the most atrocious theft, and therefore punished with death.<sup>m</sup> In this case with us the heir presumptive may have a writ de ventre inspiciendo (for inspecting whether a woman be pregnant),<sup>10</sup> to examine whether she be with * Rogaverunt omnes episcopi magnates, ut consentirent quod nati ante matrimonium essent legitimi, sicut illi qui nati sunt post matrimonium, quia ecclesie tales habet pro legitimis. Et omnes comites et barones una voce responderunt, quod nolunt leges Angliæ mutare, quæ hucusque usitatae sunt et approbatæ (All the bishops requested the peers to consent that children born before marriage should be legitimate, as those which are born after marriage, because the church esteems them so. But all the earls and barons answered unanimously, that they would not change the laws of England which were hitherto used and approved). Stat. 20 Hen. III. c. 9. See the introduction to the great charter, edit. Oxon. 1759. sub anno 1253.

<sup>1</sup> Cro. Jac. 541.

<sup>m</sup> Stiernhook de Jure Gothor. l. 3. c. 5.

<sup>10</sup> "The writ de ventre inspiciendo, to ascertain whether a woman convicted of a capital crime was quick with child, was allowed by the common law, in child, or not;<sup>n</sup> and, if she be, to keep her under proper restraint, till delivered; which is entirely conformable to the practice of the civil law:<sup>o</sup> but, if the widow be upon due examination found not pregnant, the presumptive heir shall be admitted to the inheritance, though liable to lose it again, on the birth of a child within forty weeks from the death of the husband.<sup>p</sup> But if a man dies, and his widow soon after marries again, and a child is born within such a time, as that by the course of nature it might have been the child of either [<sup>457</sup>] husband; in this case he is said to be more than ordinarily legitimate; for he may, when he arrives to years of discretion, choose which of the fathers he pleases.<sup>q</sup> To prevent this, among other inconveniences, the civil law ordained that no widow should marry infra annum luctus (within the year of mourning),<sup>r</sup> a rule which obtained so early as the reign of Augustus,<sup>s</sup> if not of Romulus: and the same constitution was probably handed down to our early ancestors from the Romans, during

<sup>n</sup> Co. Litt. 8. Bract. l. 2. c. 32.

<sup>o</sup> Ff. 25. tit. 4. per tot.

<sup>p</sup> Britton, c. 66. pag. 166.

<sup>q</sup> Co. Litt. 8.

<sup>r</sup> Cod. 5. 9. 2.

<sup>s</sup> But the year was then only ten months. Ovid. Fast. I. 27.

---

order to guard against the taking of the life of an unborn child for the crime of the mother. The only purpose, we believe, for which the like writ was allowed by the common law, in a matter of civil right, was to protect the rightful succession to the property of a deceased person against fraudulent claims of bastards, when a widow was suspected to feign herself with child in order to produce a supposititious heir to the estate, in which case the heir or devisee might have this writ to examine whether she was with child or not, and, if she was, to keep her under proper restraint till delivered. 1 Bl. Comm. 456; Bac. Ab., Bastard, A. In cases of that class, the writ has been issued in England in quite recent times. In re Blakemore, 14 Law Journal (N. S.) Ch. 336. But the learning and research of the counsel for the plaintiff in error have failed to produce an instance of its ever having been considered, in any part of the United States, as suited to the habits and condition of the people. So far as the books within our reach show, no order to inspect the body of a party in a personal action appears to have been made, or even moved for, in any of the English courts of common law, at any period of their history." Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250, 253, 35 L. Ed. 734, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1000.

their stay in this island; for we find it established under the Saxon and Danish governments.<sup>t 11</sup>

§ 622. (2) Bastards born during wedlock.—As bastards may be born before the coverture or marriage state is begun, or after it is determined, so also children born during wedlock may in some circumstances be bastards. As if the husband be out of the kingdom of England (or, as the law somewhat loosely phrases it, extra quatuor maria—beyond the four seas), for above nine months, so that no access to his wife can be presumed, her issue during that period shall be bastards.<sup>u</sup> But, generally, during the coverture access of the husband shall be presumed, unless the contrary can be shown;<sup>v</sup> which is such a negative as can only be proved by showing him to be elsewhere: for the general rule is, præsumitur pro legitimatione (the presumption is in favor of legitimacy).<sup>w</sup> In a divorce, a mensa et thoro (from bed and board), if the wife breeds children, they are bastards; for the law will presume the husband and wife conformable to the sentence of <sup>1</sup> separation, unless access be proved: but in a voluntary separation by agreement, the law

<sup>t</sup> Sit omnis vidua sine marito duodecim menses. (Let every widow remain unmarried twelve months.) LL. Ethelr. A. D. 1008. LL. Canut. c. 71.

<sup>u</sup> Co. Litt. 244.

<sup>v</sup> Salk. 123. 3 P. W. 276. Stra. 925.

<sup>w</sup> 5 Rep. 98.

---

<sup>11</sup> Savigny has discussed this point in his history of the Roman law during the Middle Ages (vol. 2, ch. 10, § 58); but the civilian does not share Blackstone's belief that the law of Canute was a survival of the Roman dominion. After referring not only to this (LL. Canute, § 71, Ancient Laws, Thorpe's ed. vol. 1, p. 74), of which he says that it is clearly taken from the Theodosian Code, lib. 3, tit. 8, section 1, brev. de sec. nuptiis, its penalties differing entirely from those of the code of Justinian de sec. nuptiis, but also the other proofs of the knowledge, or use of the Roman law in the Anglo-Saxon period given by different writers, he concludes that all taken together prove some acquaintance with the Roman law among the clergy, but not the preservation of any such law from the period of Roman rule in the island. When it is considered that the law of marriage was in the hands of the clergy, whose councils and synods preserved an almost unbroken line of descent from those of Christian Rome, the wonder must be, not that we find an occasional trace of Roman law here, but that these are so very few and slight.—HAMMOND.

will suppose access, unless the negative be shown.<sup>x</sup> So, also, if there is an apparent impossibility of procreation on the part of the husband, as if he be only eight years old, or the like, there the issue of the wife shall be bastard.<sup>y</sup> Likewise, in case of divorce in the spiritual court a vinculo matrimonii (from the bond of matrimony), all the issue born during the coverture are bastards;<sup>z</sup> <sup>12</sup> because such divorce is always upon [458] some cause, that rendered the marriage unlawful and null from the beginning.

§ 623. b. Support of bastards.—Let us next see the duty of parents to their bastard children, by our law; which is principally that of maintenance. For, though bastards are not looked upon as children to any civil purposes, yet the ties of nature, of which maintenance is one, are not so easily dissolved: and they hold indeed as to many other intentions; as, particularly, that a man shall not marry his bastard sister or daughter.<sup>a</sup> The civil law, therefore, when it denied maintenance to bastards begotten under certain atrocious circumstances,<sup>b</sup> was neither consonant to nature, nor reason; however profligate and wicked the parents might justly be esteemed.

<sup>x</sup> Salk. 123.

<sup>y</sup> Co. Litt. 244.

<sup>z</sup> Ibid. 235.

<sup>a</sup> Lord Raym. 63. Comb. 356.

<sup>b</sup> Nov. 89. c. 15.

---

<sup>12</sup> Effect of divorce on legitimacy.—The influence of the canon law in introducing the consideration given to good faith, knowledge, etc., is clearly shown in the case of divorce, and its effect upon the legitimacy of the issue. By the common law a divorce bastardized all the issue, as Croke says, in Hil. 18 Edw. IV, pl. 28, fol. 29, 30; but the spiritual law distinguished in cases of divorce for consanguinity between a conscious and unconscious incest, and bastardized only the issue of the former. (Brian, ubi supra, and Catesby, arg. fol. 296.) There the question is treated as an open one, and the difference of common and canon law is clearly recognized; but at a later date the same point is stated without qualification in our law, as Blackstone has stated it here (Roll. Rep. 212; 14 Vin. 250; Heir, F. 1); and it is doubtless from the influence of the canon law that the French law took the rule mentioned in a former note (p. *453), legitimizing children born of a void marriage, which has been copied by the statute law of Virginia and other states.—HAMMOND.

The method in which the English law provides maintenance for them is as follows:° When a woman is delivered, or declares herself with child, of a bastard, and will by oath before a justice of peace charge any person having got her with child, the justice shall cause such person to be apprehended, and commit him till he gives security, either to maintain the child, or appear at the next quarter sessions to dispute and try the fact. But if the woman dies, or is married before delivery, or miscarries, or proves not to have been with child, the person shall be discharged: otherwise the sessions, or two justices out of sessions, upon original application to them, may take order for the keeping of the bastard, by charging the mother or the reputed father with the payment of money or other sustentation for that purpose. And if such putative father, or lewd mother, run away from the parish, the overseers by direction of two justices may seize their rents, goods, and chattels, in order to bring up the said bastard child. Yet such is the humanity of our laws, that no woman can be compulsively questioned concerning the father of her child, till one month after her delivery: which indulgence is, however, very frequently a hardship, upon parishes, by giving the parents opportunity to escape.

§ 624. c. Rights and incapacities of bastards.—<sup>[459]</sup> I proceed next to the rights and incapacities which appertain to a bastard. The rights are very few, being only such as he can acquire; for he can inherit nothing, being looked upon as the son of nobody, and sometimes called filius nullius (the son of no one), sometimes filius populi (the son of the people).<sup>d</sup> Yet he may gain a surname by reputation,<sup>e</sup> though he has none by inheritance. All other children have their primary settlement in their father's parish; but a bastard in the parish where born, for he hath no father.<sup>f</sup> However, in case of fraud, as if a woman be sent either by order of justices, ° Stat. 18 Eliz. c. 3 (Poor, 1575). 7 Jac. I. c. 4 (Vagabonds, 1609). 3 Car. I. c. 4 (1627). 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 12 (Poor Relief, 1662). 6 Geo. II. c. 31 (Bastard Children, 1732).

<sup>d</sup> Fort. d. L. L. c. 40.

<sup>e</sup> Co. Litt. 3.

<sup>f</sup> Salk. 427.

or comes to beg as a vagrant, to a parish which she does not belong to, and drops her bastard there; the bastard shall, in the first case, be settled in the parish from whence she was illegally removed;<sup>e</sup> or, in the latter case, in the mother's own parish, if the mother be apprehended for her vagrancy.<sup>b</sup> Bastards also, born in any licensed hospital for pregnant women, are settled in the parishes to which the mothers belong.<sup>1</sup> The incapacity of a bastard consists principally in this, that he cannot be heir to anyone, neither can he have heirs, but of his own body; for, being nullius filius, he is therefore of kin to nobody, and has no ancestor from whom any inheritable blood can be derived. A bastard was also, in strictness, incapable of holy orders; and, though that were dispensed with, yet he was utterly disqualified from holding any dignity in the church;<sup>k</sup> but this doctrine seems now obsolete; and in all other respects, there is no distinction between a bastard and another man. And really any other distinction, but that of not inheriting, which civil policy renders necessary, would, with regard to the innocent offspring of his parents' crimes, be odious, unjust, and cruel to the last degree, and yet the civil law, so boasted of for its equitable decisions, made bastards in some cases incapable even of a gift from their parents.<sup>l</sup> A bastard may, lastly, be made legitimate, and capable of inheriting, by the transcendent power of an act of parliament, and not otherwise,<sup>m</sup> as was done in the case of John of Gant's bastard children, by a statute of Richard the Second.

<sup>e</sup> Ibid. 121.

<sup>b</sup> Stat. 17 Geo. II. c. 5 (1743).

<sup>1</sup> Stat. 13 Geo. III. c. 82 (Lying-in Hospitals, 1772).

<sup>k</sup> Fortesc. c. 40. 5 Rep. 58.

<sup>l</sup> Cod. 6. 57. 5.

<sup>m</sup> 4 Inst. 36.

CHAPTER THE SEVENTEENTH. [460]

OF GUARDIAN AND WARD.

§ 625. Guardian and ward.—The only general private relation, now remaining to be discussed, is that of guardian and ward;<sup>1</sup> which bears a very near resemblance to the last, and is plainly derived out of it: the guardian being only a temporary parent; that is, for so long time as the ward is an infant, or under age. In examining this species of relationship, I shall first consider the different kinds of guardians, how they are appointed, and their power and duty; next, the different ages of persons, as defined by the law: and, lastly, the privileges and disabilities of an infant, or one under age and subject to guardianship.

1 The law of guardianship.—The common-law distinctions as to different kinds of guardian have almost entirely disappeared, though in the guardian ad litem we have still a reminiscence of the prochein amy who was guardian in socage; and the parent is still guardian by nature of his child's person, but not of his estate. The guardian is now testamentary or statutory; the latter being appointed by the proper court under the state laws regulating the subject. After the age of fourteen the infant has usually by these statutes the right to select his guardian, subject to the court's approval. Either is now known as a general guardian, unless his power is expressly limited by the act appointing him.

The court of the father's last domicile is the proper court to appoint. (Wells v. Andrews, 60 Miss. 373.) The guardian cannot change it by removing the ward. (Marheineke v. Grothaus, 72 Mo. 204.) The appointment has no extraterritorial force, e. g., out of state. (Taney's Appeal, 97 Pa. St. 74, peculiar facts, guardian appointed where father was killed—aunt's choice of domicile.) Ancillary guardian may be appointed in another jurisdiction. Guardianship of "unknown heirs of A" is a mere nullity. (State v. McLaughlin, 77 Ind. 335.) He may expend the income, but not the principal without leave of court. Seemle, under strong and sudden urgency, as for maintenance, medical expenses, and burial, he may do so. (Hobbs v. Harlan, 10 Lea (Tenn.), 268, 43 Am. Rep. 309.) The court can afterward sanction this as to personalty, but not as to realty. Rinker v. Streit, 33 Gratt. (Va.) 663.) He may under circumstances anticipate future resources. (Gott v. Culp, 45 Mich. 265, 7 N. W. 767.) The ward cannot in any case extend his authority. His consent even in a criminal case is a nullity. (State v. Willoughby, 76 Mo. 215.) The apparent exception of consent given by female ward after marriage not real. (Bickerstaff v. Marlin, 60 Miss. 509, 45 Am. Rep. 418.) A guardian's contract even for necessities for the ward will not bind the estate (Reading v. Wilson, 38 N. J. Eq.

§ 626. 1. Guardians.—1. The guardian with us performs the office both of the tutor and curator of the Roman laws; the former of which had the charge of the maintenance and education of the minor, the latter the care of his fortune; or, according to the language of the court of chancery, the tutor was the committee of the person, the curator the committee of the estate. But this office was frequently united in the civil law;<sup>a</sup> as it is always in our law with regard to minors, though as to lunatics and idiots it is commonly kept distinct.

§ 627. a. Kinds of guardians—(1) Guardians by nature; (2) Guardians for nurture; (3) Guardians in socage; (4) Guardians by statute or by testament; (5) Guardians by custom.—<sup>[461]</sup> Of the several species of guardians, the first are guardians by nature: viz., the father and (in some cases) the mother of the child. For if an estate be left to an infant, the father is by common law the guardian, and must account to his child for the profits.<sup>b</sup> And, with regard to daughters, it seems by construction of the statute 4 & 5 Ph. & Mar., c. 8 (Abduction, 1558), that the father might by deed or will assign a guardian to any woman child under the age of sixteen; and, if none be so assigned, the mother shall in 446); but he may be held personally on a contract so made. (McKinney v. Jones, 55 Wis. 39, 11 N. W. 606, 12 N. W. 381.) He cannot advance money from his own means, and hold the ward personally liable after coming of age. (Preble v. Longfellow, 48 Me. 279, 77 Am. Dec. 227.) The guardian is a trustee, and held to all the duties of a trustee, except those belonging to the legal title, which he has not (in land at least, though he may have in personalty). It is a breach of trust if he takes title in his own name, and the title is void. (Robinson v. Peabworth, 71 Ala. 240; Coffey v. Greenfield, 62 Cal. 602.) Upon his responsibility for the ward's money deposited in his own name, see Parsley v. Martin, 77 Va. 376, 46 Am. Rep. 733. Like other trustees, he cannot purchase. (Jeffries v. Dowdle, 61 Miss. 504.) It is his duty to collect debts by suit (Bemiss v. Bemiss, 110 U. S. 42, 28 L. Ed. 64, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441); and he may compound them. (Ordinary v. Dean, 44 N. J. L. 64.) The guardian should settle his accounts in court at the termination of the minority. It will then be res adjudicata. (State v. Slauter, 80 Ind. 597.) He may settle with the infant personally after the latter is of age, but in case of doubt will have the burden of proving the fairness of the settlement, especially if made soon or hastily. A delay of four years in questioning such a settlement is fatal, at least as to claims on his sureties. (Aaron v. Mendel, 78 Ky. 427, 39 Am. Rep. 248.)—HAMMOND.

<sup>a</sup> Ff. 26. 4. 1.

<sup>b</sup> Co. Litt. 88.

---

this case be guardian.<sup>c</sup> There are also guardians for nurture,<sup>d</sup> which are, of course, the father or mother, till the infant attains the age of fourteen years:<sup>e</sup> and in default of father or mother, the ordinary usually assigns some discreet person to take care of the infant's personal estate, and to provide for his maintenance and education.<sup>f</sup> Next are guardians in socage (an appellation which will be fully explained in the second book of these Commentaries), who are also called guardians by the common law. These take place only when the minor is entitled to some estate in lands, and then by the common law the guardianship devolves upon his next of kin, to whom the inheritance cannot possibly descend; as, where the estate descended from his father, in this case his uncle by the mother's side cannot possibly inherit this estate, and therefore shall be the guardian.<sup>g</sup> For the law judges it improper to trust the person of an infant in his hands, who may by possibility become heir to him; that there may be no temptation, nor even suspicion of temptation, for him to abuse his trust.<sup>h</sup> The Roman laws proceed on a quite contrary principle, committing the care of the minor to him who is the next to succeed to the inheritance, presuming that the next heir would take the best care of an estate, to which he has a prospect of succeeding: and this they boast to be "summa providentia (the greatest prudence)."<sup>i</sup> But in the meantime they seem to have forgotten how much it is the [462] guardian's interest to remove the encumbrance of his pupil's life from that estate for which he is supposed to have so great a regard.<sup>k</sup>

<sup>c</sup> 3 Rep. 39.

<sup>d</sup> Co. Litt. 88.

<sup>e</sup> Moor. 738. 3 Rep. 38.

<sup>f</sup> 2 Jones 90. 2 Lev. 163.

<sup>g</sup> Litt. § 123.

<sup>h</sup> Nunquam custodia alicujus de jure alicui remanet, de quo habeatur suspicio, quod possit vel velit aliquod jus in ipsa hæreditate clamare. (The guardianship of no person shall of right continue in him, of whom a suspicion may be entertained that he can or will claim any right in the inheritance.) Glanv. l. 7. c. 11.

<sup>i</sup> Ff. 26. 4. 1.

<sup>k</sup> The Roman satirist was fully aware of this danger, when he puts this private prayer into the mouth of a selfish guardian:

—pupillum o utinam, quem proximus hæres

Impello, expungam. (O, were my pupil fairly knock'd o' th' head! I should possess th' estate if he were dead.) Pæra. l. 12.

And this affords Fortescue,<sup>1</sup> and Sir Edward Coke,<sup>m</sup> an ample opportunity for triumph; they affirming, that to commit the custody of an infant to him that is next in succession is "quasi agnum committere lupo, ad devorandum (like committing the lamb to the wolf to be devoured)."<sup>n</sup> These guardians in socage, like those for nurture, continue only till the minor is fourteen years of age; for then, in both cases, he is presumed to have discretion, so far as to choose his own guardian. This he may do, unless one be appointed by the father, by virtue of the statute 12 Car. II, c. 24 (Military Tenures, 1660), which, considering the imbecility of judgment in children of the age of fourteen, and the abolition of guardianship in chivalry (which lasted till the age of twenty-one, and of which we shall speak hereafter) enacts, that any father, under age or of full age, may by deed or will dispose of the custody of his child, either born or unborn, to any person, except a popish recusant, either in possession or reversion, till such child attains the age of one and twenty years. These are called guardians by statute, or testamentary guardians. There are also special guardians by custom of London, and other places;<sup>o</sup> but they are particular exceptions, and do not fall under the general law.

§ 628. b. Reciprocal rights and duties.—The power and reciprocal duty of a guardian and ward are the same, pro tempore (for the time being), as that of a father and child; and therefore I shall not repeat them: but shall only add, that the guardian, when the ward comes of age, is bound to give [<sup>463</sup>] him an account of all that has been transacted on his behalf, and must answer for all losses by his willful default or negligence. In order, therefore, to prevent disagreeable contests with young gentlemen, it has become a practice for many guardians, of large estates especially,

<sup>1</sup> C. 44.

<sup>m</sup> 1 Inst. 88.

<sup>n</sup> See Stat. Hibern. 14 Hen. III (1229). This policy of our English law is warranted by the wise institutions of Solon, who provided that no one should be another's guardian, who was to enjoy the estate after his death. (Potter's Antiqu. b. 1. c. 26.) And Charondas, another of the Grecian legislators, directed that the inheritance should go to the father's relations, but the education of the child to the mother's; that the guardianship and right of succession might always be kept distinct. (Petit. Leg. Att. l. 6. t. 7.)

<sup>o</sup> Co. Litt. 88.

to indemnify themselves by applying to the court of chancery, acting under its direction, and accounting annually before the officers of that court. For the lord chancellor is, by right derived from the crown, the general and supreme guardian of all infants, as well as idiots and lunatics; that is, of all such persons as have not discretion enough to manage their own concerns. In case, therefore, any guardian abuses his trust, the court will check and punish him; nay, sometimes will proceed to the removal of him, and appoint another in his stead.<sup>p</sup>

§ 629. 2. Wards; infancy.—Let us next consider the ward or person within age, for whose assistance and support these guardians are constituted by law; or who it is, that is said to be within age. The ages of male and female are different for different purposes. A male at twelve years old may take the oath of allegiance; at fourteen is at years of discretion, and therefore may consent or disagree to marriage, may choose his guardian, and, if his discretion be actually proved, may make his testament of his personal estate; at seventeen may be an executor; and at twenty-one is at his own disposal, and may alien his lands, goods, and chattels. A female also at seven years of age may be betrothed or given in marriage; at nine is entitled to dower; at twelve is at years of maturity, and therefore may consent or disagree to marriage, and, if proved to have sufficient discretion, may bequeath her personal estate; at fourteen is at years of legal discretion, and may choose a guardian: at seventeen may be executrix; and at twenty-one may dispose of herself and her lands. So that full age in male or female is twenty-one years, which age is completed on the day preceding the anniversary of a person's birth;<sup>q</sup> who till that time is an infant, and so styled in law. Among the ancient Greeks and Romans women were never [<sup>464</sup>] of age but subject to perpetual guardianship,<sup>r</sup> unless when married, "nisi convenissent in manum viri (unless they should come under the care of a husband)": and, when that perpetual tutelage wore away in process of time, we find that, in females as well as males, full age was not till twenty-five years.* Thus by the constitution of different kingdoms, this period, which is merely arbitrary, and juris positivi (positive law), is fixed at different times. Scotland agrees with England in this point (both probably copying from the old Saxon constitutions on the Continent, which extended the age of minority "ad annum vigesimum primum, et eo usque juvenes sub tutelam reponunt—to the twenty-first year; and they place their youths under guardianship till that period);† but in Naples they are of full age at eighteen; in France, with regard to marriage, not till thirty; and in Holland at twenty-five.

<sup>p</sup> 1 Sid. 424. 1 P. Will. 703.

<sup>q</sup> Salk. 44. 615. Lord Raym. 480, 1096. Toder v. Sansam. Dom. Proc. 27 Febr. 1775.

<sup>r</sup> Pott. Antiq. b. 4. c. 11. Cic. pro Muren. 12.

§ 630. a. Privileges and disabilities of infants.—Infants have various privileges, and various disabilities: but their very disabilities are privileges; in order to secure them from hurting themselves<sup>2</sup> by their own improvident acts. An infant cannot be sued

* Inst. 1. 22. 1.

† Stiernhook de Jure Sueonum. 1. 2. c. 2. This is also the period when the king as well as the subject arrives at full age in modern Sweden. Mod. Un. Hist. xxxiii. 220.

---

2 Privileges and disabilities of infancy.—An infant's disabilities extend only to the disposal of property. In holding it he has the same rights with any other person, and a gift, devise, or conveyance to him vests a complete title, with which the parent has no right as parent to interfere, and as guardian can only deal with it as any other guardian would, subject to account, and under the direction of a court of probate or chancery. Acceptance by the infant is presumed. (Jackson v. Bodle, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 184.) Guardian's promise does not bind. (Burnham v. Porter, 24 N. H. 570.) A conveyance from the father to the child is no exception to this rule; only such a conveyance is subject to be avoided by creditors if voluntary, as the like conveyance to a stranger would be, and the relationship of the parties is a suspicious fact that would strengthen other evidence of fraud. Such a conveyance to a stranger would be valid between the parties, and there seems to be no reason why it should not be valid between parent and child, as any other voluntary conveyance would be, against subsequent purchasers under the American rule, though not under the English. (Spencer v. Carr, 45 N. Y. 406, 6 Am. Rep. 112.) An absolute gift of personalty by father to child, e. g., of a watch, cannot be reclaimed without the child's consent. (Smith v. Smith, 7 Car. & P. 401.)

Upon the distinction between different acts by the infant himself, the fundamental principle may be stated thus: An infant or minor is incapable of obligating himself by any promise he may make, or other expression of his will;

but under the protection, and joining the name, of his guardian; for he is to defend him against all attacks as well by law as otherwise:<sup>a</sup> but he may sue either by his guardian, or prochein amy, his next friend who is not his guardian. This prochein amy may be any person who will undertake the infant's cause; and it frequently happens that an infant, by his prochein amy, institutes a suit in equity against a fraudulent guardian. In criminal cases, an infant of the age of fourteen years may be capitally punished for any capital offense:<sup>w</sup> but under the age of seven he cannot. The period between seven and fourteen is subject to much uncertainty: for the infant shall, generally speaking, be judged prima facie innocent; yet if he was doli capax (capable of deceit), and could but he is subject to all the laws of the state, and responsible for transgressions against them, equally with adults. In consequence, he is liable for torts, but not upon contracts: or more accurately, he is subject to duties in rem, but not to obligations in personam. But even this limited responsibility does not attach to him upon birth, or before he can be deemed a rational being; mischief done by a young infant not capable of foreseeing the results of his acts, must be regarded as accidents. At what age this capacity begins is a question of fact in each case. So, too, in cases where a greater degree of care, skill, prudence, or knowledge is required, or where actual malice must be shown, it will always be a question of fact, and his age at the time will be one of the evidential factors, of which the answer to that question must be constructed. Infancy may always be taken into consideration with other circumstances in determining whether a wrong has been committed. It is here not an ultimate but an evidential fact, and the effect of it will vary according to the nature of the tort. This is very clearly stated by C. J. Marshall in Vasse v. Smith. After holding that infancy is not a complete bar in trover, even when the goods were in his possession by virtue of a contract, he says: "Yet it may be given in evidence, for it may have some influence on the question whether the act complained of be really a conversion or not," and therefore overrules an exception taken to its admission.

<sup>a</sup> Co. Litt. 135.

<sup>w</sup> 1 Hal. P. C. 25.

---

The exceptional cases in which the minor is said to bind himself by his contracts will be found always to contain some external act or course of conduct, upon which the law fixes the consequence wrongly attributed to his obligation. Thus his feoffments actually passed the seisin, but his grants were inoperative; his contract to serve was called binding, to give him a settlement (King v. Dutton, 15 East, 352); but it was really the residence that was the result in fact of the service. The clearest instance, however, is the purchase of necessaries; the law implies liability to pay the reasonable worth of what he discern between good and evil at the time of the offense committed, he may be convicted and undergo judgment and execution of death, though he hath not attained to years of puberty [465] or discretion.* And Sir Matthew Hale gives us two instances, one of a girl of thirteen, who was burned for killing her mistress; another of a boy still younger, that had killed his companion, and hid himself, who was hanged; for it appeared by his hiding that he knew he had done wrong, and could discern between good and evil: and in such cases the maxim of law is, that malitia supplet aetatem (malice, or the intention to do a wrongful act, makes up for the want of mature years). [Broom's Legal Maxims (8th ed.), 264]. So, also, in much more modern times, a boy of ten years old, who has in fact received, but his express promise to pay any particular sum is of no force.

* 1 Hal. P. C. 26.

---

In these cases the obligation is to be separated from the act done; the latter can only be annulled upon equitable terms; the former is simply unenforceable against the minor, while no question can arise upon it otherwise. Per contra, the acts done by either party may have legal consequences, which only the minor can avoid—under what conditions?

In all executed contracts there is something done, the practical consequences of which are the same when an infant does them as when they are done by a person of full age. It is absurd to speak of such acts as void or voidable. Being actually done, the only question is what legal consequences follow; and we must distinguish land, chattels, money. Where the infant has conveyed land, the grantee has a title good as to all third persons (Irvine v. Irvine, 9 Wall. 628, 19 L. Ed. 804), and is bound by his purchase, although the infant may avoid it by re-entry, without returning the price (Green v. Green, 69 N. Y. 533, 25 Am. Rep. 233), or by deed to another person, after he is of age, except where the grantee is in actual possession, and the law avoids deeds of land in adverse possession, when he must re-enter (Riggs v. Fisk, 64 Ind. 100; Mustard v. Wohlford, 15 Gratt. (Va.) 329, 76 Am. Dec. 209). The privilege is not lost by mere acquiescence even after he comes of age, until the statute of limitations runs (Wallace v. Latham, 52 Miss. 291); but the sale may be confirmed by his conduct, amounting to an equitable estoppel (Irvine v. Irvine, 9 Wall. 627, 628, 19 L. Ed. 803, 804; Davis v. Dudley, 70 Me. 236, 35 Am. Rep. 318; Ferguson v. Bobo, 54 Miss. 121; Allen v. Poole, 54 Miss. 323), and of course by his express grant, or recital, and confirmation in another grant. (Phillips v. Green, 5 T. B. Mon. (21 Ky.) 344.)

The distinction between what the infant has actually done, and what he has promised or directed to be done, lost sight of entirely in the common maxims as to the effect of his contracts (because executed and executory contracts alike was guilty of a heinous murder, was held a proper subject for capital punishment, by the opinion of all the judges.<sup>7</sup>

With regard to estates and civil property, an infant hath many privileges, which will be better understood when we come to treat more particularly of those matters: but this may be said in general, that an infant shall lose nothing by nonclaim, or neglect of demanding his right: nor shall any other laches or negligence be imputed to an infant, except in some very particular cases.

§ 631. (1) Contracts and conveyances of infants.—It is generally true, that an infant can neither alien his lands, nor do any legal act, nor make a deed, nor, indeed, any manner of contract, that will bind him. But still to all these rules there are some ex-v Foster. 72.

---

are included in that term), was at the basis of the old distinction between feoffment and grant. The former, an actual livery of seisin, is voidable only, because something has actually been done which requires to be undone before the parties are in statu quo; the latter, a mere declaration or written instrument, making no change in the subject matter of itself, can be entirely disregarded, or held void, and will thus leave the parties in statu quo. (Thompson v. Leach, Carth. 435; Comb. 469; 3 Salk. 300; 2 Vent. 198; Yates v. Boen, 2 Strange, 1104; Ball v. Mannin, 1 Dow & C. 380; Dexter v. Hall, 15 Wall. 9, 21 L. Ed. 73, criticising 2 Bl. Comm. 291.)

The passage of Perkins, quoted by Lord Mansfield, 3 Burr. 1804, and so many others, which makes an infant's grant void if it does not take effect by delivery of his hand, is often understood as if it referred to the delivery of the deed itself (see Lord Mansfield's reasoning, etc., and comments by Judge Story, Tucker v. Moreland, 10 Pet. 67-70, 9 L. Ed. 349, 350); but there seems no doubt that he meant livery of seisin, or of the land itself; i. e., that he had in mind the primitive distinction between feoffments and other conveyances. In section 14 soon after he says: "If an infant give a horse, and do not deliver him with his hand, and the donee take the horse by the force of the gift, the infant shall have trespass. But if he do deliver with his own hand not." (1 Mod. 137.) It is plain that nothing here depends on delivery of a deed, but on delivery of the thing itself. By a feoffment, or wherever there is livery of seisin, the infant actually transfers the land, and it cannot be treated as a nullity, though he have a right to take it again. But all other deeds by which an estate passes are void, and do not transfer the land (see Perk. § 15); but Lord Mansfield held a lease and release voidable only in Z. v. P., and thus destroyed the ancient distinction. (See statement by Bronson, J., in Fonda v. Van Horne, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 631, 30 Am. Dec. 77, 80.) The same phrase is used in Whittingham's Case, 8 Coke, 84, "if ceptions: part of which were just now mentioned in reckoning up the different capacities which they assume at different ages; and there are others, a few of which it may not be improper to recite, as a general specimen of the whole. And, first, it is true that infants cannot alien their estates: but infant trustees, or mortgagees, are enabled to convey, under the direction of the court of chancery or exchequer, or other courts of equity, the estates they hold in trust or mortgage, to such person as the court shall appoint.* Also it is generally true, that an infant can do no legal act: yet, an infant, who has an advowson, may present to the benefice when it becomes void.† For the law in this case dispenses with one rule, in order to maintain others of far [466] greater consequence: it * Stat. 7 Ann. c. 19 (Trust or Mortgage Estates, 1708). 4 Geo. III. c. 16 (Infant Trustees and Mortgagees, 1763).

† Co. Litt. 172.

---

the infant makes a feoffment in fee, and executes it by livery of seisin by his own hands"; and this case illustrates Perkins, for it holds an infant's feoffment valid, if made so, but void if made by letter of attorney. (Whittingham's Case, 8 Coke, 89.) R. W. devised to his bastard daughter and her heirs. She enfeoffed S. and died without issue before her majority. The question was whether the land escheated to the queen; i. e., whether the infant's feoffment was a valid transfer of the fee. On the assumption that it was made by livery of seisin by her own hands, the two chief justices held that it was valid (p. 84). But it afterward appeared that it was executed by letter of attorney made by the infant, wherefore it was resolved that it was void, and the land did escheat (p. 89).

The old doctrine is well stated in Viner, Lunatic, C. 3, 3, and Infant, D. E.; though it seems from D. 33, vol. 9, fol. 387, that it was repudiated in Thompson v. Leach, by Chief Justice Holt, at least as to infants. In D. 29 it is said that if an infant makes feoffment, and dies without heir, the feoffment is unavoidable, citing Y. B. etc.

The rule as to infant's contracts is generally stated as follows: When the court can pronounce the contract to be for the infant's prejudice, it is void; when to his benefit, as for necessities, it is good; when the contract is of an uncertain nature as to benefit or prejudice, it is voidable only at the election of the infant. (Per Eyre, C. J., in Keane v. Boycott, 2 H. Black. 511; Mansfield, C. J., in Zouch v. Parsons, 3 Burr. 1794; 1 W. Black. 575. See Williams v. Moore, 11 Mees. & W. 256, for criticism on voidable and void, with remark of Wooddesson, I. 239, and note 2, pointing out the objection, and in favor of holding all voidable.) The objections to the distinction of void and voidable are strongly stated in Clark v. Goddard, 39 Ala. 164, 84 Am. Dec. 777; followed in Langham v. State, 55 Ala. 114. Compare authorities in 34 Am.

permits an infant to present a clerk (who, if unfit, may be rejected by the bishop) rather than either suffer the church to be unserved till he comes of age, or permit the infant to be debarred of his right by lapse to the bishop. An infant may also purchase lands, but his purchase is incomplete: for, when he comes to age, he may either agree or disagree to it, as he thinks prudent or proper, without alleging any reason; and so may his heirs after him, if he dies without having completed his agreement.<sup>b</sup> It is, further, generally true, that an infant, under twenty-one, can make no deed but what is afterwards voidable: yet in some cases<sup>c</sup> he may bind him-

<sup>b</sup> Co. Litt. 2.

<sup>c</sup> Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4 (Artificers and Apprentices, 1562). 43 Eliz. c. 2 (Poor Relief, 1601). Cro. Car. 179.

---

Dec. 538, as to binding force of apprenticeship. But Woodruff v. Logan, 6 Ark. 276, 42 Am. Dec. 695, holds such a contract made by infant alone binding because beneficial.

